seriously ill, and before many days were gone, it became manifest that he was dying. He had long suffered from gout, which had enfeebled his whole frame, and, once sunk on his couch of sickness, left him unable even to use his hands for eating. Elizabeth, as soon as she heard of the serious state of her old minister, trustiest of all her servants, began visiting him, though herself far from well, and going day after day, took a sad pleasure in administering to him little comforts, and taking the place of a nurse in giving him his food. These kind attentions greatly cheered the heart of the dying statesman; and when, on the 4th of August, he closed his eyes for the last earthly sleep, it was with a smile on his lips. The loss of Burleigh deeply affected the queen. Her tears flowed fast when the news of his death was carried to her, and nothing for a long while could disturb her melancholy. That she herself was approaching the dark gate dividing the here from the hereafter, Elizabeth poignantly felt at the decease of Burleigh, and felt again, a few weeks after, on the report of another death. On the 4th of August expired her truest friend; and on the 13th of September following died her greatest enemy. King Philip perished on this day, after having suffered for months the most excruciating pains, his body being covered all over with frightful ulcers, and the worms beginning to devour him while yet the last faint flame of life was flickering. The end of the "demon of the south" was a great theme for Huguenot preachers, yet was it not altogether devoid of the coldly heroic element. Not a sound of complaint escaped the lips of Philip under all his horrible sufferings, and not a tear moistened his eye in taking farewell of the world. His indomitable pride never left him for an instant; he thought it unbecoming in a great king to utter complaints, and he complained not. He died as he had lived, silent and impenetrable.

When the queen's grief about the loss of her great minister had somewhat subsided, Essex returned to court. He was too honest to feign sorrow for the death of a man who had been his bitter enemy; but his sympathy with Sir Robert Cecil was real, and he frankly offered him the hand of friendship. The young secretary, whose great ambition was to fill the vacant place of chief adviser of Elizabeth, professed the same feelings, yet mistrusted Essex secretly, both as a rival in the queen's favour, and as absolutely opposed to his peace policy. Cecil hated war even more than his father, and knowing that as long as the imperious earl preserved his influence with the queen there would be no security against England being dragged into battle, at some moment or other, he felt himself compelled in mere self-defence to get rid of him. An opportunity was not long wanting. The proceedings against Ireland, interrupted by the death of the lord treasurer, were taken up soon after; and the question of the appointment of a commander-in-chief coming on again for discussion in the privy council, Cecil artfully hinted at the fitness of the earl of Essex to fill the post. Elizabeth eagerly caught at the suggestion. She felt quite as anxious as the secretary to discard Essex, having got tired of the handsome lover who had amused her for a time, but was now becoming very inconvenient and troublesome in his arrogance. The offer to take the chief command in Ireland was made accordingly to the earl; and though he appeared to be conscious that it was a snare, meant for nothing else than to lead him into destruction, he deemed it cowardice to refuse the post. His only conditions were to be invested with ample powers, and to have the command of at least thirty thousand troops; and all this being granted to him, together with the right of nominating his own officers, he set sail in March, 1599. Before starting, his heart misgave him once more, and with a consciousness as if ruin was impending over him, he sent a pathetic letter to his royal mistress. "From a mind delighting in sorrow," Essex wrote; "from spirits wasted with passion; from a heart torn in pieces with care, grief, and travel; from a man that hateth himself and all things else that keep him alive: what service can your majesty expect, since any service past deserves no more than banishment and proscription to the cursedest of all islands? It is a rebel's pride and assumption that you will give me leave to ransom myself out of this hateful prison, out of my loathed body, which, if it happeneth so, your majesty shall have no cause to mislike the fashion of my death, since the course of my life could never please you." Elizabeth received her favourite's romantic address with great indifference, and quietly allowed him to take his departure for "the cursedest of all islands."

The career of Essex in Ireland justified but too much his evil forebodings. He landed at Dublin with an army of twenty-two thousand men, and found ten thousand more in garrison within the English Pale; but considerable as was this force, it was utterly inadequate for the gigantic task assigned to him. Ireland, to be brought under obedience to the English government, had to be not only conquered, but to be civilized. To kill a few thousand natives in battle, or to hang a few score ragged chieftains, calling themselves kings, was clearly useless for achieving the desired end, amounting to little else than lopping off branches of single trees, while a virgin forest was remaining behind. A few weeks' sojourn in the Pale, with an occasional raid into impenetrable bogs and attack upon half-naked people armed with clubs and spears, were quite sufficient to teach Essex not to attempt the task of conquering a country which, even if conquered, could not possibly be held; and he therefore wisely resigned himself to establish orderly rule in the districts occupied by English troops, or more immediately within their reach. With this object in view he left Dublin on the 10th of May, at the head of a force of sixteen thousand men, and defeating the rebels in a number of engagements, with great loss on his part, yet very little actual result, made his way to Waterford, and from thence back again to the capital. Here he remained from the 3rd of July till the 28th of August, and then set out on a march northward into Ulster, to do battle with the earl of Tyrone, the greatest and most dangerous foe of the English government. The two armies met on the road from Drogheda to Louth; but instead of fighting the chiefs entered into negotiations with each other. Sickiness and constant skirmishing with the natives had reduced the troops under the command of Essex to less than ten thousand; and finding himself opposed by a force more than three times the strength of his own, stationed in a very superior position, he gladly accepted the offer of the rebel chief to treat for peace. On the proposition of Tyrone, he and Essex met at the ford of Bellachinoche, the Irish earl sitting on horseback in the middle of the stream, with the water up to his hips, and Essex standing on the southern bank, leaning on his sword. The result of this conference was an armistice of six weeks, which had no sooner been concluded when Essex marched back to Dublin, troubling himself no further about the proceedings of his antagonist. A report had reached him that the queen had fallen alarmingly ill, and he was seized by an overwhelming anxiety to get back to England.

Arrived at Dublin, Essex made the government of Ireland over to his friend, Sir George Carew, and without asking the permission of the queen to quit his post, or awaiting any orders of the home government, took passage on board one of his ships for England, accompanied by only six persons, among them Sir John Harrington, a godson of Elizabeth. The travellers reached London before daybreak on the morning of the 28th of September; and learning that the queen was at her palace of Nonsuch, in Surrey, Essex hastily crossed the Thames ferry at Lambeth, and spurred along the miry paths and bye-ways till he had reached the royal residence. It was ten o'clock in the morning when the impetuous rider stood before the palace gates, and was told that the queen had not yet quitted her chamber. The information was lost upon Essex, for without waiting a moment, breathless, his clothes in disorder, and bespattered with mud up to his very face, he rushed into Elizabeth's bedroom, scattering the frightened maids of honour to right and left. The queen had just risen, with her hair still about her face, when the earl stormed into her chamber, threw himself at her feet, and in a wild burst of passion seized her hands, which he covered with kisses. The sight of the hot lover before her, strikingly handsome even in his travel-stained garments, with the flush of excitement and of the long morning ride upon his face, was too pleasing to the queen not to make her overlook the want of respect of his violent intrusion; and after a lengthened interview Essex retired, loudly expressing his contentment to the courtiers assembled in the ante-chamber. The satisfaction was somewhat premature. Half an hour after the departure of her favourite Elizabeth granted an audience to Sir Robert Cecil; and when the earl returned in the course of the day, having cast off the traveller, and clad in his superb court dress, he found the scene entirely changed. It was with great difficulty he obtained another interview with her majesty, who no longer looked smilingly upon him, but told him in a harsh tone that he would have to justify before the privy council his conduct of leaving his post and neglecting his duty. Cecil was standing at the side of the queen while she addressed the earl, whose agitation made his hands tremble, while an ashy paleness spread over his face. The battle between the handsome and highly-gifted earl and the crooked little secretary with the "big head-piece" was fast drawing to an end, and Essex himself could doubt no longer who would win the game.

The earl was summoned before the privy council the day after his arrival at Nonsuch Palace, the 29th of September. When he entered the council room, at two in the afternoon, the lords rose for a moment to greet him; but they seated themselves immediately after, while he remained standing bareheaded at the foot of the table. After a short pause Sir Robert Cecil took up a paper, and, requesting the attention of Essex, informed him that he stood indicted on three charges, namely, "his disobedience of her majesty's instructions in regard to Ireland; his contemptuous disregard of his duty in returning without leave; and his over-bold going to her majesty's presence in her bedchamber." The replies of the earl were dignified, though resting on grounds unknown both to civil and military law. He pretended that as commander-in-chief, invested with absolute powers, he had a right to conclude treaties with rebels, even although his orders were to make war upon them, and he moreover argued that the same absolute powers enabled him to leave his post temporarily for the purpose of conferring with his sovereign. As to the charge of rushing unannounced into the queen's bedroom, Essex threw himself at her majesty's mercy. On having the defence of the earl communicated to her, Elizabeth remarked, drily, "that she would pause and consider his answers," giving orders at the same time to confine Essex to his own room. The same evening the queen had an interview with her godson, to whom she very excitedly expressed her feelings concerning the man in whose company he had come from Ireland. Sir John Harrington himself recorded the interview in a letter to a friend. When first espying her godson, "What!" Elizabeth exclaimed, "did the fool bring you too? Go back to your business." The honeyed words of Sir John, thoroughly acquainted with all the arts of courtiership, had little effect upon the angry queen. "She chafed much," Harrington informed his friend, "walked to and fro, looked with discomposure in her visage, and, when I knoed to her, caught at my girdle and swore, 'By God's son! I am no queen: that man is above me! Who gave him command to come here so soon? I did send him on other business.' She bid me go home; and I did not stay to be bidden twice. If all the Irish rebels had been at my heels I should not have made better speed."

That Essex had finally, and probably for ever, fallen from the giddy height to which the queen's favour had raised him was now beyond doubt; but the real causes of Elizabeth's wrath against her old favourite were as yet known only to herself and Sir Robert Cecil. The earl's treaty with Tyrone, and subsequent flight from his post of duty, though grave facts in the act of accusation, were the mere pretence of his ruin, and still more so his unauthorized intrusion into the royal bedroom. Elizabeth had pardoned the latter crime, not too heinous in her eyes, the moment it was committed; and it was only after the conference with Cecil, which followed in the wake of the earl's unexpected appearance at court, that her feelings towards him seemed to turn, all on a sudden, from love into hatred. It was this conference which decided the fate of Essex. In it the secretary informed her majesty, under proof of many documents, that the earl had been for a lengthened time in constant communication with King James; that his correspondence had grown more and more intimate during his sojourn in Ireland; and that the real reason of his

abrupt departure from his post was to be found in the receipt of news which made him hope that the crown was about to be left vacant, and that he might help to place it on the head of his royal correspondent. There was a considerable amount of truth in these revelations made by Cecil to his royal mistress; but the secretary neglected to add a few important points concerning his own actions. He himself had long kept up an active intercourse with James VI., so contrived, however, that it could not be easily proved; and he himself had sent the report of the desperate illness of the queen to Ireland, and to prevent its immediate contradiction had stopped for a few days all ships but those carrying the false intelligence. The bait had taken exceedingly well, luring the too vehement and too careless favourite to destruction. Though it could not be charged against Essex as a crime to exchange letters with the monarch of Scotland or his friends, and to harbour intentions for assisting him in securing a succession to which all England held him to be entitled, Elizabeth's anger nevertheless passed all bounds on hearing of the deceit practised by the man nearest to her heart, leaving her decided never to forgive him. The first examination of the earl was followed by another the next day, after which the queen gave orders that he should be committed to the custody of the lord keeper at York House. In the meanwhile there were warm discussions in the privy council, where Essex personally had as many friends as Cecil enemies; and it was decided in the end to acquit the earl from the charges brought against him. Elizabeth showed some exasperation at the report, but soon calmed down, being herself undecided as yet what to do with her discarded favourite. A faint flicker of tenderness for him was still lingering in the bosom of the queen, new hatred being strangely mixed with old love.

For more than eight months Elizabeth wavered between rancour and pity, till at last pity got the upper hand. Thrice she made out the warrant for the committal of Essex to the Tower, and thrice she revoked it, giving finally, as if ashamed of her own indecision, a half secret command for his release from the custody of the lord keeper, with strict orders, however, that he should not venture into her presence. The earl sullenly obeyed, but, as if in revenge of his exclusion from court, at once began to keep open house at his mansion in Essex Street, gathering around him all his friends and admirers, and forming a sort of court of his own. His popularity among the citizens of London had always been great, both on account of his brilliant personal qualities and his unbounded liberality, so that there was no want of ardent followers ready to share in his banquets, to listen to his speeches, and to bestow upon him their enthusiastic applause. The latter went deep into the heart of Essex, ripening a plan over which he had been brooding ever since the commencement of his disgrace at court. It consisted of nothing less than to expel Cecil and his party forcibly from the government, to surround the queen by a number of his own adherents, making her to some extent a prisoner, and, in order to gain a strong hold over the people, sufficient to counteract the affection borne to Elizabeth, to call in the aid of the king of Scotland as heir apparent of the throne. Wild as was the scheme, the earl set seriously about its execution a few months after his release from custody. Scattering money with open hands, he soon gathered around him a great number of partizans, some of them mere needy adventurers, but others of a better class, who had served under him in France, Ireland, and Spain. They diligently spread the rumour that the queen was not right in her senses, and that, having fallen entirely under the dominion of her crooked little secretary, a conspiracy had been set on foot for depriving King James of his right to the succession, and admitting the claim of the daughter of Philip II., who, being a foreigner and entirely ignorant of the country, would fall under the absolute rule of the Cecil clique. The story found credence, the more so as there seemed real signs that the mental faculties of Elizabeth were on the verge of aberration. "She walks much," Sir John Harrington wrote to a city acquaintance, "in her chamber, and stamps with her foot at ill news, and thrusts her rusty sword at times into the tapestry in great rage. She always keeps a sword by her table. Her highness hath worn but one change of raiment for many days, and swears much at those that cause her griefs." She had griefs enough, the poor queen, now getting close upon seventy, with crowds of fawning hypocrites around her, with nothing but envy, jealousy, and distrust before her eyes, and without a single true-loving human creature in the world on whose bosom she might rest her grey old head.

The preparations of Essex to possess himself of the government were not carried on in secret, but openly in the light of day. But for her utter prostration of mind and body, Elizabeth might have ended them at a stroke, by despatching half a dozen of her guards, and sending Essex to the Tower. However, she allowed him, with apparent unconcern, to preach insurrection not only in his own house but at every public place in the city; and it was not before the beginning of February, 1601, when he had been playing the rebel for more than seven months, that she sent two members of the privy council, the lord chancellor and the lord chief justice, to remonstrate with him about his undutiful behaviour. It was on a Sunday morning, the 8th of February, that the two lords knocked at the gate of Essex House, demanding admission in the name of the queen. They were admitted into the courtyard after some delay, and finding it full of armed men, looking as if prepared for a fight or a revolt, demanded to know the meaning of this extraordinary assemblage. Essex, speaking with great vehemence, told them that his life was in danger from the machinations of his enemies, and that his friends had gathered around him for his own and their safety. To this the lord keeper replied that the laws of the land would protect him, as all other citizens; but while he was trying to pacify the excited earl, a great clamour arose among the crowd, they crying, addressing their chief, "Away, my lord, they abuse you, they betray you, they undo you." Bravely facing the multitude, the lord keeper made another attempt to appease the earl: "Let us speak with you privately," he exclaimed, "so as to understand your griefs." Essex thereupon led them into the house, as if to hold a conversation; yet instead of doing so looked them up in a room, while the armed mob behind went crying, "Kill them! kill them!" Having made prisoners of the queen's envoys, the earl rushed forth from his house towards the city, brandishing his sword, and calling upon the people to rise in arms and gather around him.

A madder attempt at revolt had never been made in England. The earl was a great favourite among the citizens of London, and they fully comprehended his griefs of disappointed ambition; but when he stormed through the streets, his naked sword in hand, not a man stirred from his door, all staring at him as at an apparition, or a person seized by temporary insanity. Arrived at Ludgate, with a crowd of his own followers and servants at his heels, Essex found the chains drawn, and his progress opposed by a company of the train bands, called up in haste by the bishop of London. A conflict ensued, in which several men were killed, which appeared to have the effect of sobering the infuriated earl, so that he pressed no further, but making his way to the river, jumped into a barge, and returned to Essex House. Here, in the meanwhile, things had gone against him nearly as much as in the city. By the help of one of his false friends, the lord keeper and lord chancellor, whom he intended to hold as hostages, had escaped, and defection seemed rife among the rabble of his adherents. Essex nevertheless continued in his mad course, resolved to turn his dwelling into a fortress against the government, whereupon Cecil began to think that the game had lasted long enough. Without awaiting the orders of the queen, who had listened to the report of the earl's revolt with the greatest indifference, evidently considering it a mere farce, he despatched a large body of soldiers with cannon and ammunition to attack Essex House, and, if necessary, batter it to the ground. The force, commanded by the earl of Nottingham, arrived at nightfall; but before the preparations for the assault upon his improvised stronghold had been completed, Essex declared his intention to surrender. It was against the advice of his more intimate friends, who argued that he had gone too far to be able to claim a pardon, and that he had no other resource left but to fight his way through his assailants, and seek safety abroad, in France or the Netherlands. However, the earl did not listen to this counsel; his sudden frenzy had been followed by equally sudden depression, and in this mood he handed his sword to Nottingham, with the feeling still strong in his mind of possessing the love of the queen. He seemed to forget that the queen was verging upon three score and ten.

Early on the morning of the 9th of February, the gates of the Tower shut upon Essex; and on the morning of the 19th he was led to trial before the house of peers on the charge of high treason. The guilt of the earl in attempting to stir up an insurrection, and even shedding blood to this effect, was undeniable, and his defiance, therefore, was reduced to the plea that he did not intend to hurt the queen personally. "Here I protest before the living God," he exclaimed, solemnly, "as he may have mercy upon me, that my conscience is clear from any disloyal thought of harm to her majesty." This plea naturally could avail him but little, and after a trial, lasting from nine in the morning till six at night, in which judges and lawyers rivalled with each other to abuse the fallen favourite—a man great in brains and small in heart whom he himself had raised, Francis Bacon, coveting distinction in the rancour of his attacks—Essex was condemned to death. When led back to the Tower by torchlight, with the sharp axe of the executioner turned against his face, half the population of the city streamed forth to see him; but he, as recorded by an eye-witness, “went a swift pace, bending his face to the earth, and would not look upon any of them, though some spake directly to him.” The day after the condemnation of the lover on whom her soul had once hung in raptures, Elizabeth signed the warrant for his execution. She signed it with a firm hand, putting an elaborate flourish around her name, as if determined to keep up the full beauty of her much-admired penmanship. On Ash Wednesday, the 25th of February, six days after his trial, the earl’s head was struck off within the walls of the Tower, in the presence of only a few dozen courtiers and lords, who sat round the scaffold as if witnessing an entertainment. The official report of the execution of her favourite was brought to the queen while she was playing on the spinet; there was intense grief on the countenance of all the ladies in the room, but she affected joyfulness, and launched out into a merry tune.

Among the people, the execution of the earl created a decided feeling against Elizabeth. Though the guilt of Essex in getting up a foolish revolt was undoubted, yet the general belief was that he had been tempted into it by intrigues, and that but for the desire of ridding herself of her old lover, the queen might have put a stop to the whole affair, weeks before its outbreak, by a mere word. The impression seemed justified from the fact that the principal adherents of Essex, including the earl of Southampton, his most intimate friend, and who had been condemned to death with him, received the queen’s pardon, and that some even were admitted into favour at court, and gratified with honours of various kinds. All this served to render Elizabeth unpopular all at once; and whereas it had been her greatest delight before to be greeted wherever she appeared by the joyful acclamations of the multitude, she now was condemned to move about amidst the ominous silence of her subjects. Under this treatment the temper of the aged queen soured more and more, inclining her to cruelty and absolute bloodthirstiness. Not long after the death of Essex, there arrived a special ambassador from France, in the person of the marshal de Biron, to whom the queen, as a pleasant entertainment, showed the rows of skulls of condemned traitors, piled over the gates of London Bridge and on the walls of the Tower. Biron, though having witnessed the horrors of the night of St. Bartholomew, yet got somewhat pale on beholding three hundred ghastly heads, half devoured by birds of prey, stuck up over the city entrance, and her majesty riding merrily underneath, with a peep at old friends and acquaintances among the rotten skulls. The report from his ambassador of the sights he had been shown, induced Henry IV. to break off an intended visit to England, which he had been planning for some time. Elizabeth felt greatly annoyed at this change of purpose, being most desirous to look face to face upon the gallant king and soldier, renowned equally for winning battles and killing ladies’ hearts. To coax him to her court, if possible, the queen went down to Dover, on learning that Henry was on a journey to Calais, taking care to let him know that she was expecting him, and adding, to give a spur to his curiosity, that she had a most important secret to communicate, which could be told to none but himself. But Henry politely excused himself, refusing, almost for the first time in his life, the invitation of a lady. He would not have refused, probably, if the lady had been seventeen instead of seventy.

In the autumn of 1601, the queen summoned a parliament—the last of her reign. She opened it in person, with great pomp, on the 27th of October; but her haggard looks belied the bold words in which she alluded to her health and strength; and when, towards the end of the ceremony, she shivered and trembled under the weight of her golden robes, being kept from falling only by the arms of the bystanding courtiers, it became evident to all that her days were numbered. Her procession to and from Westminster was even more gloomy and sad than the scene within doors; the crowds lining the road, still resenting the death of Essex, were silent as the grave, not a cry uttering welcome to the once idolized queen, whose gray hair, deeply furrowed cheeks, and lustreless eyes, were heralding the end of all earthly pride. As if to make up for this absence of popular sympathies, the members of both houses of parliament exhausted themselves in demonstrations of slavish humility towards Elizabeth. On the question of subsidy being brought up for discussion in the lower house, one Mr. Heyle came forward with the astounding assertion that all England belonged to the queen. “I marvel much,” exclaimed this worthy representative of the people, a lawyer by profession; “I marvel much that the house should stand upon granting of a subsidy, or the time of payment, when all we have is her majesty’s, and she may lawfully at her pleasure take it from us: yea, she hath as much right to all our lands and goods as to any revenue of her crown.” Other members followed in the same strain, one of them speaking of the queen as a being endowed with superhuman qualities, and another calling one of her messages to the house “a gospel of glad tidings.” The vote of four subsidies at once followed in the wake of these orations, after which the members of the house of commons begged permission to throw themselves at the feet of her majesty. They went, to the number of one hundred and forty, and prostrating themselves in the dust, the speaker read to Elizabeth an address expressive of the boundless affection of the commons, because “her sacred ears were ever open to hear them, and her blessed hands ever stretched out to relieve them.” After telling her majesty that the attributes most proper to God belonged also to her, that she was all truth, all constancy, and all goodness, the speaker concluded; “Neither do we present our thanks in words or any outward sign, which can be no sufficient retribution for so great goodness; but in all duty and thankfulness, prostrate at your feet, we present our most loyal and thankful hearts, even the last drop of blood in our hearts, and the last spirit of breath in our nostrils, to be poured out, to be breathed up for your safety." Elizabeth listened very complacently to this profane adulation, as if convinced of its being no more than the truth.

But the time was fast approaching now when all worldly pride and vanity were powerless to fan the last pale embers of a burnt-out life. At the commencement of 1602 the queen fell into deep melancholy, from which all her attendants, courtiers, and flatterers found it impossible to raise her. Nightly she saw visions hovering over her couch, among them "her own body, exceedingly lean and fearful in a light of fire," with other produce of the imagination—and of a diseased liver. The queen suffered under a complication of physical and mental disorders; gout, rheumatism, and dyspepsia alternately racked her body, to all which were added weird phantoms of the mind, culminating in the terror of death. She professed to be weary of existence, yet could not bear even the sight of mourning garments, and fiercely resented any allusion, however faint, to her approaching decease. The shrewd little man, Sir Robert Cecil, cleverly played upon this weakness, and ingratiated himself more than ever with his mistress, by telling her of the prospect of a long life still in store for her, and, to fortify this belief, procuring for her all sorts of elixirs and wonderful talismans. One day, Sir John Stanhope, vice-chamberlain, and one of Cecil's familiars, presented Elizabeth with a piece of gold, "of the bigness of an angel, full of characters," which, he said, came from a lady in Wales, who had lived to the good age of one hundred and twenty years, and feeling extremely juvenile and in high spirits, was induced to lend her sigil to the queen, assured that as long as she wore it on her body she could not die. Her majesty eagerly "took the piece of gold and hung it about her neck." The event, related by Lady Southwell, one of the favourite maids of honour of the queen, had a strange sequel. Elizabeth, after she had hung the talisman around her neck, got more desponding than before, and, as reported by her maid of honour, "though she became not suddenly sick, yet she daily decreased of her rest and feeding, and within fifteen days fell downright ill." "Then," Lady Southwell continues, "in the melancholy of her sickness, she desired to see a true looking-glass, which in twenty years before she had not seen, but only such a one as on purpose was made to deceive her sight; which true looking-glass being brought to her, she presently fell exclaiming at all those flatterers who had so much commended her, and they durst not after come into her presence." The courtiers whispered to each other that she was going mad; but there was "system in her madness."

Towards the end of the summer of 1602, Elizabeth somewhat rallied, so as to be able to receive the marquis de Beaumont, ambassador of Henry IV., as well as two special envoys from the court of Scotland, bringing congratulations to her birthday. King James was anxiously looking forward to his great heritage, and wondering how it happened that his aged relative did live so long, despatched some of his ministers to look after her and report upon her actual condition. The queen was not for a moment blind to the cause which had brought the gentlemen from Edinburgh, and to spite her dear heir and hopeful successor, engaged upon an extraordinary performance. When the envoys of James were waiting one day in the royal antechamber, expecting an audience, she dressed herself up in youthful costume, and then went hopping about to the sound of a fiddle, allowing the watchful diplomatists to have a peep at her through the half-opened door. James got nearly as melancholy as Elizabeth had been, on receiving the report of this scene; however, he regained his spirits in about a month, with the arrival of the news that the queen's life was despaired of. It was Cecil who furnished this information, keeping in active correspondence with the king of Scotland, and steadily aiming at the fulfilment of the great task which all the tribe of courtiers kept in view, to worship the rising while not neglecting the setting sun. His doings were not entirely unknown to the queen, who more than once reproved him when perceiving that he was engaged in other service than her own. On one occasion he was near being caught in his dangerous intrigues, and only saved himself by a clever stroke of cunning. While attending at court, a packet of a mysterious nature was put into his hands, and Elizabeth detecting with a quick glance that it came from Scotland, demanded to see the contents. Cecil bowed in the most unconcerned manner, and then, slowly unloosening the strings of the bundle of papers landed to him, broke forth in a kind of monologue. "This packet," he murmured slowly, as if speaking to himself; "this packet has a most strange and evil smell: surely it has not been in contact with infected persons or goods." The queen, terribly afraid of contagion, at once fell back a step, ordering her secretary to take the parcel away, and not bring it into her presence again till thoroughly fumigated. Cecil hastened to obey the order, and returning in the course of the day, had the satisfaction to show his sovereign letters inwardly as well as outwardly clean.

After suffering a relapse in the autumn of 1602, Elizabeth somewhat recovered the following winter, and in the middle of January, 1603, felt so well as to be able to remove from Whitehall to Richmond Palace. The change seemed to be favourable to her for about a month, at the end of which she got again so weak as to be incapable of leaving her room. But feeble as she was, she declined all medical aid, and refused even to go to rest, on account, it was said, of an old prediction which told her that she would die in bed. Cecil, the high admiral, and some of her more immediate attendants, in vain entreated her to take at least some nourishing broth; but she sullenly rejected all offers, telling them that "she knew her own constitution better than they did, and that she was not in so much danger as they imagined." To the admiral, who continued pressing her to seek rest on her couch, she gave a fearful reply. "If he were in the habit of seeing such things in bed as she did in hers," Elizabeth exclaimed, "he would not persuade her to go there." After a few days thus passed, the queen seemed to get distrustful of all around her, only allowing a few persons to enter her chamber, among them her kinsman, Robert Carey, brother of Lady Scrope, one of the favourite ladies of honour, who had come up from Berwick, pretending to be overwhelmed with anxiety for the health of his beloved sovereign, but in reality as a spy in the service of King James. Carey, according to his own description, found the queen "sitting low upon her cushions. She called me to her: I kissed her hand, and told her it was my chiefest happiness to see her in safety and health, which I wished might long continue. She took me by the hand, and wrung it hard, and said, 'No, Robin, I am not well,' and then discoursed with me of her indisposition, and that her heart had been sad and heavy for ten or twelve days; and in her discourse she fetched not so few as forty or fifty great sighs." In the middle of March, the French ambassador, de Beaumont, was permitted to enter the chamber of Elizabeth, and describing her state, informed his master "that the queen continued to grow worse, and appeared in a manner insensible, not speaking above once in two or three hours, and at last remained silent for four-and-twenty hours, holding her finger almost continually in her mouth, with her rayless eyes open, and fixed on the ground, where she sat on cushions, without rising or resting herself, greatly emaciated by her long watching and fasting." On Wednesday, the 23rd of March, Elizabeth grew speechless. "That afternoon," as reported by Carey, "by signs she called for her council, and by putting her hand to her head when the king of Scots was named to succeed her, they all knew he was the man she desired should reign after her." No more sound escaped the lips of the queen. Resting in mute agony on her pillows, she breathed heavily a few hours longer, till, at three o'clock on Thursday, the 24th of March, there was an end to all the earthly struggles of Elizabeth, last of the royal Tudor race.

Over the couch of the dying queen two ladies of honour kept watching intently. At the moment she ceased to breathe, one of them, Lady Scrope, rushed to the window, and dropped a sapphire ring. It fell at the feet of her brother, Robert Carey, who grasped it hastily, jumped on a ready-saddled horse, and galloped away on the road to Scotland.

TOMB OF ELIZABETH.

CHAPTER II.

History of Law and Government, from the accession of Henry VII., A.D. 1485, to the death of Elizabeth, A.D. 1603. *

THE five reigns from Henry VII. to Elizabeth, commonly known as the Tudor period, form the culminating point of absolute monarchy in England. The tendency to it was visible towards the middle of the fifteenth century, or the latter part of the reign of Henry VI.; but it did not find its true expression till another generation had come and gone, and a sovereign of a new race, shrewder than any of his predecessors, had climbed, sword in hand, up the golden steps of the throne. From the time of the Norman conquest, but principally from the date of Magna Charta, till the end of the reign of Richard III., the kingdom remained under a more or less strong oligarchical rule. The chief political power was in the hands of a numerous and wealthy feudal nobility, and the king himself was little more than a noble lord, raised temporarily above his compeers. He lived in their midst, selected his consort from among their ranks, was sometimes aided and sometimes opposed by them in his peaceful and warlike enterprises, and not unfrequently hurled from the throne by rebellious barons. The beginning of the War of the Roses saw this formidable oligarchical power in its zenith; the end of it marked its decline. It was a war which devoured its own brood, and while it set all England in flames, burnt the great baronial castles in preference to the cottages of their poor retainers. On the wreck of all this feudal wealth and power arose the first Tudor king, and seeing, with statesmanlike penetration, that peace and prosperity would not be otherwise possible for England, he made it his life task to depress the oligarchical sway, and raise on its foundation the absolute monarchy. In the execution of his vast purpose the king found no lack of willing associates; the influence of the clergy, the cunning of the ministers of law, and the unlimited approbation of the growing middle classes, represented in an obsequious House of Commons, stood at his side so firmly, that at the end of a prosperous reign, extending over near a quarter of a century, Henry VII. had become the mightiest sovereign, and the greatest; if not also the wisest despot, that ever ruled the English nation.

The legislation of Henry VII.—his own essentially, parliament being the merest cipher—may be divided under three heads, as political, social, and commercial. The first was entirely directed towards the strengthening of the royal power and the weakening of that of the aristocracy; the second had for its object the restoration of public order, imperilled by years of wild anarchy; while the third class of laws, the least in which Henry's wisdom was displayed, aimed at expanding English trade and commerce by protective and restrictive enactments. Of the strictly political laws, the most important—already alluded to in the general history of the period—was that by which the nobility acquired the power of breaking the ancient entails and of alienating their estates. "By means of this law," says Hume, "joined to the beginning luxury and refinement of the age, the great fortunes of the barons were gradually dissipated, and the property of the commons increased in England." This important statute, which in its consequences far outweighed any other passed in the same reign, is known as the Statute of Fines, 4 Henry VII., c. 24. A sort of corollary to this law was another "of singular policy," as Lord Bacon has it, concerning enclosures and the division of land. "Enclosures," says Bacon, "at that time began to be more frequent, whereby arable land, which could not be manured without people and families, was turned into pasture, which was easily rid by a few herdsmen; and tenancies for years, lives, and at will, whereupon much of the yeomanry lived, were turned into demesnes. This bred a decay of people, and, by consequence, a decay of towns, churches, tithes, and the like. The king likewise knew full well, and in no wise forgot, that there ensued withal upon this a decay and diminution of subsidies and taxes; for the more gentlemen, ever the lower books of subsidies. In remedying of this inconvenience the king's wisdom was admirable, and the parliament's at that time. Enclosures they would not forbid, for that had been to forbid the improvement of the patrimony of the kingdom; nor tillage they would not compel, for that was to strive with nature and utility; but they took a course to take away depopulating enclosures and depopulating pasturage, and yet not by that name, or by any imperious express prohibition, but by consequence. The ordinance was, 'That all houses of husbandry, that were used with twenty acres of ground and upwards, should be maintained and kept up for ever; together with a competent proportion of land to be used and occupied with them,' and in no wise to be severed from them, as by another statute, made afterwards in his successor's time, was more fully declared: this upon forfeiture to be taken, not by way of popular action, but by seizure of the land itself by the king and lords of the fee, as to half the profits, till the houses and lands were restored. By this means, the houses being kept up did of necessity enforce a dweller; and the proportion of land for occupation being kept up did of necessity enforce that dweller not to be a beggar or cottager, but a man of some substance, that might keep hinds and servants, and set the plough on going. This did wonderfully concern the might and manner-hood of the kingdom, to have farms as it were of a standard sufficient to maintain an able body out of penury, and did in effect amortise a great part of the lands of the kingdom unto the hold and occupation of the yeomanry or middle people, of a condition between gentlemen and cottagers or peasants." The last sentence of the great historian is strikingly suggestive. To turn the swords of the nobles into ploughshares, to "set the plough on going," and to give "the lands of the kingdom unto the hold and occupation of the yeomanry or middle people,"—such was the beginning and end of Henry's legislation.

A task of scarcely less importance than that of debasing the nobility and raising an industrious middle class, was that of restoring the reign of law and order, grievously interrupted by the anarchy of the long civil war. The state of England at this period, the absence of all visible authority and of all means to enforce the laws for the maintenance of public peace, is shown in the great Cornish insurrection, which took place in the twelfth year of Henry's reign. In its major part, the first act, before the appearance of the counterfeit duke of York, it was not by any means a political insurrection, but merely a social disturbance, the people complaining of undue taxation, and wishing to obtain the ear of the king to obtain redress of their grievances. In more settled times the riot would have been suppressed, in all likelihood, on the first interference of the constituted authorities; but so feeble were the ties of law and order, even a dozen years after the battle of Bosworth, that the mob was allowed to pass, nearly unmolested, all the way from Cornwall into Surrey, and had to be defeated in a pitched battle. To stem this fearful torrent of lawlessness, the king enacted a great number of laws, all tending to the speedy administration of justice and the severe punishment of disorder. The institution, or rather remodelling of the famous Star Chamber, subsequently so obnoxious to the English people, was one of the results of the new legislators. From the oldest times, the king's council exercised criminal jurisdiction, and though this power declined with the decay of the royal prerogative, it never entirely ceased. Subsequently to the Norman period the council met at irregular intervals, sitting in a room at Westminster known as the chambre des eslayers, or, in Latin, Camera Stellata. To reconstruct the original jurisdiction of this "Star Chamber" court was the object of one of the statutes of Henry VII., so far attaining its end as it furnished an additional means for enforcing public order. Whatever the Star Chamber court became in after times, it seems certain that in Henry's reign its operation was in the main salutary. Lord Bacon, a great lawyer as well as historian, speaks of the remodelling of the Star Chamber as one of the "excellent laws" of Henry VII., bestowing eloquent praise upon the new tribunal. "This court," he says, "is one of the sagest and noblest institutions of this kingdom. For in the distribution of courts of ordinary justice, besides the high court of parliament, in which distribution the king's bench holdeth the pleas of the crown, the common pleas pleas civil, the exchequer pleas concerning the king's revenue, and the chancery the pretorian power for mitigating the rigour of law, in case of extremity, by the conscience of a good man; there was, nevertheless, always reserved a high and pre-eminent power to the king's council in causes that might in example or consequence concern the state of the commonwealth, which if they were criminal the council used to sit in the chamber called the Star Chamber, if civil, in the white chamber or white hall. And as the chancery had the pretorian power for equity, so the Star Chamber had the censorian power for offences under the degree of capital. This court of Star Chamber is compounded of good elements, for it consisteth of four kinds of persons—counsellors, peers, prelates, and chief judges. It discerneth also principally of four kinds of causes—forces, frauds, crimes various of stellionate, and the inchoations or middle acts towards crimes capital or heinous, not actually committed or perpetrated. But that which was principally aimed at by this act was force, and the two chief supports of force, combination of multitudes, and maintenance or headship of great persons."

There were a great number of other laws passed during this reign tending towards the maintenance of public peace. Henry's maxim, undeniably just at all times, but particularly in his own, was to deal promptly with offenders, and to let punishment follow swiftly in the wake of crime. A statute passed in the eleventh year of his reign permitted justices of assize and of the peace to try all offences, except murder, treason, and felony, without a jury, and though this law gave rise to some abuse, it had, on the whole, a very good effect in accelerating the course of justice. How slow the ordinary proceedings were in those days is apparent from another statute of Henry, which orders accusations of murder to be brought to trial "within a year and a day." Such investigations previously extended over many years, the crime, however heinous, being treated like a modern chancery suit, and not unfrequently, if the accused happened to be possessed of some property, leading to an acquittal, the prosecutors having compounded the matter. Among the other wise laws of Henry's reign was one which allowed, for the first time, the poor to obtain justice, by pleading in forma pauperis, that is without paying either the taxes for the writs or fees to the counsel pleading their cause. "A good law," remarks Hume, "at all times, especially in that age when the people laboured under the oppression of the great."

The dissolution of all the bands of society which followed in the wake of the civil war, is shown in many other laws of Henry's reign. One of these enacts the punishment of death for the kidnapping of women, which appears to have been then so common an occurrence, that Lord Bacon takes pains to show that the law was founded upon justice, arguing that "the obtaining of women by force into possession, however afterwards assent might follow by allurements, was but a rape drawn forth in length." As illustrative of the social state of the period was another law against vagabonds, passed in the nineteenth year of Henry's reign, upon which Lord Bacon remarks as follows:—"There likewise was a long statute against vagabonds, wherein two things may be noted: the one, the dislike the parliament had of gaoling of them, as that which was chargeable, pestiferous, and of no open example; the other, that in the statutes of this king's time, for this of the nineteenth year is not the only statute of that kind, there are ever coupled the punishment of vagabonds, and forbidding of dice and cards, and unlawful games, unto servants and mean people, and the putting down and suppressing of alehouses, as strings of one root together, and as if the one were unprofitable without the other." This is a legislative topic sadly overlooked in our own time, and in the study of which modern governments do not see as clearly as King Henry and his advisers the "strings of one root."

The most defective and unwise laws passed in the reign of Henry VII. were those relating to trade and commerce. They were all based upon the notion that industry, in order to flourish, had to be watched over, patronized, and protected, and that even foreign commerce and the intercourse between nations required to be artificially guided and directed into certain channels. This was the prevailing idea of the time; and Henry did not stand sufficiently high above his time to see the fallacy of this belief. The king may be pardoned for his want of clear-sightedness by the fact that a far greater man than himself, living a century later, held the same antiquated doctrines of political economy. Speaking of one of the laws of Henry for "regulating" trade, Lord Bacon says, "Another statute was made, prohibiting the bringing in of manufactures of silk wrought by itself, or mixed with any other thread. But it was not of stuffs of whole piece, for that the realm had of them no manufacture in use at that time, but of knit silk, or texture of silk, as ribbons, laces, cauls, points, and girdles, &c., which the people of England could then well skill to make. This law pointed at a true principle: 'That where foreign materials are but superfluities, foreign manufactures should be prohibited;' for that will either banish the superfluity or gain the manufacture." Modern political economists will stand aghast at this enunciation of this "true principle" by so great a philosopher and statesman as Lord Bacon.

The whole of the statutes affecting trade and commerce made in Henry's reign were strictly repressive of all industry and national activity. Very severe laws were passed against the taking of interest for loans of money, which was then called usury, or, as Bacon defines it, "the bastard use of money." Other laws prohibited, under high penalties, the exportation of money, plate, or bullion; the natural effect of which prohibition was a rise in the price of these articles, and a more extensive clandestine export than would have taken place otherwise. But so far was this "protection" of money carried, that alien merchants who imported commodities into the kingdom were obliged to invest in English commodities all the money acquired by their sales, in order to prevent the efflux of the precious metals. It was also prohibited to export horses; the effect of which was that the English breed, greatly esteemed all over the continent of Europe, began to degenerate rapidly. Contrasting the wise legislation of Henry VII. in political and social matters, and the most unwise system followed in respect to commercial and industrial affairs, Hume, the historian, remarks truly, that "the more simple ideas of order and equity are sufficient to guide a legislator in everything that regards the internal administration of justice;" but that "the principles of commerce are much more complicated, and require long experience and deep reflection to be well understood in any state." Centuries had to pass away before English legislators came to learn, in the hard school of experience, those true principles unknown to Henry VII. and his time.

The reign of Henry VIII. was little more than a continuation of that of Henry VII., as far as the principles of political government were concerned. However, the personal character of the son, his obstinate temper and his unbridled passions, made the vast political power accumulated by the father far more formidable and atrocious than it had been previously, converting the royal sway from an enlightened absolutism into unlimited tyranny. The civil legislation of the reign of Henry VIII. was not very extensive, and distinguished, like everything else during the sway of this despot, more by its violence than its depth. There were but ten parliaments summoned during the thirty-eight years that he swayed the realm, and the whole time they sat, distributed over twenty-three sessions, did not exceed three years and a half. During the first twenty years of his reign, the total sittings did not amount to twelve months altogether; subsequently, his religious reforms, as well as the increasing wants of his exchequer, obliged him to call parliaments somewhat more frequently; but they only met in short sessions, and never to any other purpose than to be the unresisting tools of his will. The labour of Henry's ten parliaments is well summarized by Hume. "All the king's caprices," he says, "were blindly complied with, and no regard whatever was paid to the safety or liberty of the subject. Besides the violent prosecution of whatever he was pleased to term heresy, the laws of treason were multiplied beyond all former precedent. Even words to the disparagement of the king, queen, or royal issue, were subjected to that penalty; and so little care was taken in framing these rigorous statutes, that they contain obvious contradictions, insomuch that, had they been strictly executed, every man without exception must have fallen under the penalty of treason. By one statute, for instance, it was declared treason to assert the validity of the king's marriage, either with Catherine of Arragon, or Anne Boleyn, while by another it was treason to say anything to the disparagement of the offspring of these marriages, the princesses Mary and Elizabeth. Nor would even a profound silence with regard to these delicate questions be able to save a person from such penalties, for by a previous statute it was ordered that whoever refused to answer upon oath to any point contained in that act was subjected to the pains of treason. The king, therefore, needed only to propose to any one a question with regard to the validity of these marriages; if the person was silent, he was a traitor by law, and if he answered, either in the negative or affirmative, he was no less a traitor. So monstrous were the inconsistencies which arose from the furious passions of the king, and the slavish submission of his parliaments."

It was somewhat remarkable that the only show of opposition, extremely feeble, but which yet was enough to rouse him into fury, that Henry VIII. ever met from his parliament was about money bills. That he should cut off heads by hundreds and thousands was never objected to for a moment by the extremely loyal individuals who spoke and acted as representatives of the people of England; but when he wanted to put his hands somewhat deeper than usual into the money-bags of the property-possessing classes, they broke out into a faint, half-stifled cry of resistance. It availed them nothing, however; the ministers of Henry, most of them educated in the good school of his money-loving father, being acquainted with many ways for extracting subsidies; and if they could not get them in the shape of ordinary taxes, showing themselves quite willing to adopt the gentle name of "benevolences." The impost raised under this title, which amounted to very large sums, was one of the cleverest financial inventions of Henry's reign. By the instructions of the privy council, the commissioners nominated to levy "benevolence," were directed to "incite all men to a loving contribution according to the rates of their substance, as they were assessed at the last subsidy;" but pointing out to them at the same time that "the least which his majesty could reasonably accept would be twenty pence in the pound on the yearly value of land, and ten pence in the pound on movable goods." The commissioners were further instructed to summon but a few before them at one time, and to commune with each person apart, "lest some one unreasonable man, amongst so many, forgetting his duty towards God, his sovereign lord, and his country, may go about by his malicious frowardness to silence all the rest, be they never so well disposed." After using "good words and amiable behaviour," as far as they would go, the commissioners were finally empowered to employ coercive measures against all too fond of their cash to give a portion of it to their sovereign lord, the prison being always kept open for such undutiful subjects. The "benevolence" produced 119,518*l.*—considerably more than a million of present money—to Henry in a single year. To this sum the county of Somerset contributed 6807*l.*; Kent, 6471*l.*; Suffolk, 4512*l.*; Norfolk, 4046*l.*; Devon, 4527*l.*; and Essex, 5051*l.* In Cumberland the commissioners were only able to raise 574*l.*, and in Lancashire but 660*l.* The wealth of England below the soil as yet was unknown, and it was agriculture that paid all the imposts and "benevolences" exacted by Henry VIII.

The severity with which the king exacted his taxes was not unmingled with a grim sort of humour. He was fond of recommending to his financial agents the famous proposition invented by his father's prime minister, Archbishop Morton, as a rule in the assessment of contributions, and a guide in levying them. The archbishop told those landowners or merchants who lived handsomely, that their opulence was manifest by the rate of their expenditure, while against those whose course of living was less sumptuous, he upheld the belief that they must have grown very rich by their economy. There was no escape from the horns of this dilemma, which acquired the name of "Morton's fork," and was held in greater awe than the prime minister's mitre or archiepiscopal hook. To the "fork," the background of which was a gaol, Henry added another pleasantry, by turning those of his faithful subjects who objected to "benevolences" into unbenevolent soldiers. The fun was first practised about the year 1525, upon one Richard Reed, a wealthy alderman of the city of London, who having withstood the "good words and amiable behaviour" of the royal tax commissioners, was ordered to have a helmet stuck on his head and an arquebuse into his hand, and to be sent to the army which was in the field on the Scotch border. With Master Reed travelled a letter, directed to Sir Ralph Ewer, commander of the English troops, ordering him to employ the alderman on the hardest and most perilous duty, and subject him when in garrison to the greatest privations. "You must use him in all things," the instructions concluded, "according to the sharpe discipline militar of the northern wars." The worshipful Richard Reed, after suffering great misery from lack of victuals, not compensated by an ample allotment of stripes, was finally taken prisoner by the Scots, and only allowed to return to his aldermanic duties after paying an enormous ransom, together with a triple "benevolence." His example had a great influence in stirring Henry's subjects into liberality; and parliament itself, which sat in the same year Richard Reed went into the wars, was so far excited by it as to vote a statute releasing the king from all his debts, whenever and however incurred. The statute, one of the strangest ever passed by an English or any other legislative body in the world, enacted that the two houses of parliament in their wisdom "do, for themselves and all the whole body of the realm which they represent, freely, liberally, and absolutely give and grant unto the king's highness all and every sum and sums of money, or any other thing, to his grace at any time heretofore advanced or paid, by way of trust or loan, either upon any letter or letters under the king's privy seal, general or particular, letter, missive, promise, bond, or obligation of repayment, or by any taxation or other assessing, by virtue of any commission or commissions, or by any other mean or means." The statute was frequently renewed—as often as it pleased his majesty to wipe off his debts by act of parliament.

Gross as was the tyranny with which Henry seized the property of his subjects, it sank into utter insignificance before the arbitrariness of his penal legislation. The new statutes of treasons introduced into the English code at his behest have scarce a parallel in the history of any Christian country; and subsequent historians marvelled how it was possible that any human beings removed from absolute barbarism should have sanctioned such laws, and still more should have submitted to them. The tendency to make laws written in blood was visible almost from the beginning of Henry's reign; but it was not until his desire for matrimonial changes had become manifest that they fully revealed the hideous despotism lurking beneath them. It first showed itself with the enactment of the statute 25 Henry VIII. cap. 22, which was passed to confirm the king's divorce from Catherine, and his nuptials with Anne Boleyn. By this law it was made high treason if any person "by writing, or imprinting, or by any exterior act or deed," should do "anything to the peril of the king's person," or "anything whereby the king might be disturbed or interrupted of the crown," or, finally, "anything to the prejudice, slander, and derogation of Queen Anne or her issue by the king." The writing and printing of certain words was punishable with death according to this act; but a statute passed the year after went a step further, by making it treason to utter words expressing a wish, hinting at "slanders and dangers which might happen to the king's person or that of the queen." Scarcely two years had passed, when it became treason to assert that which before it had been treason to deny; there was death now upon uttering a word in favour of the same "Queen Anne," a whisper against whom had been death previously. When ordering his people to worship the new selection of his fancy, Jane Seymour, under penalty of the gallows, Henry went again a step further in making obedience negative as well as positive. In the statute 28 Henry VIII. cap. 7, it was declared high treason if any one "by words, writing, or imprinting, or any other exterior act, directly or indirectly, accepted, took, judged, or believed," the marriages with either Queen Catherine or Queen Anne to have ever been good or lawful. To heighten the monstrous absurdity and tyranny of this new injunction, there was a clause in the statute making it high treason to have no opinion at all upon the subject of the various nuptials of his dread majesty, or to hide any opinion thereupon before the royal commissioners appointed to investigate public opinion. No excuse was admitted, and the act especially provided that "if any protested that they were not bound to declare their thought and conscience, and stiffly thereon abided," they should be hung. It seemed all but impossible that any despotism, however wild, could go further; yet this was by no means the climax.

The absurdity of Henry's penal legislation reached its height in the statute promulgated after he had cast off his fifth wife, which made it high treason to withhold facts, or rumours, respecting the virginity of any woman upon whom he might have cast his eye; but the actual despotism culminated in the statute 31 Henry VIII. cap. 8, which gave the force of law, without the vote of parliament, or any other formality, to all the decrees and proclamations of the king. The act asserted a sort of divine right of his majesty to make laws by inspiration, the preamble dwelling upon "his royal power given of God," and animadverting against former "disobedience of the king's proclamations by some who did not consider what a king by his royal power might do." In passing this statute, parliament abdicated its functions even as a mere legislating machine worked by a master; and henceforth there was little else to do for the representatives of the people than to vote attainders and keep the hangman and executioner at work. They started with great energy in this avocation, making themselves quite as slavishly the instruments of royal despotism as in the proclamation of new laws. The innumerable attainders launched by Henry VIII, particularly in the latter part of his reign, were in reality nothing more than foul assassinations, in no way differing from ordinary murders but in the fact of the chief assassin wearing a crown and asserting a "royal power given of God." In all cases there was an utter neglect of even the forms of justice; the proceedings were hurried and half secret; the accused was neither heard in his own defence nor confronted with his accusers; and once attainted, the unfortunate victim had as little hope of escaping death as the condemned criminal standing at the foot of the gallows with the rope around his neck. However, the ordinary trials, in which a certain amount of legal forms were observed, offered scarcely more security against the bloodthirsty despotism of Henry than his murders by attainder. A writer specially well-informed on the subject, Mr. Reeves, in his "History of the English Law," remarks that, "if we are to judge of the general administration of criminal law in this reign from the trials that have come down to us of eminent persons, it appears that the lives of the people were entirely in the hands of the king. A trial seems to have been nothing more than a formal method of signifying the will of the prince, and of displaying his power to gratify it. The new-invented treasons, as they were large in their conception, and of an insidious import, by giving a scope to the uncandid mode of inquiry then practised, enlarged the powers of oppression beyond all bounds."

The statutes affecting trade and commerce promulgated during the sway of Henry VIII. were conceived in much the same spirit as his penal legislation. To repress all individual energy, and make the will of the despot paramount in everything, was the main object kept in view, descending even to such little matters as the games and pastimes of the people. Thus it was forbidden to artificers, husbandmen, labourers, apprentices, and servants to play at tennis, cards, dice, bowls, or any other "unlawful game," out of Christmas, under a penalty of twenty shillings for every offence; but from this prohibition noblemen and gentlemen, willing to compound for unlawfulness by buying a royal licence, were excepted, not only as far as they were individually concerned, but as regarded their servants and retainers. In the foreign commerce the realm Henry constantly interfered, by changing customs duties, and putting all manner of impediments upon it, going so far as fixing the number of merchants authorised to deal in certain articles, and the quantities of which they were to dispose. During the first part of his reign, the king showed himself greatly disposed to attract foreign artisans, particularly the industrious Flemings, skilled in producing woollen and other textile fabrics, into England; but after his divorce from Catherine, out of a fantastic belief that these men felt sympathy with his cast-off wife, he pursued them with fierce hatred, driving thousands out of the realm by orders of council and edicts of the Star Chamber. The effect of these decrees, as of nearly everything else done in this reign, naturally was to impoverish the country, and to spread poverty and desolation far and wide. So marked was the decline of general welfare, that several of Henry's statutes bear witness of it, among others one repealing a law passed in the reign of Edward II., which interdicted magistrates while in office to become dealers in wines or victuals. It is stated, as a reason for the repeal of the law of Edward II., that "since the making of that statute and ordinance, many and the most part of all the cities, boroughs, and towns corporate within the realm of England are fallen in ruin and decay, and are not inhabited by merchants and men of such substance as at the time of making that statute: for at this day the dwellers and inhabitants of the same cities and boroughs are commonly bakers, vintners, fishmongers, and other victuallers, and there remain few others to bear the offices." To improve the condition of his realm, Henry went to work in his usual despotic manner, prohibiting luxury in apparel, fixing the wages of artificers and labourers, and even settling the prices of bread and meat, butter and cheese. Beef and pork were ordered to be sold at a halfpenny a pound, and mutton and veal at a halfpenny and half a farthing. The fatal result of this interference with the natural laws of supply and demand became very soon apparent; but it was not till they had led to open revolt in many places that the king could be brought to repeal the most obnoxious of his trade regulations.

The short reign of Edward VI. was chiefly occupied with annulling the monstrous legislation of the preceding thirty-eight years. It was high time it should be done, the condition of the realm having become so deplorable as to threaten either a frightful revolution, or a relapse into the barbarism of the early middle ages. By the statute 1 Edward VI. cap. 12, the most horrible of the penal laws of Henry VIII. were annihilated at one fell swoop. The act abolished nearly all the treasons and felonies created in the preceding reign, and likewise repealed all laws of parliament interfering with doctrine and matters of religion, as well as the flagrant unconstitutional statute of 31 Henry VIII. cap. 8, which had given to the decrees and proclamations of the king the force of laws. It was to the wisdom of the Protector that the liberal enactments of Edward's reign were chiefly due; and when he had fallen under the intrigues of his enemies, the young king, who with many good qualities possessed nevertheless a tinge of the cold despotic element remarkable in all the Tudors, was visibly driven in the opposite direction. Less than a month after the execution of Somerset, the two houses of parliament passed a new statute of treason, enacting that any person calling the king "schismatic, heretic, infidel, tyrant, or usurper of the crown," should be punished for the first offence by the loss of his goods and chattels, and be imprisoned "during his majesty's pleasure; for the second, should suffer the penalties of premunire; and for the third offence should be indicted for high treason. This statute was pressed through the lower house of parliament under much opposition, ending finally in the addition of a clause far more important than the act itself. The clause provided that "no person shall be indicted for any manner of treason, except on the testimony of two lawful witnesses, who shall be brought in person before the accused at the time of his trial, to avow and maintain what they have to say against him, unless he shall willingly confess the charges." Though demanded by the most obvious principles of equity and justice, the clause was only assented to after some resistance by the House of Lords—the absolutist members of which seemed to feel that it marked the dawn of a reviving spirit of liberty in the parliament of the nation.

The reign of Queen Mary at its commencement gave hopes of being a continuation of that of Edward. In the first act passed after her accession, all additions to the law of treason made during the preceding reign were repealed, and the legislation upon the subject brought back to the statute of the 25th of Edward III. However, the temper which dictated this liberal enactment lasted but a very short time. Mary was surrounded by bad counsellors, and her own dark and despotic humour inclining but too much to their advice, she soon launched forth, with all the vigour possible to a diseased body and mind, in the career traced by her father. A curious incident distinguished the first intercourse between queen and parliament. Before she had been many weeks on the throne, a paper was put into her hands by the Spanish ambassador, containing the outlines of a plan of government which her relative, Kaiser Charles, advised her to adopt. The plan was based upon the casuistry that Mary, being the first reigning queen of England, was not bound by any constitutional limitations affecting kings; and that, therefore, it was in her power to alter the forms of government, civil as well as religious, in any way she liked, and as much as she liked. The advice sounded not altogether unpleasant to the ears of the queen, offering evidently the straight road to the fulfilment of her darling desire to bring England back, with the greatest possible speed, into the fold of the holy Roman apostolic church. Nevertheless, though much in favour of her uncle's plan, Mary was cautious enough not to say anything about it till after having shown it to Bishop Gardiner, and he disapproving it entirely, the paper of the Spanish ambassador was thrown into the fire. The flames did not so well consume it but that the contents became known, leading parliament to vote a statute of a somewhat singular character. It set forth that because the laws of the realm attributed all prerogative and pre-eminence to the name of king, also assigning to him the punishment of offenders, therefore "some malicious and ignorant persons" pretended that the queen had not the same privileges, rights, and duties. To correct this impression, the statute laid it down as a fundamental rule of the constitution "that the kingly or royal office, together with all its dignity, prerogative, and power, may be vested either in male or female, and ought to be as fully deemed and taken in the one as in the other." Like many other acts of parliament, before and after, the statute expressed but partially and indirectly the current of thought which had called it into existence.

Among the ferocities which marked the terrible five years during which the daughter of Henry VIII. and Catherine of Arragon filled the throne of England, making the reign of "bloody Mary" a byword for all ages, that of the regular use of torture was, if not the most glaring, at least the most iniquitous. Torture, the hideous invention of eastern despots, was never known to the English law code; nor indeed to that of any of the blue-eyed races fond of the sea and of liberty, commonly designated as Anglo-Saxons. A rack had been introduced into the Tower in the reign of Henry VI., by the duke of Exeter, and the people called it mockingly after him "Exeter's daughter"; but the dismal instrument was rarely used, nearly all the judges discountenancing its employment as entirely illegal. It was left to the first female sovereign of England to establish all the horrors of torture in the name of religion, and to tear bodies to pieces with the object of saving souls. Almost from the moment Mary ascended the throne, the rack was set to work; and it did not cease its ghastly functions till her own body was lying stiff and stark in the lonely chamber of St. James's Palace. Though confessedly illegal, the employment of torture was openly prescribed on many occasions by the ministers of the queen, notably in the orders regulating the establishment of the Ecclesiastical Commission, an imitation of the Spanish Inquisition. The commissioners were empowered "to inquire into all heresies, either by presentments, by witnesses, or by any other means," to seize all dealers in and readers of heretical books, and to try and punish all clergymen not preaching the pure orthodox faith of Rome. In the execution of these duties, they were allowed not only to break open houses, to search premises, to compel the attendance of witnesses, and "to force them to make oath of such things as might discover what they sought after," but they were expressly enjoined "to put to the torture such obstinate persons as would not confess, and there to order them at their discretion." Frightful as was this injunction, it was but on a par with all the other proceedings of this detestable reign, the horrors of which were scarcely surpassed in the worst forms of oriental despotism. The results, fortunately, were the reverse of those expected by the advisers of Mary, and the very measures designed for the re-establishment of the old religion did more than anything else to overthrow it finally and for ever. In the words of Henry Hallam: "What had the greatest efficacy in disgusting the English with Mary's system of faith was the cruelty by which it was accompanied. Though the privy council were continually urging the bishops forward in the persecution, the latter bore the chief blame, and the abhorrence entertained for them naturally extended to the doctrine they professed. A sort of instinctive reasoning told the people, what the learned on neither side had been able to discover, that the truth of a religion begins to be very suspicious when it stands in need of prisons and scaffolds to eke out its evidences. And as the English were constitutionally humane, and not hardened by continually witnessing the infliction of barbarous punishments, there arose a sympathy for men suffering torments with such meekness and patience, which the populace of some other nations were less apt to display, especially in executions on the score of heresy."

The vast edifice of cruelty and bigotry which the priestly counsellors of Mary succeeded in raising during her short five years' reign crumbled into dust immediately at her death. A more sudden transformation of government policy than that which took place in the few hours that intervened between the decease of the daughter of Catherine of Arragon, and the proclamation of the daughter of Anne Boleyn scarcely ever occurred in the history of England. It was the more extraordinary as there was scarcely any change in the attributes and the power of the crown, Elizabeth remaining quite as absolute as her sister, and scarcely a whit less despotically inclined. But what distinguished the despotism of Elizabeth from that of her predecessor was that it was exerted for the advancement of great national objects, that it was Protestant, and that it was English. Her wretched, misguiding, and misguided sister, Spanish by blood, and Romish by education, would scarcely have proceeded in her odious tyranny had she properly understood the character of the people over whom she had been called to reign; but she knew no more of England than her priests and confessors chose to tell her, and throughout her miserable reign acted as if her throne was standing south of the Alps or the Pyrenees. Elizabeth, on the other hand, was English to a supreme degree, possessing not only the virtues, but, in a somewhat exaggerated form, the faults and weaknesses of the race that hailed her accession to the throne with enthusiasm, and remained enthusiastically devoted to her through good and evil days. Thus she was enabled to do things which no other monarch in her position, and with her undefined claims of legitimacy, could have ventured upon without danger, if not of an insurrection, at least of a strong passive resistance. The first acts of Elizabeth's first parliament were as strong an assertion of spiritual despotism, though in the opposite direction, as any proclaimed in the reign of Mary. By statute 1 Elizabeth cap. 1, it was ordered that every subject of her majesty should take an oath of supremacy, as follows:—"I do utterly testify and declare that the queen's highness is the only supreme governor of this realm, and all other her highness's dominions and countries, as well in all spiritual and ecclesiastical things or causes, as temporal; and that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm; and therefore I do utterly renounce and forsake all foreign jurisdictions, powers, superiorities, and authorities, and do promise that from henceforth I shall bear faith and true allegiance to the queen's highness, her heirs and lawful successors, and to my power shall assist and defend all jurisdictions, pre-eminences, privileges, and authorities, granted or belonging to the queen's highness, her heirs and successors, or united and annexed to the imperial crown of this realm." This oath was embodied in the two statutes known as the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity, of which Mr. Hallam remarks that they "form the basis of that restrictive code of laws, deemed by some one of the fundamental bulwarks, by others the reproach of our constitution."

The main feature of the civil legislation of the reign of Elizabeth was the constant grappling with social questions, little understood as yet, but brought forward for solution both by the increase of national prosperity, and the intense desire of the queen to promote the material condition of her subjects. Of all the questions to be solved, none was greater, nor more important, than that of pauperism. Ever since the cessation of the civil wars and the union of the rival houses of York and Lancaster in the new Tudor dynasty, wealth had increased at a high rate in England; but its black shadow, destitution, had grown at a still higher rate, apparently defying all attempts at remedy. The first attack upon pauperism was made in 1495, when, by a statute known as 11 Henry VII. cap. 2, it was ordered that beggars not able to work should be seized and sent to the hundred where they were born, or where they last dwelt, or where they were best known, and should continue there, "without begging out of the hundred." This curious legislation, which made begging legal within certain limits, was further enforced by an act passed nine years later, the statute of 19 Henry VII. cap. 12, which required all destitute persons to go to the city, town, or hundred where they were born, or to the place where they last abode for the space of three years, "without begging out of the said city, town, hundred, or place." The difficulties of carrying out such a scheme of local beggary, and thereby preventing vagrancy, were necessarily great; but nothing was done further in the matter for more than a quarter of a century, till the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII. Preferring repressive laws to any others, Henry, while retaining the spirit of the system inaugurated by his father, added to it some sharp penal enactments. By statute of the 22 Henry VIII. cap. 12, all magistrates were directed to assign to poor persons a strictly defined limit within which they were to beg, and which they were forbidden to leave under severe punishment. "Impotent beggars," asking alms beyond their district, were ordered to be placed in the stocks for two days and nights, on bread and water, after which they had to take their oath that they would return to their authorized sphere; while "able-bodied beggars" were to be well whipped at the cart's tail, with the oath likewise to be administered afterwards. It was something like an official recognition of honour among rogues, this statutory oath-taking, yet it unhappily failed in its effects. Vagrants and beggars continued increasing to an alarming extent; and before another five years had elapsed, the necessity of farther legislation became manifest. The ablest of Henry's advisers, Thomas Cromwell, was now at the helm of the state as vicegerent and vicar-general, and his genius, unwilling to follow in the trammels of old forms and ideas, elaborated an entirely new system for remedying, or at least alleviating, the dire effects of pauperism. It was in 1536, the same year which saw the head of Queen Elizabeth's mother fall on the block, that Cromwell devised and passed through parliament the first law for the compulsory relief of the poor.

The statute of Cromwell, known as the 27 Henry VIII. cap. 25, was remarkable not only as first introducing the system of compulsory charity, but as legislative evidence of the vast spread of pauperism, and the impossibility of keeping it within bounds by any of the means formerly employed. The statute, after reciting the act of the 22 Henry VIII. cap. 12, and dwelling upon the fact that it made no provision for the support of the impotent, nor for keeping "valiant and sturdy beggars" at work, ordered that the head officers of every city, shire, town, and parish, shall maintain the helpless poor within their districts by alms collected from the charitable, and with the assistance of the same funds shall set the able-bodied to work, "in such wise as they may get their own living by the continual labour of their own hands." It was further enacted that "every preacher, parson, vicar, and curate, as well in their sermons, collections, bidding of the beads, as in the time of confession and making of wills, shall exhort, move, stir, and provoke people to be liberal for the relief of the impotent, and setting and keeping to work the said sturdy vagabonds." The money collected for the relief of the poor was ordered to be kept in a common box, and almsgiving otherwise than to these common boxes was prohibited on forfeiture of ten times the amount. To compel valiant and sturdy beggars to earn their own bread, the statute enacted that their refusal should be punished, the first time by a sound whipping, the second time by the loss of the right ear, and the third time by the penalty of death. As far as the maintenance of the helpless poor went, Cromwell's act had a moderately good effect; but it was otherwise regarding the compulsory labour of the able-bodied beggars, who could not be brought by any threats to "get their own living by the continual labour of their own hands." To force these idlers, who had become excessively numerous, into obedience to the law, another statute was passed by the first parliament of Edward VI., enacting that every able-bodied creature not applying himself to some honest labour, or offering to serve even for meat and drink, if no better service was to be had, "shall be taken for a vagabond, branded on the shoulder with the letter V., and adjudged a slave for two years to any person who shall demand him, to be fed on bread and water, and caused to work by beating, chaining, or otherwise." If he ran away before the two years had expired, he was to be branded on the cheek with the letter S, and adjudged a slave for life; and if, after that, he attempted to escape once more, he was to be hung in chains. This terrible law defeated itself by its severity, and being found useless, was repealed at the end of a few years, by the 3 and 4 Edward VI. cap. 16, which revived the statute 22 Henry VIII. cap. 12, in all its particulars, thus doing away entirely with the system of compulsory relief introduced by Cromwell. Everything now was again confusion, and remained so during the whole of the reign of Mary, she being too busy in burning heretics to trouble herself about mere beggars and vagabonds. It was left to Elizabeth and her great minister to make stronger efforts than any yet undertaken to banish the frightful curse of pauperism, and confine the hordes of vagrants that were swarming all over the land.

There were some scores of statutes and decrees issued in the reign of Elizabeth to regulate the treatment of and provision for the poor, the principal of them of such wisdom, as well as practical importance, as to form the basis of legislation on the subject for centuries after. The first act of Elizabeth, or, more strictly, of Cecil, was to restore Cromwell's system of compulsory relief, and the second to make it more strict on the part of the contributors, so as to convert the formerly voluntary almsgiving into a sort of impost. It was ordered by statute 5 Elizabeth cap. 3, that "if any person of his froward wilful mind shall obstinately refuse to give weekly to the relief of the poor, according to his ability," the bishop of the diocese, or other ecclesiastical superior, shall bind him to appear at the next sessions, when the justices there "shall charitably and gently persuade and move the said obstinate person to extend his charity towards the relief of the poor of the parish where he dwelleth." If their eloquence be ineffective upon the delinquent, then "it shall be lawful for the justices, with the churchwardens, or one of them, to tax such obstinate person, according to their good discretion, what sum the said obstinate person shall pay weekly towards the relief of the poor within the parish;" and if he still refuse, "the justices shall, on complaint of the churchwardens, commit the said obstinate person to goal." This useful arrangement for extracting "voluntary contributions," worked exceedingly well, so as to produce large sums for the relief of the poor; but unhappily the number of the destitute increased much faster in proportion than the amounts raised from year to year, and before long Cecil found it necessary to legislate again. A new statute, the 14 Elizabeth cap. 3, was passed in 1572, strictly defining the claims and duties of alms-takers, and alms-givers, and laying down fixed rules, very elaborate in all particulars, and full of sagacious knowledge, entering into the minutest details, for the treatment of pauperism. The statute commenced by reciting that "all the parts of this realm of England and Wales be presently with rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars exceedingly pestered, by means whereof daily happeneth in the same realm horrible murders, thefts, and other great outrage, to the high displeasure of Almighty God, and to the great annoyance of the common weal," and then went on to enact "as well for the utter suppressing of the said outrageous enemies to the common weal, as for the charitable relieving of the aged and impotent poor people," that the two classes of paupers should be strictly divided, and treated according to their merits. It was the leading idea of Cecil that the deserving poor could not be too kindly, nor the undeserving too harshly, treated.

To the undeserving, the measure was dealt out first in the statute. The enactment, severe in the extreme, ran that "all persons thereafter set forth to be rogues and vagabonds, or sturdy beggars, shall for the first offence be grievously whipped, and burnt through the gristle of the right ear with a hot iron of the compass of an inch about, and for the second be deemed felons, and for the third suffer death as felons." Among rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars were included "all persons whole and mighty in body, able to labour, not having land or master, nor using any lawful merchandize, craft, or mystery, and all common labourers, able in body, loitering and refusing to work for such reasonable wage as is commonly given." This class disposed of, the act continued: "And forasmuch as charity would that poor, aged, and impotent persons should as necessarily be provided for, as the said rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars repressed, and that the said aged, impotent, and poor people, should have convenient habitations and abiding places throughout this realm, to settle themselves upon, to the end that they nor any of them should hereafter beg or wander about," therefore "the justices of the peace shall within their several divisions and authorities make inquiry of all aged, poor, impotent, and decayed persons born within their said divisions and limits, or which were there dwelling within three years next after this present parliament, living by alms, and register their names; and when the number of poor people forced to live upon alms be by that means known, the said justices shall appoint within their said divisions meet places, by their discretion, to settle the same poor people for their abidings." It was farther ordered that "if the parish within which the said poor people shall be found, shall or will not provide for them, and set down what portion the weekly charge for their relief and sustentation will amount unto, that done, the justices of the peace shall, by their good discretions, tax and assess all the inhabitants dwelling within the said divisions to such weekly charge as they and every one of them shall contribute towards the relief of the said poor people, and shall appoint collectors, who shall gather the same proportion, and make delivery so much thereof, according to the discretion of the justices, as they shall appoint." Any resistance to contribute to this new poor-rate was to be summarily punished. If the presumed alms-giver, the act ran, "shall refuse to do so, the said justices shall commit him to gaol, until he shall be contented with their said order, and do perform the same." This statute, scarcely discussed in parliament, and unnoticed by many contemporary historians, proved more important to the welfare of the people of England than almost any other act of civil legislation of the reign of Elizabeth.

But the efforts of Burleigh to raise the lowest class of the people, and make the realm a truly Christian country, somewhat different from the "heroic Middle Ages," with its noble barons glittering in steel and gold, and its ignoble "villains" dying of hunger at the roadside, under the hoof of the baronial steeds, only commenced with this act of the 14th of Elizabeth. Additions to it were made from time to time, facilitating and simplifying the system of parochial relief, and lessening the chance that any poor persons really deserving aid should suffer want or be neglected. This was attained to a great extent; but the greater difficulty of setting the "valiant and sturdy beggars" to employ their hands in honest work was not so easily overcome. To gain this end, Burleigh, and parliament at his instigation, all but exhausted themselves in dictating pains and penalties. By the 39th of Elizabeth cap. 3, it was enacted that every idle vagabond "shall, on his apprehension, be openly whipped until his body be bloody, and shall be forthwith sent from parish to parish, the next straightway to the parish where he was born, if the same may be known by his confession, or otherwise; and if the same be not known, then to the parish where he has dwelt before the punishment by the space of one whole year, there to put him to labour as a true subject ought to do; and if not being known where he was born or last dwelt, then to the parish through which he last passed without punishment, to be conveyed to the house of correction of the district, or to the common gaol of that county or place, there to remain or be employed in work." It was likewise ordered that "if any of the said rogues shall appear to be dangerous to the inferior sort of people where they shall be taken, or otherwise be such as will not be reformed of their roguish kind of life, it shall be lawful to the justices of the limits where any such rogue shall be taken, to commit that rogue to the house of correction, or otherwise to the gaol of the county, there to remain until the next quarter sessions; and then such of the same rogues, so committed by the justices of the peace there present, or the most part of them, shall be thought fit not to be delivered, shall be banished out of this realm and all other the dominions thereof, and at the charge of the county shall be conveyed into such parts beyond the seas as shall be at any time hereafter for that purpose assigned by the privy council." This was the origin of the laws for transportation of criminals.

The last and greatest of the statutes of Elizabeth concerning pauperism, generally regarded as the most remarkable instance of practical statesmanship to be found in English legislature up to that period, was promulgated in 1601, less than two years before the death of the queen. This new law—drawn up by Cecil, and known as the 43rd Elizabeth cap. 2—was the first to abandon the exceeding severity which had been the bane, self-destructive in its cruelty, of all the preceding statutes. Instead of inflicting horrible punishments, quite out of proportion with the offence committed, upon idle vagrants, the law ordered the application of the simple "labour test," all being set to work who could do so, and the rest, disabled from age, illness, or bodily defects, being maintained at the public expense by a regular poor-rate. In order that none might escape the "labour test," the rules applying to it were made so absolute as to embrace even children, the latter being set to work in the same manner as adults, with this provision, however, that whenever possible they should be made to learn a trade or handicraft, for which purpose special funds were set aside. The act further laid down very minutely the whole of the details of the management of the poor on the new principle, ordering the erection of "mills, turns, cards, and such like necessary implements" for "lusty beggars," of hospitals for the sick, and of houses of maintenance for all other "poor, aged, and impotent persons." The mode of application of the principle through the agency of overseers, under the control of the justices of the peace; the selection of parishes in the districts for its administration; the form of contribution by rates; the species of property to be assessed to the rates, and the remedy against their unequal imposition, were all carefully prescribed in the statute, the whole forming a body of enactments so discreet and judicious as not to be disturbed for many generations to come. It was supplemented and enlarged by a law passed soon after, which placed the endowment of all hospitals, almshouses, and other charitable institutions upon an entirely new footing. Former establishments of the kind had been founded, if large, such as the great hospital of the earl of Leicester at Warwick, under a special act of parliament, and if of lesser importance, by a licence under the great seal. The new statute enacted that any person might, within twenty years, found and establish, with an adequate provision of land, "hospitals, maisons de Dieu, abiding-places, or houses of correction, as well for the sustentation and relief of the maimed poor, needy, or impotent people, as to set the poor to work; and from time to time place therein such head and members, and such number of poor, as shall seem convenient." This act was made perpetual in the next reign.

Not all the laws of Elizabeth were as imbued with wisdom as those concerning the treatment of the poor. Her legislation affecting trade and commerce was as despotic as that of Henry VIII., and her financial government scarcely less oppressive; while her judicial proceedings, with very few exceptions, bore the stamp of remorseless tyranny, acknowledging in the abstract no other right but that of the crown, and utterly disregarding the liberty of the subject. Elizabeth's rule, in this respect, has been compared by some historians to that exercised over semi-barbaric nations. "The government of England," David Hume wrote, "during that age bore some resemblance to that of Turkey. The sovereign possessed every power, except that of imposing taxes; and in both countries this limitation, unsupported by other privileges, appears rather prejudicial to the people. In Turkey it obliges the sultan to permit the extortion of the pashas and governors of provinces, from whom he afterwards squeezes presents or takes forfeitures: in England, it engaged the queen to erect monopolies and grant patents for exclusive trade—an invention so pernicious, that, had she gone on during a tract of years at her own rate, England, the seat of riches and arts and commerce, would have contained as little industry as Morocco or the coast of Barbary." The financial extortions of the queen were, indeed, almost endless, and carried on without the slightest regard to law or justice. Besides the regular subsidies granted to her by parliament, she extracted money wherever it could be got, under a hundred different names, as purveyance, pre-emption, benevolence, wardship, dispensation, and a multiplicity of other forms, all more or less oppressive. If an estate fell to a minor, she took possession of it, and enjoyed the whole of the profits till the coming of age of the owner, and frequently long after; and if the heir happened to be a female, she took the owner as well as the property, giving her away to some courtier or favourite, like a mere fixture, without in the slightest way consulting her taste. To extract cash from the city merchants, she frequently prohibited the sale of certain descriptions of goods, and allowed that of others only on payment of extraordinary taxes; thus, on one occasion, she issued a decree interdicting the sale of all crimson silks till her court had been fully supplied; while at another time an embargo was laid upon all glass vessels brought from Venice, and not raised till the owners of the "Flanders galleys," which imported the wares, had come forward with some unusually handsome offerings. At all times Elizabeth assumed a supreme and uncontrolled authority over foreign trade, and even over ordinary intercourse by travel with other countries, allowing no person to enter the kingdom or depart from it without her consent, and no merchandize to be imported or exported without the royal licence. Nor did Elizabeth disdain to extract money from the holy mother church. It was quite usual with her when promoting a bishop to take advantage of the opportunity of a weak incoming tenant by pillaging the see of some of its manors; and once upon a vacancy she kept the bishopric of Ely for nineteen years entirely to herself, pocketing the revenues. When at last the new bishop had come in, she wanted to mulct him still further, and the good man resisting, her majesty honoured him with a letter under her own hand. "Proud prelate," the queen wrote, "I understand you are backward in complying with your agreement, but I would have you know that I who made you what you are can unmake you; and if you do not forthwith fulfil your engagement, by God, I will immediately unfrock you. Yours, as you demean yourself, Elizabeth."

Of all the exactions of the queen none pressed more heavily upon her subjects, and gave rise to more complaints, than those relating to monopolies. There was scarcely a merchandize or commodity of any kind that had not been assigned over to some so-called patentee, who alone possessed the right, secured under a royal patent, of disposing of it to the retailers and the public at large. It was in vain parliament protested, at almost every session, for more than forty years, against this burthen of monopolies, which not only was in itself a heavy and grievous mode of taxation, but destructive of all sound trade and the true interests of the government. On one occasion, a member of parliament described, in a discussion on the subject, the number of monopolies granted by the crown. The list comprised currants, salt, iron, powder, cards, calf-skins, felts, sail-cloth, bones, train-oil, lists of cloth, pot-ashes, vinegar, coals, steel, aquavite, brushes, bottles, pots, saltpetre, lead, oil, calamine, glass, paper, starch, tin, sulphur, drapery goods, dried pilchards, Spanish wool, Irish yarn, and a vast number of other articles, the mere enumeration of which seemed to fatigue the House of Commons. When the list was read, a member cried, "Is not bread in the number?" and everybody ejaculated "bread!" in astonishment. The first speaker went on, "Yes; I assure you, if affairs go on at this rate, we shall have bread reduced to a monopoly before the next parliament." What increased the indignation of the House of Commons, but feebly representing that of the people of England, was the extraordinary fiscal power attached to nearly all the monopolies, converting them into terrible engines of oppression. Thus the "patentees" of saltpetre had the right of entering every house, and searching every room, from the garret to the cellar; so that frequently the dwellers, to avoid the havoc committed among their property, had to get rid of the intruders by bribes. The profits drawn from the "patents" were so great that the earl of Essex, among others, derived fifty thousand pounds sterling from his privilege to sell sweet wines, and Raleigh twenty thousand from another on oil. Some of the monopolized articles were pushed up to ten or twelve times their ordinary value by the "patent;" thus one of the most indispensable commodities of daily life, salt, rose from sixteen pence to fifteen shillings a bushel, after the queen had given the right of exclusive sale to one of her court favourites. The murmurs and dissatisfaction at this tyranny kept on increasing towards the end of Elizabeth's reign, influencing parliament to the extent that, in the session of 1601, the otherwise timid members, slavishly bent to execute every behest of the crown, got courage to frame an address to her majesty, praying she might do away with the most obnoxious of the monopolies. The courtiers, who mostly held the "patents," set up a loud howl at this movement, crying against the insolence to touch the "royal prerogative;" but Elizabeth, as always, viewed things with more discernment, and advised by Cecil, whose spies were spread all over the country, keeping him well informed about the depth of the popular resentment, she resolved to accede to the humble request of her commons. Accordingly, on the 25th of November, a royal message was delivered in parliament which drove nearly all the members frantic with the excitement of loyalty. One of the representatives of the nation solemnly declared, with tears gushing from his eyes, that if a sentence of everlasting happiness had been pronounced in his favour, he could not have felt more joy than on listening to the proof of the overwhelming goodness and condescension of the queen, as conveyed in her message.

The royal message simply announced that her majesty, in her infinite wisdom, had resolved to cancel some of the "patents" she had granted, and that no new ones should be issued until further orders. Mr. Secretary Cecil, after the reading of the message by the speaker, made an oration which partly stopped the tears of the member who had broken in with his appeal to the "everlasting happiness." Repeating the most important points of the royal missive, Cecil exclaimed, "I say, therefore, there shall be a proclamation general throughout the realm to notify her majesty's resolution in this behalf. And that you may eat your meat more savoury than you have done, every man shall have salt as good and cheap as he can buy it or make it, freely without danger of that patent which shall be presently revoked. The same benefit shall they have which have cold stomachs, both for aquivita, and aqua composita, and the like. And they that have weak stomachs, for their satisfaction shall have vinegar and aleger, and the like, set at liberty. Train-oil shall go the same way; oil of blubber shall march in equal rank; brushes and bottles endure the like judgment." Disliking the smell of woad, Elizabeth, with her accustomed arbitrariness, had some time before prohibited the growth of the plant; but she now, in her condescending mood, repealed the interdict, with this provision, as explained by Cecil, "that when her highness cometh on progress to see you in your countries, she be not driven out of your towns by suffering it to infect the air too near them." Then he continued, discussing the abrogation of monopolies, "Those that desire to go sprucely in their ruffs, may at less charge than accustomed obtain their wish, for the patent for starch, which hath so much been prosecuted, shall now be repealed." Besides the "patents" mentioned in Cecil's speech, those for calf-skins, felts, and leather were also revoked, and those for cards and glass provisionally suspended. The remedy, after all, was very slight, leaving the greater number of the monopolies, and the most profitable ones, untouched; nevertheless, the members of the House of Commons could not find words to express their gratitude, little accustomed as they were to see their prayers or petitions noticed by so imperious a governor as Elizabeth.

Far worse than the financial extortions of the queen, and in every respect the darkest side of her noble and high-aiming rule, was her despotism in the administration of justice. Though not worse than that of her Tudor predecessors, it was equally bad. One of the warmest admirers of Elizabeth, the historian Henry Hallam, acknowledges, in referring to her government, that "courts of justice were little better than the caverns of murderers. Whoever was arraigned at their bar was almost certain to meet a virulent prosecutor, a judge hardly distinguishable from the prosecutor, except by his ermine, and a passive, pusillanimous jury." The jury, in every instance, was picked by the sheriff, "either," as stated by Hallam, "according to express directions, or to what he judged himself of the crown's intention and interest. If a verdict had gone against the prosecution in a matter of moment, the jurors must have laid their account with appearing before the Star Chamber; lucky if they should escape on humble retraction, with sharp words, instead of enormous fines and indefinite imprisonment. The control of this arbitrary tribunal bound down and rendered impotent all the minor jurisdictions. That primeval institution, those inquests by twelve true men, the unadulterated voice of the people, responsible alone to God and their conscience, which should have been heard in the sanctuaries of justice, as fountains springing from the lap of earth, became, like waters constrained in their course by art, stagnant and impure. Until this weight that hung upon the constitution should be taken off, there was literally no prospect of enjoying with security those civil privileges which it held forth." Besides the Star Chamber, the Court of High Commission, venal judges, and packed juries, Elizabeth possessed another terrible engine of oppression in the right to proclaim martial law whenever she thought fit so to do. This simplified in an exceeding degree the forms of even Tudor justice, the "twelve true men," and all other ceremonies used in murdering an obnoxious subject becoming entirely superfluous, nothing more being required than to lead the doomed man to the nearest tree or gibbet, and hang him. The great queen displayed on all occasions an extraordinary fondness for martial law, ordering it to be employed, among others, against persons importing forbidden books, pamphlets, and papal bulls from abroad, as well as against vagrants inclined to riotousness. In her proclamation ordering martial law to be used in the killing of book importers, Elizabeth expressly prohibited the questioning of her lieutenants or their deputies, for their "arbitrary punishment of such offenders," "any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding;" and she still more strikingly exhibited her despotic inclinations in a subsequent decree, commanding the immediate execution of a number of riotous idlers who had disturbed the peace of the city of London. In giving a commission of provost marshal to Sir Thomas Wilford, one of her officers, the queen stated, with unmistakable clearness, that she "granted him authority and commended him, upon signification given by the justices of the peace in London, or the neighbouring counties, of such offenders worthy to be speedily executed by martial law, to arrest and take the same persons, and in the presence of the said justices, according to justice of martial law, to execute them upon the gallows or gibbet openly, or near to such place where the said rebellious and incorrigible offenders shall be found to have committed the said offences." Commenting upon this document, David Hume justly remarks, "It would be difficult to produce an instance of such an act of authority in any place nearer than Muscovy."

The weight of Elizabeth's judicial despotism was greatly increased through the ready imitation of it by all the members of the government. Not only the privy council in general arrogated to itself a power of discretionary imprisonment, into which no inferior tribunal was allowed to inquire, but commitments by a single counsellor or courtly nobleman were very frequent. These abuses gave rise to a remarkable complaint on the part of the judges themselves, who, though not at all scrupulous to be the mere executors of mandates from the throne, did not relish the interference into their business of other subjects of her majesty. The complaint was vented in the form of a petition to the privy council, signed by eleven judges, and was delivered in Easter term of the 34th of Elizabeth, that is in 1592, eleven years before the death of the queen. "We, her majesty's justices of both benches and barons of the exchequer," the petition ran, "do desire your lordships that by your good means such order may be taken that her highness's subjects may not be committed or detained in prison, by commandment of any nobleman or counsellor, against the laws of the realm, to the grievous charges and oppression of her majesty's said subjects: or else help us to have access to her majesty, to be suitors unto her highness for the same. For divers have been imprisoned for suing ordinary actions and suits at the common law until they will leave the same, or against their wills put their matter to order, although some time it be after judgment and accusation. Item, others have been committed and detained in prison upon such commandment against the law; and upon the queen's writ in that behalf no cause sufficient hath been certified or returned. Item, some of the parties so committed and detained in prison, after they have, by the queen's writ, been lawfully discharged in court, have been oftentimes recommitted to prison in secret places, and not in common and ordinary known prisons, as the Marshalsea, Fleet, King's Bench, Gatehouse, nor the custody of any sheriff, so as upon complaint made for their delivery, the queen's court cannot learn to whom to award her majesty's writ, without which justice cannot be done. Item, divers sergeants of London and officers have been many times committed to prison for lawful execution of her majesty's writs out of the King's Bench, Common Pleas, and other courts, to their great charges and oppression, whereby they are put in such fear as they dare not execute the queen's process. Item, divers have been sent for by pursuivants for private causes, some of them dwelling far distant from London, and compelled to pay to the pursuivants great sums of money, against the law, and have been committed to prison till they would release the lawful benefit of their suits, judgments, or executions for remedie, in which behalf we are almost daily called upon to minister justice according to law, whereunto we are bound by our office and oath. And whereas it pleased your lordships to will divers of us to set down when a prisoner sent to custody by her majesty, her council, or some one or two of them, is to be detained in prison, and not to be delivered by her majesty's court or judges: we think that if any person shall be committed by her majesty's special commandment, or by order from the council-board, or for treason touching her majesty's person, which causes being generally returned into any court, is good cause for the same court to leave the person committed in custody. But if any person shall be committed for any other cause, then the same ought specially to be returned." Inanimate as is this petition of the eleven judges, in its dry legal phraseology, it offers a terrible picture of the annihilation of all justice, all guarantees of right, and all individual liberty in the reign of the last of the Tudor monarchs.

The causes of the high prerogative of the Tudors, though springing partly from the individual character of the princes of this remarkable royal race, were not entirely personal, but based upon the condition of the age, only just emerging from the lawlessness of the feudal times, and the dissolution of all order in the long civil wars preceding the accession of Henry VII. England undoubtedly wanted strong rulers; and if they became a little too strong for the good of the commonwealth, the fault was not so much that of the rulers themselves, nor that of the body of their subjects, but that of the political leaders of the people, the great nobles and the members of the two houses of parliament. The celebrated author of the "Constitutional History of England" has furnished a graphic summary of the position of the realm under the Tudor sovereigns. "It appears to be a very natural inquiry," he says, "after beholding the course of administration under the Tudor line, by what means a government so violent in itself, and so plainly inconsistent with the acknowledged laws, could be maintained; and what had become of that English spirit which had not only controlled such injudicious princes as John and Richard II., but withstood the first and third Edward, in the fulness of their pride and glory. Not, indeed, that the excess of prerogative had ever been thoroughly restrained, or that, if the memorials of earlier ages had been as carefully preserved as those of the sixteenth century, we might not possibly find in them equally flagrant instances of oppression; but still, the petitions of parliament and frequent statutes remain on record, bearing witness to our constitutional law and to the energy that gave it birth. There had evidently been a retrograde tendency towards absolute monarchy between the reigns of Henry VI. and Henry VIII. Nor could this be attributed to the common engine of despotism, a military force. For, except the yeomen of the guard, fifty in number, and the common servants of the king's household, there was not, in time of peace, an armed man receiving pay throughout England. A government that ruled by intimidation was absolutely destitute of force to intimidate. Hence risings of the mere commonalty were sometimes highly dangerous, and lasted much longer than ordinary. A rabble of Cornishmen, in the reign of Henry VII., headed by a blacksmith, marched up from their own country to the suburbs of London without resistance. The insurrections of 1525, in consequence of Wolsey's illegal taxation, those of the north ten years afterwards, wherein, indeed, some men of a higher quality were engaged, and those which broke out simultaneously in several counties under Edward VI., excited a well-grounded alarm in the country; and in the two latter instances were not quelled without much time and exertion. The reproach of servility and patient acquiescence under usurped power falls not on the English people, but on its natural leaders. We have seen, indeed, that the House of Commons now and then gave signs of an independent spirit, and occasioned more trouble, even to Henry VIII., than his compliant nobility. They yielded to every mandate of his imperious will; they bent with every breath of his capricious humour; they are responsible for the illegal trial, for the iniquitous attainder, for the sanguinary statute, for the tyranny which they sanctioned by law, and for that which they permitted to subsist without law. Nor was this selfish and pusillanimous subservieney more characteristic of the minions of Henry's favour, the Cromwells, the Riches, the Pagets, the Russells, and the Powletts, than of the representatives of ancient and honourable houses, the Howards, the Fitz-Alans, and the Talbots. We trace the noble statesmen of those reigns concurring in all the inconsistencies of their revolutions, supporting all the religions of Henry, Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth; adjudging the death of Somerset to gratify Northumberland, and of Northumberland to redeem their participation in his fault; setting up the usurpation of Lady Jane, and abandoning her on the first doubt of success—constant only in the rapacious acquisition of estates and honours, from whatever source, and in adherence to the actual power."

The income of the five Tudor sovereigns was very large, amounting to from 300,000*l.* to 800,000*l.* sterling per annum, of the money of the time, the least being that of Henry VII., and the largest of any that of his son and successor, Henry VIII. Henry VII. left behind him an overflowing treasury, which his son emptied in a few years, and after devouring millions over millions of ecclesiastical property, the funds of hospitals, of orphans, and of widows, died deeply in debt. Edward VI., too, who enjoyed a revenue of about 400,000*l.* a year, left a large debt, which was quintupled by Mary, whose income rose not above 350,000*l.* Elizabeth, after paying the debts of both her predecessors, began to accumulate money, though not so much by regular as by irregular means. The subsidies voted to her by parliament during the forty-five years of her reign amounted altogether to rather less than three millions sterling, or about 66,000*l.* per annum, but this comparatively small sum she increased by her numerous financial exactions to more than 500,000*l.* a year. Up to Elizabeth, none of the sovereigns of England had been ashamed to accept pensions, paid with more or less regularity, from foreign monarchs; but she reversed the policy, and instead of taking began to give. Henry of Navarre, the Dutch republicans, and the German princes, alike began to taste the sweetness of Elizabeth's subsidies; and the soft golden stream that came flowing in upon them from the island shore made them ready to proclaim, one and all, that England was the first country upon earth. Though naturally inclined to the strictest economy, bordering at times upon avariciousness, the queen was lavish in her expenditure upon her favourites, especially the last and most unfortunate of them, the earl of Essex, who drew from her, according to a computation of Burleigh, presents in money to the value of three hundred thousand pounds in the course of a few years. To the grievous disappointment of her eager heir in the north, Elizabeth left little or no treasure at her death, her chief legacy to the king to come consisting in a magnificent female wardrobe, the finest the world had ever seen, being made up of no less than two thousand dresses.

CHAPTER III.

History of Religion, from the accession of Henry VII. to the death of Elizabeth.

THE Reformation, greatest of events, next to the introduction of Christianity, that ever took place in England, distinguishes the Tudor period above all others. Though prepared long beforehand in the thoughts and feelings of the people, the gradual dawn of public enlightenment and the falling away of the dark superstition of past ages, the great crisis burst over the nation with some suddenness, accelerated by what human ignorance is often willing to describe as "accident," but what to the higher mind is nothing but the ruling of an all-wise providence. Judging by mere outward appearances, the Church of Rome was more firmly engrafted on English soil in the reign of Henry VII. than it had been for centuries. The king not only took his chief advisers from the ranks of the clergy, made a cardinal his prime minister, and a bishop, devoted to Rome, his most trusted counsellor; but he never neglected any occasion to show his reverence in the shows and ceremonies, and his deep regard for the ministers of religion. Nevertheless, as the England of his days was fast beginning to lose that zeal in the cause of the Church which had formerly distinguished it, which had covered the soil of the kingdom with splendid cathedrals, nunneries, and monasteries, and which had made the clergy, next to the feudal lords of the soil, the wealthiest class of the realm, so the king himself, earnest observer of the signs of the times, was anything but a devout churchman at heart. Indeed, he could not well be so without stemming the course of his own policy, which ran towards making the throne the source and fountain-head of all power, facing a people united in obedience, and undisturbed by the rivalry of privileged classes and hereditary rights. Henry's giant enemy in the accomplishment of this vast object was the nobility in the first instance; but the king, "sad, serious, and full of thought and secret observation" as he was, could not well help seeing that, his greatest foe overcome, he would have to deal with a power scarcely inferior to it in importance, and throwing its shadow up to the throne. With all his outward show of respect for the ministers of religion, Henry VII. never lost any occasion for depressing their influence, and depriving them of privileges which he deemed might be taken quietly, without too much resistance. In this noiseless strife, perfectly suited to his temper, the king was eminently successful; but it was not till towards the end of his reign that the keenest of the champions of the Church began to feel that they had been shorn of their strength, without knowing how it had been done.

Before grappling with the spiritual power of Rome, Henry VII. was naturally desirous to break down that independence from the civil law which the priests had raised up for themselves in the course of ages, and by means of which they were withdrawn entirely from the jurisdiction of the crown. There was, in fact, nothing more obtrusive to the royal prerogative than the so-called benefit of the clergy, which secured immunities to the ministers of religion, and even to all "clerks," or persons able to read and write, entirely at variance with that equality before the law which the king had so much at heart. These immunities had long given rise to loud complaints, inasmuch as, according to Burnet, "it was usual for persons, after the greatest crimes, to get into orders, and then not only what was past must be forgiven them, but they were not to be questioned for any crime after holy orders given till they were first degraded, and till that was done they remained the bishop's prisoners." Henry did not wait long to attack this immense privilege of the representatives of the Church, and in the fourth year of his reign had a statute passed curtailing, for the first time, the benefit of the clergy. "Whereas," ran the statute, "upon trust of the privilege of the Church, divers persons lettered have been the more bold to commit murder, rape, robbery, theft, and all other mischievous deeds, because they have been continually admitted to the benefit of the clergy as oft as they did offend in any of the premises;" therefore, for the future, clerks should take the benefit but once; and to simplify book-keeping, it was ordered that those convicted of murder should be branded with an M, and those of treason and other crimes with a T on the brawn of the left thumb. "For this good Act's sake," slyly remarks Bacon, "the king himself was after branded, by Perkin's proclamation, as an execrable breaker of the rites of the Church."

Next to the benefit of the clergy, the most important privilege of the priesthood was the right of sanctuary. It not only gave the Church of Rome power to shelter its own members against justice and law, but enabled it to stretch its wide mantle over every evildoer, however deep in crimes, who might choose to implore its protection. No doubt, in the times of wild anarchy through which the kingdom had passed, the privilege of sanctuary had not been without its beneficial results. It enabled the weak man to fly from the vengeance of the strong, and the innocent to escape the persecution of the wicked, and without this last refuge of the Church no barriers would have existed between the oppressors and oppressed. But Henry, meaning to extinguish anarchy within the fair realm of England, and to make one law for all, under the unrestricted sway of the central influence emanating from the throne, held that the time of sanctuaries was gone. However, the king was well aware that this was a matter of quite as much civil as ecclesiastical import, and therefore, with wonted shrewdness, he attacked the sanctuary right not by parliamentary statute, but—what was really a wonderful stroke of policy—by means of a Papal Bull. The way in which Henry obtained this Bull, in the third year of his reign, is quaintly told by Bacon. "At that time also," says the learned historian, "the king sent an ambassador unto Pope Innocent, signifying unto him his marriage, and that now, like another Æneas, he had passed through the floods of his former troubles and travels, and was arrived unto a safe haven; and thanking his holiness that he had honoured the celebration of his marriage with the presence of his ambassador, and offering both his person and the forces of his kingdom upon all occasions to do him service. The ambassador, making his oration to the pope in the presence of the cardinals, did so magnify the king and queen, as was enough to glut the hearers. But then he did again so extol and deify the pope, as made all that he had said in praise of his master and mistress seem temperate and passable. But he was very honourably entertained, and extremely much made on by the pope, who, knowing himself to be lazy and unprofitable to the Christian world, was wonderfully glad to hear that there were such echoes of him sounding in remote parts. He obtained also of the pope a very just and honourable Bull, qualifying the privileges of sanctuary, wherewith the king had been extremely galled, in three points. The first, that if any sanctuary man did by night, or otherwise, get out of sanctuary privily, and commit mischief and trespass, and then come in again, he should lose the benefit of sanctuary for ever after. The second, that howsoever the person of the sanctuary man was protected from his creditors, yet his goods out of sanctuary should not. The third, that if any took sanctuary for case of treason, the king might appoint him keepers to look to him in sanctuary." The picture of the "lazy and unprofitable" pope, made use of by a most active diplomatic king, "another Æneas" is a perfect illustration in showing Henry's dealings with the court of Rome.

The attempt to bend the ecclesiastical under the civil power would have clearly been a hopeless one, but for the aid of that mighty spirit of rebellion which, long previous to Henry's accession, had begun to arise against Roman Catholicism. Wycliffe's followers, the Lollards, bold pioneers of the Protestants of latter days, increased from year to year, and though even at the beginning of Henry's reign, a century after the death of the great reformer, their numbers were comparatively insignificant, the great bulk of the people adhering, at least nominally, to the ancient faith, the spirit of investigation stirred by them spread silently through the masses. The violent persecution under which the new heretics suffered had the usual effect of adding fuel to the flame. It was not Henry's policy to show himself in any way favourable to the Lollards, his aim being rather to depress the power of the Church by its own members, and, if possible, let the pope, bishops, and cardinals, do the work he wanted to be done. He therefore looked on at the continued persecution of Wycliffe's followers as an impartial spectator, interfering neither for nor against them, and, perhaps, impressed by the conviction that the ultimate result would be that of all martyrdom. A few heretics were burned regularly every year, for the glory of God and the Roman Catholic Church, during the whole of the fifteenth century; but the victims were taken chiefly from among the poorer classes, and in an age when life was held so cheap, and the punishment of death was so common, the whole attracted little attention. However, with the never-ending spread of the revolt, the Church of Rome became alarmed, and the zeal of persecution increased in view of the visible strength of the persecuted. In the year 1494, ninth of the reign of Henry VII., the first female heretic was sent to the stake. It was a lady of wealth, the widow of a gentleman, named Joan Boughton, and having many friends, and being, besides, above eighty years of age, her violent death at Smithfield attracted far more attention than that of the majority of Lollards who had previously suffered. John Fox, the martyrologist, describes this aged sufferer for the sake of religion as "a disciple of Wycliffe, whom she accounted for a saint, and held so fast and firmly eight of his ten opinions, that all the doctors of London could not turn her from one of them." When the ecclesiastical judges "told her that she should be burned for her obstinacy and false belief, she set nothing by their menacing words, but defied them, for she said she was so beloved of God and His holy angels that she cared not for the fire; and in the midst thereof she cried to God to take her soul into His holy hands." The martyrdom of this venerable person caused a great stir among all the people attached to the teachings of Wycliffe, and the night following her death at the stake, "the most part of her ashes were had away of such as had a love unto the doctrine that she died for." This caused fresh persecution, and the fires of Smithfield came to be lighted anew, among the martyrs being Lady Young, daughter of Joan Boughton. She met her fate as heroically as her aged mother; but others condemned with her did not, and preferred recantation to the horrors of the flames. For such cases a curious ceremony had been invented by the priests, satisfying their great object of striking terror, and yet showing willingness to pardon and forgive. The condemned Lollards had to carry in public procession the faggots with which they were to be burnt, and to stand before the preacher at St. Paul's during the whole time of his sermon. This was the ordinary punishment for recanting heretics in London; but in the provinces, where the priestly power swayed more unchecked, the penalties imposed were far more severe. One William Tylsworth was burnt at Amersham, in Buckinghamshire; and his only daughter, nominally pardoned, having been compelled to set fire to his stake, she and her husband, with numerous others, had to carry faggots through the whole county, were treated with barbaric cruelty, and finally branded on the cheek. To inflict the last-named revolting punishment, "their necks," according to John Fox, "were tied fast to a post or stay with towels, and their hands holden that they might not stir, and so, the iron being hot, was put to their cheeks, and thus bare they the prints and marks of the Lord Jesus about them."

Henry VII., though he did not suppress, certainly did not encourage religious persecution, and by taking in other respects a decided attitude against the priesthood, all but placed himself at the side of the disciples of Wycliffe. One of the first statutes made by the king was "for the more sure and likely reformation of priests, clerks, and religious men," which gave power to bishops to punish them for incontinence and other crimes. However, this statute and others following it had so little effect in putting a stop to the gross demoralization of the clergy, that Henry was compelled to call in the aid of his trusty ally, the "lazy and unprofitable" head of the Romish Church. Pope Innocent at first seemed unwilling to believe that the priesthood of the realm of England were really as godless and wicked as depicted by the king; but having met with confirmation on all sides, his holiness directed Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, to admonish the clergy of the kingdom in general, and the greatest sinners among them in particular. These letters of admonition, duly issued, formed in themselves a graver protest against the Church of Rome than was ever put forth by the most fanatical heretic thrown into the flames at Smithfield. The nation came to hear, from the pontiff himself, and through the mouth of the head of the English Church, that a vast number of the priesthood of the kingdom led such utterly wicked and depraved lives as to be almost beyond the hope of reform. It appeared, among other things, from the archiepiscopal admonitions, that the monks of St. Alban's kept two neighbouring nunneries filled with loose women, whom they visited openly and in the most shameless manner, committing riot and debauchery on the very steps of the altar. The abbot and his monks were accused of other and still graver crimes, not in a vague manner, but in distinct charges and with specified names. Everywhere throughout the kingdom priests and monks were charged with strutting about like gallants, wearing showy garments, jewels, and gold chains, and shrinking back from no crime in the gratification of their passions and the indulgence of a luxurious life. It was but natural that the priesthood should smart under this exposure, coming from so high an authority; but the only visible effect of Archbishop Morton's admonitions was, not that they tried to reform, but an attempt to revenge themselves on the indirect author. So far was this hatred pushed, that the king had to pass a special statute to protect Morton's life from some "mortal enemies in court;" which enemies, probably, would have gladly aimed their blow higher had they had a chance to do so. As it was nearly all the conspiracies of the period centred in priests. Both Lambert

Simnel and Perkin Warbeck had their chief supporters in the Church; and a score of lesser impostors, such as Ralph Wilford, were openly instructed and brought forward by leading ecclesiastics. The king, to judge from all his actions, never lost this enemy out of sight, and it is highly probable that, had his life lasted long enough, he would have set his heel with full energy upon the neck of the priesthood, as well as upon that of his chief foe, the turbulent aristocracy.

The reign of Henry VII. may, on the whole, be regarded as the first dawn of the English reformation, although the actual increase of the doctrines of reform and of the numbers adhering to it was not very great. Probably the chief cause of this was the want of unity among the opponents of the Romish Church. While some of them were inclined to overthrow the whole gigantic tree of error, crime, and superstition, which had grown around the Church in the course of centuries, others, more timid, seemed content to lay the axe but upon the most diseased branches, and to spare the tree itself. What was most generally objected to was the image-worship of the Church; but even here some stopped in merely protesting against the worship of the saints, while others were equally opposed to that of the Virgin Mary. The former heresy was sometimes pardoned by the ecclesiastical tribunals; the latter never. In an inquisition held before John Arundel, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, one John Blomstone, charged with having said "that it was foolishness to go on pilgrimage to the image of our Lady at Doncaster, Walsingham, or at the Tower of the city of Coventry, for a man might as well worship the blessed Virgin by the fireside in the kitchen as in the aforesaid places," was let off on doing penance; while another Lollard, Richard Hegham by name, had to go to the stake for saying "that if the image of our Lady of Tower were put into the fire it would make a good fire." Aggravated penalties awaited those Lollards, few in number, who denied the right of the pontiff to call himself the successor of St. Peter, and to pardon sins. This was naturally held the greatest heresy, inasmuch as it interfered not only with the spiritual supremacy of the pontiff, but, what was more, with the cash nexus, the sale of pardons being, as the most extensive, so the most lucrative business of holy Mother Church.

English Protestantism in the reign of Henry VII. may be said to have been a dormant fire, smouldering for want of a strong wind to fan it into a purifying flame. The accession of Henry VIII. found England in a high state of religious excitement. The ever growing immorality of the clergy, high and low, was gradually begetting a general detestation among the people, which was increased by senseless disputes among the priests and monks themselves, carried on with no other result than that of damaging their common cause. Not content with quarrelling constantly about endowments, honours, privileges, and money matters, the great religious orders got, towards the end of the reign of Henry VII., into a fierce altercation about a very delicate point of doctrine, that known as the "Immaculate Conception." It divided the whole body of ecclesiastics into two great parties, the fighting champions of which were the Franciscans, or Grey Friars, on the one side, and the Dominicans, or Black Friars, on the other. The Franciscans maintained that the Virgin Mary had been conceived and born wholly without original sin, while the Dominicans asserted that she had been conceived like every other earth-born human creature, but had been sanctified and cleansed from all sin attaching to the descendants of Adam and Eve before seeing the light of day, while still in her mother's womb. This somewhat subtle point of theology the two great parties in the church discussed with immoderate zeal for some years, abusing each other in the heartiest manner, and finally resorting to curses and maledictions. An appeal to the pope resulted in a decision in favour of the Franciscans, and the Immaculate Conception; yet this by no means cooled the ardour of the Dominicans, and braving the pains of excommunication with which they were threatened, they stoutly maintained their own dogma. Not being able, after the papal judgment, to preach it openly, they had recourse to indirect agencies, calling up, among others, the help of some very ancient aids of faith, that of miracles. In the same year when Henry VIII. ascended the throne, the news spread all over England that a certain image of the Virgin, having a temporary resting-place at Berne, in Switzerland, had been heard to weep and groan, and being asked to explain the cause of her sorrow, had declared before many witnesses that she felt deeply grieved at the false doctrine of the Franciscans, being certain that her conception had been maculate, and not immaculate. The result, as stated in the words of Fox, the martyrologist, was that "the people in great number came flocking to the image, with manifold gifts and oblations, for the Dominic friars so had wrought the matter, and had so swept all the fat to their own beards from the order of the Franciscans, that all the alms came to their box. The Franciscans, seeing their estimation to decay, and their kitchen to wax cold, and their paunches to be pinched, not able to abide that contumely, and being not ignorant or unacquainted with such counterfeited doings—for, as the proverb sayeth, 'It is ill halting before a cripple'—eftsouns espied their crafty jugglings, and detected their fraudulent miracles." Detection was followed by punishment, and the four chief managers of the speaking Maculate Virgin were given over to the flames. The greatest enemies of monasticism could not have done more to cast opprobrium upon the system than the Friars, Grey and Black, did by this public exhibition of their own rogueries.

The seething spirit of the English people, protesting against the corruption of the church, exhibited itself before long in a remarkable affair, which, though not important by itself, became so in its consequences. In the spring of 1514, a citizen of London, named Richard Hunne, a tailor by trade, fell into a dispute with a priest about a very trifling matter, involving the ownership of a piece of cloth used at the burial of the tailor's daughter. Refusing to give up the cloth, which the priest claimed as a mortuary, Hunne was sued for it in the ecclesiastical court, and in retaliation, by advice of his counsel, entered upon the very bold step of taking out a writ of præmunire against his pursuer for bringing him before a foreign jurisdiction, the court sitting under the authority of the pope's legate. It was raising a great issue on a very small point; and being not at all desirous to have the potent question as to whether Rome had a right to interfere in the distribution of justice in England brought under public discussion, the priests parried the stroke aimed against them by throwing the bold tailor into prison. After having been subjected for several weeks to close confinement in the "Lollards' Tower," adjoining St. Paul's, Richard Hunne was carried before the bishop of London, on the general charge of heresy, and the special one that he had "in his keeping divers English books, prohibited and damned by the law, as the Apocalypse in English, epistles and gospels in English, Wycliffe's damnable works, and other books containing infinite errors, in the which he hath been long accustomed to read, teach, and study daily." Hunne admitted the charges, yet at the same time refused to withdraw his suit against the priest, upon which he was sent back to prison, the bishop significantly remarking that "the London juries were so prejudiced against the church that they would find Abel guilty of the murder of Cain." Two days after, Richard Hunne was found dead in his cell in the Lollards' Tower, suspended from a hook in the ceiling. The gaolers declared that he had hung himself, but the coroner's jury at the inquest came to a different conclusion. According to the account of Burnet, the historian of the Reformation, the jury "found him hanging so loose, and in a silk girdle, that they clearly perceived he was killed; they also found that his neck had been broken, as they judged, with an iron chain, for the skin was all fretted and cut; they saw some streams of blood about his body, besides several other evidences, which made it clear he had not murdered himself. Whereupon they did acquit the dead body, and laid the murder on the officers that had the charge of that prison; and by other proofs they found the bishop's summoner and the bellringer guilty of it; and by the deposition of the summoner himself it did appear that the chancellor, and he, and the bellringer, did murder him, and then hung him up."

Neither the bishop nor his priests quailed before the storm. Instead of submitting to the verdict of the jury, they did their utmost to increase the public indignation by clamouring against the spread of unbelief, going so far as to continue the process of heresy against Hunne's dead body. Snatched away from the coroner, the corpse of the murdered man was carried, in horrible mockery, before the ecclesiastical tribunal, and an indictment of thirteen articles read against it. Condemned, as a matter of course, the putrid body was sent back to prison, and from thence dragged to Smithfield, where, on the 20th of December, it was committed to the flames. This ghastly piece of barbarism, worthy of the champions of the Immaculate Conception and of papal infallibility, had the effect of driving almost every man in the capital into opposition to Rome; and henceforth, as reported by Burnet, "the city of London was never again well affected to the popish clergy, but inclined to follow anybody who spoke against them, and every one looked on it as a cause of common concern." The burning of the dead body at Smithfield was replied to by the launching of a coroner's warrant against

Dr. Horsey, chancellor of the bishop of London, as well as the summoner and the bellringer of the Lollards' Tower, for the murder of Hunne; and great efforts were made to bring them to justice, the chief lawyers of all the civil tribunals taking the part of the people. After a short while, parliament itself took the matter up, and a bill, which passed both houses by a large majority, restored to Hunne's children the goods of their father, thus annulling the conviction of the ecclesiastical court by which they had been forfeited. This was a severe blow to the priests, which they knew not how to parry, and to divert attention from it, a matter which had strongly occupied public attention some years before was brought forward again. It was a prosecution of the papal legate and the archbishop of Canterbury against Dr. Henry Standish, guardian of the Mendicant Friars of London, and chief of the king's spiritual council, for heretical opinions expressed in several sermons delivered at St. Paul's Cross, in which, among others, he asserted the right of jurisdiction of the civil courts of the realm over the clergy. The starting anew of this accusation, which had been prudently dropped before, excited great indignation among all classes, leading parliament to implore the king, in a humble address, "to maintain the temporal jurisdiction, according to his coronation-oath, and to protect Standish from the malice of his enemies." Henry felt somewhat perplexed what to do, being urged by Wolsey on the one hand to uphold the rights of the church, but having more inclination to uphold his own rights, involved in the "temporal jurisdiction." To solve the difficulty, he had recourse to an expedient as novel as significant, that of forming a great assembly for discussing the spiritual affairs of the nation.

The assembly, consisting of all the judges, the king's councillors, both spiritual and temporal, and many members of both houses of parliament, met at the convent of the Black Friars. The first question entertained was the prosecution against Dr. Standish; but from this special matter the discussions soon swayed over a wider range, embracing a variety of the most important matters, especially the great one under agitation in the affair of Richard Hunne, as to whether there existed any lawful jurisdiction for the papal legate in England, or any court presided over by him, over laymen, subjects of the king. It became manifest, immediately after the opening of the assembly, that the vast majority of the members, including many of the clergy, were opposed to the pretensions of the church of Rome. Prominent among the speakers was Dr. Veysey, dean of the royal chapel, who openly challenged the assumed right of the priesthood to exercise any control or influence whatever in affairs beyond their own order, or to be anything else than a class of citizen, on a level and co-ordinate with other classes. In support of his heretical tenet, Dr. Veysey brought forward some striking arguments. To prove that "the laws of the church did not bind any but those who received them," he cited the fact "that in old times all secular priests were married; but in the days of St. Augustine, the apostle of England, there was a decree made to the contrary, which was received in England and in many other places, by virtue whereof the priests in England may not marry. But this law not being universally received, the Greek church never judged themselves bound by it, so that to this day the priests in that church have wives as well as other secular men. If then the churches of the east, not having received the law of the celibate of the clergy, have never been condemned by the church for not obeying it, then the convening clerks having been always practised in England was no sin, notwithstanding the decree to the contrary, which was never received here." Dr. Veysey wound up his speech by the pregnant sentence, that "the commonwealth of the realm was chiefly to be looked at, and to be preferred to all other things." The great question having been fully discussed on all sides, the judges unanimously delivered their opinion "that all those of the convocation of the clergy who did award the citation against Standish were in the case of a præmunire facias," the summoning of the king's subject before a foreign tribunal being contrary to the constitution of the realm. After delivering this opinion, and forwarding it to the king, the assembly broke up. Almost unconsciously, the orators of the convent of the Black Friars had made a long stride towards Protestantism, pushing valiantly forward in the path traced out more than a century before by Wycliffe, and along which a poor German monk was now preparing to hew his course, with thunder and lightning flashing around his head.

The king received the report of the Black Friars' assembly very graciously, and to give his reply, summoned the whole of the members to meet him at his royal residence of Baynard's Castle, in the city of London. Feeling now thoroughly alarmed, the church party had made extraordinary efforts to defend their privileges, and Cardinal Wolsey himself came forward to plead the cause of his order. Kneeling before the king, Wolsey, in the name of the clergy, declared "That none of them intended to do anything that might derogate from his prerogative, and least of all himself, who owed his advancement only to the king's favour; but this matter of convening the clerks did seem to them all to be contrary to the laws of God and the liberties of the church, which they were bound by their oaths to maintain according to their power." The cardinal, therefore, humbly begged "that his majesty, to avoid the censures of the church, would refer the matter to the decision of the pope and his council at the court of Rome." Henry replied that he thought the matter had been discussed sufficiently before the assembly, and that Doctor Standish and others had fully proved the legal issue; but the bishop of Winchester, interrupting, cried, "I warrant you, Doctor Standish will not abide by his opinion, at his peril." Thus appealed to, the doctor faltered, "What shall one poor friar do alone, against all the bishops and clergy of England?" After a short silence, the archbishop of Canterbury arose to argue in favour of the rights of the church to exercise sway over laymen; and he having finished, the lord chief justice proceeded to refute his pleadings on the basis of common law and of the constitution of the realm, which, he showed, acknowledged no foreign jurisdiction of any kind in England, having extolled the royal prerogative to the utmost, to the great satisfaction of Henry, who listened very demurely to arguments so flattering to his vanity, his majesty finally delivered his judgment. "By the permission and ordinance of God," Henry exclaimed, "we are king of England, and the kings of England in times past had never any superior but God only. Therefore know you well that we will maintain the right of our crown, and of our temporal jurisdiction, as well in this as in all other points, in as ample manner as any of our progenitors have done before our time. And as for our decrees, we are well assured that you of the spirituality go expressly against the words of divers of them, as hath been shewed you by some of our council; and you interpret your decrees at your pleasure, but we will not agree to them more than our progenitors have done in former times." The words sounded like a rebellion of the king of England against the power of Rome.

The rebellion, for the time being, was not very deep nor very serious. Fickle and capricious in regard to all higher objects, and strong only when driven by his animal passions, Henry did not proceed far in the anti-papal campaign he seemed to have entered upon, and being wholly under the guidance of his cardinal-minister, he made his peace with Rome almost as soon as it had been broken. The clerical party, acting under Wolsey's advice, greatly facilitated the healing of the breach by their prudence, and even the papal court, usually so quick in interfering when its privileges were concerned, acted with remarkable forbearance, leaving everything to the great cardinal at the helm of the English government. Under his management, a compromise was entered into between the opposing factions in church and state, the clergy consenting to deliver up the chancellor of the bishop of London, accused of participation in the murder of Richard Hunne, to civil justice, and the judges, on the other hand, promising to withdraw him from a London jury, who to a certainty would have sent him to the gallows, by trying him on a special indictment issued by the king. The compromise was carried out to the entire satisfaction of Wolsey, if not of the two great parties the mutual strength of which he was trying to break. Arraigned before the court of the king's bench, the chancellor, Dr. Horsey, pleaded Not Guilty; and no proofs against him being produced by the attorney-general, he was discharged. But so strong was the public feeling against him that he found it impossible to retain his post any longer, and he had to quit London and go to Exeter, where he spent his days in great retirement. However, to make the battle even on both sides, Wolsey persuaded the king to dismiss Dr. Standish from his post in the spiritual council, and while the chancellor had to fly from the rage of the people, he had to fly before the rage of the priests. On the whole, the victory seemed greatest on the side of the partisans of Rome, although it was such as bore within it the seeds of ruin. As summed up by Gilbert Burnet, "the clergy suffered much in this business, besides the loss of their reputation with the people, who involved them in all the guilt of Hunne's murder; for now their exemption being well examined, it was found to have no foundation at all but in their own decrees, and few were much convinced by that authority, since upon the matter it was but a judgment of their own in their own favour. Nor was the city of London at all satisfied with the proceedings in the king's bench, since there was no justice done; and all thought the king seemed more careful to maintain his prerogative than to do justice."

After the passing of the excitement arising from the deliberations of the assembly at the Black Friars, the bonds uniting the sovereign of England to the see of Rome appeared drawn firmer than ever. While the principles of the reformation, wafted across from Germany, were daily spreading among the people, and the opposition to priestly-rule and the superstition of ages was getting more and more strength among the masses, the king himself seemed to move in the opposite direction, dragged onward by his great clerical adviser, and impelled, besides, by his own petty vanity. Succeeding popes, Julius II. and Leo X., sent him presents of blessed golden roses, which delighted him like a child; and being asked to join in the crusade against Luther and the German reformers, he did so with the greatest alacrity. Not being able, to his infinite distress, to hang or burn the monk of Wittenberg, he resolved in an evil hour to annihilate him by a pamphlet. The story of Henry's book against Luther is quaintly and concisely told by a chronicler of the times. "About the year 1521," reports the Rev. John Strype, "did King Henry show himself a man of letters as well as arms, by a book which he owned himself the author of, wherein both his learning and his zeal for the pope's cause and religion appeared, being written in confutation of Martin Luther's late books against indulgences granted by popes, and other errors of the church of Rome. This book the king, by the cardinal's advice, thought fit to have presented to Pope Leo, which was done by Dr. Clark, then the king's ambassador at Rome, and was delivered by him into his own hands, in a solemn assembly of cardinals. And at the same time he made a speech to the pope, to which the pope presently made answer, showing his most grateful acceptance of it. And in testimony thereof he gave him the title of Defender of the Faith; and so always to be styled whencesoever he was named. The book thus presented, richly bound, was laid up in the Vatican as a rarity, where the Lord Herbert of Cherbury saith he afterwards saw it. This was brought about by the means of Cardinal Wolsey, who procured some copies of the book to be written in a very fair and beautiful character, and one of them to be bound up splendidly, namely, that which was to be sent to the pope; and the said cardinal sent that especially to the king, for his liking of it, before it went." The work was printed the same year in London, as a quarto pamphlet, with the title, "Assertio Septem Sacramentorum adversus Martin Luther," or Defence of the Seven Sacraments against Martin Luther. The irate reformer responded to the royal attack in a vehement reply, which sorely hurt Henry's vanity, both as a king and an author. His claim to authorship was somewhat of a pretence, since he had given little more than his name to the pamphlet in defence of the Seven Sacraments; nevertheless he felt severely aggrieved when the German monk told him, with very strong epithets, that his theology was bad, and his Latin worse. The criticism rankled deep in the conceit of Henry, and he never more set his name to book or pamphlet, nor ever forgave Doctor Martin Luther.

Had the people of England been less determined to break the bonds of Rome, the quarrel of the king with the great German reformer might have led to a firmer establishment than ever of Roman Catholicism in the realm; but bending as the great majority of Henry's subjects were towards the doctrines of the new faith, he himself was unable to stem the mighty tide, and, almost imperceptibly, kept drifting with the stream. The force of the great current of the reformation that was overrunning the country became strikingly visible in the year 1526, while Henry was in the height of his intimacy with the court of Rome, glorying in his title of Defender of the Faith, and ready to stamp out all heresy with fire and sword. In this year, a translation into the vernacular of the New Testament, made by William Tindal, and printed at Antwerp, was sent into England, and in a wonderfully short time spread in thousands of copies all over the country, notwithstanding the most determined efforts of the priests to stop the circulation. But threats, intrigues, and heavy punishments alike were spent in vain for the purpose. In the month of October, 1526, a circular letter was issued by all the bishops, stating that some of Luther's followers had "erroneously translated the New Testament," and "had corrupted the word of God both by a false translation and by heretical glosses;" they therefore required all incumbents to charge the people within their parishes that had any of these translations to bring them to the vicar-general within thirty days after the premonition, under penalty of excommunication and suspicion of heresy. This had no effect whatever, and it soon became apparent that the tenets of the reformers were spreading with such a rapidity as to baffle all attempts to restrain them. In the midst of their crusade against the Bible, the bishops learnt that the high seat of erudition in England, the university of Cambridge, was infected with heresy, some of the most eminent teachers, Bilney, Latimer, and others, having taken to propagate the works and opinions of Luther without fear and restraint. The most zealous of the prelates thereupon moved that a body of ecclesiastical commissioners be appointed to go to Cambridge, to discover the chief fautors of heresy there, and visit them with condign punishment; but this proposal was rejected by Wolsey on the ground of inexpediency. He at the same time summoned, as cardinal legate, a meeting of the principal dignitaries of the church, to deliberate upon the fearful increase of heretical opinions, and devise measures for counteracting it. Several of the Cambridge professors, Bilney among them, were brought before the meeting, and forced, under great threats, to abjure their errors; but they soon relapsed, and the doings of the assembly otherwise had no result. To all thoughtful observers it was becoming manifest that the best part of England, all that the kingdom possessed of intellect, of understanding, and of mental worth, had grown into Protestantism, and was getting more and more attached to the new faith, regardless of royal and papal and priestly power.

The attitude towards the reformation of Cardinal Wolsey, guide of the king, and virtual ruler of England, was somewhat strange. While doing everything in his power to attach Henry to Rome and set his face against the adherents of Luther, he proceeded at the same time with but little zeal against the English reformers, exhibiting so much indulgence towards them as to incur the suspicion of the ultra orthodox party of being a secret heretic. There was good ground for the distrust, Wolsey showing himself in one respect as great an enemy of ecclesiastical abuses as even Luther himself. In the year 1523, while the great German monk was sitting in his lone prison at the Wartburg, translating the Bible, the cardinal, at the instigation of his friend Edward Fox, bishop of Hereford, a favourer of the reformation, issued a commission for examining the monasteries, and dissolving and overthrowing those which showed the most glaring abuses and the greatest neglect of morality. The iniquities brought to light by this examination aided very powerfully in the spread of the principles of reform, forming a practical commentary to all the attacks levelled against the Roman Catholic clergy. Wolsey was not an altogether passive, or accidental instrument in thus assisting the cause of Protestantism. Ambition had made him a priest and a cardinal, and ambition made him aspire to the papal throne; but in reality he had not a grain of the true priestly element in him, being not only sceptic in matters of dogma, and tolerant of the views and opinions of others, but entirely devoid of attachment to Rome. But for his desire to emancipate himself from the thralldom of both ruling and serving a creature so fickle and vulgar and brutal as Henry VIII., it would have suited Wolsey's natural temper much better to take part in the reform movement of the educated English middle classes, of which he was the representative to a certain extent, than to be the champion of Romish interests, with which he felt little sympathy, and for which he cared less. However, the lofty dream of his ambition was to grasp the golden tiara of the self-styled successors of the apostle; and sacrificing everything to this dream, the son of the Ipswich trader neglected the chance outspread before him of becoming one of the founders of English Protestantism. Even as it was, with the vision of the papal throne constantly before his eyes, Wolsey did much for the cause of religious reform, both directly and indirectly, and had an infinitely greater share in making England Protestant than the sensual despot whom chance made the tool of breaking a link or two in the chain of Roman bondage. In Wolsey, literature found a constant and bountiful patron; and while he invited the most eminent scholars of the Continent to teach in English universities, he encouraged both learning and the spread of the new ideas of religion that had been fermenting in the heads of the best and most thoughtful of men ever since the church of Rome had become a mass of corruption. It was reserved for Wolsey in the end to lift, with bandaged eyes, the heavy axe that was to sever for all times England from the papacy.

At what precise time Henry got tired of his aged wife, conceiving, as he was pleased to express it, "scruples about his marriage," is not known; but there appears little doubt that Wolsey was chiefly instrumental in raising the "scruples," and fanning them into the proper glow. As reported by Burnet, "the cardinal did first infuse them into him, and made Longland, bishop of Lincoln, that was the king's confessor, possess the king's mind with them in confession." "It is also said," the author of the "History of the Reformation" continues, "that the cardinal being alienated from the emperor, that he might irreparably embroil the king and him, and unite the king to the French interests, designed this out of spite; and that he was also dissatisfied towards the queen, who hated him for his lewd and dissolute life, and had often admonished and checked him for it." Whatever the motives of Wolsey, he earnestly prosecuted the preparations for the divorce, the ultimate result of which he could not possibly foresee. There was, indeed, nothing in the first steps taken to obtain the needful papal sanction for the divorce which made either Henry or his minister doubt for a moment that it would be as readily granted as it had been in a hundred similar cases, when popes had assisted kings and other important men to get rid of inconvenient wives. When the matter was first proposed to the holy father, he, being a prisoner in the castle of St. Angelo, showed the greatest anxiety to oblige the Defender of the Faith, upon whom he rested his main hopes for escaping from the grip of the far-reaching Kaiser; but when once these hopes were frustrated in new victories of the imperialists, the whole turn of affairs changed, and from dealing with a facile pontiff, dispensing for small consideration bulls, pardons, and indulgences, Wolsey found himself face to face with the proudest monarch of the age, whose personal honour was involved in the question of the divorce. Perhaps, if possessed of more diplomatic skill, the cardinal might have overcome the difficulty, and by entering into negotiations with Charles V., and diverting the foreign policy of England into its old channels, as opposed to France, have secured the goodwill of the powerful monarch, thus surmounting all obstacles to the divorce, and doing away with all dangers likely to result from a quarrel with the head of the Catholic church. But Wolsey possessed no more diplomatic talent than military capacity; the "boy bachelor," as he was early called at Oxford, understood Greek and Latin and theology to perfection, but knew little or nothing of French and German, and of continental politics. His ignorance was fortunate for England—providential for the great cause of Protestantism.

Henry's negotiations with the court of Rome created a great divergence of opinion among the adherents of religious reform. While all ardently desired the destruction of the papal influence in England, likely to result from the failure of the negotiations, but few could bring themselves to look with complacency upon the means by which it was to be achieved. Queen Catherine was far from popular, her dark bigotry, alike with her un-English habits and mode of life, having left her since the day of her arrival in the country isolated among the circle of her priests; confessors, and courtiers; nevertheless, her misfortune touched all hearts, and the cause of morality and of the sacredness of the nuptial tie being bound up with her own, she had infinitely more friends than her rival, Anne Boleyn, who was arising to carry the doctrines of the reformation to the throne of England. The feeling of the people was curiously reflected in the discussions concerning the king's divorce that took place in the universities. Henry having asked them to give their advice in the matter, the hesitation to favour his illicit passion was great and general; and even at Cambridge, where the doctrines of Luther had spread to an extraordinary degree, it was not without great trouble that the king's agents, instructed to prepare the divorce in the teeth of Rome, could carry their point. "When they came to Cambridge," runs Burnet's account, based upon letters written by Henry's envoys, Gardiner and Fox, "they spake to the vice-chancellor, whom they found very ready to serve the king; so was also Doctor Edmonds, and several others; but there was a contrary party that met together, and resolved to oppose them. A meeting of the doctors, bachelors of divinity, and masters of art, in all about two hundred, was held. There the king's letters were read, and the vice-chancellor calling upon several of them to deliver their opinions about it, they answered as their affections led them, and were in some disorder." Finally, after a debate extending over two days, it was decided that "what two parts of three agreed to, should be read in a congregation, and without any further debate the common seal of the university should be set to it. Yet it was at first denied; then being put to the vote, it was carried equally on both sides. But being a third time proposed, it was carried for the divorce. Of which an account was presently sent to the king, with a schedule of their names to whom it was committed, and what was to be expected from them; so that it was at length determined, though not without opposition, that the king's marriage was against the law of God." Forced as was this adhesion of men of learning to the arbitrariness of the despot who made religion the cloak of his passions, it was yet not without great significance. Called upon to vote on a theological question, the high schools of England were placed for the first time in opposition to the priesthood, and the right of reason vindicated against the infallibility of the pope.

The fall of Wolsey greatly accelerated the final breach with Rome, yet before even the great cardinal had been stripped of all his power, and Henry had found a Cromwell to guide him away from the allegiance to pontifical supremacy, the attitude of the people clearly showed that England, if not its ruler, had become Protestant. Early in November, 1529, twelve months before the death of Wolsey, a parliament was summoned, after an interval of seven years; and its proceedings immediately indicated that religious reform could be no longer postponed. Humble as was the behaviour of the representatives of the nation on all occasions, and great the fear of the despot of England, who as yet had done nothing decisive to show that he really meant to hew down the bridge to Rome, parliament still lost not a moment in expressing its adherence to Lutheran doctrines, and its desire to get rid of the evils and abuses of the ancient church. The first bills passed by the House of Commons were levelled against the Romish clergy; one of them forbade the exactions for probates of wills; another was for the proper regulation of mortuaries, and a third put a stop to the plurality of benefices and non-residence, and the abuses committed by priests as farmers of land and holders of landed property. In the passing of these statutes there were severe reflections made on the vices and corruptions of the clergy, by speakers who made little secret of the fact of being Protestants at heart. When brought up to the House of Lords, the spirit in which these bills were framed was severely attacked by the bishop of Rochester, who cried "that the commons were resolved to bring down the church," warning them "to consider the miserable state of the kingdom of Bohemia, to which it had been reduced by heresy," and ending "that all this was for lack of faith." So far from being intimidated by this harangue of the prelate of Rochester, one of the chief leaders of the priestly party, the House of Commons boldly stood up against it, challenging the bishop to give an explanation of his censure. On the proposal of one of the most forward opponents of the clergy, thirty members of the house, headed by the speaker, Sir Thomas Audley, went as a deputation to the king, to complain of the bishop of Rochester for saying that their acts flowed "from the want of faith." The expression, they argued, was a high imputation against themselves, as well as against their constituents, the people of England, who were not infidels and heathens, but had abundance of faith, though not in the priests. The bishop thereupon, with six of his colleagues, including the archbishop of Canterbury, was summoned to the royal presence, and being told of the complaint of the commons, and asked to apologise, took refuge in a piece of sophistry, by explaining that when he spoke of lack of faith, he did not allude to the lower house of parliament, nor to the people of England, but to the Protestants of Bohemia. Clever as was the excuse, it was scarcely worthy of a prelate of the holy apostolic church.

All the bills sent from the House of Commons to the lords during this session were passed, notwithstanding the extreme resistance of the clerical party. Though possessing a clear majority in the upper house, the spiritual lords evidently dreaded to exert their power to the utmost, fearing that in the temper of the nation they might lose more than gain by opposition carried too far. The general adherence of the people to the principles of the reformation, even among the lower classes, was strikingly shown by a short act of parliament, passed in December, 1529, interdicting "the pulling or digging down crosses on the highways." Identifying crosses with priests, and full of a dim consciousness that the reign of the Romish priesthood was drawing to an end, the labourers and others among the agricultural population had begun to give utterance to their feelings by "digging down crosses," precisely similar to the mode adopted by the peasants of Germany, Bohemia, and Switzerland. The way in which the current of Protestant doctrines was running from the Continent into England is curiously indicated by the historian of the reformation. "There were some at Antwerp—Tyndal, Joy, Constantine, with a few more," reports Burnet, "that were every year printing and writing new books, chiefly against the corruptions of the clergy, the superstition of pilgrimages, of worshipping images, saints, and relics, and against relying on these things, which were called, in the common style, 'good works,' in opposition to which they wrote much about faith in Christ, with a true evangelical obedience, as the only means by which men could be saved. The book that had the greatest authority and influence was Tyndal's translation of the New Testament, of which the bishops made great complaints, and said it was full of errors. But Tonstall, bishop of London, being a man of invincible moderation, would do nobody hurt, yet endeavoured as he could to get their books into his hands: so, being at Antwerp, in the year 1529, as he returned from his embassy at the treaty of Cambray, he sent for one Packington, an English merchant there, and desired him to see how many New Testaments of Tyndal's translation he might have for money. Packington, who was a secret favourer of Tyndal, told him what the bishop proposed. Tyndal was very glad of it, for, being convinced of some faults in his work, he was designing a new and more correct edition; but he was poor, and the former impression not being sold off, he could not go about it. So he gave Packington all the copies that lay in his hands, for which the bishop paid the price, and brought them over, and burnt them publicly in Cheapside. This had such an hateful appearance in it, being generally called a burning of the Word of God, that people from thence concluded there must be a visible contrariety between that book and the doctrines of those who so handled it. So that next year, when another edition was finished, many more were brought over, and Constantine being taken in England, the lord chancellor, in a private examination, promised him that no hurt should be done him if he would reveal who encouraged and supported them at Antwerp. Which he accepted of, and told that the greatest encouragement they had was from the bishop of London, who had bought up half the impression."

London was not much behind Antwerp in employing the newly-created power of the press for the diffusion of Scriptural knowledge, and attack upon the worn-out edifice of priestly superstition. Sir Thomas More, the greatest, wisest, and most zealous champion of the church of Rome, was among the first to invoke the printer's aid in the field of religious controversy; but powerful as was his pen, it did not prevent the rise of advocates of the new faith, who boldly stood out against him in the arena he had chosen. In reply to one of the lord chancellor's quaint pamphlets, written in the name of the souls in purgatory, representing the miseries they were in, and the great relief they found from the masses of the friars, and calling upon all men "to befriend these poor friars now that so many enemies were arrayed against them," John Frith, a young and fervent Lutheran, friend of William Tyndal, came forward with a book, showing that the Bible knew nothing of the priestly assertion that there was a purgatory, and that it was not believed in by the primitive church of Christ. This gave rise to a war of pamphlets on the subject, in which the zealous bishop of Rochester and John Rastall, a printer and kinsman of More, took part, both violently opposing the friend of Tyndal, who had to fight his battle singlehanded. To Rastall's arguments in favour of a purgatory, based on the defects of human repentance in this life, and the consequent necessity of an existence in which souls may be purified before entering a higher state of being, Frith eloquently replied that our sins were not pardoned because of the lesser or greater perfection of our repentance, but through our faith in Christ, his teachings, and his sufferings, and that if our repentance be sincere and accepted as such by God, its pardon was sufficient, and could not be further punished. To an unfortunate remark of Sir Thomas More, repeated by his friends, "that the new preachers prevailed only on simple tradesmen, and women, and other illiterate persons," John Frith replied in a manner that carried annihilation with it. He calmly told the lord chancellor that the same objection had been made to the followers of the Saviour, who were fishermen, women, and rude mechanics, and that our Lord had replied to them in saying, "Blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God." All this was eagerly read by the people, revelling in the joy of newly-awakened thought, and poring over the leaves of the Bible as Luther had done not many years before in his narrow cell. But the London printing-press brought forth other books less argumentative than those of John Frith, and which, if using grosser weapons, still more appealed to the understanding of the "simple tradesmen, women, and other illiterate persons," against whom More and the priests had directed their elegant sneers. One of these, called "The Supplication of the Beggars," written by Simon Fish, a lawyer of Gray's Inn, had an immense circulation. It was in the form of a petition of the beggars of England to the king of England, the beggars complaining that they, poor helpless people, cripples of various sorts, and afflicted with disease, had the alms taken away from their mouths by regiments of stout and lusty friars, very able to work, but very unwilling. Entering into arithmetical calculations, as becoming alms-seekers, the beggars further showed that if each friar belonging to the five mendicant orders had but a penny a quarter from every household, the total amounted to a vast sum, expended most unprofitably for the commonwealth, and, as delicately hinted, most unprofitably to his majesty the king. The "Supplication" concluded with a biting sally at the purgatory dogma; the pope and his priests, the beggars said, were most cruel and hard-hearted people for only delivering those out of purgatory who could afford to pay liberally for the service, leaving the rest of poor moneyless souls to roast at the everlasting fire. The clergy got wild with rage when they found this terrible book read by tens and hundreds of thousands of people all over the kingdom. But it was in vain they appealed to Henry to punish the author. Anne Boleyn had given her royal lover an early copy of the "Supplication" that had been sent to her; and its humour had tickled his majesty so much as to make him look upon Simon Fish of Gray's him as one of the most deserving of his subjects, almost equal in merit to Hudson, the court-fool, who could sit in an apple-pie.

The storm that had been brewing over the heads of the Romish priesthood in England for years had been of little service to them as a warning, and when the clouds opened at last they were as unprepared for the event as ever they had been. By the decision of the court of king's bench, which brought a fine of a hundred thousand pounds upon the whole body of the clergy, for contravention of the ancient statutes of provisors and præmunire, they began to feel the iron grip of the despot turning against them; but even this failed to serve as an admonition, and so far from bringing reason into the field, only led to an intestine war among the several grades of the priestly hierarchy. To raise the hundred thousand pounds quickly among themselves, and conciliate the greedy tyrant by prompt payment, would have been easy enough for the great prelates and heads of conventual establishments, all of them possessed of immense wealth; but instead of doing so they called upon the poorer priests to disburse the amount, which gave rise to a quarrel utterly damaging to the whole order. The fine had been inflicted in January, 1531; and on the 1st of September following, after several vain attempts to obtain the money by voluntary subscriptions, the bishop of London called together a meeting of the lower clergy at the chapter-house of St. Paul's, to debate upon the subject. In a very remarkable speech, the bishop told his hearers "that as the state of men in this life was frail, so the clergy, through frailty and want of wisdom, had misdeemed themselves towards the king, and had fallen in a præmunire, for which the king of his great clemency was pleased to pardon them, and to accept of a little, instead of the whole of their benefices which by the law had fallen into his hand, and he therefore desired they would patiently bear their share in the burthen." The reply, given very angrily, was that they, the lower orders of the priesthood, had never meddled with provisors, præmunire, or any other of the high matters bringing them under the grasp of the statute, so that they had nothing to do with the fine imposed for its contravention, the payment of which they must leave to the bishops and abbots, enjoying the wealth as well as the privileges of the church. "Upon which," says the report of the meeting, "the bishop's officers threatened the priests; but they, on the other hand, being encouraged by some laymen that came along with them, persisted in their denial to pay anything, so that from high words the matter came to blows, and several of the bishop's servants were ill-handled by them. But he, to prevent a further tumult, apprehending it might end upon himself, gave them good words, and dismissed the meeting with a blessing, and promised that nothing should be brought in question that was then done. Yet he was not so good as his word, for he complained of it to the lord chancellor, by whose order fifteen priests and five laymen were committed to prison." The episcopal blessing, followed by imprisonment, had necessarily but a moderate effect in restoring union among the clergy.

Henry's attack upon the Romish hierarchy now

followed stroke upon stroke, with weapons mainly forged by the priests themselves. The convocation of the clergy in the session of 1531 having acknowledged him, though with great unwillingness, "Protector and only Supreme Head of the Church of England," the first use he made of his now dignity was to abolish the tax of annates, or first year's income of vacant bishoprics, that had been paid to Rome from time immemorial, and which formed the chief income of the cardinals who attended upon the pope; and this measure was followed up, in May, 1532, by a decree doing away with the legislative power of convocation, and reducing it to a mere debating assembly. Seven months after, in January, 1533, the king married Anne Boleyn; and in March following, the friend of Luther, Thomas Cranmer, was instituted archbishop of Canterbury. Parliament met in the autumn of the same year, and in a few pregnant statutes annihilated the supremacy of Rome. By the 25 Henry VIII. cap. 19, the abolition of the legislative authority of convocation, already dictated by royal decree, was fully confirmed; by 25 Henry VIII. cap. 20, it was ordered that bishops for the future should be elected and consecrated under the sole authority of the king, and no longer be presented to the pope for confirmation; and by 25 Henry VIII. cap. 21, all pecuniary contributions whatever, imposed by the pontiff of Rome, were abolished, and his licensing and dispensing powers transferred to the archbishop of Canterbury, while the realm of England was declared "free from subjection to the laws of any foreign prince, potentate, or prelate." Having passed these important statutes, parliament was prorogued for a few months, and on meeting again in November, 1534, a short act was voted, setting the seal to its former measures. It confirmed what had been already acknowledged by the clergy, that the king was "the Supreme Head upon earth of the Church of England," and further ordered that the king, his heirs and successors, should have power to "visit and reform all heresies, errors, and other abuses." Thus the Roman pope was expelled and cast out in favour of a pope-king of England. It was the old feudal "Le roi est mort: vive le roi!"—very time-honoured, but highly objectionable nevertheless to true Protestants, bent upon substituting reason for authority, and the laws of God for the decrees of kings and priests.

Important as were the statutes abolishing the papal supremacy in England, they sank into all but insignificance before the great practical measure of the next few years, the dissolution of the monasteries. Two things, and two only, made the English reformation—the annihilation of monasticism and the study of the Bible, the first representing the ploughing up of the soil, fitting it to let in light and to bring forth heaven's good gifts, instead of foul weeds and thistles, and the second the throwing in of noble seeds given by God to mankind in his Holy Word. Already the Bible had found its way into the realm, and was eagerly read by vast multitudes; but it still had brought little fruit as yet, and could bring little, as long as the ground was covered by swarms of idle and profligate monks, abhorring truth, reason, and knowledge, and propagating vice and ignorance both by precept and example. It was when Thomas Cromwell, noble blacksmith's son and true Protestant, set his axe to this great stronghold of crime and superstition, that commenced the real dawn of the reformation in England. The work began in the summer of 1535, and was completed in the short space of three years, during which such an amount of iniquity, hidden under the cloak of religion, was brought to light as would pass belief were the facts of it not embodied in contemporary documents of unquestionable authenticity. The general orders issued by Cromwell to his agents, or "visitors" as they were called, was to "put forth all religious persons that would go, and all that were under the age of four-and-twenty years; and close up the residue that would remain, so that they should not come out of their places; and take order that no man should come to the houses of women, nor women to the houses of men, but only to hear their service in the churches;" and farther, "to all religious men that departed, the abbot or prior to give them for their habit a priest's gown and forty shillings of money; and the nuns to have such apparel as secular women wear, and go where they would." The "visitors" were moreover instructed to encourage, by all means in their power, that the secularized monks should devote themselves to some trade or profession, the teaching business being specially recommended to the better-informed among the men. "Also," the orders ran, "that the abbot or president keep and find in some university one or two of his brethren, according to the ability and possessions of the house, which brethren, after they be learnt in good and holy letters, when they return home may instruct and teach their brethren, and diligently preach the word of God." Cromwell's commissioners were not altogether unsuccessful in this respect; but on the whole the labour they had undertaken proved far more one of destroying than of building.

The facts and incidents disclosed in the official reports of the monastic "visitors" were of the most extraordinary kind. Dr. Layton found at Maiden Bradley "an holy father prior, who hath but vj children, and but one dowghter mariede yet of the goodes of the monastery, trynging shortly to mary the resto. His sones be tale men waittyng upon him; and he thanks God he never medelet with marytt women, but all with madens, the faireste cowlede be gottyn, and always mared them ryght well." John ap Rice, another of Cromwell's commissioners, reported from the large Benedictine monastery of Bury, in Suffolk, that there was "suche a frequence of women commyng and reassorting as to no place more. And amongst the reliques we found moche vanitie and superstition, as the coles that St. Laurence was tosted withall, the paring of St. Edmundes naylles, St. Thomas of Canterbury penneknyff, and his bootes, and divers skulles for the hedache; peces of the holie crosse able to make a holie crosse of; other reliques for rayne and certain other superstitiouse usages, and for avoyding of wodes growing in corne." Visiting Bedfordshire, Dr. Layton found a "priorie called Harwolde, wherein was iiij or v nunnes with the prioress; one of them had two faire chyldren, another one." At Walsingham Abbey, famous place of pilgrimage, Richard Southwell discovered "a secrete pryve place within the house, where no channon nor onnye other of the howse dyd ever enter, as they saye, in whiche there were instrumetes, pottes, belowes, flyes of such strange cholers as the lick non of us had seene, with poygies, and other thinges to sorte, and offered gould and sylver, nothing ther wantynge that should belonge to the arte of multiplyng." Of the head of the princely abbey of Fountains, in Yorkshire—the mere decayed fragments of which, forming the largest monastic ruin in the empire, cover more than twelve acres of ground—worse things were reported. "Pleasit your mastershippe to understande," ran the letter to Cromwell, "that thabbot of Fontance hath so grefly dilapidate his howse, wasted ther wooddes, notoriously keyping vj w——, diffamede here a toto populo, one day denyng these articles with many mo, the next day folowying the same confessyng, thus manifestly incurrying perjurie. vj days before our accesse to his monasterie he committed theff and sacrilege, confessyng the same. At mydnyght causode his chapelaine to stele the sextens keys, and towke owte a jewel, a crosse of golde with stones. One Warren, a goldsmith of the Chepe, was with hym in his chambrue at that howre, and ther they stole out a giete emerode with a rubie; the saide Warren made thabbot beleve the rubie to be but a garnet, and so for that he payede nothyng, for the emerode but xx". He solde him also then plate withoute weyght or ownces: howe moche thabbot therfor therin was deceivede he cannot tell, for the trewith ys he ys a vara fole, and a miserable ideote. We pronunce him perjurede."

The result of Cromwell's great work was summed up as follows by an unknown writer of the Elizabethan age, whose manuscript has come down to the present day:—"He caused visitacions to be made of all the religious houses touching their conversations, whereuppon was retourned the booke called the Blacke Booke, expressing of every suche house the vile lives and abominable factes, in murders of their bretherne, in sodomies, in w——, in destroying of children, in forging of deedes, and other infinite horrors of life, in so muche as dividing of all the religious persons in England into three partes, two of these partes at the least were s——; and this appeared in writing, with the names of the parties and their factes. This was shewed in parliament, and the villanies made known and abhorred. Then he caused the king of the abbes possessions to make such dispersion, as it behoved infinite multitudes for their owne intrest to joyne with the king in holding them downe, whiche he did by divers meanes, and these among other: by founding divers bishoprickes and colleges with these possessions, selling many of them to many men for reasonable prices, exchanging many of them with the nobilitie and others for their auncient possessions, to their greate gaine with whome he exchanged, preferring many sufficient persons to the kinges servise, who were sone raised to nobilitie and to worshipec and good calling, and all indewed with maintenaunce out of the revenewes of abbyes." Many propositions were made by Cromwell, as well as other advisers of Henry, to employ at least a part of the immense wealth derived from the confiscated monasteries for the advancement of some national object; but they all came to nothing, the king's greedy nature being above all temptations to do good, or leave a name cherished by posterity. The by far greatest portion of the monastic property, amounting, according to some calculations, to not less than one-fifth of the rental of the whole kingdom, fell into the hands of Henry's courtiers and favourites, and but a small fraction was devoted to public purposes. It was at first intended to appropriate large sums to the advancement of religion, and an act of parliament was passed authorizing the king to found a great number of new bishoprics, deaneries, and colleges, and endow them with the lands of the suppressed convents. But out of eighteen new ones mentioned in the parliamentary schedule only six were established, namely Bristol, Chester, Gloucester, Oxford, Peterborough, and Westminster. Together with these, fourteen abbeys and priories were converted into cathedral and collegiate churches, a dean and prebendaries being allotted to each, under obligation to give annually small sums to the poor, and to repair the king's highways within certain districts. Thus the ecclesiastical establishments of Canterbury, Carlisle, Winchester, Worcester, Peterborough, Rochester, Bristol, Chester, Durham, Ely, Westminster, Gloucester, Thornton, and Burton-upon-Trent, survived to tell the tale of the dissolved monasteries.

The destruction of monasticism had not yet been completed, when already a retrograde movement stopped the course of the reformation. On the 19th of May, 1536, Anne Boleyn was led to the block, and with her vanished all that had ever attracted the coarse and vulgar-minded tyrant who was swaying the destinies of England towards the cause of truth and reason. Henceforth he played the pope as never Roman pontiff had played it before, killing, burning, and torturing like a fiend incarnate, making the faith of a nation dependent upon his whims, and turning religion into a hideous mockery. During the ten years that elapsed till death carried off the infuriated royal brute, the great heart of England kept beating heavily against the huge burthen of despotism that was oppressing it like a nightmare; and had it been in human power to lead a nation into infidelity and disregard of all religion, the monstrous rule of these ten years might have done it. Fortunately, the extreme violence of Henry's despotism defeated its own ends, and his wholesale murders and fierce persecutions, directed in turn against Protestants and Catholics, though they loosened for a while, yet ultimately settled the seeds of faith, by making men disbelieve as in the power of a self-styled vicar of Christ, so in that of a parliamentary "Supreme Head upon earth of the Church of England." The newly-made "Supreme Head," as quaintly remarked by Sir James Mackintosh, the historian, "approached as nearly to the ideal standard of perfect wickedness as the infirmities of human nature would allow;" and it was this very perfection of diabolic atrocity which, by a mysterious working of divine providence, came to assist in the slow progress of the reformation. As the people of Rome had never believed in the heavenly inspiration of their pope, his asserted infallibility being too fantastic to bear close examination, so the people of England, now they had a pope for themselves, were more than ever driven into the conviction that all human authority in matters of religion was vain and vicious, and that nothing else would lead to the salvation of the soul but faith in Christ and in God's own message to mankind. Thus the subjects of Henry VIII. set to study their Bible, and the more he kept beheading and burning, sending to the scaffold and the stake all who denied his popedom, the more the people kept to examine the Scriptures, poring over the holy book till its words had crept into their souls. Once the temples of superstition, the convents, swept away, and the Bible introduced in their place, it was beyond the power of all popes, and kings, and priests, to drive the reformation from the soil of England.

The progress of the English Bible was somewhat singular, undergoing the most extraordinary vicissitudes in the course of half a century. Before the reformation, two versions existed, the one Wycliffe's translation, and the other a paraphrase thereof, strongly tinted with Lollard opinions. Both were extremely rare, and very little read; and it was not till Luther began his great religious movement, which spread rapidly from east to west, that there arose a desire among the English people to study in their own language the unknown Book on which the new faith was based. The consequence was the publication of Tyndal's translation of the New Testament, issued from a printing-press at Antwerp in 1526, which passed through several editions, and in a very short time spread all over the kingdom, notwithstanding the extreme opposition of the priests, who burned all the copies they could lay hand on, and punished the readers. William Tyndal, who thus earned a high place among the religious reformers of England, was a very remarkable man. The son of a Gloucestershire yeoman, born about the beginning of the reign of Henry VII., he studied theology at Oxford and Cambridge, and being ordained in 1502, became a friar in the monastery of Greenwich. Here he found a Latin version of the Scriptures, the study of which influenced him to such an extent that he quitted his convent, accepted a situation as tutor in the house of a nobleman near Bristol, and commenced preaching on Bible subjects in all the surrounding villages. Accused of heresy, he was soon cited before the ordinary, by whom, as he himself reports, he was "rated like a dog," and made to quit the diocese. After wandering over various parts of England, full of the great project of translating the Bible, yet finding no support anywhere, Tyndal finally, towards the end of 1533, embarked for the Continent, landed at Hamburg, and made his way to Wittemberg, where he met Luther, and under his direction prepared an English version of the gospels and epistles. To print them was the next great difficulty, not overcome till after the most gigantic exertions. Few establishments on the Continent could print in English, and fewer still dared to incur the hatred of the priesthood by meddling with the Bible; and the humble monk of Greenwich, steeped in poverty, had not the slightest worldly inducement to offer, nor even a promise that the costs of the enterprise would be paid. At length a printer at Cologne, touched by the earnest entreaties of the poor foreigner, undertook the work; but after ten quarto sheets had been struck off, the archbishop interfered.

and Tyndal had to fly, first to Worms, and then to Antwerp, where his translation of the Bible was finally issued from the press, under the assistance of the company of English merchants, to whom he acted as chaplain. As soon as printed, copies of the New Testament, followed by the Pentateuch, the historical books, the psalms, the prophets, and the rest of the Scriptures, "came thick and threefold into England," according to the testimony of John Fox, the martyr-ologist. The burning of the Book by the priests but raised the desire of the people for its study; "they did," said Tyndal afterwards, when preparing to meet the doom which the despot of England reserved to all the great and noble men of the realm, "they did none other thing than I looked for: no more shall they do if they burn me also."

Tyndal's translation—basis of the "authorized version" subsequently made—was attacked by the more moderate among the Romish hierarchy in England, who were ashamed to own their aversion to the Word of God itself, on the ground that it was incorrect; and taking advantage of this argument, the Protestant party, headed by Cranmer, proposed to the king that the bishops themselves should render the Bible into the vernacular. The proposal was adopted by Henry, his vanity being flattered by the offer of subjecting the new work to his supervision, so as to correct the inspiration of the apostles by his own. To the royal injunction to set to work in translating the Scriptures, the Catholic prelates made no open resistance, but simply shelved the matter by doing nothing, trusting that time would bring help. In 1533, the king becoming more peremptory, Cranmer carried a resolution through convocation that Tyndal's version should be amended; and the bishops still remaining inactive, he divided the work into ten parts, and sending each to a leading prelate, desired them to put in their corrections without further loss of time. The bishop of London openly refused; the others, sailing close to the wind of royal favour, promised again obedience, but again did nothing. On this, Miles Coverdale, a learned friar of the Augustine monastery, Cambridge, one of the earliest seats of Protestantism in England, went to the Continent, under a licence of Cromwell, and with the aid of Tyndal prepared a new translation of the Bible, differing from the former chiefly in the leaving out of the prefaces, notes, and commentaries, against which the priestly reproach of incorrectness had been chiefly directed. Coverdale's translation was printed at Zürich, in Switzerland, and was first published at Hamburg, in 1535; and while it was proceeding another edition of it was prepared, by order of Archbishop Cranmer, at Paris, the English artisans not being thought able to do the work as well, and the paper of home manufacture being known to be vastly inferior to that of France. Cromwell, now at the height of his power, took a great interest in this edition, and by his instructions Dr. Bonner, English envoy at the court of Francis I., obtained the king's leave to print the Bible in a large volume, as handsome as all the resources of the typographical art would permit. The work was duly completed; but before it could be despatched, the priests once more stepped in, seized the edition, and burnt it publicly. A few of the copies, however, were secretly conveyed away, together with the formes, and having safely reached England, Richard Grafton, a London printer, finished the labour of the press. In the summer of 1538, Cromwell presented the new Bible to the king, and procured the royal warrant permitting the reading of the same "without control or hazard." To this the vicar-general added his own injunctions, issued to all incumbents, "to provide one of these Bibles, and set it up publicly in the church, and not to hinder or discourage the reading of it, but to encourage all persons to peruse it, as being the true lively word of God." Archbishop Cranmer sent a warm letter of thanks, dated the 13th of August, to Cromwell, for his great efforts in the publication of the Bible, expressing himself "full of joy that he saw this day of reformation which had now risen in England, since the light of God's word was shining over it without cloud."

READING BIBLE IN CHURCH.

Cranmer's joy was not destined to last long. Before yet the Bible had been placed in all the churches, as ordered by Cromwell, the fickle tyrant, who did not know how best to play his part of pope, once more changed his attitude, and set to burn Protestants instead of beheading Catholics. Having long swayed to and fro between the two great forms of belief that had come to divide the realm, Henry, in his declining years, with a body broken under vicious indulgences, felt himself attracted finally towards the ancient faith of Rome, which offered pardon against mass and confession, and heaven for cash payment. The change required the less effort on his part as outwardly the two religious parties seemed very evenly balanced; the earnestness of the English reformers, under Cranmer of Canterbury, Latimer of Worcester, Shaxton of Salisbury, and Fox of Hereford, being matched by the violent zeal of the Romanist bishops, headed by Gardiner of Winchester, Lee of York, Stokesley of London, Tonstall of Durham, and Clarke of Bath and Wells. The appointment of Gardiner as chief adviser of the king, in 1539, was immediately followed by the enactment of the statute of the Six Articles, or the "Bloody Statute," which completed Henry's creed, and fenced it round with terrible penalties. It was a statute such as no tyrant had ever framed before, completely reversing the current of the age, and threatening with imprisonment and death all who did not adhere to the six Romish doctrines of transubstantiation, communion under one kind, celibacy of priests, vows of chastity, private masses for the dead, and auricular confession. Seized with renewed zeal for his pontifical dignity, Henry took an active part in carrying the statute of the Six Articles through parliament; and by his desire Bishop Gardiner inserted in the preamble that "the king's most royal majesty, of his most excellent goodness, not only commanded that the said articles should deliberately and advisedly, by his said archbishops, bishops, and other learned men of his clergy, be debated, argued, and reasoned, and their opinions therein be understood, declared, and known, but also most graciously vouchsafed in his own princely person to descend and come into his said high court of parliament and council, and there, like a prince of most high prudence, and no less learning, open and declare many things of high learning and great knowledge touching the said articles, matters, and questions." The Bloody Statute was voted with great alacrity by the dutiful lords and commons, who had lost anchor and compass on the ocean of ever-changing doctrines on which they were tossed about by the breath of the "Supreme Head" of the realm. There was much satisfaction among the priests at the new act; "it was received," Burnet reports, "by all that favoured popery with great joy, for now they hoped to be revenged on all those who had hitherto set forward the reformation."

In reality, the passing of the statute of the Six Articles left nothing of the main elements of Protestantism in England but the Bible, and its existence was threatened as soon as the new law was seen to be in good operation, sending every day crowds of martyrs to the prison and the stake. At several meetings of convocation, in 1540 and 1541, the bishops of the now ruling faction signed addresses to the king, entreating him to interdict the reading of the English translation of the Scriptures, on the ground of its being full of errors. Henry resisted for a moment, feeling his personal vanity slightly touched in the matter, as he had taken part in bringing out the English edition, and authorized Cromwell to put the words "cum privilegio" on the title-page. Seeing the difficulty of entirely prohibiting the Bible, the Romish party lit upon a singular plan for defacing the inspired book, and making its study all but useless to the masses. At a meeting of convocation, held in 1542, Gardiner, after again dwelling at great length upon the "errors" contained in the English version of the Scripture, proposed that a new translation should be made, in which all the words of doubtful meaning, or the rendering of which would be difficult, should be printed in Latin, after the original. Among an immense list of "untranslatable words," brought forward as examples by Henry's prime minister, were adorare, ancilla, baptizare, contritus, ecclesia, clementia, idiota, justitia, martyr, poenitentia, pontifex, sacramentum, sandalium, simplex, simulacrum, and other expressions of like meaning, which, if simple enough in themselves, yet formed a more or less inconvenient contradiction between the teaching of the Bible and the teachings of the priests. Gardiner's friends fully comprehended the purport of his proposition, and a petition to the king was resolved upon, praying that he would authorize the re-translation of the Scriptures on the scheme of the bishop of Winchester. Cranmer being still at his side, Henry was made to declare himself against the plan, on the homely ground "that if a translation must be made, it should not be daubed all through with Latin words, that the people could not understand it much better for its being in English." However, the Romish bishops kept on addressing the king about the fearful errors of the Bible, till Cranmer, scarcely knowing how further to protect his work, persuaded Henry to refer the examination of the English translation to the two universities, which should decide whether the complaints of convocation were well-founded. "The bishops," says Burnet, reporting the sequel, "took this very ill when Cranmer intimated it to them in the king's name, and objected that the learning of the universities was much decayed of late, and that the two houses of convocation were the more proper judges of that, where the learning of the land was chiefly gathered together. But the archbishop said he would stick close to the king's pleasure, and that the universities should examine it. Upon which all the bishops of his province, except Ely and St. David's, protested against it, and soon after the convocation was dissolved."

The Romish party gained their point, after all, before Henry's reign had come to an end. The burning of Tyndal and others who had taken an active part in translating and distributing the Bible, quickly followed by the execution of the greatest of English reformers, Thomas Cromwell, left the field free for the machinations of the priests, and they succeeded in passing several statutes which virtually destroyed the use of the Scriptures. In 1543, parliament, on the behest of the despot, voted a law under the significant title, "An act for the advancement of true religion and for the abolishment of the contrary," which prohibited "all manner of books of the Old and New Testament in English, being of the crafty, false, and untrue translation of Tyndal, and all other books and writings in the English tongue teaching or comprising any matters of Christian religion, articles of the faith, or Holy Scripture, or any part of them." By this statute, the penalty of three months' imprisonment for the first offence, and of perpetual imprisonment for the second, was decreed against all who should "print, sell, or otherwise publish any of the said books," declared to be "clearly and utterly abolished, extinguished, and forbidden to be kept or used." The act excepted "Bibles and New Testaments in English, not being of Tyndal's translation," but with two very important and very extraordinary conditions attached, the first being that the Bibles thus permitted should be mutilated, and the second, that they should only be read by certain classes of people. It was ordered, under heavy penalties, that all marginal notes, preambles, and annotations to be found in the permitted version of the Scriptures should, by the owners themselves, be "cut out or blotted out in such wise as they cannot be perceived nor read," and the liberty to inspect the condemned portion of the Bible was reserved to the clergy, to "captains of the wars, justices of the peace, and others which heretofore have been accustomed to declare or teach any good, virtuous, or godly exhortations in any assemblies." As to the "blotted-out" Bible, its study was permitted only to noblemen and gentlemen, the latter category including merchants "being householders;" and the privilege was withdrawn from all women, artificers, apprentices, serving-men of the degree of yeomen or under, labourers, husbandmen, and, in fact, the great body of the population. Instead of the Bible, thus withdrawn from the people, Henry enjoined all to read and study a publication issued under his patronage, called "The Necessary Doctrine and Erudition of a Christian Man," to the last edition of which he had condescended to furnish a prefatory epistle, whence it was called the "King's Book." Further it was impossible even for a pontifex to go. The prohibition of God's Word, and institution of the King's Book properly finished the ecclesiastical rule of Henry VIII.

A more sudden change in matters of religion than that which took place in the few days from the decease of Henry to the instalment of the boy-king, his son, had never before been witnessed in English history. Another Luther in energy of character, no less than a Cromwell in readiness of expedients, Somerset hesitated not a moment to lay his axe to the rotten tree of Romanism; and before one half of the people knew that the pope-king was dead, he had told the other half that there should be no more popery in England, if he, Protector of the realm, could help it. Instantly on Edward's accession and Somerset's seizure of the reins of government, the persecutions under the terrible statute of the Six Articles were put a stop to; the crowds of heretics that filled all the prisons were released; the Protestant exiles were recalled; and commissioners were despatched to all parts of the kingdom, empowered with almost unlimited authority to carry out the reformation in the church. Among other instructions, the commissioners were ordered to require that at least four sermons should be preached yearly, in every church, against the papal authority; that sermons should be directed against the worship of images, and that all images which were the objects of pilgrimage, or offerings, should be destroyed; that a book of homilies, drawn up by Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, and others, should be used in every church; that each clergyman should provide for himself, and each parish for the congregation, an English Bible; and that no clergyman should preach without a licence from the Protector, or the archbishop of Canterbury. After these preparatory measures, a parliament was assembled, at the commencement of November, 1547; and the lords and commons, with customary humility, voted a number of bills which Somerset had prepared to promote and enlarge the reformation. By 1 Edward VI. cap. 1, the communion was appointed to be received in both kinds, by the laity as well as the clergy; by 1 Edward VI. cap. 2, bishops were ordered to be nominated by the king, and process in the ecclesiastical courts was decreed to run in his name; and by 1 Edward VI. cap. 12, the whole of the terrible statutes against the Lollards, passed in the reigns of Richard II. and Henry IV., were repealed, together with all the acts in matters of religion passed under Henry VIII., except those directed against the papal supremacy. The far-reaching strokes embodied in these few statutes all but sufficed to bring the mighty edifice of English Romanism to the ground; and having accomplished the labour of destroying, the Protector forthwith set to work on the higher task of building up again. After a short prorogation, parliament once more assembled to vote a statute repealing all laws against the marriage of priests, and an "Act for the Uniformity of Service," a clause of which ordered the general use of a new "Book of Common Prayer," which had been prepared by Cranmer. The publication of this book, which came to guide the forms of English worship for centuries, was not one of the least important labours of the short reign of Edward VI.

The preamble of the "Act for the Uniformity of Service" stated that the king, having appointed "the archbishop of Canterbury, and certain of the most learned and discreet bishops and other learned men of this realm," to set to work to "draw and make one convenient and meet order of common and open prayer and administration of the sacraments," they had "by the aid of the Holy Ghost, with one uniform agreement, concluded and set forth the same in a book entitled the Book of Common Prayer, and administration of the Sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, after the use of the Church of England." According to the terms of the statute, the Book of Common Prayer was to be read by all ministers in cathedrals and parish churches from the ensuing feast of Pentecost, under stringent penalties for neglect, and it was also ordered that it should be purchased, at the cost of the parishioners, before the time specified. The injunction was generally complied with, and the two authorised printers with whom the issue of the work had been left, Richard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch, could for a time not supply copies enough to satisfy the demand. They commenced printing in March, 1549, immediately after the passing of the act, and kept their presses at work uninterruptedly during the whole of the year and part of the next. By a clause inserted in the statute, and reprinted on the fly-leaf of the first edition, a folio volume, the price of the Book of Common Prayer was rigidly fixed. "The king's majesty," the clause ran, "by the advice of his most dear uncle, the Lord Protector, and other his highness' council, straitly chargeth and commandeth that no manner of person do sell this present book, if unbound, above the price of two shillings and two pence the piece, and the same bound in paste, or in boards, not above the price of three shillings and eight pence the piece." A new edition of Cranmer's work, known as the "Second Book of Common Prayer," and containing some additions, was published in 1552, and distributed the same as the first issue. The Latin missals and breviaries were the groundwork on which both were drawn up; those parts which were considered superfluous being omitted by the archbishop and his friends, and the others translated into English, with such corrections and additions as were required to meet the wishes of the reformers, without too much offending the prejudices of the Roman Catholics. In the "Second Book," the exhortation, confession, and absolution were added to the previous contents; the ten commandments were also introduced into the communion service; the litany was ordered to be used on Sundays, water in baptism was prescribed to be consecrated, and the sign of the cross enjoined in confirmation and matrimony. The spirit which dictated these reforms was undeniably one of moderation; yet they nevertheless greatly exasperated the more zealous of the Romanists. In the western insurrection of 1549, stirred up by the clergy adhering to the old religion, the cry of the rebels was "We will have the mass as before." The answer of Cranmer was wonderfully persuasive in its quietness. "The priest," said the archbishop, "is your proctor and attorney, to plead your cause and to speak for you all; but had you not rather know what he saith for you? I have heard suitors murmur at the bar because their attorneys have pleaded their cases in the French tongue, which they understood not. Why then be you offended that the priests, who plead your cause before God, should speak such language as you may understand?"

Moderate as was the course pursued by Cranmer and his associates in the work of religious reform, they yet accomplished great things in a very short time, and the six years' reign of Edward rooted on English soil, more or less firmly, five important points of progress from the old to the new faith. These were that, first, the public services were expressed in the mother tongue, and the Scriptures read instead of the Romish legends; that, secondly, the worship of saints, including that of images, was abolished; that, thirdly, auricular confession was swept away, with, fourthly, clerical celibacy, and, fifthly, the doctrine of the Real Presence. These, added to the two great ends achieved under the previous reign, the destruction of the authority of the bishop of Rome, and the dissolution of the monasteries, formed, indeed, gigantic strides towards a purer religion; but the whole was far from satisfying the more ardent of the Protestants, brought up in the school of Luther and of Calvin. They held, and loudly expressed their opinion, that the advisers of the young king, including Cranmer, were still far too much attached to the old religion, and that the spirit actuating them was more one of compromise with ancient errors than of zeal for the cause of pure and absolute truth. Nearly all the upholders of these advanced opinions were English exiles, who had been driven abroad during the despotism of Henry VIII. and returned only at the accession of Edward VI., and though they were not strong in numbers, their influence, originating both in their zeal and the remarkable talents, if not genius, of many of them, was very considerable. To Cranmer this influence was not pleasing, opposition being unwelcome to him, as to all men invested with great and unusual power; and losing many of his high and noble qualities in the sunshine of success, it at last drove him into the most hateful acts, quite unworthy of his character and of the doctrines he professed. In 1549, commissions were issued by the archbishop "to inquire into heretical depravity," the result of which was a rigorous persecution of Protestant dissenters, particularly of the peaceful sect known as the Anabaptists, who while disbelieving in the validity of infant baptism, also rejected oaths, and asserted the doctrine of non-resistance, subsequently adopted by the Quakers. The Anabaptists, the Lollards of the Continent, had come from the Netherlands, where they existed long before the time of Luther; but the reformation had brought them into England where they hoped to live in peace, not thinking for a moment that men like Cranmer and his friends, whose cry was for liberty of conscience, would deny them the rights they claimed and to a great extent had obtained for themselves. The archbishop soon disabused them in this respect, and while treating Roman Catholics with the greatest leniency, exhibited somewhat of the spirit of the despot who had raised him from obscurity to the highest place in the church by sending Protestants to the stake. Some of the unhappy victims he seized recanted their heresy, and were freely pardoned by the primate; but two of them, Joan Bocher, known as Joan of Kent, and Van Parr, a Dutch surgeon settled in London, were burnt at Smithfield, the first on the 2nd of May, 1550, and the second on the 24th of May, 1551.

Cranmer was not alone guilty of these atrocious acts, accomplished to the everlasting shame of the early reformers, but was incited thereto by others whose zeal for Protestantism, such as they understood it, had stood the proof of persecution, and who therefore ought to have felt still deeper the disgrace of persecuting others. Prominent among these men, whose ardour in the battle they were fighting led them to forget the injunction of the apostle that "God is love," and that "If we love one another God dwelleth in us," was John Rogers, a friend of Tyndal and of Miles Coverdale, who after having lived in exile for many years—spending his time in making a new translation of the Bible, which was printed abroad in 1537—under the name of Thomas Matthew, had come back to England at the accession of Edward, and been appointed prebendary of St. Paul's and vicar of St. Sepulchre's, London. Possessing great influence with the archbishop, Rogers was entreated by one of his friends, after Joan of Kent had been condemned to death, to interfere in her favour, so as to save her life and prevent a disgrace to Protestantism. The friend—name not known, but supposed to be John Fox, who himself told the story in his "Book of Martyrs"—was very earnest in his pleadings, urging that if it was absolutely necessary to prevent the spread of the doctrines of the Anabaptists, of which the woman of Kent was a zealous expounder, it would be best to keep her simply in prison, allowing her to change her opinions, if so inclined, and at any rate disabling her from communicating them to others. However, Rogers refused to listen to these strong and noble arguments, insisting with vehemence that Joan Bocher ought to be put to death. "Well, then," said his friend, "if you are resolved to kill her, opinions by taking her life, at least choose some other kind of death, more consonant with the gentleness and mercy prescribed in the Gospel, than that of fire; for, certainly, there seems no need that such torments should be resorted to, in imitation of papists." Grimly smiling, the translator of the Bible replied, that "burning alive was not a cruel death but mild enough." Upon this, the plodder for mercy could restrain himself no longer, and pushing back Rogers' hand which he held in his own, he exclaimed, full of indignation, "Well, perhaps it may so happen that you yourself will one day have your hands full of this mild burning." The words were spoken in the spring of 1550; and in the spring of 1555 John Rogers was led to the stake at Smithfield, the first victim of a new reign of fanaticism.

Persecution, "the deadly original sin of the reformed churches, and that which cools every honest man's zeal for their cause," as truly remarked by the author of the "Constitutional History of England," assumed somewhat formidable proportions towards the end of the short reign of Edward VI. As long as the Protector swayed the realm, the zealots of Protestantism were not allowed to go too far, his mind being greatly above the narrow sectarian notions of the age, and able to practise toleration on a large scale. Deeming freedom of conscience infinitely more valuable than the uniformity of doctrine for which the archbishop of Canterbury and his friends were striving, Somerset put his shield of toleration alike over all forms of dissent from the established church, protecting alike Lollards and Huguenots, Lutherans and Calvinists. To a congregation of French and Walloons, under the ministry of the learned reformer Valerandus Pollanus, who sent in a petition "that they might be permitted to form themselves into a church for the free exercise of religion, and to follow peaceably their calling of weaving," he granted Glastonbury Abbey as a settlement, providing houses and an allotment of pasture land for each family, and giving them money out of his own purse to buy wool. And German no less than Dutch and French heretics were indebted to Somerset for protection. He assigned the church of Austin Friars to a colony of Protestants from the land of Luther, who had gathered round a very remarkable man, Johannes à Lasco, a Polish noble, and under him formed themselves into the first foreign Protestant congregation established in the metropolis of England. Johannes à Lasco, nephew of the archbishop of Gnesen, primate of Poland, had abandoned family, fortune, and country, to follow the bent of his religious convictions, and after connecting himself in the ties of personal friendship with both Luther and Calvin, had become attached, finally, to the doctrines of the Swiss reformers, which he spread in East Friesland with the greatest success, and continued spreading subsequently in England. With the fall of the Protector, the patronage bestowed upon men of this stamp, who brought with them not only new and stirring ideas but many a valuable industry, entirely ceased, and while some of them were looked upon with jealous eyes, others had to endure even hatred and persecution. The unhappy longing after "uniformity," which, a leaven of old Romanism, distinguished those of the English Protestants who had succeeded in grasping the power of government, was directed mainly against the opponents of the doctrine of the Real Presence, as taught by the Church of England. A more preposterous dogma than that of transubstantiation, ushered into existence by the Church of Rome, was never known in the whole history of human superstition; yet as the Catholic priests had already murdered thousands for not strictly adhering to the insane tenet they had invented, so the Protestant teachers in their turn seemed inclined to tear each other to pieces for differing about an act of faith, expressly declared by the Son of God to be "in remembrance" of his love.

Setting aside the contrarieties of church government, the mode of administering the Eucharist was what substantially separated the world of Protestantism in the reign of Edward VI. All Protestants, without exception, rejected the Romish theory of transubstantiation, according to which the substances of the bread and wine taken at the Lord's Supper were changed, after being consecrated, by a sort of magic transformation, into the substances of Christ's body and blood, the "accidents," as the theologians of the ancient school called them, or chemical qualities of the bread and wine, being believed to become inherent in the flesh and blood. To this theory the church reformers strongly objected, on the very simple argument that the simultaneous existence of a substance in several places was inconceivable and contradictory in itself. Thus far, negatively, the Protestants agreed; but when they came to set up doctrines of their own, they diverged almost as widely from each other as from the Church of Rome. Luther to some extent admitted the metaphysical mystery involved in the priestly dogma of transubstantiation, and all that he did was to substitute one unintelligible theory for another. In the Confession of Augsburg, he laid down the doctrine of "consubstantiation," teaching that two substances were united in the sacramental elements, which might be termed, with equal propriety, either bread and wine, or body and blood. "Nostra sententia est," the great reformer said, dogmatically, "corpus ita cum pane, seu in pane esse, ut revera cum pane manducetur, et quemcunque motum vel actionem panis habet, eundem et corpus Christi." The Swiss reformers, while they agreed in the main with Luther's doctrines, absolutely refused to admit that of "consubstantiation," declaring their conviction that the Eucharist was no more than a commemoration of the death of Christ, and that the bread and wine were mere symbols to remember them of the earthly form of the Son of God, and the blood which he had shed for mankind on the cross. This opinion, unfortunately, excited as much indignation among the Lutherans as among the Roman Catholics, leading to a fierce war of words, and to a mutual hatred which all but shipwrecked the new faith. To reconcile the conflicting doctrines and restore peace among the reformers, Martin Bucer, a native of the Alsace, deeply learned in theology, and who, like Luther, after having been a monk had married a nun, got up a new theory about the Eucharist, the chief merit of which was its ambiguity, or elasticity. His explanation, conveyed in terms full of metaphysical airiness, was that the bread and wine were not affected by the priestly consecration, but that, if received by the communicant in entire faith, and under the spirit of the Redeemer, they might become the body and blood of Christ at the moment of being taken. Cranmer and his friends looked favourably upon this doctrine; and on the invitation of the archbishop, Bucor came to England in the spring of 1549, and was appointed professor of theology at Cambridge. He did not fill the office long, but died in February, 1551, after taking an active share in the course of the English reformation. Three years after his decease, his tomb was broken into by order of Queen Mary, and his bones disinterred and burnt. Rome could not let the opponents of transubstantiation rest, even in death.

The internal dissensions among the reformers served much to heighten the force of the popish persecution that set in at the accession of Mary. United, it would have been difficult even for such daring fanatics as Gardiner and Cardinal Pole to attack a party that had wielded supreme power for more than six years, and had modelled to its own liking the political as well as the ecclesiastical constitution of the kingdom. But the Protestants of England had as little coalesced, at the end of Edward's reign, as those of the Continent, and the consequence was that they fell before the close phalanx of Romanism like corn under the scythe of the mower. Edward's ministers had been rash in breaking down the barriers of ancient superstition; but Mary's advisers went to work with infinitely more rapidity in going in the opposite direction. It was not a mere reaction that took place, but a revolutionary storm which raged as if presided over by the spirit of evil, in the shape of a bigoted, half-mad woman. Anticipating even the legal authority which Tudor parliaments were at all times so willing to offer to their hereditary tyrants, Mary and her priests rushed upon their religious antagonists with tiger-like fury; and the new reign was not yet three months old before the Latin liturgy had been substituted for the English Prayer Book, the Romish prelates had been reinstalled, the Protestant bishops been thrown into prison, and more than one-half of the clergy been expelled from their livings. Such was the frenzy with which the priestly party went to work that in a single month following her accession, before parliament had met and any change had been made in the established laws, the queen presented to two hundred and fifty-six livings, restoring all those turned out under the acts of uniformity, and introducing Catholics. Parliament having assembled on the 24th of October, a single act, 1 Mary cap. 2, swept away the whole religious edifice that had been built up during the previous reign. Without referring to the dissolution of the monasteries and the alienation of the church lands, which had been completed by the Protector, the statute, grand in its simplicity, ordered that all the acts of Edward VI. respecting religion should be abolished, and that the public creed should be restored to the state in which it was in the last year of Henry VIII. Here the retrograde movement stopped for a few months, until the arrival of Reginald Pole, when a fresh parliament was called together to vote a series of statutes dictated by the cardinal. The new legislature, the vilest that ever disgraced the English nation, rapidly executed the orders of the papists, repealing all statutes, articles, and provisions made against the supremacy of the holy father and the see apostolic of Rome, since the twentieth year of Henry VIII., and reviving all the horrible laws against heresy and heretics made during the reigns of Richard II., Henry IV., and Henry V. Thus, while in the preceding year England had been brought back, as far as queen and parliament could do so, to the era antecedent to the reformation, it was now made to return to the epoch prior to the partial changes of Henry VIII., or to pure and unadulterated popery and Romanism. At the same time, the revival of the old Lollard legislation put a sharp rod in the hands of the queen, wherewith she might chastise her subjects for having dared to think for themselves. Mary lost no time to make use of her rod.

The horrors of the Marian persecution, in the course of which, short as it was cut by the death of the mad fanatic on the throne, nearly three hundred persons were burnt to death, were aggravated by the behaviour of the upper classes. Protestantism as yet, the same as the Christian religion in its infancy, had found its adherents chiefly among the middle and lower ranks of English society, and while these, the people so-called, were ready to give their lives for the truth, the "gentlemen" either looked on with calm indifference, or quietly submitted to the ruling powers, whatever they willed, with some preference however for Roman Catholicism, as the religion of authority. "The higher classes," says Hallam, taking a philosophical view of the time of the reformation, "partook far less than their inferiors in the religious zeal of the age, and Henry, Edward, Mary, Elizabeth, found almost an equal compliance with their varying schemes of faith. Yet the larger proportion of the nobility and gentry appear to have preferred the Catholic religion. Several peers opposed the bills for reformation under Edward; and others, who had gone along with the current, became active counsellors of Mary. Not a few persons of family emigrated in the latter reign; but, with the exception of the second earl of Bedford, who suffered a short imprisonment on account of religion, the Protestant martyrology contains no confessor of superior rank. The same accommodating spirit characterized, upon the whole, the clergy, and would have been far more general if a considerable number had not availed themselves of the permission to marry, granted under Edward, which led to their expulsion from their livings on his sister's coming to the throne." According to the Rev. John Strype, author of the "Annals of the Reformation," the number of Protestant martyrs burnt by Mary amounted to two hundred and eighty-eight; while John Speed enumerates two hundred and seventy-seven, classified as one archbishop, four bishops, twenty-one divines, eight yeomen, eighty-four artificers, a hundred husbandmen, labourers, and servants, twenty-six wives, twenty widows, nine unmarried women, two boys, and two infants. The archbishop and bishops sent to the stake were Cramer of Canterbury, Latimer of Worcester, Ridley of London, Hooper of Gloucester, and Farrar of St. David's, all of whom sprung from the middle and lower classes, their origin being well represented in the case of Latimer, who went to the stake, as related by

Fox, in "an old threadbare Bristol frieze gown, girded to his body with a ponny leather girdle, his Testament suspended from his girdle by a leather sling, and his spectacles without a case hung from his neck upon his breast." The contrast between such ill-dressed bishops and the purple-clad prelates of the Church of Rome had, probably, some effect in shaping the ecclesiastical course of "persons of family," in regard to the reformation.

More frightful even than the burnings were the horrible tortures, inflicted by the priestly demons who had made the realm of England their prey, upon the adherents of the new faith. "Some of them," says Strype, "were thrown into dungeons, noisome holes, dark, loathsome, and stinking corners; others were put in fetters and chains, and loaded with so many irons that they could scarcely stir. Some were tied in the stocks, with their heels upwards; some with their legs in the stocks, and their necks chained to the wall with gorgets of iron; some with both hands and legs in the stocks at once; some with both hands in, and both legs out; some with the right hand and the left leg, or the left hand and the right leg, fastened in the stocks with manacles and fetters, having neither stool nor stone to sit on to ease their woeful bodies. Some standing in Skevington's Givos,* most painful engines of iron, with their bodies doubled; some whipped and scourged, beaten with rods, and buffeted with fists; some having their hands burned with a handle, to try their patience, or force them to recant; some hunger-pined, and some miserably famished and starved." The fortitude of the martyrs of the new faith under these hellish tortures was perfectly marvellous, showing more than anything else, the strength which the reformed religion, young as it was, had already acquired over men's minds. They prayed for their enemies while their limbs were torn to pieces, and marched to death as to a bridal feast. When Rowland Taylor, one of the chaplains of Cranmer, was led from his prison to the stake, his wife and children met him on the road. As related by Fox, the martyrologist, "when the sheriff and his company came against St. Botolph church, Elizabeth his daughter cried, saying, 'Oh, my dear father! Mother, mother, here is my father led away.' Then cried his wife, 'Rowland, Rowland, where art thou?' for it was a very dark morning, that the one could not see the other; and he replied, 'Dear wife, I am here, and staid.' The sheriff's men would have led him forth, but the sheriff said, 'Stay a little, masters, I pray you, and let him speak to his wife;' and so they stayed. Then came she to him; and he took his daughter Mary in his arms, and he, and his wife, and Elizabeth, knelt down and said the Lord's Prayer: at which sight the sheriff wept apace, as did divers others of the company. After they had prayed, he rose up and kissed his wife, and shook her by the hand, and said, 'Farewell, my dear wife, be of good comfort, for I am quiet in my conscience. God shall stir up a father for my children.' And then he kissed his daughter Mary, and said, 'God bless thee, and make thee his servant;' and kissing Elizabeth, he said, 'God bless thee. I pray you all stand strong and steadfast unto Christ and his words, and keep you from idolatry.'"

Scenes like these did more than any sermons could have done to fortify the hearts of the people in the Protestant faith, and bring over to it thousands who were yet wavering between the old religion and the new. The crimes and barbarities of the Marian persecution bore seeds which their perpetrators never dreamt of, spreading throughout the nation a horror of popery which ages could not efface, and which by itself formed one of the safest bulwarks against further efforts and temptations of the cunning disciples of priestcraft to reawaken the sensual pomp and glory of the church of Rome again within the realm. More than this, the persecution went far to purify the aims and aspirations of the Protestants themselves. The old taint of Romanism, intolerance, was clinging too much to the early church reformers, who had acted in the reign of Edward as if striving to lay the basis of their faith on the same foundation as that of the Catholic priests, ignoring the demands of reason, and enforcing blind obedience in spiritual as in secular matters. And though the change from persecution to toleration, from the hellish feeling of hatred to the divine spirit of forgiveness, did not take place immediately, it gradually laid hold of the Protestant mind, rooted in the bitter but salutary lessons of the past. With the hideous spectacle of the doings of such men as Gardiner and the apostate Bonner, "whom all generations shall call bloody," as Fuller in his "Church History" says, before their eyes, some of the greatest and noblest among the reformers commenced preaching tolerance. Philip Melancthon, the friend of Luther, and founder, with him, of German Protestantism, was one of the first to stand forward as apostle of the new doctrine. He had shown but little moderation in early life, both towards Roman Catholics and dissenters from his own creed, advocating the harshest proceedings of the civil government even against the Swiss reformers; but he changed all these views under pressure of the grim facts of history unrolling before his eyes, and at the end of his career went expounding the divine precept of the Redeemer: "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another, as I have loved you, that ye also love one another; by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." The text needed preaching in Protestant no less than Catholic churches.

Elizabeth's reign was the first great visible fruit of the new spirit gradually descending upon Protestantism. Although brought up from her infancy in bitter hatred of Romanists and Romanism, and having no cause of affection for a party that, during the whole of her sister's reign, had conspired against her life, dragging her to the verge of the scaffold, she displayed an excessive moderation towards her powerful antagonists, distinctly intimating, at the very beginning of her career as a queen, that she meant to moderate religious persecution. To restrain the impetuosity of the most zealous of her Protestant subjects, who commenced pulling down crosses, destroying images, and insulting priests as soon as the death of Mary became known, she at once, a few days after her accession, issued a decree forbidding all innovations not sanctioned by law, and threatening the disturbers of the public peace with severe penalties. While showing in many ways that she intended to adhere firmly to the faith in which she had been educated, her personal attitude at the same time towards the Roman Catholics was as respectful as they could desire. Five weeks after her proclamation, on Christmas day, 1558, the queen, as recorded in a letter of Sir William Fitzwilliam, one of her courtiers, "repaired to her great closet with her nobles and ladies, as hath been accustomed in high feasts; and she passing a bishop preparing himself to mass, all in the old form, she tarried there until the gospel was done, and when all the people looked for her to have offered according to the old fashion, she with her nobles returned again from the closet and the mass unto her privy chamber, which was strange unto divers." Elizabeth had to relinquish her temporizing policy to some extent at the meeting of her first parliament, which took place on the 21st of January, 1559, and the conduct of which immediately proved that the nation was determined to advance in the path of the reformation. Almost the first act passed brought the public religion back to the state in which it had been at the death of Edward VI., the whole of the statutes voted during this reign being confirmed, and the opposing ones of Mary declared null and void. Another important law followed, called, "An Act restoring to the Crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical and spiritual, and abolishing all foreign power repugnant to the same," which re-established the royal supremacy, investing Elizabeth with nearly the same absolute powers in matters of religion as those possessed by Henry VIII., but substituting for his title of "Head of the Church," the somewhat strange sounding one of "Governor of the Church." The statute was opposed in the House of Lords on grounds which the speakers chose to call political, the earl of Montacute arguing that on a new breach with Rome it might happen that "the hazard would be as great as the scandal, should the pope thunder out his excommunication, and expose the nation by that means to the resentment of neighbouring enemies." The argument, forming a convenient cloak for deeper objects, took little effect, and the Act of Supremacy was voted by a large majority. Under it, all archbishops, bishops, judges, and other civil and ecclesiastical dignitaries were compelled to make a declaration upon oath that they would recognize none but the queen's authority, "as well in all spiritual and ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal," the penalties of non-obedience being fine and imprisonment for the first offence, the incurring a præmunire for the second, and death for the third, as in cases of high treason.

The Act of Supremacy was chiefly the work of Elizabeth's great minister, who immediately after her accession laid before her a plan of ecclesiastical policy, which came to be adhered to, in its general outline, till nearly to his death. Deeply imbued with the spirit of moderation, Cecil in this scheme aimed to give satisfaction to the Protestant interest without too much offending the adherents of the old religion; and although his advice was conceived rather too much in a worldly-wise temper, it seemed on the whole the best that could be tendered by the minister of a sovereign combining spiritual with political power, but necessarily compelled to let the latter predominate over the former. "The first thing she had to do," Cecil told the queen, in his memorial, "was to balance the dangers that threatened her both from abroad and at home. The pope would certainly excommunicate and depose her, and stir up all Christian princes against her. The king of France would lay hold of any opportunity to embroil the nation, and by the assistance of Scotland, and of the Irish, might perhaps raise trouble in her dominions. Those that were in power in Queen Mary's time and remained firm to the old superstition, would be discontented at the reformation of religion; the bishops and clergy would generally oppose it; and since there was a necessity of demanding subsidies, they would take occasion by the discontent the people would be in on that account, to inflame them; and those who would be dissatisfied at the retaining of some of the old ceremonies would, on the other hand, disparage the changes that should be made, and call the religion a cloaked papistry, and so alienate many of the most zealous from it." To regulate and satisfy all these fears and hopes, Cecil advised to establish a firm yet moderate rule, based on Protestant principles, at home, and to enter into close alliance with the church reformers abroad, especially with those in Scotland, France, and the Netherlands. "The courses and practices of Rome," Cecil continued, "were not much to be feared. As for those who had borne rule in Queen Mary's time, means were to be taken to lessen their credit throughout England; they were not to be too soon trusted or employed, upon pretence of turning, but those who were known to be well affected to religion and the queen's person were to be sought after and encouraged." "The bishops," Cecil held, "were generally hated by the nation: it would be easy to draw them within the statute of præmunire, and upon their falling into it, they and the clergy must be kept under it till they had renounced the pope, and consented to the alterations that should be made. Great care was to be had of the universities and other public schools, as Eton and Westminster, that the next generation might be betimes seasoned with the love and knowledge of religion." The kind of Protestantism thus dictated was one altogether new to England, differing entirely both from the Calvinistic church principles encouraged by the Protector, and the zealous and intolerant uniformity system pursued by Cranmer in the height of his power. A compromise as it was between two great principles, it necessarily satisfied neither the ardent Protestants, nor the more earnest among the Roman Catholics, but it had the great merit, nevertheless, of calming the excited feelings of the nation, of putting a stop to murder committed in the name of heaven, and of laying the foundation of a larger and broader church government than any that could have arisen amidst the hatred of sects and the fierce battle of religious persecution.

In strict pursuance of his policy of moderation,

Cecil had the Act of Supremacy, with which was connected "An Act for the uniformity of common prayer and divine service," restoring the liturgy of Edward VI., administered in the most tolerant manner. Though the penalties set upon refusal of the oath of supremacy were of the severest kind, he contented himself to use them as an intimidation, his main object being to get rid of untrustworthy servants, and put others in their stead. In this he succeeded completely, as far as the most troublesome of his enemies, the bishops, were concerned. Immediately after the breaking up of parliament, the oath was tendered to the great prelates appointed by Mary, and when they all, with one exception, that of Dr. Kitchen of Llandaff—lusty Benedictine monk of old, who had changed his creed already four times, and objected not to change it four times more to enjoy the loaves and fishes of Llandaff—replied by a refusal, their sees were declared vacant, and they were placed under confinement, in conformity with one of the provisions of the statute, and to keep them from doing mischief. Their places were filled chiefly by Protestant divines who had escaped the Marian persecution by becoming voluntary exiles, among them Matthew Parker, former chaplain to Anne Boleyn, who was made archbishop of Canterbury; Edward Grindall, a quiet and pious Lutheran, who had been preaching the reformation for some time at Strasburg, in the German tongue, and who was now appointed bishop of London, and subsequently filled the archiepiscopal sees of York and of Canterbury; Edwin Sandys, old member of the Cambridge school of reformers, who was nominated bishop of Worcester; and Thomas Bentham, one of the most learned and active members of the more advanced Protestant party, who was appointed to the see of Lichfield. On the completion of all the changes, the whole of the Catholic bishops, with the exception of three of the most violent among them, whose hands were deeply stained with Protestant blood, Bonner of London, Watson of Lincoln, and White of Winchester, were let out of prison, and told that they would be no further molested. Compromised as they were, more or less, in the horrible events of the preceding reign, they trusted so completely to the assurance given by Cecil, that they did not deem it necessary to leave the country, but quietly settled in England. Tunstall of York and Thirleby of Ely, two of the more moderate of Catholic prelates, were quartered at Lambeth Palace, and Archbishop Heath, who had held the Great Seal under Mary, retired to his private residence at Chobham, in Surrey, where he remained in studious tranquillity till his death. Thus the mighty change which gave back to England once more and for ever the principles of the reformation, was accomplished without violence and without the least amount of persecution. It was the greatest triumph yet celebrated by Protestantism.

In the summer of 1559, the queen appointed a general ecclesiastical visitation, to compel the observance of the "Act for the uniformity of common prayer and divine service." This statute, Cecil intended to make useful in clearing the lower ranks of the church hierarchy from Romanists, in the same manner as the Act of Supremacy had proved available for remodelling the episcopal bench. By the uniformity act, all clergymen refusing to use the Book of Common Prayer issued in the reign of King Edward, were ordered to be punished for the first offence with forfeiture of one year's income of their benefices and six months' imprisonment; for the second, with deprivation of their livings and twelve months' imprisonment; and for the third with deprivation and imprisonment for life. The act ordered likewise that all persons speaking against the Prayer Book, or causing any other forms than those prescribed by it to be used in any church, chapel, or other place of religious worship, should be subjected to the penalty of one hundred marks for the first offence, of four hundred marks for the second, and of forfeiture of goods and imprisonment for the third. Lenient as was the statute, contrasted with the legislation of the preceding reigns, it was made still more so in its application, as conducted by Cecil. The ecclesiastical commissioners acting under his instructions went on their round, less with the object of inflicting fines and imprisonment, than of seeing that no rabid zealots of the ancient religion should continue in ministerial office, and they therefore brought the statute in force only to get rid of these. As for the rest of the clergy, including the immense class of doubtful or wavering persons, they contented themselves to hold the sword of justice suspended over their heads, or, as Cecil had expressed it in his memorial, "to keep them under till they had renounced the pope, and consented to the alterations that should be made." The parochial priests showed themselves most anxious to fall in with the spirit of moderation that animated the government, quite against the expectation of Cecil, who had reckoned upon vast changes to be made among the lower clergy, as well as in the upper hierarchy, an immense number of the livings having been filled by Mary's advisers with real or presumed papists. But only eighty incumbents altogether resigned their benefices, or were deprived of them, and even this small number included changes forcibly made to reinstitute ministers who had been driven from their position in the previous reign, for no other reason than having lawful wives, instead of concubines. The extreme lenity thus shown towards a class professedly inimical to the established rule and to all religious progress, was loudly declaimed against by the leaders of the more advanced sections among the reformers, who looked upon the action of the government as a betrayal of the Protestant cause, sinful alike for encouraging popish superstition and idolatry and for retarding the spread of the principles of the new faith. The reproaches were not altogether unjustified, even although they sprang from a source embittered with the old leaven of uncharitableness and intolerance in all matters concerning the aspiration of man towards God.

During the first years of the reign of Elizabeth, the religious peace which Cecil sought to give the realm found few opponents among the Catholics, and if threatened by any dangers, they seemed to come rather from the side of the reformers themselves. It was in the nature of Protestantism, and, indeed, one of its great blessings, though men did not see it all at once, that it should give rise to a great and almost infinite diversity of opinions in minor matters of religion, human authority being overthrown by the triumph of reason over blind belief, and the study of God's holy word making priests of all true followers of Christ. Though condemned for a long time by the church reformers, quite as much as by the believers in an infallible pope—who as such had a logical ground to insist upon absolute unity—the right of schism, developed into sectarianism, made itself felt as a fact in the earliest ages of Protestantism, proclaimed alike by the followers of Wyckliff, of Huss, and of Jerome of Prague, as by the later disciples of Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, and Knox. There was schism in England from the time the Lollards began to read their Bible, though it was kept from showing itself by the strong pressure of persecution; but as soon as this was withdrawn from the new faith it became visible to all. At the beginning of the reformation under Edward VI. two great parties stood forth at once among the Protestants, the first, representing the more conservative tendencies of mankind, showing strong inclinations to retain as many as possible of the forms and outward symbols of the ancient church as were compatible with the principles they proclaimed, and the second, more bent towards radicalism, insisting on the necessity of entirely breaking with the church of the past, throwing away its forms together with its dogmas. Both sections of the Protestant faith found their counterparts on the continent of Europe, the conservatives in the followers of Luther, not deeply bent upon retrenching on the exterior ceremonies of the Church of Rome; and the radicals in the disciples of Calvin, who rejected the whole symbolism of the ancient religion, and from their desire to establish purer forms of religion and worship after a while came to be denominated "Puritans." The radical church reformers, or Puritans, greatly increased in England in the latter part of the reign of Edward, and their doctrines came prominently before the nation on the appointment of one of the most eminent of their leaders, John Hooper, to the bishopric of Gloucester, a promotion due to the patronage of the earl of Yarmouth, afterwards duke of Northumberland, and which was very unwelcome to Cranmer and his conservative friends. The consecration of Hooper was all but prevented by his refusal to wear the episcopal robes, particularly the rochet, the vestments in his opinion being too similar to those of the Romish church to allow him to appear in them. Nor would he consent to take the oath of supremacy with the addition "all saints" to the phrase "so help me God;" and his resistance was so staunch as not to give way before a lengthened incarceration, first in his own house and afterwards in the Fleet Prison. Finally, a compromise had to be effected, consisting in the words "all saints" being expunged from the oath, and the licence given to Hooper not to wear episcopal robes except on high occasions, as when preaching before the king. It was to a great extent a victory of Puritanism over the dogmas of the state church, or those of conservative Protestantism.

The exile of many of the leading men among the reformers during the reign of Mary, contributed in a singular manner to widen the breach between the two great sections of the Protestant faith. A considerable number sought and found a refuge in the two German cities of Strasburg and Frankfort on the Mayn, both inhabited by Lutherans as well as Calvinists, and hot beds of theological strife, in which the strangers from England were made to take part. In enlisting foreign sympathies, the Calvinists soon got the better of their opponents, by exhibiting a large amount of power of reasoning as well as of sympathy with their guests, to whom they frankly extended their hands, while the more narrow-minded, aristocratic, and inhospitable Lutherans kept aloof in proud self-satisfaction. At Strasburg, the strife did not rise beyond warm discussions; but at Frankfort it burst forth after a while in a sort of war between the two factions, the bone of contention being the form of liturgy used in the church assigned to the English, the conservatives, headed by Richard Cox—subsequently bishop of Ely—insisting upon retaining the Prayer Book of Edward VI., and their antagonists, under the leadership of John Knox, claiming the right of making alterations in the Calvinist sense. By the employment of other than theological weapons, Cox and his friends in the end succeeded in driving their Protestant brethren not only from the church of Frankfort, but from the city; and Knox, followed by most of those who had taken part with him in the struggle, had to retire to Geneva, where they formed themselves into a congregation under the personal care and superintendence of Calvin, whom the apostle of Scotland humbly called his father. The new service which the exiles established was distinguished by the absence of all ceremonial rites; there were no responses and no litany, everything being banished that could bring back recollections of the Church of Rome. To inform their friends at home of their proceedings, they also published an account of the same in English, under the title of "Directory of the Service, discipline, and form of Common Prayer and administration of sacraments in the church of Geneva." The book had not long been printed, when the death of Queen Mary dissolved the nightmare of popery that had taken England under its fangs, and the exiles turned their steps joyfully homeward, to be reinstalled in the places and dignities they had quitted. Geneva sent back a large number, all of them completely changed in their doctrinal views; and from Zurich and other parts of Switzerland, there came men who had left their country as conservative Protestants, and returned to it as eager reformers of reform. One of the latter, Thomas Bentham, was appointed by Elizabeth to the see of Worcester; but, on the whole, the queen and Cecil reserved their ecclesiastical favours for the more orthodox divines who had conquered at Frankfort, and who came to divide between them nearly all the mitres and crosiers which the Church of England had to give. Knox and his friends cared little; they were not the men to hanker after bishoprics, but, striding forth on the path they had entered, prepared themselves to become the fathers of English Puritanism.

To Cecil, the new reforming element in the church was not a little embarrassing. Personally, he felt much sympathy with the doctrines of the Puritans, but they sadly interfered with the system of compromise which he had set up as a guide in the government of the country; and the queen being not at all favourably inclined towards the Geneva innovators, who opposed her privileges, as well as the outward pomp and ceremonial of her worship which she valued greatly, he found himself under the necessity of opposing the aims of the Protestant sectarians. Under the acts of supremacy and uniformity, they were completely in his power, and open to persecution quite as much as the Roman Catholics; however, he did not deem it prudent to enforce the law all at once, but tried to convert rather than to punish. Acting in concert with Archbishop Parker, who, as one of the heads of the orthodox school of Protestantism, seemed inclined to proceed sharply against dissenters, a number of commissioners were despatched for the special purpose of interrogating the ministers known to be favourable to the Geneva doctrines, and to submit to them an agreement to conform to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England as laid down by the queen, under penalty of being proceeded against under the statutes. The result was not what Cecil expected, scarcely any of the clergy appealed to giving way either to threats or promises, but all declaring themselves determined to leave their cures and wander forth as beggars rather than recede an atom from what they held to be the truth. To take them by the word was little less than persecution; yet Archbishop Parker, with all the zeal of his new-born dignity, and quite forgetful of the sufferings he had himself undergone in the previous reign, hesitated not to enter upon the new career of intolerance. His orders were, "They must conform to the habits, or part with their preferments;" and the behest expelled some thousands of the best and ablest teachers and ministers of the reformation from their spheres of activity, leaving them in a state of destitution, and nearly one-fourth of the churches in the kingdom without regular clergy. "They travelled up and down the country," reported Bishop Jewel, "from church to church, preaching where they could get leave, as if they were apostles: as they were with regard to their poverty, for silver and gold they had none." Like all persecutions, this one, too, had effects the very opposite from those calculated upon. Puritanism, driven from a few isolated spots where it had a chance of lapsing into conformity, and scattered broadcast all over the land by sowers of unmatched skill, ardour, and enthusiasm, became, through the very means employed for its extinction by an orthodox archbishop, a power such as even Knox and Calvin could scarcely have dreamt in the loftiest of their dreams.

Elizabeth was fully cognizant, and entirely approved of the harsh measures employed against the Geneva reformers, her indignation against them being great, more on account of their disregard of forms and ceremonies, than of the deeper substance of their teachings, the all but revolutionary nature of which she had scarcely any means of understanding. Her mind, truly feminine in this respect at least, was always ready to overvalue the influence of the outward shapes and garments of things; so that when Archbishop Parker's commissioners sent in their report of the nakedness of Puritan worship, she was ready to condemn it at once as utter irreligion. The report, written just previous to the expulsion of the ministers, was curious in many respects. "Some of them," the paper ran, describing the doings of the new dissenters, "perform divine service and prayers in the chancel, others in the body of the church; some in a seat made in the church; some in a pulpit, with their faces to the people. Some keep precisely in the order of the book; some intermix psalms in metre; some say with a surplice, and others without one. The table stands in the body of the church in some places, and in others it stands in the chancel; in some places the table stands altarwise, distant from the wall a yard; in others in the middle of the chancel, north and south; in some places the table is joined, in others it stands upon tressels; in some the table has a carpet, in others none. Some administer the communion with surplice and cap, some with surplice alone, and others with none; some with chalice, others with a communion cup, and others with a common cup; some with unleavened bread, and some with leavened. Some receive kneeling, others standing, and others sitting; some baptize in a font, and some in a basin; some sign with the sign of the cross, and some sign not; some minister in a surplice, and others without; some with a square cap, some with a round cap, some with a button-cap, and some with a hat; some in scholars' clothes, and some in others." The wonderful variety of apparel, observances, and rites, striking as it must have been to the eye of the professors themselves, was the exact type of the Puritanism of the day. All was seething among the Geneva reformers; reason and sense alike in a state of fermentation, and dim faith groping its way earnestly and painfully across the wide ocean separating human understanding from heavenly wisdom. As yet there was no settled bond of union among them, and no great dogma which kept the individual mind from swaying to and fro on the storm-tossed sea of truth. As with all new-born creeds, the negatives of Puritanism were stronger than the positives; before erecting a church, the disciples of Knox and Calvin had to conquer their building ground, and, the Scriptures in hand, be Protestants against the Protestants.

The crusade which the orthodox reformers had opened against the radicals in the church was slackened somewhat at the end of a few years, owing to the necessity the former found themselves under to seek assistance in all quarters towards the common enemy of Rome. After remaining very quiet for a time, the Catholics in many parts of the realm boldly lifted their heads and began to demand concessions, encouraged both by the extreme forbearance shown to them by the government, and the internal dissensions among their antagonists. This was sufficient to create alarm; but what greatly added to it was the visible tendency of the queen to move in a Rome-ward direction. It was known that on more than one occasion Elizabeth had given utterance to clearly popish views regarding transubstantiation, going so far as to reprove a divine who had preached before her against the Real Presence; while at the same time she exhibited her love for what the reformers called idolatry by keeping images, and a crucifix with lighted tapers before it, in her private chapel, where also, it was whispered, she was offering up prayers to the Virgin.* Remonstrances, humbly tendered, were found to be useless, and instead of conforming to the wishes of her spiritual advisers, the queen turned against them on a subject more tender than any other, that of the celibacy of the clergy. The law respecting it was in the most confused state, for while an act passed in the first year of Edward VI. allowed the marriages of bishops, priests, and deacons, this had been repealed by another of the first of Mary; and although the whole of the statutes of Mary bearing upon religion had been abrogated at the accession of Elizabeth, it was a doubtful point whether this included the repeal of the act annulling celibacy. Many as were the doubts in the matter, they had not prevented the greater number of the Protestant clergy to take wives unto themselves; and all, therefore, from Archbishop Parker, who had entered the conjugal state in 1547, immediately after the accession of Edward VI., and had written and published a "Defence of the marriage of priests," during the Marian persecution, down to the humblest village curate, were full of anxiety to have this matter settled to their satisfaction. In this emergency, the aid of the Puritan element, which began to be strongly felt in parliament, was of the greatest importance, the dissenters showing themselves even more eager than the orthodox churchmen to destroy the hateful institution of priestly celibacy, one of the mightiest weapons of hierarchical power ever forged by Rome. The combined efforts of the Protestants of all parties resulted in a pressure which the queen could not resist, and she had to give her consent to an act sanctioning anew clerical marriages, with this proviso, however, that no priest or deacon should take a wife without the permission of the bishop of the diocese and of two justices of the peace, as well as the consent of the woman's parents, or nearest of kin. The approbation of Elizabeth to this law was almost extorted, and her rankling hatred, or envy, of clergy marriages, exhibited itself soon after on a visit to Archbishop Parker. After having been sumptuously entertained by the primate and his consort at Lambeth Palace, the maiden queen took leave of Mrs. Parker by uttering a gross insult. "Madam,"* Elizabeth exclaimed, "I may not call you; mistress† I am loth to call you: but, however, I thank you for your good cheer." John Harrington, poet of note, remarked upon her majesty's good taste: "Cæteris paribus, and sometimes imparibus too, she always prefers the single man to the married."

The death of Archbishop Parker, in 1575, gave a new turn to the ecclesiastical policy of Elizabeth's government. He had been the stern opponent of the Puritans, ready to proceed to any amount of rigour to uphold the boundaries of the state church and the forms of religion as established by law, and but few of the members of the privy council sharing his views, his decease became a matter of importance, and still more the appointment of his successor. The choice, through Cecil's influence, fell upon Edward Grindall, archbishop of York, a prelate of very moderate views, and who in his previous treatment of the Geneva reformers had drawn upon himself the reproach of favouring their opinions. His nomination to the primacy, therefore, was looked upon as a sort of victory of Puritan doctrines, which, having prospered before by persecution, now spread under the sunshine of toleration and encouragement from above. The first effect was seen in the revival of a practice introduced into England by the radical church reformers, which was called "prophesying." It consisted in the meeting of ministers, at appointed times, for the purpose of discussing Scripture texts; the assemblies being open to the public, and under the presidency of a so-called moderator, who finished by summing-up the main points of the debate, with his own conclusions of it. Not only the Puritans, but all the ministers not belonging to the ultra orthodox section of the state church, were in favour of these meetings, which, it was said, greatly tended to edify the people, very little acquainted as yet with their religion, and at the same time served to supply deficiencies of learning and theological study among the pastors themselves. This, however, was not the opinion of Archbishop Parker, nor of Queen Elizabeth, both holding, not without some justice, that the chief result of these public discussions would be to "unsettle religion," in so far as religion was synonymous with the dogmas of the established episcopal church and the statutes of supremacy and uniformity. By special command of Elizabeth, and entirely in accordance with his own feelings, Archbishop Parker suppressed the "prophesyings;" but at his decease the practice at once sprang into life again, it being known that the new primate was rather in favour of it than otherwise. Grindall justified this opinion by making a representation to the queen on the subject, stating that it would be for the benefit of the church that the meetings should be again permitted to take place, and that should any disorderly debates occur, it would be easy to get rid of them by special rules and proper supervision. But Elizabeth would not listen to the arguments of the archbishop, and rigidly commanded him to suppress the "prophesyings," the same as his predecessor. Grindall refused, in a letter full of manly boldness, whereupon he was suspended from the exercise of his archiepiscopal functions, and by an order of the Star Chamber confined to his house. The "prophesyings" were brought to an end soon after, in consequence of circular letters of the queen directed to the bishops; but though conquered in this field, the Puritans nevertheless felt that they had gained another victory.

Hitherto the Geneva reformers, though driven from their livings and persecuted in many ways, had remained nominally within the pale of the episcopal church; but the most active among them now began to think that all chance of reconciliation had gone by, and that they were strong enough to stand by themselves, and to separate from the established form of worship. At a meeting held in London, the resolution was come to "that it was their duty, in the present circumstances, to separate from the public churches, and to assemble in private houses, or elsewhere, to worship God according to their conscience;" and they thereupon established a "presbytery" at Wandsworth, a small village close to the capital, inhabited partly by Walloon and Huguenot refugees, who carried on the art of weaving. It was the first embodiment of Puritan thought, laid down, according to a report of Bishop Sandys, Grindall's successor in the sees of London and York, in five principal tenets. They were, first, "The civil magistrate has no authority in ecclesiastical matters: he is only a member of the church, the government of which ought to be committed to the clergy;" secondly, "The church of Christ admits of no other government than that by presbyteries; namely, by the ministers, elders, and deacons;" thirdly, "Each parish must have its own presbytery;" fourthly, "The choice of ministers belongs of necessity to the people;" and, fifthly, "The names and authority of archbishops, archdeacons, deans, chancellors, commissaries, and other titles and dignities of the like kind, should be altogether removed from the church of Christ." The congregation at Wandsworth included among its founders several men of note, chief in the list Walter Travers, a divine of the Cambridge school of reformers, who had been chaplain of the English colony at Antwerp, and subsequently, on his return to England, to Cecil, whose interest procured him the appointment of afternoon lecturer at the Temple, where he had for colleague Richard Hooker, author of "Ecclesiastical Polity," and zealous defender of state church doctrines. "The forenoon sermon spake Canterbury, the afternoon Geneva," it was said of the two; but Travers was far the better speaker, and his eloquence carried everything before it. In a short while, presbyteries came to grow up in many parts of the kingdom, which alarmed the government to the extent as to put in motion for the first time the High Court of Commission, brought into existence by parliamentary enactment soon after the accession of Elizabeth. The statute empowered the queen and her successors to authorize, by letters patent under the great seal, whenever they thought fit, and for as long a period as they pleased, a commission of persons, lay or clerical, to exercise full jurisdiction in spiritual matters, and to "order, visit, reform, and redress all heresies, errors, schisms, abuses, contempts, offences, and enormities whatsoever." One of the first acts of the commission was the violent suppression of the Presbyterian congregation at Wandsworth, and the meetings in the provinces gradually shared the same fate.

The severities, once more, had the effect of not only not answering the object, but of leading to the opposite result. The tenets of Walter Travers and his friends were comparatively moderate, and it was left to persecution to develop a new form of Puritanism, the adherents of which were first distinguished as the Brownists—verging, two generations later, into the Independents. Robert Browne, a clergyman of good family, nearly related to the lord treasurer, was founder of the new sect, the dogmas of which were far in advance of those of the Geneva reformers. The Brownists taught "that every particular church, with its pastor, stands immediately under Christ, the Archpastor, without any other ecclesiastical power intervening, whether it be of prelates, of synods, or any other invented by man." They thus differed from the first Puritans not only in rejecting episcopacy, but likewise synodical sway, and the whole exterior organisation of Calvinism, which connected all the members of the great "Church of Christ" in one bond of union. This bond, the Brownists argued, too much resembled that of the episcopal church, and even of popery, to be acceptable to the true disciples of the Redeemer, who could put trust alone in the Scriptures; and they, therefore, laid down the following propositions as their code of faith. "That a particular form of church government is prescribed in the Word of God; that no other form ought to be allowed; that the Church of God ought to be governed by elders, but that this government does not exist; that the neglect to promote this government is one chief cause of the present ignorance, idolatry, and disobedience; that there ought to be an equality among ministers, which the popish hierarchy and all who belong to it do not like." Francis Johnson, an eminent Brownist, openly maintained these tenets in a sermon delivered at St. Mary's Church, Cambridge; in consequence of which he was expelled from the university and thrown into prison. The persecution, discouraged by Cecil, but forced on by the queen, now became more violent, dissent being looked upon by Elizabeth as sedition. In 1580 an act had been passed "to retain the queen's subjects in their due obedience," which punished absence from the parish church by a fine of twenty pounds a month, and imprisonment till paid; if absent a whole year, the delinquent was condemned to pay a double fine, and was liable, besides, to be put in gaol for an indefinite term. The weight of this statute fell heavily upon the Brownists, who absolutely refused conformity; and many of them died in prison, while others, honest citizens before, were turned into vagrants and malefactors. Among those imprisoned by the High Court of Commission were two Suffolk clergymen, Copping and Thacker, who, after remaining in gaol for seven years, were hung at Bury St. Edmunds, with the publications of Robert Browne tied round their necks. Queen Elizabeth could have hit upon no better means for spreading the tenets of the Brownists.

In 1583 an event occurred which brought the persecutions against the dissenters from the state church to its height. Archbishop Grindall, after having been suspended from his functions for a lengthened period, died in this year, and Elizabeth appointed as successor of the mild and kindly-disposed primate, who had not been at all to her taste, a man of the opposite character, John Whitgift, bishop of Worcester. Whitgift, the son of a merchant in Great Grimsby, Lincolnshire, had attached himself at a very early age to the principles of the reformation, and done much to advance the cause of Protestantism at Cambridge, where he signalled himself as teacher and preacher, filling, during a residence of fifteen years, all the highest posts of the university. In 1568 he became Margaret professor of divinity, and four years after master of Trinity, regius professor of divinity, and chaplain to Queen Elizabeth. Up to this time Whitgift had shown himself more or less favourable to Puritanism; but now the opposite tendency broke forth in a remarkable dispute and theological controversy with Thomas Cartwright, his successor in the Margaret professorship of divinity, which made the greatest stir all over England. Cartwright, a native of Hertfordshire, and one of the acknowledged leaders of the Puritans, delivered, in 1569, a course of lectures from his professorial chair, in which the order and constitution of the established religion were openly assailed, the ground taken being that the Scriptures contained the exact model after which the government of the church ought to be framed, and that this model was complete without bishops and archbishop. He, therefore, insisted on the formation, in England, of a Presbyterian church, towards which object, he advised, "every one ought to labour in his calling, the magistrate by his authority, the minister by the word, and all by their prayers." Against these doctrines—the exposition of which by a divine of Cartwright's gifts and fame became extremely popular, his lectures attracting great crowds of students—Whitgift stood forward, answering week by week from the university pulpit what had been said in the Margaret divinity chair. His replies, in substance, were that "Christ has left the mode of church government to be regulated from time to time by the church itself;" that "no absolute forms are prescribed, and no minute injunctions laid down in the Scriptures;" and that "providing that everything be done for edification, and nothing contrary to the express command of God, the church has liberty to form her own institutions." The controversy was carried on for several years, with increasing bitterness on both sides, both in lectures and books, Cartwright and his friends coming forward with an "Admonition to parliament for the reformation of Church discipline," and Whitgift replying in a publication called "Answers to a certain libel called an Admonition." The "Admonition" was presented to the House of Commons by two of the founders of the Wandsworth Presbyterian congregation, Field and Wilcox, whereupon the queen, perceiving that the Puritans were getting the best of the controversy, hurled a right royal argument at their heads. Field and Wilcox, with a number of other dissenters from the state church, were thrown into prison, and their "Admonition" burnt by the common hangman; while at the same time Cartwright was degraded from the professor's chair and expelled the university, and Whitgift made vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and, soon after, bishop of Worcester. In this position he distinguished himself by the most violent anti-Puritan zeal; so that when in 1583 the queen lifted him to the primacy of England, the radicals in the church knew that they must prepare for another reign of persecution.

The persecution was not long in coming. In a few months after the appointment of the new archbishop he gave an earnest of the rigour with which he meant to rule the church, by promulgating a series of articles "for the observance of discipline." One of these, specially directed against the secret meetings of the new Presbyterian congregations, prohibited all preaching, reading, or catechising in private houses, whereto any not of the same family should resort, "seeing the same was never permitted as lawful under any Christian magistrate." By another, still more important, the primate ordered the assent, by subscription, of all the clergy to three points, the queen's supremacy, the lawfulness of the common prayer and ordination service, and the truth of the whole thirty-nine articles containing the confession of the church of England. To put his injunctions in force Whitgift reorganized the High Court of Commission, making it to consist of forty-four members, including twelve bishops, and investing them with increased power. They were directed to inquire after and to punish, "under the oaths of twelve good and lawful men," all offences against church and state, notably "all heretical opinions, seditious books, contempts, conspiracies, false rumours or talks, and slanderous words and sayings." Not content with opening this wide net, which might hold any number of delinquents, the archbishop added a mode of procedure, wholly founded on the canon law, consisting in a system of interrogations, so comprehensive as to embrace the whole scope of clerical uniformity, and at the same time so precise and minute as to leave no room for evasion. Thus prepared, the commissioners went forth, examining, suspending, and imprisoning ministers, till at last the very magnitude of their operations stopped their course, many parts of the kingdom having become clergyless, and a vast number of churches being shut up for want of persons to conduct the service. In only six of the eastern counties, two hundred and thirty-three ministers were suspended, of whom thirty-eight in Essex, sixty in Suffolk, and sixty-four in Norfolk. The effect was the more lamentable as the men thus expelled formed the more learned and diligent part of the clergy, the great body of the order belonging still to the old monkish school, distinguished only for ignorance. To fill up the vacancies, common mechanics were appointed to many of the livings, notwithstanding which there remained such a want of ministers that, according to contemporary testimony, "in some places there was no preaching, nor so much as reading a homily, for many months together; and in sundry parishes it was hard to find persons to baptize or bury the dead." It was in vain that Cecil lifted his voice to reinstall at least a portion of Puritan clergy in their old positions, where, as he explained to the queen in a supplication, "though they are over-squeamish and nice in their opinions, and more scrupulous than they need, yet with their careful catechising and diligent preaching they bring forth that fruit which your most excellent majesty is to desire and wish, namely, the lessening and diminishing the papistical numbers." The lord treasurer here was slightly, though perhaps wilfully, in error. Shrewd as was Elizabeth, and extremely jealous of her royal prerogative, she could not but be less afraid of the "papistical numbers" than of "over-squeamish and nice" people of the opposite creed, who, she dimly and instinctively felt, while casting their spears at mitres were aiming at crowns in the background.

The extreme severity with which the queen proceeded against Protestant dissenters led to a momentary coalition between them and the Roman Catholics. On the whole, the Catholics were not so ill treated, on account merely of their religious belief, as the nonconformists of the reformation; however, their leaders were highly obnoxious to the government as adherents of a foreign power, and as long as Elizabeth was under fear of being attacked by the pope and his lieutenant, King Philip, all priests and Jesuits were mercilessly hunted after, and led to the gallows whenever they could be caught. It was a political more than a religious persecution; but it nevertheless brought on a sort of outward alliance between some of the most zealous men of both parties; and while homeless Puritan ministers, preaching the word of God and seeking alms from door to door, often found shelter and hospitality in the houses of faithful adherents of the old religion, banished priests, chased like wild beasts by the spies of the government, went trudging all over the land disguised as Brownist and Presbyterian preachers. This did not remain long undiscovered, and the result was to increase the queen's anger and suspicion against both Puritans and papists, leaving her less and less inclined to toleration and forbearance. Harshness against the Protestant nonconformists having nearly reached its limits in the courses adopted by Archbishop Whitgift, the weight of Elizabeth's wrath began to fall upon the Roman Catholics, and in consequence several new statutes were passed to keep them in bridle. In 1585 an act was passed "against Jesuits, seminary priests, and such other like disobedient persons," which made it felony to harbour priests, and treason to communicate with papal agents; and two years later parliament had to vote another law, restraining "popish recusants" to particular places of residence, while all subjects of the queen were forbidden to harbour any of whose conformity they were not well assured. Finally, in 1593, by a statute known as the 35 Elizabeth, cap. 2, all persons above sixteen years of age, being convicted "popish recusants," were prohibited to leave their usual dwelling-place and to go beyond five miles of it without written licence from the bishop of the diocese, under penalty of imprisonment and of forfeiture of all their goods. This was the last act against Roman Catholics passed under Elizabeth. The total number of adherents of the old religion who suffered during her reign amounted, after the calculation of a Catholic historian, to two hundred and four, of which number fifteen were executed for denying the queen's supremacy, one hundred and twenty-six for exercising their ministry, and the rest for becoming reconciled to their church after having abandoned it. Many of them had to undergo torture before being killed, including hideous "bowellings" at the foot of the scaffold, for which Lord Bacon, in a tract written in 1592, politely apologised, arguing that those horrors were "less cruel than the wheel, or forcipation, or even simple burning."

The latter years of the reign of Elizabeth were distinguished by an ever increasing severity against the Protestant dissenters. While the cruelties exercised against the Romanists were chiefly, if not entirely, due to political reasons, the persecution of the Puritan nonconformists assumed no other but religious aspects, and thus laid the germs of a hatred which it took generations to extinguish. Although the House of Commons was possessed of a strong Puritanic element, which likewise exhibited itself in the privy council and among the chief advisers of the crown, Elizabeth, too well assisted by her fanatic prime minister, set out not many years before her death upon a new crusade against the nonconformists, more fierce than any that had yet taken place. It was caused to some degree by the immense increase of dissent in all parts of England, upon which the queen looked with the greatest alarm, the more so as the new forms of schism that were constantly springing into life threatened to go farther and farther away from the established religion. Among those which more immediately attracted the attention of Elizabeth, as well as of Archbishop Whitgift, were a body of sectarians called the Barrowists, after their leader, Henry Barrowe, a member of Gray's Inn and graduate of Cambridge. He was of honourable descent, "a gentleman of good house," according to the testimony of his friend, Lord Bacon, and for some time frequented the court of Elizabeth, distinguishing himself by his gaiety and the elegance of his manners. Suddenly, however, a change came over him, he taking, as described by Bacon, "a leap the strangeness of which made him very much spoken of," the man of the world turning into one of "prociensness in the highest degree." Frequenting the secret Puritan assemblies, Barrowe soon became a leader of the most advanced section, and being hunted after as such by the archbishop's agents, was thrown into prison, and after lengthened sufferings and repeated examinations before the High Commission court, in which it was vainly sought to shake his faith, was put upon his trial at the Old Bailey, together with a Puritan minister named Greenwood. The charge against him was that of writing and publishing certain books and pamphlets tending to the slander of the queen's government; but the only one of his writings given in as evidence against him was a work entitled "A brief dissertation on the False Church," which, though containing an exposition of Puritan doctrines, exhibited not the slightest tendency to political disaffection, and therefore could in no way establish the accusation. However, it had been resolved beforehand that Barrowe, as well as Greenwood, should be made examples of, in the hope that their death, should they persist refusing to recant their obnoxious tenets, might do something towards arresting the progress of separatism. Accordingly, no attention was paid to his defence, while his courage, ability, and manifest innocence of the charge brought against him, only tended to exasperate the servile judges, who without hesitation condemned him to death. On the 6th of May, 1593, Barrowe and Greenwood were drawn on hurdles to Tyburn, and there hung on the gallows, in the presence of an immense multitude, who silently execrated a government calling itself Protestant and yet shedding Protestant blood on mere doctrinal grounds. Elizabeth herself before her death seemed to repent of her severity, for asking on an occasion one of her chaplains what he thought of Barrowe and Greenwood, and he replying, after some hesitation, that "he was persuaded, if they had lived, they would have been two as worthy instruments for the church of God as had been raised up in the age," she fell into a deep gloom—"she sighed and said no more."

"The church of England," says a philosophical writer, remarkably free from religious as well as political bias, Henry Hallam, "was not left by Elizabeth in circumstances that demanded applause for the policy of her rulers. After forty years of constantly aggravated molestation of the nonconforming clergy, their numbers were become greater, their popularity more deeply rooted, their enmity to the established order more reconciled. It was doubtless a problem of no slight difficulty, by what means so obstinate and opinionated a class of sectaries could have been managed; nor are we, perhaps, at this distance of time, altogether competent to decide upon the fittest course of policy in that respect. But it is manifest that the obstinacy of bold and sincere men is not to be quelled by any punishments that do not exterminate them, and that they were not likely to entertain a less conceit of their own reason when they found no arguments so much relied on to refute it as that of force. . . . The best apology that can be made for Elizabeth's tenaciousness of those ceremonies which produced the fatal contention may be suggested, though without much express authority, from the records of that age, in the justice and expediency of winning over the Catholics to conformity, by retaining as much as possible of their accustomed rites. But in the latter part of the queen's reign this policy had lost a great deal of its application; or rather, the same principle of policy would have dictated numerous concessions, in order to satisfy the people. It appears by no means unlikely that, by reforming the abuses and corruption of the spiritual courts, by abandoning a part of their jurisdiction, so heterogeneous, and so unduly obtained, by abrogating obnoxious and at best frivolous ceremonies, by restraining pluralities of benefices, by ceasing to discountenance the most diligent ministers, and by more temper and disinterestedness in their own behaviour, the bishops would have palliated, to an infinite degree, that dissatisfaction with the established scheme of polity, which its want of resemblance to that of other Protestant churches must more or less have produced." Elizabeth's calm and wise minister, Sir Francis Walsingham, gave her advice which she might well have obeyed, in telling her that "consciences are not to be forced, but to be won and reduced by force of truth, with the aid of time, and the use of all good means of instruction and persuasion."

CHAPTER IV.

History of Literature, Science, and Art, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of Elizabeth.

Two great events contributed and acted together to make the Tudor period the golden age of English literature—the invention of printing, and the Reformation. Ten years before the accession of Henry VII. William Caxton established his printing office in the almonry of Westminster Abbey, but its products did not become well known till some time after, and it was, to a great extent, the royal patronage which spread them over England. The first of the Tudor monarchs made good use of Caxton's office by having important documents, such as the Papal Bull which confirmed his right to the crown, printed in the form of broad-sheets and widely distributed among the people. Personally, too, the king was an eager student, "reading," says Bacon, "most books that were of any worth," and getting never tired to add to his store of information." Besides his majesty, William Caxton had a great and zealous patron in Margaret Tudor, the mother of the king. She herself was an authoress, fond of writing and translating books of devotion—some of which were printed after her death—and her private influence with the king, as well as the high esteem in which she was held by the nation, enabled her to contribute not a little to the progress of the new art, as well as to the advancement of general education. So high, in fact, was the opinion, even of the learned, of the character of the king's mother, that in a dispute concerning the jurisdiction of the town and university of Cambridge, she was chosen arbitrator, and the conflict having been finally settled, it was agreed "that any doubt or ambiguity in these articles shall be interpreted by Lady Margaret, countess of Richmond, or by such persons as she may appoint." Lady Margaret also endowed colleges and professorships, both at Oxford and Cambridge, and her fostering care had no slight effect in spreading knowledge wider and wider among all ranks and classes.

Nevertheless, though the advance both of rudimentary education and of the higher branches of learning was very considerable, there was a great dearth of writers in the age of Henry VII. As Mr. James Gairdner, diligent searcher in the ancient records, well remarks, "In no period of the English annals are the sources of history so scanty. Since the days of Chaucer English literature had declined, and become a perfect blank. There was not a poet even of Lydgate's standing. There was hardly an original prose writer whose name survives at this day. The monkish chronicles, generally, cease long before the close of the fifteenth century, and there is nothing to supply their place for some time after." "It is true," continues Mr. Gairdner, "there were countervailing influences from abroad. The study of ancient learning was beginning to revive. Italy had sent forth eminent scholars; and classical literature was admired and imitated. The movement spread from south to north, giving a new vitality to thought in every country where it was received; but it was late in reaching England. At the commencement of the Tudor period the only writers of note were two foreigners, who wrote in Latin; and it is from their works, and not from the works of Englishmen, that we derive our principal knowledge of the history of the time." The two foreigners here alluded to were Polydore Vergilius, a native of Urbino, in Italy, who came to England to collect the famous papal impost known as Peter's Pence, and who wrote a 'Historia Anglica,' and Bernard André, a French monk, whom Henry VII. appointed for his poet laureate and historiographer. The curious career of the latter forms in itself an epitome of the literary history of the reign.

Bernard André, born at Toulouse, and originally a friar of the order of St. Augustine, came into England with Henry, having probably made the acquaintance, either of the king or the king's mother, abroad. Though blind, André followed in the courtly train at Henry's triumphal entry into London, and soon after was appointed poet laureate. Then, as in recent times, the laureateship was a post of honour more than of emoluments; nevertheless, Bernard André, not entirely ignorant of the art of converting soft verses into hard cash, made the business pay. His total blindness did not prevent him from becoming master of St. Leonard's Hospital, Bedford, and subsequently incumbent of the rich living of Higham, the proceeds of which, together with his laureate stipend of ten marks per annum, lifted him far above his former state of barefooted friar. Literature, moreover, was honoured in him by the constant bestowal of gifts, honours, and dignities on the part of the king. In 1496, Bernard André was made tutor to Arthur, prince of Wales, then about ten years of age, and henceforth he seems to have taken up his residence at court, paying no other attention to his clerical offices than taking the pecuniary produce. From time to time he presented, as in duty bound, highly laudatory poems to the king, receiving in return presents of money, most frequently a hundred shillings—a very liberal gift in those days, and which, probably, even now, would not be despised by adulators possessing the gift of verse. In the entries of these payments, still existing at the Record Office, Henry's laureate is always called "Master Bernard, the blind poet."

Master Bernard was generally looked upon by his contemporaries as the greatest English author of the age, notwithstanding that he did not write a line in English, composing all his poetry and prose either in French or Latin. The most important of his works were, besides a great number of poems, a 'Vita Henrici VII.,' and 'Annales Henrice VII.,' both, as may be expected, overflowing with praise for a most magnanimous and most liberal king. In the title of his 'Life of Henry,' Master Bernard calls himself the royal historiographer, leaving it to be supposed that he obtained this title, with his other honours, from the king. Being blind, the author must have dictated his composition to an amanuensis; but it is probable that the MSS. still existing, as unique specimens, in the Cottonian Library, were the identical copies presented to King Henry. "They are each written," says Mr. Gairdner, "in a different hand, but in very clear distinct writing, with few decorations of any kind. The Life has two coloured initials, one at the commencement of the dedication, and the other at the commencement of the preface, and spaces are left in other places for similar embellishments." It is a curious proof of the want of education at this period, even among those who professed to be learned, that the spelling in all the manuscripts left by Henry's historiographer and poet laureate is extremely bad. Though the fair presumption must be that Bernard André, in works to be laid before his royal master, employed the best scribes to be had at the time, yet it seems that even these were deficient in their knowledge of the very rudiments of composition.

Of the character of the poetical literature, the following is a good specimen, being a translation of a small portion of a somewhat ambitious work, attributed to Bernard André, and called, 'Les douze triomphes de Henry VII.,' the deeds of the king being compared to the twelve labours of Hercules. It is the author's plan, as explained in the prefatorial verses:—

"To rehearse the wonderful exploits
Of King Henry VII. of England,
The triumphs that he has achieved in his day
Against Envy, the worst in the world,
Which, as may be seen in his case,
Pursues him with mortal warfare;
Yet still, as we ought to believe,
Nothing can injure those whom God means to help.

"Of his virtue and illustrious dignity,
According to my poor ability,
I will speak, that it may be known
How victoriously he reigns.
Treacherous Envy is always raging
To destroy him by her venomous fate,
But in the end he resists in such wise
That he will confound the envious traitors.

"To describe by any comparison
His noble actions and his proud elevation,
I must by some means find
Those who in their time have had similar griefs.
I have seen in the history of the Greeks
How Juno entertained envy of Hercules,
And I know no subject which is nearer
To that of King Henry: God grant him long life!

"Twelve triumphs did Hercules achieve
During his time, as the story recounts them to us.
He was brave and valiant in his exploits.
To accomplish any meritorious work.
But, truly, I think that King Henry
Has a greater victory than Hercules:
For his feats are better worthy of memory
Against Envy! and I will prove it."

The eight of the "twelve triumphs," in which Henry's bout of arms and of diplomacy with the king of Scotland is compared with the Greek hero's feat of bringing into Peloponnesus the wild bull which laid to waste the island of Crete, is very curious. The poet laureate sings:—

"In this eighth exploit Hercules fought
The great bull by a great struggle.
By his efforts and good conduct he did so much
That he overthrew and subdued him.
This work was of great merit,
And in it he acquired great glory,
Hence it was recorded by the Greeks,
And will be held in eternal remembrance.

"This noble king, what has he done?
Has he not struggled with this bull?
He has indeed, and the fact shows him to us
A valiant man full of frankness.
The king of Scotland by his skill
He has subdued, and all his party.
By his good sense he has so arranged
That he does his will with him in part.

Mr. Gairdner, to whom the above translation is due, remarks, in respect to the original, that "it would be curious if we could ascertain whether this poem was held in any estimation beyond the limits of the court. At the date of its composition it was not altogether superfluous or extravagant to state that the pacification of the country had demanded a series of Herculean labours. The poem may be regarded as an appeal to the lords and people of England not to undo the good work that had been effected, but to aid the king in its completion. Hence it is very probable it was transcribed and circulated elsewhere than at court."

The distinguishing feature of the literature, as well as the educational system, was a stiff kind of scholastic pedantry. As the poet laureate knew nothing more fitting for the praise of his lord than to compare him to Hercules—most inappropriate simile for a diplomatic king abhorring physical force—so had the schoolmasters of the time an all but slavish adherence to Greek and Latin models. Bernard André records with intense satisfaction, that his pupil, Prince Arthur, had read Homer, Thucydides, Lucan, Ovid, Virgil, Cicero, Quintilian, Cæsar, and Tacitus. It does not appear he ever read Chaucer; indeed, it seems highly improbable, since Master André, although calling himself English historiographer, knew no English. For some time to come French remained the fashionable language of the court and upper classes, as Latin that of the learned bodies, and notwithstanding the glorious development of the national language in Chaucer and others, there seemed to be no fructifying soil for English literature. Even Caxton, whose literary tastes must have been of the highest order, and who could not fail seeing the importance of original English works for the support of his great art, employed all his leisure time to make translations from the French, which he afterwards printed. His final labour was the translation of the 'Lives of the Fathers,' which, as stated in an edition published by Wynkin de Worde in 1495, he finished "at the last day of his life."

But notwithstanding the want of original writers, the English language continued its internal course of development, gradually assuming its modern form. Its actual structure in the reign of Henry VII. is seen in the following extract from a proclamation issued by the king's privy council, giving directions for the reception of Princess Catherine of Spain, affianced bride of young Prince Arthur, who arrived in England in the latter part of 1501. After ordering the mode of her reception at "Excestre," and other places on the road from Exmouth to London, the proclamation continues:—

"Item, the Monday next ensuyng, which shalbe viij. day of November, the said princesse shall disloge from Chertsey, and drawe towards Croydon, and ther in tharchebisshops place loge the next night ensuyng, and the Towseday next day following.

And the same officers and som of the servauntes of my lord stieward to be by him commaunded to see that this ordenaunce be duly kept and observed. And that noon of the said lordes, ner noon othre persone attending upon the said princesse take their loginges at their owne handes, or be their owne herbergers, but alwaies resorts unto the kinges herbergers, to take their loginges by their assignement.

"Item, after her departing fro Croydon, she shalbe conveyed to my lord of Rochestre is place besides Lamhithe, and ther loge that nyght, and hir ladyes; tharchebisshop, the bisshop, therle, and the remenaunt of her compaignye to loge in the towne of Lamhythe. "Item, that a palfrey with a pylion richely arrayed, and led in hand, be then at the said place for the said princesse, and doo folowe next unto the said hensmen."

Art, the same as literature, made much progress in the reign of Henry VII.; but the impulse here also came from abroad. England had been too long a battle-field, to produce, even with all the encouragement of a peace loving sovereign, anything but the crudest talent in the more refined pursuits of life. Thus, all the painters, sculptors, and architects of any note who flourished at the time were foreigners. The king employed a great number, chiefly in the erection of the stately pile of Sheen, or Richmond, built after the destruction of the old royal residence at the same place in 1498. Richmond Palace was one of the earliest as well as noblest edifices in which the so-called Tudor style of architecture came to exhibit its distinct character. It was a most magnificent residence, built chiefly of stone, with a hall a hundred feet long and forty feet wide, and immense open corridors, with galleries above. The most striking internal feature of Richmond Palace was the crowd of turrets surmounting the building, as well as the lofty oriel windows, both a marked characteristic of the Tudor style. There were an immense number of windows in this great royal residence, showing that Henry was certainly fond of light in the physical sense. The King's illustrious historian did not share this fondness. "You shall sometimes," says Lord Bacon, speaking of the Tudor architecture, "have fair houses so full of glass that one cannot tell where to come out of the sun or the cold." On Richmond

REMAINS OF RICHMOND PALACE.

Palace, and on an architectural work of higher taste, the mausoleum known as the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey, the king expended very large sums. The chief artist engaged in the erection of this chapel was Pietro Torregiano, a Florentine sculptor, who, however, had under him a good many English assistants. It appears that Torregiano, who received 1000*l.* for his share of the work, was sent by the king to Italy to engage some of his countrymen, but not succeeding, had to content himself with English hands and brains. A few of these English art students subsequently rose to fame; among them John Hales, sculptor of the fine tomb of Thomas Stanley, earl of Derby, at Ormskirk.

The royal patronage of art, though naturally exerting great influence upon the spread of a more refined public taste, did yet little for the domestic architecture of the age of Henry VII. The Spaniards who came over with Philip II. reported of the English working classes, that "though they fared commonly so well as the king, they had their houses made of sticks and dirt." With the exception of the wealthy monasteries, the first of all to introduce foreign refinements, and the mansions of some few of the nobility, dwelling houses were still for the most part built of timber, without chimneys, and mostly without glass windows. Even in many of the houses of the wealthy, the owner "made his fire against a rore-dosse, in the hall where he dined and dressed his meat." Glass, though in general use in Italy, France, and Germany, was still extremely scarce in the England of Henry VII., the ordinary substitute being horn, lattice work, or oiled linen. A few great noblemen, who enjoyed the luxury of glass windows, valued them so highly, that whenever they left their residence they had them carefully packed up and stowed away, to be used again at their return. But there was a great difference in this respect between London and the provinces; the wealthy citizens of the capital having made far greater progress in all the arts of civilized life than those of any other part of England. "Although this city," reports a Venetian who visited London in 1496, "has no buildings in the Italian style, but of timber or brick like the French, the Londoners live comfortably, and it appears to me that there are not fewer inhabitants than at Florence or Rome. It abounds with every article of luxury, as well as with the necessaries of life; but the most remarkable thing in London is the wonderful quantity of wrought silver. . . . In one single street, named the Strand, leading to St. Paul's, there are fifty-two goldsmiths' shops, so rich and full of silver vessels, great and small, that in all the shops in Milan, Rome, Venice, and Florence put together, I do not think there would be found so many of the magnificence that are to be seen in London. These great riches of London," continues the Venetian, "are not occasioned by its inhabitants being noblemen or gentlemen—cavalieri à baroni habitanti—being all, on the contrary, people of low degree—tutti popolari—who have congregated there from all parts of the island, and from Flanders, and from every other place." The Italian traveller committed a mistake in saying that the London goldsmiths lived in a street "named the Strand, leading to St. Paul's;" the street, leading indeed to St. Paul's, but from another direction, was Cheapside, often styled "Goldsmiths' row."

The reign of Henry VIII. showed an immense progress in science and arts, and still more in literature. The current of new ideas, born by the reformation, that came flowing in from the Continent, made itself felt in all directions, stirring up not only the religious sense of the people, but arousing the nation to a noble thirst after mental progress and general enlightenment. It was satisfied to a high degree by some of the greatest teachers and writers of the age, either born in England, or attracted hither from foreign countries by the fame of its ancient schools of learning and the liberality of individuals. Foremost among the latter was Erasmus of Rotterdam, "the glory of the priesthood and the shame." The great scholar had been in England in the last years of the reign of Henry VII., but only for a short time, and it was by invitation of Henry VIII., conveyed in a flattering Latin epistle, that he returned for a lengthened sojourn. Appointed professor of Greek and Margaret lecturer of divinity at the university of Cambridge, he came to exercise a great influence over English thought; and although he left the country at the end of five years—praising its men and women to the skies, but execrating its malt liquor and bad wine—his sway scarcely diminished from a distance, his publications hastening on not a little the labours of the reformation. "Erasmus laid the egg, and Luther hatched it," was a favourite saying of the early Protestants. He published the first edition of the Greek New Testament, unsealing the book of books to thousands, and doing immense service to spiritual freedom at an age when the authority of the Vulgate, or the Latin version of the Bible, was paramount. For a considerable time during his stay in England, Erasmus was an inmate of Sir Thomas More's house, composing there his "Morias Encomium," or Praise of Folly, a wonderful satire in which the weaknesses and irrationalities of men of all ranks and all conditions were severely chastised. The friendship of the philosopher of Rotterdam with More brought the greatest foreign and the greatest English scholar of the age in direct connection. The brightest luminary of the reign of Henry VIII., More, enriched English literature by two distinct forms of composition, the first good historical work in the vernacular, and the first political romance or allegory. His "History of King Richard III." has been pronounced by an eminent critic, "the earliest example of good English language, pure and perspicuous, well-chosen, without vulgarism or pedantry;" while in his celebrated "Utopia," the best known of all his publications, he produced a form of scholarly prose fiction, for which there had been no precedent, either in England or in other countries, since the revival of literature. It was the first book written by an English author that had a large circulation on the continent of Europe.

In the romance of "Utopia," More gives a philosophical exposition of his ideal views respecting the political and social forms of society as they ought to be, or might be, discussing successively the questions of government, constitution, public economy, education, marriage, and similar topics relating thereto. The basis of the story is a description of the imaginary island of Utopia, given in conversation by one Raphael Hythoday, a seafaring man, "well stricken in age, with a black, sunburnt face, and a long beard," to whom More is supposed to be introduced in the city of Antwerp by his friend Peter Ægidius, or Peter Giles. The original Latin edition of the "Utopia" first appeared in 1516, when the author was thirty-six years of age, and the English translation, made by Ralph Robinson, a clergyman, was published in 1551. More's "History of King Richard III." was written while he was living in retirement, soon after his marriage with his first wife, daughter of Mr. Colt, a gentleman of Essex. The following is a specimen of this work, which arrived at a high degree of popularity. It is the first part of a chapter headed "The Description of Richard the Thirde."

"Richard the third sonne, of whom we now entreate, was in witte and courage egall with either of them, in bodye and prowesse farre vnder them bothe, little of stature, ill fetured of limmes, croke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlye, in other menno otherwise, he was malicious, wrathfull, oniuious, and from bfore his birth, euer frowarde. It is for trouthe reported, that the duches his mother had so much a doe in her trauille, that shee coulede not bee deliuered of hym vncutte: and that hee came into the worlde with the fete forwarde, as menne bee borne outwarde, and (as the fame runneth) also not vntoed, wthther menne of hatred reporte aboute the trouthe, or elles that nature chaunged her course in hys beginnynge, whiche in the course of his lyfe many thynges vnaturallie committed. None euill captaine was hee in the warre, as to whiche his disposicion was more metely then for peace. Sundrye victories hadde hee, and sometime ouerthrowes, but neuer in defaulte as for his owne persone, either of hardinesse or polytyke order, free was hee called of dyspence, and somwhat aboute hys power liberal, with large giftes hee got him vntedfaste frendshippe, for whiche hee was faine to pil and spoyle in other places, and got him stedfast hatred. Hee was close and secrete, a deepe dissimuler, lowlye of counteynaunce, arrogant of heart, outwardly compynable where he inwardly hated, not letting to kisse whome hee thoughte to kyl: dispitions and cruell, not for euill will alway, but after for ambicion, and either for the suretie or encrease of his estate. Frende and foe was muche what indifferent, where his aduantage grew, he spared no mans deathe, whose life withstode his purpose. He slewe with his owne handes king Henry the sixt, being prisoner in the Tower, as menne constantly saye, and that without commaundement or knowlege of the king, whiche woulde vndoubtedly yf he had entended that thinge, haue appointed that boocherly office, to some other then his owne borne brother."

Most of the other writings of Sir Thomas More were of a controversial character, displaying immense zeal in defence of the orthodox tenets held by the author, and forming a striking contrast with the sentiments expressed in the "Utopia," advocating complete religious toleration. More also wrote a great amount of poetry, particularly in the latter years of his life, when chained to a coarse and ill-tempered wife, who did not even sympathise with him when in prison, awaiting the axe of Henry VIII. It was in expectation of death that he wrote the following sweet poem, which he entitled "Thomas More to them that trust in Fortune."

"Thou that are powde of honour, shape or kynne,
That hepest vp this wretched worldes treasure,
Thy fingers shryned with gold, thy tawny skynne,
With fresh apparyle garnished out of measure,
And weneest to haue fortune at thy pleasure,
Cast vp thyne eye, and loke how slipper chaunce,
Illudeth her men with chaunce and varyaunce.

Sometyme she loketh as lovely, fayre, and bright,
As goodly Venuis mother of Cupyde,
She becketteth and she smileth on euery wight,
But this chere fayned, may not long abide.
There cometh a cloude, and furwell all our pryde,
Like any serpent she beginneth to swell,
And looketh as fierce as any fury of hell.

Yet for all that we brotle men are fayne
(So wretched is our nature and so bynde),
As soone as Fortune list to laugh agayne,
With fayre countenance and disceifull mynde,
To crouche and knele and gape after the wynde,
Not one or twayne but thousandes in a rout,
Lyke swarmyng bees come flickeryng her aboute.

Then as a buyte she bryngeth forth her ware,
Siluer, golde, riche perle, and precious stone:
On whiche the massed people gaze and stare,
And gape therefore, as dogges doe for the bone.
Fortune at them laugheth, and in her trone
Amyd her treasure and waueryng rychesse, Prowdly she houeth as lady and emperesse.

Fast by her syde doth wery labour stand,
Pale fere also, and sorrow all bewept,
Disdayn and hatred on that other hand,
Eke restles watche fro slepe with trauayle kept,
His eyes drowy and lokyng as he slept,
Before her standeth daunger and enny,
Flattery, dysceyt, mischiefe and tyranny.

About her commeth all the world to beggo,
He asketh lande, and he to pas would bryng
This toye and that, and all not worth an egge:
He would in lone prosper aboute all thyng:
He kneloth downe and would be made a kyng:
He forceth not so he may money haue,
Though all the worlde accompt hym for a knaue.

Lo thus ye see diuers heddes, diuers wittes,
Fortune alone as diuers as they all,
Vnstable here and there among them flittes:
And at auenture downe her giftes fall,
Catch who so may she throweth great and small
Not to all men, as commeth sonne or dewe,
But for the most part, all among a fewe.

And yet her brotell giftes long may not last,
He that she gaue them, loketh proude and hys,
She whirleth about and plucketh away as fast,
And geueth them to an other by and by.

And thus from man to man continually,
She vseth to geue and take, and silly tosse,
One man to wyanyng of an others losse.

And when she robbeth one, down goth his pryde.
He wepeth and wayleth and curseth her full sore.
But he that receueth it, on that other syde,
Is glad, and bleeth her often tymes therefore.
But in a whyle when she loueth him no more,
She glydeth from hym, and her giftes to,
And he her curseth, as other fooles do.

Alas the folysh people can not cease,
Ne voyd her trayne, tyll they the harme do fele.
About her alway, beasely they preace.
But lord how he doth thynk hym self full wele
That may set once his hande vpon her whele.
He holdeth fast: but vpwrd as he fleeth,
She whippeth hor whele about, and there he lyeth.

Thus fell Julius from his mighty power.
Thus fell Darius the worthy kyng of Perse.
Thus fell Alexander the great conquerour.
Thus many mo than I may well reherse.
Thus double fortune, when she lyst reuerse
Her slipper fauour fro them that in her trust,
She fleeth her wey and leyeth them in the dust."

All the other authors of the reign of Henry VIII. are far below Sir Thomas More in beauty of style as well as in depth of erudition. Among the prose writers the most remarkable was More's friend, Sir Thomas Elyot, whose best known work is a political treatise called "The Governour," but who published, besides, "The Castle of Health," "On the Education of Children," "The Banquet of Science," "A Defence or Apology for Good Women," and a Latin-English dictionary, called "Bibliothecæ Eliotæ," which served as a mine to dictionary compilers for more than a century. Of the poets of the reign, John Skelton fills the second place, after More, though his diction attained to no great elegance, and his wit, for which he was chiefly distinguished, is generally very coarse. Skelton was originally a priest, but the bishop of Norwich having suspended him from his functions as rector of Diss, Norfolk, nominally for his dissolute life, but in reality for his bent to satire, which showed no respect for episcopal mitres, he went to London, and by some means got an introduction to court, where he succeeded in gaining the favour of the dread king. Getting to admire the punning of the loose rector, whose satirical verses, published in broad-sheets, formed the amusement of courtly ladies and gentlemen, Henry made him poet laureate, and bestowed upon him occasional favours when in particular good humour. This had the effect of making Skelton somewhat too bold, and he dared to attack Cardinal Wolsey, who at once ordered the laureate to be apprehended, from which fate he escaped by taking refuge in the sanctuary of Westminster. Here the abbot, John Islife, who took amusement in his satire, afforded him shelter till his death, which occurred in 1529. One of the most famous and popular of Skelton's pieces, spread about the country for more than a hundred years after, and still of some local fame, was a song in honour of one Elynour Rummin, a dealer in ale, or so-called "ale-wife," settled at Leatherhead, in Surrey. The not fair Elynour kept the "Running Horse"—modern Leatherhead has come to possess two Running Horses, both "antique and original"—which, according to the legend, was often visited by King Henry and his courtiers, including the laureate, who got drunk at the royal expense. A short extract from this piece, containing the first section, or, as headed in the broad-sheets, the "primus passus," will give an idea of Skelton's poetry, as well as of the manners and customs of the people in whose company the "Defender of the Faith" spent his leisure time. The picture of the "Running Horse"—within a short ride of Nonsuch Park, where Henry built himself a hunting retreat, much frequented afterwards by Queen Elizabeth—is complete in all respects.

"And this comely dame,
I understand her name
Is Elynour Rummin,
At home in her wouning,
And as men say.
She dwelt in Sothray,
In a certain steod,
By aide Lederhede.
Shes is a tonnish gib,
The deuill and she be sib.
But to make up my tale,
Shes brueth nappy ale,
And make thereof pot-sale,
To trauellers and tinkers,
To sweaters and swinkers,
And all good ale drinkers,
That will nothing spare,
But drinke till they stare,
And bring themselves bare,
With now away the mare,
And let vs aley care,
As wiso as an hare,
Come who so will,
To Elynour on the hill,
With fill the cup, fill,
And sit thereby still,
Early and late;
Thithir comes Kate,
Cisly, and Sare,
With their legs bare,
And also their feete, Hardly unsweat;
With their heeles dagged,
Their kirtles all to jagged,
Their smockes all to ragged;

With titters and tatters,
Bring dishes and platters,
With all their might running,
To Elynour Rummin,
To haue of her tunning.
She giues them of the same,
And thus begius the game;
Some wenches unbracod,
And some all unlaod,
With their naked paps,
Their flaps and flaps,
It wigs and it wags,
Like tawny saffron bags;
A sort of foule drabs,
All scurvie with scabs,
Some be fyre-bitten,
Some skew d like a kyttien.
Some, with a shoe-clout, Binde their heads about;
Some haue no haire-lace,
Their lockes about their face,
Their tresses untruat,
All full of unlust;
Some looke strawry,
Some cawry mawry;
Some vntyde tegges,
Like rotten egges;
Such a lewd sort,
To Elynour resort,
From tide to tide,
Abide, abide,
And to you shall be told How her ale is sold
To mawte and to mold."

The remaining authors of note of Henry VIII.'s reign were the unfortunate earl of Surrey, murdered like Sir Thomas More, who paraphrased the first five chapters of Ecclesiastes and a few of the Psalms, and translated the second and fourth books of the Æneid—the first specimen in the English language of blank heroic verse—with a number of amatory poems and elegies, after the Italian; and Sir Thomas Wyatt, friend of Cromwell, who published a great number of ballads, sonnets, and satires, which rank with those of the earl of Surrey as the first fruits of modern English poetry. These productions, however, as yet met with but few readers; and the chief occupation of the printing press consisted in aiding the spread of classical learning and literature. One of the most remarkable features in connection with it was the improvement of the universities, and the foundation of many new colleges, to accommodate the increasing numbers of students and of teachers. In the university of Oxford, Brasenose College was founded in 1511 by Sir Richard Sutton and Dr. William Smyth, bishop of Lincoln, the former endowing it with the manor of Borowe and other estates in Leicestershire; Corpus Christi College was established six years after by Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester;

the able diplomatist in the service of Henry VII. and Henry VIII., who also founded the free schools of Taunton and Grantham; and a third college, first denominated Cardinal College, but subsequently changed into Christ Church, was established in 1525. At Cambridge, two new colleges, Christ's and St. John's, were founded by the accomplished mother of Henry VII., Margaret Tudor, in 1505 and 1508; to which was added, in 1519, Magdalen, or, as first called, Maudlin College, endowed by the unfortunate duke of Buckingham, and finished after his execution by Lord Chancellor Audley. Henry VIII. himself established Trinity College in 1536, endowing likewise four new professorships at Cambridge, of theology, of law, of Hebrew, and of Greek. The latter language was little known in England before the reign of Henry VIII., and was not publicly taught till the year 1510, when William Lilly, a painstaking scholar, who had spent some years in the east, set up a private grammar school in London, where he expounded Greek to his pupils. He gathered numerous eager students around him, among others Dr. John Colet, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, who had previously studied Greek at Oxford through the medium of Latin translations, and who, to show his fondness for the teacher and for learning in general, founded, in 1512, a classical seminary in St. Paul's Churchyard, to which he appointed Lilly the head master, and which obtained the name of St. Paul's School. Lilly filled the office till his death, in 1523, publishing some poems and treatises, and a famous grammar, entitled "Brevissima Institutio, seu ratio grammatice cognoscendi," which passed through numerous editions—painfully known to this day to the little men who imbibe classical lore in the old establishment in the churchyard as "Lilly's Grammar."

The education of youth, in the reign of Henry VIII., and for a long time after, was extremely pedantic. While the great body of the people were as yet in the most profound ignorance, removed as far as the cattle in the fields from any knowledge of books or letters, the children of the upper classes were stuffed to repletion with dead languages, theology, astrology, mythology, and other wisdom of the heavy kind. A curious illustration of the manner of training in use at the period has been preserved in some letters addressed to Cromwell, by the tutor of his little son, a boy named Gregory. Having risen suddenly to the pinnacle of power, the great reformer, who annihilated monasticism and drove darkness from England without knowing Greek or Latin, deemed it incumbent on him to give his son and heir what was understood to be a polite education, and after engaging a great number of teachers had, it appears, regular reports furnished to him, to see how his little Gregory was getting on. Poor Gregory, according to the reports, spent his sunny days of youth in this way:—"First," says the learned head tutor, "after he hath heard mass, he taketh a lecture of a dialogue of Erasmus colloquium, called 'Pietas Puerilis,' wherein is described a very picture of one that should be virtuously brought up; and, for cause it is so necessary to him, I do not only cause him to read it over, but also to practise the precepts of the same; and I have also translated it into English, so that we may confer therein both together, whereof, as learned men affirm, cometh no small perfect." After this, young Gregory got a dose of French, "wherein Maistre Vallance, after a wondrously compendious, facile, prompt, and ready way, not without painful diligence and laborious industry, doth instruct him;" and, some short space intervening for being fed, or whipped, as the case might be, "after that he exerciseth his hand in writing one or two hours, and readeth upon Fabian's Chronicles as long." The Chronicles done, the little man had "the lute and the virginal," with other "pastimes of instruments" put into his hands, to scrape or blow melodious sounds; and following this, on fine days, his learned head tutor took him for a ride. "When he rideth," reports the guardian of Gregory, with evident pride, arriving at the keystone of the wonderful system by which he forced as with an hydraulic pump the wisdom of ages into his little pupil's head, "when he rideth, as he doth very oft, I tell him by the way some history of the Romans or the Greeks, which I cause him to rehearse again in a tale." What became of the hard-worked pupil is not known. Probably the Romans and Greeks, Fabian's Chronicles, Maistre Vallance, and Erasmus' "Pietas Puerilis" killed poor Gregory Cromwell long before Henry VIII. laid his father's head on the block.

In art and science the reign of the second Tudor king showed not much progress, although, like most despots, he squandered vast sums upon objects pleasing to his taste, or likely to lead both to his praise and his personal gratification. To two of the greatest Italian painters, Raffaele and Titian, Henry made, soon after his accession, munificent offers to come to England, but which were not sufficient to tempt them to leave their own country, where they had enough of honours and fame; and several minor Italian artists whom he tried to attract in the latter part of his reign excused themselves on the same ground as the Piedmontese princess who was asked to share his throne—that of having "but one neck." However, he got a real genius, risking his neck in order to make money, in the German Hans Holbein, who, chiefly through the efforts of Sir Thomas More, aided by those of Erasmus of Rotterdam, was induced to settle in England, and to foster art by his example. Hans Holbein was a very remarkable man, great alike as painter, architect, modeller, and engraver, and ready at any time at the behest of his patrons to paint their portraits, make designs of jewellery, draw plans of mansions and of gardens, and model patterns of all kinds, from a statue down to a button. But with all his talents and genius, Holbein was but poorly remunerated by the professedly art-loving king, who, while giving immense sums to his flatterers and court-fools, and throwing the accumulated wealth of ages from the plundered monasteries into the lap of a few fawning nobles, could not afford to pay more than thirty pounds a year to the great painter who shed lustre over his reign. The only remarkable artists, besides Holbein, who flourished during the period, were Luca Penni, a pupil of Raffaele, and younger brother of the more celebrated Gian Francesco Penni, who came to England in 1537, engaging in painting and engraving, and Girolamo da Trevigi, a sort of universal genius, of astounding versatility, busy alike as painter, architect, engineer, and inventor of mechanical appliances. Though vastly inferior as an artist to Holbein, Henry VIII. valued the services of the latter higher, paying him a salary of one hundred pounds a year, but exacting in return a larger amount of work, and of very dangerous work too. When setting out upon the last heroic exploit of his life, in the summer of 1544, Henry ordered that Girolamo should help him to conquer France, as military engineer; and the poor Italian, who really could do nothing well but portrait painting, had to embark on board the magnificent ship with sails of cloth of gold which carried the fat majesty of England from Dover to Calais. Having been taken to the siege of Boulogne, the painter did his best to show his mechanical talents by attending to the great ordnance; but the French guns were quicker than his own, and a cannon ball suddenly finished his military career at the end of August, a fortnight before the gouty king had been lifted on his war-horse, and "like a noble and valiant conqueror gone into Bulleyn." Hans Holbein was carried off by the London plague in the same year that Girolamo was killed, and Luca Panni had left England some time before; so that the trio of distinguished foreigners that chiefly represented art under Henry VIII. vanished from the country before his death. Native artists of eminence England as yet had none.

In architecture, there was no visible progress during the reign of Henry VIII., but rather a retrograde movement. Much as he prided himself on his title of "Supreme Head upon earth of the Church of England," the king did not erect a single ecclesiastical edifice of any importance, nor even rebuild any that were falling into ruins, his apathy in this respect going so far as to interfere even with the continuation of works already commenced at his accession, such as the noble abbey of Bath, the labours of which came to an end for want of funds, and were not resumed till the reign of Elizabeth. Henry nevertheless built a great deal, but his taste was of the worst, everything being sacrificed to show and ornament, and impressed with the stamp of vulgarity. Cardinal Wolsey, who aimed to be a great patron of art and architecture, stood but little above the master he served, all his works having more or less of the character of the wooden castles and the silken trees with damask leaves, tailored regardless of expense, which his genius created on the Field of Cloth of Gold. Of all the buildings erected by the king and cardinal, the palaces of Nonsuch and of Hampton Court were most admired at the time, and both were anything but works reflecting credit upon their taste. Nonsuch, which was used by Henry as a hunting retreat, was altogether paltry and tinselly in character, overloaded with gilding and plaster ornaments, but with not a single feature of grandeur or beauty about it, its walls being built up chiefly of mean bricks, and in part only of timber. The wonders of Nonsuch, which left courtiers breathless for admiration, consisted not only in the terrific number of plaster casts stuck against the front of the edifice, but in the gardens behind, containing, as described by a learned traveller, "fountains that spout water one round the other like a pyramid, upon which are perched small birds that stream water out of their bills, with Actæon turned into a stag as he was sprinkled by the goddess and her nymphs, all with inscriptions." Hampton Court Palace, the architectural masterpiece of Wolsey, and costliest edifice erected in the reign of Henry VIII., differed from Nonsuch chiefly in being made up of less plaster and timber, but a far mightier mass of bricks. Immense sums were lavished upon the furnishing of this residence by the cardinal. "Every chamber," according to Cavendish, faithful servant of Wolsey, "had a basin and ewer of silver, a great livery-pot of silver, and some gilt: yea, and some chambers had two livery-pots with wine and beere, and a silver candlestick." The greater part of this plate, which evidently cost more money and was held more important than the edifice in which it was deposited, was richly chased, the workmanship of foreign artists whom Henry kept in his pay. At the head of these men stood Pietro Torrigiano, a native of Florence, who had wrought the metal work of the tomb of Henry VII. at Westminster Abbey, and was held in the highest esteem by the king, but whose ungovernable temper brought him in constant conflict with his fellow-workers. After many fights with "the English brutes," as he was pleased to call the natives chiselling under his orders, Torrigiano at last ran away, without completing his commissions, and went to Spain, where he fell into the hands of the Inquisition, being suspected of having imbibed heretical opinions. After repeated examinations, finding that his condemnation was certain, he refused to take food, and died of voluntary starvation, having found means before his end to shatter into fragments his masterpiece, a beautiful statue of the Virgin with the child in her arms, the design of which he had made in England by order of Cardinal Wolsey.

Towards the end of his reign, Henry discharged most of the foreign artificers he had kept in his pay, as if getting tired of playing any longer the part of art patron, so little congenial to his nature. He even relinquished the scheme of erecting his own magnificent tomb in Westminster Abbey, containing life-size effigies of himself and of Jane Seymour, surrounded by saints and angels, a large portion of which work had been actually executed. Broken up at his death, the saints and angels subsequently met with the low fate of being melted down and sold as old metal. The king also, at some time of his life, had made an attempt to form a picture gallery, but it never came to anything; and an inventory taken in the year of his death, enumerating one hundred and fifty-three paintings as belonging to him, showed his indifference to art so far as not to contain even the names of the painters. Probably he himself was unable to distinguish between a Raffaele and a Flemish picture, and all he cared for was the subject delineated, which in many instances was coarse enough, exhibiting once more his innate brutality of character. "If it be allowed," says Horace Walpole, passing in review the inventory of the pictures left by the king, all nameless, and distinguished only as "tables" and "stained cloths," or paintings on panel and on canvas, as if the raw material of construction was the most important part about them, "if it be allowed that the mind and taste of Henry VIII. were demonstrated by the subjects upon which he employed the painters whom he patronized, and to whom he dictated them, an opinion exactly corresponding with his character will be the result. We find in his collection numerous portraits of himself; repetitions of those of contemporary princes, particularly of the Emperor and of Francis I.; of his predecessors; two of the duchess of Milan, who refused to marry him—but not one of his six wives. The historical and Scriptural subjects were, the violation and death of Lucretia; the decollation of St. John the Baptist, with his head in a charger; a similar exhibition of Judith and Holofernes; St. George, his patron saint; the Virgin and Child, with the dead Christ; sundry Flemish 'moralities,' in which Death is personified; and 'drolls' of the imbecility of old men, with caricatures of the pope." One of the latter delectable works of art was set down in the inventory as "a table of the Bussopp of Rome, the four Evangelists casting stones at him."

The two reigns of Edward VI. and Mary were too full of religious excitement to produce much either in art or literature. The Protector, however, was a genuine patron of art; and the noble palace he erected for himself on the banks of the Thames, between the city and Westminster, differed as much from the timber and plaster splendours of Henry VIII. as his own character from that of the vulgar despot, his predecessor in power. "Somerset House," built after the designs and under the superintendence of Giovanni of Padova, an architect of remarkable genius, but of whose career little is known, was the first edifice in the Italian style erected in England, and its chaste and simple grandeur, springing into the eyes of even the most uneducated in art, was not without influence in leading the taste of the age away from the ornamental trumperies of the Nonsuch mode of architecture. A mixture of the Italian and the older English, or Gothic style, was the immediate result, gradually developing itself into that happy combination of southern and northern taste known as the later Tudor, or, more correctly, the Elizabethan style of architecture. It was essentially the creation of native artists, who now began to arise, but did not become conspicuous till after the reign of Mary and the closing of the period of religious fanaticism. The change, constituting altogether an immense progress, affected the inside as well as the outer form of buildings, which began to be more conveniently arranged and more agreeably furnished, showing a gradually spreading taste among the middle as well as the upper classes. An inventory of the furniture of the hall of Robert Goodchild, parish clerk of Newcastle-on-Tyne, taken in 1557, fourth year of the reign of Mary, exhibits a very substantial amount of fittings and household goods. Robert Goodchild had an "almery," or large cupboard, valued at ten shillings; a counter "of the myddell hynde," six shillings; a "cowborde," or small cupboard, three shillings and four pence; five basins and six lavers, eight shillings; seventeen "powder doblers," or pewter pots, seventeen shillings; six pewter dishes and a hand basin, five shillings; six pewter saucers, eighteen pence; four pottle pots, five shillings and fourpence; three pint pots and three pots, three shillings; ten candlesticks, six shillings; a little mortar with pestle, two shillings; three old chairs, eighteen pence; and six old cushions, estimated at two shillings. Books are not mentioned among the belongings of the Newcastle parish clerk, but other documents of the period refer to them now and then, showing that they were finding their way gradually among the masses. Printing was getting a flourishing art, and the members of the profession formed themselves into a guild, as the Stationers' Company, and obtained a charter in the reign of Mary, electing for their warden John Day, a native of Dulwich, Suffolk, who kept a great number of workmen employed at his establishment near Holborn Conduit, and had several shops in other parts of London for the sale of his books. All the printers of the time had their own emblem; that of John Day was quaint, no less than significant—Love waking a young man, and pointing to the rising sun, with the words—"Arise, for it is Day."

The literature of the reigns of Edward VI. and Mary was not productive of great names. Among the more distinguished authors were Sir Thomas Wilson, a native of Lancashire, who published, in 1553, a book called "Arte of Rhetorique," which was much admired, and Alexander Barclay, a clergyman, who produced "The Castle of Labour," "The Mirror of Good Manners," and "The Ship of Fools," the last-named work arriving at a high degree of popularity. Of the style of Wilson, celebrated, according to Dr. Samuel Johnson, for its politeness, the following passage, taken from the "Arte of Rhetorique," may serve as a specimen.—

"Pronunciation is an apte orderinge bothe of the voyce, countenance, and all the whole bodye, accordyng to the worthines of suche wordes and mater as by speache are declared. The vse hereof is suche for anye one that liketh to haue prayse for tellynge his tale in open assemblie, that hauing a good tongue, and a comely countenance, he shal be thought to passe all other that haue the like vtterance: though they haue much better learning. The tongue getteth a certayne grace to euery matter, and beautifieth the cause in like maner, as a swete soundyng lute muche setteth forth a meane deuised ballade. Or as the sounde of a good instrumente styrreth the heares, and moueth muche delite, so a cleere soundyng voice comforteth muche our deintie eares, with muche swete melodie, and causeth vs to allowe the matter rather for the reporters sake, than the reporter for the matters sake. Demosthenes, therefore, that famous oratour, beyng asked what was the chiefe point in al oratorie, gaue the chiefe and onely praise to Pronunciation; being demanded, what was the seconde, and the thirde, he still made answer, Pronunciation, and would make none other answer, till they left asking, declaryng hereby that arte without vtterance can doo nothing, vtterance without arte can doo right muche. And no doubte that man is in outward appaunce halfe a good Clarke, that hath a cleane tongue, and a comely gesture of his body. Aschines lykwyse beyng banished his cuntry through Demosthenes, when he had redde to the Rhodians his own oration, and Demosthenes answered therunto, by force wherof he was banished, and all they maruelled muche at the excellencie of the same. then you would haue maruelled muche more if you had heard hymselfe speak it. Thus beyng cast in miserie and banished for euer, he could not but geue suche greater reporte of his deadly and mortal enemy."

More remarkable as an author in all respects than Sir Thomas Wilson was Alexander Barclay. The latter was the son of a Scotchman who had emigrated to France, and become a professor of law at the university of Paris, marrying at the same time a French lady, and making himself a home in his adopted country. Alexander, however, left his parents when still young, and after travelling for several years on the Continent.

and acquiring proficiency in half a dozen languages, found his way to England, entered into holy orders, and through various stages rose at last to be vicar of All Saints, Lombard Street, and one of the chaplains of Queen Mary. Liberality of religious views seemed entirely out of place in such a position; nevertheless Barclay in several of his works strongly opposed the Jesuits, and throughout advocated a moderate Catholicism. In his "Ship of Fools," which passed through many editions, he read sermons to all classes and sects, making little of ecclesiastical dogmas, but much of wisdom and virtue. The dedication ran: "The Lenuoy of Barclay to the foolcs."

"Ye mocking foolcs that in scorne set your ioy, Proudly despising God's punishment,
Take ye example by Cham the sonne of Noy,
Which laughed his father vnto derision,
Which him after cursed for his transgression,
And made him seruant to all his lyne and stocke:
So shall ye caytifs at the conclusion,
Since ye are nought, and other scorne and mocke."

Among the most characteristic parts of the "Ship of Fools," was the chapter "Of Mockers and Scorners, and false Accusers."

"O heartless foolcs, haste here to our doctrine, Leaue off the wayes of your enormitie,
Enforce you to my precepts to encline,
For here shall I shewe you good and veritie:
Encline, and ye finde shall great prosperitie,
Ensuing the doctrine of our fathers olde,
And godly lawes in valour worth great golde."

Who that will followe the graces manyfolde
Which are in vertue, shall find aunauement:
Wherefore ye foolcs, that in your sinne are holde,
Ensue ye wisdom, and leaue your lewde intent,
Wisdom is the way of men most excellent:
Therefore haue done, and shortly spode your pace,
To quaynt your self and company with grace."

Learne what is vertue, therin is great solace, Learne what is truth, sadnes, and prudence,
Let grutchie be gone, and grauitie purchase,
Forsake your folly and inconuenience,
Cease to be foolcs, and ay to sue offence,
Followe ye vertue, chiefe roote of godlynes,
For it and wisdom is ground of clemynes."

Wisdom and vertue two thinges are doubtles
Whiche man endueth with honour speciall,
But suche heartes as slepe in foolishnes
Knoweth nothing, and will nought know at all:
But in this little barge in principall
All foolish mockers I purpose to reprove, Clawe he his backe that feeleth itche or greue."

Mockers and scorners that are harde of becoue,
With a rough combe here will I clawe and grate,
To proue if they will from their vice remoue,
And leaue their folly, which causeth great debate:
Suche caytiues spare neyther poore man nor estate,
And where their selfe are moote worthy derision,
Other men to scorne is all their most condition."

The literary movement from the Marian to the Elizabethan period had less of the features of ordinary progress than of a sudden leap from the dim dawn of morning into the full light of day. Printing and the reformation had drawn forth light long before Elizabeth ascended the throne, but the smoke of the Smithfield fires brought darkness on again; and when the grim clouds vanished, the sun was seen high in the heavens, more brilliant than men's eyes had ever beheld it yet. Even had the era of Elizabeth produced no other names than the two immortal ones of Shakespeare and Bacon, it would stand above all others in English literature; but surrounded as they were by a galaxy of minor stars, its splendour went far to outshine that of any other age and of any other nation in the history of the world. The literature that sprung up in "great Eliza's golden time" was as vast as exalted, embracing nearly all the forms of mental activity, yet running chiefly in the two deep grooves of poetry and philosophy. The long roll of poets and dramatists of the Elizabethan age opens with Thomas Sackville, the scion of an old English family settled in Sussex, born in 1536. While a student of jurisprudence he wrote the tragedy of "Gorboduc," the earliest regular English drama, which was represented before the queen in 1562 by the members of the Inner Temple. Some years before this date Sackville had started a curious periodical publication, called "The Mirror of Magistrates," designed to give a dramatic survey of the whole range of English history, from William the Conqueror to the end of the wars of the Roses, and the successive divisions of which were written by various contributors, among them Richard Baldwynne, a clergyman, George Ferrers, a member of Lincoln's Inn, and Thomas Churchyard, a poet and soldier, patronized by the earl of Leicester. Sackville himself contributed the Induction, or prologue, and the story of the first duke of Buckingham, both admirable pieces, displaying a fertility of imagination, a vividness of description, and strength of language as yet unknown. The "Mirror of Magistrates" speedily acquired great popularity, and after having been published in a quarto volume in 1559, passed through a second edition in 1563, a third in 1571, and a fourth, with the addition of a series of new "Lives," from the fabulous history of the early Britons, in 1574. A preface of much meaning, hinting at one of the great causes which assisted in the progress of literature of Elizabeth's reign, distinguishing it from that of her predecessor, was added to the second edition of "The Mirror" by Richard Baldwynne. "The work," the writer stated, "was begun and part of it printed in Queen Mary's time, but hindered by the lord chancellor that then was; nevertheless, through the means of my Lord Stafford the first part was licensed and imprinted the first year of the reign of this our most noble and virtuous Queen. Since which time, although I have been called to another trade of life, yet my good Lord Stafford hath not ceased to call upon me to publish so much as I had gotten at other men's hands, so that through his lordship's earnest means I have now set forth another part."

Sackville's prologue to "The Mirror of Magistrates," celebrated as forming the commencement of the marvellous dramatic literature of the Elizabethan age, and the connecting link between the morn of English poetry, as represented by Chaucer, and the noonday splendour of Shakespeare, was conceived in a grand and gloomy spirit. It begins with a picture of winter, its faded fields and withered flowers, reflecting the mutability of all earthly things, and as such the history of nations. Then the poet sees the phantom Sorrow stand before him:—

"In black all clad there fell before my face
A piteous wight, whom woe had all forswat;
Furth from her eyen the crystal tears outbrast,
And, sighing sore, her hands shee wrong and fold,
Tearing her hair that ruth was to behold."

Her body small, forwithered and forspent,
As is the stalk with summer's drought oppress;
Her weaked face with woful tears besprent,
Her colour pale, and, as it seemd her best,
In woe and plaint reposed was her rest;
And, as the stone that drops of water wears,
So dented were her cheeks with fall of tears.

I stood aghast, beholding all her plight,
T'ween dread and dolour so distrained in heart,
That, while my knees upstart with the sight,
The tears outstreamed for sorrow of her smart.
But, when I saw no end that could apart
The deadly dole which she so sore did make,
With doleful voice then thus to her I spake:

Unwrap thy woes, whatever wight thou be!
And stint betime to spill thyself with plaint:
Tell what thou art, and whence; for well I see Thou can'st not dure, with sorrow thus attaint.
And with that word, of sorrow, all forfaint,
She looked up, and, prostrate as she lay,
With piteous sound, lo! thus she gan to say:

Alas, I wretch, whom thus thou seest distrained,
With wasting woes that never shall alake,
Sorrow I am; in endless torments pained
Among the Furies in the infernal lake;
Where Pluto, God of Hell, so grisly blake,
Doth hold his throne, and Lettie's deadly taste
Doth reave remembrance of each thing forepast.

Whence come I am, the dreary destiny
And luckless lot for to bemoan of those Whom fortune in this maze of misery
Of wretched chance most woful mirrors chose;
That when thou seest how lightly they did lose
Their pomp, their power, and that they thought most sure, Thou may'st soon deem no earthly joy may dure."

Following in the field of poetry opened by Thomas Sackville—who rose to be one of Elizabeth's favourites, elevated to the peerage as Baron Buckhurst, and subsequently invested with the earldom of Dorset—came George Gascoyne. He was the son of Sir John Gascoyne, a knight of an ancient family settled in Essex, and after studying law at Cambridge, went as a volunteer to the Low Countries, taking service under the prince of Orange against the Spaniards. Returned to England, he was introduced at court, and in 1575 accompanied the queen on one of her progresses, to celebrate which he wrote "The Princely Pleasures of Kenilworth Castle." The year after he published a poem called "The Steel Glass," generally looked upon as the earliest instance of English satire, as well as one of the first specimens of English blank verse. This piece, full of clever sarcasm reflecting upon the dress, manners, customs, amusements, and follies of the time, met with great success, and found favour even with Queen Elizabeth, not on the whole very fond of satire. Gascoyne next published "Notes concerning the making of Verse or Rhyme in English," which created attention as the first original work on criticism, previous labours of the kind having been mere translations or adaptations from the classical authors. After bringing out several volumes of poems, under the quaint titles of "Flowers," "Herbs," and "Weeds," and forming an intimacy with Sir Walter Raleigh and several other eminent men of the period, he died at Stamford, on a journey, when not quite forty years of age. Besides poems, Gascoyne published a number of dramatic pieces, two of which, the comedy "The Supposes," a translation of the "Suppositi" of Ariosto, and the "Jocasta," a free version of the Phœnissæ of Euripides, were acted at Gray's Inn.

Comedies were not introduced into England much before the time of Elizabeth, but they had already become very popular entertainments, favoured alike by the adherents of the ancient religion, whose taste for theatrical performances had long been nourished by the miracle-plays, oldest form of dramatic representations, and by the Protestants, who, naturally fond of study, found in them food for mental activity. One of the best known pieces in the earlier years of Elizabeth was a piece called "Ralph Roister Doister," written by Nicholas Udall, a good classical scholar and zealous Lutheran, who, curiously enough, combined religious authorship with comedy making, producing successively a translation of Erasmus' Paraphrase of the New Testament and plays for the boys of Eton School, of which he was the head master. It was probably this latter occupation, or amusement, which led to the publication of the "Ralph Roister Doister," held to be the earliest English comedy that was, if not performed, at least issued from the press, one Thomas Hackett being recorded in the register of the Stationers' Company, under date of 1566, as holding a licence for printing the play. Other pieces soon came to share the popularity of Nicholas Udall's comedy. Among them was "Gammer Gurton's Needle," the oldest known edition of which, bearing the date of 1575, describes it as "played on the stage not long ago in Christ's College, in Cambridge." Of the author of the latter play nothing is known, the title-page giving merely his initials as "Mr. S., Master of Arts," while designating the piece itself as a "right pithy, pleasant, and merie comedie." Of the pith, pleasant, and meriment of "Gammer Gurton's Needle," the following extract may serve as a specimen, being part of the introductory speech of the first act, put into the mouth of a wandering beggar called Diccon, the Bedlam. Diccon, that is, Richard, exclaims:—

"Many a myle have I walked, divers and sundry waies,
And many a good man's house have I bin at in my daies:
Many a gossip's cup in my tyme have I tasted,
And many a broche and appt have I both turned and basted:
Many a peece of bacon have I had out of thir balkes,
In ronnyng over the countrey with long and were walkes;
Yet came my foote never within those doore cheekes,
To seeke flesh or fysh, garlyke, onyons, or leekes,
That ever I saw a sorte in such a plyght,
As here within this house appeareth to my syght.
There is howlyng and schowlyng, all cast in a dumpe,
With whewling and pewling, as though they had lost a trump:
Syghing and sobbing, they weepe and they waille;
I marvel in my mynd what the devil they ayle.
The olde trot syts groning, with alas and alus,
And Tib wringes her hands, and takes on in worse case;
With poore Cocks, theyr boye, they be dryven in such fyts
I fear mee the folkes be not well in theyr wyts.
Aske them what they ayle, or who brought them in this staye?
They answer not at all, but alacke and welaway!
When I saw it booted not, out at doores I lyed mee,
And caught a slyp of bacon, when I saw none spyed mee,
Which I intend not far hence, unles my purpose fayle, Shall serve for a shoing horne to draw on two pots of ale."

Hitherto, in the period embracing the first twenty years of the reign of Elizabeth, the poetical literature had been represented by men of high talent; but now came the era of genius, ushered in by Edmund Spenser. In 1579 Spenser published his "Shepherd's Calendar," inaugurating a succession of works that placed him in the first rank of poets, not of England alone, but of all countries. Comparatively numerous as were already metrical compositions, the "Shepherd's Calendar" attracted attention at once, though not entirely on its poetic merits, but because of the puritanical spirit which it breathed, in harmony with the feelings of the classes which mainly took an interest in literature. Divided into twelve books, denominated Eclogues, the "Calendar" celebrated the ever-varying beauties and delights of the seasons, a pastoral being adapted to every month; but under this guise was hidden a large amount of polemical or party divinity, clergymen only figuring as shepherds, the good ones—such as "Algrind," representing Grindall, archbishop of Canterbury—of puritanic sentiments, and the wicked exhibiting prelates or high dignitaries of the church of opposite views. But Puritans or Catholics alike could not keep from admiring the exquisite beauty of some of Spenser's verses, such as that of the second Eclogue, containing the "Tale of the Oak and the Briar":—

"It chanced after uppn a day
The husbandman's self to come that way,
Of custom to surviue his ground,
And his trees of state in compass round:
Him when the spiteful Brere had espied,
He causeless complained, and loudly cried
Unto his lord, stirring up stern strife:—
O my liege lord! the god of my life,
Please of you pond your suppliant's plaint,
Caused of wrong and cruel constraint,
Which I your poor vassal daily endure:
And, but your goodness the same secure,
Am like for desperate dole to die,
Through felonous force of mine enemy.
Greatly aghast with this pitous plea,
Him rested the Goodman on the lea,
And bade the Brere in his plaint proceed
With painted words tho gan this proud weed
(As most usen ambitious folk),
His coloured crime with craft to cloak:—
Ah, my sovereign! lord of creatures all,
Thou placer of plants both humble and tall,
Was not I plantid of thine own hand,
To be the primrose of all thy land,
With flowering blossoms to furnish the prime,
And scarlet berries in summer time?
How falls it then that this faded Oak,
Whose body is sere, whose branches broke,
Whose naked arms stretch unto the fire,
Unto such tyranny doth aspire, Hindring with his shade my lovely light,
And robbing me of the sweet sun's sight?
So beat his old boughs my tender side,
That oft the blood springeth from woundes wide."

The "Shepherd's Calendar" was reprinted four times during the author's life, in 1581, 1586, 1591, and 1597. But before the second edition appeared the poet had finished another work, which he called "Dreams," subsequently published under the title of "Visions of Petrarch," and had begun to plan and partly execute his masterpiece, the "Fairie Queene." When commencing this great work, destined to confer immortal fame upon his name, Spenser was living in Ireland, at the castle of Kilcolman, county of Cork, and here he was visited by his friend and patron, Sir Walter Raleigh, to whom he showed the portions already finished. Raleigh was so much charmed with the poem, that he pressed the author to return with him to London, in order to present him to the queen; and accordingly, in the autumn of 1589, Spenser was brought under the personal notice of Elizabeth, and received the gracious permission to read to her some of his verses "at timely hours." Having listened, she declared, "by the measure of her own great mind," the poem to be "of wondrous worth." The plan and object of the work the poet himself stated to be "to represent all the morall vertues, assigning to every vertue a knight, to be the patron and defender of the same, in whose action and feates of armes and chivalry the operations of that vertue whereof he is the protector are to be expressed, and the vices and unruly appetites that oppose themselves against the same to be beaten downe and overcome." The first three books of the "Fairie Queene" were published in 1590, and received by the public, according to the statements of contemporary writers, with a perfect burst of wonder and admiration, so far shared by the queen as to induce her to settle a pension of fifty pounds a year upon the poet. Notwithstanding its extraordinary success, the fourth, fifth, and sixth books of the "Fairie Queene" were not published till 1596, Spenser having returned to his castle of Kilcolman in the meanwhile, married a beautiful but poor Irish girl, "a country lass," and got into a lawsuit about an estate granted to him by the crown. In the autumn of 1598, Kilcolman Castle was attacked by an armed band of Irish rebels, and set on fire; and although the poet and his wife escaped with their lives, their new-born babe perished in the flames. Heartbroken and in utter destitution, Spenser fled to England, and with great trouble made his way to London, but only to die. Neither the great queen, who had praised the "wondrous worth" of the noblest poem yet produced in her realm, nor any of the thousands of readers whose admiration it had excited and continued to excite, came forward with the slightest offer of assistance to the poet. "He died for lacke of bread in King Street," recorded Ben Jonson, a brother of the pen. However, the author of the "Fairie Queene," though dying for want of bread, had the honour of being buried in Westminster Abbey. Spenser had dedicated his masterpiece to "the Most High, Mighty, and Magnificent Empress, Elizabeth, to live with the eternity of her fame."

Queene." Always rich in colours and grand in conception, the "exquisite sense of the beautiful" rises into sublimity when touching the higher regions of thought, as in the second canto of the fifth book, in the dialogue between the Giant, the spirit of negation, and Artegal, the angel of faith.

The last books of the "Fairie Queene" were not published till 1609, ten years after the poet had died "for lacke of bread," and "the Most High, Mighty, and Magnificent Emperess, Elizabeth," had buried him in Westminster Abbey—where in due course he had a grand monument erected to his honour. Besides the "Fairie Queene" and the "Shepherd's Calendar," Spenser composed a variety of poetical works, all more or less distinguished for beauty of form and splendour of imagination, but none of them equal to his masterpiece. Between its first publication and the rise of another sublime genius, before whose greatness all others were doomed to sink into nothingness, there appeared a whole crowd of minor poets, whose works reflected, to a greater or lesser degree, the lustre of intellect that had spread over the realm. Foremost among these writers of fiction was Sir Philip Sidney, the ideal gentleman of the Elizabethan age. Though his metrical productions cannot be compared with those of Spenser, and even of inferior writers, such as Sackville, his allegoric romances take a very high rank, above all his principal work, on which his fame chiefly rests, the "Arcadia," originally published under the title of "The Countess of Sidney's Arcadia." As described in the preface to one of the earlier editions, the "Arcadia" is "a piece of prose-poetry, for though it observeth not numbers and rhyme, yet the invention is wholly spun out of the phansie, and conformable to the possibilitie of truth in all particulars." None of Sidney's works were published during his lifetime. The "Arcadia" was printed for the first time in 1590, four years after the author's death; another work, a collection of sonnets, called "Astrophel and Stella," in 1591; and an eloquent essay, entitled "Defense of Poesie," in which he speaks of songs which made his heart "stir as with the sound of a trumpet," in 1595. Among the most noted of Sidney's contemporaries, holding about the same rank in the poetical literature of the age, were Drayton, Chapman, Daniel, Fairfax, and Warner. Drayton, a native of Warwickshire, born in the fifth year of the reign of Elizabeth, reflected the character as well as the origin of the class of writers among which his name came to be enrolled, by a question he was reported to have asked in early youth: "What sort of creatures are those poets? Of all things make me one." Drayton wrote odes, elegies, fables, sonnets, and epistles in verse, and a great work, the "Polyolbion," an attempt to register in metrical form the topography and antiquities of England, which brought him the poet laureateship. Chapman, described by a contemporary as "a person of most reverend aspect, religious and temperate, and highly esteemed by the clergy and academicians," distinguished himself chiefly by a translation of the works of Homer, made in long rhyming lines of fourteen syllables, like the metre of Drayton's "Polyolbion." Daniel, the son of a music-master at Taunton, educated at Oxford, but who left the university without taking a degree, "his geny being," according to Anthony à Wood, "more prone to easier and smoother subjects than in pecking and hewing at logic," published a vast number of poetical and prose works, chief among them "The Tragedy of Cleopatra," composed in alternate rhymes, with choruses on the antique model. Of Fairfax and Warner little is known beyond the facts that the first was a private gentleman, living on his estate in York shire, and the second a London attorney, and that both "cultivated the muses" with very great zeal. Fairfax made himself known principally by a translation of Tasso's "Gerusalemme Liberata," under the title of "Godfrey of Bullogne;" and Warner by a poem called "Albion's England," in thirteen books, which attained great popularity among the extreme Puritans for its attacks upon the forms and ceremonies of the church of Rome. Limited as was the renown, it was worth something in an age possessing, as recorded by contemporary chroniclers, above two hundred poets, all more or less known to fame.

From among this vast crowd there shone forth on a sudden a light so great as to dazzle all ages—a light so great as to blind those near it, for they saw it not.

SHAKESPEARE'S BIRTH-PLACE.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

Like a meteor flashing across the heavens, the bard of Avon came and went, and the living world of men knew nothing of the star when it had disappeared, but only remembered its brightness. "Of William Shakespeare," says Hallam, "whom through the mouths of those whom he has inspired to body forth the modifications of his immense mind, we seem to know better than any human writer, it may be truly said that we scarcely know anything. We see him, as far as we do see him, not in himself, but in a reflex image from the objectivity in which he was manifested; he is Falstaff, and Mercutio, and Malvolio, and Jaques, and Portia, and Imogen, and Lear, and Othello; but to us he is scarcely a determined person, a substantial reality of past time, the man Shakespeare. The two greatest names in poetry are to us little more than names. If we are not yet come to question his existence, as we do that of 'the blind old man of Scio's rocky isle'—an improvement in critical acuteness doubtless reserved for a distant posterity—we as little feel the power of identifying the young man who came up from Stratford, was afterwards an indifferent player in a London theatre, and retired to his native place in middle life, with the author of Macbeth and Lear, as we can give a distinct historic personality to Homer. All that insatiable curiosity and unwearied diligence have hitherto detected about Shakespeare serves rather to disappoint and perplex us, than to furnish the slightest illustration of his character. It is not the register of his baptism, or the draft of his will, or the orthography of his name that we seek. No letter of his writing, no record of his conversation, no character of him drawn with any fulness by a contemporary has been produced." The depth of mystery surrounding everything connected with the life of the greatest poet ever born, the pride and glory of England for all ages, can only be explained by the supposition that the England of Elizabeth knew not the worth of William Shakespeare. The poet of all times, he stood so high above his own time, that his contemporaries were utterly unable to measure the power, the grandeur, and the magnitude of him whom they saw walking in the flesh among them, but whose heaven-soaring thoughts passed their understanding. One only of all the authors of the Elizabethan era spoke in becoming terms of Shakespeare: he who also recorded the fact of the author of the "Fairie Queene" perishing "for lacke of bread." Nothing of all earthly things so much dims the glory of this golden age of literature, than that Spenser should have died forgotten, and Shakespeare should have lived unknown.

Of the exact number of Shakespeare's works, their date of publication, and the order in which they were written, as little is known as of his life. From the testimony of a divine, named Francis Meres, who brought out, in 1598, a book called "Palladis Tamia, or Wits Treasury," it appears that in that year he had written, besides the poems of "Venus and Adonis," "Lucrece," and the "Sonnets," at least twelve of his incomparable plays. "As Plautus and Seneca are accounted the best for comedy and tragedy among the Latines," says Francis Meres, "so Shakespeare among the English is the most excellent in both kinds for the stage. For comedy witness his 'Gentlemen of Verona,' his 'Errors,' his 'Love Labours Lost,' his 'Love Labours Won,' his 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' and his 'Morchant of Venice.' For tragedy his 'Richard II.,' 'Richard III.,' 'Henry IV.,' 'King John,' 'Titus Andronicus,' and his 'Romeo and Juliet.'" It is generally supposed that Shakespeare settled in London about 1587, being then twenty-three years old; but there is absolute darkness as to what he did for some years to come, and only a glimmer of knowledge is furnished by the poet's dedication of his comedy of "Venus and Adonis" to Lord Southampton, in which he describes it as "the first heir of his invention." The poet's acquaintance with Lord Southampton, friend of the earl of Essex, the royal favourite, and who was condemned to death with him, in 1601, but pardoned by the queen, probably led to his productions being made known at court; but there is no evidence that Elizabeth ever took the slightest notice of the greatest of her subjects, or considered his head otherwise than as liable to the poll-tax. Nor did Burleigh, or any other of the men in power, display the least affection or esteem for the sublime writer who was scattering with prodigal hand in sight of them the fruits of his genius, sowing seeds compared with which their own doings, their diplomacies, intrigues, and war makings, sank into utter insignificance. As far as known, the only men who appreciated to any extent the exalted spirit dwelling among them were some of the minor poets and dramatists of the age, who sunned themselves in, and feebly reflected, the light of his genius. A knot of them, Ben Jonson, Beaumont, Fletcher, Seldon, Cotton, Donne, and half a dozen more of the literary host of "Eliza's golden time," were in the habit of meeting William Shakespeare at a sort of club established by Sir Walter Raleigh at the Mermaid tavern, in Bread Street, listening to "words of flame" such as, probably, the world had never heard before—and may never hear again. As recorded by Beaumont—

"What things have we seen Done at the Mermaid! Heard words that have been So nimble and so full of subtle flame,
As if that every one from whence they came
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
And had resolv'd to live a fool the rest
Of his dull life."

Before the end of the sixteenth century, Shakespeare published, besides the works already cited, "The Taming of the Shrew;" the second part of "King Henry IV., the three parts of "King Henry VI.," the "Merry Wives of Windsor;" "As you like it;" "Much ado about Nothing;" "King Henry V.;" "Pericles;" and, probably, the first draft of "Hamlet." About the number and names of the plays produced by Shakespeare from the opening of the seventeenth century to the termination of his literary career, opinions are divided, but the conjecture most generally admitted is that up to the year 1600 he had written twenty-three or twenty-four pieces. From this date to the end he probably wrote fifteen more tragedies and comedies, among them the most sublime of his productions. They were "Timon of Athens;" "Measure for Measure;" "Macbeth;" a new and enlarged edition of "Hamlet;" "Troilus and Cressida;" "Twelfth Night;" "Coriolanus;" "Julius Cæsar;" "Antony and Cleopatra;" "A Winter's Tale;" "Othello;" "King Lear;" "Cymbeline;" "Henry VIII.;" and "The Tempest." The first collective edition of the dramas was not published till 1623, seven years after Shakespeare's death—the delay furnishing another proof of the indifference of the epoch to the heaven-inspired poet which it had borne.

ANN HATHAWAY'S COTTAGE.

There is some significance, also, in the fact that the decease of Elizabeth, preceding his own by thirteen years, was not commemorated in any way by Shakespeare, which neglect produced complaints from a verse-maker named Chettle, who put forth a dismal elegy, entitled "Englandes Mourning Garment," lamenting that "silver-tongued Melicert," with others of the leading authors, did not assist him to wail the nation's loss. It cannot be doubted that the poet, whose inward eye measured all things, saw clearly the greatness as well as the littleness of the singular woman who had wielded the sceptre of England for so long a time, beholding her as beheld by future generations—generations admitting with one universal voice that Shakespeare derived no fame from living in the age of Elizabeth, but that Elizabeth's great glory was to live in the age of Shakespeare.

When Shakespeare had nearly finished his meteor-like career upon earth, another star of the first magnitude, of splendour scarcely inferior, arose with Francis Bacon. He, "the wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind," can be claimed, however, but in a small degree for the period of Elizabeth, his fame alike and the greater part of his literary activity falling into the reign of her successor. Bacon was born three years before Shakespeare; but he outlived him eleven years, and the poet's work was all but done when that of the philosopher began. Though stand ing side to side on the roll of English literature, the two greatest names inscribed thereon, and the two greatest lives ever born together at any epoch of the world, their careers strikingly differed from each other. Shakespeare lived in utter obscurity, all but unknown to his contemporaries: Bacon in the bright glare of public fame, known not only, but known too well. His course was a strange one in many respects. Son of Sir Nicolas Bacon, keeper of the Great Seal, nephew of Burleigh, and, when very young, a favourite with Elizabeth, he seemed to have from the commencement a high career before him, with no social difficulties to overcome; yet for all this, and his astounding genius and immense ambition, he had to fight his way upwards step by step, against obstacles and perplexities without end. Everything was in his favour, but his towering genius was against him. Leaving Cambridge at the age of sixteen, a boy in years but in learning already a man, he travelled abroad for some time, and, recalled at the death of his father, had to learn that he was penniless, the title and fortune of Sir Nicolas going to his eldest son, Sir Anthony Bacon. He now threw himself on the patronage of his great and powerful uncle, but only to be disappointed in his hopes of advancement, Burleigh having discovered already that he was an "innovator," and, what was worse, a "theorist." Thereupon he entered his name at Gray's Inn as a law student, made a few friends and many enemies; but nevertheless worked his way up at the bar, became a successful advocate, a member of the House of Commons, and in a short time acquired such fame as an orator that the queen herself went to listen to his pleadings. Elizabeth admired his speech, but did not admire his opposition to various subsidies which she wanted to be voted; and Bacon was soon informed that he had fallen into disgrace at court, and would have to suffer all the consequences which this entailed under a despotic government. Half in despondency, half in disdain, he now resolved to abandon public life, and to sequester himself as a scholar in the monastic solitude of Cambridge; but before the scheme could be carried into execution he had become intimate with the earl of Essex, who most generously made him a present of a small estate at Twickenham to enable him to commence, unrepressed by worldly anxieties, a series of vast literary labours, which had long been the dream of his ambition. The first fruit of these labours was a volume of "Essays," which at once established the fame of the author as a philosopher of nature and of human nature.

STATUE OF LORD BACON.

The renown of his book brought Bacon forth from his retirement, and reoccupying again his place at the bar, he was enrolled among the crown lawyers. Soon after occurred the mad rebellion of Essex, and to Bacon was assigned the mournful duty of prosecuting his kind friend and benefactor. The manner in which he executed this task, and the cruel harshness with which he brought the whole weight of his splendid oratory to bear against the unfortunate prisoner, to whom he was bound by all the ties of gratitude, forms one of the dark spots in the resplendent fame of the immortal philosopher. Even his friends were indignant at Bacon's conduct on this occasion, and to vindicate himself he wrote an "Apology," the pith of which was in the sentence, "That which I performed at the bar in my public service, by the rules of duty I was bound to do it honestly and without prevarication." But probably "the rules of duty" had less influence in directing the philosopher's course in this instance than his high-soaring ambition and covetousness of political power and distinction, necessarily mean in an age when both could be obtained only by subservience to the predominant despotism. Having done the not honourable work demanded of him, Bacon assiduously continued his attendance at court, but with as little success as before, Elizabeth showing much inclination to listen to his eloquent talk, but none whatever to promote him to a higher sphere of usefulness than that of queen's counsellor. In this doubtful and humiliating position, the great philosopher remained till the end of the reign, yearning after the wealth flowing from the hands of a queen, and disdaining the infinitely higher wealth of his own mind. At the death of Elizabeth, Bacon had reached the age of forty-two, without having produced as yet anything but his "Essays," as the first so the least important of all his writings. However, unimportant as they were compared with the later results of his mighty intellect, they nevertheless marked an era in the history of English philosophy. In the first edition of the "Essays," published in 1597, there were ten dissertations, entitled, respectively, "Of Studies;" "Of Discourse;" "Of Ceremonies and Respects;" "Of Followers and Friends;" "Of Suitors;" "Of Expense;" "Of Regiment of Health;" "Of Honour and Reputation;" "Of Faction;" and "Of Negotiating." Nearly all these treatises were expanded in later editions to about double their extent, and a number more were added in the reign of Elizabeth's successor, which saw the main part of the literary career of the most august philosopher ever born to England.

Compared with the literature of fiction, the prose authorship of the reign of Elizabeth was very circumscribed in its list of names. Besides Bacon there were only two writers of note, Richard Hooker and Roger Asham. Hooker, famous as the author of one great book, the "Ecclesiastical Polity," was a native of Exeter, the son of poor parents, but whom the liberality of a relative allowed to study at Oxford, where he became Hebrew lecturer. He left his post in 1580, having, as recorded by a friend, "his quiet and capacious soul stored with all the precious learning of the philosophers, casuists, and schoolmen," to preach a few sermons at St. Paul's Cross, London. Wandering divines, coming up to town in this way, had "lodgings and diet" free of expense, at a dwelling known as the "Shunamite's house," where also poor Richard Hooker descended, to his own exceeding grief. His coil was attended by a Mrs. Churchman, possessed of a daughter named Joan, whom she managed to foist upon the innocent divine, who found himself a married man almost as soon as he had done preaching. The marriage involved the loss of a fellowship at Oxford, from which Hooker had derived his chief maintenance, and after starving for a few years, he was glad enough to accept a very diminutive "living" at Drayton-Beauchamp, in Buckinghamshire. Here he was visited one day by a former pupil, George Cranmer, nephew of the archbishop, who found the Hebrew lecturer not, as expected, in study, but "tending his small allotment of sheep in a common field." On proceeding homeward, Cranmer was still more astounded to hear a shrill voice from the distance crying, in authoritative tone, "Richard, come and rock the cradle." Not being able to forbear hinting at the domestic discomforts of his learned friend, Hooker calmly replied that "as saints have usually a double share of the misfortunes of this present life, it did not become him to repine: he submitted to the Divine will, and laboured to possess his soul in patience." Through Cranmer's influence the sage was appointed lecturer at the Temple, and afterwards incumbent of Boscombe, in Wiltshire, with a prebend at Salisbury, which placed him above want, and the necessity of tending sheep and rocking cradles. At Boscombe he began, and in 1591 published, the first four books of the great work which made his name famous all at once, the "Ecclesiastical Polity." It was an elaborate attempt to defend the Church of England against the attacks of the Puritans, carried out with a literary power and a force of logic and of reasoning that remained unsurpassed. He contended for episcopacy as an apostolical institution, and always preferable, when circumstances would allow its preservation, to the more democratic model of the Calvinist congregations. Though elevating the authority of an episcopal hierarchy, even in matters of belief, with an exaggeration not easily reconciled to the Protestant right of private judgment, the "Ecclesiastical Polity" gained great popularity among all classes, and Elizabeth admired it so much as to present the author with the rich living of Bishopsbourne, near Canterbury. Here Hooker spent the remaining five years of his life, publishing a fifth book of his "Polity," and getting ready three more, which were not printed, however, till nearly half a century afterwards, when the influence of the work was growing powerful enough to bring a king of England back to the fold of Rome.

Far removed from Hooker in religious doctrine, yet not unlike him in the style of his literary productions, was Roger Ascham, second greatest prose writer of the reign of Elizabeth. Ascham, the son of poor parents, like Hooker, and like him, too, teacher of Greek at Cambridge, was already in his forty-fourth year when Elizabeth ascended the throne; but though the queen loved young people about her, his age did not prevent him from becoming her private secretary and Latin reader, involving the duty of being at court the greater part of his time. He had already acquired some literary fame as author of a curious work, called "Toxophilus, or Partitions of Shooting," much admired for the terseness of its diction, as well as the lucid treatment of the subject; and basking in the sunshine of royal favour, he commenced writing another book, the greatest of his productions, issued, though only after his death, under the title of "The Schoolmaster." In the interval between completing this work, one of the best educational treatises ever written, and his retirement from court, which took place in 1563, Ascham brought out a series of Latin "Epistles" descriptive of his travels in foreign countries, which gained great renown, both on account of their style—an imitation of that of Cicero—and the curious historical and biographical facts which they contained. The latter days of Elizabeth's secretary are believed to have been passed in poverty and misery. For a time the queen rewarded his services handsomely, but having left her neighbourhood, she thought no more of him; and he being a man utterly averse to asking any favours, and fond of independence, he had to pay the penalty of it in bitter indigence. To divert his mind from too much study, he took to "alectryomachia," or, in clear English, cock-fighting, which fashionable amusement, greatly in vogue among the courtiers of Elizabeth, made him still poorer and scarcely wiser, and finally occasioned his death by an exposure to cold. For some time before his decease he suffered greatly from fever, in spite of which he kept up his night studies, working particularly hard in the month of December, 1568, in the composition of a Latin poem, for presentation to the queen on New Year's day. But before the new year arrived, Roger Ascham had completed his earthly labours, leaving his poem unfinished. Elizabeth, hearing of his death, feelingly remarked that she would have rather lost "ten thousand pounds" than her old secretary—a sum at which she probably valued but few of her friends. Better than her majesty's memento were Fuller's quaint words in commemoration of Roger Ascham. "He was," recorded the quaint old chronicler, "an honest man, and a good shooter. Archery was his pastime in youth, which, in his old age, he exchanged for cock-fighting. His 'Toxophilus' is a good book for young men; his 'Schoolmaster' for old men; his 'Epistles' for all men."

The reign of Elizabeth, with all its literary glory, produced exceedingly little in science and the fine arts. Possessed of no imagination, and essentially utilitarian in all her tastes, the queen never had any liking for art, and as far as science went acknowledged it only in Shakespeare's definition as "cunning in musick and the mathematicks." The chief painters of the Elizabethan age were Dutchmen, skilled in delineating portraits upon canvas, the only form of high art patronized by the upper classes, who slavishly followed the model set by the court. Among the most renowned of these limners were Lucas Van Heere, offspring of an old artist family settled at Ghent, and Henry Cornelius Vroom, a native of Haarlem. The former, poet as well as painter, author of a "Boomgard der Poesy," or Garden of Poetry, was in great favour with Elizabeth, owing to the outrageous flattery of which he made use in her portraits, at a time when her features assumed a very haggard appearance. In one of his pictorial allegories the shrewd Dutchman represented the aged queen of such excessive beauty as to make her glance suffice to dazzle Venus, Juno, and Minerva, in whose midst she suddenly appeared; this painting—still to be seen at Hampton Court Palace—pleased her majesty so much as to lead her into an unusual fit of liberality in paying the artist. Lucas Van Heere was otherwise a clever man. In 1570 he painted a gallery for the earl of Lincoln, high-admiral of the fleet, in which he represented the costumes of different nations, and because of the fickleness of fashions in the realm of Elizabeth, set the Englishman down as naked, with a pair of shears in his hands and a bale of cloth at his side. Less in favour than Lucas Van Heere was Cornelius Vroom, who was chiefly employed by the earl of Nottingham, and who designed the tapestry representing the defeat of the Spanish Armada, which for a long time ornamented the walls of the House of Lords. The queen herself disliked Vroom and the majority of his brother artists, requiring, as she expressed it, none but "special cunning painters" or men after the Van Heere style. "To do the profession justice," says Horace Walpole, "they seem to have flattered her the least of all her dependants, for there is scarcely a single portrait of her that can be called beautiful. The profusion of ornaments with which they are loaded are marks of her continual fondness for dress, while they entirely exclude all grace, and leave no more room for a painter's genius than if he had been employed to copy an Indian idol totally composed of hands and necklaces. A pale Roman nose, a head of hair loaded with crowns and powdered with diamonds, a vast ruff, a vaster fardingle, and a bushel of pearls, are the features by which everybody knows at once the pictures of Queen Elizabeth."

The architecture of the period was scarcely above that of art in general. Most of the nobility continued to inhabit their ancient castles, ~~the brick houses changed~~ gradually into palaces by the alteration of the original edifices, and the addition of side wings and other out-buildings, the latter mostly in the Grecian style. As remarked by a distinguished art critic, "the incongruous mixture of the conflicting principles of Grecian and Gothic architecture produced buildings more truly barbarous, and more disgusting to a cultivated taste than the rudest Norman work." There were, however, many exceptions to this general degeneracy of taste, and though the queen herself did little or nothing towards raising the standard of architecture in the erection of noble palaces or public buildings, some of her ministers and courtiers, among them Lord Burleigh, the earls of Salisbury and of Suffolk, and the poet, Lord Buckhurst, spent their vast fortunes in the construction of noble mansions, the pride of the Tudor style of art. It was one of the consequences, too, of a long reign of peace and national prosperity that building became far more frequent than before; and the number of the landed gentry especially, who sought to escape the gloom of the middle ages in their ancient habitations, and went to remodel them into more cheerful dwellings, was so great as to leave its mark on the English landscape for generations to come in the much praised as well as much abused "Elizabethan manor-house." Many of the mansions erected during the middle and the latter part of the sixteenth century were of magnificent dimensions, and highly picturesque, from the varied lines and projections of the plan and elevation, as well as rich in fanciful cut work, knobs, bosses, and pannels, giving rise to what was afterwards well described as the "florid" style. Of the general design of the noble mansions of the period, an account is given in Leland's "Itinerary," in the description of Wreschill Castle, near Howden, in Yorkshire. "Most part of the best court," says Leland, "is of timber. The castle is moted about on three parts: the fourth part is dry, where the entry is into the castle. Five towers, one at each corner: the gateway is the fifth, having five lodgings in height; three of the other towers have four lodgings in height, the fourth containeth the buttery, pantry, pastry, lardery, and kitchen. In one of the towers a study called Paradise, where is a close in the middle of eight squares latticed; about and at the top of every square is a desk lodged to set books on. The garde-robe in the castle is exceeding fair; and so are the gardens within the mote and the orchards without; and in the orchards are mounts 'opere topiario' written about, with degrees like turnings of a cockle-shell, to come to top without pain." Notwithstanding all the show and ornament lavished upon these castles, or gentlemen's mansions, a great many of them had wood for their principal material, as stated by Leland in his description of Morley House, near Manchester, which, he says, was "builded, saving the foundation of stone squared, that riseth within a great mote a six feet above the water, all of timber—after the common sort of building of the gentlemen for most of Lancashire."

Among the noblest palaces constructed in the reign of Elizabeth, and held to be a model of all others, and of the higher class of domestic architecture in general, was that of her great minister, Lord Burleigh, situated at St. Theobald's, in Hertfordshire. Economical as he was otherwise in his tastes, Burleigh lavished immense sums upon this edifice, which he erected mainly for the purpose of receiving with due splendour his royal mistress, the maker of his fortune, whenever she should honour him with a visit. He did so no less than twelve times, remaining for a week or longer, and putting him to an expence of between three and four thousand pounds each time. From a parliamentary survey made in the middle of the next century, eighty years after it had been completed, it appears that Burleigh's palace consisted of two principal quadrangles, with four outer courts, called the Fountain court, the Dial court, the Buttery court, and the Dove-house court. The largest of these, the Fountain court, about ninety feet square, had on the east side a cloister of seven arches, while the ground floor formed a magnificent hall, the roof of which was arched with carved timber of curious workmanship. In the main building, the lower part was chiefly devoted to private apartments, while the state rooms were situated in the floor above, the divisions of which were more sumptuously decorated than any other part of the palace. The chief of these were the presence-chamber, finished with carved oak wainscoting, and a ceiling full of gilded pendants, and the royal gallery, one hundred and twenty-three feet long, "wainscoted with oak, and paintings over the same of divers cities, rarely painted and set forth, with a fret ceiling, with divers pendants, roses, and flower-de-luces; also divers large stage heads, which were an excellent ornament of the same." At each corner of the palace stood "a high and fair tower," and over the hall in the middle "a large and fair turret in the fashion of a lantern, curiously wrought with divers pinnacles at each corner, wherein hangeth twelve bells for chiming, and a clock with chimes and sundry work." The middle court was formed by a quadrangle one hundred and ten feet square, while on the east side of the palace was a cloister, surmounted by the "Green Gallery," one hundred and nine feet long and twelve feet broad, "excellently well painted with the several shires in England, and the arms of the noblemen and gentlemen in the same." Above the gallery was a leaded walk, on which were two lofty arches of brick, "of no small ornament to the house, and rendering it comely and pleasant to all that passed by." The whole account of this residence of Lord Burleigh tallies well with the description of the ideal palace in Spenser's "Fairie Queene":—

"High lifted up were many lofty towers,
And goodly galleries far overlaid,
Full of fair windows and delightful bowers,
And on the top a dial told the timely hours."

ELIZABETHIAN MANSION.

The art of gardening was brought to high perfection in the reign of Elizabeth, and the grounds attached to the larger mansions and palaces were laid out in the most elaborate manner, partly in the Italian and partly in the Dutch style, full of terraces, fountains, canals, and labyrinths. The pleasure-gardens of St. Theobald's contained seven acres, divided into as many "knots" of fantastic shape, "one of which was set forth in likeness of the queen's arms." A foreign traveller who visited Burleigh's palace in the summer of 1598, a few weeks after the death of the illustrious owner, left a record of the gardens as they appeared to him. "From the gallery," the account runs, "in which is painted the genealogy of the kings of England, one goes into the great garden, encompassed with a ditch full of water, large enough to allow of the pleasure of going in a boat and rowing between the shrubs and flowers. There are a great variety of trees and plants; labyrinths made with a vast amount of labour; fountains running in basins of white marble, and columns and pyramids of wood up and down the gardens. After seeing these we were led by the gardener into the summer-house, in the lower part of which, built semicircularly, are the twelve Roman emperors, in white marble, and a table of touchstone, set round the upper part with cisterns of lead, which are kept full of water by means of pipes, so that they may hold fish; they are also very convenient for bathing in summer time. In another pleasure-house near to this, and joined to it by a little bridge, was an oval table of red marble." The general state of art of the Elizabethan period was reflected to a great extent in these curious gardens, with their terraces, labyrinths, fountains, pyramids of wood, and statues of marble. Love of nature, and of the highest forms of beauty which nature alone furnishes, was curiously mixed up with love of artificialness, assuming no definite shape, but wavering to and fro, and seeking to appropriate the various tastes, good or bad, of other nations. There was not a little of anarchy and confusion in this state of things, yet it was an upward movement on the whole, resulting finally in nearer approach to ideal perfection, as in literature so in science and art.

CHAPTER V.

History of Industry and Commerce, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of Elizabeth.

The Tudor period, most eventful epoch in the material progress of England, formed the basis in many respects of that immense development of trade and industry which took place in the succeeding centuries. At the accession of Henry VII. the material prosperity of the country had sunk very low, and the reign of the first of the Tudor monarchs was far more distinguished for progress made in commerce than in the industrial pursuits of the people. Agriculture, the first of all industries, continued for a long time to be in an undeveloped state, far behind that of most continental countries. The main cause of it, undoubtedly, was the monstrous monopoly of land existing since the Norman conquest, which had made the whole soil of the kingdom over to a few persons, leaving the mass of the people, including those whose sinews extracted the riches of the soil, drawing wealth from what was in itself worthless, in a state of servitude. A Venetian traveller, who visited England in a diplomatic capacity in the year 1496, gives a graphic description of this unnatural monopoly of land, under which the energies of a whole nation were kept lying crushed and broken. "There is not a foot of land in all England," he writes, "which is not held either under the king or the church; and many monasteries also pay acknowledgments to the king for their possessions; a great number of them having been founded out of the royal funds, by the crown, after the conquest by King William." "King William," the traveller shrewdly adds, "conquered England for the crown. All the land that was fit for cultivation was divided into a number of parts called military services, giving to each service, or, as otherwise named, fee, 60 acres of land, an acre being about as much as two oxen can cultivate in a year. It is computed that there are at present 96,230 of these fees; but the English Church is in possession of 28,015 of them; the remainder are the property of the crown or of the barons of the realm, who, however, pay acknowledgments to the crown for them." It would be impossible to give in a few lines a clearer picture of the social state of England at the end of the fifteenth century.

"All the lands of the nobility," continues the observant Italian, "are not in cultivation, for a great portion lies barren and waste, and I am told that there are more than four thousand parks in England, all enclosed with timber fences. Such is the condition of the lords temporal in this kingdom. But that of the lords spiritual is still better, for, besides their own lands, they possess the actual tenth of all the produce of the earth, and of every animal." That agriculture did not flourish under this dead weight of "lords temporal" and "lords spiritual" was no wonder; but there were yet other causes at work which contributed to destroy it. The chief of these was the great depopulation of the country caused by the long civil wars. There was nothing that struck the Venetian traveller more at his first entrance into England than the scarcity of human beings everywhere. "The population of this island," he exclaims, "does not appear to me to bear any proportion to her fertility and riches. I rode from Dover to London, and from London to Oxford, a distance of more than 200 Italian miles, and it seemed to me very thinly inhabited; but, lest the way I went should have differed from the other parts, I inquired of those who rode to the north of the kingdom, to the borders of Scotland, and was told that it was the same case there; nor was there any variety in the report of those who went to Bristol and into Cornwall." It is probable that the population of England at this period was not much, if at all, above three millions, or about fifty to the square mile. Taking one out of the three millions to have been inhabitants of towns, there would have remained only two millions of individuals, men, women, and children, for the cultivation of some twenty millions of acres of arable land. The task was a clear impossibility, even without the terrible despotism of a hundred thousand temporal and spiritual lords.

A last cause of the low state of agriculture—or, perhaps, cause and consequence alike—was the great demand for English wool throughout the continent at this period. This made it for a time much more lucrative to keep large flocks of sheep than to cultivate the soil; and hands becoming likewise more and more scarce, acre after acre of arable land was converted into pasture. Henry VII. was fully aware of the importance of this growing evil, and attempted, as was his wont in all things, to remedy it by legislation. Several acts were passed to enforce tillage and discourage sheep-breeding: by one of them, great owners of flocks—often possessing above twenty thousand head—were not allowed to have more than two thousand, and, to make the business less profitable, restrictions were laid on the export of wool. The latter part of Henry's policy, though fatal in a commercial sense, took some effect in regard to agriculture, and with the decrease of exports there came an increase of arable land. However, the progress was naturally slow, and Henry's legislation did probably, on the whole, more harm than good.

The two staple exports of English produce at this time were wool and tin, while the chief article of import was wine. "With the exception of wine," says the Italian traveller of the year 1496, "they import nothing from abroad for their subsistence. Nevertheless the sale of their valuable tin brings large sums of money, and still more do they derive from their extraordinary abundance of wool, which bears such a high price and reputation throughout Europe. And in order to keep the gold and silver in the country when once it has entered, they have made a law, which has been in operation for some time now, that no money nor gold or silver plate shall be carried out of England." The short-sighted policy which dictated this law was less Henry's own than that of the age; so that when Lord Chancellor Morton declared to the parliament which met in November, 1487, that it was the king's wish to have a statute passed, ordering "that whatsoever merchandize shall be brought in from beyond the seas may be employed upon the commodities of this land, whereby the kingdom's stock of treasure may be sure to be kept from being diminished by any overtrading of the foreigner," the words met with immense applause. In the same message to parliament, the lord chancellor was very outspoken in respect to the king's wish to enrich himself, formed, as he argued, with the ultimate object of enriching the nation. "Lastly," said Cardinal Morton, "because the king is well assured that you would not have him poor that wishes you rich, he doubteth not but that you will have care as well to maintain his revenues of customs and all other natures, as also to supply him with your loving aids if the case shall so require. The rather for that you know that the king is a good husband, and but a steward, in effect, for the public; and that what comes from you is but as moisture drawn from the earth, which gathers into a cloud, and falls back upon the earth again." If the eloquent lord chancellor's simile was correct, then England must have exhaled an enormous moisture of wealth in the quarter of a century of Henry VII. According to Lord Bacon, the "cloud" had gathered, at the death of the king, "the sum of near eighteen hundred thousand pounds sterling," which, at the present value of money, would amount to about thirty millions sterling—an almost fabulous mass of riches.

Restrictive as were most of the commercial laws of Henry, he yet did much for the advancement of international traffic, by concluding advantageous treaties with nearly all the countries having intercourse with England. These treaties show that there existed at the end of the fifteenth century a very considerable amount of trade with Denmark, the Hanse Towns, Sweden and Norway, the Low Countries, Spain, Portugal, and Italy. There were colonies of English merchants settled at the chief ports of all these countries, and the stipulation regarding their privileges, including their right to elect their own "governors" and "aldermen," form an important clause in all the agreements. But greater than with any other foreign state was the commercial intercourse of England with the Netherlands. The great and flourishing cities of the latter country—which was very much in the fifteenth what Great Britain became in the nineteenth century—were vast consumers of the important raw material, wool, sending in return various manufactured articles, such as clothing and arms; and to carry on this intercourse, numerous Flemish merchants were settled in England, as well as English merchants in the Netherlands. To all these, the temporary interruption of commerce, arising out of the imposture of Perkin Warbeck, and the encouragement given to him by the duchess of Burgundy, proved a serious blow. Henry commenced hostilities in 1493 by expelling all Flemish traders from the English dominions, whereupon the regent of the Netherlands, Archduke Philip, took reprisals, and banished all English subjects from his country. This absurd warfare, fatal to the best interests of both countries, lasted for nearly three years, when at last the subjects forced the sovereigns into peace. "By this time," so Lord Bacon tells the story, "the interruption of trade between the English and the Flemish began to pinch the merchants of both nations very sore; which moved them, by all means they could devise, to affect and dispose their sovereigns respectively to open the intercourse again, wherein time favoured them. For the archduke and his council began to see that Perkin would prove but a runagate and citizen of the world, and that it was the part of children to fall out about babies. And the king on his part, after the attempts upon Kent and Northumberland, began to have the business of Perkin in less estimation; so as he did not put it to account in any consultation of state. But that, which moved him most was, that being a king that loved wealth and treasure, he could not endure to have trade sick, nor any obstruction to continue in the gate vein which disperseth that blood. And yet he kept state so far, as first to be sought unto. Wherein the merchant adventurers likewise, being a strong company at that time, and well under-set with rich men and good order, did hold out bravely; taking off the commodities of the kingdom, though they lay dead upon their hands for want of vent. At the last, commissioners met at London to treat: on the king's part, Bishop Fox, lord privy seal; Viscount Wells; Kendal, prior of Saint John's; Warham, master of the rolls, who began to gain much upon the king's opinion; Urswick, who was almost over one; and Hilsey: on the archduke's part, the Lord Bevers, his admiral; the Lord Verunsel, president of Flanders, and others. These concluded a perfect treaty, both of amity and intercourse, between the king and the archduke, containing articles both of state, commerce, and free fishing." This treaty, long after known by the Flemings as the "intercursum magnus," was a remarkable instance of the power already acquired by the commercial interest at the end of the fifteenth century—a power sufficient to influence even so despotic a king as Henry VII., and strong enough to smother the flames of war.

Commerce might have been much more flourishing in Henry's time but for the heavy charges with which not only the imports, but, what was worse, even the exports were burthened. Originally, these dues—comprised under the term consuetudines, or regal taxes, which came to be changed into "customs"—amounted to three pence for every twenty shillings' worth of merchandize either imported or exported; yet in course of time these imposts were doubled and trebled. A new tax, called poundage, was granted by parliament to King Edward I.; and this, too, Henry VII. had raised from three pence to twelve pence, "to guard the seas and protect the ships from pirates." The claim was not a mere pretence of raising money, for the king, in reality, expended large sums in protecting commerce and gaining for England the mastery of the seas. He built, at a cost of fourteen thousand pounds sterling of the money of the time, a large armed vessel, called the "Great Harry," which came to be the first ship of that mighty fleet of war known subsequently as the Royal Navy. Previously, whenever the government required vessels for the defence of the coast, or other warlike purposes, the seaport towns had to furnish them, which arrangement did not always bring either the best ships or best men. In other respects Henry was exceedingly anxious to raise the honour of the English flag. He assisted Sebastian Cabot, a Venetian settled at Bristol, to fit out a vessel, and go westward across the Atlantic, in search of unknown continents. The result was the discovery of Newfoundland and adjacent territories on the continent of North America. A greater honour than this the king missed by the merest chance. Christopher Columbus, having in vain applied to various princes for aid to carry out his vast schemes, sent his own brother Bartholomew to Henry VII., in the year 1488, on the like mission. But the vessel in which Bartholomew sailed was attacked by pirates, and the unfortunate ambassador got captured and carried off to the African coast as a slave. When, after some years, he made his escape, and succeeded in reaching England, it was too late. Christopher Columbus had left Spain on the second of August, 1492, and was already on his way to the wonderful continent in the west. Thus narrowly did England miss the honour of the greatest maritime discovery of all ages.

The story of Cabot's voyage across the North Atlantic, ending in the discovery of Newfoundland, is quaintly told by Lord Bacon. "There was," he says, "one Sebastian Gabato, a Venetian, dwelling in Bristol, a man skilful and expert in cosmography and navigation. This man seeing the success, and emulating perhaps the enterprise of Christophorus Columbus, in that fortunate discovery towards the south-west which had been by him made some six years before, conceited with himself that lands might likewise be discovered towards the north-west. And, surely, it may be he had more firm and pregnant conjectures of it than Columbus had of this at the first. For the two great islands of the old and new world being, in the shape and making of them, broad towards the north and pointed towards the south, it is likely that the discovery first began where the lands did nearest meet. And there had been before that time a discovery of some lands, which they took to be islands, and were indeed the continent of America, towards the north-west. And it may be that some relation of this nature coming afterwards to the knowledge of Columbus, and by him suppressed—desirous rather to make his enterprise the child of his science and fortune than the follower of a former discovery—did give him better assurance that all was not sea, from the west of Europe and Africa unto Asia, than either Seneca's prophecy, or Plato's antiquities, or the nature of the tides and land-winds, and the like, which were the conjectures that were given out whereupon he should have relied: though I am not ignorant that it was likewise laid unto the casual and wind-beaten discovery, a little before, of a Spanish pilot who died in the house of Columbus. But this Gabato, bearing the king in hand, that he would find out an island endued with rich commodities, procured him to man and victual a ship at Bristol for the discovery of that island. with whom ventured also three small ships of London merchants, fraught with some gross and slight wares, fit for commerce with barbarous people. He sailed, as he affirmed at his return, and made a chart thereof, very far westwards, with a quarter of the north, on the north side of Terra de Labrador, until he came to the latitude of sixty-seven degrees and a half, finding the seas still open." In the patent granted to Sebastian Cabot and his three sons, the navigators were authorized by King Henry "to set up our banner in any town, castle, island, or continent of the countries so to be discovered by them; and such of the said towns, castles, or islands so found out and subdued by them, to occupy and possess, as our vassals, governors, lieutenants, and deputies." Henry VII., it thus appears, was the first monarch of England who conceived the idea of that vast colonial empire which, three centuries later, came to encircle the globe.

The discovery of America, together with the newly found passage round the Cape of Good Hope, had immediate results upon the commerce of England, which shared at least a part of the flood of riches which set in from the golden lands of both the east and the west. But while wealth kept fast increasing, particularly in the larger towns, the nation's prosperity gained not altogether, the policy of restriction, or, in modern language, of "protection," being by universal consent still acknowledged as the essence of governmental wisdom. So little, in fact, were the true laws of political economy understood, that the increase of precious metals, which naturally caused a corresponding increase in the price of commodities, was contemplated with great alarm. To guard against and check the rise in the value of English produce, the maximum price of most articles was fixed by law. The price of a yard of scarlet cloth was limited to twenty-six shillings—reducing money to the value of our time that of a yard of fine cloth to eighteen, and of a yard of coarse cloth to ten shillings. Even Lord Bacon, writing a century later, and in what must be considered a far more enlightened age, greatly applauds this ancient system of "protecting" trade and industry. "He also made," says the historian of Henry VII., "statutes for the maintenance of drapery and the keeping of wools within the realm; and not only so, but for stinting and limiting the prices of cloth, one for the finer and another for the coarser sort. Which I note, both because it was a rare thing to set prices by statute, especially upon our home commodities; and because of the wise model of this act, not prescribing prices, but stinting them not to exceed a rate, that the clothier might drape accordingly as he might afford." The last part of the sentence, meant no doubt seriously by the author, was yet full of sarcasm. It was the natural effect of all these restrictive laws that English produce became, not cheaper in quantity, but worse in quality; profits necessarily remained the same, but the standard of goods got lowered, "that the clothier might drape accordingly as he might afford." The evil effect of this legislation kept for a long time English manufacturing industry far behind that of the Continent; and Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds, and Liverpool remained unknown villages, while Antwerp, Ghent, Augsburg, and Venice were magnificent cities, radiating far and wide the outward light of higher forms of material civilization.

During the reign of Henry VIII. the commerce and industry of England made very considerable progress, in spite of the terrible despotism that was weighing upon the country and repressing the energies of the people. The long freedom from war which the realm had enjoyed under the rule of the first Tudor king, and the growing prosperity following in its train, developed peaceful pursuits in spite of all obstacles, the natural tendency of things being to raise English industry on a level with that of the neighbouring states on the continent of Europe. Like all tyrants, too, Henry was rather inclined to aid in the advance of merely material prosperity, a proof of which he gave soon after his accession to the throne by introducing gardening and the growing of vegetables from the Netherlands. Previously "roots" were all but unknown in England; there were no carrots, cabbages, potatoes, turnips, parsnips, radishes, or like vegetables, and Catherine of Arragon, when wishing to eat a dish of salad, the common supper of her native country, had to send for it to Antwerp. It was owing to this fact, and to his own attachment to the pleasures of the table, as to all other sensual gratifications, that Henry had gardeners brought over from the Low Countries, and also encouraged the traffic in sugar, spices, and different luxuries which Dutch and Portuguese vessels carried from the East. The great centre and mart of this trade was the city of Antwerp, now risen to the height of its wealth and prosperity, in consequence of the discovery of the new road to India around the Cape of Good Hope, which diverted the channel of eastern commerce away from Venice and towards Lisbon. The ships of the Portuguese merchants, joined in gradually increasing numbers with those of Dutch traders, had come to bring their valuable cargoes of spices, drugs, and other rich productions of East India, first to Lisbon, and then to Antwerp, as to an entrepot, or midway station, between the northern and southern parts of Europe. This led numerous English and German merchants to settle at Antwerp; and many of the manufacturers and traders of the wealthy city of Bruges also removed thither after the latter had been reduced into subjection and deprived of its principal privileges by the Archduke Maximilian, about the year 1500. Antwerp, on the other hand, was secured from interference by its ancient charters, confirmed by the successive rulers of the country, which, even after its subjection to Austria and Spain, left it a free city all but in name, enjoying the advantages of political connection with the masters of the new world west of the Atlantic, yet not suffering from their tyranny. Included in the privileges of Antwerp was the right of holding free fairs, subject to no fiscal supervision, and to which merchandize from all parts of the world could be brought without being liable to customs or other duties. Two of the fairs lasted six weeks each, and were attended by an immense concourse of traders from all parts of the globe, whose transactions were of vast importance, the value of the spices alone brought annually from Lisbon to Antwerp amounting to above a million of crowns. Of these spices England took but a small share previous to the accession of Henry VIII.; but it greatly increased subsequently, owing not a little to the example and encouragement of the luxury-loving monarch.

The enormous treasure left to Henry by his father allowed him not only to indulge freely in all the luxuries of the age procurable by money, and thus to give an indirect stimulus to commerce, but to satisfy his vanity and ambition in fields not dreamt of by his predecessors. Spurred alike by the desire to make himself a name among the kings of the age, and by the instigations of his royal father-in-law, who wished to drag him into a contest with France, Henry resolved, not long after the crown had fallen on his head, to lay the foundation of a permanent fleet of war by establishing a Navy Office under a Lord High Admiral, an institution hitherto unknown in England, and to construct as many armed vessels as his means would allow. To the first man-of-war of the royal navy, the "Great Harry," built by Henry VII., there was added, in June, 1511, a ship called the "Lion," captured from the Scottish captain, Andrew Barton; and the next year, 1512, Henry built his first ship, the "Regent," at Woolwich, where he had constructed a dockyard, chiefly under the superintendence and with the help of foreign artificers. The "Regent," of a burthen of one thousand tons, and carrying seven hundred soldiers, mariners, and gunners, was the largest man-of-war ever seen in England, and its construction served to raise the warlike mood of the young king to such an extent that he commenced the erection of fortifications at Gravesend and on the opposite Essex shore, so as to protect the new dockyard at Woolwich. Accompanied by seventeen other vessels, impressed, after the ancient fashion of marine warfare, from the Cinque Ports, the "Regent" left the Thames in the autumn of 1512, commanded by Admiral Sir Edward Howard, who had entered into a contract with the king for the victualling of the fleet. It was settled in this agreement that the fleet should carry three thousand men, "consisting of the eighteen captains of the ships, one thousand seven hundred and fifty soldiers, and one thousand two hundred and thirty-two mariners and gunners." The further arrangement was "the admiral to have, for the maintenance of himself in diet, and for wages and reward, ten shillings daily during the voyage; each captain to have one shilling and sixpence per day; and the soldiers, mariners, and gunners to have, per month of twenty-eight days, five shillings wages, and five shillings more for victuals." Finally, the admiral undertook "to manage the armament for the before-named allowances, he receiving three months' expense always beforehand: item, for the cost of every captain and soldier four shillings, and of every mariner and gunner one shilling and eight pence." The English fleet was, by a treaty which Henry had made with his royal father-in-law, to cruise along the coast of France on the Atlantic, while King Ferdinand's navy was to perform the same duty in the Mediterranean. Almost the only result of the enterprise was the blowing-up of the "Regent," with the whole of her crew, near Brest, a few months after leaving England. Thereupon the king, still undaunted, and with abundance of money in his treasury, ordered the building of another still larger man-of-war in place of the lost ship, calling the new vessel the "Henry Grace-de-Dieu."

Small as was the glory derived by the young king from his first naval undertaking, it yet led to important advantages for the nation. In connection with the desire for ship-building by which he was animated for the time, Henry established, in the same year in which the "Regent" was launched and lost, an institution destined to render the greatest and most lasting benefits to English commerce. This was the "Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford," which obtained by royal charter all the ancient rights and privileges formerly vested in "the shipmen and mariners of England," including the right of examining, licensing, and regulating pilots, of ordering and superintending the erection of beacons and lighthouses, and the placing of buoys, and of inquiring into the qualifications of captains and other officers of the merchant navy. Institutions subordinate to the Deptford Trinity House were subsequently formed at Hull and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and found to aid materially in the growth of the English merchant navy. "The three establishments," according to Richard Hakluyt, "were in imitation of that which had been erected at Seville, in Spain. The monarch of Spain, observing the many shipwrecks in the voyages to and from the West Indies, occasioned by the ignorance of seamen, established, at the Contractation House, lectures on navigation, and a pilot-major for the examination of other pilots and mariners; he also directed books on these subjects to be published for the use of his mariners." Being led by his spouse, on whom he yet hung with some affection, into intimate intercourse with Ferdinand the Catholic, Henry borrowed various other institutions from Spain, encouraging also, as far as was in his power, the trade of England in that direction. In 1514 he concluded a treaty of peace and commerce with Ferdinand, extending and renewing former agreements, with the additional clause, among others, "that in case the ships of either party shall thereafter chance to be wrecked on the coasts of the other party, the magistrates shall secure and sequester the merchandize and goods of such wreck for the proprietors, if within twenty months they shall make out their claim thereunto, and perishable merchandize shall be sold for the benefit of the right owners; but if no claim be made within twenty months, then the laws of the country where such wreck shall happen to regulate the disposal of the property." About a year after the signature of this treaty, Henry, or rather Wolsey, now commencing his career as virtual sovereign of the realm, concluded a commercial alliance with Charles, Ferdinand's successor on the throne of Spain, and ruler of the Netherlands, which gave some notable advantages to the trade of England with the Low Countries. The treaty stipulated "that the English, carrying their merchandize to Antwerp, shall not thereto be obliged to pay the tolls of Zealand; neither, when they carry their merchandize to Bergen-op-Zoom, or to Middelburg, shall they be obliged to pay the tolls of Brabant, but solely those of Zealand." It was also settled "that the merchants of either country shall not make any bye-laws and statutes among themselves for agreeing not to buy the goods of certain towns or persons of the other country; neither shall either side set a fixed price on the merchandize of the other side at their fairs and markets, but all persons shall be free on both sides to buy and sell as they best can." The clause was a first groping attempt to break through the endless obstacles and impediments of ancient commerce, imposed by the merchants themselves as much as by governments, and to launch into the open sea of free trade.

The increasing commerce of England in the earlier part of the reign of Henry VIII. led to a considerable immigration of foreign traders and artisans, which caused great dissatisfaction at some of the ports, particularly in the city of London, where the spirit of monopoly, abhorrent of competition and free intercourse between individuals and nations, had its strongest representatives in the numerous guilds and close corporations. The complaints against the foreigners were, according to Edward Hall, worthy city recorder and occasional court historiographer, "that there were such numbers of them employed as artificers that the English merchants had little to do, by reason the merchant strangers bring in all silks, cloths of gold, wine, oil, iron, and other goods, that no man almost buyeth of an Englishman; they also export so much wool, tin, and lead, that English adventurers can have no living. The foreigners also compass the city round about, in Southwark, Westminster, Temple Bar, Holborn, St. Martin's le Grand, St. John's Street, Aldgate, Tower Hill, and St. Catherine's, and they forestall the market, so that no thing for them cometh to the market, which are the causes that Englishmen want and starve while foreigners live in abundance and pleasure." A source of particular dislike to the good citizens were the natives of the Netherlands, their crimes, as stated in the charge-sheet of the recorder, consisting in bringing into England "iron, timber, and leather, ready manufactured, and nails, locks, baskets, cupboards, stools, tables, chests, girdles, saddles, and painted cloths." The hatred against the aliens kept on increasing for several years, till at last, on the 1st of May, 1517, it broke out into open tumult and riot. It was rumoured for some time before that an attack of the city apprentices upon the foreigners was being organized for this day; and to preserve the peace, Wolsey sent for the lord mayor on May-eve, making him responsible for the good behaviour of the king's lieges in London. But the storm had been brewing too long to be appeased by anything the poor lord mayor and his brother aldermen could do. On the morning of the day appointed by the rioters—called "Evil May Day" for generations after—a tumultuous crowd came rushing forth, with the cry of "Prentices! Prentices! Clubs! Clubs!" and after attacking the prisons and liberating the inmates, went to sack the houses of the obnoxious aliens, and of such of the natives as were known to be favourable to them, or as were known to possess a good deal of money. The tumult lasted till three o'clock the next morning when the authorities at last got the upper hand, arresting some three hundred of the leading rioters. Brought to trial, and found guilty of treason, they were all condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered; "for execution whereof," Hall records, "ten pairs of gallows were set up in divers parts of the city, as at Aldgate, Blanchapleton, Grass Street, Leadenhall, before each of the Compters, at Newgate, St. Martin's, at Aldersgate, and Bishopsgate, and these gallows were set upon wheels, to be removed from street to street, and from door to door, as the prisoners were to be executed." At the last moment, the bribe of a large sum of money, offered to Cardinal Wolsey by the friends of the condemned apprentices, saved the unfortunates from the gallows upon wheels, which claimed but one victim in the supposed chief instigator of the riot, a "broker," called Lincoln. The effect of this solitary hanging was sufficient, nevertheless, to give peace to the aliens settled in London for a long time to come.

Henry continued to encourage the immigration of foreign artisans and traders during the first twenty years of his reign, with the result of establishing a great many new arts and branches of industry in the country. As recorded in an old rhyme, of no authentic date, but probably referring to some period near 1524:—

"Turkeys, carp, hops, and beer, Came into England all in one year."

Turkeys, or, as they were long called, "guinea-cocks," found their way to England by the help of the Antwerp traders, who brought them from the east, and thriving very well, soon became favourite articles of consumption among the upper classes, every good dinner including "pig, veale, goose, and capon, and turkie well drest." The introduction of carp has been attributed to one Leonard Mascall, of Plumsted, in Sussex, who, says the author of the "English Worthies in Church and State," fetched them "from beyond sea," in all likelihood from Italy, where the priests kept large ponds stocked with the dainty fish, for food supply in Lent and on other so-called fast-days. The importation of hops and the use of the plant in the manufacture of fermented malt liquor was probably due to immigrants from Germany, where hopfields were common as early as the thirteenth century. In the breweries of the Netherlands, hops were employed from the beginning of the fourteenth century; and the Dutch, as well as the Germans, being great beer-drinkers, there were many regulations in force to produce the best possible article, such as the limitation to brew only during certain months in the winter. But notwithstanding the intimate connection with the Low Countries, the English refused to take kindly to the Dutch system of brewing, and for some time after the new plant had been introduced into the south-eastern counties, where it was found to grow luxuriously, there was a general outcry against its use, the people preferring the ancient ale, made of malt only, to beer manufactured with the addition of hops. Henry himself showed great aversion to the new-fangled liquor; and in an order respecting the servants of his household, issued in 1530, he strictly prohibited his brewers to put hops into ale. The common council of the city of London not long after petitioned parliament against the use of hops, "in regard that they would spoyl the taste of drinks and endanger the people." In spite of all this opposition, hops and beer, no less than turkeys and carp, became naturalized in England in the course of less than a generation, the force of usefulness, in these as in other cases, overthrowing fashion, public taste, and national habits.

The constant immigration of foreigners into England, mostly Protestant refugees, embracing the most intelligent of the industrial classes of France, Germany, and the Netherlands, though it visibly raised the prosperity of the country, was not effected without the greatest opposition on the part of the old conservative guilds and trading societies. Some of these, such as the clothworkers and the pewterers of London, were most persevering in petitioning from year to year king and parliament to stop the influx of aliens, and the introduction of new inventions and discoveries; the argument being the same as that of the common council against hops, that they "endangered the people." The example of London was liberally followed by other towns, such as the old borough of Bridport, in Dorsetshire, the energetic inhabitants of which went a step further than those of the capital, by including under the term "foreigners" not only alien-born persons, but all people dwelling beyond the borough boundaries. In 1530 the men of Bridport sent a long petition to parliament, beginning with the statement "that the people of this town have, out of time that no man's mind is to the contrary, used to make most part of all the great cables, hawsers, ropes, and all other tackling, as well for the royal ships and navy as for the most part of all other ships within the realm, by reason whereof this town was right well maintained;" and ending with the grievous complaint "that the people of the adjacent parts to this town have set up making cables, hawsers, ropes, and other tackling," and that as a result thereof the ancient borough "is like to be utterly decayed." The petition was successful, and parliament in its wisdom made a law—the 21 Henry VIII. cap. 12—enacting "that all hemp growing within five miles of Bridport shall be sold nowhere but in that town," and "that no persons, other than such as shall dwell and inhabit the said town, shall make, out of the said town, any cables, hawsers, rope, and other tackling made of hemp, in any other place or places, within the said distance of five miles from the said town." In the same year in which this extraordinary act was passed, the city of London obtained a decree of the Star Chamber, stating "that the realm is overrun with foreign manufacturers," and "that foreigners export bacon, cheese, powdered beef, mutton, and other articles, whereby great portions of corn and victuals grown and bred within the realm are consumed." In consequence of this statement a proclamation was issued by the king, putting new duties upon imports and exports, to the great delight of the far-seeing merchants and citizens of London.

Wolsey's fall and the matrimonial calamities of King Henry had an ill effect upon English trade and industry, both in checking commercial enterprise and increasing the brutal weight of the most unenlightened despotism that had ever pressed upon the nation. Labouring under the impression that the Flemish merchants and artisans settled in London and other parts of the kingdom sympathized with his injured wife, Henry drove away a great number of them, and, besides, issued an edict prohibiting the export of coin, and ordering all foreign traders "that no money they took for selling their wares should be exchanged to other countries, but should be employed in the commodities of the realm." This decree was published in 1531, and the year after the king issued a fresh proclamation, ordering that foreign wines should be imported in English ships only, and by English masters and mariners, and settling at the same time the price of these wines. "None shall sell," the ordinance ran, "any French wine above eight pence per gallon, or one penny per pint, nor Malmssey, Sack, Rumney, or other sweet wines, above twelve pence per gallon." Getting more and more into the old despotic way of "encouraging trade," Henry, the next year, 1533, drew up a statute—24 Henry VIII. cap. 3—commanding the sale of all kinds of meat at fixed prices, beef and pork at a halfpenny, and mutton and veal at three farthings a pound. The law was very effective in saving beasts and killing butchers. In a survey of London, made shortly after, it was found that the total number of butchers within the city and all its suburbs did not amount to above eighty, and that they did not slaughter more than thirty-three thousand oxen a year, thus giving but a modest allowance of "the roast beef of old England" to each citizen. However, the scarcity of butchers, if not of oxen, did not discourage Henry to continue in his course of legislation, and not being able to cheapen beef and mutton one way, he tried another. In 1534 parliament was ordered to pass a statute—25 Henry VIII. cap. 13—limiting the number of sheep which each man was allowed to possess. The preamble to this statute, after dwelling on the bad habit "of engrossing great number of sheep in one man's hands," and of "enhancing the prices of all manner of corn, cattle, wool, pigs, geese, hens, chickens, and eggs, by reason whereof a marvellous multitude of people be not able to provide meat and clothes for themselves and their families," went on to state that "some now have twenty-four thousand, some twenty thousand, and some five thousand to ten thousand sheep, whereby a good sheep that used to be sold for two shillings and four pence, or three shillings at most, is now sold for six shillings, or five shillings, or four shillings at least, which things tend to the decay of hospitality and to the diminishing of the people." In consequence it was enacted that "none shall keep above two thousand four hundred sheep, exclusive of lambs, at any one time, unless it be on his own lands of inheritance," and that "no man shall hold above two farms, in the parish of one of which two he shall be obliged to live and reside himself." The law was well designed to put a stop to farming in general, and sheep-farming in particular.

The restrictive tyranny of the legislation of Henry VIII. bearing upon industry and commerce, got to its height in the last ten or twelve years of his reign, encouraged quite as much by popular ignorance concerning the true laws of political economy as by his own despotic tendencies. A general decay of trade having become visible, many towns, districts, and counties demanded, after the example of Bridport, to have the monopoly of certain manufactures, which demands were nearly always granted. In 1534 a petition was sent to parliament from the city of Worcester, and the towns of Evesham, Droitwich, Kidderminster, and Bromsgrove, representing "that the said city and towns were, in times past, well and substantially inhabited, and employed in the manufacture of woollen cloths, until within a few years past, when divers persons, dwelling in the hamlets, thorps, and villages of the said shire, have not only engrossed and taken into their hands sundry farms, and become graziers and husbandmen, but have also begun to make all manner of cloaths, and exercise weaving, fulling, and shearing within their own houses, to the great depopulation of the said city and towns." Thereupon parliament enacted, by statute 25 Henry VIII. cap. 18, "that no person within Worcestershire shall make any cloth but the proper inhabitants of the city of Worcester, and the towns of Evesham, Droitwich, Kidderminster, and Bromsgrove, excepting persons who make cloths solely for their own and family's wearing." In the following year, 1535, it was decreed by statute, in view of interfering with the growing decay of trade and industry, "that whereas great numbers of houses have of a long time been in ruins in the city of Norwich; also in Lynn Bishop, in Norfolk, and in Nottingham, Shrewsbury, Gloucester, Ludlow, Bridgnorth, Queenborough, and Northampton, many of which ruins, filled with nastiness, are in the principal streets of those towns, where in times past have been beautiful dwelling-houses well inhabited," therefore the owners were ordered to rebuild them within a fixed time, "or else the property to go to the lord of the manor, or to the communities of the said city and towns." A still more arbitrary statute, reaching the acme of absurdity in the absolute hopelessness of meeting with obedience, was issued the following year, directing of what length and breadth the linen fabrics called "lockrams" and "dowlas," manufactured in Brittany, should be made. On the French manufacturers refusing to obey this law, the commerce in their articles naturally came to a standstill, and the result was great injury to the English woollen trade, vast quantities of cloth having been annually sent to Brittany in exchange for the linens, and the exports ceasing all at once. The momentary distress inflicted upon weavers, tuckers, spinners, dyers, and wool-pickers, became so great as to force parliament to retrace its steps; and by an act of the 28 Henry VIII. cap. 4, the obnoxious statute was repealed, leaving the stubborn foreigners once more at liberty to shape their commodities according to their own taste.

There was very little wanting at this period to exterminate altogether the oldest and only manufacture of importance of which England could boast, that of woollen fabrics. Established by the wisdom of Edward III., who availed himself of some discontents among the Flemish artisans to invite them over into England, the manufacture had been comparatively flourishing hitherto, being equally spread all over the country, and employing a great number of persons, most of them dividing their time between agricultural labour and spinning and weaving. The trade continued to progress till the middle of the reign of Henry VIII., increasing so much in the eastern counties, that at some riots which took place in 1525, more than four thousand weavers were reported to have assembled out of Sudbury, Ianeham, and other towns of Suffolk. To this prosperity the monstrously repressive government of the latter part of Henry's reign, his despotic ravings, wholesale murders, and gross financial extortions put an abrupt check. Many of the most intelligent foreign artisans and manufacturers left England; others were driven away, and Lutheran and Huguenot merchants objected to risk their lives in a visit to a country where there existed no other law but the will of a madman. Thus the stream of trade and commerce kept turning away from England; and while half the towns of the kingdom were falling into ruins, the great cities of Germany and the Netherlands continued to rise in wealth and power, Antwerp, among others, erecting for itself a magnificent exchange, with the grand inscription in letters of gold on the frontispiece: "In usum negociatorum cujuscunque nationis ac lingue,"—for the use of merchants of all nations and all languages. In the same year in which the Antwerp exchange was opened by the enlightened Flemish traders, parliament, at the behest of the king, took another step towards driving the woollen manufacture out of England. By the statute 34 & 35 Henry VIII. cap. 10, the people of Yorkshire, who had come to be most expert weavers, taking to themselves a very important branch of the trade, that of the manufacture of blankets and other bed coverings, were forbidden to exercise their business any longer, unless belonging to one of the guilds or corporations of the city of York. As ground for this merciless prohibition, the preamble of the statute set forth "that York city had been formerly supported by sundry handicrafts, and most principally by making of coverlets and coverings for beds, whereby great number of inhabitants and poor people in that city and suburbs, and in other places of the county, have been constantly employed. But that of late years sundry evil-disposed persons, and apprentices not expert in that occupiers have withdrawn themselves out of that city into the county; and divers other persons, inhabiting the villages and towns of that county, and nigh to the said city, have intermeddled with the said craft, and do daily make coverlets, neither of good stuff nor proper size, and sell them abroad in the county, to villages and men's houses, to the king's subjects." It was therefore enacted, under heavy penalties, "that no person whatever, within or nigh to the county of York, shall make any coverlets for sale, but inhabitants alone dwelling within the city of York and its suburbs."

The last years of the rule of Henry VIII. were marked by the issue of several statutes singularly befitting the termination of such a reign. They tried to enforce the rebuilding of the depopulated cities and towns of the kingdom, showing that more than two-thirds of them had fallen into ruins, one of the statutes enumerating no less than fifty-eight of such places. This act, after the usual preamble, now getting very common, "that whereas, in times past, many beautiful houses have been within the walls and liberties," enumerated as "fallen down and decayed," York, Lincoln, Canterbury, Coventry, Bath, Chichester, Salisbury, Winchester, Bristol, Scarborough, Hereford, Colchester, Portsmouth, Poole, Rochester, Lynn, Feversham, Worcester, Stafford, Buckingham, Pontefract, Grantham, Exeter, Ipswich, Southampton, Great Yarmouth, Oxenford, Great Wycombe, Guildford, Stafford, Kingston-upon-Hull, Beverley, Bedford, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Leicester, Berwick, Shafton, Sherborne, Bridport, Dorchester, Weymouth, Plympton, Barnstable, Plymouth, Tavistock, Dartmouth, Lancaster, Liskeard, Bodmin, Truro, Lestwithiel, Helston, Bridgwater, Somerton, Alcester, Taunton, and Warwick. In all these cities and towns, the act stated, "many houses are now fallen down and decayed, and at this time remain unre-edified as desolate and vacant grounds, many of them nigh adjoining to the high streets, replenished with much uncleanness and filth, with pits, cellars, and vaults lying open and uncovered, to the great peril of the king's subjects, and other houses are in danger of falling." The statute, though threatening fines and forfeitures of all sorts, had naturally little or no effect; nor had another, published the year after, enumerating a second list of decayed cities and towns, with repetition of some old names. The new list included "the cities of Canterbury and Rochester, the towns of Stamford and Grimsby in Lincolnshire, the towns of Cambridge, Darby, Guildford, Dunwich, the towns of the Cinque Ports with their members, Lewes in Sussex, and Buckingham," with several others, all which, the act stated "are now fallen down, decayed, and remain unre-edified, lying desolate, with much ordure, filth," and so forth. In the wake of this followed one more statute—35 Henry VIII. cap. 4—enumerating as "fallen down and decayed" the cities and towns of "Shrewsbury, Chester, Ludlow, Haverfordwest, Pembroke, Tenby, Caermarthen, Montgomery, Cardiff, Swansea, Cowbridge, New Radnor, and Presteing in Radnorshire, Brecknock, Monmouth, Malden in Essex, Abergavenny, Uske, Caerleon, Newport, Lancaster, Preston, Lyrepool [Liverpool], and Wigan, in Lancashire." In the same year that this act, last certificate of the utterly ruinous condition of the trade and industry of the kingdom, and the annihilation of all prosperity among the people, was published, Henry granted a licence to two Florentine merchants to bring into England, "for the pleasure of us and our dearest wife, the queen," a number of costly articles of luxury, including, in wide margin, "all manner of goldsmith's work of gold and silver; all manner of skins and furs, and of sables; all manner of cloths of tissue of gold, silver, tinsel, velvet, and silks, and cloths of tapestry and arras, mixed with gold and silver; and all sorts of fringes and lace, wrought with gold and silver." To pay for his fineries, the king borrowed a hundred thousand florins from Anthony Fugger, a banker and money-lender of Augsburg, descendant of a poor weaver, who had settled in the old German city at the end of the fourteenth century. From his own subjects Henry VIII. could raise no more money: they had nothing left to give but their heads.

There was an attempt during the first part of the short reign of Edward VI., while the Protector held the reins of government, to upset the pernicious legislation of Henry VIII., but it had little effect, owing to the obstinacy and ignorance of the old monopolising bodies, to overcome which he had neither time nor strength. By a statute of the second year of Edward, certain descriptions of artisans, especially "all manner of workmen relating to building of houses," were allowed to use their hands and brains independent of trades' unions and companies, or, as expressed in the act, "to follow their occupations in all cities and towns corporate, although they do not live therein, nor are free of such corporations." This liberal law gave rise to such a howl from the guilds of the capital, that it had to be repealed in their favour in little more than a year, by statute of 3 & 4 Edward VI. cap. 20. The preamble of the act of repeal stated, very significantly, "that the city of London being the king's chamber, and most ancient city of this realm, the artificers and craftsmen of the arts, crafts, and mysteries of the same are at great costs and charges, as well in bearing and paying of taxes, tallages, subsidies, scot, lot, and other charges, as well to the King's Majesty as to the said city, and at many and sundry triumphs and other times for the King's honour;" it therefore could not be permitted that "foreigners," that is non-freemen, "should come and work among them, contrary to their ancient privileges," with the certain result of leading to "a great decay of cunning, and an impoverishment and driving away of the freemen, being artificers of the crafts, arts, and mysteries within the said city of London, to the great hurt and destruction of the said city." London having gained its object, the corporations of all the other cities and towns of the kingdom insisted upon having the same favour shown to them, the most decayed of them crying the loudest; and there remained nothing for the weak government but to sanction the entire repeal of the free-trade law. However, in other ways the advisers of Edward VI. did their best to raise the trade and prosperity of the realm, chiefly by encouraging the settlement of foreign Protestant immigrants, the flower of the industrial classes of the west European countries. "This young prince," says Adam Anderson, describing the support given to industry by Edward VI., "through his own inclination, and the advice of Archbishop Cranmer, furnished great assistance to persecuted foreign Protestants, many thousands of whom settled in various parts of England, but principally at London, Southwark, Canterbury, Sandwich, Maidstone, Southampton, Norwich, and Colchester, where they had the free exercise of their religion in separate congregations, and where manufactures were so greatly cultivated and improved by their means as not only to enrich those places where they were settled, but to prove very beneficial to the whole kingdom. In the short persecuting reign of Queen Mary, those poor people were forced again to fly beyond sea, though at her death they returned to their old habitations. They consisted of Walloons, Germans, French, Italians, Polanders, and Swiss, and there was in those times even a congregation of Protestant Spaniards in London."

By far the most important measure of the reign of Edward VI., affecting the foreign commerce of England, was the breaking up of the monopoly and destruction of privileges of the powerful association of Hanse Towns merchants, established in London for several centuries under the title of the "Steelyard Company." Though originally of some advantage to the country, by establishing intercourse with distant nations, such as Russia and Turkey, whose trade was more directed towards Germany than England, the association had become, during the whole of the sixteenth century, a monopolizing body far more hurtful than beneficial, and many efforts had been made in consequence to overthrow the privileges of the foreigners. These proved successful at last in the year 1552, in consequence of pressing remonstrances made to the privy council by an influential corporation of London merchants, known as the "English Company of Merchant Adventurers." The "Adventurers," old rivals of the "Steelyard" traders, accused the latter of, first, "defrauding the customs, by colouring, or taking under their own names, as they paid little or no duties, great quantities of the merchandize of other foreigners not entitled to their immunities;" secondly, of "having frequently exceeded the bounds of even the great privileges granted to them by our kings, and having, by the force of great presents, purchased new grants from time to time;" thirdly, of "trading in a body, and by that means underselling and ruining others;" fourthly, of "setting what prices they pleased both on their imports and exports, and, through having the command of all the markets in England, with joint or united stocks, keeping out and breaking all other merchants;" fifthly, of "having reduced, by sole command of the markets, the price of English wool to one shilling and sixpence per stone;" sixthly, of "growing in power, shown by having exported, in the year 1550, no fewer than forty-four thousand woollen cloths of all sorts, whilst the whole of the English merchants together had, in the same year, exported but one thousand one hundred cloths;" and, seventhly, of "importing and exporting all their goods in foreign bottoms, and thereby, being exempt from aliens' duties, causing a great loss to the nation." Minor charges, not formulated, were that the Hanseatic merchants imported too much foreign grain, to the depression of the English corn market, as well as large quantities "not necessary" of linen cloth, flax, steel, hemp, cordage, and naval stores. Utterly unreasonable as were many of the points brought forward as accusations, and, what was still more absurd, as charges formulated by rivals in trade—the "Merchant Adventurers" being possessed of a great part of the trade with the Netherlands, keeping offices at Antwerp, and hankering after privileges as large as those of their "Steelyard" competitors—the assault nevertheless was effective, mainly through being backed by the whole strength of the agricultural interest, the corn-growers as well as the wool-growers. Aiming at the good of the people in all their endeavours, the advisers of the young king could not shut their eyes to the fact, superseding every other, that the monopoly of the Hanse Towns merchants was hurtful to the true interests of the nation, and they decided accordingly.

The decision of the government, given after a long and patient investigation, was embodied in an order of the privy council, confiscating the privileges of the "Steelyard Company," on five distinct legal and technical grounds. They were, first, "that all the liberties and privileges claimed by, or pretended to be granted by the merchants of the Hanse are void by the laws of this realm, forasmuch as the said merchants have no sufficient corporation to receive the same;" secondly, "that such grants and privileges claimed by them do not extend to any persons or towns certain, and therefore it is uncertain what persons, or which towns, should or ought to enjoy the said privileges; by reason of which uncertainty the merchants have admitted and do admit to be of their freedom and immunities whom and as many as they list, to the great prejudice of the king's customs;" thirdly, "that if and supposing the pretended grants were good in law, as indeed they are not, yet the same were made on condition that they should not colour any other foreigner's merchandize, as by sufficient proof they have done;" fourthly, "that above one hundred years after the pretended privileges granted to them, they used to transport no merchandize out of this realm but only into their own countries, neither did they import any merchandize but from their own countries: whereas at present they do not only convey English merchandize into the Netherlands, and there sell them, to the great damage of the king's own subjects, but they do also import merchandize of all foreign countries, contrary to the true intent and meaning of their privileges;" and, fifthly, "that in King Edward the Fourth's time they had forfeited their pretended privileges, in consequence of war between the realm and the Hanse Towns, whereupon a treaty was made stipulating that our English subjects should enjoy the like privileges in Prussia and other Hanseatic parts, and that no new exactions should be laid on their persons or goods, which treaty has been much broken in several parts, and especially at Dantzick, where no redress could ever be obtained, either by the requests of the king's father or himself, for the said wrongs." In consideration of all which circumstances and reasons, the privy council of Edward decreed "that the privileges, liberties, and franchises claimed by the merchants of the Steelyard, shall from henceforth be and remain seized, and resumed into the king's grace's hands, until the said merchants of the Steelyard shall declare and prove better and more sufficient matter for their claims: saving, however, to the said merchants all such liberty of coming into this realm and trafficking in as ample manner as any merchant-strangers have within the same." The decree settled the fate of the most remarkable mercantile organization that had yet been established in England. With their privileges, particularly the customs' exemptions, taken away, the great Steelyard Company dwindled down rapidly; and though the Hanseatic traders continued to import considerable quantities of grain, hemp, and linen cloth, their exports fell to such an extent that before the century had come to an end the "forty-four thousand woollen cloths of all sorts," which they were in the habit of sending annually abroad, were despatched no more by them but by English firms, a good share passing through the hands of the "Merchant Adventurers."

The policy which dictated the withdrawal of the Steelyard monopoly, and the attempt to break through the obstructive privileges of some of the ancient guilds, entirely ceased in the latter part of the reign of Edward VI., after the death of the Protector, and gave way to repressive measures. In 1552 and 1553 several acts of parliament were passed, in imitation of those of Henry VIII., regulating certain occupations, fixing prices, and otherwise interfering with the free exercise of trade and industry. One of the most notable of these was the statute of 7 Edward VI. cap. 5, which not only settled the cost of wine imported for the benefit of the king's lieges, but the number of houses in each town or city where they might consume it, and all but the quantity which each man, from a Duke's son down to a charcoal-burner, should be allowed to take and swallow. It was stated in the preamble of the statute that it was enacted "for the avoiding of many inconveniences, and much evil rule," arising from "many taverns of late set up in back lanes, corners, and suspicious places, both in London and other towns and villages," the condition of which was to be improved, in the first instance, by the somewhat singular remedy of making wine very cheap. By the first clause of the act the prices of wines were fixed, as "Gascony and Guienne at eight pence per gallon, Rochelle at four pence per gallon," and others in proportion; with the final limitation that "no wine of any kind shall be sold at a higher price than twelve pence per gallon, on forfeiture of five pounds." The next clause ordered that "none but such a one as can spend one hundred marks of yearly rent, or else is worth one thousand marks, or else shall be the son of a duke, marquis, earl, viscount, or baron of the realm, shall have or keep in his house any vessel of the said wines for his family's use exceeding ten gallons, on forfeiture of ten pounds." It was enacted in the third clause that no wine should be sold without a licence, and that, moreover, such licensed taverns should exist "only in cities, towns corporate, burghs, port towns, or market towns, or in the towns of Gravesend, Sittingborn, Tuxford, and Bagshot, on forfeiture of ten pounds." Besides, the statute ordered, "there shall only be two taverns for retailing of wine in every city or town, except in London, which may have forty taverns; in York, eight taverns; in Norwich, four; in Westminster, three; in Bristol, six; in Lincoln, three; in Hull, four; in Shrewsbury, three; in Exeter, four; in Salisbury, three; in Gloster, four; in West-Chester, four; in Hereford, three; in Worcester, three; in Southampton, three; in Canterbury, four; in Ipswich, three; in Oxford, three; in Cambridge, four; in Colchester, three; in Newcastle upon-Tyne, four." A final clause of the act willed that "merchants may use in their own houses, but not to sell, such wines as they shall import; also high sheriffs, magistrates of cities and towns, and inhabitants of fortified towns, may keep vessels of wine for their own consumption only." According to the surmises of a contemporary chronicler, the statute was directed against "those especially who adhered to the old religion," pointing to a direct connection between wine and the belief in celibacy, mass, and transubstantiation.

The close of the reign of Edward VI. was distinguished by the commencement of a noble enterprise, destined to exercise considerable influence upon the commerce of England. On the 10th of May, 1553, two months before the decease of the young king, three small vessels, the "Bona Esperanza," of one hundred and twenty tons, the "Edward Bonaventure," of one hundred and sixty tons, and the "Bona Confidentia," of ninety tons, sailed slowly down the River Thames, saluting the dying monarch as they passed Greenwich. The three vessels were despatched by a singular association, calling itself the "Mysterie and Companie of the Merchant Adventurers for the Discoverie of Regions, Dominions, Islands, and Places unknown;" and their object in the first instance was nothing less than to discover a north-east passage to ancient Cathay, or China. The originator of the scheme and governor of the society was the greatest seaman of the age, the discoverer of the northern shores of America, Sebastian Cabot, who, at the ripe old age of seventy-six, was bent, with juvenile energy, upon an undertaking which he hoped would throw glory upon the English name. It was an exalted purpose, and the more so as England had not treated Sebastian Cabot well. After sailing twice westward across the Atlantic, discovering "land which no man before had attempted," the bold and genial mariner was left to poverty and neglect, and had to seek bread in foreign countries, the death of Henry VII. taking away his principal friend and protector, and every chance of carrying out the great enterprises which were the dream of his imagination. There was no room for men like Cabot in the realm of Henry VIII., so he made his way to Spain, where he was courteously received, nominated superintendent of harbours in 1518, and subsequently, in 1526, appointed to the command of a fleet to the Moluccas, with which he entered the Rio de la Plata, opening up unknown districts to European trade. But though treated with the highest regard, and most handsomely rewarded by the Spanish government, Cabot's heart yearned for his own country, and he returned to England immediately after the accession of Edward VI., who at the instance of the duke of Somerset, granted him a pension, with the post of "pilot-major," involving a general supervision over maritime affairs. Being exceedingly gentle in manners, Sebastian Cabot soon became a great favourite of the young king, to whom he explained the variations of the needle, with many other scientific and geographical subjects, and finally induced him to take a warm interest in the great project he had cherished for years, that of reaching China by sailing to the north-east, around the Scandinavian peninsula and Russia. The consequence was the rise, under royal sanction and patronage, of the "Mystorie and Companie of the Merchant Adventurers for the Discoverie of Regions, Dominions, Islands, and Places unknown."

Vast as were the objects of the society, its capital in money was of the smallest, being no more than six thousand pounds, divided into two hundred and forty shares, of twenty-five pounds each. Cabot's genius, however, made up, as far as genius could do, for the want of funds in the great enterprise, for he personally superintended the fitting out of the three little vessels which were to make their way to China through the northern polar seas, had them sheathed with metal, so as to withstand the destructive attacks of worms, common to the warm latitudes which it was believed they would reach, and in his attention to details went so far as to teach every seaman engaged for the expedition his duties, not only technical but moral. With simple and affectionate earnestness he impressed upon all the importance of personal purity and conscientious discharge of duty, and the necessity of being manly and upright in their intercourse with the inhabitants of the distant countries which they were going to explore, warning them especially not to provoke them by disdain or contempt, but to treat them "with all gentleness and courtesie." The fame and bright example of the old sailor-hero had the effect of rallying round him some of the best and bravest seamen of England, thus enabling him to appoint a picked body of mariners as crew and officers of the three small ships which he started on the perilous voyage towards the north pole. To the command-in-chief of the expedition he nominated Sir Hugh Willoughby, scion of an ancient and illustrious family, one of the members of which had filled the office of lord chief justice in the reign of Edward III. Willoughby received the title of "captain-general of the fleet," while under him, as "pilot-general," served Richard Chancellor, a very remarkable man, of whose future exploits the English nation found reason to be proud. Thus equipped, the tiny squadron set sail, Willoughby on board the "Bona Esperanza," Chancellor in the "Edward Bonaventure," and an experienced seaman, Cornelius Durforth, as captain of the third and smallest vessel, the "Bona Confidentia." Both Willoughby and Chancellor carried with them letters of recommendation of Edward VI., written in Greek and Latin, and addressed to the "kings, princes, and potentates inhabiting the north-east parts of the world towards the mighty empire of Cathay." The poor boy-king looked down dreamingly from his palace at Greenwich as the ships of the little fleet went sailing by on the bright May morning, dipping their colours into the water—perhaps dreaming of far-away sunny Cathay —or of that unknown land, distant and near, sunny and dark, the gate of which his faltering steps had reached.

Eight weeks after the sailing of the fleet, King Edward died; and the very same night, during a tremendous storm and uproar of the elements, the "Edward Bonaventure" parted company with the other two vessels off the Loffoden Isles, on the north-western coast of Norway. Icy gales from the arctic regions continued blowing for months after, opposing the progress of the bold explorers; nevertheless Willoughby, in the "Bona Esperanza," accompanied by the tiny vessel of Cornelius Durforth, bravely pushed onward to the east, until their crews were utterly exhausted. By the middle of September the elements had vanquished their brave hearts, and on the 18th of the month they ran for shelter into a small haven on the coast of Russian Lapland, formed by the mouth of the river Arzina, a district inhabited only by wandering Finnish tribes during a short time in the summer. The season being too far advanced to allow further progress, Willoughby and Durforth resolved upon spending the winter on the inhospitable coast, hoping to meet with some of the natives, so as to be able to procure supplies of food and fuel. But their hopes were doomed to be vain. After fruitless expeditions in all directions, ineffectual in discovering any trace of human life, the courageous navigators had to sit down in such huts as they could build on the ice-bound coast—to sit down never to rise again. The following summer some Russian fishermen found Sir Hugh Willoughby in his cabin, stiff and stark, and around him seventy dead bodies, killed by hunger and cold, yet looking grand and daring even in death. In the meantime, while the explorers of the "Bona Esperanza" and "Bona Confidentia" were perishing on the coast of Lapland, Richard Chancellor, in the "Edward Bonaventure," pushed onward to the east, and succeeded in getting into the Bay of St. Nicholas, or White Sea, a part of the northern ocean where no European, or any other ship, had ever been seen before. Steering southward now, he found his way to the mouth of the great river Dvina, and to the castle of Novo Dvinsk, which, a century after, grew into the city of Archangel. The commander of the castle received the English adventurers, who came upon him like apparitions from the clouds, in the most courteous and hospitable manner, and on the demand of Chancellor, furnished him with sledges and horses to visit the great Czar Ivan Basilowitch at Moscow. Ivan, a bold, energetic man and able warrior, had dim notions of his kingdom hanging on to the skirts of Europe, the far west of his immense dominions, called Britain, and learning from his new visitor that paid tribute to the name of Edward, he allowed himself to be persuaded to enter into a treaty of friendship and commerce with his brother monarch. The treaty, brought home by Richard Chancellor in the summer of 1554, laid the foundation of a new important phase of industrial activity for England, in the direct trade with Russia. Czar Ivan's treaty with Edward VI., made when the young king had been dead six months, was ratified by his successor, but not with much goodwill.

Queen Mary was too busy in extirpating heresy, and harassing non-believers in the mass, to have time for encouraging trade and industry; and whatever she did towards it was chiefly in obedience to the wishes of her Spanish and German relatives, and of the man before whom she was crouching with insane passion. Soon after her accession, she restored, on a hint from Kaiser Charles, the privileges of the merchants of the Steelyard; and the interest of the Hanseatics being opposed to the establishment of a direct trade between England and Russia, Chancellor and his friends, chief among them old Sebastian Cabot, had much trouble in prosecuting their schemes directed towards this object. After the immense difficulties and dangers encountered in the last expedition, Cabot himself seemed to doubt whether the empire of Cathay and the shores of India could be reached by the road to the north-east; and to make the best of the success that had been achieved, it was resolved by his advice to change the "Mysterie and Companie of the Merchant Adventurers for the Discoverie of Regions, Dominions, Islands, and Places unknown" into a simple "Russia Company." The opposition of the Steelyard traders having been overcome through the active help of some of Cabot's influential patrons, shareholders in his undertaking, which was the more effective on account of the utter apathy of the queen to everything relating to trade and industry, the new company finally obtained a royal charter allowing them to carry out their designs. The preamble of the charter, dated the 6th of February, 1555, set forth "that the marquis of Winchester, lord high treasurer, the earl of Arundel, lord steward of the Queen's household, the earl of Bedford, lord privy seal, the earl of Pembroke, Lord Howard of Effingham, lord high admiral, and others named, "had already fitted out ships for discoverie northward and north-eastward to lands and seas not as yet frequented by any Christian monarch," and that "one of the said ships arrived safe and wintered in the dominions of our cousin and brother Lord Ivan Basilowitch, emperor of all Russia, who entertained them honourably and granted them letters to us, with license freely to traffic in his country, and other privileges under his signet." In consequence, the royal charter assigned to the association "full liberty to resort not only to all parts of the Emperor's dominions, but to all other parts not known to our subjects," ordering likewise that "none but such as shall be free of, or licensed by the company shall frequent the parts aforesaid, under forfeiture of ships and merchandise, one half to the crown, and one half to the company." The administration of the Russia Company was vested by the same charter in a governor and "twenty-eight of the most sedate, discreet, and honest fellows, four of whom to be called consuls, and the other twenty-four to be called assistants," the appointment as first governor for life being given to Sebastian Cabot. The veteran explorer, one of the true sea-kings of the British Isles, did not enjoy the small honour thus bestowed upon him very long, departing life before the end of Mary's reign, at the full age of four score years. In death, as in life, England was ungrateful to one of the noblest of her sons. No pen recorded the place of sepulture of the discoverer of America.

The foundation of the Russia Company was the almost solitary instance of a good or useful act of the reign of Mary, which otherwise proved as fatal to the development of trade and industry as the most pernicious years of the rule of Henry VIII. Not content with stifling the inner life of the nation under a hideous religious persecution, the priests into whose hands the government of the realm had fallen repressed all healthful physical energy by laws of the most arbitrary kind, which seemed as if designed to make an end of England as an industrial country, and turn it into a quiescent paradise of monks. One of the first parliamentary decrees of Mary laid heavy duties, much higher than those of the preceding reign, upon all imports and exports; another re-established various ancient monopolies, such as that of the Steelyard Company; and several more put a bridle upon whole classes of the industrial population, and upon buyers as well as sellers of goods. By 1 and 2 Mary cap. 2, it was enacted that "whosoever shall wear silk in or upon his hat, bonnet, girdle, scabbard, hose, shoes, or spur-leather, shall be imprisoned for three months, and forfeit ten pounds, excepting magistrates of corporations and persons of higher rank; and if any person knowing his servant to offend against this law, do not put him forth of his service within fourteen days, or shall retain him again, he shall forfeit one hundred pounds." Another statute, 1 and 2 Mary cap. 7, prohibited, under heavy penalties, "linen-draper, woollen-draper, haberdashers, grocers, and mercers, not free of any city, burgh, or corporation town, and living in the open country, out of the said cities and towns, from vending their wares in the said cities and towns, excepting in open fairs." Other acts of the same kind interfered with and obstructed a number of trades and industries, the most notable of them all but annihilating the woollen manufacture. This last statute, 2 and 3 Mary cap. 11, ordered that "no clothier, living out of a city, borough, or market-town, shall keep above one loom in his house, nor let out any loom for hire; no woollen-weaver, living out of a city, borough, or market-town, shall keep more than two looms, nor more than two apprentices; no weaver shall have a tucking-mill, nor be a tucker, fuller, or dyer; no tucker nor fuller shall keep any loom in his house; no person who has not heretofore been a clothmaker shall hereafter make or weave any kind of broad white woollen cloths, but only in a city, borough, town corporate, or market-town, or else in such places where such cloths have been used to be commonly made for ten years preceding this act; and no person shall set up as a weaver unless he has previously served an apprenticeship of seven years to the business." That the English woollen manufacture survived an act like this showed a truly immense vitality of the trade.

The death of Mary, preceded by the loss of Calais—an event far more detrimental from a commercial than a political point of view, as it deprived England of an important staple for woollens and other merchandize—finally closed the long course of industrial decline; and the accession of Elizabeth opened up an era brighter and fuller of prosperity than any yet seen. Weak and arbitrary as a political ruler, capricious as a religious lawgiver, and vulgar as a patron of art and literature, Elizabeth was superlatively great as a queen of trade and industry. Possessed of a commercial talent approaching genius, careful in husbanding the resources of the state like her own, but liberal to prodigality whenever high interests were concerned, whenever the harvest promised to repay amply for the seeds thrown into the ground, Elizabeth was eminently fitted to raise England from its low condition, and to lead it onward into rivalry with the first industrial powers of the world. In attempting this immense task, which seemed to stand clear before her eyes from the beginning, the queen was highly favoured by outward circumstances and opportunities such as no other monarch had enjoyed before. England was bursting with repressed energy, and the nation cried for nothing more than to be freed from the heavy shackles which restrained all its movements; and at the same time, just while the cry was loudest, a field was opened which afforded room for more than the pent-up current of industrial activity that was awaiting the opening of the flood-gates. At the accession of Elizabeth the people of the Netherlands engrossed the trade of Europe, but at the very moment their prosperity was highest, the heavy blight of a combined military and priestly despotism was upon them, and there were all the signs that Spain and Rome together would drag them to the ground, and if not utterly annihilating the social and political life of a marvellously industrious race, yet inflict such wounds as to drag the country down to the rank of secondary states. That such was the fate in store for the Flemish dominions of Philip II., neither Elizabeth nor her great minister could doubt for a moment; so that while raising English trade and industry, they had to look forward to expanding both sufficiently to embrace and hold a part of the rich heritage of the Low Countries. It seemed too great almost to be received even in part, and but for an Elizabeth on the throne, England in the middle of the sixteenth century could have no more presumed to compete with the Netherlands for the world's commerce, than the city of London to rival Antwerp, and the villages of Liverpool and Manchester to emulate Amsterdam and Bruges. How prosperous were the great Flemish towns, particularly Antwerp and Amsterdam, at the period of Elizabeth's accession, and how vast their trade, compared with that of England, may be seen from a very remarkable description of the Netherlands by a contemporary Italian writer, Luigi Guicciardini, a native of Florence, and nephew of the great historian Francesco Guicciardini, who left the most clear and detailed account of commerce and industry of the age that has come down to the present time.

In his "Descrizione di Paesi Bassi," Guicciardini left on record that Antwerp had at certain periods no less than two thousand five hundred ships lying at anchor in the harbour, and that "it was usual for five hundred ships to come and go in one day, and four hundred to come up the Scheldt in one tide;" also "that ten thousand carts were constantly employed in carrying merchandize to and from the neighbouring countries, besides many hundreds of waggons daily coming and going with passengers, and five hundred coaches used by people of distinction." The trades of Antwerp, according to the Florentine, long a resident in the city, comprised "one hundred and sixty-nine bakers, seventy-eight butchers, ninety-two fishmongers, one hundred and ten barber-surgeons, five hundred and ninety-four tailors, one hundred and twenty-four goldsmiths, besides a great number of lapidaries and jewellers, three hundred master painters and gravers," and an infinite number of mercers, drapers, haberdashers, and other retail dealers. The houses he calculated at thirteen thousand five hundred, mentioning the rent as "extravagantly dear, so as, except Lisbon, to surpass any city of Europe; a set of lodgings of five or six chambers, with a hall and garrets, not letting for less than two hundred crowns yearly, and the greater lodgings and smaller kind of houses usually at five hundred crowns and upwards." But the riches of the inhabitants were in proportion. "One of the foreign merchants," Guicciardini says, referring to a member of the house of Fugger of Augsburg, whilom weavers, and afterwards money-lenders to Henry VIII. and other kings and potentates, "died worth above six millions of crowns; and there are many natives, traders and others, worth from two hundred thousand to four hundred thousand crowns." The greatness of Antwerp essentially consisted in its being a cosmopolitan city, open to all creeds and races, and aiming at free trade as far as understood by the age. "Besides the natives," Guicciardini records, "and the French, who are here very numerous, there are six principal foreign nations who reside at Antwerp, both in war and peace, making above one thousand merchants, including factors and servants, namely, first, Germans, secondly, Danes and Easterlings, thirdly, Italians, fourthly, Spaniards, fifthly, English, and sixthly, Portuguese." The habits of the mercantile community were "to meet twice every day, in the morning and the evening, one hour each time, at the English Bourse, where, by their interpreters and brokers, they treat of buying and selling all kinds of merchandize; from thence they go to the New Bourse, or principal Exchange, where, for another hour each time, they transact all matters relating to bills of exchange, with the said six nations and with France, as also for loans of money at interest"—usually at twelve per cent even with such distinguished borrowers as Kaiser Charles, Philip II., Henry VIII., Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, all of whom at times, when their exchequers were empty, made humble applications to the merchants of Antwerp. But both Henry VIII. and Mary lost their credit at Antwerp towards the end of their reigns, and Elizabeth could borrow with difficulty at the commencement of her own, the industrial prosperity of England being very accurately gauged and taken account of by the shrewd men of the "six nations" who spent two hours each day at the New Bourse.

Continuing his account of Flemish trade and commerce, Guicciardini furnishes an interesting sketch of the intercourse between England and Antwerp. "To England," he says, "Antwerp sends jewels and precious stones, silver bullion, quicksilver, wrought silks, cloth of gold and silver, gold and silver thread, camblets, grograms, spices, drugs, sugar, cotton, cum-min, galls, and linen both fine and coarse; also serges, tapestry, madder, hops in great quantities, glass, salt fish, metallic and other merceries of all sorts, to a great value, as well as arms of all kinds, ammunition for war, and household furniture. From England Antwerp receives large quantities of fine and coarse draperies, fringes, and other things of that kind; also the finest wool, and excellent saffron, but in small quantities; a great deal of lead and tin; sheep and rabbit skins without number, and various other sorts of fine peltry and leather; beer, cheese, and other sorts of provisions in considerable quantities; as, likewise, Malmsey wines, which the English import from Candia." As regards Scotland and Ireland, they added but little to the world-trade of the active Flemings. "To Scotland," states Guicciardini, "Antwerp sends but little, as that country is chiefly supplied from England and Franco; however, some spicery finds its way thither, with sugars, madder, wrought silks, camblets, serges, linen, and mercery. And Scotland sends to Antwerp vast quantities of peltry of many kinds, leather, wool, and indifferent cloth, fine large pearls, though not of quite so good a water as the oriental ones. To Ireland Antwerp sends much the same commodities as to Scotland, and Antwerp takes from Ireland skins and leather of divers sorts, some low-priced cloths, and other gross things of little value." Concerning the total amount, in money value of the time, of the trade between England and the Netherlands, the Florentine writer brings forward some curious and interesting calculations. "In recent years," he states, "they imported upwards of one thousand two hundred sacks of English wool to Bruges, worth two hundred and fifty thousand crowns, and of drapery brought from England into the Netherlands there are undoubtedly, one year with another, above two hundred thousand pieces of all kinds, which, at the moderate rate of twenty-five crowns per piece, is five millions of crowns, or ten millions of guilders," or about one million of pounds sterling. "So that," says he, "these and other merchandize brought to us by the English, and carried from us to them, may make the annual amount to be more than twelve millions of crowns, or twenty-four millions of guilders," or about two millions four hundred thousand pounds sterling—certainly more than two thirds of the total commerce of England at the time. Nevertheless the dealings of the Flemings with England were small compared with their commercial transactions with France and Germany, the latter country especially, from which they imported, among other articles, according to Guicciardini, "above forty thousand tuns of wine annually, which, at thirty crowns per tun, amount to one million four hundred and forty thousand crowns," and "sixty thousand lasts of grains, chiefly rye, worth one million six hundred and eighty thousand crowns." The latter merchandize was mainly carried by sea to Amsterdam, where, the Italian records, "twice in every year fleets of three hundred ships together come in from Dantzick and other ports on the Baltic, and five hundred ships are often seen, mostly belonging to the inhabitants." Guicciardini adds that Amsterdam stood next to Antwerp in extent of trade among the cities of the Netherlands.

Queen Elizabeth, in attempting to bring the commerce and industry of England on a level and in competition with that of the Low Countries, could not be unaware of the immensity of the task before her, the trade of the whole realm at her accession being insignificant even when compared with that of Antwerp alone, into the port of which four hundred vessels glided with a single tide, and in whose merchants' books all the monarchs of Europe figured as debtors. Shortly after her accession Elizabeth attempted to borrow the small sum of sixteen thousand pounds from the citizens of London, but could not get it on account of their real or pretended poverty; and though Cecil managed after a while to raise the amount by threats and coaxings from a few wealthy aldermen, they declared that they could not lend it to her for longer than six months. All this was very little hopeful for the great object in view; but Elizabeth understood her subjects, as they began to understand her after a while, which proved a long step onward in the road to progress. To inspire confidence, the queen openly explained in the first session of her first parliament the simple principle upon which she meant to act in raising the prosperity of the kingdom, it being to make trade flourish by making it free. The motive was embodied in the earliest statute affecting commerce and industry that was passed, the 1 Elizabeth cap. 13, which repealed the most obstructive portion of the old navigation laws, decreed for the "protection" of English shipping. It was stated in the preamble "that since the making of the said statutes, other sovereign princes, finding themselves aggrieved with the said acts, as thinking that the same were made to the hurt and prejudice of their country and navy, have made like penal laws against such as should ship out of their countries, in any other vessels than of their several countries and dominions, by reason whereof there hath not only grown great displeasure betwixt the foreign princes and the kings of this realm, but also the merchants have been sore grieved and endamaged," on which good grounds the prohibition against the use of foreign shipping by British subjects was repealed, with the proviso, however, that all ships so employed, whether in exporting or importing goods, should pay aliens' customs. Exceptions were made in favour of two London companies engaged in the continental trade, the "Merchant Adventurers," and the "Merchants of the Staple," who were permitted "to lade merchandize on foreigners' ships, provided there be not English ships sufficient in number for such embarkations, without being for that cause subject to aliens' duties." The merchants of Bristol were likewise privileged, on account of "having sustained great losses at sea from enemies, who have taken all their best ships and much substance," to use foreign ships without liability to aliens' duties, "if there be no English shipping sufficient within forty miles of Bristol." It was a movement towards free trade greatly in advance of the current notions of the age, and for which the queen had to suffer much obloquy till the time when results came to justify her wise policy.

In her endeavours to raise the nation to a higher state of prosperity, Elizabeth was fortunate enough to meet with a most able man, of large views and spotless integrity, who before long became her commercial, as Cecil was her political, adviser. This was Thomas Gresham, the son of a lord mayor of London, born in 1519, and who joined to the advantages of having been a mercer's apprentice in the city that of a learned education at Cambridge, where philosophy made him understand trade better, and trade philosophy. When still young he went to Antwerp, to assist there in a mercantile agency kept by his father, one of his occupations being to negotiate loans for Henry VIII., whose perennial want of cash furnished employment to more than one firm of bankers at the great European money-market. Having been in his father's service for about seven years, Thomas Gresham was himself appointed "king's agent" in 1544, at a salary of twenty shillings a day. He filled the office till the death of Henry VIII., and during the whole of the reign of Edward VI., with ever-increasing demands upon his activity as a loan negotiator, but in spite of his zeal he was dismissed soon after the accession of Mary, on account of an odour of heresy that was hanging about him. However, the saintly advisers of the queen soon repented themselves of their act, for the successor they appointed to him, one Dauntsey, though undeniably orthodox, could raise no cash, and they were glad enough to reinstall Gresham anew as "queen's agent." At the coming to the throne of Elizabeth, Gresham had two places of business, one at Antwerp, managed by an able assistant, Richard Clough, and another in Lombard Street, in the city of London, in which latter "shop," flourishing under the sign of the grasshopper, he himself carried on the trade of banking and money-lending. It was here the queen got acquainted with Gresham, who showed himself as able and willing to help her in her necessities as he had helped her three predecessors on the throne; and forming a very high opinion of his mercantile tact and wisdom, she knighted him at the close of 1559, and sent him to Antwerp with the double function of ambassador and financial agent. In his new capacity, the penetrating knowledge of her commercial adviser proved of immense service to the queen. Entering with his whole heart into her great objects, he assisted her in every possible way to carry them out; he sent her plans for ships, and workmen to build them; he furnished her with instructions to erect gunpowder mills, with receipts for dyeing wool, and with information for making steel, for tempering sword-blades, and for casting cannon; and he told her how Antwerp had risen, and how London might rise to be equal to Antwerp. That the great city on the Scheldt had now arrived at the meridian of its glory, and got into imminent danger of being crushed under the iron heel of Spanish despotism, was a fact patent to the inhabitants themselves; and many of them, including the wealthiest of the merchants, began making preparations for flight the year after Gresham's arrival as ambassador. He himself stayed not to hear the forerunners of the inquisition and the hangmen of the "council of blood" knocking at the gates, but returned to England before the legions of Alva came tramping down the banks of the Rhine.

The murderous persecution that burst forth in the Netherlands after the arrival of Alva and his bands, all but unparalleled for hideousness even in the history of religious strife, exercised singularly beneficial effects upon England. Nothing Elizabeth could have done, and nothing that was in the nation's power itself to accomplish, could have raised the prosperity of the kingdom so rapidly as King Philip, greatest enemy of England, did by the act of sending his bloodhounds against the unfortunate Protestants of the Low Countries. Murderous as was the persecution, it yet had its bounds in the very number of the victims, whose heads could not be struck off all at once, and whom all the prisons could not hold, so that many escaped to France and Germany, and many more to England. "Hence," says the author of the "Historia Belgica," a contemporary writer, "after D'Alva had hanged, beheaded, and burned such numbers, yet greater numbers still fled to find shelter and bread for their families in foreign parts, carrying thither arts and manufactures before only known in the Netherlands. In England the decayed cities and towns of Canterbury, Norwich, Colchester, Sandwich, Maidstone, Southampton, and many other towns, were filled with manufacturers of woollen, linen, and silk, the same as it happened two hundred years before," or about the year 1360, "when the Belgians and Flemings, driven from their homes by frequent inundations, first taught the English the art of making woollen cloth, of which they were before ignorant, being skilled only in husbandry, keeping of sheep, and war." "It was now," the author continues, "that the fugitive Netherlanders taught the English the making of bayes, sayes, and other slight stuffs, as also the weaving of fine linen, and made their country very populous." The first great stream of Dutch immigrants settled in the eastern counties, particularly in and about the city of Norwich, which, long in a state of decline, had become almost deserted since the rebellion of the agricultural labourers, led by "King Ket," in 1549. Under the feet of the industrious Flemings, the grass soon ceased to grow in the streets; the whole population, foreign and native, took to spinning and weaving; the city grew far beyond its former dimensions, opulence took the place of poverty, and education of ignorance, and Norwich manufactures got famous all over the world. The Flemings, too, had a taste for art as well as for industry; they filled their houses, once they had settled down and become citizens of a new land, with paintings and sculpture, such as could not be found even in baronial halls; and all around their dwellings they planted choice flowers, unknown before in England, the Provence rose, carnations, and gillyflowers, till the country far and wide had been changed into a great garden. As at Norwich, so at Colchester, at Canterbury, Maidstone, Sandwich, and numerous other places in the eastern and south-eastern counties, the current of immigration uniformly spread industry and wealth. It spread in circles, and continued to flow unceasingly till towards the end of the century, flying Huguenots pressing in the rear of flying Walloons, all being equally well received, cared for, and protected by the sagacious queen whom providence had placed on the throne of England. Nothing that Elizabeth did in the course of her long reign was so intrinsically great, and so great in its consequences, as her unwavering constancy in stretching her protecting arm over the earnest and conscientious crowds of men who left their homes for the sake of religion to seek in England a better home. They profited by the change, but England profited still more.

The rapid growth of national prosperity under the wise rule of Elizabeth began to show itself before the first ten years of her reign had come to an end, in the erection of a building serving as a monument of English commerce, the London Exchange. It was entirely the work of Sir Thomas Gresham, who, with the trade and industry of the Flemings as a constant model before his eyes, kept telling the queen that any further loans of money she might require ought to be raised, not in foreign countries, but among her own subjects; and that in order to centralize the financial transactions of the mercantile community in a convenient manner, and facilitate the whole of the operations connected therewith, it was essential that there should be a public edifice for the purpose, or a Bourse, like that of Antwerp. The necessity for such a building had shown itself long before, in the fact of the London merchants holding regular meetings in a dingy place in Lombard Street, so that, the want being indisputable, the only question under discussion was who should bear the expense of erecting the required Bourse. Elizabeth, earnest as she was in her endeavours to encourage commerce, never liked to part with cash unless absolutely indispensable; and not seeing her way to recouping herself in the outlay for the proposed building, she insisted that the citizens themselves should raise the money. But the majority of the London merchants as yet were mean-spirited, with little faith in the great future in store for England; and many of them even hated Gresham for proposing that the government should raise loans at home, instead of from foreign money-lenders, their notion being the old-fashioned one of the wealth of nations consisting, not in the amount of their industry and trade, but in the hoarding of so much coin or bullion. Impatient to lose his time and waste arguments with his thick-headed brother citizens, Sir Thomas Gresham at last determined upon a grand act of munificence, that of building the Bourse which London wanted, but would not pay for, at his own expense. His intention having been announced, the corporation of the city, half ashamed of their meanness, offered to give the ground for the building; and a plot of land covered by three small lanes, called St. Christopher's Alley, New Alley, and Swan Alley, was bought for the purpose, at a cost of three thousand five hundred pounds. Gresham now set to work at once, laying the first stone of the new edifice on the 7th of June, 1566; and under the direction of a Flemish architect named Henricke, the Bourse, designed in imitation of that of Antwerp, with a square piazza in the centre and rooms over it, grew up rapidly, the slate-covered roof being completed in the autumn of the following year. Some time was lost over the internal decorations, the taste and liberality of the "queen's merchant," as Sir Thomas Gresham was now generally called, not suffering him to make a present of mere bare-brick wall to his fellow citizens; but everything was completed before the end of 1569, and in the first month of 1570 Elizabeth inaugurated it with becoming pomp. As reported by Raphael Holinshed, quaint chronicler of contemporary events, "on the three and twentieth of January, the queen's majesty, accompanied by her nobility, came from her house at the Strand, called Somerset Place, and entered the city of London by Temple Bar, Fleet Street, the Cheap, and so, by the north side of the Bourse, to Sir Thomas Gresham's in Bishopsgate Street, where she dined; then after dinner her grace returned through Cornhill, entered the Bourse on the south side, and after her highness had viewed every part thereof above ground, especially the Pawn, which was richly furnished with all sorts of the finest wares in the city, she caused the same Bourse, by an herald and trumpets, to be proclaimed the Royal Exchange, so to be called from thenceforth." If Elizabeth's subjects had reason to be proud of their queen, the queen had equal reason to be proud of such subjects as Sir Thomas Gresham.

GRESHAM EXCHANGE.

The period of the building of Gresham's Exchange was memorable as an epoch in which the commercial enterprise of the nation took wings and attempted to fly, England itself becoming too narrow for it. It was as if, awaking from a long torpor, the effect of half a century of ruthless despotism, the people seemed to become suddenly aware of the latent power resting within them, the capabilities of their brains and arms, and the immense resources of the land which had given them birth; and getting bold in the consciousness of their strength, sprang forward to enterprises destined to spread the glory of the English name all over the globe. The new-born energy manifested itself in a hundred different ways, but in none so remarkable as in the rise of a number of daring maritime adventurers, who, with material means utterly inadequate to their lofty dreams, entered upon a series of marvellous discoveries, navigating unknown oceans in frail boats, mere cockleshells in size, laying their hands upon mighty empires like waste lands pertaining to the first comer, and groping their way round the great globe itself as if it had been a lake belonging to England. The first, in order of time, of these great sea-rovers, was Martin Frobisher, a native of Yorkshire, of parentage not known, but probably a sailor in early life. His notion, often expressed, was that the finding of a north-west passage to Cathay and the Indies was "the only thing of the world that was left yet undone whereby a notable mind might be made famous and fortunate;" and acting upon this idea, engendered chiefly by the failure of Cabot's plan to discover the shortest road to China by sailing to the north-east, Frobisher made the greatest possible efforts to get the necessary means for carrying out his vast scheme: He succeeded in finding a patron in the earl of Warwick, elder brother of Leicester, the favourite, and with his assistance and that of several London merchants, fitted out three small vessels, the "Gabriel," of thirty-five tons, the "Michael," of thirty tons, and a pinnace, or open boat, of ten tons, with which he left the Thames on the 8th of June, 1576, Queen Elizabeth looking on and waving her hand when the tiny craft glided along in front of Greenwich Palace, as King Edward had done twenty-three years before, when Willoughby sailed down the river on the dreamt road to Cathay. The new undertaking was even more perilous than that of Willoughby, the diminutive embarkation to which he intrusted fortune and life being less than one fourth the size of the vessels fitted out by Sebastian Cabot, and to all appearance utterly inadequate, not only to brave the dangers of the polar regions, but even to cross the Atlantic. But Martin Frobisher, determined to do "the only thing of the world that was yet left undone," sailed forth with his three little boats into the unknown regions of the north-west, as if engaged on a river trip: steering along the east coasts of England and Scotland, he made his way to the Shetlands; from thence to the Faroes; then westward to Iceland and Greenland; and, rounding Cape Farewell, got into the channel leading to the vast Hudson Bay—channel still known as Frobisher Strait. Not being able to find a western outlet of Hudson Bay, and running short of provisions, the daring adventurer now saw himself compelled to return, which he did after capturing one of a tribe of Esquimaux, which the English sailors, on their first appearance, took for porpoises, but which their captain declared to be merely "strange infideles, whose like was never seen, read, nor heard of before." With his Esquimaux passenger, and several other curious things he was able to pick up, Frobisher started back for England; and after encountering a terrible storm, safely arrived at Harwich on the 2nd of October, "highly commended by all men for his great and notable attempt, but specially famous for the great hope he brought of the passage to Cathay."

Frobisher firmly believed in the existence of a passage westward, from Hudson's Bay; and his great object in returning to England was to fit out some larger vessels, with a better stock of provisions, so as to be able to sail onward to the golden lands of the east. In this, however, he was greatly disappointed; the queen commended him much, but would advance no money, and the London merchants, his old friends, being equally unwilling to invest their spare cash in hypothetical roads to Cathay, he saw himself compelled with the deepest regret to abandon the enterprise, or at least to postpone it. Thus passed seven or eight years, at the end of which a curious accident did more for the bold adventurer than all his eloquence, his real merits, and his energy had been able to achieve. One of the sailors in the expedition to Hudson's Bay had brought home to his wife, as a memorial of the voyage, a large piece of stone-like black mineral, which, after being carefully kept for a long while, happened to fall into the fire, where it "glistened with a bright marquesset of gold." The good woman opened her eyes very wide, lost in blank astonishment, but recovering her senses, snatched the bright stone from the flame, at the risk of burning off her fingers, and ran with it to a goldsmith. The man told her it was ore containing gold, and advised her to keep the secret of the discovery, which she did so well that in a few days all London knew of it. Now was the time for Martin Frobisher. There was no more need for begging, entreaty, and persuasion, he had vessels offered to him on all sides; and the queen herself showed great anxiety that he should accept one of the ships of the royal navy in searching again for the north-west passage—and bringing back as large a quantity as possible of the black-looking stuff which the sailor's wife had seen glittering in the fire. Frobisher took the proffered queen's ship, the "Aid," with two other vessels, and embarking in great haste, set sail again in May, 1577, once more made his way to Iceland and Greenland, and once more ran into Hudson's Bay. After taking on board several hundred tons of the golden ore, not without some severe conflicts with the Esquimaux, who resented the invasion of their territory, and the previous capture of one of their brethren, Frobisher turned his face homeward, and reached England in safety in the latter part of September. Being carefully assayed now, it was discovered that the black mineral which had been found in America contained, indeed, gold, but in very minute quantities, so as to make it a not particularly valuable commercial transaction to fetch it from across the Atlantic. Nevertheless, it was thought that the ore might not have been well chosen, and that some of it would contain a much greater proportion of the coveted yellow metal; which supposition being favoured by the queen, the gold fever spread all over England, and half the vessels of the kingdom were put at the disposition of Martin Frobisher. He selected fifteen of the finest ships, with which, well equipped, and stored with abundance of provisions, he set sail on the 31st of May, 1578, resolved both to discover the north-west passage, and to bring back abundant supplies of the gold containing mineral. This time, however, with vastly greater means than before at his command, he was most unsuccessful, for, arrived at the American continent, Frobisher found the strait which bore his name blocked up by ice, and could not get into Hudson's Bay; and though he subsequently entered it by another channel, he could discover neither a western outlet nor the golden ore, and had to return to England completely disappointed. But although a failure so far, the searches for the north-west passage to Asia proved highly beneficial to the nation, encouraging the spirit of enterprise which had now been awakened, and which came to form the basis of England's future greatness.

In the same year when Martin Frobisher made his second voyage of exploration to the north-west, a maritime hero greater than he, Francis Drake, left the country on a southward expedition, the most wonderful and daring that had ever been undertaken by English sailors, being nothing less than an attempt to circumnavigate the globe. Drake was already known as a bold and successful adventurer, when planning this great enterprise, through having made several voyages to the Spanish West Indies, in which "he got some store of money by playing the seaman and the pirate;" and his new scheme starting professedly with the main object of looking after money, he had but little difficulty in obtaining the assistance he wanted, both in ships and men. Like all his brother sea-kings of the period, Drake held vessels of the size of little fishing-boats quite sufficient for the purpose of exploring the most unknown regions, crossing the ocean through storms and hurricanes for thousands of miles, and examining the sea-girt globe to its farthest confines; and thus for his voyage round the world he collected no more than five frail barks, the largest, the "Pelican," of less than a hundred tons burthen, and the smallest of but fifteen tons. With this little fleet, manned by one hundred and sixty-four sailors, a goodly number of them the sons of gentlemen, Drake set sail from Plymouth on the 15th of November, 1577, steering due south. After a long and stormy voyage, in which the five little boats were tossed about like feathers on the waves of the Atlantic, the adventurers reached, on the 29th of May, 1578, the port of St. Julian, where they remained for two months, refitting and laying in a stock of provisions. On the 20th of August following, Drake rounded the continent of South America, passing through the Strait of Magellan; and having parted company by this time with the other vessels of his little fleet, sailed in his own ship, the "Pelican," along the coasts of Chili and Peru, attacking and plundering the Spaniards whenever occasion offered. Continuing his north-westerly course, he then made his way along the shores of California and North America, as far as Vancouver Island, in the hope of being able to discover a passage into the Atlantic, and finding in the west what Frobisher had sought in the east. Failing in this attempt, he landed near the mouth of the Fraser River, and "took possession" of the country in the name of Queen Elizabeth—the planting of a small flag, taken from a bark of a hundred tons, being deemed quite sufficient to annex an empire of boundless extent to the little peninsula which had given birth to Drake and the "Pelican." The annexation having been accomplished, and the name of "New Albion" been given to the million and odd square miles of newly-acquired landed property, the "Pelican" shaped her course to the south-west, across the Pacific Ocean, and reaching the Molucca Islands on the 4th of November, 1579, Java on the 16th of March following, and the Cape of Good Hope on the 15th of June, the little vessel proudly ran into Plymouth

Harbour on the 3rd of November, 1580, having accomplished the voyage round the world in two years and ten months. The whole nation received Drake with rapturous applause, in which the queen joined by honouring him with a visit on board his ship. She ordered the "Pelican," according to Camden, "to be drawn up in a small creek near Deptford, upon the Thames, as a monument of his so lucky sailing round the world; and having, as it were, consecrated it as a memorial with great ceremony, she was banqueted in it, and conferred on Drake the honour of knighthood. At this time a bridge of planks, by which they came aboard the ship, sank under the crowd of people, and fell down with an hundred men upon it, who notwithstanding had none of them any harm. So that the ship may seem to have been built under a lucky planet." The world-rounding little "Pelican" remained at Deptford till quite decayed, and when broken up in very old age its oaken backbone furnished an arm-chair for the professor of history at the university of Oxford.

While Frobisher was seeking a north-west passage to India, and Drake was sailing round the globe, the old idea of Cabot of getting to Asia in an easterly direction was nigh being realized, though in a somewhat different sense than he had dreamt of, by the commercial association formed under his auspices, the Russia Company. The first operations of the company were subject to singular vicissitudes. The year after obtaining the royal charter incorporating it, the association sent Richard Chancellor, with three ships, to Novo Dvinsk, or Archangel, from which he made his way over the route he had previously explored to Moscow, had fresh interviews with the Czar, to whom he presented some rich gifts, and in return obtained large trading concessions, and the promise that a Russian ambassador should be sent to England, in order to keep up constant relations of friendship and goodwill between the two nations. That the promise might not fail, Chancellor offered to convey the imperial envoy in his own ships, which being accepted he set sail again from the White Sea in the summer of 1556, taking with him the body of Sir Hugh Willoughby, found on the Lapland coast, as well as the two vessels laid up there amidst snow and ice for three years. The return voyage was prosperous until Chancellor sighted the coast of Scotland, when a terrible storm arose, which dashed his vessels upon some dangerous rocks near Pitaligo Bay, Aberdeenshire, leaving him with nearly all his companions to perish. Among the few that escaped from the wreck was the Russian ambassador, who made his way to London in sore plight, having lost not only the whole of the splendid presents destined by the Czar for the sovereign of England, but all his private property, to his very clothes, thus presenting himself somewhat in the guise of a homeless vagabond. Queen Mary nevertheless received him, but very coldly; and the Muscovite diplomatist becoming soon conscious that the government to which he was accredited was too busy killing men for their religion to be able to do much for trade, he took his departure in the spring of the following year, escorted by three new vessels which the Russia Company had fitted out. As commander of the new expedition, and their chief representative in the Czar's dominions, the company appointed Anthony Jenkinson, a very able man, who had no sooner arrived at Moscow when he set to work to obtain new privileges and concessions for a trade not only in but through Russia, his great object, conception of a vast mind, being to establish an overland transit to China and India. By dint of soft speech and liberal presents he got all he wanted, after which he despatched several agents to the Caspian Sea and the frontiers of Persia, from whom he received the report that an immense field for commerce was lying open in that direction. To the exploration of this field Jenkinson now devoted his whole energy; and to protect himself against interlopers, he advised his company to obtain a parliamentary charter securing their privileges and monopolies, in lieu of the royal concession upon which their previous transactions had been based. This was done, though with great difficulties, the rumour of fabled wealth to be found in Russia having started not a few eager competitors, anxious to secure a share in the overland road to Cathay and the Indies. Elizabeth, however, did not encourage these pretensions; little favourable as she was to exclusive privileges, she thought that the interests of commerce would be best secured by granting to the Russia traders the full benefit of their previous exertions, and they accordingly obtained, in the eighth year of her reign, the sought-for parliamentary charter. Its tenour strikingly showed the thirst for enterprise that had arisen in England.

The act of parliament organizing the work of the Russia traders who sought to establish an overland route to Asia, commenced by giving to their company a new name, not a little curious in its vague ambition. It was enacted "that the said company, society, and corporation, shall henceforth be incorporated, named, and called only by the name of the Fellowship of English Merchants for Discovery of New Trades, by that name alone to continue a corporation for ever, with all the powers and privileges of their charter, or of any other corporation; and that no part of the continent, isles, ports, or arms of the sea of any emperor, king, prince, ruler, or governor, before the said first enterprise not known or frequented by the subjects of this realm, and lying from the city of London northwards, north-westwards, or north-eastwards, nor any parts now subject to the Czar Ivan Bazilowitch, or to his successors, sovereigns of Russia, nor the countries of Armenia, Media, Hyrcania, Persia, or the Caspian Sea, nor any part of them, shall be sailed or trafficked into, nor frequented by any subject of England, either by themselves or their factors, directly or indirectly, other than by the order, agreement, consent, or ratification of the governor, consuls, and assistants of the said fellowship, or the more part of them and their successors, upon pain, for every offence, to forfeit all such ships, with their appurtenances, goods, and merchandizes, one moiety to the queen, the other to the company." Appended to the act were several clauses, the first of them leaving the trade to Norway free, and the second providing "that, for the better maintenance of the navy and mariners of this realm, it shall not be lawful for the said company to transport any commodity of this realm to their new trade, but only in English ships, and with a majority of English mariners, and the like in bringing into this realm any merchandize from their new trade, on pain, for every offence, of forfeiting two hundred pounds, one moiety to be the queen's, and the other moiety to go to any English port town having a decayed harbour that will sue for it." A final clause provided "that every of the queen's subjects inhabiting the city of York and the towns of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Hull, and Boston, who have for the space of ten years continually traded the course of merchandize, and who before the 25th of December, 1567, shall contribute, join, and put in stock to, with, and amongst the said company, and shall take for the furniture of one ordinary, full, and entire portion, or share, and do in all things behave himself as others of the society are bound to do, shall from the said 25th of December, 1567, be accounted free as one of the said society and company in all respects." The latter clause was due to the northern ports mentioned having largely contributed to the expenses of Cabot's first attempt to discover the north-east passage, which the queen, with the constant view of encouraging maritime enterprise, thought fit to reward in this manner. Notable in other respects, the act of parliament confirming the "Fellowship of English Merchants for Discovery of New Trades" was additionally so in being the first which established an exclusively mercantile corporation in England.

By the desire of the new company, which counted among its shareholders some of the most influential merchants of London, the queen despatched, in the spring of 1568, a special envoy to Russia, in the person of Sir Thomas Randolph, most experienced diplomatic gentleman of the age, employed in no less than eighteen different embassies. Randolph landed at Novo Dvinsk, where he found, besides the castle and a large house built by the English traders, only a few huts; but proceeding up the River Dvina for about seventy-five miles, he came to the town of Colmogro, and eight hundred miles further upwards he reached Vologda, an important city, and the seat of a large commerce. From here he travelled overland for five hundred miles, through a country well inhabited, to Moscow, where the Czar received him with much cordiality, granting all the demands preferred in favour of the "English Merchants for Discovery of New Trades." Meanwhile the active representative of the company, Anthony Jenkinson, had gone already in search of the new trades, and had succeeded in establishing a regular intercourse between the Caspian and the White Sea, so as to form the last great link in the important chain connecting Asia and England. The arrangements he had made consisted in transporting goods from Astrakhan up the river Volga, in vessels scooped out of an entire tree, as far as Yaroslar, a distance of nearly two thousand miles; and from thence to carry them overland, for about one hundred and thirty miles, to Vologda, where new hollow trees were ready to swim them down to Novo Dvinsk and the White Sea. The route into the interior of Asia soon got so far perfected that the agents of the company began to push their way to the confines of Afghanistan, bartering Persian silk, turquoise stones, galls, carpets, and Indian spices against English merchandize, establishing offices at Ispahan and Teheran, and looking forward with great confidence to the establishment of intercourse with Cathay. These hopeful prospects suddenly came to an end in 1571, with the breaking out of a vast civil war in Russia. The first signs of it showed themselves while Sir Thomas Randolph was on his visit to the court of Moscow; and not long after he had left, having concluded his diplomatic and commercial transactions, the long pending storm burst forth in full fury. Aiming to do the same work in his country which Henry VII. had accomplished in England, to curb the power of the feudal-aristocracy, Czar Ivan exasperated the whole powerful class, and suffering some reverses in one of his warlike expeditions, the nobles rose against him in a body, calling in to their aid the Khan of Crim Tartary. The latter, at the head of fifty thousand Mahometans, invaded Russia in the spring of 1571, penetrating as far as Moscow, which he set on fire, burning down, as reported, one hundred and eighty thousand houses. But this useless ferocity had the effect of bringing the rebellious nobles again round to their monarch, and fighting at the side of Ivan Basilowitch, they drove the Mahometans quicker out of Russia than they had come into it. In the meanwhile, however, the country had suffered enormously in the savage warfare carried on, and the trade of the English company had been all but annihilated, the burning of Moscow alone having caused the destruction of merchandize valued at above a hundred thousand roubles, while the loss suffered by the plunder of several rich caravans from Persia amounted to quadruple the sum. This created great despondency among the shareholders, and although Anthony Jenkinson, whom the queen, in addition to his other functions, had nominated her representative at the court of Russia, did everything in his power to restore the fallen fortunes of the company, and even obtained the Czar's promise to make good their losses, the affairs of the corporation gradually dwindled down, until after a number of years they became quite insignificant. Thus ended the first attempt to make an overland road to India, an attempt which, in boldness of conception and skill of execution, considering the narrow means at the command of the promoters, was not inferior to any other of the grand enterprises of the age of Queen Elizabeth.

The vast and all but marvellous increase of English trade and industry, which began with the accession of the queen, made itself strikingly felt towards the end of the first half of her reign. "There were," reports a contemporary writer, "brought in an immeasurable use of luxurious commodities into England, as wines, spices, silk, and fine linen; of the latter sort, of above ten groats the ell, there is more than three hundred and sixty thousand pounds yearly spent, which is half the value of our woollen cloths exported." The increase of luxuries led to the enactment of several sumptuary laws, ill in keeping with the spirit of free trade fostered by Elizabeth, and, probably, much less of her own make than that of parliament the representative rather of the old agricultural, than of the new commercial and industrial interest, and violently attached as such to the traditional policy of repression. The laws forbidding the wearing of various certain costly articles were pretty harmless, inasmuch as few took any notice of them; but far more dangerous were several attempts made about this period to "protect" certain trades by giving them exceptional privileges, which proved only an impediment to their own activity, as well as an obstruction to others. To raise the woollen manufactures of the eastern counties, the merchants of the Steelyard, who had been shorn of all their monopolies at the beginning of the reign, and entirely lost their old influence, were forbidden to import any goods similar to those made in England, as well as to export raw wool to Holland and Germany; while at the same time other trades were placed under paternal supervision by heavy import duties on rival goods, and even parliamentary injunctions for the more rapid consumption of their own produce. One of the most curious statutes of the latter kind was for the protection of "cappers," or knitted cap makers, whose grievance was that the people of England insisted upon wearing felt hats, while they were able to make the most beautiful head coverings of wool. Struck with this injustice and perversion of public taste, parliament in its wisdom enacted "that every person above seven years of age shall wear, on Sundays and holidays, a cap of wool, knit, made, thicked, and dressed in England, and dressed only and finished by some of the trade of cappers, on the forfeiture of three shillings and four pence for every day so neglected to be worn; excepting, however, out of this act, maids, ladies, and gentlewomen, and every lord, knight, and gentleman, of twenty marks in land, and their heirs, and also such as have borne office of worship in any city, town, or shire, and also the wardens of the London companies." But so stubborn were the subjects of Elizabeth, so opposed to be guided by a wise legislature in matters of taste, and so blind in beholding the vast superiority of fine knitted woollen caps, keeping the brain tight and warm, over coarse hats of felt, that the poor "cappers," instead of doing more business in consequence of the parliamentary decree, actually got more decayed in trade. The statute protecting the "cappers," though disobeyed, was never repealed, thus leaving it in the power of all succeeding kings of England to put their subjects into knit woollen caps.

Although repressive laws were found to be of very little if any effect, the principle was persevered in during the whole of Elizabeth's reign, giving rise to not a few absurd statutes and royal proclamations. Among the most extraordinary of these enactments was an edict of the queen against the growth of London, published in the twenty-second year of her reign, the consequence mainly of a census of the inhabitants of the city that had taken place, showing the population of the metropolis to amount to above one hundred and fifty thousand souls, among them no less than six thousand four hundred aliens. Thereupon Elizabeth issued a proclamation of a very remarkable character, strikingly illustrative of the views of political economy prevailing in her age. "The Queen's Majestie," the proclamation, dated Nonsuch, July 7, 1580, ran, "perceiving the state of the citie of London—being aunciently termed her chambre—and the suburbes and confines thereof to increase dayly, by accesse of people to inhabite in the same, in such ample sort, as thereby many inconveniences are scene already, but many greater of necessity like to followe, being such as her majestie cannot neglect to remedie, having the principal care, under Almighty God, to foresee aforehand, to have her people in such a citie and confines not onlie well governed by ordinarie justice, to serve God and obey her majestie,—which, by reason of such multitudes lately increased, can hardly be done without devise of more new jurisdictions and officers for that purpose—but to be also provided of sustentation of victual, foode, and other like necessities for man's life, upon reasonable prices, without which no citie can long continue. And finally, to the preservation of her people in health, which may seem impossible to continue, though presently, by God's goodness, the same is perceived to be in better estate universally, than hath been in man's memorie; yet where there are such great multitudes of people brought to inhabite in small roomes, whereof a great part are scene very poore, yea, such as must live of begging, or by worse means, and they heaped up together, and in a sort smothered with many families of children and servants in one house or small tenement; it must needes followe, if any plague or popular sickness should, by God's permission, enter amongst those multitudes, that the same would not only spread itself, and invade the whole citie and confines, but that a great mortalitie would ensue the same, where her majestie's personal presence is many times required: besides the great confluence of people from all partes of the realme, by reason of the ordinary termes of justice there holden, the infection would be also dispersed through all other partes of the realme, to the manifest danger of the whole body thereof; out of the which neither her majestie's owne person can be, but by God's special ordinance, exempted, nor any other, whatsoever they be. For remedie whereof, as time may now serve, until by some further good order be had in parliament or otherwise, the same may be remedied; her majestie, by good and deliberate advise of her counsell, and being also thereto moved by the considerate opinions of the lorde-mayor, aldermen, and other the grave wise men in and about the citie, doth charge and straightly command all manner of persons, of what qualitie soever they be, to desist and forbear from any new buildings of any house or tenement within three miles from any of the gates of the said citie of London, to serve for habitation or lodging for any person, where no former house hath bene known to have been in the memorie of such as are now living; and also to forbear from letting or setting, or suffering any more families than one only to be placed or to inhabite from henceforth in any one house that heretofore hath bene inhabited." The latter prohibition showed a not unwise regard of sanitary considerations, which now, for the first time, were considered worthy of attention by the government, the constant recurrence of the fatal plague, or Black Death, proving a stern teacher.

After this injunction, the proclamation continued: "And to the intent that this her majestie's royal commandment and necessary provision may take place, and be duely observed, for so universal a benefite to the whole body of the realme, for whose respects all particular persons are bound, by God's lawe and man's to forbear from their particular and extraordinary lucre, her majestie straightly chargeth the lorde-mayor of the citie of London, and all other officers having authoritie in the same, and also all justices of peace, lordes and bailifes of liberties not being within the jurisdiction of said lorde-mayor of London, to foresee that no person do begin to prepare any foundation for any new house, tenement, or building, to serve to receive or hold any inhabitants to dwell or lodge, or to use any victualling therein, where no former habitation hath bene in the memorie of such as now do live; but that they be prohibited and restrained so to do. And both the persons that shall so attempt to the contrary, and all manner of workmen that shall after warning given continue in any such work tending to such newe buildings, to be committed to close prison, and there to remain without baile, until they find good sureties, with bonds for reasonable sums of money to be forfeitable and recoverable at her majestie's suite, for the use of the hospitals in and about the said city, that they will not at any time hereafter attempt the like. And further the said officers shall seaze all manner of stuff so, after warning given, brought to the place where such newe buildings shall be intended, and the same cause to be converted and employed in any publick use for the city or parish where the same shall be attempted. And for the avoyding of the multitudes of families heaped up in one dwelling-house, or for the converting of any one house into a multitude of such tenements for dwelling or victualling-places, the said lorde-mayor, and all other officers, in their several liberties within the limites of three miles, as above mentioned, shall commit any person giving cause of offence, from the day of the publication of this present proclamation, to close prison, as is afore limited. And also for the offences in this part of increase of many indwellers, or, as they be commonly termed, inmates or undersitters, which have been suffered within these seven years, contrary to the good auncient laws or customes of the city, or of the boroughes and parishes within the foresaid limit of three miles afore-mentioned, the said lorde-mayor, and the other officers above-mentioned, shall speedily cause to be redressed in their ordinarie courtes and law dayes, betwixt this and the feast of All-Saintes next coming; within which times such undersitters or inmates may provide themselves other places abroade in the realme, where many houses rest uninhabited, to the decay of divers auncient boroughes and townes. And because her majestie intendeth to have this ordinance duely executed, her pleasure is, that the said lorde-mayor of London, and other the officers having jurisdiction within the said space of three miles above-mentioned, shall, after the proclamation hereof, as speedily as they may, meete in some convenient place near to the said city, and there after conference had accord among themselves how to proceed to the execution hereof; and, if any cause shall so require, to impart to her majestie's privy counsell any let or impediment that may arise, to the intent that remedy be given to any such impediment, according to her majestie's pleasure heretofore expressed." In the wake of this proclamation followed another forbidding the use of coal in the metropolis—the latter as nugatory as the former. The mighty current of trade of the chief city of the realm had already grown too strong for restrictive legislation, for, as told by Sir William Monson, "the Turks in those days believed England to be a town in the kingdom of London."

The trade of London received a new impulse in 1585 through the storm and sack of Antwerp by the prince of Parma, resulting in the final and absolute ruin of the large and opulent city. It had suffered much before from the Spaniards, by whom it was partly burnt in 1576; but its vitality hitherto had shown itself greater than the overwhelming force of despotism, defying even Alva's soldiers and the bloodhounds of the Inquisition. However, Philip II. was determined to effect the destruction of Antwerp, both as a punishment of the heretics against whom he was warring with ever increasing bigotry, and to annihilate the chief rival of Lisbon; and seeing that the killing of the principal inhabitants, the confiscation of their property, and the wildest licence given to the Spanish soldiers, had not the desired effect, he issued orders to his representative in the Netherlands to stamp out the city from the face of the earth, to crush its commerce, and raze its principal dwellings, warehouses, and palaces to the ground. The orders were faithfully obeyed; and in the autumn of 1585, nineteen thousand people, the flower of the population, were driven from their homes, and had to seek a refuge in Amsterdam and other Dutch cities, while equal numbers fled into England and Germany, leaving none but the poorest, least industrious, and most abandoned part of the inhabitants behind. The ruin of the great Flemish emporium of trade had an extraordinary effect upon the commerce of England as well as of Europe. In the words of Adam

Anderson, "the famous city of Antwerp, not only the finest of all Brabant, but likewise almost of all Europe, was miserably stripped of its wealth and prosperity, whilst riches, arts, ingenuity, and industry crowded into Amsterdam, in a manner so sudden as hardly to be paralleled in story." According to John de Witt, Grand Pensionary of Holland, "about one third part of the dealers in and weavers of says, damasks, and stockings, who were settled at Antwerp, went into England because those trades were then new to the English, and therefore under no halls or guilds excluding foreigners; another great part went to Leyden; the traders in linen fixed at Haarlem; and the Flemish fishing went mostly to Holland." Commenting upon the fall of Antwerp and the rise of Amsterdam, John de Witt remarks, "the king of Spain acted according to the practice of all absolute monarchs in destroying the great city, which he thought too powerful, and dispersing the traffic over his other numerous towns; but the merchants of Antwerp, being compelled to forsake their homes, chose Amsterdam to settle in, because the isles of Zealand were not so well situated for inland commerce, and there was no toleration of religion either in France or England; in the latter country also there were heavy duties on goods exported and imported." On the last point the Flemish traders hold maxims far in advance of the age, as reported by John Botero, author of a remarkable treatise on the causes of the rise and decay of commercial towns. "The Flemish cities," says Botero, "were the most mercantile and the most frequented for commerce and traffic in all Europe, on the principal cause that the infinite quantity of merchandize imported and exported paid but a very small custom." This was a lesson which English governments took a long time to learn.

The series of maritime expeditions commenced by Cabot, Frobisher, and Drake continued without interruption till the end of Elizabeth's reign, serving not a little to make the English name known all over the globe. In 1586, Thomas Cavendish, a native of Trimby, in Suffolk, set out on a second circumnavigation of the earth, quite as remarkable as that effected by Francis Drake ten years before. He left Plymouth with three small vessels on the 22nd of July, and on the 7th of January following passed the strait of Magellan, from which point he kept his course close to the western coast of America, in the track of his great predecessor. When opposite the Californian shore he fell in, on the 28th of July, 1587, with the "Santa Anna," an Acapulco ship of seven hundred tons, laden with a cargo of immense value, and after a desperate conflict extending over six hours, boarded it and seized the treasure, which proved sufficient to make every man under the command of Cavendish independent in fortune for the rest of his life. From California the adventurers, in their little fishing-boats, sailed right across the wide Pacific and the Indian Ocean, doubling the Cape of Good Hope on the 12th of May, 1588, and reaching England again on the 9th of September, thus accomplishing the circumnavigation of the world in little more than twenty-five months. The riches brought back by Cavendish and his companions had a great effect towards stimulating similar enterprises; and crowds of bold sailors started on voyages to the eastern and western coasts of America, which, though many of them were little else than filibustering expeditions, had yet considerable influence in assisting the growth of English commerce. This was more particularly the case with the maritime explorations of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, who himself was in many respects the noblest and most perfect type of England's sea-kings in the age of Elizabeth. Gilbert, a native of Dartmouth, in Devonshire, descendant of an old Norman family, began his career as a learned soldier, having studied at Oxford, and after distinguishing himself in the Irish wars and the Low Countries, became a member of parliament in 1571. He next published a treatise attempting to demonstrate the existence of a north-west passage to Cathay and the Indies; and to show his belief in the theories advanced by him prepared an expedition to the regions already explored by Frobisher in 1578, having obtained in the same year letters patent from the queen giving him authority to "discover and take possession of any remote heathen and barbarous lands not being actually possessed by any Christian prince or people." In the fitting out of the expedition, Gilbert's half-brother, Walter Raleigh, took an active part; but on the first start turning out a failure he retired from it, preferring for the time his brilliant career at court to the dangers of the sea. Gilbert finally sailed from Cawsand Bay, near Plymouth, on the 11th of June, 1583, with five small ships, he himself at the helm of the foremost vessel, a jewel in the form of a golden anchor, a present from the queen, conspicuously on his breast. After taking possession of Newfoundland, Gilbert tried to make his way into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, but lost the largest of his vessels in a gale off Cape Breton, which made him take the command of the "Squirrel," a boat of ten tons, which he called his "little frigate." The storm continuing, the remaining vessels ran extreme danger; but it was in vain the captain of the "Golden Hind," a bark of forty tons, entreated Gilbert to turn back, or at least to transfer himself to the larger ship. Sir Humphrey refused to leave his post of danger, and kept battling with the gale till Monday, the 9th of September, when, in the words of the captain of the "Hind," the "little frigate" was "near cast away, oppressed by the waves, yet at that time recovered, and giving forth signs of joy, the general, sitting abaft with a book in his hand, cried out unto us, as we did approach within hearing, 'We are as near to heaven by sea as by land,' reiterating the same speech, well becoming a soldier resolute in Jesus Christ." "That same Monday night," the captain continues his narrative, "about twelve of the clock, the frigate being ahead of us in the 'Golden Hind,' suddenly her lights were out, whereof, as it were in a moment, we lost the sight, and withal our watch cried the general was cast away, which was too true, for in that moment the frigate was devoured and swallowed up by the sea."

It was in emulation of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, whom he felt, probably, ashamed of having deserted in the hour of need, that Walter Raleigh formed, the year after the death of his half-brother, a vast scheme for exploring the southern parts of North America, adjoining the great bay known as the Gulf of Florida.

He began by fitting out at his own expense two ships, which left England in the month of April, and returned in September, reporting that they had discovered and taken possession of a beautiful country, possessing the most excellent climate and soil, with many fine rivers, and intersected by numerous arms of the sea, offering splendid harbours. The idea of forming an English settlement in the new country at once occurred to Raleigh, who had been knighted in the meanwhile, and the queen encouraged the plan so far as to give the district the name of Virginia. The following year, 1585, Sir Walter Raleigh despatched a fleet of seven ships to the projected colony, under the command of his relative, Richard Grenville; and shortly after, encouraged by the royal donation of twelve thousand acres of the forfeited estates of the Irish earl of Desmond, he fitted out a third fleet for Virginia, to carry a number of emigrants thither. According to the account of William Camden, the antiquary, this expedition, which proved in a great measure abortive, made England acquainted with the tobacco plant, the use of which spread so rapidly that by the end of the reign of Elizabeth smoking had become quite general. "These men," says Camden, referring to the unsuccessful settlers of Virginia, "who were brought back to England, were the first that used that Indian plant called tobacco, or nicotia, which they used against crudities, being taught it by the Indians. And from that time forward it began to grow into great request, and to be sold at a high rate, whilst in a short time men everywhere, some for wantonness, some for health sake, with insatiable desire and greediness, sucked in the stinking smoke thereof through an earthen pipe, which presently they blew out again at their nostrils." His first attempt to establish a settlement having failed, Raleigh, with undaunted perseverance, fitted out three more vessels for the same object, inviting emigrants to America by the publication of a pamphlet called "A True Report of the New-found Land of Virginia," which painted the state of the country in rose colours. This brought him one hundred and fifty adventurers of both sexes, who sailed from Portsmouth on the 26th of April, 1587, and arrived in Hatorask Harbour on the 22nd of July. The first sight that met their eyes on landing was a quantity of human bones scattered on the beach, the remains of settlers from England, who had been slain by the natives; and on proceeding inland to the old colony, which was expected to be still in existence, nothing but ruins could be found, the village built by the first emigrants sent out by Raleigh being represented by a few heaps of stones, among which the wild deer were crouching, feeding on the herbage and melons which had overgrown the floor and crept up the walls of the former dwellings. Though profoundly discouraged by this spectacle, the emigrants nevertheless set to work building fresh houses, not, however, on the old site, but on the island of Roanoke, which new settlement they called the city of Raleigh. Nature here offered everything in abundance for the supply of physical wants; but for this very reason the settlement proved a complete failure. Having nothing to do but gather juicy fruit coming to their very lips, shoot the fearlessly approaching deer, and draw nets from the water crowded with fish, the adventurers, freed, to their own misfortune, from the struggle for existence, began by quarrelling among themselves, and after that entered into disputes with the natives. On hearing that his new colony was not getting on better than the old one, Raleigh, at the end of two years, sent out a small fleet with supplies, both in men and stores, to the settlers, hoping to inspire them by this means with new energy. But the fleet, attacked by storms and Spanish privateers, flying offshoots of the great Armada, did not reach Virginia, and the ultimate fate of the English settlers was never known. All perished in the earthly paradise where they had sought a home, without leaving a trace behind them; their very bones disappeared under the rich vegetation of the south, and the city of Raleigh became the habitation of bears, wolves, wild cats, and rattlesnakes. Thus sadly ended the first attempt of England to found a colonial empire.

Elizabeth took very little direct interest in the colonisation schemes of Raleigh and others, her efforts for the encouragement of commerce and industry being directed more to carry immigrants into England than to send emigrants away from it, and more to form a navy fit to undertake the profitable carrying trade of the Dutch and Flemings than fleets entering upon showy conquests like those of the Spaniards and Portuguese. At the accession of the queen the navy of England was of the most insignificant dimensions, the whole number of ships owned by natives not being equal to the arrivals or departures of the port of Antwerp on a single day, taking the average of the year. The vast increase of commercial activity, and the unwearying efforts of the government, had the result that in 1573, when Elizabeth had been thirteen years on the throne, the entire navy, royal as well as mercantile, comprised one hundred and forty-six vessels, of which thirteen belonged to the crown and the rest to merchants, the latter, however, being armed as well as the former, and bound by law to assist in the defence of the country. For the next ten years the number of ships increased but little, but they augmented in size. According to the authority of Burchet, for many years secretary to the board of Admiralty, "the merchant ships of England, in the year 1582, the twenty-fourth of Queen Elizabeth, were reckoned one hundred and thirty-five, many of them of five hundred tons each," and "those ships were esteemed the principal part of our maritime power." The greater part of the navy of England was fitted out and put to sea to encounter the Spanish Armada, in 1588, the number, by one account, comprising one hundred and seventeen ships, manned by eleven thousand sailors, and by another, which probably included some foreign craft, principally Dutch, one hundred and eighty vessels. In a report, or remonstrance, sent by the corporation of the Trinity House to the lord high admiral of England, in the last year of Elizabeth's reign, it is stated "that in the year 1588 the queen's majesty had at sea one hundred and fifty sail of ships, whereof forty were her own, and one hundred and ten the ships of her subjects; and that in the said year there were likewise one hundred and fifty sail of English merchant ships employed in trading voyages to all parts, each being of about one hundred and fifty tons burthen, one with another." The whole of these three hundred vessels, a great many of them coasters, or fishing-boats, were, by the same account, "manned with thirty thousand seamen, namely, the queen's forty ships with twelve thousand, or three hundred in each ship; the one hundred and ten hired vessels with twelve thousand one hundred, or one hundred and ten in each ship on an average; and the one hundred and fifty trading ships with six thousand seamen, or forty in each ship." The wars with Spain had an ill effect upon the development of the navy, according to the report of the Trinity House corporation, which goes on to say that "a little above twelve years since, the said year 1588," or just at the commencement of the seventeenth century, "the shipping and number of seamen are decayed about one third part." Altogether the fleet of England, both for war and peace, remained comparatively small until the end of Elizabeth's reign; but the queen, nevertheless, as if conscious of the prodigious strength that was sleeping within the nation, spoke in very high language to the greatest maritime power in the world. "Upon Spain's complaining," says William Camden, "that the English ships frequented the Indian seas, Queen Elizabeth declared that the ocean was free to all; forasmuch as neither nature, nor regard of public use, do permit the exclusive possession thereof." There was a potent seed of future grandeur in this new doctrine started by Elizabeth of the ocean being free to all.

One of the greatest services rendered by the queen to the internal commerce of the country was the restoration of the coinage, which had been vilely debased by her predecessors, to the extent of seriously interfering with the interchange of commodities. Under Henry VII. the standard originally fixed by Edward IV., in 1464, and adhered to subsequently, was well preserved, the pound of silver being coined into four hundred and fifty pennies, or thirty-seven and a half nominal shillings. The first shilling coins, or large groats, as the people called them, were struck by Henry VII. in 1504; and to the end of his reign the king continued making money on the legal standard, deeming the principle of honesty in this respect a very important part of commercial policy. But his son had no sooner ascended the throne when honesty came to an end. Being always in want of money, spite of his gigantic robberies and extortions, and having not the slightest regard for the welfare of his subjects, but taking the satisfaction of his whims and passions as his sole guide, Henry VIII. hit upon the idea, now as yet in England, of multiplying his cash by debasing the coin—that is, by mixing brass with the precious metals. He at first made five hundred and forty pennies out of a pound of silver, instead of four hundred and fifty, as his father; and seeing that his subjects submitted to the fraud with admirable patience, he gradually increased his brass and diminished the silver until he had come to coin five hundred and seventy-six pennies out of only four ounces of silver. The distress and confusion created by this deterioration of the medium of exchange were enormous, and lasted throughout the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward, and Mary. Under Edward some feeble attempts were made to restore the coinage, though without effect; and Mary, after issuing a virtuous proclamation dwelling upon the miseries caused in the two preceding reigns by base money, made it baser still to a considerable amount. Thus things had arrived at a frightful state of disorder, almost paralysing trade, when Elizabeth came to the throne, and at once set a stop to the anarchy that had arisen by calling in, at a large sacrifice to herself, the whole of the debased coin, and issuing instead money after the legal standard. It was an undertaking of no little difficulty, greatly increased through the old coin, bad as it was, having been lessened in weight by clipping, to the extent of not being worth frequently even one half its nominal value. To prevent as much as possible a recurrence of this species of fraud, Elizabeth introduced milled edges, and otherwise perfected, with the help chiefly of foreign artisans, the outward shape and appearance of the money coined in her reign, making it superior to any yet produced in England. She likewise multiplied the various descriptions of coins, to the infinite advantage of small dealers and the poorer classes in general, who previously experienced the greatest trouble in carrying on the trading transactions of daily life. There were struck in her reign sovereigns and half sovereigns, crowns and half crowns, angels, half angels, and quarter angels, nobles and double nobles, dollars, shillings, sixpences, and groats. So much did the question of coinage, of the industrial importance of which she was fully aware, occupy her mind, that in the very last year of her life she harboured schemes for improving the existing system by striking small coins of copper, to be called farthings and half farthings, for the special benefit of the poorest of the poor. But death stopped, as many higher plans, so the making of farthings. Nevertheless, of all the virtues inscribed upon her tombstone as belonging to the great queen, there was none she more truly deserved as that formulated in the words, "moneta in justum valorem reducta."

The latest event of Elizabeth's reign affecting commerce was also one of the greatest. On the 31st of December, 1600, two years and two months before the death of the queen, she granted a charter to George, earl of Cumberland, and two hundred and fifteen knights, gentlemen, and merchants, "That at their own cost and charges they might set forth on one or more voyages to the East Indies, in the countries and parts of Asia and Africa, and to the islands thereabouts, to be one body politic and corporate, by the name of the Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies." The charter granted to the company the exclusive privilege "to trade, by such means and passages as are already found out, or as shall hereafter be discovered, into the countries and parts of Asia and Africa, and into and from all the islands, ports, towns, and places of Asia, Africa, and America, or any of them beyond the Cape of Good Hope to the Straits of Magellan, where any traffic or merchandize may be used to and from every one of them, in such manner as shall from time to time be limited and agreed on at any public assembly, or general court of the company, any statute, usage, diversity of religion or faith, or any other matter to the contrary notwithstanding, so as the trade be not to any country already possessed by any Christian potentate in amity with her majesty, who shall declare the same to be against his or their good liking." It was also provided in the charter that "none of the queen's subjects but the company, their servants, or assigns, shall resort to India without being licensed by the company, upon pain of forfeiting ships and cargoes, with imprisonment, till the offenders give one thousand pounds bond to the company not to trade thither again." When this charter was signed by Elizabeth, English ships had already found their way to India, the first in 1591, in a privateering expedition fitted out by some London merchants against the Portuguese who had taken possession of a small territory on the western coast. The expedition consisted of three ships, the largest commanded by Thomas Raymond, as chief "general," and the next in size under the captaincy of James Lancaster, a skilful and daring seaman, well acquainted with the navigation of the southern seas. Misfortune overtook the little fleet from the outset; before reaching the Cape of Good Hope, a pestilence broke out on board one of the vessels, the smallest, which had to be sent back to England, and the Cape had no sooner been passed when there arose a terrible gale, the full fury of which fell upon Raymond's ship, which was heard of no more. Lancaster succeeded in reaching India, and after visiting Tranquebar and Ceylon, and shipping a valuable cargo of pepper and spices, set sail for the Spanish possessions in America, in the hope of falling in with a stray argosy that would pay, better than the spices and pepper, for the expenses of the expedition. He met none, however, and getting short of provisions, landed on the uninhabited island of Mona, midway between San Domingo and Porto Rico, where he disembarked with the greater part of his crew. While on shore, looking for food, six of the sailors who had remained behind in the ship resolved to run away with it; and the captain and his men were left on the lonely isle, where they had to remain for nearly two years, suffering fearful privations. At last, after several of the men had perished of hunger and disease, the rest were picked up by a passing French vessel, and got home again towards the end of 1593. The miseries he had undergone had no effect whatever in extinguishing the spirit of adventure in James Lancaster, and returned to his friends, he made all possible efforts in getting up another expedition to the semi-fabulous east which he had been the first to visit from England. He succeeded in interesting the earl of Cumberland, a genial maritime adventurer and friend of Sir Walter Raleigh, in his schemes, and the consequence was the formation of the "Company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies."

As soon as the company had obtained their charter they raised the sum of seventy two thousand pounds, in fifty-pound shares, and fitted out four vessels, the best that could be found in England, for a voyage of exploration to India. James Lancaster was appointed to the command in chief of the expedition, with the title of "Admiral of the Fleet," and having shipped twenty-seven thousand pounds' worth of merchandize and coin, with a large quantity of stores, artillery, and ammunition, the four vessels, the largest of six hundred, and the smallest of two hundred and forty tons burthen, with a total crew of four hundred and eighty, dropped down the Thames on the 13th of February, 1601. Remaining some time at Torbay, where John Davis, discoverer of the Davis' Straits, and renowned for his nautical skill, joined the fleet as chief pilot, Lancaster finally set sail for India on the 22nd of April. After a long and dangerous voyage Lancaster reached, on the 5th of June, 1602, the port of Acheen in Sumatra, where he was exceedingly well received by the native king, in consequence chiefly of a letter from Elizabeth, which strongly appealed to his intellect as well as flattered his vanity, under the pleasing illusion that the epistle was solely addressed to him, whereas it was but a copy of a circular directed to all the dark chieftains in the southern seas with whom the "Admiral of the Fleet" should happen to fall in. The circular, highly creditable to the queen, as containing very enlarged views of international commerce, ran as follows:—"Elizabeth, by the grace of God, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith. To the Great and Mighty King of ——. Whereas Almighty God, in his infinite and unsearchable wisdom and gracious providence, hath so disposed of his blessings and of the good things of this world created and ordained for the use of man, that the same, however they be brought forth, do either originally grow and are gathered or otherwise composed and made, some in one country and some in another. Yet are they by the industrie of man, directed by the hand of God, dispersed and sent out into all partes of the world, that his wonderful bountie in his creatures may appeare unto all nations, his majesty having so ordained that noe one place should enjoye as the native commodities thereof all things appertayninge to man's use, but that one countie should have need of another, and out of the abundance of the fruits which one region enjoyeth the necessities or wants of another should be supplied. By which means men of severall and far remote countries have commerce and traffique one with another, and, by their interchange of commodities, are linked together in amitie and friendship."

After this preamble, the letter went on:—"The above considerations, most noble king, together with the honourable report of your majesty for well entertaining of strangers that visit your country with love and fear, with lawfull traffique of merchandize, have moved us to give license to divers of our subjects who have been stirred up with a desire by a long and dangerous navigation to find out and visit y<sup>r</sup> territories and dominions, being famous in this part of the world for honourable merchandize, and to offer you commerce and traffique in buying, bartoring, and interchanging of commodities with your people according to the course of merchants, which comence and interchanging of yours shall accept of and receive and entertain our merchants with favour, according to the hope that gave them encouragement to attempt so long and dangerous a voyage; you shall find them a people in their dealing in conversation of that justice and civillitie that you shall not mislike of their repair to your dominions, and upon further conference and inquisition had with them, both of the kind of their merchandize brought in their ships and of other necessarie commodities which our dominions may afford, it may appear to y<sup>r</sup> majesty that by their means you may be furnished in their next retourne into your ports in better sort than you have been heretofore supplied, either by the Spaniard or Portugals, who of all other nations in the parts of Europe have onelie hitherto frequented your countie with trade of merchandize, and have been the onelie impediment both to our subjects and divers other merchants in the parts of Europe, that they have not hitherto visited your countie with trade, whilst the said Portugalls pretended themselves to be the sovereign lords and princes of all territories, and gave it out that they held your nation and people as subjects to them, and in their stiles and titles doe write themselves kings of the East Indies; and if y<sup>r</sup> Majesty shall in y<sup>r</sup> princelie favour accept with good liking this first repair of our merchants unto y<sup>r</sup> countries resorting thither in peaceable traffic, and shall entertain thus their first voyage as an introduction to a further continuance of league and friendship between y<sup>r</sup> majesty and us, of commerce and intercourse between y<sup>r</sup> subjects and ours, we have given order to this our principal merchant, if y<sup>r</sup> majesty should be pleased therewith, to leave in y<sup>r</sup> countie some such of our said merchants as he shall make choice of to reside in y<sup>r</sup> dominions under y<sup>r</sup> princelie and safe protection, untill the retourne of another fleet which we shall send unto you, who may in the meantime learn the language of y<sup>r</sup> countie and apply their behaviour as it may best sort to a connexion with y<sup>r</sup> majesty's subjects, so that amitie and friendship being interchanged and begun, the same may the better be continued when our people shall be instructed how to direct themselves according to the fashions of y<sup>r</sup> countries. And because, as the consideration of the entertaining of amitie and friendship in the establishment of intercourse to be continued between us, there may be required on y<sup>r</sup> majesty's behalf such promise or capitulation to be performed by us which we cannot in these letters take knowledge of, we therefore pray y<sup>r</sup> majesty to give care therein to this bearer, and to give him credit in whatsoever he shall promise or undertake in our name concerning our amitie and interchange, which promise we for our parts, in the worde of a prince, will see performed, and will be redie gratefully to requite any love, kindness, or favour that our subjects receive at y<sup>r</sup> majesty's hands. Praying y<sup>r</sup> majesty for a better satisfaction of y<sup>r</sup> kind acceptance of this our love and amitie offered y<sup>r</sup> highness, you would by this bearer give testimony thereof by y<sup>r</sup> princillie letters directed unto us, which shall give us great and wonderful content."

The letter was received with the greatest satisfaction by the king of Acheen, who appeared to be much impressed with its contents, and came to form a high idea of the good sense, honesty, and straightforwardness of the new race with whom he had got into contact. After receiving the English admiral at a public audience, with great display of pomp, he concluded with him a treaty of amity and commerce, granting all the privileges asked for, and allowing the shipment, free of duties, of a fixed quantity of pepper and spices. His business in Sumatra finished, Lancaster set sail with his four ships—the "Dragon," of six hundred, the "Hector," of three hundred, the "Ascension," of two hundred and sixty, and the "Susan," of two hundred and forty tons—for Bantam, in the island of Java. On the way thither he fell in with a Portuguese carrack, of nine hundred tons, loaded with calicoes and other manufactures of India, which he captured; contenting himself, however, with laying hands upon the goods, and allowing the crew to retain possession of their vessel. On the 5th of December, 1602, the English fleet arrived at Bantam, where Lancaster met with as agreeable a reception as he had found at Acheen, and having delivered the queen's letter, he made propositions for a commercial treaty. The agreement was duly concluded, and put into force at once by the opening of a brisk trade with the natives, who were found willing to sell bags of pepper, weighing sixty-two pounds, for five and a half Spanish dollars, or about twenty-five shillings, which gave an extremely handsome profit to the purchasers. From Bantam the admiral sent a pinnace, with twelve men, and some of the merchants, representatives of shareholders of the company who had come with him from England, to establish a factory in the Molucca Islands; and having completed the cargoes of his ships, and taken affectionate leave of the king, an intelligent youth, he started on the return voyage on the 20th of February, 1603, leaving three agents with eight assistants behind him, to watch over the interests of the new settlements. After encountering dreadful storms, in which Lancaster's own ship, the "Dragon," lost rudder and spars, and had to be taken in tow by one of the smaller vessels, the admiral arrived, in the month of July, at the island of St. Helena, of which he took possession in the name of Queen Elizabeth—now no more. The voyage across the Atlantic from St. Helena was highly prosperous, and the Indian adventurers, unconscious founders of a new empire, reached the mouth of the Thames on the 11th of September, 1603. They bitterly wept on learning the news that the great queen who had helped them to plant the flag of England on the shores of the Indian Ocean was lying in her marble tomb in Westminster Abbey.

SEAL OF ELIZABETH.

CHAPTER VI.

History of Manners and Customs, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of Elizabeth.

As in religion, politics, literature, and commerce, so in the various conformations of social life, the Tudor period forms the connecting link between the barbarism of the middle ages and the progress of modern civilization, its commencement resting in the former and its end in the latter era. During the greater part of the reign of Henry VII. the mediæval aspect predominated; the vices engendered by long years of brutal warfare were still on the surface, and the virtues of peace and industry slow in coming. Bands of robbery, waste of the great military host of the feudal aristocracy, kept infesting highways and byways; and, notwithstanding the extreme severity of the laws, murder, rapine, and theft were flourishing, not only in the thinly populated country, but in the very midst of large cities. "There is no country in the world," wrote a diplomatic Venetian traveller, who visited England about the middle of the reign of Henry VII., "where there are so many thieves and robbers as in England; insomuch that few venture to go alone in the country, excepting in the middle of the day, and fewer still in the towns at night, and least of all in London." Sir Thomas More, in his "Utopia," bestows great praises upon "that strait and rigorous justice which at that time was executed upon felons, who were, for the most part, twenty hanged together upon one gallows." But he himself acknowledges that even this summary mode of justice did not answer; and "seeing so few escaped punishment, he could not choose but wonder and marvel how, and by what evil luck, it should come to pass that thieves nevertheless were in every place so rife and so rank." The latter fact is repeatedly stated by the Venetian traveller, who declared that he "did wonder and marvel" at the combined existence of so many thieves and so many gallows. "People are taken up every day by dozens," he says, "like birds in a covey, and especially in London; yet for all this they never cease to rob and murder in the streets." So great was the lawlessness that more than one generation was required for its cure.

At the side of all this crime and wretchedness among the lower classes, the upper ranks of society, chiefly of the clergy, exhibited barbaric splendour in their doings, shows, and entertainments. At the priory of St. Thomas, at Canterbury, there was a hall, 150 feet long and 40 feet broad, appropriated to the accommodation of pilgrims, who fared there in the most sumptuous manner, waited upon by many stewards and attendants; besides these liberalities, there was a daily distribution to the poor of all the fragments of the refectory. More princely still in his hospitality was the abbot of St. Alban's, who entertained every traveller who came to his gates for full three days. The proud dignitary himself used to dine every day in state, at a table raised fifteen steps above the rest of the hall, at which he sat alone; only very high guests had the honour of sitting near to the abbot. He was waited upon by monks, who performed a hymn at every fifth step, and sang hallelujahs when their master had swallowed his due quantity of victuals. These monks seemed to consider good cheer a part of their religion. Ingulphus, the historian of Croyland Abbey—the weird old ruins of which still raise their head above the Lincolnshire fens—passes a high eulogium upon the cook, Lawrence Chatores, who, "prompted by the love of God and zeal for religion," gave the monks, at his own expense, milk of almonds on fish days. The Venetian traveller before mentioned, well acquainted though he was with the luxurious life of the priests at Rome, was yet surprised at the immense wealth displayed by the English clergy. "There is," he exclaims, "not a parish church in the kingdom so mean as not to possess crucifixes, candlesticks, censers, patens, and cups of silver; nor is there a convent of mendicant friars so poor as not to have all these same articles in silver, besides many other ornaments worthy of a cathedral church." Further on he breaks out: "But the magnificence of the tomb of St. Thomas the Martyr, archbishop of Canterbury, is that which surpasses all belief. This, notwithstanding its great size, is entirely covered with plates of pure gold; but the gold is scarcely visible from the variety of precious stones with which it is studded, such as sapphires, diamonds, rubies, and emeralds." The contrast of all this pomp and splendour of the religious bodies, and of the utter wretchedness of the masses, struck others besides the Venetian traveller.

The great barons lived not nearly so well as the men of the church; their entertainments showed a mixed state of barbarism and magnificence, and with much ostentation, there was an utter absence of the refinements and even the comforts of life. A minute delineation of the daily routine in the establishment of one of these feudal barons is given in the "Northumberland Household Book," printed after the original of a noble earl of this family, who lived in the reign of Henry VII. The family of this earl of Northumberland consisted of 166 persons, including servants, and there were reckoned, besides, 57 visitors every day, so that board and lodging had to be provided for not less than 223 individuals. According to the accounts in the "Household Book," the daily expense of each person, for food, drink, and firing, amounted to two pence halfpenny; but servants, away from home on their master's service, were only allowed two pence a day. For the whole household, somewhat above a quarter of wheat was allowed for every month throughout the year, the wheat being estimated at five shillings and eight pence a quarter. Two hundred and fifty quarters of malt were also allowed, at four shillings a quarter, and two hogsheads were to be made of a quarter, giving about a bottle and a third of beer a day to each person, which liquor was certainly not very strong. One hundred and nine fat beeves were bought at Allhallow-tide, at thirteen shillings and four pence a piece; and twenty-four lean beeves were purchased at St. Helen's, at eight shillings a piece. The latter were put into the pastures to feed, so as to serve from Midsummer to Michaelmas, which was the only time during which the family had fresh beef, the members living for all the rest of the year on salted meat. One hundred and sixty gallons of mustard were allowed in a year; which quantity was indeed requisite for the salt beef. Six hundred and forty-seven sheep were also allowed, at twenty pence a piece; but these, too, were all caten salted, except between Lammas and Michaelmas. Only twenty-five hogs were allowed, at two shillings a piece; with twenty-eight veals at twenty pence, and forty lambs at ten pence or a shilling. The latter were, however, reserved for my lord's table, or that of the upper servants, called the knights' table. The lower servants, getting nothing but salted meat almost through the whole year, and with few or no vegetables, had a very bad and unhealthy diet. "So that," says David Hume, "there cannot be anything more erroneous than the magnificent ideas formed of the Roast Beef of Old England." Modern Englishmen must entertain as much an idea of Old England's cleanliness, for only seventy ells of linen at eight pence an ell, were annually allowed for the great family, and no sheets were used. The linen was made into eight tablecloths for my lord's table; and one tablecloth for the knights—this last, it appears, was washed but once a month. Only forty shillings were allowed for washing throughout the whole year, and most of this small sum was expended on the linen belonging to the chapel. The drinking, however, was tolerable, namely, ten tuns and two hogsheds of Gascony wine, at the rate of four pounds thirteen shillings and four pence a tun. On the other hand, only ninety-one dozen of candles were given out for the whole year.

The family rose at six in the morning, dined at ten, and supped at four in the afternoon. The gates were all shut at nine, and no farther ingress or egress permitted. My lord and lady had set on their table, for breakfast, at seven o'clock in the morning, a quart of beer, as much wine, two pieces of salt fish, six red herrings, four white ones, or a dish of spits. On flesh days there were half a chyne of mutton, or a chyne of beef boiled. Mass was ordered to be said at six o'clock, in order, says the "Household Book," that all my lord's servants may rise early. Only twenty-four fires were allowed, beside the kitchen and hall, and most of these had only a peck of coals a day. After Lady-day no fires were permitted in the rooms, except half fires in my lord's and lady's, and the nursery. It appears from the "Household Book" that the ancient lord was constantly stirring about. When on his travels he carried with him thirty-six horsemen, together with loads of furniture, bedding, and kitchen utensils, the existing inns not being able to give more than bare room. My lord passed the year in three country-seats, all in Yorkshire, Wryfel, Leckenfield, and Topcliffe; but he had furniture only for one. He carried everything along with him, beds, tables, chairs, and kitchen utensils, all which articles were, probably, so coarse that they could not be spoilt by the carriage. Yet seventeen carts and one waggon sufficed for the whole—one cart for all the kitchen utensils, cooks' beds, and the rest. A very remarkable circumstance was that this ancient earl had eleven priests in his house, with seventeen attendants, chanters, and musicians, belonging to his chapel; while there were only two cooks for a family of 223 persons. Their meals were certainly dressed in the slovenly manner of a ship's crew. "It is amusing to observe," says David Hume, commenting upon the "Household Book" of the Northumberland earl, "the pompous and even royal style assumed by this Tartar chief. He does not give any orders, though only for the right making of mustard, but it is introduced with this preamble, 'It seemeth good to us and our council.' If we consider the magnificent and elegant manner in which the Venetian and other Italian noblemen then lived, with the progress made by the Italians in literature and the fine arts, we shall not wonder that they considered the ultra-montaine nations as barbarous."

The Venetian traveller who visited England about the reign of Henry VII.—presumed to be the secretary of Francesco Capello, first ambassador of the great republic on the Adriatic to this country—noted in his account, which has come down to the present time, everything he saw with wonderment and surprise. Social life in England evidently appeared to him very different from the forms to which he had been accustomed in France and Italy. "There are three estates in England," he notes, as not a little remarkable, "the Commons, the Nobles, and the Ecclesiastics. The people are held in little more esteem than if they were slaves"—il popolo è in poco maggiore stima che se fosse servo. "The clergy," he continues, "are they who have the supreme sway over the country, both in peace and war. Amongst other things, they have provided that a number of sacred places in the kingdom should serve for the refuge and escape of all delinquents; and no one, were he a traitor to the crown, or had he offended against the king's own person, can be taken out of these by force. Many a villain of this kind, who, for some great excess that he has committed, has been obliged to take refuge in one of these sacred places, often goes out of it to prowl on the roads, and returning, escapes all punishment. This commonly proves no loss to the pursues of the priests, nor to the general income of the sanctuaries. Every church is a sanctuary for forty days; and if a thief or murderer, who has taken refuge in one, cannot quit it in safety within this time, he may give notice that he wishes to leave England. In this case, being stripped to the shirt by the chief magistrate of the place, and a crucifix placed in his hand, he is conducted along the road to the sea, where, if he finds a passage, he may go in peace. And if there is no ship, he has to walk into the sea up to his throat, praying for a passage, which must be repeated till a vessel can take him on board." The writer concludes: "It is not unamusing to hear how women and children lament over the misfortune of these exiles, asking how it is possible to live out of England, and repeating to each other that 'they would rather die than go out of the world,' as if England were the whole world!"—come se Inghilterra fosse tutto il mondo! The Venetian gentleman clearly thought the England of Henry VII. anything but a desirable part of the world.

But there was one thing the Venetian admired in the Englishmen he met with: they fed well, and, better still, they drank well. "They take great pleasure," he says, "in having a quantity of excellent victuals, and also in remaining a long time at table." "But," he adds, maliciously, "they are very sparing of wine when they drink it at their own expense. Few people keep wine in their own houses, but buy it, for the most part, at a tavern; and when they mean to drink a great deal they go to the tavern. This is done not only by the men, but by ladies of distinction." The Venetian here speaks only of drinking wine, which to him appeared the only beverage fit for civilized beings. He adds that the strange people who live in England have "an abundance of ale and beer, to the use of which they have become so habituated that even at an entertainment where there is plenty of wine they will drink beer in preference and in great quantities. Like discreet people, however, they do not offer it to Italians." Now comes a master stroke of shrewd observation. "These English," he exclaims, "think no greater honour can be conferred or received than to invite others to eat with them, or to be invited themselves, and they would sooner give five or six ducats to provide an entertainment for a person, than a groat to assist him in his distress." If the cap fitted "these English" as closely in the reign of Henry VII. as four centuries after, the Venetian was a true philosopher.

A much greater man than this Venetian traveller, the famous Erasmus of Rotterdam, "the glory of the priesthood and the shame," left a far worse description of the social state of England at this period. The learned Dutchman, though most favourably inclined towards the English people, from whom, indeed, he received nothing but praises and caresses, could yet not shut his eye to many of the horrors of all but savage life which he saw everywhere around him. That England was periodically, and at short intervals, visited by the plague was to him no wonder at all. "The floors of the houses," he says, "are mostly of clay, and strowed with rushes. Fresh rushes are from time to time laid over them, but the old ones remain as a foundation for perhaps twenty years together." Of the living and dead contents of this "foundation," the great Rotterdam scholar then goes on to give a description in elegant Latin, which decency forbids to render into modern English. Erasmus advised his friends to do away with their rushes, and politely also gave it as his opinion that "it would contribute to health if people ate and drank less, and lived on fresh rather than salt meat." Erasmus, as well as other observers, natives and foreigners, complained of the great dinners being mere animal feeding, unenlivened by intelligent conversation. Harrison, in his preface to "Holinshed's Chronicle," mentions "the great silence that is used at the tables of the honourable sort, generally all over the realm;" and the Venetian traveller also was struck in seeing "how punctiliously they sat in their order, and the extraordinary silence of every one." This was on the occasion of a lord mayor's dinner, which lasted above four hours, and at which there were more than one thousand persons at table. "There was," the guest relates, "an infinite profusion of victuals and of plate, which was for the most part gilt;" but all this, in his opinion, was poor compensation for the want of good spirits and sociability. There was another thing he did not like, namely, that "the English being great epicures, and very avaricious by nature, indulge in the most delicate fare themselves, and give their household the coarsest bread and beer, and cold meat baked on Sunday for the week." One more charge, worse than that of "cold meat," was that of want of domestic affection. "Although their dispositions," says the Venetian, "are inclined to licentiousness, I have never noticed any one, either at court or among the lower orders, to be in love. One must conclude, therefore, either that the English are the most discreet lovers in the world, or that they are incapable of love. I say this of the men; for I understand it is quite the contrary with the women, who are very violent in their passions. Howbeit the English keep jealous guard over their wives, though anything may be compensated in the end by the power of money."

The reign of Henry VII. was remarkable for the spread of ideas of social equality, mainly derived from the teachings of the Lollards, and which the upper classes sought to combat by propagating doctrines of the opposite kind. The latter found a warm champion in Alexander Barclay, clergyman and poet, who furnished a legendary explanation of the divisions of blood, in one of his seven "Eclogues." His story was that God went to visit Eva one day, when Adam was away from home, planting turnips or something else, and that she, seeing him come up to the house, while a great number of her untidy or ugly children were loitering about, hid the worst-looking lot away, so as not to give offence to the Creator. "Some of them," the Reverend Alexander Barclay reports, "she placed under hay, some under straw and chaff, some in the chimney, and some in a tub or druff; but such as were fair and well made she wisely and cunningly kept with her." Entering the dwelling after this had been accomplished, God told Eva that he had come to see the children, with the intention of promoting them in their several degrees, assigning to each a rank or occupation. The mother of mankind then put her little ones forward, and God appointed the first to be an emperor, the second a king, the third a duke, and so forth, making successively earls, lords, barons, knights, squires, and "hardy champions." While this was going on, Eva's maternal heart gave way, and fearing that there would be nothing left upon earth for the children she had hidden, she drew them forth one by one from cupboard and chimney, hay and straw, and put them up in a row. They were not pleasant to look at, dirty, dusty, begimed, and ill-shapen as all of them were, "so that anybody might be frightened at the sight of them," and God, too, did not conceal his disgust. "None," he exclaimed, looking around him at the as yet unordained group, "can make a vessel of silver out of an earthen pitcher, or goodly silk out of a goat's fleece, or a bright sword of a cow's tail; neither will I, though I can, make a noble gentleman out of a vile villain. You, therefore, shall all be ploughmen and tillers of the soil, to keep oxen and hogs, to dig and delve, and hodge and dike, and in this wise shall ye live in endless servitude.

Even the townsmen shall laugh you to scorn; yet some of you shall be allowed to dwell in cities, and shall be admitted to such occupations as those of makers of puddings, butchers, cobblers, tinkers, costard-mongers, hostlers, or daubers." This account of the origin of servile labour, though much admired, like the rest of Barclay's poetical and prose works, was not at all accepted as true by the majority of the lower classes, who, to judge by the literary productions of the period, took every occasion to exhibit by indelicacy and extreme insolence towards superiors their notions of social equality.

Of the riotousness, incivility, and arrogance of the numerous troops of domestics and followers which the nobles and great landowners of the reign of Henry VII. were obliged to keep in their service, Alexander Barclay furnishes many instances, neglecting not to show, as a true moralist, how this behaviour reacted upon the manners and habits of the upper classes. Coarseness abounded everywhere, even at the royal court; high-born ladies and gentlemen amused themselves by bandying vile jests; and the very meals, to which all devoted the greatest attention, were gross to a loathsome degree, neither courtiers, lords, nor belted carls desisting to dip their hands into a common platter to fish out a delectable piece of flesh or fowl. The poet feelingly complains of a "special custom," very bad indeed, in that of the servants scampering off with the dishes before they have been well ransacked, thus leaving not even time for a fair stand-up fight for the victuals.

"A speciall custome is used them among,
No good dish to suffer on bords to be longe;
If the dish be pleasant, either fleshe or fische,
Ten handes at once swarme in the dishe,
And if it be fleshe, ten knives shall thou see Mangling the flesh and in the platter flee;
To put there thy handes is perill without hyle,
Without a gauntlet or els a glove of mayle."

Several writers mention that in the earlier part of the sixteenth century the English had gained the character of keeping the most profuse tables, and being the most formidable gluttons in Europe. According to an author whose manuscript has been printed in the "Reliquiæ Antiquæ," there was a merchant who went abroad in the last years of Henry VII., and was invited to dinner by a rich nobleman. When at table, the foreign lord wondered that his guest did not eat as much as he expected, and thereupon broke forth doubtfully, "Englishmen are called the greatest feeders in the world; and it is reported that one man of them will eat as much as six of another nation, and that more victuals are consumed there than in any other region." To which remark the merchant replied by saying, "It is true, and it is for three reasonable causes that so much victual is served with us on the table: one of which is for love, another for physic, and the third for dread. As concerns the first, we are accustomed to have many divers meats for our friends and kinsfolk, because some love one manner of meat, and some another, and we wish every man to be satisfied. Secondly, in regard of physic, because for divers maladies which people have, some men will eat one meat, and some another, it is desirable that every body should be suited. The third cause is for dread, for we have so great abundance and plenty in our realm of beasts and fowls, that if we did not kill and destroy them, they would destroy and devour us." The existence of the rude abundance boasted of by the merchant is confirmed by all the writers of the time, notably by Bishop Latimer, who, in the account of his own early home, left a picture of the social condition of the yeomen of the reign of Henry VII. Latimer's father paid four pounds a year rental, for which he had as much land under tillage as kept six men, thirty cows, and one hundred sheep. He had enough, moreover, to keep constantly a horse and a man for the king's service, to send his son to school and college, to give to each of his daughters a dowry of five pounds on marriage, and to keep his hands open in throwing alms to the poor, "all which," says Latimer, "he did from the said farm." The secret of this plenitude of riches, derived from a piece of land rented at not more than four pounds, was that farms like those of Latimer's father were mostly held under a church lease. Abbots, priors, and monks, themselves fond of good cheer, had no objection that others should live well also; and if they destroyed souls they certainly fed bodies.

The reformation under Henry VIII. brought with it an immense change, as in the mental and moral state, so in the manners, habits, social life, and general physical condition of the people. Besides the dissolution of the monasteries, leading to a redistribution of great part of the soil of the kingdom, a number of other causes, the discovery of America, and influx of precious metals, the newly-awakened commercial spirit of the nation, and the universal spread of education, went to overturn all the former conditions of society, and to erect a new England on the ruins of the old. Like other great changes, this one, in all respects the mightiest ever known in English history, affected many classes of the people very injuriously, and gave rise to a great deal of individual suffering. It was the agricultural population especially that felt the burthen of the revolution; for the courtiers, adventurers, and rogues of all descriptions among whom Henry VIII. distributed the church lands, were anything but good or wise stewards of the property intrusted to their hands, and looking to nothing but individual gain, to be realized immediately, they frequently reduced the farmers and day labourers to a worse condition than they had been in for centuries. The rent of land in many parts of England rose threefold and fourfold, the successor of Latimer's father paid a rental of sixteen pounds, instead of four, and the consequence, the bishop relates, was that the new tenant was unable "to do anything for his prince, for himself, nor for his children, nor to give a cup of drink to the poor." What greatly embittered the position of the tillers of the soil was the vast increase of enclosures, due to the augmented value of land, the general rise of prices, and the growing desire of the people of the towns to invest their savings in real property. "Hence," says Roger Ascham, speaking of enclosures and the rise of rents, "so many families dispersed, and so many houses ruined; hence the honour and strength of England, the noble yeomanry, broken up and destroyed." In a curious dialogue, in which a husbandman of the period exchanges notions of popular grievances with several townspeople, the former is made to exclaim, "Marry, for these enclosures do undo us all; for they make us to pay dearer for our land that we occupy, and causeth that we can have no land in manner for our money to put to tillage; all is taken up for pasture, either for sheep, or for grazing of cattle, in so much that I have known of late a dozen ploughs, within less compass than six miles about me, laid down within this seven years; and where three score persons or upwards had their livings, now one man with his cattle hath all." And concentrating, in the usual narrow vision of men attached to a certain description of physical labour, all his thoughts upon this one point, the farmer cries, "Yea, those sheep are the cause of all the mischiefs, for they have driven husbandry out of the country, by the which was increased before all kind of victuals, and now it is altogether sheep, sheep, sheep. It was far better when there were not only sheep enough, but also oxen, kine, swine, pig, goose, and capon, eggs, butter, and cheese; yea, and bread-corn, and malt-corn enough besides, reared altogether upon the same land." Many others, with the farmer represented here, felt the magnitude of the revolution that was coming over English society, and vainly groping after the causes, broke forth in lament of the "good old times."

Notwithstanding the increase of wealth, marked by the general rise in prices, and other signs of industrial progress which distinguished the reign of Henry VIII. from that of his predecessor, the bulk of the people, not only of the lower, but of the middle, and in part even of the upper classes, continued to live in a very rude and comfortless manner. Most of the dwellings, in town as well as country, were without chimneys, and, as of old, "made of sticks and dirt," that is, wattle plastered over with clay, the fire being lighted against the wall, and the smoke seeking its way out, as best it might, through the crevices in the roof, through door and windows. Only the wealthier classes enjoyed the luxury of beds, and the people slept on straw pallets, with a bit of wood under the head for a pillow, and nothing else but a piece of coarse matting, or perhaps a bundle of hay, for a covering. Of the rude mode of living of the bulk of the people in the time of Henry VIII., Raphael Holinshed, the historian, has left a curious picture. "There are men yet dwelling in the village where I remain," he records, writing towards the middle of Elizabeth's reign, "who have noted three things to be marvellously altered in England within their sound remembrance. One is, the multitude of chimneys lately erected, whereas in their young days there were not above two or three, if so many, in most uplandish towns of the realm—the religious houses and manor places of the lords always excepted, and peradventure some great personage—but each made his fire against a reed-dosse in the hall where he dined and dressed his meat. The second is the great amendment of lodging: 'for,' said they, 'our fathers and we ourselves have lain full oft upon straw pallets, covered only with a sheet under coverlets made of dagswaine, or hapharlots, and a good round log under their head instead of a bolster. . If it were so that the father of the good-man of the house had a mattress or flock bed, and thereto a sack of chaff to rest his head upon, he thought himself to be as well lodged as the lord of the town,' so well were they contented. 'Pillows,' said they, 'were thought meet only for women in child-bed.' As for servants, if they had any sheet above them it was well, for seldom had they any under their bodies to keep them from the pricking straws that ran oft through the canvas and raised their hardened hides. The third thing they tell of is the exchange of wooden platters into pewter, and wooden spoons into silver or tin. For so common were all sorts of wooden vessels in old time that a man should hardly find four pieces of pewter, of which one was peradventure a salt, in a good farmer's house." Dwelling further upon the good old times when Henry VIII. was king, Holinshed continues: "In days past, men were contented to live in houses builded of sawow and willow, so that the use of oak was in a manner dedicated wholly unto churches, religious houses, and princes' palaces; but now sawow and willow are rejected, and nothing but oak anywhere regarded. And yet see the change. For when our houses were builded of willow, then had we oaken men; but now that houses have come to be made of oak, our men are not only become willow, but a great many altogether of straw. Also, we have now many chimneys, and yet our tenderlings complain of rheums, catarrhs, and poses; then had we none but reed-dosses, and our heads did never ache. For as the smoke in those days was supposed to be a sufficient hardening for the timber of the house, so it was reputed the best medicine to keep the good man and his family from the quack or pose." Holinshed fairly represented the conservative tendencies of the majority of Englishmen of his time, and his words go far to explain the protracted existence, into a period when the nation was getting civilized and wealthy, of chimneyless houses and wooden bed-pillows.

Not only the chattels and fittings in the houses of the poorer classes, but likewise those in the mansions of the greatest nobles were extremely mean and wretched during the whole of the reign of the second Tudor sovereign. It appears, from numerous inventories that have been preserved, that wealthy people during the period spent their money upon little else than plate, and perhaps a few costly silk and velvet hangings, together with a splendid bed, and that all the rest of the furniture was of the most paltry description. An ancient bundle of papers in the collection of manuscripts in the Cottonian library, furnishing "an inventory of all the goodes and cattells of Sir Adrian Fokewo," dated the thirtieth year of Henry VIII., gives a picture, among many others, of the interior of the house of a rich nobleman of the period. The list begins with a large and magnificent service of plate, silver as well as silver-gilt, the cost of which must have been beyond measure greater than all the rest of things enumerated, including the mansion itself. The latter had a vast number of apartments, the chief of which were the hall, the "perler" for the reception of important guests, the best bedroom, and the "chamber over the perler," specially reserved for the noble owner. In the hall there was "a hangings of grene say, bordered with darneng," or needlework; "two grete side tables, with standinge tressels; a small joyned cuberde, of waysscott, with a short peice of counterfett carpett upon it." A "square cuberde," with a "short piece of carpett in the wyndowe," and "five formes," constituted all the rest of the furniture. In the "perler," the principal "cattels," besides "hangings of grene say and red," were "one Flemish chaire; four joyned stooles; a joyned forme; a rounde table of cipress, with a peice of counterfett carpett upon it; a paynted table," or picture, "of the Epiphany of our Lord." In the best bedroom, the furniture consisted again "with hangings of grene and red say," of "one great trussing bed, with two fether beds, whereof the one is downe, with two bolsters; two pillowes of downe; three blankets of woollen cloth; a coverlet of verder work onelyed." A table, two chests, "an old Flemish chaire," and sundry minor articles, such as "a fyre pan; a payer of tonges; a chaser of brass; two basons, two joyned stooles," completed the furniture of this apartment. Lastly, in the "chamber over the perler," in many respects the best fitted up room in the mansion, there were "an hangyng of rodd and greine say; a sparvor of greine and blake say, with curteyns of the same; a trussinge bed, framed of wenskotte; two fether bedds; one grete bolster; two fustians, with a luge counterpoint of grete verders," and a number of smaller articles, among them "a turned chaire; a pair of tonges," and "a grete standerde, with divers apparrell belongyng to the Lady Foscawe." The picture of the inside of a noble mansion here given altogether indicates a state of semi-barbarism in home life, the utter absence of refined and luxurious ease being as remarkable as the vulgar ostentation taking its place. That the inventory of the "goodes and cattells" of Sir Adrian Foscawe represented that of the wealthiest class of English nobles is shown by the fact that Cardinal Wolsey himself, whose prodigious expenditure was the marvel and envy of his contemporaries, had his apartments fitted in very similar style, the only notable things being splendid hangings and some magnificent beds, while all the rest of the furniture was of the shabbiest kind. A great change in this respect, however, took place within the next generation, when the vast development of commerce brought England into closer contact with the nations of the Continent, leading to the adoption of more refinement in the modes and habits of every-day life.

Henry VIII. himself was to some extent the inaugurator, if not of improved tastes, at least of increased luxury in the internal arrangements of dwellings. It was owing partly to his personal intercourse with some of the most accomplished monarchs of the age, such as Francis I. and Kaiser Charles, and partly, and more still, to the influence of his wives, especially of Anne Boleyn, whose education at the court of France had led her to appreciate to the full many of the comforts and refinements of home life common in that country, but unknown as yet in England. Several of the king's palaces, notably that of Westminster, and Wolsey's great brick case at Hampton Court, which he appropriated to himself, were furnished in a very sumptuous manner, although the prevailing taste of the period was responded to so far that the great article of English furniture, the bedstead, towered like a giant over all other chattels. The royal bedroom at Hampton Court, at the time his dread majesty shared it with his third spouse, was described as follows in an inventory of the time:—"Item, a bedstede, the posts and heade curiously wroughte, painted, and guilte, having as well foure bullyeons of timbre gilte, of foure vanes of yron painted with the kinges armes, haveing cellar, tester, double vallaunces, and bases of cloth of golde tissue, and a cloth of silver paned together, embroidered upon the seames; with a worke of purple vellat, having the kinges armes crowned with the crown imperial within the garland upon the cellar and tester, and also with roses and floures de luce, likewise crowned within the garlande, upon the said cloth of silver." The whole of this magnificent upholstery was of the most expensive kind. "The double vallaunce, every one of them," says the inventory, "took in depth one quarter of a yarde, with a deepe fringe of gold, silver, and silke; the tester fringed upon bothe sydes, with a narrow fringe of Venice gold and silver, touke in deythe one yerde, one quarter, three nailes, and in height three yerdys; the three bases fringed at the endes and at both sides with a narrowe frynge of lyke gold, and silver, as aforesaide, together with five curtaines, touke twenty-three paines of taphata, painted purple and white, garnished on both sides with passamyne of Venice gold." From some accounts it appears that the cloth of gold which Henry VIII. was so fond of using cost not less than forty-six shillings a yard, so that the cost of furnishing his bedroom alone must have been enormous, considering the value of money at the time. However, the sleeping apartment at Hampton Court Palace devoted to the use of his majesty had little else than the superlative bedstead in it, the rest of the furniture being, as usual, of the shabbiest description. It consisted, as set down in the inventory, of "two joyned cupbordes, one joyned stooles, two awndyrons, with fire-fork, tonges, and fire-pan, and a steel glass covered with yellowe vellat." The last-named article was the mirror chiefly in use at the time, looking-glasses as yet being only made for the personal use of the fair sex, of very small size, and always kept in cases, which the ladies might put in their pockets, or lock up among their trinkets, for fear of damage on the costly article being left to vulgar touch. The steel mirrors themselves were only in possession of very wealthy people, and treated as great luxuries, covered by curtains; one belonging to Henry VIII., and hung at his palace in Westminster, was described as "a faire grete lookinge steale glasse, sette in crymsonne velvet, richly embrawdered with damaske pirls, with knots of blew, and a curtain to the same of blewe tafata, embrawdered with Venice gold, and cordiauntes of the same gold."

The dress worn in the time of Henry VIII. by the upper classes was very much in keeping with the furniture of the houses, the old simplicity giving way everywhere to showiness, and comfort to ostentation. The example of the court here, as in other weightier matters, set the fashion of the time, and Henry's extravagance in apparel was imitated by his subjects just as much as the plainness of the garments of his economical father. How the first Tudor king was dressed is quaintly stated by the author of a work called the "Boke of Kervynge," who instructs the "chaumberlayne" in his duties, telling him "warne your soverayne hys petycote, his doublet, and his stomachere, and then put on hys hosen, and then his schone or slyppers; then stryke up his hosen mannerly, and tye them up; and then lace his doublet hole by hole." The nobles of the reign of Henry VII. were simple in their attire like the king; and even the great dignitaries of the church, otherwise given to ostentation, thought fit to imitate the royal example. "The clergy of England," wrote Elizabeth's Archbishop Parker, "never wore silke, or velvet, untill the time of the pompons Cardinall Wolsey, who opened that dore to pride among them, which hitherto cannot bee shut." Before Henry VIII. had been a dozen years on the throne, an entire change of fashions had taken place, manifesting itself in the cut as well as the material of the garments, both tending towards a greater adornment of the person, though mostly at a sacrifice of comfort and physical well-being. In Barclay's satire, the "Ship of Fools," the gentlemen are laughed at for having "their necks charged with collars and chaines," with "their fingers full of rings," and for leaving "their necks naked almost unto the raines," and "their sleeves blazin like unto a crane's wings." The moralists of the age chiefly declaimed against the new-fangled bands, cuffs, and ruffs of the men, the rich doublets of silk and satin, and the showy kinds of head coverings, which took the place of the simple old round-cornered hats. Stow's Chronicle reports that "in the reign of Henry the Eighth was begun the making of Spanish felts in England, by Spanyards and Dutchmen, before which time the English used to ride and goe, winter and summer, in knit caps, cloth hoods, and thrum'd hats." The latter articles, and, indeed, the chief portion of the dress of the upper classes, remained in use among the lower ranks of the people long after getting out of fashion. In the "History of George Dobson," published towards the end of Elizabeth's reign, it is said of an "ale-wife" in the country, "she put on her fairest smocke, a petticoat of a good broad red, her gown of grey faced with buckram, with her square thrum'd hat, and before her hung a clean white apron." The history of "Jack of Newbury"—"Jack" being John Newchombe, a famous clothier living in the time of Henry VIII.—describes the tradesman as follows, when going to meet the king: "He had on a plain russet coat, a pair of korsie brooches, without welt or gaurd, and stockings of the same piece sowed to his slops, which had a great cod-piece on which he stuck his pins." Joseph Strutt, the antiquarian, speaking of the last-named portion of the dress of "Jack," justly calls the fashion

"abominable;" nevertheless it was introduced by Hans Holbein in a great painting of Henry VIII. sitting on the throne in all his regal majesty and handing a charter to the barber-surgeons. In Henry's reign, as in others, dress had its influence upon morality and morality upon dress.

Four different acts of parliament were passed during the reign of Henry VIII. to regulate and fix the dress of the various classes of the population. These statutes ordered that none but the king, the queen, the royal children, and the king's mother and sisters, should wear any cloth of gold, or any silk of purple colour, or any fur, called "fur of black genetts;" and that none under the rank of a duke or a marquis should wear any cloth of gold, or tissue of gold. None under the degree of an earl were to wear any sable furs; none under the degree of a baron any embroidery of gold and silver; and none under the degree of knight any woollen cloth of foreign make, or any crimson or blue velvet. Descending lower in the social scale, the statutes provided the apparel of all other ranks of his majesty's subjects, by fixing the limit of costliness or shape of each. No man under the degree of a knight, except gentlemen possessed of a clear yearly income of two hundred marks, was allowed to wear "any chain, or collar of gold, or gilt, or any gold about his neck, or in bracelets," nor to wear "sattin in damask in his gown," under pain of forfeiting forty shillings for each offence; and no man under the property qualification of one hundred pounds sterling per annum was allowed to wear "sattin damask, or silken chaumlet, in his doublet," under like penalty. The enactments further specified that "no man under the degree of a gentleman, possessed of less than ten pounds per annum, or goods and chattels to the amount of hundred pounds—which goods are to be proved by oath—shall wear any fur which is not got in the kingdom;" that "no man under the degree of an earl, marquis, or knight of the garter, shall wear embroidered apparel, broched or guarded with gold, silver, or goldsmith's work;" that "no man under the degree of a knight shall use more cloth in a long gown than three yards;" that "no serving man under the degree of a gentleman shall wear a gown, or coat, more than three yards broad, nor any chaumlet, or any manner of fur, lambs' excepted, nor any cloth in his hose above twenty pence per yard, unless it be the gift and leaving of his master;" that "no man under the degree of a gentleman shall wear any silk, or chaumlet, or any points in any apparel of his body, ornamented with aiglets of gold, or silver gilt, or buttons, or broches of gold, or any goldsmith's work, except it be the badge of his lord;" that "no man under the degree of a knight shall wear gowns of velvet, pinch'd shirts, or pinch'd partlets of linen cloth, or plain shirts garnished with silk, or gold, or silver;" and, finally, that "no husbandman, or common labourer to any artificer, out of cities or boroughs, having no goods of their own above the value of ten pounds, shall use or wear any cloth, the broad yard whereof passeth two shillings and four pence, or any hose above the price of twelve pence the yard." The punishment for breaking the law consisted in penalties of from ten to forty shillings in all cases, except the last, concerning the husbandman and common labourers, who had the threat of "imprisonment in the stocks" hanging over them, if presuming to dress better than allowed by king and parliament. The statutes, however, affected only the apparel of the male population, the mighty despot himself probably seeing the impossibility of meddling with the dress of women.

Of the personal attire of Henry VIII.—who to all his other titles might have added with good reason that of Chief Tailor of England—a list found in the Harleian Library, giving an inventory of the king's private wardrobe at Westminster, furnishes a curious picture. His majesty had among other articles of apparel of the richest kind "a gowne with a square cape of crimson vellat and crimson satten, all over embraudered with pirls of damaske gold and silver, having a riche border and gaurde of crimson vellat, embraudered with damaske gold and pirls, faced with crimson satten." On the sleeves of the gown were "twenty-six diamonds set in buttons of gold," while the kirtle was of "crimson satten, all over embraudered with damaske peeles, and pirls set in gold." There are enumerated, besides, "shirt bandes of golde, with ruffles to the same," many cloaks "of tawny satten embraudered with Venice gold;" a number of stomachers, "some of purple, of silver tissue, others embraudered with gold and pirls;" a plentiful choice of caps, ornamented with "plumes of white ostrich feathers, richly garnished with passemayne, and fringes of Venice gold, with gold spangles intermix'd;" and vast quantities of "sweete gloves, lined with white vellat, trimmed with buttons and small aiglets of gold enamelled; also knitte gloves of silk, and handkerchers edged with gold and silver, others with needlework." On one occasion the king's dress and that of his horse, when he rode from the Tower to Westminster, was, according to Recorder Hall, minutest of historiographers, a very mountain of gold and jewelry. "His grace," says Hall, "wared in his upperst apparell a robe of crimsyn velvet, furred with armyns; his jacket or cote of raised gold; the placard embrowdered with diamonds, rubies, emeraudes, greate perles, and other riche stones; a greate banderike aboute his necke, of large balasses; and the trapper of his horse damaske gold, with a depe purfell of armyns." The crowd of Henry's attendants were likewise magnificently arrayed, "his knights and esquires for his body in crimosyn velvet, and all the gentlemen, with others of his chappell, and all his officers, and his household servauntes, were appareled in skarlet." In magnificence of attire Henry outshone not only all his male subjects, prevented by statute from becoming rival tailors, but even his wives, the vainest of the six, Anne Boleyn, never exhibiting half as many pearls, diamonds, and rubies as he in his public shows. At her coronation alone, fair Anne was allowed by her royal lord to compete with him in dress, by putting on a surcoat of silver tissue, and a mantle of the same material, lined with ermine, while the litter in which she rode was covered with cloth of gold, and the horses which drew it had coats of white damask. Poor Anne Boleyn had to pay dearly for her short-lived splendours, and her successors wisely gave up the competition.

The military costume of the time of Henry VIII. partook to some extent of the changes affecting the dress of ordinary life. Much of the armour worn by knights ceased to be plain, but became embossed and otherwise ornamented, and steel skirts, called "lambeaux"—from the French word "lambeaux," shreds, or scraps—made of ribbed and fluted metal, were introduced from the Continent. But the greatest of all changes respecting military life during this period was that of weapons, the old English cross-bow, which had won many a great battle and hardened the muscles of the fighting part of the population, gradually giving way to the new matchlock or hand-gun. Henry VII. had commenced arming a portion of the yeomen of his guard with matchlocks, and his son continued the process by importing the "wheellock gun," invented by the Italians, and the pistol, so called from its being made at Pistoja, in Tuscany. However, the substitution of firearms for the ancient bow took place very slowly, both on account of the popular antipathy to the new weapon, and of the intrinsic difficulty of using it in any but fair weather and under the most favourable circumstances. The method of firing the rude matchlocks, or harquebuses, with which Henry VII. and Henry VIII. armed a portion of their troops, was indeed of the clumsiest kind. Though called a hand-gun, the weapon was so heavy that in firing it had to be laid on a "rest," or a thick staff, with a curve on the top, which the soldier always carried with him, fastening to the top of it the lighted match with which the powder was ignited—the flint-and-steel pan being of much later invention. A military author of the reign of Elizabeth declared that even then, in the more improved state of the hand-gun, it was of little or no use—"in rain, snowe, fogges, or when the enemy has gained the wind." The same author, John Bingham, describes the various operations necessary in letting-off the "musket"—now name for a perfected firearm, derived from the Italian "moschetto," a small hawk—showing the whole to be an extremely slow and tedious performance. "The musketer," he says, "takes down his musket, uncocks the matche, blowes, proynes, shettes, castes of the pan, castes about the musket, opens his charges, drawes out his skowring stick, rammes in the powder, drawes out againe and puts up his skowring stick, layes the musket on the rest, blowes off the match, cockes and tryes it, gardes the pan, and so makes ready: all which actions must necessarily be observed if you will not faile of the true use of the musket." It was, probably, this great slowness, as well as difficulty of handling firearms, which caused the maintenance of the old weapons of war for a long time to come, so that till the end of the reign of Henry VIII. the "musketers" marched in the midst of, and were protected in some sort by archers and henchmen, or men with axes.

The mode in which English soldiers went into battle in the reign of Henry VIII. is described in a manuscript preserved in the Cottonian Library, delineating the early wars of the king in France. "First," says the account, "go a strong party of horse, and on either side two cannons, guarded by two troops of horse, one to the right and the other to the left; then follow a large body of musketers and henchmen, rank'd alternately, preceded by a small party of henchmen and followed by a larger party of musketers only, and at either end as wings go a small party of archers, and on the right and on the left several pieces of cannon; then follows the main body, flanked at each wing by a strong party of archers, and on either side a large wing of horsemen well armed. The main body is composed of pikemen and henchmen, the henchmen being placed in the middle to guard the king's person; after the main body follows a small party of musketers, and then a larger body of musketers, flanked on either side by a small company of archers, which is followed by a party of musketers also. On either side are many pieces of cannon, and behind, guarded by a strong troop of horse, come the baggage, the women, the oxen, the sheep, and the like." Another manuscript of the time of Henry VIII., likewise preserved in the Cottonian Library, explains "the order to be had when the kinge goeth to battle," apparently referring to Henry's last continental expedition. "When the kinge goeth to warre in the countrie of his enemyes, and intendeth to make batayle, he must have in the forwarde the maister of his cross-bowes, and after the forwarde the high stewarde and the marshall of his lodgyng; and then the king, accompayned with dukes, and earles, and barons of his realme; and then in the rerowarde a duke, or an earl, or one of the marshalles, if the forwarde be stronge enough to resist the enemies." Next follows "the order of the kinge if he intend to fyghte," not in his own person, but through others. "The kinge," says the manuscript, "arrayed in his own coat of armes, must be on horseback, on a good horse, covered also with his armes; the kinge must also wear a crown upon his headpiece, and on each side of him two dukes, or knyghtes of the valiauntest that he hath in his armye, well mounted, and armed on all poyntes. Behind the kinge his gentleman shall go bearyng his pennon, wheresoever the kinge goeth; and the king ought to be accompayned with dukes, and earles, to contynue under his banner. If the enemy will fight on foote, the kinge must still byde on horseback, and those that carry his banners must be on foote, accompayned as beforesaide: the kinge must be on horseback because that the dignitye of a kinge hath that priviledge, and for that it ought to suffice to see his people fight. And it is requisite that he see from one ende of the fildes to the other, to comfort his armye and give them courage; also if it happen that the fildes should be lost, he may save himself, for it is better to loose a battayle than to loose a kinge, inasmuch as the loosyng of a kinge is often the loss of a realme." The last sentence well expressed the prevailing political feeling of the Tudor period.

The fondness of Henry VIII. for all sorts of shows and exhibitions, whether of war or peace, where his vanity could find room to display itself, had some effect upon the character of the sports and pastimes of the people during the first half of the fifteenth century. Besides spending a great deal of his time in tournaments and jousts, the king was liberal in encouraging theatrical performances, and himself introduced a new kind of entertainment called a "maske." According to the contemporary historian, Edward Hall, in the third year of Henry's reign, "on the day of Epiphany at night, the kinge with eleven others were disguised, after the manner of Italie, called a maske, a thing not scene afore in England; they were appareled in garments long and brode, wrought all with gold, with visers, and cappes of gold." The novel entertainment soon got into fashion through constant repetitions at court. When Kaiser Charles visited Henry, the latter, says Hall, "gave a great entertainment at Windsor, and on Sunday [June 16, 1522] at night was a disguising, or play, in the greates hallo. The form of it was that there was a proud horse which would not be tamed nor bridled, but Amitie sent Prudence and Police, which tamed him, and Force and Puissance bridled him. This horse was meant by the French kinge, and Amitie by the kinge of England and the emporor, and other persons were their counsail and power." After this terribly pedantic prologue came the "maske" proper, performed by twelve ladies and twelve gentlemen. "They played a dialogue before the kinge, the purport whereof was whether riches were better than love; and when they could not agree, each called knightes who fought a fair battle of the barriers and left the place. Then came in an old man with a silver beard, and he concluded that love and riches both be necessary for a prince, that is to saie, by love to be obeyed and served, and riches to reward his lovers and friends." Henry VIII. as usual was profuse in scattering gold and cloth of gold, always the Lord Bountiful when his private amusements were concerned. On one occasion, as reported by Hall, "there came a certayne number of gentlemen, whereof the kinge was one, apparayled all in one swote of shorte garments, little beneath the poyntes, of blew velvet and crymsyne, with long sleeves, all cut and lyned with clothe of gold, and the upper parte of the garments were powdered with castels, and shufes of arrowes of fine doket gold; the upper partes of their hosen of like sewte and facion, the nether partes of scarlet, powdered with tymbrelles of fyne gold; on their heads bonets of damaske and silver, flatte woven in the stole, and thereupon wrought with gold and ryche fethers in them, all in visors." These pastimes of Henry VIII. were in direct contravention of a statute of Henry VII., which interdicted going about by night "with painted faces or visors."

Simultaneously with the introduction of gorgeous Italian "masks," taking the place of the simple old English court amusements, a great change occurred in the stage entertainments prepared for the multitude, by the gradual substitution of regular dramatic pieces for the ancient "mysteries." The latter fell into disuse before the reformation, chiefly on account of the contempt with which the people had come to look upon the lower orders of the clergy and the monks, whose dissolute manners made them unfit in the eyes of devout men to personify sacred characters, such as the angels, the apostles, and Jesus Christ, all which were represented in nearly every one of these performances. But the taste for stage plays nevertheless continued to exist, and grew in strength with the spread of books and of general education, and to satisfy it, a new sort of dramatic entertainment, in which earthly things and earthly passions were reflected upon, came to be produced. This led to a complete revolution in the highest of all popular diversions, making everything connected with it assume an entirely new form. In the performance of the sacred "mysteries," the stage on which the representations took place consisted of three different platforms, raised one above the other, each serving a particular purpose. On the uppermost sat the "pater celestis," surrounded by all his angels; beneath it, on the second platform, appeared the holy saints and glorified men; while the lowest stage was occupied by those who represented mere human characters, and all beings not yet past the gate separating life from death. On one side of this lowest platform was a cavern, dark as night, from which fire and flames were constantly issuing while the performance was going on, the audience being treated also, now and then, to hideous yells and screams, to exhibit the sufferings of the poor souls in purgatory—sufferings which, the actors took care to remind the spectators, might be abridged at once by payment of certain sums of money, graduated in proportion of rank as well as wickedness. To heighten the impression made by the yells from the dark cavern, demons were seen ascending the ladder leading out of it from time to time, carrying in their clutches wretched bundles of humanity, which they cast into a place behind the tripartite stage, amidst shrieks drowning all other noises, unearthly in their intensity. All this had its due influence as long as the priestly performers themselves were held in proper estimation; but the sway ceased as soon as the spectators got under the power of new ideas, and came to discover that those who aimed to hold the balance of good and evil before their eyes were imbued themselves with more than the average amount of depravity and vice. Less and less attended by the people, the "mysteries" gradually fell into neglect, and lay performers came to occupy the place of priests and monks on the old stage. The new actors, not knowing what to do with the three platforms, began by pulling down the topmost one, and while shaping the ground floor into a theatre, after the Italian fashion, used the floor above as a stage accessory, and converted the purgatory and home of lost souls into a storehouse of old clothes.

The stage contrivances in the earlier representations of secular dramas were of the rudest kind, differing little from those of puppet shows. No decorations assisted to keep up the illusion of the play, and the actors had no costumes appropriate to the characters they were representing, the latter being indicated merely by inscriptions over the doors through which they entered. Each performer had a door, or rather a movable slip of curtain to himself, for which purpose the background of the stage was divided into a number of small compartments, separated by thin columns of wood, or canvas. During the sway of Henry VIII. and that of his two successors, everything connected with the stage remained low and vulgar; but a vast improvement took place towards the middle of the reign of Elizabeth, with the rise of the great dramatic poets that shed lustre over her age. "Comedians and stage-players of former time," records John Stowe, writing in the

25th of Elizabeth, "were very poore and ignorant, in respect of these of this time; but being now grown very skilfulle and exquisite actors for all matters, they were entertayned into service of divers great lordes, out of which companies there were twelve of the best choosen; and at the request of Sir Francis Walsingham they were sworne the queene's servants, and were allowed wages and liveries, as groomes of the chamber." "Untill this yeare, 1583," the chronicler continues, "the queene had no players: amongst the twelve players there be two rare men, viz., Thomas Wilson, for a quicke, delicate, refined extemporall wit, and Richard Tarleton, for a wondrous, plentiful, pleasant wit." But with all the excellency of the actors, in whose list William Shakespeare himself figured, glorifying the profession for an age, the class was held in low estimation till the end of the reign of Elizabeth, and long after. The Puritans especially, who set themselves against all theatrical performances as leading to immorality, showered abuse upon "the players," whom they accused of irreligion, pride, and vanity, the latter exhibited in too great sumptuousness of dress. "Over-lashing in apparel," exclaims one of their writers, Stephen Gosson, "is so common a fault that the very hyerlings of some of our players, who stand at revision of six shillings by the week, get under gentlemen's noses in sutis of silke, exercising themselves to prating on the stage, and common scoffing when they come abroad, where they look askance over the shoulder at every man of whom the Sunday before they begged an almos." The allusion to the "Sunday" here was due to the fact that the earlier dramatic performances took place only on the first day of the week, probably as much in consequence of growing out of the "mysteries," as because the lower and middle classes retained the Catholic custom of treating Sunday as the chief day of recreation and amusement a long time after the reformation. However, Stephen Gosson made it one of his complaints against the actors that they did not stick to their Sunday only, but allured people to the playhouse more frequently, with the damnable intention of "making four or five Sundays every week."

The theatres of the time of Elizabeth scarcely deserved the reproaches showered upon them by Puritan writers; for though not aiming to be schools of morals, and partaking of some of the coarseness of popular manners of the age, they did infinite service in raising the taste of the masses, and weaning them from more brutal amusements, such as bear and bull-baiting, and cock-fighting. These savage sports were so much the fashion during Elizabeth's reign, that the queen herself did not disdain to attend them, and even gave them her special protection by ordering that there should be no dramatic performances on Wednesdays, so as not to interfere with the great bull-fights that chiefly took place on this day. Of the frightful barbarity of these games, a learned German, Paul Hentzner, who visited England in the year 1598, as companion and tutor to a travelling nobleman, furnishes a striking picture. After mentioning the theatres "without the city," where, he remarks, "English actors represent almost every day tragedies and comedies to very numerous audiences," he dwells at much greater length upon the rival entertainment, as evidently far more popular among the people whose character and manners he had come to study. "There is still another place," Hentzner says, "built in the form of a theatre, which serves for the baiting of bulls and bears. These are fastened behind, and then worried by great English bull-dogs; but not without great risk to the dogs, from the horns of the one, and the teeth of the other. It sometimes happens the dogs are killed upon the spot; however, fresh ones are supplied in the place of those that are incapable to fight. To this entertainment there is often added another, that of whipping a blinded bear, which is performed by five or six men standing circularly with whips, which they exercise upon him without any mercy, as he cannot escape from them because of his chain; but he defends himself with all his force and skill, throwing down those who come within his reach, or who are not active enough to get out of it, and tearing the whips out of their hands and breaking them." That not only the lowest classes, and those sunk deepest in brutality, but the highest and most accomplished personages in the realm, could look upon such atrocious cruelties as amusement gives a very low idea indeed of the moral standard of "Eliza's golden age." On many an occasion, the great maiden queen, who knew Greek and Latin, French, German, and Italian, who wrote verses, and counted a Shakespeare, a Bacon, and a Sidney among her subjects, looked complacently on while a poor animal whose eyes had been torn out was being whipped to death. "Her majesty," says a letter, describing the "princely pleasures" of Kenilworth Castle, on Elizabeth's visit to her favourite, the earl of Leicester, in 1575, "her majesty this day hath appointed a Frenchman to doe feats upon a rope in the conduit court, and to-morrow she hath commanded the beares, the bull, and the ape to be bayted in the tilt-yard." No less than thirteen bears were tortured to death on the day here referred to. "It was a sport very pleasaunt of theez beastz," reported an enthusiastic eyewitness, who fasted his eyes upon the sport, together with the maiden majesty of England, "to see the bear with his pink nyz leering after his enemies' approach . . . and what shyft, with byting, with clawyng, with roring, tossing, and tumbling, he would work to wynd himself from them, and when he was loose to shake his ears twyse or thryse with the blood and the slaver about his fizonamy was a matter of goodly relief." Scenes like these, and their necessary results, explain much of the character of Elizabeth and of her times.

In intimate connection with the brutality of many of the popular sports of the Tudor period was the prevailing gross superstition of the age, from which the queen was as little free as the meanest of her subjects. The belief in witches, among others, was so universal that the learned and pious Bishop Jewel addressed Elizabeth from the pulpit on the subject, exhorting her to destroy those poor creatures whom fools or villains might point out as sorcerers. "It may please your grace," exclaimed the prelate of Salisbury, in a sermon preached before the queen in 1558, at St. Paul's Cathedral, "it may please your grace to understand that witches and sorcerers within these few last years are marvellously increased within your grace's realm. Your grace's subjects pine away, even unto the death, their colour fadeth, their flesh rotteth, their speech is benumbed, their senses are bereft." "I pray God," added the loyal and zealous preacher, "the sorcerers may never practice further than upon the subject." The hint was sufficient to lead to the bringing in of a bill during the next parliamentary session making witchcraft and enchantments felony, in the passing of which act one of the bishops spoke of his personal acquaintance with witches' doings, exclaiming, "these eyes have seen most evident and manifest marks of their wickedness." Many persons suffered under this statute, and Elizabeth was not loth to ascribe all her ailments, great or little, to "the effect of magic," not excepting the regular visitations of the toothache, consequence of her too great indulgence in sweetmeats and other indigestible dainties. In 1589, one Mrs. Dier was put to the torture for having "worked some mischief to her majesty;" and having been racked, "her words and doings were sent to Popham, the queen's attorney, and Egerton, her solicitor, by Walsingham, the secretary, and Sir Thomas Heneage, her vice-chamberlain, for their judgment." Fortunately for this poor woman, she escaped the extreme penalty by strict adherence of the judges to the letter of the law, it being found that she "was not within the compass of the statute touching witchcraft, for that she did no act tending to that purpose, and neither set figure nor made speeches." The act here mentioned as a ground of acquittal, that "to set figure" was believed to be one of the most prominent parts of the occult art of magic, and as such was duly embodied in Elizabeth's sorely statute. A writer of the time laid it down that witches "take the roots of mandrake, or else the roots of briony, which simple folke take for the true mandrake, and make thereof an ugly image, by which they represent the person on whom they intend to exercise their witchcraft." So deep was the belief in sorcery rooted in the superstition of the age, that even Bacon did not deem it beneath his dignity to refer to it in several of his works, though with evident incredulity. "The ointment that witches use," he says in one place, "is reported to be made of the fat of children digged out of their graves, of the juices of smallage, wolfbane, and cinquefoil, mingled with the meal of fine wheat. But I suppose the soporiferous medicines are best to do it, which are henbane, hemlock, mandrake, moonshade, or rather nightshade, opium, saffron, poplar leaves, and tobacco." Of the connection between the last-named herb and witchcraft, an odd tale was current in Bacon's time. It ran that when the Christians first discovered America, the enemy of mankind got afraid of losing his hold over the people there, and to revenge himself upon his adversaries taught them the use of tobacco, thereby achieving the most extraordinary success, overthrowing at one swoop bodies and souls. In allusion to this story, Raphael Thorius, poet and physician, designated rolls of tobacco as "the devil's addle eggs."

A wonderfully clear and graphic picture of the general aspect of England, and the habits, customs, and manners of the people at the end of the reign of Elizabeth, has been left on record in Paul Hentzner's

description, already cited. The observant traveller, with his noble companion, several friends, and the proper retinue of servants, landed at the port of Rye, in Sussex, rode from thence, by way of Tunbridge, to London, and having examined carefully all that he deemed worth seeing in the capital, visited Cambridge, Oxford, Windsor, Hampton Court, and other places, and finally embarked again at Dover, much pleased with the exploration of Queen Elizabeth's realm, the main facts and results of which he noted down in his diary in elegant Latin. "As soon as we had come on shore at Rye," says Hentzner, beginning the account of his journey, "we gave in our names to the notary of the place, who demanded our business, and being told that we had none but to see England, we were conducted to an inn, where we found ourselves well entertained, as is generally the case in this country. From here to London we took post-horses, which carried us surprisingly swift; they had light bridles, and their saddles were little more than a span in width. At Plumwell we first changed horses; then we passed Tunbridge, another village, and at Chipstead we had fresh steeds for the second and last time." Arrived at London, the traveller got enraptured with all the sights which his eyes beheld—some very ugly things among them. "The city," he records, "being very large of itself, has extensive suburbs, and a fort, called the Tower, of beautiful structure. It has also a great number of public buildings and churches, of which latter there are above one hundred and twenty parochial. On the south is a bridge of stone, eight hundred feet in length, and of wonderful workmanship; it is supported upon twenty piers, made of square stone, sixty feet high and thirty feet broad, and joined by arches of about twenty feet diameter. The whole is covered with houses, so disposed as to give the appearance of an ordinary street, and not at all of a bridge. On the one side stands a tower, on the top of which the heads of persons executed for high treason are stuck upon iron spikes; we counted above thirty heads." Dwelling at length upon the public buildings and the government of London—the "thirty heads" receiving no further notice—Hentzner goes on: "It is worthy of observation that every year, upon St. Bartholomew's day, when the fair is held, it is usual for the lord mayor of London, attended by the twelve principal aldermen, to walk in a neighbouring field, with a gold chain about his neck, to which is hung a jewel representing a fleece. During his year of magistracy the lord mayor is obliged to live so magnificently that anybody, native or foreigner, is free to dine at his table—if he can find a chair empty. When the lord mayor leaves the precincts of the city, a mace, a sword, and a cap are borne before him, while he is followed by the aldermen in scarlet gowns, all on horseback, with chains round their necks. Upon their arrival at the appointed place, where a tent is pitched, the mob begin to wrestle before them, two at a time, and the victors receive rewards from the hands of the magistrates. After this a lot of rabbits are turned loose among the crowd, and pursued by the boys, who endeavour to catch them, making an astounding noise. While we were looking at this entertaining show, one of our company, Tobias Salander, doctor of phisic, had his pocket picked of a purse containing nine crowns of gold. It was done in an exceeding clever manner, by an Englishman, who always kept near the doctor in a friendly way; and it was not till he was gone that our companion discovered that his purse was gone too." All the German travellers admired the cleverness, except Herr Tobias Salander.

Having seen the London curiosities, the Germans went down the river to Greenwich, to pay a visit to the court of the ruler of England, inspecting by the way "the ship of that noble pirate, Sir Francis Drake, in which he is said to have surrounded this globe of earth." Paul Hentzner had a near view of Queen Elizabeth, and, putting upon paper everything he espied, with the greatest minuteness, left on record a pen-and-ink picture surprising for its clearness. "We were admitted," he relates, "by an order from the lord chamberlain, into the presence-chamber, through which the queen usually passes on her way to the chapel; it was hung with rich tapestry, but the floor was strewn with rushes only, after the English fashion. At the door stood a gentleman dressed in velvet, with a gold chain, whose office it was to introduce to the queen any person of distinction that came to wait upon her. It was Sunday, when there is usually the greatest attendance of nobles and other personages; there were present this day the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of London, and a vast number of councillors of state and officers of the crown, all awaiting the arrival of the queen. She came at last from her own apartment, attended in the following manner. First there went a file of gentlemen, barons, earls, and knights of the Garter, all richly dressed and bare-headed, and next came the lord chancellor, carrying the seals in a scarlet silk purse, and walking between two nobles, one of them holding the royal sceptre and the other the sword of state in a red scabbard. Now appeared the queen—in the sixty-fifth year of her age, as we were told. She looked very majestic: her face oblong and fair, but wrinkled; her eyes small, dark, and pleasant; her nose a little hooked; her lips narrow, and her teeth black. She had in her ears two pearls, with very rich drops; she wore false hair, and that red, and upon her head rested a small crown of gold. Her bosom was uncovered—as all English ladies have it till they marry—and around her neck hung a string of magnificent jewels. Her hands seemed very small, her fingers long, and her stature of the middle size; and though her deportment was stately, her manner of speaking was mild and obliging. She was dressed in a robe of white silk, bordered with pearls of the size of beans, over which hung a mantle of black silk, shot with silver threads; the train was very long, and borne by a marchioness. As she went along in all this state and magnificence, she spoke very graciously, first to one, then to another, addressing in turn foreign ministers and others in English, French, and Italian. All spoke to her kneeling, but at times she raised some one with her hand. While we were there, Baron Slawata, a Bohemian, had letters to present to her, on which she, as a mark of particular favour, took off her glove and let him kiss her right hand, sparkling with rings and jewels. Wherever she turned her face as she was going along, all fell down on their knees. Next to the queen followed the ladies of the court, very handsome and well shaped, and mostly dressed in white; and at her side marched the gentlemen pensioners, fifty in number, with gilt battle-axes. In the ante-chamber, next the hall where we were, many persons presented petitions to the queen, which she received very graciously, causing frequent shouts of 'Long live Queen Elizabeth.' To which she replied, 'I thank you, my good people.'"

While the queen attended divine service, "which scarce exceeded half an hour," Hentzner and his friends watched the setting out of the royal table for dinner, an elaborate process, and not a little curious. "A gentleman entered the room bearing a rod, and along with him another who had a tablecloth, which, after they had both knoeled three times with the utmost veneration, he spread upon the table; after this both again knoeled thrice and then retired. Next came two other gentlemen, one with the rod, and the other with a salt-cellar, a plate, and some bread, and when they had knoeled as the others had done, they retired with the like ceremonies. Several other attendants made their appearance, and at last came a married lady, a countess in rank, and with her an unmarried one carrying a tasting-knife in her hand. The former, who was dressed in white silk, prostrated herself three times, in the most graceful manner, and then approached the table and rubbed the plates with bread and salt, with as much awe as if the queen herself had been present. The two ladies kept standing near the table, and when they had waited a little while, twenty-four yeomen of the guard entered the apartment, bare-headed, clothed in scarlet, each with a golden rose upon his back. They brought in successively, on rich plate, twenty-four dishes, which they handed to a gentleman, who placed them upon the table, while the lady in attendance gave to each of the guards a mouthful of the dish he had been carrying. This, we were told, is done for fear of poison. During the time that the yeomen—who are selected from among the tallest and handsomest men that can be found in England—were bringing in dinner, twelve trumpets and two kettle-drums made the hall ring for half an hour together. The whole ceremony of setting out the table having come to an end, a number of unmarried ladies made their appearance, and carried the dishes away into the queen's private room, where, as we were told, she selects her own dinner and sends the remainder to her attendants. The queen takes her dinner and supper nearly always alone, with very few servants about her, and it is seldom that anybody, native or foreigner, is admitted at the time." Hentzner does not mention the time at which the queen dined; but it was probably the hour which had become customary at the end of Elizabeth's reign, namely twelve o'clock. At the beginning of the reign it was eleven, as mentioned by William Harrison, in his "Historical Description of the Island of Britain," inserted in Holinshed's Chronicle. "With us," says Harrison, "the nobilitie, gentrie, and students, do ordinarily go to dinner at eleven before noone, and to supper at five, or between five and six, at afternoon." Fashion, at the end of the sixteenth century, put back the hour of dining till noon. "At ten," says a character in one of Thomas Middleton's plays, published about 1590, "we drink, that's mouth-hour; at eleven, look around for victuals, that's hand-hour; at twelve, go to dinner, that's eating-hour." Twelve o'clock remained the dinner-hour for the next hundred years.

Having finished his tour through England, and seen many curious things at Cambridge, Oxford, Windsor, and Canterbury, as well as in the capital, the German traveller put down in his diary the following reflections about the country and the people. "The soil of England," his account runs, "is fruitful, and abounds with cattle, which inclines the inhabitants rather to raising flesh than corn, and near one third part of the land is left uncultivated for grazing. The climate is most temperate at all times, and the air never heavy, as a consequence of which, maladies are scarcer and less physic is used than anywhere else. Although the soil is productive, the grape is not grown; but the want is supplied by the importation from abroad of the best kinds of wine, such as Rhenish and Spanish, Gascon and Orleans. The general drink, however, is beer, prepared from barley, which tastes well, but is strong and very intoxicating. Upon the hills, many of which are treeless and dry, wander numerous flocks of sheep, and whether it be the soft temperature of the air, or the goodness of the soil, it is certain that they produce finer and softer wool than the flocks of any other country. In these flocks, with golden fleeces, lies the chief wealth of the inhabitants." After some further description of the country, Hentzner continues: "The English are serious, like the Germans; but greater lovers of show. The nobles and wealthy persons like to be followed wherever they go by great troops of arms, who wear their master's badge in silver, fastened to their left arm. Many of the people excel in dancing and music, and all are active and lively in their movements, though somewhat stouter than the French, whom they resemble in this respect. They cut their hair close on the middle of the head, letting it grow on either side. The English are good sailors and better pirates; they are famous thieves, and it is said that above three hundred of the class are hung annually at London—beheading is with them less infamous than hanging. They are more polite in eating than the French, taking less bread but more meat, which they roast to perfection; they also put a great deal of sugar in their drink. They are often troubled with the scurvy, which is said to have crept into England with the Norman conquest. Their houses are commonly of two stories, except in London, where there are sometimes three, and more seldom four; they are built of wood, and those of the richer classes of bricks; the roofs are mostly low, and in some cases covered with lead. The English people certainly are powerful in the field, successful against their enemies, and impatient of anything like slavery. They are vastly fond of great noises that fill the ear, such as the firing of cannon, the beating of drums, and the ringing of bells; and it is common for a number of them, if they feel somewhat elated, to go up into some church tower and ring the bells for hours together for the sake of exercise. Vanity is very general among them; and if they see a foreigner particularly handsome or well made, they will say 'It is a pity he is not an Englishman.'

Taken all in all, virtues and defects, lights and shadows, the people of England at the end of the Tudor period gave every sign and manifestation of becoming one of the leading nations of the world. As yet the total population was little above four millions, but the subtle brains and strong arms of this mere handful of men, inhabiting part of a small island, already pointed them out as rulers of future empires. "The kingdom of heaven," says Bacon, in his essay "On the true Greatness of Kingdoms and States," written a few years before the death of Elizabeth, "the kingdom of heaven is compared, not to any great kernel or nut, but to a grain of mustard seed, which is one of the least grains, but hath in it a property and spirit hastily to get up and spread. So are there states great in territory and yet not apt to enlarge or command, and some that have but small dimensions of stem and yet like to be the foundations of great monarchies. Walled towns, stored arsenals and armouries, goodly races of horse, chariots of war, ordnance, artillery, and the like, all these are but as a sheep in a lion's skin, except the breed and disposition of the people be stout and warlike." "And thus much is certain," Bacon continues, further on, "that he that commands the sea is at great liberty, whereas those that are strongest by land are many times, nevertheless, in great straits. With us of Europe, particularly, the vantage of strength at sea—which is one of the principal dowries of this kingdom—is great, as well because most of the kingdoms of Europe are girt by the sea, as because the wealth of both Indies seems, in great part, but an accessory to the command of the seas." Bacon in his essay overlooked one feature of national greatness. "The English people," Paul Hentzner observed, "are impatient of anything like slavery." Here was the main source of England's future greatness.

SADDLE OF ELIZABETH.

THE STUART PERIOD.

CHAPTER I.

The Civil and Military History of Great Britain from the Accession of James I., A.D. 1603, to the Death of Charles I. A.D. 1649.

IN the grey dawn of Thursday, the 24th of March, 1603, Queen Elizabeth was lying dead on her lonely couch at Richmond Palace, in the same chamber in which King Henry VIII. had breathed his last, and her kinsman, Robert Carey, was galloping along in furious haste on the road to Scotland. Without stop or delay, the rider kept his horse's head northward, not taking rest till arrived the next morning within the borough of Doncaster, after a whirlwind flight of one hundred and sixty miles. Another gallop of a hundred and sixty miles brought the rider over the Scottish border; and at noon on Saturday, the 26th of March, he crossed the Tweed at the foot of Norham Castle, full of hopes of reaching Edinburgh before sunset. He had not got far, however, before his jaded steed stumbled under him, throwing him on the ground, and on his attempting to get up, gave him a blow on the head with one of his hoofs, inflicting a deep wound, and leaving him prostrate and almost senseless. But the kinsman of the last Tudor queen, carrying a crown to the first Stuart king, felt as if his life depended on a quick ride to Edinburgh, and though faint from loss of blood, and half dead with fatigue, he managed to crawl into the saddle again and pursue his road northward. Midnight was approaching when at length he reached the gate of Holyrood Palace; he knocked, was admitted, and on his earnest entreaty allowed to see the king, who had gone to bed. Carey knelt at the bedside, and wiping his blood-stained face, and lifting the sapphire ring that had fallen from the window of the dying chamber of Queen Elizabeth, exclaimed: "Hail to thee, James! King of England, Scotland, Ireland, and France!"

Joyful sounds never reached the ears of the son of Mary Stuart. For many weary years he had been expecting the event announced to him, until at last it seemed as if it would never come, as if the golden fruit that was hanging above him temptingly would never drop upon his parched lips. It was not ambition alone, and greed of political power, that turned all the desires of James towards the throne of England, but his longings had their source in considerations of a far simpler and far more prosaic nature. A quiet, shy, and studious man, a pedant in learning and theorist in statecraft, he would have been abundantly content in his limited sphere as ruler of Scotland, or, if need be, asthane of a Scotch village, if allowed to live at ease, with a fair allowance of the good things of the world, and no people about him to contradict his wise sayings, oppose his whims, or otherwise ruffle his temper. But none of these delights were offered to James of Scotland, chief of a turbulent commonwealth of mailed barons, warlike yeomen, fanatic preachers, and rebellious traders and artisans, all of them ready at the least provocation to take him by the throat and make him responsible for evil times and evil deeds. In name still a monarchy, Scotland in fact had become a republic ever since the day that the Lords of the Congregation made Mary Stuart their prisoner; and James himself, whose natural shrewdness was not entirely obscured by his pedantry and mental conceit, was perfectly well aware, through the bitter experience of a quarter of a century of nominal kingship, that his power was a sham, and his sceptre a toy, not quite as useful as an ordinary walking-stick. The absence of substantial dominion James might have borne with patience, but he fretted for not enjoying even the outward honours to which he thought himself entitled as a crowned head, and, what made matters much worse, for being wretchedly remunerated as a crown-bearer. His high theoretical notions of what a king ought to be, laid down not only in multifarious speeches, but in books composed by himself, came in everlasting conflict with dire reality: his nobles defied him; his servants disobeyed him; his clergy preached against him; and his spouse laughed at him; and there was scarce a subject in his realm who would properly follow his commands, or even read his literary compositions. A little more money, he knew, would have set him all right, at least in his own house; and his constant penury, therefore, put the culminating point to his unhappiness, as well as to the burning desire to get out of it by seating himself on the golden throne of Elizabeth, and obtaining at one stroke all that earth could offer or his heart could desire. The picture before his eyes was so dazzling, and so complete in its offer of unalloyed blissfulness, that James after long impatient expectation had come to fancy at last it would never be a reality, or, at the best, could be realized only by some kind of superhuman effort on his part. Labouring under this impression, he had kept up for years a secret correspondence with Cecil, Essex, Northumberland, and a number of other eminent men grouped around Elizabeth's throne, and had despatched ambassadors to almost all the potentates of Europe, the pope included, offering concordates, alliances, and treaties of peace, in return for their friendship and goodwill. His mind, delighting in intricate and mysterious combinations, found contentment in thus forestalling, as he fondly believed he was doing, the current of events; yet he nevertheless felt trembling as on the verge of a precipice when hearing at last that the hour had arrived that was to justify all his hopes and expectations. Taking the zealous messenger who was kneeling at his bedside, greeting him as ruler of three kingdoms, by the hand, he enjoined him to keep the weighty intelligence which he had brought a secret for a while. Though transparently conscious of his own merits, James seemed to feel for the moment more than ever doubtful whether his head would ever bear the delicious burden of the crown of England.

The fears and doubts of King James were very unfounded. Had he been the only son of Elizabeth instead of mere collateral heir, her subjects could not have been more inclined to transfer her crown to his head, and to kneel in mute obedience before his sceptre. Some very erudite people, almost as full of scholarship as James himself, had been counting up a list of fourteen claimants of Elizabeth's throne; and the pedigree of one or two of these claimants had been discussed in pamphlets and news sheets, but beyond this the movement never went, and the great body of the nation was fully and absolutely prepared to accept the king of Scotland, and no one else, as sovereign of England. Everything spoke in his favour, and nothing against him. His claim of blood was decidedly better than that of any other possible pretender; he was unobjectionable on the score of religion, having been educated in the strict tenets of Protestantism; he furnished guarantees of undisturbed succession in several children, offspring of a Protestant wife; and last, not least, he added most materially to the power and greatness of England by establishing the long-desired union with Scotland. The last consideration would have been sufficient to eliminate a hundred lesser claimants of the crown from competition, and as it was served to add, in an extraordinary degree, to the unanimity with which the English people saluted the accession of King James. To the leading men of the government this unanimity was perfectly well known, and immediately after Elizabeth's decease they exhibited their acquaintance with the state of public opinion by slavishly bowing before her successor. Cecil's correspondence with James had become very intimate during the last weeks of the illness of the queen; and as soon as her eyes were closed he called his colleagues in the privy council together, and showed them a proclamation to the people announcing the death of Elizabeth and the accession of the king of Scotland. The edict had been agreed upon previously between the king and Cecil, of which fact most of the privy councillors were well aware; and all them having no other object in view but that of intently worshipping the rising sun, they resolved with marvellous unanimity that the supreme power of the realm, growth of four generations of unrestricted despotism, should be made over unconditionally and at once to James. Before Elizabeth had been dead five hours, the proclamation was signed by all the high dignitaries of state: and when the citizens of London arose from their slumbers on the morning of the 24th of March, they heard the clatter of many horsehoofs in the silent streets, and heralds proclaiming that the kingdom had changed masters. Soon after daybreak, Cecil himself, with a crowd of noble lords at his heels, issued forth from Whitehall to read his proclamation to the people. First on the steps of the royal palace, and next under the High Cross, at Cheapside, he announced "most distinctly and audibly," as recorded by John Stow, an eyewitness, that the queen's blessed majesty was dead, and that the right of succession was wholly and undisputedly in James king of Scots, now king of England, Scotland, Ireland, and France. Thereupon, says John Stow, "all the multitude with one consent cried aloud: 'God save King James!'"

Two official envoys were despatched by Cecil immediately after the reading of the proclamation to carry the news of his accession to James; but they were no match to Robert Carey in hard riding, and it was not till Wednesday, the 30th of March, four days after his arrival, that they made their solemn entry into Holyrood Palace. Their appearance put an end to many heavy doubts that had been agitating the mind of James, and he gave himself up to unrestricted joy, limited only by the consciousness of his own ineffable grandeur and dignity. Cecil having, very considerately, sent him some money for the journey to London, the king was for leaving Scotland at once, but was retained a few days by the importunities of his wife. Anne of Denmark thought it beneath her dignity to go on a journey with a throne for a goal without a full assortment of crown jewels; and learning from the English envoys that they had not brought the regalia, and could not fetch them either, she declared her intention to stop at home until further arrangements could be made. Finding persuasion useless to turn the attention of his consort from this weighty matter, James resolved to set out without her; and early on the morning of the 5th of April quitted Edinburgh, with an immense train of courtiers, arriving the same day at Berwick-on-Tweed. Here, in the rapture of a most cordial greeting from his new subjects, he fired off a big gun with his own hand, astonishing all the people present by his pluck, and none more than himself; and this done he sat down to write a long letter to his "right trusty and right well-beloved" Cecil and others of his privy council at London, giving thanks for the money sent, and asking to let him have some more. At the same time he despatched a wonderfully characteristic note to his eldest son, Henry, a boy nine years of age, who had been left at Stirling Castle under the care of the earl of Mar, giving him paternal advice as to how he ought to behave now that he had become heir of the English throne. "Choose none to be your playfellows but of honourable birth," the counsel, or rather order, ran, "and, above all things, never give countenance to any but as ye are informed are in estimation with me." Then his majesty continued: "I send you herewith my book, lately printed: study and profit by it as you would deserve my blessing; and as there can nothing happen unto you whereof ye will not find the general ground therein, if not the particular point touched, so must ye level every man's opinions or advices with the rules there set down, allowing and following their advices with the rules there set down, and mistrusting and frowning upon them that advise you to the contrary." The marvellous work of James's own composition, "my booke lately prentid," as he described it, was called the "Basilicon Doron," and consisted of a mass of precepts and injunctions on religious, social, political, and moral subjects, on all which the king gave his final judgment with the tone of absolute authority, considering the opinions of all other men as unconditionally worthless. It was sheer modesty in the royal author to say that there could "nothing happen" in the world of which his book did not give the "general ground, if not the particular point." After this announcement, there was no room to doubt that England, for the first time in its history, was getting a universal philosopher for a king.

The immeasurable conceit of James, and belief in his own infallibility, was raised to the utmost pitch by the reception given him by his new subjects. A century of despotism had done its work in destroying all sense of manhood among the upper classes of English society; and they bowed before the new king, not as free men face to face with a freely-chosen sovereign, but like slaves crouching at the feet of a fresh master. The Scottish gentlemen who followed in the train of James were perfectly amazed at the cringing and fawning attitude of the English nobility. "This people will spoil a gude king," one of them exclaimed, with a slight feeling of disgust, remembering the bold manner in which his countrymen had opposed absolutistic pretensions, a famous Presbyterian minister among others declaring from the pulpit that all royal autocrats were "the devil's bairns." The servile worship paid to him by his English subjects fairly turned James's head before he had got far on his progress to London. He crept along in slow stages, advancing not more than ten or fifteen miles a day, dining at the houses of the chief gentry on the road, listening with composure to the most inflated adulation, and dubbing everybody a knight who came across his path, making nobles at the rate of more than forty a week. At York, Cecil was lying in wait for the king, and had a long secret interview with him, which ended in his being formally reinstated and confirmed in his position of secretary of state and prime minister of England. The son of Burleigh had not a few enemies, who, as he was well aware, were making the greatest efforts to eject him from his high post; but he defeated all their machinations by intrigues of a very superior kind, buying up everybody possessed of influence with James, and sparing no exertions in words or deeds to make the king believe that he was indispensable to him. Always under the sway of some particular favourite, who ruled him by humouring his whims and simulating profound admiration of his sublime wisdom, James for the moment had two guides about him to whom his ears were always open, in Sir George Hume, a member of his Scottish privy council, and Roger Aston, his barber. To both Cecil applied himself very diligently, sparing neither bribes nor promises, and the result of his work became visible immediately in many declarations of royal affection expressed in his favour. Not trusting too much to these, Cecil determined to keep close to James, so as to prevent the access of other influences. Obtaining the king's promise to honour St. Theobald's, his sumptuous seat in Essex, with a visit before making his public entrance into the metropolis, Cecil led him thither very slowly, making use of every moment to increase his authority by outbidding all other sycophants in the royal suite in flattery and intrigue. Thus the long train, increasing every day, swept on, through York, Doncaster, and Worksop, to Newark-upon-Trent, where James performed his first great act of kingship. Hearing that a thief had been caught in the vicinity of the court, he issued his warrant to the recorder of Newark, ordering that the man should be hung at once, without examination, trial, or judgment. The order was executed without delay, to the intense consternation of the people, who wildly opened their eyes at the approach of the new-fangled despot, yet dared not tell him that what he was doing was simply murder, for which any English jury might send him to the gallows.

After making two hundred and nine new knights on the road, and hanging one thief, James at last reached St. Theobald's on the 3rd of May, having taken very nearly a month to accomplish the journey from the border. Cecil had made great preparations to receive the king, converting the splendid mansion which his father had built at an immense expenditure, into a sort of fairy palace; and the sight of all the splendour and luxury spread out before his eyes so much startled the royal visitor that he seemed beside himself for joy. The shrewd son of Burleigh spared neither good dinners, nor fine wines, nor smiling obsequiousness to keep up the good-humour of his majesty; and everything succeeding according to his wishes, he made a great exhibition of his now established power, designed to strike his enemies dumb, by summoning all the lords of the privy council to his house to do homage to the new ruler. James was well content with the scheme, feeling enraptured with the sumptuous dwelling and the exquisite wines of his host, so that, showing no hurry to leave St. Theobald's, Cecil had time not only to present to him the privy councillors collectively and individually, but to influence his mind to the extent of giving all places of importance to his own adherents, and keep all those inimically disposed to him out of office. It had always been a prominent feature of Burleigh's policy to suffer no conspicuous men at his side to obscure his own importance in the eyes of the sovereign, and Cecil followed the course somewhat further than his sire, being instinctively conscious that he had more reason to do so. It was his jealousy, acting in concert with the undisguised animosity of several other of Elizabeth's advisers, that had brought Essex to the block; but since the noble and hot-headed earl had fallen, new dangers appeared before him in the rise of some of the old foes of Elizabeth's favourite, and it was to destroy these that Cecil's present efforts were chiefly directed. James, not devoid of generosity as long as it was cheap, and seemed profitable, professed the belief that Essex had suffered for his faithfulness to him, which led him to speak of the gallant earl always as "my martyr," not forgetting, probably, that the name

thus tenderly apostrophised enjoyed boundless popularity in England. Upon this genial piece of hypocrisy, for it was little else, Cecil built a notable scheme of his own. Wishing to get rid at once of the four most distinguished men in and near the government, whose ambition he dreaded most, he whispered into the king's ear that the earl of Northumberland, Lord Cobham, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Lord Grey, had been chiefly the means of destroying Essex, and that it would be well, therefore, to visit them with some marks of royal displeasure. James did as advised, conveniently forgetting that Cecil himself had been the principal actor in the Essex drama, and the four rivals and old allies of the secretary were given to understand that they must expect no promotion, while Raleigh, the most ambitious of the number, and consequently most dangerous, was deprived in addition of the various posts he filled. This done, James remodelled his council, leaving none but friends of Cecil, such as Egerton, the lord keeper, the two Howards, Buckhurst, Mountjoy, and Nottingham, in office, and adding to the number four Scottish lords, together with his own secretary, James Elphinstone. Finally, on the 7th of May, the king quitted St. Theobald's, after dubbing twenty-eight more knights, thus raising the list of nobles he had created within a month to two hundred and thirty-seven, or about four times as many as Queen Elizabeth had made during the whole of her long reign.

James made his entry into the metropolis late in the evening of the 7th of May, received by the lord mayor and aldermen of the city at Stamford Hill, and escorted by them to a residence prepared at the Charter House, through streets lined by dense crowds of people, full of enthusiasm, but somewhat astonished at the personal appearance of the new majesty of England. The contrast between the city dignitaries and the king was great indeed; the former being clad in their gorgeous scarlet robes, and the latter in a garb suggestive of the traditional dress of the followers of Robin Hood. A spectator on the road left a description of "the colours" of King James, describing his garments "as green as the grass he trod on, with a feather in his cap, and a horn instead of a sword by his side." The figure and features of James were not made to do away with the ludicrousness of this attire. "He was of middle stature," according to Sir Anthony Welldon, clerk in the royal household, "more corpulent through his clothes than in his body, yet fat enough, his clothes being made large and easy, the doublets quilted to be stiletto proof, and his breeches in plaits and full stuffed—he was naturally of a timorous disposition, which was the reason of his quilted doublets." Then, to complete the portrait in a few strokes, "his eyes were large and ever rolling," "his beard was very thin," "his tongue too large for his mouth," "his skin as soft as taffeta varsemet," and "his legs extremely weak." James himself became aware on the day of his entry that he had made no very favourable impression upon his subjects in the metropolis, and to gain popularity he issued a proclamation suspending the operation of all the monopolies granted by Queen Elizabeth until they had been examined by the privy council. This had a good effect upon the multitude; and to earn the plaudits of the middle classes as well, the king set to manufacture still more knights, determined apparently not to rest till every shopkeeper in the realm had been turned into a nobleman. From the Charter House, where he did nothing else but knighting individuals who came in his way, James removed to the Tower, continuing there the business, and from thence proceeded to Greenwich, unwearied in his labours, till he had ennobled some seven hundred people by the touch of his sword—or that green "horn" which hung "instead of a sword by his side." Having shaped a sufficient number of knights to form a regiment, or people a small town, James set to produce peers of the realm. The first upon whom the honour was conferred was Cecil, who was raised to the peerage under the title of Lord Cecil of Essendon, which promotion was followed immediately by the creation of nine more barons and four earls, most of them Scotchmen. The sudden rise of these strangers brought out the loud murmurs of the English courtiers and sycophants, who believed themselves entitled, by length of service and servility to the predecessor of James, to earliest consideration; and to appease their clamour the manufacture of earls and barons continued until sixty-two new names had been added to the roll of the House of Lords. The silly and highly impolitic proceeding gave rise to much amusement among the wits of the city, who stuck up bills in the public lounge at St. Paul's offering to teach, on the most moderate terms, a new and improved art of mnemonics, requisite for remembering the names of all the brand-new nobles baked by King James.

James was little affected by the gibes of his subjects, dwelling, blissfully ignorant of pasquinades and lampoons, in a lofty atmosphere of his own, which he established for himself as soon as he had settled down in the old abode of Queen Elizabeth, at Greenwich. Surrounded by a dense crowd of court parasites, he employed all his spare time, left after eating, drinking, and making nobles, in preparing proclamations to the people of England brimful of oracular wisdom, and expounding all things, high and low, under the new light of his sublime understanding. Of his predecessor on the throne he only spoke with an air of contempt; and the tribe of flatterers around him, who had crawled in the dust before the great queen, hesitated not to echo his words, and to admire everything falling from his lips as bits of divine inspiration. James, for once in his life, appeared to feel satisfied with the incense bestowed upon him, and his happiness seemed complete but for one little black cloud in the distance, upon which he looked with gloom and apprehension. This was the conduct of his wife, left behind at Edinburgh. Anne of Denmark, from the first year of her marriage with James, had taken the measure of the man, and broken his conceit by letting him understand on every suitable occasion that she was fully aware of being wedded to a pedant and a charlatan, in whose head and heart alike there was no room for love, or any other high feeling, but only for illimitable vanity and egotism. Knowing that it was impossible for him to impose upon her, the pluckless royal husband stood in awe of his consort, and the dread had given rise already as to many ludicrous scenes, so to a dark tragedy, the details of which were hidden in profound mystery. On the 5th of August, 1600, two years and seven months before the death of Elizabeth called him to the English throne, James had left Falkland Palace on a hunting excursion, in company with Alexander Ruthven, one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber, a handsome youth on whom the queen had recently bestowed extraordinary marks of favour. Before the hunting commenced, on the road to the forest, James turned aside to visit the earl of Gowrie, Ruthven's elder brother, at his mansion at Perth, telling his suite to leave him alone for a few hours. The time had not expired when the royal attendants came galloping up, and found that a double murder had been committed, both the earl and young Ruthven being stretched out in one of the rooms of their mansion, weltering in blood. James sullenly stated that the brothers had been slain by his order, having previously attacked him and tried to do violence to his own person. Utterly improbable as was the story, the young nobles not having previously shown the slightest cause of ill-will against the king, but, on the contrary, being known as fervent partisans of the crown, the courtiers did not refuse credence to their master, and the dead bodies of the Ruthvens were dragged away by them to be judged for treason, according to the ancient law of Scotland. The queen fainted on hearing the account of the tragedy at the Gowrie mansion, and refused to see James, openly accusing him of participation in a foul murder, and her opinion was shared by many of the people, especially the Presbyterian clergy. Nevertheless, the Scottish parliament, in conformity with the royal behest, judged the two Ruthvens guilty of treason, and the remains of the brothers were ordered to be torn to pieces by the hangman. On the day on which the judgment was executed, the 19th of November, 1600, the queen gave birth to a son, christened Charles—destined to follow his father on the throne as Charles I. It was reported that, in the agony of her confinement, the queen exclaimed "she hoped God would not visit her child with his vengeance for the murder of the Ruthvens."

There was a seeming reconciliation between James and his wife after the birth of Charles, but it was hollow and deceitful on both sides. The year after dissensions broke out afresh, and in 1602 the king went so far as to accuse his consort of plotting against his life, and harbouring in her private apartments a sister of the Ruthvens who meant to give him poison. The accusation was true as regarded the secretoring of the unhappy woman, whose nearest relatives had been killed, and the queen was forced to deliver her up, and promise never to see her again. Further quarrelling between the royal pair was stopped by the arrival of the great news that James had succeeded to the crown of England, in the burst of which glory and excitement Anne forgot her own deep private sorrows. Ambitious as much as her partner, though possessed of less vanity and more pride, she would have been glad to set out with him on the journey to the new throne; but the absence of the indispensable jewelry forbidding the progress, she agreed to let James go alone in his green coat, with his feather in his cap, and horn at his side, consoling herself with the hope that in his absence she would be reigning queen of Scotland. But the expectation was entirely destroyed by the arrangements made at the last moment by the king, followed up by orders despatched on his journey to London. These were to the effect that his eldest son, Henry, just past nine, should represent his own exalted self in his absence, and be kept for this purpose under the close care of the earl of Mar at Stirling Castle, not to be allowed to stir from thence, nor, on any account, to get into the custody of his mother. When learning how she had been thwarted, Anne got furious, and instantly hurried off from Holyrood to Stirling, determined to take possession of her son, if necessary, by main force. The earl of Mar had left a few days before on a journey to England when the queen arrived at the gate of Stirling Castle, with a great body of armed attendants, and demanded of Lady Mar, who filled the place of governor in her husband's absence, instant admission. This was refused for the armed men, whereupon Anne came rushing in with a few of her courtiers, took her son by the arm, and made an attempt to run away with him. But Lady Mar, a staunch Scotchwoman, not suffering from the nerves, opposed her majesty in a very determined manner, declaring "that she had the king's warrant for retaining the prince under her charge, and till she saw equal authority for surrendering him, she must keep him by force." Anne now broke forth in hysterical shrieks; her attendants drew their swords, and the officers of the castle, on a wink from Lady Mar, drew their swords likewise. The scene ended by a long fainting fit of the queen, from which she had no sooner recovered when she was delivered, prematurely, of a dead son. James received the lamentable news in the middle of May, just after he had settled comfortably at Greenwich Palace, making lords and writing proclamations. He had been cherishing fond hopes that his royal consort would let him have peace for awhile; but the report of her behaviour at Stirling upset him completely, and utterly at a loss how to defend himself, he gave orders to the earl of Mar to let her do everything she liked, to deliver Prince Henry up to her, and to pay her all the honours of a reigning queen. However; even this failed to pacify the irate royal lady; she refused to receive her son from the hands of the earl of Mar when offered to her, and deeming she could not punish her husband better than going to him, she started for London immediately after she had recovered from her confinement. The affray at Stirling castle had taken place in the first week of May; and on the 2nd of June the queen found herself sufficiently strong to set out for the English capital, carrying with her in an oaken coffin the body of her still-born infant.

It took nearly a month for Queen Anne to get to London, her progress being delayed by endless quarrels with the court officials sent to her by James, she insisting to appoint her own people, and he swearing great oaths that he would "break the pate" of any man accepting office without his permission. While she was tarrying at Berwick and York, disputing with her servants, polishing her bright English jewels, and looking after her dark little coffin, the king's feelings, dull with the dread of coming days, were agreeably relieved by the announcement that ambassadors from Spain, France, and the Netherlands had arrived to pay their homage to him, and congratulate him on his accession to the throne. The diplomatic envoys of the three countries made their appearance at court almost simultaneously, their errand being to the same purpose, not of congratulation merely, but to get the promise of English gold and English arms for or against the great cause still attracting the attention of Europe, the struggle of the Netherlands against Spanish dominion. The embassy from the people of the United Provinces, representing the greatest stake in the transaction which James was to decide, was the most numerous and most influential of the three; it consisted of Prince Frederick of Nassau, son of the prince of Orange, Johan van Olden Barneveldt, Henry Count Biederode, and other distinguished patriots and statesmen of the republic. They arrived on the 12th of June, and had scarcely set foot in England when there came an opponent in the person of Count d'Arenberg, representative of Archduke Albert of Austria, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, and brother-in-law of Philip III. Two days after his arrival, on the 15th of June, 1603, a French ship of war ran into Dover Harbour, carrying on board a third special embassy, headed by Maximilian de Bethune, baron of Rosny, councillor, friend, and guide of Henry IV., greatest minister of the greatest king of the age. The fame of Rosny already was spread over England, and when the news of his arrival became known, a crowd of distinguished men, among them Lord Sidney, former commander in the Netherlands, Lord Southampton, who had just been released from the Tower, where he had been since the execution of Essex, and many other nobles, flocked down to Canterbury and Gravesend to meet him, and brought him in triumph to London, getting him a residence at Arundel House, in the Strand. James exhibited some jealousy at the conspicuous reception given to the envoy of Henry IV., and to show his disapproval of any other person but himself being honoured by his subjects, made him wait some days for an audience. The ambassador himself ascribed the delay to a different cause, explained in his "Memoirs." "King James," says Rosny, "was by no means so well inclined to Henry IV. as Elizabeth had been, because he had been told that my sovereign had called him in derision a 'captain of arts and clerk of arms.'" The title given to James by Henry IV. was not bad; but Rosny, after he had made the personal acquaintance of the new king of England, first of the Stuart line, invented a better one by calling him "the wisest fool in christendom."

The great question as to whether England should continue to interfere actively in the promotion of civil and religious liberty in Europe by assisting the oppressed Protestants of the Netherlands, or should help Spain and Rome in recovering its lost ground by becoming a cold and passive looker-on in the mighty struggle, began to occupy the whole nation with the arrival of the three embassies. All politicians and statesmen of the kingdom, as well as the leaders of the various religious parties, debated it with great heat; and James himself made his preparations for the solution by appointing a grand master of the ceremonies for the court. He had felt the want of such an important functionary ever since he had taken possession of Greenwich Palace, and the non-existence of the office was one of the reasons which made him look with pity and disdain upon the government of Elizabeth, so that when the distinguished foreign envoys arrived he hurried to fill the gap that threatened to sink his own rule to the same level. After careful deliberation, the king decided upon intrusting the grand mastership of the ceremonies to Sir Lewis Lukenor, a Scottish gentleman, and the royal letters patent to the effect having been duly issued, orders were given to admit the ambassadors to the Presence. Prince Frederick of Nassau and his colleagues were the first to be introduced, and Rosny was to follow next; but a curious incident, not a little significant of the character of James, prevented the audience taking place on the appointed day. As a mark of respect for the late queen, Henry IV. had given distinct orders to his envoy to put himself and all his suite in mourning on first presenting themselves at Greenwich Palace, where Elizabeth had so long resided, and which seemed intimately connected with her memory. However, immediately after his arrival in England, the resident French ambassador, count de Beaumont, warned Rosny not to carry out the orders given to him, representing to him, according to his own relation, "that his proceeding would certainly be beheld with an evil eye in a court where there was such an affectation of consigning the great queen to oblivion, that no mention was ever made of her, and men even avoided to pronounce her name." "This being the case," continues Rosny, "I should have been very glad to have dispensed with the necessity of appearing in a dress of mourning; but the commands which I received on this head were very positive, and appeared to me highly proper, on which account I disregarded the advice of count de Beaumont, promising, however, that I would consider the subject further if he would write and get the opinion of Sir William Erskine and some other gentlemen of the bedchamber who best understood the ceremonial of the English court. He wrote on a Wednesday, but received no answer on Thursday, Friday, or during the whole day of Saturday; and I persisted in my resolution to obey the orders I had received in spite of the arguments to the contrary, which he continued to argue. However, on Saturday night, the eve of the day appointed for the audience, so late that I was on the point of going to bed, count de Beaumont came in a great hurry to tell me that Sir William Erskine had sent him word that the courtiers were unanimous in regarding my design of assuming a mourning dress as an insult to them, and that his majesty himself would feel so deeply offended that nothing more would be necessary to render my negotiation abortive from the very beginning." To resist an argument like this was, of course, impossible, and nothing was left to the friend of Henry IV. but to cast aside his mourning apparel and put himself into gay clothes. The philosophic mind of Rosny probably felt startled at the idea that there was actual and imminent danger that the wearing of a black coat and a pair of dark breeches would endanger the existence of the Netherlands and be a serious blow to Protestantism in Europe.

Rosny had his audience on the appointed day, and laid before the king a treaty of alliance between England and France, having for chief object to assist the Dutch in their struggle for independence, and drive the Spaniards from the Netherlands. James at first seemed not at all favourable to the scheme, his love of peace being as great as his dislike to the people of the Low Countries, whose sturdy republicanism and Calvinistic creed were both as utterly repugnant to his own absolutistic tenets as the principles of the Scotch Presbyterians, who had dared to assert to his face that kings were "the devil's hairns." Receiving in turn the Spanish, Dutch, and French envoys, James at the commencement markedly inclined his ear to the first; but this feeling underwent a visible change at the end of a week or two, after repeated interviews with Count d'Aremberg, Rosny, and the prince of Nassau and his companions. Count d'Aremberg, a clever and handsome courtier, but nothing else, offended James by paying more attention to the ladies at court than to his own august person; he was ever distributing perfumes, gloves, and pretty little toys among the fair ones, and so much wrapt up in pleasing them that once or twice he attempted to get away when the king was holding forth on abstruse theological and philosophical subjects. Rosny's deep insight into character allowed him to play his part infinitely better; almost at the first glance he had come to understand the mould of "the wisest fool in Christendom," and at the end of a couple of audiences he had become his master. Instead of troubling himself about the ladies, for whom his learned majesty never cared in his life, Rosny gained over the few intimate favourites of James, including the barber, by a liberal distribution of gold; and the effect of the whole was that in a very short time the prospects of the French alliance were secured. To this result the envoys of the Netherlands contributed a fair share. Pedantic and self-conceited as he was, James felt struck by the high mental calibre of the stately patriots who had come to invoke his aid, especially the most remarkable man among them, John van Olden Barneveldt, Grand Pensionary of Holland and West Friesland. His anti-Spanish and anti-Jesuitical arguments, scholastic in part and of the kind most appreciated by James, made a considerable impression, which was heightened by a circumstance calculated more than any other to make the stay of the handsome Count d'Aremberg at the English court of the very shortest duration. While the negotiations were at their briskest, a Roman Catholic priest, named Gwynn, had been laid hold of in the Channel by some cruisers, and confessed to his captors that he had been sent from Spain to England for the purpose of assassinating the king. All further hesitation on the part of James now came to an end. The representative of Archduke Albert, who had succeeded in gaining immense popularity among the bevy of fair ones awaiting the arrival of Queen Anne, received a hint that he had better retire to the court of Bruges from whence he had come; and Rosny and the Dutch ambassadors learnt to their infinite satisfaction that the good swords of Englishmen would be raised once more to win liberty of conscience for a kindred race by wrestling with the dark hosts of Spain and of Rome.

The conditions of the alliance between England, France, and the Netherlands got settled by the end of June; but the signature of the treaty was postponed for several weeks through the arrival of Queen Anne, which gave rise to a series of festivities, as well as commotions. After troubling not a little the peace of her husband, who would have been glad to see her remain in Scotland quietly for a year or two, Anne had found her way to the English capital; and to show her independence to the last, she refused to seek her lord at Greenwich, but went to Windsor instead, so as to compel him to follow her. Poor James, terribly afraid of his consort by this time, made all haste to do as she wished, and on the 1st of July the royal pair met at Windsor, and embraced each other very solemnly, amidst great thundering of cannon and ringing of bells. The next day the king held a chapter of the Garter, and invested his eldest son, Henry, and several Scottish and English nobles, with the order, as well as the queen's brother, ruler of Denmark. The ceremony was scarcely over when a terrible quarrel broke out between the English and Scotch courtiers, in which the queen most unwisely interfered by taking the part of the latter; the affair led not only to high words, but the drawing of swords, and to appease the tumult James had to dissolve the company and remove to Hampton Court Palace. Their majesties had not been here many days when the plague, which was raging in the capital with great violence, broke out in the royal household; and several of his servants having succumbed to it, the king ran away in great haste, and shut himself up in St. James's Palace, dispersing a fair that was being held in the neighbourhood, for fear that the concourse of the people might contribute to spread the pestilence. He also issued a batch of proclamations on and about the mystery of the plague, enjoining everybody to be in fear and trembling of the disease, and forbidding all members of the nobility and others, except certain persons specially invited, to appear at the forthcoming coronation. The ceremony had been fixed to take place on the day of St. James the Apostle, the 25th of July, and could not well be postponed; but the king's dread of the pestilence, as well as of plots upon his life, engendered by the seizure of a number of suspicious characters, reduced the projected splendour of the rites to the meagrest dimensions. Instead of going with the customary train from the Tower through the city to Westminster, the king and queen went in private by water from Whitehall to the abbey, where the archbishop of Canterbury anointed their heads amidst the flourish of trumpets, interrupted now and then by the rattling of the plague carts and shouts to bring forth the dead, the number of which had risen to near a thousand a week. To shake off the deep feeling of gloom hanging over the court, and pervading even the atmosphere, it raining incessantly, James amused himself by making a few more knights and nobles. He set to work with astounding vigour, knighting in one single day all the judges, all the serjeants-at-law, all the doctors of civil law, all the gentlemen ushers of the court, and "many others of divers quarters." Among those upon whom the honour was conferred were two very remarkable men, Francis Bacon, author and serjeant-at-law, and Roger Aston, the king's barber.

The plague, as well as the arrival of the queen, exerted a damaging influence upon the efforts of Rosny and the Dutch ambassadors to bring the treaty with James to a conclusion. In his terror of being infected with the disease, the king kept all visitors, diplomatic and others, at bay, retiring within the innermost recesses of the palace, and communing with none but his consort and a few favourites; and Queen Anne made good use of this opportunity by influencing her easily-impressed partner as much against the cause which Rosny had come to plead as was in her power. Partly out of personal spite against the oar of Mar, enthusiastic admirer of Henry IV., and partly through the sinister promptings of Romish emissaries, who had got hold of her by some means, the queen openly advocated an alliance with Spain, and though James did not profess to pay much attention to her whisperings on the subject, well aware that to follow them would bring upon him excessive unpopularity, he was so far led out of his former course as to re-enter into communication with Count d'Arenberg, and even to receive another Spanish envoy, who had come direct from Madrid. To break this new dangerous connection, and gain over the queen together with the king, Rosny as a last resource brought forward, at an interview which he obtained, the project of an intimate blood alliance between the royal families of France and England. The scheme was to marry the French heir-apparent to James's only daughter, Elizabeth, not quite five years old, and to give the eldest daughter of the ruler of France, also called Elizabeth, as a wife to Prince Henry, on the children attaining the proper age. The proposal was listened to in silence by the king, but he replied to it soon after at a banquet in a very extraordinary manner. "His majesty," relates the ambassador in his "Memoirs," curiously full of information, "asked only count de Beaumont and myself to sit down at his table—where, as I was not a little surprised to observe, he was always served by gentlemen on their knees. The conversation during a great part of the repast was about nothing but the weather and hunting, till, an occasion presenting itself to speak of the late queen, the king, to my infinite regret, did so with a kind of contempt. He went so far as to say that, for a long time before the death of Elizabeth, he had guided all her counsels, and had all her ministers at his disposal. His majesty then called for wine—which he never mixes with water—and holding his glass towards Beaumont and myself, he drank to the health of the king, the queen, and the royal family of France. I pledged him in return, not forgetting his children. When he heard them named, he drew towards my ear and whispered, but rather loud, that the next toast should be to the double union between the two royal houses. This was the first word his majesty had said to me on the subject; and though it appeared to me that the time was not at all well chosen for opening such an important matter, I did not fail to greet the words with all possible signs of joy. Imitating the royal whisper, I replied that I felt sure my sovereign would greatly prefer the dauphin should take the hand of Princess Elizabeth than that of a Spanish infanta daughter of Philip III., recently proposed to him. King James seemed much surprised at what I told him, and in his turn informed me that the identical infanta had been offered to his own son." For a king setting up to be a Solomon to engage in after-dinner prattle of this kind, about the most delicate affairs of state, seemed terribly indiscreet, even under due allowance of the habit of not mixing wine with water.

Rosny's perseverance got remunerated at last by the king consenting to put his name to a treaty of alliance with Henry IV., promising assistance to the Dutch Protestants in their struggle for independence. By the terms of this agreement, James granted permission to levy troops for the Low Countries in England and Scotland, under the condition, however, that his royal ally was to pay for them, deducting only a sum of money advanced by Queen Elizabeth to Henry, and which the latter had not been able to repay. The compact was never carried out, the French king having probably his own doubts whether the connection with the "captain of arts and clerk of arms" would be of any good, either to himself or the people of the Netherlands, his ambassador's report of what he had seen and heard giving not much hope on the subject. James had scarcely signed the treaty with France when he left London again in great haste, in mortal fear of the plague, which continued spreading among the population. He hid himself for a while at Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, whither he was followed by Rosny; but Count d'Arenberg making his appearance too, and being received with the greatest distinction by the queen, while he himself was looked upon contemptuously by her and the greater part of the courtiers, the friend and counsellor of Henry IV. thought fit to withdraw, and soon after took his departure for France. At Woodstock, prison and palace of his great predecessor on the throne, James remained till the end of September, when he removed to Winchester, where a notable drama was about to take place. It was the unravelling of a great plot, discovered by Cecil, and aiming, according to his assertions, at the overthrow of the new dynasty, the murder of the king and his whole family, and the re-introduction of the Roman Catholic religion into England. The actual facts of the terrible intrigue which Cecil had brought to light were somewhat thin and cloudy; but it suited the secretary's interests to make them appear of the hugest dimensions, as much with the object of showing the indispensable-ness of his own services as to entertain his royal master, intensely fond of mysteries of all kinds, whether moral, philosophical, or criminal. The plotters caught by Cecil in the first instance were Lord Grey of Wilton, a Puritan of somewhat exalted opinions; Sir Griffin Markham, a Roman Catholic gentleman discontented with the government; George Brook, brother of Lord Cobham, an unprincipled adventurer; and William Watson, a secular priest suspected by many to be a double spy, in the service of both the secretary and the Jesuits. There was no difficulty in spinning out the idle talk and treasonable boastings of these four persons, not devoid altogether of a share of evil intentions, and the will to do mischief should opportunity offer itself, into a formidable conspiracy; and Cecil opening his net as wide as possible, managed to haul into it half a dozen more victims, among them Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh. There was not the shadow of evidence of Raleigh having plotted either to murder the king or overthrow the government, his sole offence consisting in not guarding his words sufficiently, and, like a disappointed man who had hopes of preformant and been treated with neglect, giving vent to expressions of dissatisfaction with the new rule. However, this was sufficient to procure his arrest, and after being inveigled by Cecil into a friendly correspondence, in which he compromised himself by a hasty allusion to the doings of his old acquaintance, Lord Cobham, he was thrown into the Tower, and an indictment filed against him for high treason.

The trial of the accused conspirators came on at Winchester Castle on the 15th of November, the king having arrived there six weeks before, to prepare for the mysterious exhibition which his prime minister had prepared. To make the scene as impressive as possible, and secure the main object in view, the condemnation of all the accused, Cecil had appointed a special jury, made up entirely of his friends and dependants. The principal commissioners were Sir John Popham, lord chief justice, president of the tribunal; the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain; Lord Henry Howard; the earl of Devon; Lord Wotton of Morley; Sir John Stanhope, vice-chamberlain; and Cecil himself, chief conductor of the whole performance. Next to him, the most important player in the drama was Sir Edward Coke, attorney-general, and as such figuring as public prosecutor, a lawyer unrivalled in the extent of his professional acquirements, and singularly adapted by the vigour of his mind, the keenness of his reasonings, and the unexampled brutality of his vituperation to serve a despotic government in the management of state trials. Under his guidance, two days, the 15th and 16th November, sufficed to despatch the minor victims, all of whom were found guilty; after which came the turn of the illustrious personage whose destruction was one of the main objects of the prosecution. Sir Walter Raleigh appeared before his judges with a serene air, calm and strong in his innocence, though well aware that it would not protect him against a condemnation already resolved upon, and the finish of which required nothing but a piece of mummery passing by the name of justice. The act of impeachment accused him with conspiring to dethrone the king, and with attempting "to raise sedition and to bring in the Roman superstition by means of a foreign invasion;" but the sole evidence brought in support of these weighty charges was the deposition of Lord Cobham, Cecil's brother-in-law, of Raleigh having proposed to him to get a large sum of money, not less than six hundred thousand crowns, from the king of Spain, and employ it for stirring up sedition in the realm. The false testimony had been wrung from Cobham, a vain and weak man, terrified into madness by sudden imprisonment, under the impression that Raleigh had accused him of treason, for which purpose a line from a letter which the latter had written was artfully made use of by Cecil, to whom it was addressed. Learning subsequently that it had been a mere trick, he retracted his statement, but not to the slightest effect, the written deposition being carefully kept by Cecil and the denial as carefully suppressed. In vain Raleigh demanded to be put face to face with Cobham; his claim, meeting the barest requirement of justice, was replied to only by abuse on the part of the prosecutor, so foul and low that even the judges, venal as they were, felt a sense of shame creeping over them. The scene that took place at Winchester Castle, immediately under the eyes of the king, with his prime minister and his great lawyer acting on the one side as tools of the vilest yet weakest of despotisms, and the most illustrious man of the realm as victim and prisoner on the other, was altogether characteristic of the commencement of the reign of the first of Stuart sovereigns.

Sir Edward Coke began his charge to the jury by oaths and imprecations against Raleigh, strangely intermixed with fulsome praise of the king. "I shall not need, my masters," he exclaimed, "to speak anything concerning his majesty, nor of the bounty and sweetness of his nature, whose thoughts are innocent, whose words are full of wisdom and learning, and, whose deeds are full of honour." Then, turning round upon the accused, and charging him with having attempted "to destroy the king and his progeny," he apostrophised Raleigh—"But to whom do you bear malice?" he shouted; "to the children?" At which he was interrupted by the noble prisoner. "To whom do you speak this?" Raleigh calmly remarked: "you tell me news I never heard of." "Oh, sir, do I?" cried Coke, "I will prove you the notorious traitor that ever came to the bar. After you had taken away the king you would alter religion: I will charge you with the words." "Your words cannot condemn me," again interrupted Raleigh; "my innocency is my defence. Prove one of these things wherewith you have charged me, and I will confess the whole indictment, and that I am the horriblest traitor that ever lived, even that I am worthy to be crucified with a thousand torments." "Nay, I'll prove all!" shouted Coke; "thou art a monster! thou hast an English face but a Spanish heart! I charge thee, Raleigh, that thou hast incited Cobham to go to the Spanish ambassador and deal with him for money to bestow on discontented persons to raise rebellion in the kingdom." "Let me answer for myself!" once more interrupted Raleigh. "Thou shalt not!" fumed the lawyer. "But it concerneth my life," continued Raleigh, getting slightly excited. "Oh, do I touch you?" sneered Coke; and launching forth again in his old strain, he continued heaping the vilest abuse upon the exalted hero who stood before him—a chained lion opposite a cat. At last Raleigh's patience got exhausted, and hearing his scurrilous opponent dwell upon Cobham's guilt, broadly insinuating that his own was inseparable from it, he exclaimed, with dignity: "I do not hear yet that you have spoken one word against me. If my Lord Cobham be a traitor, what is that to me?" Coke's reply was of the most extraordinary kind; so remarkable, indeed, that it passed into a proverb, furnishing the great dramatic genius of the age with one of his quaint satirical touches. "All that Cobham did was by thy instigation, thou viper!" cried the foul mouthed legal dignitary; "for I thou thee, thou traitor!" "It becometh not a man of quality and virtue to call me so," calmly retorted Raleigh; "but I take comfort in that it is all you can do." "Ah! Have I angered you?" screamed the lawyer. "I am in no case to be angry," Raleigh answered, hanging his head on his breast.

For a whole day, from early morning till late at night, the vile abuse of James's attorney-general upon Sir Walter Raleigh was allowed to proceed, and not one of all the nobles and high-placed courtiers, who sat there in the king's palace to distribute justice, interfered for shame to make an end of the disgrace. Coke himself at last got hoarse from excess of vituperation, allowing Raleigh to enter upon a superb defence, demonstrating to conviction that the charges against him were entirely groundless. To prove them so, he produced a letter from Cobham, written after his condemnation on the preceding day, retracting all that he had formerly deposed against his friend, and thus doing away with the basis of the whole accusation. "Seeing myself so near my end," Cobham wrote, "for the discharge of my own conscience, and to free myself from your blood, which else will cry vengeance against me, I protest upon my salvation I never practised with Spain by your procurement. God so comfort me in this my affliction to say that you are a true subject, for anything I know. I will say with Pilate, 'Pursus sum a sanguine hujus.' So God have mercy upon my soul as I know no treason by you!" The letter naturally created a deep impression in court, seeing which Coke sprang again to his feet, resuming his old arguments. "Thou art the most vile and execrable traitor that ever lived," he screamed; and on Raleigh remarking,

"You speak indiscreetly, barbarously, and uncivilly," continued, "I want words sufficient to express thy viperous treasons." Thereupon the noble prisoner said, smiling, "I think you want words indeed, for you have spoken one thing—half a dozen times." After exhausting again his stock of objurgations and expletives, Coke permitted the accused at last to finish his defence. He did so in a few eloquent sentences. "Methinks it is a strange thing," Raleigh exclaimed, "that I who have always condemned and attacked the power of Spain, should now be accused to affect it." Then, continuing in a higher strain, he cried, "Remember, my lords, what St. Austin says, 'So judge as if you were about to be judged yourselves, for in the end there is but one judge and one tribunal for all men.' Now, if you yourselves would like to be hazarded in your lives and ruined in your descendants; if you would be content to be delivered up to be slaughtered, and to have your wives and children turned into the street to beg their bread; if you would be content all this should befall you, upon a trial by suspicions and presumptions, upon an accusation not subscribed by your accuser, without the testimony of a single witness, then so judge me as you would yourselves be judged." Thereupon Cecil's commissioners retired, deliberated for a quarter of an hour, and returned a verdict of Guilty.

The verdict having been announced, Sir Walter Raleigh was asked, in the usual form, whether he had anything to say in protest of judgment of death being passed against him. He replied, with noble dignity, "The jury have found me guilty; they have done what they were directed to do, and I can say nothing why judgment should not proceed. But I recommend my wife and my son of tender years to the king's compassion." The appeal to the compassion of a sovereign possessing nothing but vanity, and believing in nothing but his own superior wisdom, was naturally vain; nevertheless Raleigh had a near chance of his life being spared through a sudden fit of his majesty to engage in a dramatic surprise of a novel kind. To show himself a wonderfully magnanimous prince, and at the same time enjoy a little more mystery, James resolved to extend his forgiveness to some of the more distinguished malefactors condemned for wishing to hurt him by sending them a pardon when already under the executioner's axe, so that they might feel all the agonies of death in their minds and yet not be hurt in their bodies. The scheme was carried out to the entire satisfaction of his majesty. After lying for nearly a month in the dungeons of Winchester Castle, in daily expectation of the arrival of the hangman, and seeing the priest Watson, George Brooke, and a third victim dragged forth to the scaffold and despatched after the infliction of cruel tortures, the announcement went forth to the four noble prisoners, Lord Grey, Sir Griffin Markham, Lord Cobham, and Sir Walter Raleigh, that their turn would come next, the days of their execution having been fixed. To show that he was in earnest, James signed the death-warrants, and introducing none of his councillors into the secret of the melodrama which he meant to perform, fixed the execution of Grey, Markham, and Cobham for Friday, the 10th of December, and that of Raleigh for the Monday following. The development of the mystery planned by James was graphically recorded by an eyewitness, Sir Dudley Carleton, a diplomatic gentleman, in a letter to a friend. On the appointed Friday, at ten o'clock in the morning, Sir Griffin Markham, the first victim to be operated upon, was led to the scaffold in a pouring rain, and told to prepare himself to have his head struck off. "One might see," Carleton described the scene, "the very picture of sorrow in his face; but he seemed to want no resolution, for a napkin being offered by one that stood by to cover his face, he threw it away, saying he could look upon death without blushing. He then took leave of some friends that were near, and entered upon his devotions, and those ended prepared himself for the block." At this stage of the proceedings, his majesty, superintending the performance from a distance like a god in the clouds, dropped a spirit messenger. "One John Gib, a Scotch groom of the bedchamber," continues Carleton, "secretly withdrew the sheriff, whereupon the execution was stayed, and Markham left to entertain his own thoughts, which no doubt were as melancholy as his countenance was sad and heavy. The sheriff on his return told him that since he was so ill prepared for death he should yet have two hours' respite; so he led him from the scaffold without giving him any more comfort, and locked him into the great hall to walk with Prince Arthur." It was an idea worthy of James, this of inflicting two hours more of deadly agony.

The turn was now come for the second victim, Lord Grey of Wilton. "He was led to the scaffold," the chronicler goes on, "by a troop of young courtiers, and was supported on both sides by two of his best friends; he had withal such gaiety and cheer in his countenance that he seemed a dapper young bridegroom. At his first coming on the scaffold he fell on his knees, and his preacher made a long prayer to the present purpose, which he seconded with one of his own making, which for the phrase was somewhat affected, and suited to his other speeches, but for the fashion expressed the fervency and zeal of a religious spirit." While praying, the royal spite, John Gib, again made his appearance, whispering to sheriff and hangman. "Lord Grey having come to a full point, the sheriff stayed him, and said he had received the king's command to change the order of the execution, and that the Lord Cobham was to go before him. Whereupon he was likewise led to Prince Arthur's hall." Thus the second act was neatly played out, with another concession of mental suffering, and the third victim was summoned upon the stage. "Lord Cobham," continues the attentive looker-on, "who was now to play his part, and by his former actions promised nothing but matter for contempt, did much cozen the world, for he came to the scaffold with good assurance and no fear of death. He said some short prayers after his minister, and so outdid the company that helped to pray with him that a stander-by said, 'He hath a good mouth in a general cry, but is nothing single.'" As before, while the praying was going on, the seraphic John Gib, groom of the bedchamber, dropped down upon the scaffold between the block and the axe. Murmuring psalms with folded hands, Lord Cobham "was stayed by the sheriff, who told him that there resteth yet somewhat else to be done, for that he was to be confronted with some other of the prisoners; but he named none." At the end of a few minutes, Markham and Grey were brought back to the scaffold and confronted with Cobham, and the three "looked strange one upon the other, like men beheaded and met again in the other world." Finally, as told with much humour by the narrator, "all the actors being together on the stage—as use is at the end of a play—the sheriff made a short speech unto them, by way of interrogatory of the heinousness of their offences, the justness of their trials, their lawful condemnation, and due execution there performed, to all which they assented. Then saith the sheriff, 'See the mercy of your prince, who of himself hath sent hither a countermand and given you your lives.' There was no need to beg applause of the audience, for it was given with such hues and cries that it went from the castle into the town." James was delighted with the finish of his mystery. "The resolution of it," Sir Dudley Carleton, evident admirer of the performance, informed his friend, "was taken by the king without man's help, and no one can rob him of the praise of the action; for the lords knew not otherwise but that the execution was to go forward, till the very hour when it was to have been performed. Then, calling them before him, he told them how much he had been troubled to resolve in the business; for to execute Grey, who was a noble young spirited fellow, and save Cobham, who was as base and unworthy, seemed to him a manner of injustice; and to save Grey, who was of a proud, insolent nature, and execute Cobham, who had shown great tokens of humility and repentance, appeared to him as great a solecism. So the king went on with Plutarch's comparisons in the rest, still travelling in contraries, but holding the conclusion in so indifferent balance that the lords knew not what to look for till the end came out—'and therefore I have saved them all.' The miracle was as great there as with us who had been looking on at the scaffold, and it took like effect, for the applause that began about the king went from thence to the queen, and so round about the court."

Notwithstanding the great success of his entertainment, James did not repeat it in the case of Raleigh, being dissuaded therefrom by Cecil, who could not but feel secretly ashamed of the puerile and despicable character of a play with men's lives in which the chief part had been assigned to "one John Gib." Accordingly, Sir Walter Raleigh was reprieved quietly, without being dragged before the sheriff, hangman, and groom of the bedchamber, and taken in company with his three fellow-prisoners, Cobham, Grey, and Markham, from Winchester to London. It was ordered by the magnanimous king that after having "saved them all," they should undergo perpetual imprisonment in the Tower; however, Markham escaped from it, and went abroad as a spy in the service of Sir Thomas Edmonds, English resident in Flanders; Lord Grey, brave and high-spirited, languished and died at the end of a few years; and Cobham was suffered to stray out of prison, after his whole property had been confiscated and divided among the crowd of hungry sycophants who fawned under the breath of royal wisdom. The ultimate fate of the miserable man, "base and unworthy," according to the verdict of James, yet redeemed by "great tokens of humility and repentance," was sad in the extreme. Neither his wife, who enjoyed a large independent fortune, nor Cecil, who had married his sister, or any other of his high and noble relations, got moved either by humanity or common decency to give him a lodging or a crust of bread, and after wandering about like a beggar, he was saved for a time from starvation by a poor "trencher-scraper," formerly his servant, who relieved him with a few meals, and lodged him in an empty garret of his own wretched dwelling. Here the brother-in-law of the king's prime minister, head of a noble ancient family, privy councillor of Queen Elizabeth, and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, died of filth and hunger. Sir Walter Raleigh was treated with somewhat more of respect; he had been exceedingly unpopular before his trial, chiefly on account of the part taken in the prosecution and death of the earl of Essex, but his manly and dignified behaviour under the false accusation brought against him, and the foul abuse of the attorney-general, won him golden opinions among the multitude, which in turn had the effect of softening the rigour of his confinement, James being ever anxious to catch the wind of public favour, from whichever side it might happen to blow. At the earnest solicitation of Raleigh's wife, she and her son were allowed to share his imprisonment, and books and writing materials being likewise granted to him, he cheerfully made the Tower his home, turning the dark dungeon into a bright study, illuminated by the light of his genius. With his mind, always full of great subjects, and having been, as he himself expressed it, "a soldier, a sea-captain, and a courtier," to which he might have added, a statesman, an ambassador, a planter of colonies, and a discoverer of new empires, he now conceived a mighty task, which he set himself to accomplish in prison. It was nothing less than the composition of a "History of the World."

The trial and condemnation of Raleigh and the prisoners accused with him of plotting the overturn of the government, created a great stir among the religious parties of the kingdom, as revealing the tendency of the new ruler to turn against both Roman Catholics and Puritans, and to favour the latter no more than the former. William Watson, the priest, on the one hand, and Lord Grey, fervent Puritan, on the other, represented religious dissatisfaction rather than political opposition; and the fact that both had been severely punished seemed to show the king's intention to keep, in this respect at least, in the path struck out by Elizabeth, that of upholding the episcopal church by any means, even by persecution. To some extent, the people were prepared for this, James having in the latter years of his reign as simple king of Scotland, gradually wheeled round from Calvinism to orthodox Anglicanism, expressing, after his wont, very dogmatic and intolerant views in each stage of his faith. Up to

1590 he pretended to be a staunch Presbyterian, and in a general assembly held at Edinburgh in the latter year, "he stood up," as reported by David Calderwood, "with his bonnet off, and his hands lifted up to heaven, and said he praised God that he was born in the time of the light of the gospel, and in such a place as to be king of such a kirk, the sincerest kirk in the world." "As for our neighbour kirk of England," James continued, "their service is an evil-said mass in English; they want nothing of the mass but the liftings; and I charge you, my good ministers, doctors, elders, nobles, gentlemen, and barons, to stand to your purity, and to exhort the people to do the same—I, forsooth, as long as I brook my life, shall maintain the same." Ten years after, Queen Elizabeth getting very decrepid, and the throne of England becoming distinctly visible at Edinburgh, his majesty's religious opinions underwent a great change. He no longer held the Presbyterian church "the sincerest kirk in the world," but found that the "neighbour kirk," with its "evil-said mass in English," was far the better of the two; which discovery led him to abuse Scottish ministers and elders, and all Calvinists in general, very heartily. In his great polemical essay, the "Basilicon Doron," which he recommended to his son and heir, when on the road to England, as sole guide of life, he expressed his new convictions in very strong terms. "The Puritans," James said in this work, "are very pests in the church and commonweal, whom no deserts can oblige, and neither oaths nor promises bind. They breathe nothing but sedition and calumnies; they aspire without measure, rail without reason, and make their own imagination, without any warrant of the Word, the square of their conscience. I protest before the great God—and since I am here as upon my testament, it is no place for me to lie in—that ye shall never find with any Highland or Border thieves greater ingratitude, and more lies and vile perjuries, than with these fanatic spirits. And suffer not the principals of them to brook your land, if ye like to sit at rest, except ye would keep them for trying your patience, as Socrates did an evil wife."

The Puritans of England ought to have been contented with this royal expression of opinion, but, like hard-headed men, they were not, and labouring under the impression that as his majesty had changed his convictions once before, he might change them again, they kept on besetting him with petitions and remonstrances soon after his accession. James at first took no notice of these supplications, most of them being somewhat vague in their demands, tending merely to elicit his sentiments in regard to religious dissenters; but on their suits becoming more pressing, and more definite in shape, he could not any longer withstand the necessity of returning a reply. The promise of it was extorted from him in the journey from Winchester to the metropolis, after the Cobham-Raleigh trials, when crowds of ministers came to beseech him to give his sanction to the revival of the religious meetings, known as "prophesyings," in vogue during a part of the reign of Elizabeth, but suppressed by her and Archbishop Parker. The demand being made in such a way as to flatter the king's vanity, he agreed to hear the question of the legality of these meetings, as well as other matters in dispute between the Puritan non-conformists and the established church, discussed before him, and to give his own final judgment thereon. The religious congress was appointed to take place at Hampton Court Palace; and on the day fixed for the opening, the 14th of January, 1604, a great many prelates, ministers, and preachers assembled at the royal residence, the chief leaders of the state church party being the archbishop of Canterbury, John Whitgift, successor of Grindall, and Richard Bancroft, bishop of London; and on the side of the Puritans, John Reynolds and Thomas Sparks, professors of theology at Oxford, with Lawrence Chaderton and John Knewstubs, lecturers on divinity at Cambridge. Besides the prelates of Canterbury and London, there were seven bishops and eight deans admitted to the conference; but the number of dissenters allowed to appear before his majesty was restricted at the last moment to the four deputies from Oxford and Cambridge, the rest of the numerous clergy who had come up to defend their cause receiving orders to return home, on the pretence that there was no room for them. James himself, sitting in all his glory on a high throne, surrounded by a brilliant court, and looking portentously like an infallible pontifex, made a marked distinction on the first day of the conference between orthodoxy and dissent by not admitting the champions of the latter party to his presence, but conferring solely with the bishops. What the king wanted to know from them was their opinion upon a little tract, called "Of the Pacification of the Church," written by a man who was acquiring some influence over him, Sir Francis Bacon, knight and serjeant-at-law. Bacon was not at all inclined towards Puritanism, but he had no liking either for episcopal intolerance, and therefore argued in favour of concessions to dissent, laying stress upon the fact that "the silencing of ministers" might be dangerous, and would certainly be unwise under the existing scarcity of good preachers, and "be a punishment upon the people as well as upon the party." The statesmanlike import of these arguments had made some impression upon James, but the effect was destroyed completely in the interview with the bishops. It was enough for them to hint that the Puritans aimed at crowns as well as mitres, and that the least advantage conceded to the revolutionary party would invite a torrent of destruction. The intimation sufficed to make James wince from further contact with Bacon's book as from the touch of a serpent.

On the day after the interview with the bishops, the 16th of January, the first sitting of the congress took place. John Reynolds, chief speaker of the dissenters, opened the proceeding by requesting the king to give his gracious permission that further reforms be made by parliament in the code of the established church, tending to draw the national creed further away from the superstitions of Rome. He proposed that, with this object in view, the Book of Common Prayer should be revised; that the cap and surplice of the clergy, together with some Catholic ceremonies, such as the ring in marriage, and the cross in baptism, should be set aside; that non-residence and pluralities in the church should be strictly forbidden; and that, finally, ministers should no longer be compelled to subscribe to the Thirty-Nine Articles. Without replying to these propositions, or arguing their justness, the leaders of the episcopal party, in a very unexpected manner, denied the right of their opponents to ask for any reforms at all. Throwing himself on his knees before the king, the bishop of London asked "that the ancient canon might be remembered," which prohibited all schismatics from bringing forward any of their tenets in the presence of their ecclesiastical superiors; and he also invoked another statute, ordering "that no man should be admitted to speak against that whereunto he had formerly subscribed." This statute, Bancroft contended, had been clearly infringed by Reynolds and his companions, all of whom had given their assent to the Communion Book, as well as the Thirty-Nine Articles. The bishop concluded with a somewhat vulgar attempt to heighten the prejudice of the king against the dissenting ministers on account of their dress. It seemed to him, he said, that they wished to conform themselves "in orders and ceremonies to the fashion of the Turks rather than to the Papists, because, contrary to the orders of the universities, they appeared before his majesty in Turkey gowns, instead of their scholastic habits, sorting to their degrees." Bancroft's oration was less effective than he expected, and the bishops trembled when they saw a frown gather upon the royal brow. They had altogether forgotten in their hot zeal for orthodoxy that the king himself had called the conference together, and therefore given rise to the breaking of the statute which they invoked, and that moreover the sudden dissolution of the conference would deprive his majesty of the great opportunity offering itself of making speeches and displaying his learning. Perceiving quickly the great fault his episcopal brethren were committing, Archbishop Whitgift interfered, praying the king to hear the opponents of the church, and to decide everything according to his own unbounded wisdom. Thereupon James's brow smoothed, and he launched forth the stream of his theology. "I was by," reports Sir John Harrington, godson of Queen Elizabeth, "and heard great discourse. The king talked much Latin, and disputed with Dr. Reynolds; but he rather used upbraidings than arguments, telling the petitioners that they wanted to strip Christ again, and bid them away with their snivelling. The bishops seemed greatly pleased, and said his majesty spoke by the power of inspiration. I wist not what they mean, but the spirit was rather foul-mouthed." James finished the first sitting of the religious congress by swearing furiously at the Puritan ministers, annihilating them, if not by the power of his arguments, at least by the weight of his oaths.

The second meeting of the conference was even more unfortunate to the advocates of church reform than the first. The Oxford deputies, in requesting the king to allow again the former "prophesyings," having rashly proposed that any dispute that might arise at these assemblies might be referred to "the bishop and the presbyters," James broke out in violent anger. "If you aim at a Scottish presbytery," he cried, "it agrees as well with monarchy as God with the Devil. Then Jack and Tom, and Will and Dick, shall meet, and at their pleasures censure me and my council, and all our proceedings. Then Will shall stand up, and say, 'It must be thus;' then Dick shall reply, and say, 'Nay, marry, but we will have it thus!' And therefore here I must reiterate an old speech, 'Le Roi s'aviseira.' Stay, I pray you, for one seven years, before you demand that from me, and if then you find me puffy and fat, and my windpipes stuffed, I may perhaps hearken unto you: for let that government be once up, I am sure I shall be kept in breath." From the narrow despotic point of view, this was clever enough; and hearing the frantic applause of the courtiers, and the more subdued approval of the episcopal dignitaries, who whispered to each other about heavenly inspiration, loud enough that he could hear it, James went to tell them a tale. "After Queen Mary had overthrown the reformation in England," he said, "we in Scotland felt the effect of it. For thereupon master Knox wrote to the queen-regent, a virtuous and moderate lady, telling her she was the supreme head of the church, and charged her, as she would answer it at God's tribunal, to take care of Christ and his evangel, in suppressing the popish prelates who withstood the same. But how long, trow you, did this continue? Even till, by her authority, the popish bishops were repressed, and Knox with his adherents being brought in, were made strong enough. Then they began to take small account of her supremacy, when according to that 'more light' wherewith they were illuminated, they made a further reformation of themselves." Here the king paused for a while, and then turned round to Whitgift and Bancroft. "My lords the bishops," he exclaimed, putting his hand to his hat, and making an obeisance, "I may thank you that these men plead thus for my supremacy. They think they cannot make their party good against you but by appealing to me; but if once you were out and they were in, I know what would become of my supremacy, for 'No Bishop, no King.'" After this explication, which certainly had the merit of plainness, the king addressed himself once more to Reynolds. "Well, doctor, have you anything more to say?" he cried. The Oxford professor, harassed, brow-beaten, and abused for two long days, wisely responded, "No more, if it please your majesty." Then James called out, exultingly, "If thus be all your party hath to say, I will make them conform themselves, or else harric them out of the land—or else do worse." The Puritans bowed and retired. they had learnt one more great lesson, and meant to treasure up its fruit.

The king's triumph at the victory he had achieved was boundless. "I peppered them soundly," he told his barber and other friends, "they fled me from argumen to argument like schoolboys." There was some excuse for the immoderate exultation of his majesty in the behaviour of the chief prelates at the end of the disputation. The bishop of London went so far as to throw himself prostrate at the foot of the throne, as if to worship James, exclaiming "that his heart melted with joy, and made haste to acknowledge to Almighty God the singular mercy in giving them such a king, as since Christ's time the like had not been;" to which the primate added "that his majesty spoke by the special assistance of God's Spirit." Whitgift died six weeks after he had uttered these words, and Bancroft got his reward in being made archbishop of Canterbury. The nomination was followed by the most rigorous measures against the dissenters. Immediately after the closing of the religious conference, the king issued a proclamation ordering all civil and ecclesiastical authorities to enforce strict conformity; which edict was followed by a circular of the new primate to the bishops, commanding a strict supervision of the clergy, and the suspension from their livings of all ministers who exhibited any signs of dissatisfaction with the code and ordinance of the established church. At the same time a spy-system was organized for tracing out and denouncing the leaders of non-conformity among the clergy; and with the aid of the judges of the Star Chamber and county magistrates, the archbishop succeeded in driving above three hundred of the most upright and learned Protestant ministers from their cures, some to wander into prison, some to go abroad, and some to perish with their families of hunger. In the meanwhile, James went through the ordeal of passing from the Tower to Westminster in a gorgeous procession, exhibiting himself for the first time publicly to his subjects. The pageant, originally fixed for the eve of the day of coronation, but postponed on account of the plague, took place on the 15th of March, and not a little frightened the king, with his head always full of plots and murders. Having safely reached the end of the road, he peevishly complained "that when he next came to visit his people, he hoped they would not run here and there as if possessed, ramping as though they meant to overthrow him and his wife," recommending at the same time "that, like his good douce lieges of Edinburgh, they would stand still, be quiet, and see all they could." Such a temper naturally did not contribute to make James popular among the masses of his new subjects. "He was not like his predecessor, the late queen of famous memory," exclaims Arthur Wilson, a contemporary writer, "who, with a well-pleased affection, met her people's acclamations, thinking most highly of herself when borne up on the wings of their humble supplications. He endured this day's brunt with patience, being assured he should never have such another; but afterwards, in his public appearances, especially in his sports, the accessions of the people made him so impatient that he often dispersed them with frowns, and even with curses."

Four days after his procession from the Tower to Westminster, on the 19th of March, James opened his first parliament. He had looked forward for months past with much apprehension to the meeting of the representatives of the people, not unconscious of the slow rise of a new spirit of liberty within the nation, similar to that which he had been compelled to face during the whole of his career as ruler of Scotland. To guard against it, he had issued at the beginning of the year, together with the summonses for new elections to the House of Commons, a proclamation brimful of advice to his English subjects as to what kind of members they ought to choose, or not to choose. He warned them not to elect on any account men given to dissatisfaction, nor any "noted for superstitious blindness one way," nor "for their turbulent humours" on the other, nor any who had been declared outlaws or bankrupts. Appended to the royal edict was an order of very serious import, involving a clear breach of the privileges of parliament. James commanded that all the returns of the elections should be made into the court of chancery, and that if any "should be found to be made contrary to the proclamation," they were "to be rejected as unlawful and insufficient." The illegal injunction was disregarded by most of the constituencies; and notwithstanding all the efforts of the government to the contrary, the new parliament came to include a large number of men of the class "noted for their turbulent humours," or, in other words, Puritans. By a mistake in the arrangements, either wilful or accidental, the newly elected representatives of the people were not present when the king came to the House of Lords to open the session: he thereupon, desirous to shine by his oratory as much as possible, delivered the address from the throne twice, first to the peers and next to the commons. Like all other productions of James, the speech was prolix, full of bombast and commonplace; it contained, however, some remarkable declarations of opinion on subjects which a ruler of less conceit and more good sense would have carefully abstained from agitating. After expressing, with strongly marked self-complacency, his acknowledgment to the English people for the extraordinary alacrity with which they had greeted him as legitimate heir to the throne, he proceeded to expatiate on the blessings which they had received in his person. He had brought with him two gifts, he said, which he trusted they would accept with gratitude, the one being peace with foreign nations, and the other the union with Scotland. The king then proceeded to dilate upon the policy which he meant to pursue. To the Puritans he declared himself decidedly opposed, as well on account of their religious convictions, they being "novelists," as because of "their confused form of policy and parity, over showing discontent with the present government, and impatient to suffer any superiority, which maketh their sect unable to be suffered in any well governed commonwealth." As to the Roman Catholics, James declared that he had no desire to persecute them, especially those of the laity who would be quiet; but that all priests who continued to maintain that the pope possessed "an imperial civil power over kings and emperors," and who taught, moreover, that excommunicated sovereigns might be lawfully assassinated, should be driven out of the realm. In reply to the address from the throne, the speaker of the House of Commons, Sir Edward Phelps, delivered a short oration, loyal in tone, but reminding the king somewhat pointedly that laws binding upon the nation could be made only in parliament.

The commons had not been sitting a week before they were in open quarrel with the government. The freeholders of the county of Buckingham having returned Sir Francis Goodwin as their representative, to the exclusion of Sir John Fortescue, the court candidate, the judges of the court of chancery declared the former incapable of sitting, on account of an outlawry which had formerly been issued against him, and of "the king having in his late proclamation prohibited the election of persons outlawed." Notwithstanding the decision, extrajudicial in all respects, the house confirmed the election of Goodwin, and summoning him to the bar, ordered that he should take his seat. At this decided action the king flared up, and sent a message to the commons, telling them that "he had no purpose to impeach their privileges, but since they derived all matters of privilege from him, and by his grant, he expected that they should not be turned against him." The message, involving a question of the highest importance, had no sooner been delivered, when the house assumed an attitude of firm opposition. A committee was appointed to draw up a reply to the king, showing that the commons had always been entirely independent in the cases of disputed elections, and denying that, as asserted in the royal communication, they had come in this instance to a precipitate conclusion. The reply was delivered on the 3rd of April; and two days after James sent another message to parliament, informing the members that he had as great a desire to maintain their privileges as any living man, or as they had themselves; that he had considered carefully the manner and the matter of the subject in dispute, and had heard his judges and privy councillors, and that he was now "distracted in judgment." The conciliatory tone adopted by the king had its due effect upon the members of the lower house, and after some further discussion they elected a deputation to have an interview with his majesty, and, if possible, settle terms of agreement. At the meeting, James, who appeared to get somewhat frightened at the stern behaviour of the commons, adopted a very humble tone, acknowledging that the house was the proper judge of the returns of members, but asking, as a personal favour and to guard his dignity, that they would set aside both the candidates for the county of Buckingham, and issue a writ for a new election. It was a long time since English members of parliament had heard such language from the lips of a sovereign, and they felt not strong enough to withstand its softening influence. The issue of the new writ desired by the king was resolved upon, therefore; and to satisfy those members who were reasonably jealous of compromising the dignity of the house, a letter was obtained from Goodwin, declaring his readiness to submit to the arrangement. Thus the first encounter between an English parliament and a Stuart king ended in a drawn battle; but a battle nevertheless in which keen observers might see the mark of a wound inflicted on absolute authority.

After the settlement of the question of privilege, the commons set to work with great zeal in the reform and curtailment of regal and administrative abuses. The two principal of these discussed for the moment were the ancient feudal practices of purveyance and of wardship, the former allowing the king on his progresses to appropriate the goods and exact the services of certain classes of the rural population without proper remuneration, and the latter instituting the crown the guardian of rich wards, under no supervision as to the use made of the income derived from their estates or personal property. It was generally known that Cecil derived a large portion of his immense revenues from such wardships; but to prevent their attacks upon the corrupt system assuming a personal character, the commons prepared a petition to the king in which they proposed to lay their complaints on the subject before him, offering at the same time to grant supplies equal in amount to those drawn by the crown from the "court of wards," if he would consent to have the institution abolished. James's prime minister got alarmed at this step, and to stifle the further advance of the proposition, set out upon a dexterous flank movement. In his speech from the throne, the king had already thrown out hints about his intention to accomplish the political union of England and Scotland, and he now persuaded him to bring the matter definitely before parliament, so that active steps might be taken to carry his wishes into effect. The subject had no sooner been mentioned in the commons, when they were all astir, and dropping the discussions about purveyance, wardships, monopolies, and other grievances, began to entertain the union question as one of paramount importance. As foreseen by Cecil, though not by the king, the project of binding the two realms closely together, so as to constitute, in the words of James, "one worship to God, one kingdom entirely governed, one uniformity in laws," met with the most determined resistance of the lower house. Partly out of a narrow spirit of jealousy against the Scotch followers of James, by whom, as was said in the house, "nothing was unasked, and to whom nothing was denied," but partly also out of a sincere mistrust of the purity of the king's intentions, the English representatives blandly refused their co-operation in passing any laws tending towards the great object; and all that they could be persuaded into, after long debates, was to nominate fourteen commissioners to consider the matter, in conjunction with the lords, who were to appoint a like number. Immediately after, on the 7th of July, James prorogued the commons, with an angry letter for farewell. "You see with what clearness and sincerity I have behaved myself in this errand," he wrote, "even through all the progress thereof, though I will not say too little regarded by you, but I may justly say not so willingly embraced by you as the worthiness of the matter doth well deserve. I protest to God the fruits thereof will chiefly tend to your own weal, prosperity, and increase of strength and greatness. But nothing can stay you from hearkening unto it but jealousy and distrust, either of me the propounder, or of the matter by me propounded." The concluding words of the king were very extraordinary. "It is you now to make the choice," he exclaimed, "either by yielding to the providence of God, and embracing that which he hath casten into your mouths, to procure the prosperity and increase of greatness to me and mine, you and yours, or else, contemning God's benefits so freely offered unto us, to spit and blaspheme in his face by preferring war to peace."

It was in no amiable mood that the members of the House of Commons returned to their homes at the beginning of July; little pleased either with the personal conduct of the new king, or his wisdom in the management of public affairs. The general dissatisfaction was greatly increased by the report that while parliament had been engaged in a struggle for its own privileges and the liberties of the nation, James had taken to negotiate with the arch-enemy of England, and was actually on the point of concluding a treaty of alliance with Philip III. of Spain. A few weeks more showed that the report was perfectly true, realizing the worst expectations. Led away by his minions, and, to some extent, by the queen, who made no secret of her partiality for all friends of Rome, James consented to enter into communication with the ambassador of Philip III., the count of Villa Mediana, as soon as the great minister of Henry IV. had turned his back upon him; and being drawn onward step by step, he found himself, before many months were over, inextricably entangled in the diplomatic meshes of Spain. Distributing money with open hands, Philip's envoy soon enrolled a large party at court; and two of the new favourites of the king, Henry Howard, whom he had raised to the peerage under the title of earl of Northampton, and Thomas Howard, created earl of Suffolk, laboured with all their might to bring the scheme of a Spanish alliance to a successful end. By the middle of May the party had got so far as to obtain James's consent for the meeting of commissioners to discuss the preliminaries of peace; and on the 20th of the month the representatives of the two governments met for the first time, on the Spanish side Villa Mediana, together with the Count d'Arenberg, who had come back from Flanders; and on the part of England the two Howards, Cecil, the earl of Devonshire, the lord treasurer, Lord Buckhurst, recently created earl of Dorset, and the lord high admiral, the earl of Nottingham, who, as Lord Howard of Effingham, had seen the Invincible Armada fly into the North Sea. All the Howards being favourable to the Spanish interest, and Cecil having likewise touched the gold of the count of Villa Mediana, the negotiations made very quick progress, so that at the end of two months the treaty was ready for the king's signature. To expedite this last formality, Philip III. despatched one of his chief advisers, the constable of Castile, who arrived in England on the 12th of August, five weeks after the prorogation of parliament, bringing with him fresh supplies of gold. The earls of Northampton, of Suffolk, and others who had assisted in advancing Spanish interests, got the payment of their services, and even Cecil felt not ashamed to accept a pension of four thousand crowns, which was raised to six thousand in the following year. This done, James was pushed forward; and on the 19th of August he swore, with great solemnity, to observe the treaty made with his dear friend and ally, Philip III. The news that the king had associated himself with the patron of the Jesuits and the Inquisition, the protector of the pope, and the oppressor of the Netherlands, was received with sullen and ominous silence throughout the country. In London alone there was some slight stir, the people pointing with fingers of scorn upon Northampton and Suffolk, both of whom were engaged in building themselves splendid mansions upon foundations of Spanish gold.

The conclusion of the treaty with Spain had a great effect in strengthening the puritanical element in the nation. It pleased neither Protestants nor Catholics, for even among the latter, still very numerous in England, there were but few willing to purchase the victory of their own creed at the price of national dependence. The alliance with Philip III., therefore, while it alarmed all the disciples of the new faith, was not much more welcome to the moderate adherents of the old religion, and thus made the whole current of popular feeling move visibly towards the advanced section of reformers, which was upholding political together with religious liberty. However, while puritanism developed itself, the opposite extreme, represented by the fanatic adherents of the church of Rome, gained strength likewise; they formed themselves into a closer, firmer-knit body on the withdrawal of the more moderate men of their own party, and what they lost in numbers they gained in zeal. Desperate men, ready to stake their goods, their lives, and their hopes of eternal happiness, in the cause of what they held to be the true religion, and to advance it through crime and sin, had never been wanting among the latter class; and time and circumstances now joined once more a knot of those wild enthusiasts, bent, like the assassins of the Bartholomew night, to gain the favour of high heaven by sprinkling the earth with blood. It was in the summer of 1604 that half a dozen extreme fanatics came to meet each other for the first time in London, to discuss a plan for a Bartholomew massacre on a small scale. Their meetings took place at the invitation of a gentleman of good family and position, named Robert Catesby, owner of a large estate at Ashby St. Legers, in Northamptonshire, whose ancestors had filled offices of high trust under the crown, one of them having been the favourite minister of Richard III. Robert Catesby himself, educated by Jesuit teachers, was a zealous adherent of the church of Rome, and in the reign of Elizabeth had suffered for his faith by being thrown into prison during the time the Armada was approaching the shores of England. The persecution he had undergone had added to his deep hatred of Protestantism, fruit of his early training, which he sought to satisfy on various occasions by engaging in conspiracies against the government, notably in that of the earl of Essex. On its failure, he kept brooding over new designs to effect a revolution, so as to bring about a return of the Roman Catholics to power, and after long scheming he hit upon a horrible plan for arriving at the desired result with one great effort. It was to blow up, by means of gunpowder, the two houses of parliament at a moment when the king with his family and his ministers would be present, and having thus got rid, with a single stroke, of the whole executive, the legislature, and all the leading men of the realm, to establish a new government composed entirely of his own partizans. This terrific plan Catesby communicated first to two intimate friends, gentlemen of wealth and education like himself, Thomas Winter and John Wright, who both approved it, and promised their full assistance towards its realisation. The three conspirators were joined soon after by two more, Thomas Percy, a gentleman pensioner, and steward of the earl of Northumberland, and Guido, or Guy Fawkes, a soldier of fortune who had served as officer in the Spanish army in Flanders, and whom Thomas Winter had met at Ostend and brought to England. All the five met, towards the end of May, 1604, at Catesby's lodgings, a lonely house near St. Clement's Inn, in the Strand, and on their knees and in presence of a priest, swore a fearful oath not to rest till they had accomplished their purpose. Then the priest, Father Gerrard, a Jesuit missionary, gave them the sacrament and the absolution.

The first step of the conspirators towards the execution of their plan was to hire a house adjoining the parliament building, which was done by Thomas Percy without the slightest suspicion being awakened, his office requiring constant attendance at court and in the House of Lords. It was intended at first by Catesby to form a rapid connection between the vaults under the parliament building and the cellars of the house taken in Percy's name, so as to bring on the catastrophe at once; but this was found to be impossible after an examination; and he and his friends therefore prepared for the task of undermining the thick walls, a work which they could not expect to accomplish under several months. To secrete the gradually accumulated stores of gunpowder, another house was hired on the Surrey side of the river, opposite Westminster; and the month of December with its long nights having arrived by this time, they all set to work digging and breaking away stones. The labour was of a kind to which they were entirely unaccustomed, and to advance in it as fast as possible, two more persons were taken into the secret, Christopher Wright, a younger brother of John Wright, and Robert Kay, a Catholic gentleman in reduced circumstances, acting as attendant upon Catesby. To the number of seven now, the conspirators went on labouring day and night, armed to the teeth, with Guy Fawkes standing as sentinel at the door, ready to give the alarm at the approach of any foe or intruder. Sleeping on the hard floor, living upon the coarsest food, and thinking of nothing else but the realisation of their potent scheme, the seven cheered their hours of rest by conversing on what they would do when once the spark from their hands had touched the powder-barrels, blowing king and queen, lords, bishops, privy councillors, knights, and commons high up into the air, in such a sheet of flame as the world had never seen before. Catesby proposed that, the whole royal family having perished, except the little Princess Elizabeth, the king's eldest daughter, who was being educated under the care of Lord Harrington, at Combe Abbey, near Coventry, they should seize her, proclaim her queen, and carry on the government in her name, until the time when she could be given in marriage to a Spanish or Austrian prince. This arrangement was consented to generally, after which the parts of the immediate action were divided between the conspirators. To Guy Fawkes, the most determined man among them, was left the task of keeping guard over the cave, and at the final moment applying the match to the train of powder; Thomas Percy was charged with securing Princess Elizabeth; John Wright agreed to despatch the prince of Wales and any of the other children of the king who might not be at his side and share his fate in the parliament building; and Catesby reserved to himself the chief conduct and leadership of the enterprise, including intercommunication with the Jesuit agents, who were to direct a rising of the Catholics of the realm, and send assistance from Flanders and Rome, as soon as the sound of the thunder and the flash of the mighty sheet of fire that was to lay the people of England prostrate should re-echo over the world. Thus they schemed and plotted, the seven men, "all which seven," said Guy Fawkes in his supreme hour, "were gentlemen of name and blood, and not any was employed in or about this action, no, not so much as in digging and mining, that was not a gentleman."

James, in proroguing his first parliament at the beginning of July, 1604, had commanded it should meet again in February of the following year; but when the time arrived he dreaded the meeting, and postponed it till October. Guy Fawkes and his associates were not sorry for the delay, for the walls which they were attempting to pierce were hard as granite, and the further they went the thicker they seemed to grow. They were disturbed, too, in their work, by fearful noises, appearing as if produced by spirits of the nether world. Once, at the hour of midnight, they heard the slow tolling of a funeral bell deep in the bowels of the earth, to which they listened awestruck in deepest silence and with unutterable emotion. But the more they listened the louder it grew, and the solemn tolling did not cease until one of them, more courageous or more pious than the rest, took a few drops of holy water, the present of a priest, and sprinkled them on the ground. This instantly stopped the agonising sounds, and they were able to dig with renewed strength, and to stir each other with visions of the grand future, discernable beyond the fiery mountain which they were building up, when heresy would be extinguished in the land of their birth, the mass be heard again in its cathedrals, and a nation of believers kneel once more at the feet of the successor of the apostle. Now they heard the bell afresh, but it came no longer from the nether but from the upper world. The morning dawned, and Guy Fawkes entered, and told his friends that they need dig no longer, as the cave immediately under the parliament building, to reach which they had been labouring for months, was open and at their disposition. A coal merchant who had kept his stock there had just quitted the place, and it was to be let to the first comer. Thomas Percy immediately secured the place; and a few nights after thirty-six barrels of gunpowder were brought from the house on the opposite side of the river, and stowed away immediately under the hall where the king was to meet the lords and commons of the realm. To the seven conspirators,—joined recently by an eight in Catesby's servant, a man named Thomas Bates, whom they were compelled to intrust with the secret, yet did not look upon as an equal—the unexpected success seemed nothing less than a mark of divine providence in favour of their undertaking; and they once more sank on their knees and made a solemn oath never to abandon the work.

Everything was ready now for the great design; but it was only May, and the king had prorogued the parliament till the 3rd of October, so that five months had to elapse before Guy Fawkes could put the match to his powder-barrels. To make the best use of the time, Catesby proposed to his friends to seek new accomplices, who might assist them in their vast designs after the powder had done its work, in various parts of England as well as abroad, especial care being taken to select men possessed of means, with the aid of wandering priests and of the secret agents of Rome. This was agreed to, and the thirty-six barrels having been covered up with bars of iron, over which were spread a thousand billets of wood and five hundred faggots, the conspirators started in various directions, Guy Fawkes proceeding to Flanders, Catesby going into the midland counties, Thomas Percy to the west of England, and the others in various directions, Robert Kay being left behind to keep watch over the powder-cave. Guy Fawkes was the first to return from his mission, in the middle of August; he had attempted to gain over Sir William Stanley and Captain Owen, two Roman Catholics holding military commands in the Netherlands, but had been unsuccessful, obtaining nothing but vague promises of assistance, dependent upon preliminary success. Catesby in the meanwhile attempted a bolder stroke. He partly admitted one of his friends, Sir Edmund Baynham, a gentleman of large property in Gloucestershire, into the great secret, and despatched him on a mission to Rome, to tell the holy father that a wonderful event would soon take place in England, burning the head of the serpent of heresy, and to pray for his help to direct the sequence. At the beginning of September, Catesby met Thomas Percy at Bath, when it was decided between them to initiate three more zealous Roman Catholics, all of them men of wealth, into the conspiracy, chiefly with the object of procuring funds for buying arms and enlisting followers. The three men selected were Sir Everard Digby, of Drystoke, in Rutlandshire, a noble-minded, enthusiastic youth, united to a beautiful and affectionate wife, and possessing everything to make life blissful; Ambrose Rokewood, of Coldham Hall, Suffolk, head of an ancient and opulent family, equally young, and also newly married; and Sir Francis Tresham, a middle-aged man, owner of large estates in Northamptonshire, and who had suffered much from persecution in the reign of Elizabeth. Digby and Rokewood were drawn into the plot very unwillingly; they shuddered at the thought of the fearful deed that was to be accomplished, but finally consented to stake their lives on it, solely for the sake of a deep and fervent attachment for Catesby, their bosom friend, whose passionate ardour in the cause for which he was struggling and scheming seemed to exercise a magic influence over all with whom he came into contact. It also won Sir Francis Tresham, cousin of Catesby; but with him motives of personal revenge were the leading influence, and being a man of wavering mood, and of no great personal courage, the leader of the conspirators repented his trust in him almost immediately after he had given it. His suspicions were shared by Thomas Percy and Guy Fawkes; and for the first time their minds began to be filled with dark apprehensions of treachery. Their hands henceforth clung tight to the hilt of their swords, ready to stab false friends as well as open foes.

By the end of September the whole of the conspirators had returned to London to prepare for the great stroke. They were now ten in number, and had three more allies in three priests, John Gerrard, who had given the sacrament and absolution to the originators of the plot at the house near St. Clement's Inn; Thomas Greenway, the father confessor of Winter and Wright; and Henry Garnet, superior of the Jesuits in England. While the latter were working to bring about a general rising of the Catholics, Catesby employed the money advanced by Sir Everard Digby, Ambrose Rokewood, and Sir Thomas Tresham, amounting in the whole to about four thousand pounds, to buy arms and ammunition, as well as to fit out a small vessel, in which Winter was to sail for Flanders as soon as Guy Fawkes had sprung the mine, to bring back a number of his old friends, officers in the Spanish army. Everything was complete for the final catastrophe, when once more the calculations were disturbed by a postponement of the meeting of parliament, it being prorogued by the king from the 3rd of October to the 5th of November. The conspirators, already full of apprehensions and misgivings as to the good faith of at least one of their accomplices, were startled by the news of this fresh incident; and to find out whether there was any ground for suspecting that the grand secret had been betrayed, they sent Percy to the House of Lords on the day of formal prorogation to watch the countenances and behaviour of the lords present at the ceremony. He found everything perfectly quiet, and the assembled knot of peers and state dignitaries as dull, drowsy, and apathetic as if sitting at a public dinner, instead of over a volcano prepared to tear their bodies into invisible shreds. The report went far to calm the agitated minds of Catesby and his associates; but a few days had scarcely elapsed before they had another source of uneasiness. Sir Thomas Tresham, whom all had begun to mistrust, came forward to propose that a hint of the fatal stroke which they were preparing should be given to several of his friends in the House of Lords, ardent Roman Catholics, so that they could keep away from their seats at the day of the opening of parliament, and, their lives having thus been saved, might be able to assist them afterwards. He insisted that two noblemen especially should receive notice, Lord Monteagle and Lord Stourton, both distinguished as advocates of the old religion in the assembly of the peers, but more dear to Tresham as being married to two of his sisters. The proposal was received with scorn and indignation by Catesby, who energetically asserted that the whole tribe of ermined peers were nothing but tools of a vulgar despotism, as well as "atheists, fools, and cowards," and that, besides, the cause for which they were working was far too mighty to think of risking its success by the attempt of saving a few lives, whether worthy or worthless. "Rather than the project should not take effect," he cried, in last reply to his cousin's entreaties to warn the two lords, Monteagle and Stourton, "if they were as dear unto me as mine own son, they also must perish." Sir Thomas Tresham said nothing more, but went his way, silent and gloomy, his mind full of unutterable thoughts.

As the momentous day of the meeting of parliament approached, Catesby and his confederates had frequent interviews at a lonely house at Enfield Chase, belonging to Henry Garnet, the Jesuit, to discuss the doings of each day, as well as plans for the future. They were thus engaged on the evening of Saturday, the 26th of October, but without the presence of Sir Thomas Tresham, who had declared his intention to leave London for a few days in order to collect some money, necessary for the undertaking, on his estates in Northamptonshire. On the same Saturday evening, Lord Monteagle, Tresham's brother-in-law, a good Roman Catholic, but high in favour at court, gave an entertainment to some friends at his mansion at Hoxton, a mile from the city, and on sitting down to supper, a footman came and handed him a letter. It had been given to him, the servant said, at the door by a tall man, whose features he had been unable to distinguish in the dark, and who had hurried off without saying a word. Lord Monteagle opened the letter, glanced at its contents, and finding it rather illegible and without signature at the bottom, tossed it over the table to one of his squire attendants, a gentleman named Ward, requesting he would read it to him. Ward obeyed, and read aloud.—"My lord, out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation. Therefore I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse to shift of your attendance at this parliament, for God and man hath concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. And think not slightly of this advisement, but retire yourself into your country, where you may expect the event in safety; for though there be no appearance of any stir, yet I say they shall receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm, for the danger is past as soon as you have burnt the letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it, to whose holy protection I commend you." Although anonymous, the tone of the letter, its studied vagueness, and yet earnest entreaty, made a deep impression upon Lord Monteagle, so that he instantly left the table and set out for Whitehall, to communicate it to the head of the government. Cecil, who had been created earl of Salisbury a few months previous, was ready to sit down to supper in company with lords Nottingham, Suffolk, Worcester, and Northampton, when Monteagle arrived, and, drawing him into a side room, put the anonymous note in his hands. Some rumours of an intended rising of the Roman Catholics had already come to the ears of Salisbury through his numerous spies; he nevertheless seemed inclined to treat the matter lightly, and merely offered to take Suffolk into the secret. The latter looked very grave when, being called into the room, the letter was shown to him; the words "they shall receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them," struck him as full of meaning, knowing that the parliament building, of which he held the superintendence as lord chamberlain, had subterranean chambers, let to strangers. The idea that gunpowder might be hidden in one or all of these recesses came upon him in an instant; and Salisbury and Monteagle agreeing in the possibility of such a danger, it was determined to communicate the matter to the king. However, the affair did not appear very pressing, and James being out of town killing hares, his prime minister sat down with his friends and supped very merrily, while a few hundred yards from them Guy Fawkes paced up and down, in the feeble light of a lantern, amidst his thirty-six barrels of gunpowder—sufficient to turn Westminster and Whitehall together into a heap of ruins, and make the suppers of all dwelling therein their last upon earth.

King James was hunting at Royston, in Essex, when Salisbury received the anonymous letter from Lord Monteagle. His majesty had never enjoyed the noble amusement of shooting little animals, and soe them bleed to death at his feet in mute agony, so much as at this moment, and therefore instead of returning to town, as expected, on the last day of October, a Thursday, to prepare for the opening of parliament on the following Tuesday, he stayed away till late on Saturday, so that his minister could not hand him the all-important note till the Sunday morning. Salisbury executed his task with courtier-like address, and having hinted at the suspicion as to a powder-magazine being laid in the cave under the parliament building, was content to accept the king's order to search the place as a marvellous effusion of wisdom, produce of sudden inspiration. The royal command was carried out the day after, Monday, the 4th of November, when, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the lord chamberlain, accompanied by a few servants, descended into the cave, under the pretence of looking for some hangings used in the chamber of the lords at the opening ceremony that had been mislaid. On forcing open the door, and throwing a glance into the interior, Suffolk involuntarily fell back a step; he saw the cave was illuminated by a feeble light, and in one corner of it there stood "a very tall and desperate fellow," scowling at the intruders. Recovering from his surprise, and affecting a careless manner, the lord chamberlain asked the stranger who he was, and getting for reply that his name was John Johnson, and that he was in the service of Mr. Thomas Percy, gentleman pensioner, he shut the door again, and retreated with his followers. As soon as they were gone, the "tall and desperate fellow," no other than Guy Fawkes, hurried away to meet his accomplices, and tell them what had happened. They were partly prepared for the communication, the report of the warning letter sent to Lord Monteagle, and of the further proceedings of Salisbury, having come to their ears already through secret channels, and having given rise to some energetic proceedings on their part. Suspecting Sir Francis Tresham to have written the anonymous letter, they had summoned him to a nightly meeting, prepared to kill him at the instant if showing the slightest sign of guilt in words or manner; however, when charged with the deed, the accused exhibited so serene a countenance, and swore so boldly that he knew nothing whatever of the matter, that they let him go again, thinking that after all the note might be the mere product of the government spies hovering around them, and would not lead to a detection of their plans. They adhered to this belief, though with much doubt and apprehension, even after Guy Fawkes had brought the news of the lord chamberlain's visit to the cave. That their confederate had not been arrested on the spot left some hope in the minds of the conspirators; and after a long and anxious deliberation, they resolved that he should return to his post. It was late on Monday evening when the resolution was come to; the parliament was to meet at ten on the following morning, and, with the stroke of the clock, Guy Fawkes was to drop his spark of fire, and turn his back upon the doomed palace of Westminster.

Guy Fawkes took his place, as ordered, an hour before midnight, booted and spurred, his lantern in his left hand and his right on the hilt of his sword, Robert Kay had accompanied him to the cave, but left at the end of a few minutes, after handing him a watch which Percy had purchased for him, that he might know the right time when to set light to the faggots inclosing the long line of dark barrels, connected by a train of gunpowder. After pacing the gloomy chamber for awhile, Guy Fawkes began to feel drowsy, and sat down to rest himself, his head sinking upon his breast. There was death staring at him on every side, and the danger of being apprehended, shut up in a dungeon, and killed after nameless tortments, was great and imminent; yet though he knew it fully, he trembled not, a grand and lofty fanaticism, all but superhuman in its intensity, lifting him above every consideration of dread and fear. He had not the least mercenary or even personal interest in the execution of the scheme of blood on which he was engaged; he received no pay, and hoped for no reward of any kind; and he was conscious that the fatal spark of fire which he was carrying in his hand might, and probably would, claim him as first victim, tearing his body into atoms, and leaving his soul to account to the Creator for the horrible deed of which he had been guilty. But Guy Fawkes trembled not; gaunt fanaticism, hell-born and heaven-soaring, had lifted his body above all earthly calculations of hope or fear, and steeled his soul impenetrably against the whisperings of reason and conscience. He was sitting quietly, with his head upon his breast, as if going to sleep, when faint steps approached from without. A moment more and the door burst open; then came a struggle of a few seconds, and Guy Fawkes was in the grip of a dozen men, who throw him on the ground, bound hand and foot. The approach had been so sudden as to leave him no time to hurl his lantern against the wall, upon the train of gunpowder; but lying on the ground, conquered, foiled in all his intentions, and unable to stir, he yet remained calm and collected, not betraying by a single sign the feelings agitating his breast. To the question addressed to him by Sir Thomas Knyvett, commander of the guards who had taken him prisoner, as to his design, he quietly replied that his purpose had been to blow up in the morning the king and the two houses of parliament; but to the further interrogation as to who were his accomplices he refused to answer, saying they might do with him what they liked. He was thereupon carried straightway to Whitehall, first into the apartments of Salisbury, and from thence, accompanied by the minister, to the king's bedroom. Though bound securely, and surrounded by soldiers, the bold tall man brought before James made him shiver and tremble, and retreating to the end of the bedchamber, he restricted himself to making some cautious interrogations. Guy Fawkes gave his answers without the least hesitation. The king asking how he could have been so wicked to plan the death of a vast number of innocent persons, he quickly replied: "Dangerous diseases require desperate remedies!" and to the next question, regarding the extraordinary quantity of gunpowder he had collected, the curt answer was, "One of my objects consisted in blowing all Scotchmen back into Scotland." James would hear no more, but ordered the criminal to be taken to the Tower, and to be put through all the degrees of torture. "The gentler tortures are to be first used unto him," his majesty was pleased to command; "et in per gradus ad ima tendatur: and so God speed your good work."

The tidings of the apprehension of Guy Fawkes reached his fellow-conspirators at the instant; and by the dawn of day of Tuesday the 5th of November, they had saddled their horses, and were flying away from London at full gallop, on the road to the north. Their intention was not to save their lives, which they might have very easily done by walking on board the ship which they had chartered, ready to lift its anchors and sail at a moment's notice, but to stir up an insurrection in the midland and northern counties, in accordance with the plan previously determined upon. Catesby and John Wright were the first to leave, starting before the sun had risen; and the two were followed in a couple of hours by Percy and Christopher Wright. Soon after nine o'clock, Robert Kay procured a horse and made off; and at ten Rokewood left the city behind him, he being the best mounted of all, as owner of a magnificent stud of horses, which he had posted in relays all the way to Rugby, the latter town, near which Sir Everard Digby possessed large estates, having been made the general meeting place of the conspirators. The only one of them still remaining in London was Thomas Winter, who determined to examine the state of things with his own eyes before following in the wake of his comrades. He boldly made his way to the royal palace, which he found surrounded by soldiers, with a vast multitude shouting in front, pouring their maledictions upon the heads of all traitors; and this, not sounding pleasant to his ear, he attempted to reach the house of parliament, yet could only get to the middle of King Street, being stopped here by guards, who told him that no one was allowed to proceed further south. Unwilling to dispute the point, Winter quietly walked back to his lodgings, through streets getting more and more crowded, and saddling his steed spurred away northward. There were now seven daring men flying along the road to Northampton; but they did not remain long in the order in which they had started. About three miles beyond Highgate, Robert Kay was overtaken by Rokewood, and the two rode together for a short while, till the former found his horse to get lame, and was fain to lay down in a field, where he was taken the next day. The speed at which Rokewood was riding brought him up with Percy and Christopher Wright, forty miles further down the road; and not far off, a little beyond Brickhill, the three met Catesby and John Wright. They pressed on now all five, like men flying for their lives, Rokewood leading the way, and Percy with John Wright, on falling somewhat behind, getting so excited as to tear off their cloaks and throw them into a hedge, in order that they might ride the faster. At six o'clock in the evening they reached Ashby St. Legers, in Northamptonshire, the seat of Catesby, where they encountered some of their friends, learning at the same time that Sir Everard Digby had gathered a number of adherents around him, and was staying at Dunchurch, in Warwickshire, anxiously awaiting the signal of the great stroke in the capital having succeeded. They thereupon took to their steeds again and rode on to meet Digby, whom they found in the midst of a large circle of the gentry of the neighbourhood, all staunch Roman Catholics. Catesby appealed to them in eloquent words, not mentioning the failure of his great scheme, with which, indeed, they were unacquainted, but informing them that a revolution was preparing, and "that now was the time to stir for the Catholic cause." But they replied, to his consternation, that they would not stir, and that they meant to be loyal to the king and government, expecting more good from peace than they could possibly gain by rebellion. With this, they all quitted the place; and when the morning dawned the conspirators once more found themselves alone.

Though greatly disheartened by the refusal of Digby's friends to join their cause, Catesby and his companions were yet loth to give in, and attempt to save their lives by flying to the nearest seaport and embark for Flanders. Joined by Thomas Winter, who had come up slowly from London, they went, on the Wednesday morning, to Warwick, where they seized some cavalry horses, exchanging them for their own tired steeds, and then spurred on to Huddington, in Worcestershire, the residence of Father Greenway, and of Henry Garnet, head of the English Jesuits. On beholding the former, who had come out to meet them, Catesby joyfully exclaimed, "Here at least is a man who will live and die with us!" but the news of the failure of all their plans had no sooner been communicated to Father Greenway, when he turned round and went to hide himself in the house of a Catholic gentleman at Hendlip, always open as a refuge for priests. At Huddington, centre of a large district known for its fervent attachment to the old religion, Catesby made another great effort to stir up a rising, but without the least success, the population refusing to a man to have anything to do with him and his confederates. After a long harangue to a crowd assembled in the street, one of them, acting as spokesman, addressed Catesby. "Who are you for?" he asked. "We are for God and the country," replied the leader of the conspirators. "And we," shouted the other, "are for God, the king, and the country." The danger that the people would lay hands upon them now appeared imminent; they gave their horses once more the spur, and towards midnight arrived at Holbeach, two miles from Stourbridge, on the borders of Staffordshire and Worcestershire. Here they learnt that the sheriffs of both counties, having received orders from London, were in full pursuit of them, with all the forces at their command, determined to take them dead or alive. Sir Everard Digby thereupon took to flight; but Catesby, Winter, Percy, Rokewood, and the two Wrights refused to stir from the spot, deeming further efforts useless, and scorning to run away from their pursuers. They barricaded the house at Holbeach where they were staying, and calmly awaited the arrival of the soldiers, resolved to die arms in hand. As a preliminary, they sat down before the fire to dry some of their gunpowder, which had got wet during the day in crossing the river Stour; but bringing it too near the flame an explosion ensued, burning Catesby and Rokewood severely on face and hands. All present shuddered, seized by a sudden feeling of horror and vague remorse. They thought they saw in the explosion the finger of God's providence, bringing vengeance upon them by the same means which they intended to employ to hurl others into death. John Wright, himself unhurt, went up to Catesby, and crying out "Woe is that we have seen this day!" called for the rest of the powder, that they might blow themselves into the air together. But the leader refused; like a lion at bay he yearned for the fight, seeking death, but only death in battle.

The battle was not long in coming. At eleven o'clock on the morning of Friday, the sheriff of Worcestershire, Sir Richard Walsh, arrived with a large body of soldiers, and surrounding the house in which the rebels had taken refuge, summoned them to surrender. The reply was a shot, aimed at the magistrate but wounding one of his men. At this, the soldiers rushed against the house from two sides, opening a cross fire upon the inmates, who had gathered in a group in the hall, their muskets thrown away, and with nothing but the naked swords in their hands. Thick upon them now fell the fire of the assailants, one of the first shots killing John Wright, and another stretching his brother dead upon the floor. Rokewood dropped next, bleeding from half a dozen wounds, while Thomas Winter, brandishing his sword, was hit in the right arm. "Stand by me, Tom," Catesby cried to his old friend, "and we will die together." The words were scarcely from his lips, when a shower of lead and iron came flying through the air, laying all the conspirators prostrate, the same bullet passing through the bodies of Catesby and Percy, inflicting mortal wounds on both. A stream of blood gushed forth from the breast of the rebel leader, his eyes got dim, his knees faltered, and he sank upon the ground. But by an immense effort, he half raised himself again, and amidst a storm of fire and flame crawled into an adjoining room, where an image of the Virgin was standing upright against the wall. He clasped it in dumb agony; he pressed it to his heart; he kissed it fervently; and kissing and embracing expired, his stiff arms thrown around the cold marble. Sudden quiet having followed the loud tumult of arms, the sheriff marched in, and carefully examining the bodies upon the ground, put the corpses aside, and carried off those still breathing. There were only two prisoners left for him, Rokewood and Winter, both severely wounded, and praying that they might die before long. But death would not come, freely, or by force; the soldiers, fearing the prisoners might commit suicide, tightly bound their arms, as if pleased that some few at least of the great rebels should be left to face the stern verdict of earthly justice.

On Sunday, the 10th of November, two days after the combat at Holbeach, a solemn thanksgiving was offered in all the churches of London and the chief towns of the kingdom for the escape of his majesty and the royal family from the gunpowder plot. James had opened parliament the day previous, after a postponement of four days, with a very singular speech, descanting upon the moral and philosophical aspect of the conspiracy. At the beginning, he informed the representatives of the nation that human beings had the chance of suffering death in a violent manner in three different ways, namely, from the hands of other men, from wild beasts, and from insensible things: which latter he declared to be the most unmerciful and cruel, and then went on to take great credit to himself for having annihilated the designs of vile plotters that he and others should perish by such means. The merit of the interpretation of the anonymous letter sent to Lord Montague, James kept entirely to himself, hinting that he had accomplished the task by heavenly inspiration, which enabled him to interpret dark phrases, "contrary to the ordinary grammar construction of them, and in another sort than I am sure any divine or lawyer in any university would have taken them." After expressing his gratefulness to providence, his majesty went to look at the picture from another direction. "One thing, for my own part," he exclaimed, "have I cause to thank God in: that if God for our sins had suffered their wicked intents to have prevailed, it should never have been spoken nor written in ages succeeding that I had died ingloriously in an ale-house, or such vile place, but mine end should have been with the most honourable and best company, and in the most honourable and fittest place for a king to be in, for doing the turns most proper to his office." The speech from the throne concluded with an appeal for moderation, honourable to the king, if honest. "It may very well be possible," he said, "that the zeal of your hearts shall make some of you in your speeches rashly to blame such as may be innocent of this attempt; but upon the other part I wish you to consider that I would be sorry that any being innocent of this practice, either domestical or foreign, should receive blame or harm for the same. For although it cannot be denied that it was only blind superstition of their errors in religion that led them to this desperate device, yet it doth not follow that all professing the Romish religion were guilty of the same. For, as it is true that no other sect of heretics, not excepting Turk, Jew, nor Pagan, no, not even those of Calicut, who adore the devil, did ever maintain, by the grounds of their religion, that it was lawful, or rather meritorious, as the Romish Catholics call it, to murder princes, or people, for quarrel of religion; yet it is true, on the other side, that there are many honest men, blinded, peradventure, with some opinions of popery." And if they be not sound in the questions of the real presence, or in the number of the sacraments, or some such matters, yet do they either not know, or at least not believe, all the true grounds of popery, which is indeed the mystery of iniquity." Having delivered his speech, to prevent any possible contradiction, James prorogued the two houses of parliament for a further two months and a half, ordering them to meet on the 21st of January, 1606.

Though upholding the theory of moderation and mercy, the king did little to illustrate it practically. By his special orders, Guy Fawkes had to undergo the most frightful and hideous tortures, every instrument of illegal violence, hidden in the mouldering dungeon of despotism in which he had been caged, being employed successively to tear from him the secrets of the conspiracy. Yet, hero and malefactor of an uncommon kind, the grim sentinel of the powder-cave refused to speak even when his body was writhing under the most hellish torments and the gaolers of the Tower were tearing him to pieces limb by limb. What he himself had done, he frankly and freely confessed at the first examination; but of others he absolutely refused to speak, declining to inculcate the meanest of his accomplices. Seeing the entire uselessness of their proceedings, and deeming it too merciful to kill him on the rack, the royal inquisitors in the end left Guy Fawkes alone, devoting their attention to other prisoners connected with the plot who had been seized. The first of these who was put to torture was the servant of Catesby, Thomas Bates, who had been seized in Staffordshire, and brought to the Tower together with Rokewood and Winter. His fortitude gave way under the excruciating pain inflicted upon him, and the threats of the inquisitors to double and trouble them, and at the end of a few days they got from him a minute account of the whole plot, as far as he was acquainted with it. By his statements the government became aware for the first time of the connection of priests and Jesuits with the conspiracy; and seizing the new threads of the silently-spun web with great eagerness, Salisbury at once issued warrants for the arrest of Garnet, Gerrard, and Greenway, together with several other clerical and lay agents supposed to be in communication with them. But the orders were more easily given than executed. Although the great majority of Roman Catholics in the kingdom had shown that they not only disapproved but abhorred the plot of Catesby and his companions, they deemed it not the less their sacred duty to shelter priests against the arm of temporal justice; and persevering as were the efforts of Salisbury's emissaries to clutch them in their hiding-places, several months elapsed before any trace of their movements could be discovered. At last, towards the middle of January, two months after the catastrophe at Holbeach, the report arrived that two of the three priests sought after, Gerrard and Greenway, had got beyond the grip of justice, they having succeeded, by the help of numerous friends, to reach the coast and embark in a Spanish vessel; but that the third, Garnet, was believed to be still secreted in Worcester-shire, in all probability within the mansion of Sir Thomas Abington, at Hendlip, constructed expressly as a hiding-place for priests. No time was lost in following up the clue, and on the 20th of January, Sir Henry Bromley, a magistrate of Worcester, proceeded, in consequence of special directions from Salisbury, to search the house indicated, and, if possible, seize the head of the English Jesuits.

Sir Henry Bromley carefully obeyed his orders, and taking possession of Hendlip Hall in the middle of the night, minutely searched it from top to bottom. However he found nothing suspicious but a quantity of books, described in his report as "a number of popish trash;" and even a repetition of the search, still more circumspect, brought not the least matter of importance to light. The magistrate would have returned home now, but for the special instructions received from Salisbury, which directed him to keep possession of the mansion for a fortnight, and place two men as guards in every room. This was done accordingly, yet led to no result on the first day, nor on the second, nor the third; but on the fourth day of the watch the wainscoting of one of the rooms suddenly slipped away as by enchantment, and from out the wall there stepped two thin figures, haggard, emaciated, and looking more like ghosts than men. The guards ran away, shrieking, which brought out Sir Henry, who caught the figures, interrogated them, and learnt after much trouble that they were servants of two priests, namely, of Henry Garnet, chief of the Jesuits, and of his chaplain, Father Oldcorn, also called Father Hall. They declared piteously that they had been compelled to leave their hiding-place because of having had nothing to eat or drink for five days except a single apple between them; but when pressed to tell the abode of their masters, they became silent, strictly refusing to reveal anything, even under threat of instant death. Determined to do his duty, Sir Henry Bromley despatched his two prisoners to London, and sat down again to watch, till at the end of a week his patience was rewarded by the coming of another apparition. On the 30th of January, the wall in the great dining room of Hendlip Hall was seen to open, and two more human forms, cadaverous of aspect, stepped forth from it towards the guards. The latter seized them at once, and found that they were the priests watched for. Garnet stated that they had not been in want of food, having received regular supplies of broth through a quill in the wall, and that the cause of their appearance was due to the want of air and room in the narrow space where they had been hidden. "We were well wearied," Garnet confessed, "for we had to sit continually, save that sometimes we could half stretch ourselves, the place being not high enough; and we had our legs so straitened that we could not, while sitting, find place for them, so that we both were in continual pain, and both our legs, especially mine, were much swollen." By express orders of Salisbury, the two priests were well treated, though rigorously guarded, and taken in easy stages to the capital. A dense multitude filled all the streets through which they passed on their way to the Tower, and, pointing to Garnet, more than one of the mob broke out shouting, "There goes a young pope."

When the two priests arrived in London, the curtain had closed already over the career of the chief actors in the gunpowder plot. On the 27th of January, Guy Fawkes was brought up before a special jury at Westminster Hall; with him Winter and Rokewood, survivors of the Holbeach struggle, Sir Everard Digby, who had been caught in the flight from it, together with Robert Kay, and Thomas Bates, Catesby's servant, who had been previously captured, were put on their trial. Sir Francis Tresham, the suspected writer of the anonymous letter to Lord Monteagle which upset the conspiracy, had likewise been put in prison, less perhaps with the view of punishment than that of obtaining information; but although treated with the greatest regard, and even allowed the company of his wife and family, he fell ill soon after his arrest, and died of a mysterious disease, not without suspicion of poison. The trial of the remaining conspirators occupied very little time, and was marked by no other incidents but the ravings of the attorney-general and public prosecutor, Sir Edward Coke. After heaping curses and maledictions upon the prisoners at the bar, the great lawyer became witty, remarking that "gunpowder was the invention of a friar, one of that Romish rabble," and that it was a curious thing for the conspirators that "as by mining they did descend, by hanging they would ascend." Contrasted with this vulgarity, the behaviour of the prisoners was dignified and even noble. Guy Fawkes looked down upon judge and jury grand and gloomy, without opening his lips; the others had little to say, and said less; and Sir Everard Digby alone, after pleading guilty "fell into a speech." He stated that "the first motive that drew him into the action was not ambition or discontent of his estate, neither malice to any in parliament, but the friendship he bore to Catesby, which prevailed so much and was so powerful with him that for his sake he was ever contented and ready to hazard himself and his estate. The next motive was the cause of religion, which, seeing it lay at the stake, he entered into resolution to neglect in that behalf his estate, his life, his name, his memory, his posterity, and all worldly and earthly felicity whatsoever, his sole hope being to restore the Catholic religion in England." The immense crowd in Westminster Hall listened to the speech in deep silence; then the jury retired, and quickly brought in a verdict of guilty against all the accused, upon which they were condemned to die the death of traitors, to be drawn and quartered. Sir Everard Digby, Winter, and Bates were executed in St. Paul's churchyard on the 31st of January; and Guy Fawkes, Rokewood, and Kay suffered death at Westminster the following day, not any of them being favoured with the slightest mitigation of the terrible sentence pronounced by the judge. All underwent the tortures inflicted upon them before being killed with heroic fortitude, stanch in the persuasion of suffering as martyrs in the cause of God. The multitude looked on in sullen silence; but there were a few Roman Catholics bold enough to greet their friends on the way to the scaffold. When dragged to Westminster, each upon his separate hurdle, Guy Fawkes and his two companions were arrested by loud shouts before a house in the Strand. It was the dwelling of Rokewood's young wife; she stood on the balcony, dressed in her bridal costume, and he looking up, begged her to pray for him. "I will! I will!" she cried, without a sound of trembling in her voice: "and do you offer yourself with a good heart to God and your Creator. I yield you to Him with as full an assurance that you will be accepted of Him as when He gave you to me."

On the 3rd of March, a month and two days after the execution of Guy Fawkes, the trial of Garnet, the priestly leader of the conspiracy, "Superior to the Jesuits in England," as he was termed in the indictment, took place at Guildhall before a special commission. The government, Salisbury especially, attached immense importance to his prosecution, justly deeming priestly influence the centre and source of Roman Catholic disaffection, and holding to the belief that if it could be sufficiently weakened in the eyes of the still numerous adherents of the old faith, there would be an end of further plots and revolutions. A thousand proofs, direct and indirect, had come to testify that the Catholics as a body felt detestation of the gunpowder plot; and it was thought, therefore, that if Garnet could be distinctly connected therewith, a great end might be gained, and a long advance made towards loosening the invisible ties connecting England with Rome. But the attempt was by no means easy, the chief of the English Jesuits showing himself more than a match for the skill of Salisbury and the whole privy council of James, with brains as clear and lips as firmly compressed as those of any lawyer in the kingdom, the great bullying Sir Edward Coke not excepted. From the commencement, Garnet adopted a plain and simple line of defence; it was that he had been aware of the movements of the conspirators, but had heard of them only under the seal of confession, and that it was his duty as a priest to hold the secrets of the confessional sacred, at any risk and any hazard. This was no defence before a Protestant judge and jury, but it was all valuable before the tribunal of Roman Catholic opinion; and Salisbury was too well aware of it not to attempt to drive the Jesuit chief from his vantage ground by all the means in his power. But he soon found that threats and persuasions alike were utterly thrown away upon the cool, clear-headed, indomitable priest, under the gaze of whose keen grey eyes even the Tower inquisitors kept shrinking, and who weighed his words as carefully as misers would weigh their gold. It was in vain that Salisbury in personal examination threatened him with all the degrees of torture: Garnet perfectly knew that he dared not execute the threat for fear of the public, and for fear still more of his master; and knowing it, his thin lips only got a shade more compressed, and his searching eyes scrutinized a moment longer the restless face of his little opponent. The king, indeed, had given strict orders that Garnet should not undergo on any account the pains of torture, the motive of the injunction being not tenderness by any means, but the dread of bringing down vengeance upon his own head. But while refusing his consent to the placing of a venerable priest upon the rack, James interposed no obstacle to have the priest's servant tortured; and the latter, accordingly, an old man named Owen, the same who had been seized at Hendlip, was fastened to the hideous engines of torment in the Tower dungeons, to see whether he would betray his master. He was racked twice, the second time more severely than the first, but not a word could be got from him to inculpate Garnet, whom he even professed not to know by sight. Threatened with punishments more frightful than he had yet endured, and trembling lest the courage of his mind might give way under bodily despair, the old man then formed a heroic resolution. Possessing himself of a blunt piece of iron, he slowly ripped up his veins, and when the gaolers came the next morning to fetch him again to the rack, they found nothing but a corpse.

All other means to obtain proofs of Garnet's guilt having failed, Salisbury had recourse at last to an artifice more becoming a Spanish inquisitor than an English prime minister. He placed the prisoner and Father Oldcorn, his companion at Hendlip, in two adjoining cells, communicating with each other

by a door, and above it, in a secret place from which everything could be heard and seen, he set two spies to watch them, and to note down any words they might exchange with each other. The success even of this scheme was but moderate, although two men of education, able to understand French and Latin, as well as English, Edward Forset, a learned magistrate, and David Locherson, private secretary of Salisbury, felt not ashamed to take the part of eavesdroppers. They reported to a number of short conversations which Garnet and Oldcorn had held, but the whole scope and purport of which was as to the ways they might use to refute the accusations made against them. Garnet, with his usual caution, did not utter a word that might tend to establish his guilt, but seemed firm in the belief that nothing could be proved against him, or, as he expressed himself to his companion in misfortune, that he would be able "to wind himself out of the matter." However, when brought again before the examiners appointed by Salisbury, he appeared somewhat startled to hear that his conversations with Oldcorn had been taken down, and getting slightly confused, involved himself in various contradictions, denying first, and subsequently admitting, that he had been for some length of time in communication with the principal conspirators. But he did not waver for a moment respecting the great point in his defence, that he had obtained every particular, even the slightest, of his knowledge of the plot under the seal of confession, and that, his duty to God being higher than his obligations to men, he could not, nor ever would, betray the sacred trust. Salisbury felt that he was completely baffled; but there was no choice left for him but to go on with the prosecution, and to convict the dangerous prisoner, with or without proofs. There was no necessity to pack a jury for the purpose of obtaining a verdict, the hatred of the middle classes, particularly in London, against the Jesuits being more than sufficient to that end; and Garnet was put on his trial, therefore, without any kind of evidence that could have led to his condemnation in an open court of justice acting under strictly legal forms. His moral guilt was undoubted, he himself admitting his knowledge of the conspiracy, and yet on this very point the courage of the government failed. The Protestantism of England as yet was not deep-rooted enough to make its rulers dare to attack openly the ancient mystery of the confessional, and to put a priest upon his trial for hiding a great crime under the sacred mantle of religion.

At his trial, which excited immense interest among all classes of the population, the great hall of Westminster being crowded with members of parliament and state dignitaries, and the king himself attending behind a well-screened box, Garnet carried himself so gravely and temperately as to gain the admiration of the whole audience, composed as it was mainly of his bitter enemies. Nevertheless the attorney-general, figuring again as public prosecutor, attacked him with his usual venom, substituting abuses for arguments, and curses for proofs, to such an extent that even James declared his regret of the Jesuit not having fair play allowed him. Salisbury made a point of claiming from the accused a public acknowledgment that he had been fairly treated, and not undergone "racking or any such bitter torment," which was given, though with slight hesitation, Garnet probably knowing something of the horrible death of his servant. After hearing Garnet's defence, continually interrupted by Coke and the judges on the bench, the jury quickly returned a verdict of guilty, and the lord chief justice pronounced the sentence of hanging, drawing, and quartering. The condemnation, being arrived at without any legal proofs of guilt, seemed so unsatisfactory to many of the public that the execution of Garnet was suspended for six weeks, during which time the greatest efforts were made to extract from him avowals of his connection with the gunpowder conspirators, outside of the confessional, promises and threats alternately being held out for the purpose. But all the attempts were in vain; and when led to the scaffold on the 3rd of May, he maintained with his last breath that he knew nothing of the plot except under the seal of confession. The execution of Garnet was witnessed by a crowd of Roman Catholics of both sexes, who listened on their knees to his last words, affirming afterwards that his innocence had been proved by a miracle, a minute but perfect likeness of his head being exhibited on the straws used to wipe up his blood. Another miracle, according to Catholic writers, took place at the scaffold of Garnet's companion, Father Oldcorn, who was tried, convicted, and suffered the penalty of treason at Worcester. "His head and quarters," an eyewitness reported, "were set up on poles in different parts of the city; but his heart and bowels were cast into the fire, which continued sending forth a lively flame for sixteen days, notwithstanding the rains that fell during the time, which was looked upon as a prodigy, and as a testimony of his innocence." The names of both Garnet and Oldcorn were placed subsequently on the long roll of saintly martyrs acknowledged by the church of Rome.

The effects of the gunpowder plot upon the public mind were fully manifested in the parliamentary session which opened on the 21st of January, 1606. On the first day of meeting a bill was passed ordering the 5th of November to be kept "for ever" as a day of national thanksgiving; and the next vote sanctioned an Act of Attainder against the whole of the conspirators, by which their goods and lands were confiscated to the crown, and the bodies of such as had been slain in fight, or died a natural death, were given over to the hangman. Sir Francis Tresham came under the latter category; and though his brother-in-law, Lord Monteagle, made a great effort to save at least a portion of his property for his wife and children, could not succeed, it transpiring that the king had given a promise of his estate to one of his favourites, Sir Thomas Lake, a day or two after the committal of Tresham to the Tower, thus sacrificing the very man who had averted the great blow from him and the state to vulgar cupidity, before he had even been judged. The launching of the parliamentary attainders occasioned another great scramble for land and valuables among the courtiers, prolonged by the passing of several new statutes, one of them

prescribing a new oath of allegiance, embodying a formal renunciation of papal influence, and another imposing heavy fines, up to total confiscation of property, upon all Roman Catholics coming within the term of recusants, or deniers of the king's spiritual supremacy. The penal laws already in force against them made every recusant possessed of sufficient income liable to a fine of twenty pounds a month; while those who could not pay such large sum forfeited, if the government chose to exact the penalty, two thirds of their lands during their lifetime, or until they conformed. Up to this time the more wealthy among the Roman Catholics had escaped the penalty of confiscation, for having once paid their monthly fine, the law had no further claim against them, although the amount handed over might be of far less value than the two-thirds of the profits of their estates, which would have been taken from them had they been poorer men. By the new statutes—3 Jac. I., cap. 4 and 5—the king was empowered to refuse the fine in all cases, and to seize the land at once; and in order that the poorer class of Catholics might feel the sting of the law, a penalty of ten pounds a month was laid upon all persons keeping servants who absented themselves from church. It was likewise enacted that no recusant should appear at court, nor be allowed to remain within ten miles of London, unless engaged in some recognized trade or employment, nor receive permission to practise at the bar, to act as attorney or physician, and to execute trusts, wills, and guardianships. Severe penalties were decreed at the same time against all who did not attend church regularly, or who married, or suffered their children to be baptized, with any other rites than those of the established religion; and in order to stimulate the activity of churchwardens, it was enacted that they should pay a fine of twenty shillings whenever neglecting to report persons who absented themselves from church, and that on the other hand they should receive a reward of double the amount upon every conviction obtained through their means. The law was strictly enforced for many years, enriching a great number of churchwardens, and breeding a greater number of hypocrites.

Parliament had been engaged for several weeks in legislating against Roman Catholics, when the king came forward to remind the members that the chief object for which they had been called together was to vote supplicas to the crown. Though having lived in a state approaching penury in Scotland, with far less money at his command than most of the upper class of landowners, James had not got from experience the slightest notions of thrift, for immediately after his coming to the English throne he began indulging in the most lavish and wasteful expenditures. A constant golden stream kept flowing into the pockets of his favourites, whom he changed about once a month, every man at and near the court able to flatter his unbounded vanity, to tickle his ear with idle jests, or to minister to his amusement, enjoying in turn the royal beneficence, and taking his share, as large a one in each instance as it was possible to grasp, of the public revenue. Every year, and almost every month, the expenses of the court increased in alarming proportions, the pension list getting longer, the furniture gayer, the attendants more numerous, the jewels more costly, and the robes more gorgeous. At the end of his first year's occupancy of the throne, James had spent about one hundred thousand pounds more than his income amounted to; and at the meeting of parliament in January, 1606, the debt of the crown had reached the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds, and there did not seem the slightest prospect of a decreasing but rather of an increasing expenditure. Under these circumstances, the session had no sooner opened when the king sent a message to the House of Commons desiring the vote of the supplies to take precedence of all other matters, and confessing that the state of his exchequer had fallen to the very lowest conditions. To enforce the royal summons, the lord treasurer, the earl of Dorset, attended a parliamentary committee, accompanied by several members of the privy council, and with them dwelled strongly upon the magnitude of the king's necessities, and the indispensableness to end the same by a strong display of liberality. However, Dorset's eloquence, backed by a long array of statistics exhibiting the income and expenditure of the crown, with figures so placed as to show the royal extravagance in the least unfavourable light, was all but thrown away upon the prosaic members of the lower house, who listened to the lord treasurer's tale of woe with undisguised displeasure. Instead of proceeding at once to the vote of supplies, as demanded by the king, they kept on with the discussion of religious subjects, and the enactment of recusancy laws, until the patience of James was all but exhausted, and he came forward once more, half whining and half threatening, to demand compliance with his former message. A long debate ensued, in which some bitter allusions were made regarding the executive, and comparisons instituted between the present and the past, the whole ending by a proposal to grant the king two subsidies and four fifteenths, calculated to furnish altogether a quarter of a million sterling. This being no more than sufficient to pay about one-third of the debt owing by the crown, James expressed himself very angrily with the niggardliness of the representatives of the people; and further to show his resentment, he hurriedly quitted all affairs of state, leaving Westminster, and going to shoot hares in Berkshire.

The departure of the king caused some stir in the House of Commons, which increased on the receipt of a new message, delivered by the lord treasurer. "It troubleth his majesty," the message ran, "that, by discourse upon the subject of his necessities, strangers abroad are become privy to those arcana imperii which he only wished to lay open to his loving subjects, in which consideration he can use no better means nor more intelligible than he hath done to make you capable of the condition of his estate, nor ever meaneth to go about to obtain anything by importunity, or contestation, which may be thought to concern his own interest, especially if he shall discover that you are unwilling to strain yourselves to keep him and his from failing in the honour and dignity which is due to the eminency of his degree whom God has made your sovereign." The lord treasurer ended by informing the commons, "that if the noise of more doubts, debates, and contradictions should continue but a few days longer, not only the value of that which is desired would be lessened by the form of giving, but much of the estimation would be impaired of those subsidies whereof by the honest gratuities you have already put his majesty in possession." The appeal had some effect in stimulating the loyalty of the commons, and after a short debate a committee was appointed to draw up the bill of supply. It was to the effect of offering a grant, already proposed, of two subsidies and four fifteenths, but on the bill coming up to be voted, an amendment was made on the part of the government to increase the supply by an additional subsidy with its accompanying fifteenths, so as to make the provision somewhat more adequate to the wants of his majesty. A sharp debate followed, and the amendment, being handled very roughly, seemed in great danger of being lost, when all on a sudden a terrible piece of news came flying into the house. Every cheek blanched on the whisper going round, first with subdued breath, but getting force in passing from ear to ear, that the king had been assassinated at his hunting-box at Oaking, in Berkshire. The report had come into the houses of parliament from the city, but apparently from various directions, for the particulars differed, some stating that his majesty had succumbed under a poisoned dagger, directed by the hand of a Jesuit, others that a Spanish knight in armour had hewn him down while riding after the hare, and others again that an old Scotch woman had smothered him in bed with a feather pillow. But though varying in details, all the reports agreed that his majesty had been truly and unmistakably killed; there was weeping and lamentation all over the city, women tore their hair, and men their beards; and the commons themselves were so affected that they instantly and without further discussion voted the additional supply of one subsidy and a fifteenth to the dead king. The vote was given about the hour of noon on the 24th of May; and lo, at three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, King James came riding into Whitehall, not assassinated by a Jesuit, nor beheaded by a Spaniard, nor even smothered by a Scotch widow, but in perfect health and the highest good-humour. The cries of the loyal citizens, male and female, that greeted his majesty on his passing through the streets were deafening; but within the House of Commons unusual quietness appeared to prevail. Some of the members marvelled how the strange rumours could have originated, and others, in silent cogitation with themselves, thought they had been somewhat rash in voting the supplies.

A few days after the commons had granted him the money he so much wanted, on the 27th of May, the king prorogued parliament for six months, and then launched out into a career of extravagance wilder than any he had yet attempted. He began by turning half a dozen of his latest favourites into earls, viscounts, and barons, giving to each large estates to support the title; after which, as if afraid of not being able to melt down the parliamentary subsidies soon enough, he invited the brother of the queen,

Christian IV. of Denmark, to pay him a visit. Christian, a young man of twenty-nine, addicted to dissipation in general and hard drinking in particular, had been desirous to enjoy the hospitality of his brother-in-law ever since the English inheritance had fallen on him; and the invitation, therefore, had no sooner reached him, when he hurried off to make use of it. He came sailing up the Thames in the middle of July, and from the moment he set foot on shore till the day of his departure, at the end of five weeks, had to go through one unceasing round of shows, pageants, and festivities, James swelling with pride to show his relative the splendid property he had got into. The heads of Guy Fawkes and his companions were still withering in the sun, above the Tower gates and at Westminster, yet the king's mind was already free from every thought of the gunpowder conspiracy, and every moral connected with it. "The court, city, and some parts of the country," a contemporary, Arthur Wilson, wrote sarcastically, "are swelled to such greatness with banquetings, masques, dancings, tiltings, barriers, and other gallantry, as if there were an intention in every particular man this way to have blown up himself." Sir John Harrington, another eyewitness, related some of the doings during the royal visit in a letter to a friend in the country. "I came here a day or two before the Danish king arrived," wrote the lively godson of Queen Elizabeth, now one of the courtiers and new knights of James; "and from the moment he did come until this hour, I have been well nigh overwhelmed with carousal and sports of all kinds. The sports began each day in such manner and such sort as might persuade me of Mahomet's paradise. We had women, and indeed wine too, of such plenty as would have astonished each sober bo-holder. Our feasts were magnificent, and the two royal guests did most lovingly embrace each other at table. I think the Dane hath strangely wrought on our good English nobles, for those whom I never could get to taste good liquor now follow the fashion and wallow in beastly delights. The ladies abandon their sobriety, and are seen to roll about in intoxication. In good sooth, the parliament did kindly to provide his majesty so seasonably with money, for there has been no lack of good living, shows, sights, and banquetings from morn to night."

Very soon after the arrival of the Danish monarch, Salisbury led both him and James to his splendid mansion at St. Theobald's, desirous that the two kings should enjoy themselves to their hearts' desire. Among the entertainments provided by the busy prime minister, who had come to be the all but absolute ruler of England, was a great masque, representing the visit of the queen of Sheba to Solomon. "The lady who did play the queen's part," Sir John Harrington informed his friend, giving a detailed description of the wonderful performance, "did carry most precious gifts to both their majesties, but, forgetting the steps rising to the canopy, overset her caskets into his Danish majesty's lap, though I rather think it was in his face. Much was the hurry and confusion; soon cloths and napkins were at hand to make all clean. His majesty then got up and would dance with the queen of Sheba; but he fell down and humbled himself before her, and had to be carried to an inner chamber and laid on a bed of state, which was not a little defiled with the presents of the queen that had been bestowed upon his garments, such as wine, cream, beverage, cakes, spices, and other good matters. Meanwhile the entertainment and show went forward, but most of the presenters went backward, or fell down, wine occupying very heavily their upper chambers. First there did appear, in rich dresses, Faith, Hope, and Charity. Hope essayed to speak, but wine rendered her endeavours so feeble that she withdrew, hoping the kings would excuse her brevity. Faith then came up from behind, yet was not joined with good works, and quitted the court in a staggering condition. Charity next came to our king's feet, and seemed to cover the multitude of sins her sisters had committed; by some effort she made obeisance and brought presents, but said she would return home again, as there was no gift which heaven had not already given his majesty. She then returned to Faith and Hope, who were both sick in the lower hall. Next came Victory in bright armour, and by a strange medley of versification did endeavour to make suit to the king. But Victory did not triumph long, for after much lamentable utterance she was led away like a silly captive, and laid to sleep on the outer steps of the antechamber. Now Peace did make entry, and strive to get forward to the king; yet must I grieve to tell how great wrath she did discover unto some of her attendants, and, much contrary to her semblance, most rudely made war with her olive-branch, and laid on the pates of those who did oppose her coming." The outrageousness of the scene did not make the spectator forget its bitter sadness. "I have much marvelled at these strange pageantries," Harrington concluded his letter, "and they do bring to my remembrance what passed of this sort in our great queen's days, when I was sometimes an humble presenter and assistant, but did ne'er see such lack of good order, discretion, and sobriety, as now. I have passed much time in looking at the royal sports of hunting and hawking, where the manners were such as made me devise the beasts were pursuing men."

His loose brother-in-law having set sail again for Denmark, James received another august visitor in Prince Vaudemont, one of his kinsmen of the Guise family; and after a fresh series of revels and drinking-bouts, as degrading to the royal character as surprising to the English people, who could not help contrasting the mean crapulousness of the king with the exalted dignity of his predecessor, the time approached for another session of parliament. James looked forward to the meeting of the two houses of legislature with some eagerness, having set his mind on carrying out at last the scheme dearest to his political ambition, the union of England and Scotland. It had been intended that the matter should form the chief subject of debate during the session which was to have commenced on the memorable 5th of November of the preceding year; but the enactment of the new persecuting laws against Roman Catholics, together with the quarrel about supplies, had occupied too much time to allow the proper opening of a question of such importance, which was postponed therefore till the autumn of 1606. The opening of parliament took place punctually on the day fixed, the 18th of November, and the union of the two kingdoms was, by special command of the king, the first business brought before it. In his speech from the throne, James replied beforehand to some of the objections which he fancied would be brought against his scheme. "Some think," he exclaimed, "that I will draw the Scottish nation hither, and talk idly of transplanting trees out of a barren ground into a better, and of setting lean cattle out of a barren pasture into a fertile soil. But can any man displant you unless you will? Or can any man think that Scotland is so strong as to pull you out of your houses? Or do you not think I know England hath more people, and Scotland more waste ground? So that there is room in Scotland rather to plant your idle people that swarm in London streets and other towns, and disburthen you of them, than to bring more unto you." The puillity of arguments like these, delivered with an air of profound wisdom, was not made to convince men whose great objection to the union was not the measure itself, but the utter aversion and distrust they felt for its originator; and the discussion had no sooner commenced in the House of Commons when it became apparent that James's plan would meet with the most determined resistance on all sides. The first that was done was to read the memorial of the twenty-eight commissioners from the lords and commons, appointed in the session of 1604 to report upon the union, which was very elaborate, though somewhat vague in its counsel, exhibiting an evident desire to please both king and parliament. Four points, however, were distinctly recommended as preliminary measures by the commission, namely, freedom of commercial intercourse between the two kingdoms, the abolition of all hostile laws springing from the old border warfare, the mutual extradition of criminals, and facilities for the naturalization of Scotchmen in England and of Englishmen in Scotland. It was on the first of these points that the debate opened, in a spirit of extraordinary violence, little hopeful for the good relationship between the two nations.

Before the discussion about establishing freedom of commercial movement across the border had gone far, there was read in the House of Commons a numerous signed petition of English merchants, declaring strongly against the proposal. The merchants expressed their conviction that they should be absolutely ruined by the competition with which they were threatened, as Scotchmen were certain to be for ever on the move between the two countries, and equally certain to be always in the way when they wanted to drive a bargain, but slip quickly back to their homes when it came to the payment of taxes and subsidies, leaving these burthens upon the shoulders of their rivals. Some of the speakers ridiculed these arguments, but others, composing the majority, approved them; and one of the latter, Nicholas Fuller, a learned oriental scholar, as well as a violent, headstrong politician, showered abuse upon the Scotch, declaring that they were nothing but a tribe of pedlars. For this speech he was taken to task in the upper house by the lord chancellor, who scooled the merchants for their petition, warning the commons at the same time that if they did not yield with a good grace, the king would take the matter in hand, and would carry out the union by his own authority. The threat had some effect in softening the excited temper of the members of the lower house, and banishing the spirit of acrimony in which the subject had been hitherto discussed; and after a lengthened debate it was decided to accept a number of starting points, which might serve for the heads of a future bill defining the relations between England and Scotland. The repeal of all hostile laws, and the mutual extradition of criminals was admitted to be just in principle; and as for the more important point of free commercial intercourse, it was proposed to arrive at a gradual settlement, allowing of the destruction of the barriers opposing trade year by year and step by step. It was recommended, in the first instance, that certain productions of each country should not be allowed to be exported to the other, live animals and their produce figuring at the head of the list of prohibitions. It was said that the English were afraid of a rise in the price of cloth if sheep-farmers were permitted to send their wool to be manufactured in Scotland, and that the Scotch people were equally alarmed at the prospect of high prices for meat if their cattle could be driven across the Tweed to a more profitable market than Edinburgh or Perth could offer. The commons allowed, though provisionally only in theory, voting being carefully abstained from, that, with those and two or three other exceptions, the two countries might make a trial of free trade. One member observed in the course of the discussion that free intercourse would indisputably be beneficial to the merchants of both kingdoms, the Scotch gaining wealth, and the English wit—if clever enough to sell anything to their neighbours north of the Tweed.

The good-humour of parliament was interrupted when the session had lasted nearly a month by a subtle question, full of legal, political, and constitutional niceties, which James felt delighted in starting. It was whether the children born in Scotland after the accession of the king, and the union of the two crowns, were to be regarded, like those who had seen the light before the great event, as aliens, or whether they were to stand on the same footing with Englishmen, as native follow-subjects under one ruler. To James the matter was not for a moment doubtful, all his notions of government centering in the one of divine right of kingship, with subjects dependent on the sovereign as earthly things on the sun's rays; this, however, was not the view taken by the House of Commons, some of the leading members of which ventured to suggest that, as the union of the two crowns had not yet come to mean the union of the two countries, the children of the north born after his majesty's accession were in precisely the same position as those who had come into the world before. The difference of opinion gave rise to a terrible contest of words in both houses of parliament, echoed all over the two kingdoms, every man taking his stand with either the "Post-nati" or the "Ante-nati." To settle the matter, James ordered the law officers of the crown to draw up a statement expounding the constitution of the realm to the uninitiated, and to lay it on the table of the House of Commons. This was done, and the verdict of the law authorities, including the great Sir Edward Coke, resulted in the declaration that by the common law of England the "Post-nati," or children born in Scotland after the king's accession, were as little to be regarded as aliens as if they had been born in Exeter or York, and that only the "Ante-nati," or individuals born before the accession, were divided politically from their English fellow-subjects, and if wishing to acquire the same rights in the southern kingdom had to take out letters of naturalization. The legal opinion was anything but satisfactory to the members of the House of Commons, who kept looking with constantly increasing jealousy upon the crowd of Scotchmen surrounding the king, and engrossing many lucrative offices under the crown, to the exclusion of Englishmen who, if not better fitted to do the work, held themselves better entitled by birthright to gather the fruits of the same. Personal considerations of this nature not being made to lessen the bitterness of the strife, the discussions soon assumed a tumultuous character, leading to the utterance of speeches all but revolutionary in tone. To still the excitement, Salisbury advised a prorogation of parliament, and the session was adjourned accordingly from the middle of December, 1606, to the 10th of February of the following year.

The two months' rest, however, had little effect in calming the passions of the commons. A few days after the reassembling of the house, Sir Christopher Pigott, who had been chosen to represent Buckinghamshire, after the refusal of the government to admit Sir Francis Goodwin, poured forth a torrent of abuse, not only against the project of union, but against the whole nation of Scotland. He said that they were a pack of rebels and traitors, and, worse than that, beggars; that they were ever engaged in killing each other and assassinating their rulers, there not having been a single king who had not been murdered by his subjects; and that therefore it would be as reasonable to unite Scotland and England as it would be to place a prisoner at the bar upon an equal footing with a judge on the bench. The house listened in silence to this extraordinary harangue, as if actually sympathising with the speaker; there was no applause, but there was likewise no expression of displeasure from even a single member. James heard the next day of Sir Christopher Pigott's speech, and getting into a towering rage, summoned at once his prime minister, commanding him to take prompt steps to bring the libeller of Scotland within the reach of the law. However, the strict royal command notwithstanding, Salisbury went to work leisurely, and sending private information of what had happened to the commons, left them to understand that they must follow their own course. The hint was acted upon promptly, and by a vote the next day the house decided that the jurisdiction over its members resided within itself, and that the member for Buckinghamshire, having broken the parliamentary rules by his intemperate address, should be expelled. But immediately after, Nicholas Fuller, who had distinguished himself in the previous session by his vehement opposition to the union project, delivered another ill-natured attack upon Scotland. Comparing England to a rich pasture threatened with an irruption of herds of famished cattle, he proceeded to draw a most desponding picture of the moral and social state of the northern kingdom, describing it as altogether out of the question and unfair to the highest degree to marry such a beggarly country to a rich and flourishing state like England. He then asked, in language which never failed in meeting with a response in the House of Commons, whether the famous "Post-nati" doctrine of the naturalization of the rising generation of Scots, by the mere fact of their being born under the dominion of the king, was really based upon the constitutional law of the realm. Once admitted, he said, the doctrine might prove fatal to English liberty as well as nationality, for instances had happened, and might happen over and over again, of the crown being on the head of a prince holding sway over alien races. If Philip and Mary had left a male heir, that son would have inherited the dominions of both his parents, and would have naturalized millions of Spaniards and Sicilians in England, without any reference to parliament. The arguments made a great impression, which was increased when the speaker went on to describe the results which in his opinion would spring from the impending northern invasion. Already, he affirmed, the population of London was far too numerous; the existing trade did not suffice for the support of the merchants who attempted to live by it; and there was not sufficient preferment for the number of scholars who crowded to the universities. What would become of England if Scotland were turned into it, heaven only could tell. The oration concluded, there was a burst of rapturous applause from all sides of the crowded house, little hopeful for the union of the two kingdoms into one Great Britain.

When Nicholas Fuller had sat down, Sir Francis Bacon arose. Bacon was known to be the only man in the House of Commons, if not the only Englishman, sincerely and warmly favourable to the union, and he now came to vindicate his enthusiasm in the cause he had long advocated in a magnificent speech. He commenced by entreating his hearers to raise their minds above all petty considerations and personal and national prejudices, and to look upon the proposed change from a loftier vantage ground, with the eyes of statesmen. It had been said that England would be inundated with immigrants from the north, and that there would not be sufficient room and provision left for the children of the soil. But to this assertion he entirely demurred; no such incursion was to be expected, for the simple reasons that men, living in families, were not as easily moved as cattle, and that if a man brought with him no means of his own, and had no way of supporting himself in the country to which he came, he would starve. Yet even if this were not the case, he denied that England was fully peopled. The country could support with ease an immensely larger population than it had ever yet known; and fens, commons, and wastes innumerable were crying out for the hand of the cultivator. If this were too little, the sea was open; commerce and trade would give support to thousands; Ireland was waiting for colonists to cultivate its fertile soil, and the solitude of Virginia was crying aloud for inhabitants. To the objection that it was unfair to unite poor Scotland to rich England, Bacon replied by saying that it was well the difference consisted "but in the external goods of fortune." "For, indeed," he continued, "it must be confessed that for the goods of the mind and the body they are like ourselves; to do them right, it is known that in their capacities and understandings they are a people ingenious; in labour, industrious; in courage, valiant; in body, hard, active, and comely." The advantages of a union with such a race, he argued, were not to be measured by the amount of money they might have in their pockets. With respect to the legal part of the question, he expressed himself satisfied that the "Post-nati" were already naturalized; but he thought it advisable that this should be formally declared by statute. Bacon concluded by pointing out the dangers to the people of England which might ensue if the proposals for union were rejected; quarrels might break out, and estrangement, and even entire separation, might follow. On the other hand, if the members of the House of Commons would put all prejudices aside, viewing the question from the highest point of view, the permanent interest of the nation, they would make the united kingdom of England and Scotland to be the greatest monarchy the world had ever seen. The eloquence of the marvellous speaker to whom the house had listened, drew forth warm applause; but it was plain, nevertheless, to all observers, that Nicholas Fuller had expressed its feelings far more accurately than Sir Francis Bacon. Towering high above his age, a mighty intellectual giant, Bacon unconsciously went too far in desiring his parliamentary colleagues, servile worshippers of despotism but a few years before, to raise themselves at once to the height of statesmen and philosophers.

The impression made by Bacon's speech did not last long, it waning the sooner as it was generally perceived that in one important point it furnished no reply to the objections of Nicholas Fuller. If, according to the "Post-nati" doctrine brought forward so prominently by James, England and Scotland were called upon to unite chiefly because all persons born after the king's accession were within the king's allegiance, it seemed clear that England and Spain might be called upon to join one day under similar circumstances. Bacon, Coke, and the judges might repeat as often as they liked that the naturalization of the "Post-nati" was in perfect accordance with the law, yet public opinion, which found its expression in the lower house of parliament, refused to assent to it, deeming that if it was so, it ought not to be so. Nevertheless, after discussions extending over several months, the commons began to exhibit a very conciliating spirit, and seemed ready to take some steps towards the union, particularly in the all important point of commercial intercourse, when the conceit of the king once more upset all proceedings. Deeming his eloquence irresistible, he rushed into parliament, and personally addressed the members. "I am your king!" he cried, in the tone of a schoolmaster addressing naughty children; "I am placed to govern you, and shall answer for your errors; I am a man of flesh and blood, and have my passions and affections like other men: I pray you, do not too far move me to do that which my power may tempt me unto." The tirade, absurd enough to set the commons laughing, was followed by no other action than an action at law. Obstinately bent upon asserting his "Post-nati" theory, James determined to avail himself of the known opinions of the judges to obtain a formal decision that Scotch children born after his accession were possessed of all the rights of native Englishmen, including that of holding land. A piece of ground was accordingly bought in the name of one Richard Calvin, an infant born at Edinburgh in 1605, and an action was brought in his name against two persons who were supposed to have deprived him of his land, with a correlative suit against two other persons for detaining papers relating to the ownership of the property. The case came first before the court of Chancery, and was from thence adjourned into the Exchequer chamber, before the lord chancellor and the twelve judges. Two only of the judges argued that the child was an alien; but the other ten, together with the chancellor, laid down the law as previously expounded in the declaration to parliament, holding that Richard Calvin was a natural subject of the king of England. Though no other decision had been expected from the beginning, the king bore himself as having obtained a great triumph, his vanity and narrowmindedness preventing him from seeing that in the realm which he was ruling public opinion was overtopping legal opinions. Some time before the eleven judges had declared Richard Calvin of Edinburgh to be an Englishman, he had prorogued parliament in a very bitter mood. The prorogation took place nominally from the 4th of July, 1607, till the 10th of November of the same year; but the king had no intention to see the representatives of the nation so soon again, and they did not meet till the end of three years. It was the first attempt of James to govern without a parliament.

Hitherto the foreign policy of England had not engaged much of the king's attention; but events now forced him at last to declare whether he meant to follow in the footsteps of Elizabeth, and uphold Protestantism on the Continent, or whether he would take the opposite course, either maintaining absolute neutrality, or allying himself with Spain. Indolent by nature, and valuing the renown of deciding a knotty point in theology, or astrology, far more than the glory of arms, James would have preferred strict neutrality above all, if his mind had been but strong enough to arrive at a decision by himself; as it was, he merely kept it as an ideal aim before him, allowing his favourites to pull him in any direction most convenient to their tastes or interests. Thus he had come to conclude, in the first year of his reign, a treaty with France and the Netherlands, and in the second with Spain; and it seemed highly probable that he would in turn enter into alliances with all the sovereigns of the known world, as long as they chose to send envoys for the purpose, well loaded with gifts, and with purses capacious enough to satisfy the cupidity of the thick swarm of courtiers, male and female, which crowd around the throne.

But harmless and profitable as seemed the amusement of making treaties with foreign governments not intended to be kept, the pastime yet was fraught with danger; and circumstances occurred soon which seemed to make it probable that the colourless foreign policy set up by James would end by involving England in war with all the great powers of Europe at one and the same time. By the terms of his first treaty, the king had granted to the French and the Protestants of Holland the right of levying soldiers in his dominions, and by his second treaty he had granted the same right to the Spaniards, so that the oppressed together with their oppressors had a chance of meeting each other in England, and transferring thither, on a more or less limited scale, their battlefield. This threatened to occur as early as the summer of 1605, a year after James had entered into an alliance with Philip III. On the 14th of May, 1605, a Spanish fleet, carrying twelve thousand men, left Lisbon for the Netherlands, under the command of the Grand Admiral Don Luis Fajardo, who received the orders of Philip III. that, if unable to land his troops in Flanders, all the ports of which were closely blockaded by the Dutch, he was to set them on shore in England, where, under the benignant sceptre of King James, they would find protection till means could be obtained to send them across the channel in small boats, preferably English, which might slip over from time to time. The Spanish commander fully confided in the generous impulses of James, showing his trust in them before leaving Lisbon by forcibly seizing two English vessels that were lying in the roadstead, and employing them to make up the required number of transports. There were many more French ships to pick from; but Don Luis Fajardo did not give them a look, evidently without confidence in heretic King Henry IV.

The new Armada sighted England towards the end of May, and closely hugging the shore, arrived off Dover on the 2nd of June. Here, at the narrowest part of the straits, the passage was barred by a small Dutch squadron, under Admiral Haultain, who boldly attacked the Spanish fleet, though quadruple the strength of his own. But the Spaniards did not want to fight, and the two foremost men-of-war at once sought a refuge in Dover Harbour, while the Grand Admiral with the main body of his forces retreated towards Dungeness. The next day, Don Luis Fajardo cautiously advanced again up the channel, his fleet in battle order, but he himself hidden on board the largest of the English merchantmen which he had seized at Lisbon, their flag appearing to him much safer than his own. On the Armada coming up, the Dutch immediately attacked the enemy, and once more, without attempting fight, the Spaniards fled in all directions, a number of them running into Dover, foremost among the runners the Grand Admiral. In the heat of the pursuit, the bold Flemings advanced a little too far, until they were reminded by the guns of Dover Castle that they had trespassed upon English ground. The firing of one gun might have been sufficient, but the officer in command of the castle, deeply imbued with Spanish sympathies, and presumed to be in Spanish pay, used all he had, aiming so well as to kill more than a hundred men on board the Dutch fleet. Very naturally, the slaughter gave rise to the greatest indignation throughout the Netherlands, leading very nearly to an opening of hostilities against England, in which France seemed ready to join, Henry IV. bursting with indignation at the conduct of the "captain of arts and clerk of arms." On the other hand, the king of Spain felt equally angry on learning that his troops had arrived in England, but could not get out again. Quivering under the open threats of the French and Dutch ambassadors, James had summoned up boldness to give a direct refusal to the demand of the Spanish envoy, a marvellous piece of effrontery, that the soldiers who had landed at Dover and other places on the coast should be conveyed to Flanders in English vessels and under the protection of English men-of-war; and the Spaniards not daring to go to sea again on their own account, King Philip had the ill satisfaction of seeing his soldiers locked up in England as in a mousetrap. Though the importunities of the Spanish envoy, coupled, as always, with rich distribution of bribes to favourites, James after a short while allowed himself to be prevailed upon to request the states of Holland to give permission to their armed enemies to pass the channel unmolested. The demand was too utterly absurd to meet with other than a blank rejection, whereupon the king informed the Spaniards that they might remain in England as long as they liked, provided they lived at their own expence. To this the Spanish government, after some negotiation, assented in principle, but forgot to send the money; and many of the wretched men despatched by Philip III. having died of starvation, and others gone as deserters to France and Holland, the rest set sail from Dover in a dark winter night, when the Dutch blockading fleet had been driven from the coast by a storm, and made their way across the channel to Dunkirk and Gravelines. James had escaped war, but his peace policy nevertheless had received a rude shock.

The pusillanimity and indecision of the king proved an advantage in the end, if not to England, at least to the Netherlands. Philip III. had reckoned upon the assistance of the English government to put a stop to the success of the rebellious Flemings; he knew that the queen was entirely devoted to his interests; he had won over by gold the principal favourites of the king, and was paying a large pension to Salisbury, chief helmsman of the vessel of state; and he was not without hopes that jealousy of the growing maritime power of the Netherlands would prompt the trading classes to throw their influence in the balance to quench national sympathy for the struggling Protestants of the Low Countries. Seeing all these expectations vanish, and all the elements in his favour broken and kept in check by the drowsy timidity of the king, Philip came to the resolution to make peace with his rebel subjects, even at the price of acknowledging their independence. He had scarcely any other choice left, the power of the Dutch by sea having increased within recent years to such a degree as seriously to threaten the communication of Spain with the Indies, suggesting fears that in a time not distant the vast empire of the west might be entirely cut off from the mother country, and a death-blow be inflicted upon the monarchy. Swayed by all these considerations, the Spanish king bent his pride so far as to beseech the Flemish heretics to enter into negotiations with his representative, Archduke Albert, the first fruit of which was a six months' truce, concluded in April, 1607. To show their contempt for James, neither the Dutch nor the Spaniards asked him to take part in the negotiations, a proceeding which he was mean enough to resent by attempting secretly to upset the arrangements already come to, and thereby to destroy all chances of peace. This dishonourable course was mainly due to the advice of Salisbury, who, besides his innate love of intrigue, was driven to it by the fear of losing the annual bribe of six thousand crowns paid to him by Philip III., in case the latter should come to terms with his contumacious subjects. He therefore instructed the English representatives at the government of the states general, Sir Ralph Winwood and Sir Richard Sponser, to use all their efforts to induce the leading statesmen to drop the negotiations, on the plea mainly that it would be for the interest of the republic to continue the war, Spain having not yet been sufficiently humiliated to leave hopes that the offered peace would be permanent. The invidious counsel took no effect upon the rulers of the republic, chief among them John van Olden Barneveldt, a statesman of remarkably clear vision, and ardent advocate of peace; and Salisbury's diplomatic exertions, so far from retarding the agreement with Spain, only accelerated it, the secret motives impelling them not being unknown to the politicians of the commonwealth. To disarm the vanity of James, the Dutch invited him, after some delay, to join in the conferences opened at the Hague, where France was playing the lofty part of mediator, Henry IV. having despatched for the purpose his great minister, Pierre Joannin, the colleague and rival of Rosny. At the side of Joannin, the English plenipotentiaries came to make a poor figure, their instructions compelling them not so much to help in the conclusion of peace, than to extract money from the exhausted states general, James insisting that the loans they owed to England should be repaid before he would guarantee their future independence. After long and wearisome negotiations, the Dutch government subscribed to these conditions, acknowledging a debt of 818,408*l.*, which they promised to repay in half-yearly instalments of 30,000*l.*, reduced subsequently to 20,000*l.* Finally, on the 30th of March, 1609, the treaty of peace was signed between Spain and Holland, Philip III. giving a general recognition of the independence of the republic, and Henry IV. guaranteeing it, as a sort of arbiter of European politics. To France the treaty gave a large amount of honour and glory, and to England a small amount of money.

The money extracted from the Dutch, small as it was in amount, was most welcome to Salisbury, who was nigh being driven to despair by the extravagant expenditure of James, and the impossibility of meeting it by the resources at his command. Absolutely like a child, the king kept giving away, day by day, and week by week, large presents and prospective endowments to his courtiers, foolishly careless as to whether he had a right to give, or even whether the things he promised were his own. Very frequently, James's exchequer was so completely drained that for many months at a time there was nothing left to pay the wages of the attendants and to buy a stock of daily provisions; and on one occasion the lord treasurer, the earl of Dorset, was stopped in the streets by the servants of the household, clamouring to get their allowances, and by enraged purveyors of the royal table, who swore that unless they got their debts paid they would let his sacred majesty starve. The unfortunate treasurer, breaking down under his heavy duties, died in the spring of 1608, and was succeeded by Salisbury, who, jealous lest the important post should be filled by a rival, preferred to take the duties upon himself, together with the chief secretaryship. His first step was to make a great and almost desperate effort to raise the miserable condition of the exchequer by imposing, without regard of parliamentary prescriptions, a number of new duties, chiefly on imports, and raising several loans; and this not sufficing, he set out on the still more difficult task of attempting retrenchments of the royal expenditure. The king was ready to promise anything, and almost touched to tears when his minister told him of the impoverished state of his finances; but the feeling did not last long, and a few days had scarcely elapsed before he squandered treasure more lavishly than ever, regardless of solemn engagements and declarations, and still more regardless of the misery inflicted upon others by his monstrous wastefulness. To raise money, Salisbury established, and bartered away to the highest bidder, monopolies more oppressive than any abolished in the reign of Elizabeth; laid customs-duties on articles of prime necessity; invented imposts upon trades and handicrafts, chiefly falling upon the poor; and even sold to the Dutch the right of fishery on the coasts of England and Scotland. Besides these exactions, and ruinous efforts to cover a prodigality all but criminal, every other means was employed to bring money into the exchequer. The discharge of debts due to the crown was enforced with cruel strictness; public lands were sold for half, or less than half, their value; and all officials were ordered to be more vigilant than ever in demanding the full acquittal of payments to which the king could lay claim. Yet all exertions were fruitless to cover the yawning gulf of royal indebtedness; and after a nine months' struggle, Salisbury found that he could get no further, and that nothing remained but to call in the aid of parliament to extract James from his financial difficulties. They had long ceased to be a secret to anybody, and threatened to become a national disgrace, the bankrupt state of the king's exchequer, and wretched consequences resulting therefrom having become a theme of conversation at all the courts of Europe. At Brussels, James was publicly caricatured as half naked, dressed mainly in a hose doublet, with empty pockets hanging out, and an empty purse in his hand.

The parliament which was to fill his majesty's exchequer, and provide a sufficient number of purses for his favourites, met on the 9th of February, 1610. Salisbury, who opened the session in the name of the king, lost no time in bringing forward his financial statement, winding up with a demand for the grant of new and extraordinary supplies. Cleverly marshalling his figures, the lord treasurer was able to prove that there had not been the least prodigality in the king's expenditure, and that, if he had spent twice as much as his predecessor, and got deeply into debt besides, it was owing solely to his intense desire to rule the country well, to make his subjects happy, and to reward true merit whenever it came within his notice. He thought, the treasurer hinted, that by this time all, or nearly all, who required rewarding had got their dues, and that universal happiness was not far off, and he therefore implored the honourable members of the House of Commons "not to allow the ship of state to be wrecked at the entrance of the port." After the flowers of rhetoric came the thorns of arithmetic. Salisbury demonstrated, by a compound process of division, addition, multiplication, and subtraction, to which the members of the lower house listened with the deepest attention without being able to comprehend it in the least, that though the exchequer was bankrupt it was very near getting in an exceedingly flourishing and satisfactory state, nothing more to the effect being required than the grant of his own modest demands. These were, that the house should vote for the use of his majesty an immediate gift of six hundred thousand pounds, half of which was to be employed to pay off a portion of the debt, and the other half to meet extraordinary expenses; and that, besides this gift, solemnly guaranteed not to form a precedent for future demands of the same kind, there should be a permanent grant to the crown of two hundred thousand pounds a year, in addition to the usual subsidies, which would give the king an annual income of six hundred thousand pounds, calculated to be nearly fifty thousand pounds in excess of the expenditure. The expenditure thus fixed, Salisbury allowed, was contingent on certain retrenchments which he had recommended, and to which his majesty had given his gracious consent, so that, any doubt in the fulfilment of the royal word being impossible, the state of the exchequer must be admitted to be settled for ever on the securest and soundest financial basis. The lord treasurer wound up his statement by declaring, in the name of his majesty, that if the house would freely consent to assist the king in his need, he would, on his part, be ready to redress all just grievances. The royal promise was brought under discussion at once, and the commons decided by a quick resolution that they would be deeply grateful to have the grievances redressed first, and to be allowed to decide afterwards upon the supplies.

It was evident from the attitude assumed by the members of the lower house that they knew themselves masters of the position, and James therefore submitted, with ill-concealed resentment, to pay for the relief of his difficulties by satisfying the chief demands of the representatives of the nation. The discussion of grievances commenced immediately, and soon assumed the proportions of a great constitutional battle. Among the first questions coming under the notice of the commons was that of the right of the crown to lay impositions, either in the shape of personal taxes or of customs-duties, upon the people without the consent of parliament; and starting from matters that had arisen out of the endeavours of Salisbury to raise money, the debate soon assumed the portentous forms of an inquiry into the general functions of the executive. The starting point was, whether the recent order laying new duties upon various imports was legal, the discussion of which was taken up by the ablest speakers in the house. Sir Francis Bacon, who had the year before been appointed solicitor-general, and was striving hard to obtain court favour for a rise to still higher dignities, stoutly advocated the royal prerogative to decree commercial imposts without the consent of parliament. "The king," he argued, "had power to restrain goods from entering the ports, and if he might prohibit their entrance, he might also continue the prohibition until a certain sum was paid." The reasoning was adopted by several other of the crown lawyers, among them Henry Yelverton, a friend of Bacon, who astonished the commons by a new and extraordinary unfolding of constitutional doctrine. The law of England, he asserted, with much emphasis, extended only to low watermark all around the shore of the kingdom, and beyond it everything was subject to the law of nations, which ignored both statute and common law. From this he drew the argument that all things upon the sea were under the immediate jurisdiction of the king, as sole representative of international law within the realm, and that he on this ground had an absolute right to restrain any foreign merchandize from approaching the shore, or, if so willed, to put a certain tax upon his permission to enter, in other words, to impose customs-duties. The speech was received with indignation by the commons, and as soon as Yelverton had sat down, John Martin, member for Christchurch, sprang to his feet to refute his legal niceties and special pleadings. All Englishmen, Martin insisted, were by the constitution of the kingdom entitled to be judged by the law of England and no other, and the common law of the realm extended "as far as the power of the king," in the same relation to external government "as the soul to the body." The life and wealth of the merchants and mariners of England, he added, were "upon the seas," and they had "as good right to plough the sea as the farmer had to plough the land," the liberty of the sea being "parcel of the liberty of the subject." Immense applause followed the address of the member for Christchurch, who had touched a chord vibrating in the heart of every Englishman.

James received the report of the proceedings in the House of Commons with violent anger, and, to stifle further discussion, at the beginning of May summoned the members to Whitehall, to hearken to an oration more astounding than any he had yet delivered. The king began by reminding his hearers that they had now been sitting for fourteen weeks, without doing anything towards the chief object for which they had been called together, the relief of his necessities, but wasting their time instead in senseless discourse about matters affecting his high prerogative, which they had no right whatever to touch, and which he dared them to discuss any longer. "Kings," he exclaimed, "are justly called Gods, for that they exercise a manner or resemblance of divine power upon earth; for if you will consider the attributes of God, you shall see how they agree in the person of a king. God hath power to create or destroy, make or unmake, at his pleasure; to give life or send death; to judge all, and to be judged by none, nor accountable to any; to raise low things, and to make high things low, at his pleasure, for to God both soul and body are due. And the like power have kings: they make and unmake their subjects; they have power of raising and casting down, of life and of death; they are judges over all their subjects and in all causes, and yet accountable to none but God only; they have power to exalt low things and abase high things, and turn their subjects like men at chess, a pawn to make a bishop or a knight; they may cry down any of their subjects as they do their money; and to them is due both the affection of the soul and the service of the body." James finished his blasphemous speech, sounding in many respects like the out-pouring of a maniac, by asserting that kings existed before laws, the latter being mere free gifts of the royal will, to be changed, taken back, and suspended at any time; and that subjects had no more right to discuss the decrees of a reigning prince than to contend against the ordinances of the Almighty God. "I conclude then this point," he exclaimed, "touching the power of kings, with this axiom of divinity, that as to dispute what God may do is blasphemy, so it is sedition in subjects to dispute what a king may do in the plenitude of his power." The commons stood like men transfixed, listening to this amazing speech, and wondering whether they were still in England, or had been carried through the air into the dominions of the pope or the king of Spain. But there was evidently no time for arguments, and some of the members of the lower house having noted down the chief points of the royal oration, they quietly went to their homes, and next morning assembled again for the transaction of business. It was decided, without a division, to appoint a committee to consider the best means to be employed "to obtain satisfaction" from the king, and to protect the claims and the interests of the commonwealth. The work of the committee consisted in drawing up a Petition of Right, in which the commons declared, in moderate but firm language, that they could not and would not be prevented from debating on any matter affecting the public interest, and that, without touching the royal prerogative, they must hold to their duty of asserting the prerogative of the nation. Against all expectation, James received the members of the house who laid the document into his hands in the most affable manner, declaring with a serene air that they had misunderstood his speech, delivered with no other object than that of warning them not to impugn his prerogative, which they now affirmed they had no intention of doing, thus leaving him perfectly satisfied. He had no wish, his majesty finally declared, to abridge any of their privileges, and he gave them full liberty to continue their discussions, only hoping that they would not forget his wants. The commons were almost as much surprised at the new speech of James as at the oration in which he had compared himself to Almighty God. They could not quite understand the wonderful and erratic courses of the royal mind, yet they were more than ever impressed with the fact of possessing a very extraordinary king.

The strange behaviour of James on this occasion, fatal alike to his dignity as a sovereign and his honesty as a man, was occasioned only in part by the boundless puerility and deceitfulness of his temper, often hovering on the border of mental aberration, but due still more to the deep impression made upon him by the report of a frightful event that had taken place in France, the assassination of Henry IV. In the twenty years that had elapsed since the great and sagacious king had raised himself to the throne by the aid of Huguenot swords, he had succeeded in gaining the love and admiration of all his subjects, had restored peace to France, brought order into the public finances, encouraged learning, art, and science, raised industry and commerce, spread prosperity all over the land, and established a lofty system of freedom of conscience and religious toleration not known to any other country of the civilized world. Having now arrived at the mature age of fifty-five, he resolved to spend the evening of his life in an undertaking greater than any ever attempted by king or emperor. It was the formation of a federate republic of all the states of Europe, presided over by a senate of wise and disinterested judges, who should settle all disputes among sovereigns and nations, so as to render further contests of arms unnecessary, if not impossible, and make, for the first time since the coming of the gospel upon earth, its divine precepts a reality. But to arrive at this grand and holy peace, war had to be the beginning, the angels, as quaintly expressed by the Huguenot preachers, not having room for their work till the devils had been chased. The great spirit of evil, with them and with Henry, was the ruling family of Spain and Austria, puissant upholder of popedom, chief protector of Jesuitism, and source and centre of all superstition, bigotry, and mental darkness afflicting Europe. To strike a mighty blow against the great Catholic power, Henry IV., in the spring of 1610, assembled two armies in the south and the west of France, intending with the first to seize the Italian provinces of Spain, and with the second to fall upon Austria, in concert with the Protestant princes of Germany and the oppressed and persecuted reformers of Bohemia. The plan, far reaching as it was, had high chances of success, not the least being that of Henry, the acknowledged greatest military commander of the age, possessing fifty thousand trained fighting men and fifty millions of francs, and his double-headed antagonist being nearly destitute of soldiers and completely destitute of money. At the beginning of May, 1610, the king prepared to place himself at the head of the army crossing the Rhine, and before leaving Paris appointed a council of administration, under the nominal presidency of his consort, Marie de Medici. She, a vain, conceited woman, insisted on being crowned before assuming her functions, the rite having never been performed; and the king, though most unwilling to spend an hour of time in useless ceremonies, consented, after much pressing, to the fulfilment of her wishes. The coronation took place at the cathedral of St. Denis on the 13th of May, and the following day was fixed for the solemn entry of the queen into Paris. To meet her, Henry left the royal residence in the Louvre early in the morning, escorted only by a small guard, which became separated from him in the narrowest part of the street of St. Honoré, blocked up temporarily by a number of market carts. The king's carriage was making its way slowly through the crowd, when suddenly a man in the garb of a priest jumped on the step of it, drew a dagger from his bosom, and struck at the king, wounding him in the breast. Henry threw up his arms, crying, "Je suis blessé;" but at the same moment the assassin dealt him a second stroke, which went right to the heart. He fell back on his seat without uttering another sound—Henry the Great, the noblest, wisest, and truest king that ever ruled France was no more.

The assassination of Henry IV. created the most profound excitement throughout the whole of Europe. All men felt that the dagger which pierced the heart of the great Huguenot king had turned the current of history, and the excitement was not lessened by the fact that the true origin of the fatal deed could not be discovered. It was in vain that the assassin, a fanatic and half insane monk, named Francis Ravallac, was put through all the degrees of torture to get at the secret; he sternly refused to reveal anything, and even when arrived at the place of execution, and tied feet and hands to wild horses which were to tear him to pieces, his lips remained mute and his eyes looked bright, cheered by the words of his confessor, who bent over him telling him that the kingdom of heaven was his. The wild horses did their work, and his secrets perished with the assassin; but though the unknown hand that guided his dagger could not be traced in legal evidence, all Europe seemed to be conscious instinctively of the direction from which the fatal blow had been struck. In Spain, Italy, and Austria the priests made no concealment of the joy they felt at the death of the man who had established religious toleration, and who wanted to extirpate Jesuitism; and in Protestant Germany, Denmark, the Low Countries, England, and Scotland, there was as little disguise of the belief that the policy of Philip II. had once more prevailed in the councils of the church of Rome, and that the murder of the Huguenot king was a crime to be laid directly to the charge of the ancient religion. In the House of Commons, stirred to violent emotion by the news of the fatal deed, it was resolved almost immediately that the English Catholics should pay their share of the penalty. The crime of the French monk was, in the opinion of the commons, an attempt not unconnected with that by which their own lives and those of the whole royal family had been endangered five years before, and they set to punish it after the same manner, by strengthening the penal legislation against the adherents of the old religion. They began by petitioning the government to open a new persecution against recusants, by putting in force, with the greatest possible strictness, all the statutes against them, which request met with the warm thanks of the king, and promises of receiving full compliance. The next step of the lower house was the passing of an act ordering all English subjects to take the new oath of allegiance, which had been voted in 1606, in the wake of the discovery of the gunpowder plot, and the adoption of which was expressly forbidden to Roman Catholics by a breve of Pope Paul V., published the same year. Not content with thus exasperating to the utmost the partisans of the ancient faith, the commons, having got into a savage mood, went on to increase the already insupportable burthen of fines hanging over the heads of the unfortunate recusants. Even married women, hitherto not subject to the recusancy laws, as being supposed, the same as in ordinary legislation, to be under the influence of their lords, were drawn by the new statutes within the circle of penalties, one clause, among others, ordering that if they refused to take the sacrament in the church of England they were to be imprisoned, unless their husbands were willing to pay ten pounds a month for their liberty. Fortunately for Roman Catholic wives, the clause was not rigorously enforced.

The religious excitement consequent upon the murder of Henry IV. diverted the attention of the members of the lower house of parliament for more than a month from the great constitutional question on which they had been engaged, and when they recurred to it, towards the end of June, it was with a greater spirit of forbearance and moderation than before. On the proposition of Thomas Wentworth, member for the city of Oxford, one of the leading speakers on the liberal side, it was resolved to draw up a list of grievances, and present the same to the king, and afterwards, if the behaviour of his majesty should be sufficiently conciliatory to indulge in hopes that at least some of the complaints would be remedied, to vote a moderate amount of supplies. They then set to make out the list, a proceeding which required more than a week. Among the principal grievances were the existence of the ecclesiastical High Commission court, the proceedings of which, the commons complained, kept increasing in tyranny; the abuse of royal proclamations, some of them interfering with the liberty of the person, others with property, occupations, and inheritances, and all of them substituting the mere despotic will of the government for the regular operation of the law, the delay of many of the courts, notably that of chancery, in granting justice, and bringing suits to a conclusion; the arbitrary jurisdiction of the council of Wales over the four bordering shires of Gloucester, Hereford, Salop, and Worcester; the establishment of new monopolies, most oppressive among them the duke of Lennox's "patent" for searching and sealing new drapery; and, finally, the general augmentation of illegal imposts, taxes, and customs-duties, laid on without the consent of parliament. The long list of grievances, enumerated under nearly a hundred different heads, was presented to the king on the 7th of July, by a deputation of the House of Commons. James, on catching sight of the immense roll of parchment held out before him, called out that it was big enough to serve for a piece of tapestry; but seeing the non appreciation of his wit in the earnest looks of the commons, he changed tone, engaging to give his best consideration to all the matters placed before him as requiring reform, and promising in particular to bestow his assent upon an act prohibiting the government from assessing any further new imposts without parliamentary co-operation. To the majority of the commons the royal promises appeared satisfactory, and the next day they resolved to grant a supply. But in spite of all the exertions of the court party, they refused to give more than one subsidy and one fifteenth, sufficient to meet the most pressing necessities of the king, yet not enough to enable him to prorogue the house for more than the space of a session. The intention was not openly expressed in the speeches, but was well understood, for in the course of the debate one member was heard whispering somewhat loudly to his neighbour, that the limitation of the supply would do his majesty good, and would serve as a subpoena to bring him to answer for himself when he was wanted. His majesty's faithful commons had come to understand most distinctly the power of the purse in the government of England.

While the house was exhibiting in all its actions a deep distrust of the king, the people, particularly among the more educated and religiously trained middle classes, began to look upon him with a profound feeling of contempt. James well deserved it, his conduct, as in matters of state so in personal manners and morals, gradually showing itself under the most despicable light. He had never held much intercourse since his arrival in England with his wife and family, and as years advanced estranged himself more and more from them, leaving his consort to divert herself with lovers and father confessors, and his children to grow up as they might, among servants, intriguers, and flatterers. He himself gradually came to devote nearly the whole of his time to hunting, drinking, and cock-fighting, keeping the very lowest company, and swearing terrible oaths on every occasion, the curses being intermixed now and then with bits of sermons and scraps of theology. Even these vices, bad as they were, might have been pardoned by subjects very much inclined to be indulgent to a king, but for the last and most criminal of all his tastes, his affection for male favourites, whom he used to kiss and caress in the face of the whole court, and to intrust with the most important affairs of state, constantly leaving the welfare of the nation at the mercy of some mean and wicked creature, distinguished by nothing else but good looks and perhaps the cut of his clothes. The propensity showed itself in a marked way from the moment of the king's accession, and kept growing with every year, until it reached a climax in the advent of a minion more worthless and vile than all his predecessors, yet at the same time exercising a more absolute sway than any of them over James, and rising to such an extent as to gather in his own hands, without contraction and limitation, the supreme power of the realm. This favourite was Robert Carr, a handsome youth of obscure origin, born in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, and who attracted the king's notice accidentally at a tournament, held in the autumn of 1607, when serving as a page or groom to a Scottish nobleman. Riding up the lists behind his master, Carr's horse became restive, and, plunging and shying, finally threw him on the ground, right in front of the seat occupied by James. Struck with the beauty of the lad, and hearing that his leg had been broken by the fall, the king gave orders to carry him at once into his own room, and to let the royal surgeons attend upon him; and as soon as the tilting was over, he followed himself, and sat down at the bedside to act as a nurse. He sat till late at night, and came back next morning and every day following, until his patient got better, performing in the meantime not only the office of nurse, but in addition to it that of schoolmaster, on discovering the extreme ignorance of the handsome youth. Leaving his couch on Christmas-eve, 1607, Robert Carr received the honour of knighthood, and at the same time was sworn a gentleman of the bedchamber, James indicating plainly that he was to be the new star at court. "Now the English lords," says Sir Anthony Weldon, "who formerly coveted an English favourite—to which end the countesses of Suffolk did look out choice young men, whom she daily curled and perfumed their breaths—left all hope, and she her curling and perfuming, all adoring the rising sun, and every man striving to invest himself into his favour, not sparing for flattery or flattery." England, after passing under the sceptre of all sorts of rulers, was about to try a groom.

The aspect and condition of James's court, at the time the Scotch groom was rising into power, was graphically described in a letter of Lord Thomas Howard, a member of the privy-council, to his friend Sir John Harrington, who wished to obtain a favour from the king. "You must come well trimmed," Howard wrote; "get a new jerkin, well bordered, and not too short; the king saith he liketh a flowing garment; and be sure it be not all of one sort, but diversely coloured, the collar falling somewhat down, and the ruff well stiffened and bushy. We have lately had many brave men who failed in their suits for want of due observance of these matters. The king is nicely heedful on such points, and dwelleth on good looks and handsome accoutrements; there were eighteen servants lately discharged who were not to his liking in these matters. Robert Carr is now most likely to keep the king's affection, and hath done it wondrously in a little time. The king leaneth on his arm, pinches his cheek, and smooths his ruffled garment, and when directing discourse to others, he looketh at Carr. The young man doth much study all art and device; he hath changed tailors and tiremen many times and all to please the king. You must see Carr before you go to the king, as he knoweth his taste and what pleaseth. In your discourse you must not dwell too long on any one subject, and touch but lightly on religion. Do not of yourself say, 'This is good or bad;' but, 'If it were your majesty's good opinion, I myself should think so and so.' Ask no more questions than what may serve to discover the king's thought. In private discourse, the king seldom speaketh of any man's temper, discretion, or good virtues; so meddle not at all, but find out a clue to guide you to the heart and most delightful subject up in his mind. I will advise one thing: the roan jennet whereon the king rideth every day must not be forgotten to be praised, and the good furniture above all. This not doing ruined a great man the other day. A noble did come in suit of a place, and saw the king mounting the roan; he delivered his petition, which was heeded and read, but no answer was given. The noble departed, and came to court the next day, and got no answer again. The lord treasurer was then pressed to move the king's pleasure touching the petition. When the king was asked for answer thereto, he said, in some wrath, 'Shall a prince give heed to a dirty paper when a beggar noteth not his gilt stirrups?' Now it fell out that the king had new furniture when the noble saw him in the courtyard, but he was overcharged with confusion, and passed admiring the dress of the horse. Thus, good knight, our noble failed in his suit."

The bantering tone of Lord Howard's letter but thinly covered, and not throughout the whole communication, the feeling of despair, shame, and misery moving the heart of the writer, as of every honest Englishman, at the scenes daily witnessed at court. "You have lived to see the trim of the old times," Howard concluded his epistle to Elizabeth's godson; "you know what passed in the queen's days. These things are no more the same. Your queen did talk of her subjects' love and affections, and in good truth she aimed well; our king talketh of his subjects' fear and subjugation, and herein I think he may do well, too, as long as it holdeth good. Carr hath all the favours as I told you before; the king teacheth him Latin every morning, but some one should teach him English too, for as he is a Scottish lad, he hath much need of better language. The king doth much covet his presence; the ladies, too, are not behindhand in their admiration, for I tell you this fellow is straight-limbed, well-favoured, strong-shouldered, and smooth-faced, with some sort of cunning and show of modesty, though he well knoweth when to show his impudence. But I say, good knight, you are not young, you are not handsome, you are not finely; and yet will you come to court and think to be well favoured? Why, your learning, your Latin and your Greek, your Italian and your Spanish tongues, your wit and discretion, may be well looked unto for a time, as strangers at such a place; but these are not the things men live by now-a-days. Will you say the moon shineth all the summer day? That the stars are bright jewels fit for Carr's ears? That the roan jenny surpasseth Bucephalus, and is worthy to be bestriden by Alexander? That his eyes are fire, his tail is Berenice's locks? And a few more such fancies worthy your noticing. Your lady is virtuous, somewhat of a good housewife, and has lived at court in her time, and I believe you may venture her forth again; but I know those who would not so quietly rest were Carr to leer on their wives, as some do perceive, yea, and like it well too they should be so noticed. If any mischance is to be wished here 'tis breaking a leg in the king's presence, for this fellow owes all his favour to that bout; I think he hath better reason to speak well of his own horse than of the king's roan jennet. We are almost worn out in our endeavours to keep pace with this fellow in his labours to gain favour, but all in vain. Where it endeth, I cannot guess." It ended in Robert Carr becoming prime minister, and sovereign of England in all but name.

Among the public, the doings of the king and his new minion gave rise to the most degrading reports and insinuations, which found vent at last in parliament in a general outcry against his favouritism, prodigality, and wastefulness. The explosion took place in the House of Commons in the second part of the session of 1610, an adjournment having taken place in August, soon after the vote of the small supply for which the king had to wait so long. The one subsidy and one fifteenth going but a very little way to satisfy the royal wants, the commons were called together again at the end of October, to hear another statement of the lord-treasurer about the extreme necessities of the crown. To this they listened in silence, but before entering upon any discussion requested to be furnished with the king's full answer to the petition of grievances, in all the points enumerated. The demand led James once more to assume the absurdly haughty tone he had before attempted, of irresponsible despot. On the 5th of November, he sent a message to the commons by the speaker, telling them that they must grant him a supply of five hundred thousand pounds, to make him take into consideration their grievances, and that, as a remedy of some of them involved a serious loss to his revenue, they must raise the latter by an additional grant of two hundred and eighty thousand pounds a year, not in irregular subsidies, but "certain, firm, and stable." After the promises already given by the king, and which were coolly ignored in the message, the new demands fairly irritated the house, and a storm of anger burst forth from all sides. The prevailing system of favouritism at court and in the government was openly criticised, one member exclaiming that he "wished the king would be pleased to live of his own, to remove his pensioners, and lessen his charges," and another declaring that it was "unfit and dishonourable that those should waste the treasure of the state, who took no pains to live of their own but spent everything in excess and riot." All the speakers agreed that no supply ought to be granted unless the whole of their grievances were redressed, which proposal was adopted in the form of a resolution. The next day, parliament was adjourned by the king's command, until, as was stated, his majesty had time to consider on the position of affairs. James's chief object in the adjournment was to try again the weight of his own eloquence, for which purpose he summoned the principal members of the lower house before him at Whitehall. Only thirty answered the call, and with them he entered into a discussion, taking care, however, to start only topics of his own choice, and to do the chief part of the speaking. At length he asked, "Whether they thought he was in want, according as his treasurer and chancellor of the exchequer had told them," requesting Sir Henry Nevill, member for Berkshire, to give him a direct answer. Sir Henry blandly replied that he had not the least doubt his majesty was in want, as stated by the lord treasurer. "Then," exclaimed the king, "tell me whether it belongeth to you that are my subjects to relieve me or not?"—"To this," said the member for Berkshire, "I must answer by making a distinction. Where your majesty's expense groweth by the commonwealth, we are bound to maintain it: otherwise we are not." The reply was of a kind to profit a king, though not a king of the stamp of James.

After a fortnight's prologation, parliament met again on the 26th of November. On the day of meeting, a letter was read from the king in which he promised to remedy some of the grievances, but asked the commons not to delay the vote of the supplies any longer. The letter was brought under discussion at once, but the debate led to nothing but poignant remarks about the king's favourites, and a general expression of feeling that the house should not give way in the struggle in which it was engaged, or, as one member quaintly expressed it, "not replenish the royal cistern without a guarantee." It was finally resolved to thank the king for his proposed concessions, but to tell him plainly that the house would not be satisfied, and would not vote any further supplies, unless the list of grievances laid before the government underwent a serious examination, leading to a reform of all or most of the evils under which the nation suffered. The earnest remonstrance was taken very ill by James; he had long been chafing under the language which was held in the House of Commons about his prodigality and the influence of his favourites, and rousing himself into another fit of wrath, he declared that he would bear it no longer. Summoning the privy council, he uttered some wild speeches about his prerogative, dwelling again on the godlike nature of kings, but apparently losing sight of the fact of his own nature being anything but godlike, nor even of the high human cast. The councillors listened in silence; Salisbury alone, who, next to his own perfumed minions, was the only one to exercise any influence over James, took the word, advising him to have patience. The king, more and more enraged, cried that he could not have "assine patience," and that he was determined not to accept the largest supply which it was in the power of the commons to grant, if they "were to sauce it with such taunts and disgraces as had been uttered of him and those that appertained to him." He then talked of sending all the members of the House of Commons who had attacked his conduct or that of his favourites to the Tower, and it was with difficulty Salisbury and other members of the privy-council prevented him from signing the warrants. James's anger having cooled down at last, he allowed himself to be persuaded to adjourn the meeting of the commons for a few weeks, at the end of which, on the 9th of February, 1611, parliament was dissolved by royal proclamation. The parliament thus brought to an end had lasted more than six years, opening the reign of the first Stuart king of England, in a manner significant enough to show that the nation had arrived at a turning-point of its history. The question whether England, having become Protestant and risen high in intelligence and prosperity, should still be ruled by the will or fancy of a single man, or should be under the authority of fixed laws, springing from the collective wisdom of the representatives of the nation, had been fairly started by the first parliament of James; and to its successors was left the task to fight out the battle, the issue of which was to decide whether the flag of despotism, or of constitutional liberty, should be floating over the island kingdom.

The dissolution of parliament was the signal for

James to launch into a career of tyranny and extravagance more atrocious than anything he had yet attempted. So far from reducing his lavish expenditure, he kept on increasing it in every direction, and to fill his exchequer had recourse to the most illegal means, to plunder and extortion. He began by issuing mandates to wealthy persons, requiring them to lend specified sums to the "public service," no security being offered for the loan, nor the slightest prospect held out that it would ever be repaid. The fear of arbitrary proceedings on the part of the government made this source of revenue prolific for some time, but the circle within which "loans" could be levied was necessarily restricted, and ingenious ways for raising money had to be hit upon. On the advice of one of his favourites, the king next revived an obsolete law by which all owners of landed property were compelled to compound by a certain fine for not receiving the order of knighthood; and the crop from this gold-field having been taken in, another was opened in the entirely original idea to establish a new rank of nobility, between knighthood and peerage, under the title of baronet, and to sell the same to all comers for the round sum of one thousand pounds sterling. The scheme was started by Sir Robert Cotton, a learned courtier, and greatly approved of by Salisbury, who impressed its usefulness upon James. When the latter hesitated to adopt it, for fear of offending all his new-made knights, a numerous army, Salisbury cried, with fine malicious humour, "Tush, sir! The money will do you good, and the honour will do the buyers very little." To make his baronetcies go off quick, James gave his royal promise to limit the number strictly to two hundred; but no sooner had these been sold when he began bringing another two hundred into the market, and after that a system of free-trade was inaugurated, leaving no one willing to disburse any sum approaching a thousand pounds to complain that he could not get a nobleman. At last, when there were no people left with money in their pockets who wished to become baronets, James set the peerages up for sale. For five thousand pounds, cash down, he made a baron; for ten thousand, a viscount; and for twenty thousand, a belted earl. The manufacture of nobility, high and low, produced very handsome sums; nevertheless, the more the money came flowing in on the one side of the royal treasury, the faster it seemed to flow out on the other, the receivers increasing at a much larger ratio than the givers. With a view of getting rid of some of the former, James after a while had recourse to the desperate expedient of publicly notifying to his Scottish subjects that they must cease applying for bounty to him, as to an all-beneficent "king-in-law." A proclamation was issued at Edinburgh, setting forth that the daily visit of persons "of base sort and condition" was not only very unpleasant to his majesty, they being in his opinion and that of all beholders but "idle rascals and poor miserable bodies," but that the realm of Scotland itself was disgraced by this influx of its sons to the English capital, the people of it getting into the belief that the native country of their lawful ruler contained no persons "of good rank, comeliness, nor credit." To check the peregrinations of his northern subjects, James at the same time ordered that no captains of ships should transport any passengers from Scotland to England without license of the privy council, a special interdict being laid upon the movement of persons going southward upon the errand of recovering old debts, which, said the royal proclamation, "is of all kinds of importunity the most unpleasing to his majesty."

Six weeks after the dissolution of parliament, on the 25th of March, 1611, the king's chief favourite for the time being, Robert Carr, was raised to the peerage, under the title of Viscount Rochester, the step indicating that the minion henceforth would take part openly in the government of the realm. Previous to his elevation to the peerage, the whilom groom had employed his time to acquire a suitable fortune, and when the patent of nobility was issued to him, he found himself one of the wealthiest men in the kingdom. By dint of confiscations and extortions of all kinds, James provided his minion not only with abundance of money, but with large landed estates, one of the properties made over to him being taken from the aged hero still confined in the Tower, Sir Walter Raleigh. Queen Elizabeth had granted to Raleigh, in recompense for his great services in defending England against the Spanish Armada, as well as a reward for his large colonization schemes and enterprises, in which he had spent his family fortune, the manor of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, a splendid domain, once belonging to the see of Salisbury. The estate was greatly improved by Raleigh, by the purchase of surrounding lands, and the erection of many buildings, among others a splendid mansion for his own use, he considering it his chief property, and one that was to be the principal heirloom of his descendants. Shortly before the death of Elizabeth, fearing evil days approaching, Raleigh executed a conveyance, by which he assigned the domain to trustees for the benefit of his wife and eldest son, only reserving part of the income to himself during his own life. The settlement was not only left undisturbed after Raleigh's condemnation, followed by a pardon, but formally approved of in the course of the same year by the king; but this did not prevent the royal favourite from making a grasp at the property. Looking about for fine estates upon which to support his rising dignity, Robert Carr cast his eye on Sherborne manor, and he had not long to wait for accomplices who would help him to rob the owner. The lawyers whom he set to work discovered that the original gift of the estate by Queen Elizabeth contained a flaw, the clerk drawing out the document having misspelt or left out several words; and the case having been laid before Chief Justice Popham, a tool of the government and declared enemy of Raleigh, he at once decided that the grant was void, and that the king was at liberty to bestow Sherborne upon whomsoever he liked. The report of this attempt to rob him of his property, the only source of maintenance of his family, threw the noble prisoner in the Tower into the greatest consternation, and in his despair, knowing that it would be vain to seek for legal remedies, he sat down to pen a touching appeal to the king's favourite, imploring him to have pity upon his wife and children.

"After some great losses and many years' sorrow," the hero addressed the minion, "it has come to my knowledge that yourself, whom I know not but by an honourable fame, hath been persuaded to give me and mine our last fatal blow, by obtaining from his majesty the inheritance of my children, said to be lost in the law for want of a word. This done, there remaineth nothing with me but the name of life, despoiled of all else but the title and sorrow thereof. His majesty, whom I never offended, stayed me at the grave's brink: not, as I hope, that he thought me worthy of many deaths, and to behold all mine cast out of the world with myself, but as a king who, loving honour and truth, hath received a promise from God that his throne shall be established for ever. And for yourself, sir, seeing your fair day is but now in the dawn, and mine drawn to the evening, your own virtues and the king's grace assuring you of many favours and much honour, I beseech you not to begin your first building upon the ruins of the innocent, and that their sorrows, with mine, may not attend your first plantation. I have been ever bound to your nation, as well for many other graces as for the true report of my trial to the king's majesty, against whom had I been found malignant, the hearing of my cause would not have changed enemies into friends, malice into compassion, and the minds of the greater number then present into the commiseration of mine estate. It is not the nature of foul treason to beget such fair passions; neither could it agree with the duty and love of faithful subjects, especially of your nation, to bewail his overthrow who had conspired against their most natural and liberal lord. I therefore trust, sir, that you will not be the first who shall kill us outright, cut down the tree with the fruit, and undergo the curse of those that enter the fields of the fatherless." The letter had not the least effect; nor were the further steps of Raleigh in protecting his property of the slightest use. As a last step, Lady Raleigh herself went to Hampton Court, where James was residing, and threw herself at his feet imploring justice. The king passed her by in silence, hanging on the arm of his minion, and leering at him with his big, wolfish eyes. Despairing to move the heart of the despicable tyrant, yet encouraged by the persuasion of her friends to make one more attempt to the effect, Lady Raleigh finally went to Hampton Court with her two sons, the eldest, Walter, a youth of sixteen, and a younger boy, Carew, born while residing with her husband in the Tower. She again threw herself at the king's feet, and begged for justice and for mercy in terms that might have touched the most savage barbarian. But there was nothing in the idiotic despot that a woman could stir in the depth of her sorrow; kneeling before him, James coldly looked at the noble lady, mumbling, "I maun have the land: I maun have it for Carr." Raleigh's wife rose in indignation, and hurrying back to her prison, sank on her knees, praying in the bitterness of her soul that God would punish the wicked monsters who were bringing ruin upon her, ruin upon her children, and ruin upon England.

On his elevation to the peerage, Carr was also sworn in as a member of the privy council, and from that moment began to take an active share in the government, ruling the court and the cabinet, and making the miserable king in almost every instance the mere mouthpiece of his wishes. There was only one man left strong enough to oppose him, and his opposition was not destined to last long. The son of Burleigh, worn out with fatigue, ambition, study, hard work, intrigue, and licentiousness, began ailing in the summer of 1611; and while engaged in unceasing activity, labouring day and night to induce the commons to assist him in bearing the financial burthens that weighed heavily upon his mind, expressed to his intimate friends a presentiment that his life would not last much longer. Towards the end of the year, he broke down under a severe attack of rheumatism, which was complicated two months after by a new disease, the ague, brought on by careless exposure to the night air. However, he rallied somewhat in March, so as to be able to walk in his garden; but the change did not last long, and at the beginning of April he made up his mind to try the efficacy of the mineral waters of Bath, although told by his physicians that they would only prove injurious to his health. But Salisbury felt anxious above all things to be quiet, and to be away from the knot of brainless favourites, contemptible in his eyes, who, as he was well aware, were only waiting for his death to enter upon a scramble for his offices, if not for his property. He set out for Bath towards the end of the month; and before starting he twice went into the privy council, speaking on each occasion for nearly two hours, attempting to impress upon his colleagues the necessity of entering upon retrenchments, and of coming to an understanding with the representatives of the nation. Salisbury remained at Bath for sixteen days, at first improving a little, but soon after getting rapidly worse, his weak body tortured by shooting pains, and his strong mind harassed by tantalizing fears, springing from the remembrance of the plotters he had left behind him in the capital. Fear and agitation kept growing from day to day, till he resolved to make his way back to London, to drag himself once more to the council table, and to warn the king with his dying breath that he must reform, and that the ruin of the country was hanging in the balance. He left Bath on the 19th of May, but before he had gone far he fainted in his litter, upon which his attendants placed him in a coach, where he could lie outstretched, and slowly took him to Marlborough, to lodgings in the parsonage house. The dying minister and his suite arrived at Marlborough late in the evening of Saturday, the 24th of May; the following morning he seemed to have rallied slightly; but at noon on Sunday it became evident that his end was approaching. "After dinner," relates his chaplain, the Rev. John Bowles, "Dr. Poe did rise, and I came unto him. My lord's head lay upon two pillows, upon Master Townshend's lap. Ralph Jackson was mending the swing that supported him. 'Lo,' saith he, 'let me up but this once.' Then he called to Dr. Poe for his hand, which having, he gripped somewhat hard, and his eyes began to settle; when he cried 'O Lord!' and so sunk down without groan, or sigh, or struggling." The last of the statesmen of the Elizabethan age was gone to his rest.

The news of the death of the lord treasurer was received with great and general satisfaction throughout England. Most of the exactions, illegal imposts, and other oppressive measures of which the government had been guilty within the last few years, were ascribed to him; and he was indeed so far responsible for them as he had not used the great power he possessed sufficiently for the good of the nation, but had made it his guiding policy throughout to please the king in the first instance, so as to keep his position, and only looked to the public benefit when he could do so without fear of losing his court influence. But want of strength, and a certain unscrupulousness in getting rivals out of the way of his own ambition, had been the greatest faults of the minister; and the people had soon to find that those succeeding him in power were as immeasurably below him in general honesty of purpose, as in administrative talent, and capacity for work. The scramble for his offices, which Salisbury expected to occur as soon as he was out of the way, took place immediately after the news of his death arrived in London, and for some days it seemed uncertain who should be the new treasurer and the new secretary of state, or whether there should be a treasurer and a secretary of state at all. Robert Carr was anxious to be Salisbury's successor in both places; but he had sharp competitors, who were the more formidable as the king was getting slightly tired of his favourite, having enjoyed the pleasure of his company unusually long, and yearning for the sight of other handsome youths with golden locks and perfumed breath. However, not to break with his minion too suddenly, James allowed him to take the secretaryship of state, giving the white staff of the lord treasurer to the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, whose indispensable lady had begun again curling and perfuming beautiful lads, fit for attendance upon his majesty. The earl succeeded in filling his post to the king's satisfaction, being possessed of much energy, and entirely unscrupulous in placing new burthens upon the people, and raising money by any means within his reach; but Robert Carr did not get on so well, his ignorance and idleness being conspicuous above all his other qualities, unfitting him even for ordinary clerk's duties. He had the sense, after a while, to perceive his inability to do the work of a minister of state, and on his demand two gentlemen of ability, Sir Ralph Winwood and Sir Thomas Lake, were nominated joint secretaries, he reserving to himself a share in power, and assuming in the meanwhile the duties of lord chamberlain, vacated by Suffolk. An appointment more important than either of those had been made some months before in the elevation of George Abbot, bishop of London, to the primacy of England, vacant by the death of Archbishop Bancroft. George Abbot, the son of a poor clothworker settled at Guildford, in Surrey, had attracted the attention of James, as chaplain to the Scottish earl of Dunbar, and writer of a treatise attempting to prove that the mysterious Gowrie murder had sprung from a conspiracy against the king: the pamphlet, overrunning with fulsome laudation of the royal wisdom, led to his being raised to the bishopric of Lichfield, from which he was transferred to London, and finally to Canterbury. Abbot's elevation to the primacy was generally looked upon as having a political significance, he being attached to Puritan principles, and having shown some courage in the House of Lords in the defence of popular rights against the attacks of the ultras in church and state. But his first measures scarcely justified his renown for liberality, clerical or political.

In the midst of his hunting and drinking diversions, and play with his minions, James occasionally languished, feeling the want of change and more varied amusements; and when in this mood he mostly took refuge in theology, writing books, and delivering sermons to his courtiers on Christian wisdom, and kindred subjects. The applause he met with suggested further efforts in the same direction; and in the end the idea occurred to his majesty that he ought to sit now and then in judgment on heretics, showing to the world that he was not merely nominally but in reality Defender of the Faith. An opportunity to carry out the plan soon offered itself in the apprehension of one Bartholomew Legate, a citizen of London, accused of disseminating Arian heresies, and of having publicly declared his disbelief in the Trinity. James ordered the prisoner to be brought before him, and having severely cross-examined the man, in presence of several bishops, who throw up their hands at the astounding sagacity of their monarch, he at last elicited from the heretic's own lips that he had not humbled himself in worship before Christ for seven years, his prayers during all that time having been directed solely to God the Father. On hearing this confession, his majesty, in utter horror, kicked the man with his foot, and commanded him to be given over to justice, to be dealt with according to his merits. The consistory court at once laid hold of the citizen, who was thrown into Newgate, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be burnt. But a little difficulty still offered itself. The king was told that there were grave doubts about the legality of the proceedings of the consistory court, it possessing no jurisdiction in the case, besides which an act of Elizabeth had formally abolished all statutes concerning the burning of heretics. However, James was determined to burn, and he therefore directed Archbishop Abbot to write to the lord chancellor, Lord Ellesmere, requesting him to get the opinion of some of the judges in the matter, with a hint to select his persons well. Ellesmere did as ordered, and succeeded in procuring the verdict of a number of legal dignitaries, including Bacon, but excluding Sir Edward Coke, whose belief in the necessity of upholding the forms of justice was greater than even his subserviency to the crown, declaring that the Arian might be given to the flames without hurting the law. The king now had the satisfaction of signing the warrant "de heretico comburendo," and Bartholomew Legate was burnt at Smithfield on the 18th of March, 1612. While he was preparing for death, another sufferer was nearly ready to share the same fate. Dr. Neile, bishop of Lichfield, a prelate distinguished by the obsequiousness of his loyalty, had been eagerly watching the king's newly awakened taste for heretic-hunting, and while the lawyers were disputing about the first victim, had dragged to light a second, in a poor fellow called Edward Wightman, whom he charged with entertaining the errors of ten heresiarchs, including the false doctrines of Manicheus, Cerinthus, and Simon Magus. Wightman's solemn declaration that he had never heard of these names, nor of those of a number of other terrible heretics whose dogmas he was accused of holding, greatly told against him in the consistory court, and he was unanimously declared to be guilty, and sentenced to the flames. He was burnt a few weeks after Bartholomew Legate, an immense crowd looking on at their sufferings, cursing the tyrant and his tools, who after years of happy peace were lighting anew the fires of persecution. A third victim had been prepared for Smithfield; but the attitude of the people had the effect of frightening the king, and he hurriedly sent his respite, to all appearance struck with the consciousness that murder might be dangerous, even though it be legal murder.

The burning of heretics and active negotiations for the marriage of his two eldest children occupied James at one and the same time, in the spring of 1612. His eldest, Prince Henry, had arrived at the age of eighteen, while the next, Princess Elizabeth, was but two years younger; and to marry the two to suitable partners had long been the chief labour of England's diplomatic envoys at the principal courts of Europe, their efforts receiving the hearty encouragement of the king. James had several reasons for wishing to get wives and husbands for his children at as early a period as possible, the first being that their nuptials entitled him to a large sum of money from the nation, by the ancient custom of feudal aid; and the second that he wished to get them away from their mother, who did everything in her power to set their minds against her consort, inspiring them with feelings of contempt, if not of hatred against him. Impelled by these considerations, the attempts of James to marry his eldest son and daughter had commenced very early, and been pushed in all directions. With Spain treaties for a double marriage had been on foot almost from the day of his accession; but the chief object of Philip III. being to lure the government into a war against the Dutch Protestants, and he perceiving before long that whatever else his royal brother of England might do, he certainly would not fight, the matter gradually dropped, and the rich infant who was going to bring a couple of millions of golden ducats to Prince Henry, little by little vanished out of sight. James next entered into negotiations with the duke of Savoy, who solicited the hand of Princess Elizabeth for his heir apparent, and offered that of his sister for the acceptance of Prince Henry, the lady to be accompanied by a dowry of half a million ducats. The king thought the money was not enough, which led to the breaking off of communications with Savoy, and the taking up of fresh ones with Tuscany, France, and several German principedoms. In Germany the negotiations were conducted by Sir Ralph Winwood, an ardent Protestant, who exerted himself so zealously in the matter as to bring about an actual treaty, furnishing his royal master not only with a son-in-law, but with a new title. At a meeting of Lutheran princes held at Wesel, early in the year 1612, it was resolved to make James protector of a Protestant Union, about to be formed against Austria and papal encroachments; and in order to bind more closely the ties connecting reformed Germany with reformed England, Frederick V., count palatine of the Rhine, and one of the seven electors of the empire, a youth born in August, 1596, and therefore not quite eighteen, offered his hand to Princess Elizabeth. The envoys conveying the offer arrived in London at the beginning of May, and assisted by Sir Ralph Winwood, who meanwhile had been made secretary of state, and had found means to win Carr over to his views, as well as Archbishop Abbot, who strained every nerve to bring about an alliance which he deemed highly important to the Protestant interest, they completed the affair with great rapidity, bringing the king to sign the marriage contract between his daughter and the count palatine on the 16th of the month. James could have no idea when thus hastily putting his name to a piece of paper, that the act would lead one day to the exile of his own descendants, and the occupation of the throne of England by a foreign dynasty.

Prince Frederick, count palatine of the Rhine, duke of Bavaria and Sillesia, and elector, cupbearer, and high steward of the holy Roman empire, was not a lazy lover; and anxious to see with his own eyes what kind of bride his agents had got for him, he set out for England as soon as learning that the marriage contract had been signed by his royal father-in-law. What accelerated his speed was the news that his alliance with Princess Elizabeth was creating unbounded enthusiasm all over the country, the cause of which he naturally ascribed to his own personal qualities, not aware that it was purely political and religious, the long-pending negotiations with Spain having served thoroughly to frighten all Protestants, who now gave way to rejoicings at the prospect of the hereditary rulers of the realm being drawn over by blood alliances more and more to the reformed faith. However, the reception of the count palatine in England was all that he could desire, for on hearing that the ship in which he sailed had arrived at Gravesend, all London put itself in festal attire, and on his barge passing up the Thames to Whitehall, the banks of the river were lined by thousands of spectators, who shouted themselves deaf in bidding him welcome. James received his future son-in-law with much cordiality, due not a little to the fact of his having heard from Winwood that the elector held the very highest opinion of his princely wisdom and scholarly accomplishments, and, what was little less important, that his august consort hated him. The queen, indeed, had all along been scheming to get a Spanish prince as husband for her daughter, not only on account of her Roman Catholic tendencies, but because of the flow of golden ducats which was to come with him, and of which she stood even more in need than James; the news, therefore, of the chosen son-in-law being a German Protestant duke, with a very long title and a very short purse, put her into a great rage, making her declare that she would not give her consent to the nuptials, nor receive the elector on his arrival. A hint from the secretary of state that disobedience to the will of his majesty might lead to the withdrawal of certain supplies, had the effect of bringing her round; nevertheless she did not fail to show Prince Frederick in sternness of countenance the depth of her dislike. The scene of Frederick's arrival at Whitehall, and first meeting with the royal family, was prettily described by Sir John Finett, deputy master of the ceremonies, in a letter to a friend. "The count palatine's approach, posture, and countenance," Sir John reported, "was seasoned with a well-becoming confidence; and bending himself with a due reverence before the king, he told him, among other compliments, that in his sight and presence he enjoyed a great part—reserving, it should seem, the greatest to his mistress—of the end and happiness of his journey. Then turning to the queen, she entertained him with a fixed countenance, and though her posture might have seemed, as was judged, to promise him the honour of a kiss, his humility carried him no higher than her hand. From which, after some few words of compliment, he made to the prince [Henry], and exchanging with him, in a more familiar strain, certain passages of courtesy, he ended where his desires could not but begin, with the princess—who was noted till then not to turn so much as the corner of an eye towards him. Stooping low to take up the nethermost part of her garment to kiss it, she, most gracefully, curtsying lower than accustomed, and with her hands staying him from that humblest reverence, gave him at his rising a fair advantage, which he took, of kissing her." The count palatine, cupbearer of the holy Roman empire, clearly understood the strange family into which he was going to marry.

The arrival of his prospective son-in-law was a welcome occasion for the king to display his love of pomp and show. The treasury was perfectly empty; but this did not for a moment prevent him from indulging in luxuries and pastimes to any amount, loans and benevolences serving to cover urgent necessities, and for the rest credit taking the place of cash. James soon found that he had to apply the credit system on a very large scale, the pockets of the count palatine being nearly as empty as his own; but the deficiency did not interfere with his good-humour, raised to the highest point by the amiable manners and judicious flatteries of the German relation. Prince Frederick made himself friends in all directions by his extreme suavity, which was the more delightful to those who came in contact with him, as nothing of the kind had been expected, the queen having painted him beforehand, with colours drawn from the depth of her own imagination, as a species of human monster, ugly, ill-formed, ignorant, ragged, and brutish. The surprise of the courtiers on seeing, instead of an ogre, a handsome youth of eighteen, magnificently dressed, of princely deportment, thoroughly well educated, and most affable in speech, was described by Sir John Finett to his friend. "He hath most happily deceived good men's doubts and ill men's expectations," the deputy master of the ceremonies wrote to his friend; "report of envy, malice, or weak judgment, having painted him in so ill colours, as the most here, and especially our ladies and gentlewomen, who hold themselves not a little interested in the choice of her grace's husband, prepared themselves to see that with sorrow which they now apprehend with much gladness. He is straight and well-shaped for his growing years; his complexion is brown, with a pleasing countenance, and promising both wit, courage, and judgment. He becomes himself very well, and is exceeding well liked of all—unless of those that are now sorry they did so honour him as to discommend him." The last allusion was, probably, meant for the queen, who, after having abused and slandered her unwelcome son-in-law to the best of her power, now felt more than ever vexed that her description should prove so palpably an untruth. To revenge herself, she treated the count palatine with a haughtiness approaching insolence, while for her daughter she had no other title than "Mistress Palsgrave," and the "Rhenish gudewife." Feeling reasonably anxious to get away from so unpleasant a mother-in-law, and to carry off his beautiful young bride to his own home, the German prince proposed to the king to hurry on the marriage, and Elizabeth making no objections to the proposition, the betrothal took place on the 27th of November, some months earlier than originally intended. The solemnity of the ceremony was marked at the commencement by Sir Thomas Lake, who acted as secretary of state for the occasion, and in this capacity was called upon to read the marriage contract in French, in order that the young couple might repeat the words after him. But Sir Thomas's knowledge of the French idiom was of the meagrest, and his pronunciation sounded so ridiculous that both prince and princess could not refrain from laughing, their loud merriment being echoed by the dutiful tribe of courtiers around. But all on a sudden, Archbishop Abbot, whose whole heart was in the scene before him, restored silence, exclaiming, in grave and solemn tone, "The God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, bless these nuptials, and make them prosperous to these kingdoms and to His Church."

The archbishop had good cause to check a laughter, not only indecorous in itself, but terribly offensive on account of a most saddening event that had taken place not many days before. Little more than a fortnight previous to the betrothal of Princess Elizabeth, her eldest brother, Henry, prince of Wales, had finished his short career upon earth, under circumstances that had thrown a gloom all over England—saddening every heart save that of his own relatives. From his infancy, Henry had been an extraordinarily promising child, eager to learn, full of mental activity, kind and generous in all his actions, aiming to do noble things, and honest and truthful to an uncommon degree. Even the miserable life led by his parents seemed not to affect for a long while his innocence and uprightness of purpose; and though the mother tried hard to set him against the father, and the father against the mother, their mutual animosity and falsehood appeared to have no other effect than that of estranging him from both, leading him to follow his own inclinations, and to strike out the path he deemed best for himself. The path, unfortunately, was not the best that might have been chosen, and scarcely could be such to a youth in his position, walking on the dizzy heights leading to a throne, with the glare and temptation of unbounded power before his eyes, with scores of false guides eager to conduct him into the flowery fields of sensuality, and with not a single true friend to point out the thorny way of duty as the only road leading to the gates of bliss, of the here as of the hereafter. Prince Henry was brought to England a few months after the accession of his father, and as soon as he had arrived in London it was thought proper to make him a knight of the garter, at nine years of age, and to settle him with a splendid household in one of the royal palaces. His establishment consisted at first of seventy servants; but the number gradually increased, till in 1610 the prince's family was formed of a crowd of no less than four hundred and twenty-six individuals, exclusive of artificers and labourers. The host of people around him and under his command had some influence of raising a spirit of ambition in the young prince; his studies of history, ill directed and superficial, left no other impressions upon him but those of glaring feats of arms; and seeing nothing in the life of nations but a constant course of battling in which the stronger tried to devour the weaker, he made it his high ideal to become a great military chieftain and leader of fighting men. "He studies two hours a day," the French ambassador, baron de Beaumont, informed Henry IV., "and employs the rest of his time in tossing the pike, or leaping, or shooting with the bow, or throwing the bar, or vaulting, or some other exercise of that kind." There was talk already of the intention of the prince to invade France after having succeeded to the throne, and to recover, sword in hand, the old heritage of the kings of England. The thoughtless multitude, little given to calculate the price of "glory," and to weigh it in the scale against the corresponding part of human misery and wretchedness, wildly applauded the pike tossings of Prince Henry, and the French ambassador himself began to be a little restless at view of all the martial ardour. However, a little more examination of the character of Prince Henry and his family went far to reassure him. "The queen," baron de Beaumont told his master, "uses all her efforts to corrupt the mind of the prince by flattering his passions, and diverting him from his studies and exercises, representing to him, out of contempt to his father, that learning is inconsistent with the character of a great general and conqueror." Her majesty's action, the ambassador justly surmised, removed much of the danger threatening the peace of France and of the world.

Whether corrupted by his mother, or by other persons, Prince Henry visibly sank from his high estate when reaching the age of sixteen. About the year 1610, he fell in love with the countess of Essex, daughter of the earl of Suffolk, one of the most beautiful, most profligate, and most worthless women in the kingdom; and the passion, soon growing into infatuation, went far to accomplish his ruin. Frances Howard, countess of Essex, was little more than twelve months older than the prince, but though young in years already ripe in wickedness; married to the earl of Essex, son of the unfortunate favourite of Queen Elizabeth, at the age of thirteen, she had never lived with her husband, but given herself up entirely to a life of voluptuousness and sin. "At the time the heir of the kingdom conceived a passion for her, she was the declared mistress of Robert Carr, the royal minion, whom he detested; but this, so far from damping the ardour of his affection, seemed but to make it the more intense. At first, the woman encouraged the approaches of Henry, incited thereto by her parents, as well as her uncle, the earl of Northampton; but she soon grew tired of the timid lover, and Robert Carr using all his influence to banish his rival, she discarded him without much ado. The act seemed to drive the unhappy youth into despair; and to get rid of the feeling of hopeless passion that was weighing him to the ground, he gave himself up to the most violent exercises, as if bent upon ruining his already feeble constitution. Never strong in health, he had lately become less so by growing very fast; before reaching the age of eighteen, he was six feet high, and still his long lean body kept shooting up, though getting little rest or quiet, by day or night. Fatal symptoms, the produce of bodily as well as mental suffering, soon manifested themselves. "His full round face became pale and sharp," according to the report of one of his attendants, "and his pleasant disposition sad and retired." to get free of his own thoughts, "he accustomed himself to feasting, hunting, and sports of balloon and tennis with great violence," went to swim in the river Thames, near Richmond Palace, "in the evenings after full supper," and galloped from London to Bever, in Nottinghamshire "in two days, above a hundred miles, in the extremity of heat in summer." The arrival of the count palatine, for whom he took a great liking, made matters worse. "He allowed himself too much liberty in accompanying the Palsgrave in a great match of tennis, in his shirt, it being cold, and his looks then presaging sickness. And the day following, Sunday, the 25th of October he heard a sermon, the text in Job, 'Man that is born of woman is of short continuance, and is full of trouble.' After that he presently went to Whitehall, and heard another sermon before the king, and after dinner, being ill, craved leave to retire to his own court, where instantly he fell into great sickness, with faintings, and after that a shaking, great heat, and headache, that left him not whilst he had life." Headache and heartache alike were over on the evening of Friday, the 6th of November.

The death of the prince gave rise to a fearful rumour that spread widely among all classes of the people. It was whispered from ear to ear, louder and louder as the bruit rolled on, that the beloved of the nation had been poisoned, with the consent of his own father, by Richard Carr, the royal minion. Incredible as was the rumour, if not concerning the favourite, whom men held capable of any crime, at least with regard to the king, it yet found numerous believers, their opinion gaining strength in the utterly callous and heartless behaviour of James. He never visited his son in his last hours of fatal illness, but, on learning that he was in great danger, expressly left London and went to St. Theobald's on a hunting excursion: it was here he received the report of his death, manifesting extreme indifference, and exhibiting it still more by issuing orders, at the end of a few days, that no persons should approach him in the garb of mourning, and that the preparations for the usual Christmas festivities should be continued as if nothing had happened. The amusements that took place left nothing to desire on the point of magnificence, and they were succeeded by still greater exhibitions of pomp on the occasion of the marriage ceremony of Princess Elizabeth to the count palatine. Affianced to the German prince a fortnight after her brother's death, the king's eldest daughter was married to him on the 14th of February, 1613, when the eldest son had not been quite three months in his grave. As at her betrothal, so at the celebration of her nuptials, fair Elizabeth showed great inclination to be gay and sportive. "While the archbishop was solemnizing the marriage," reports Arthur Wilson, "some coruscations and lightnings of joy appeared in her countenance, that expressed more than an ordinary smile, being almost elated to a laughter." The marriage ceremony was performed at the banqueting-house at Whitehall, with a blaze of splendour astounding to all beholders. Mourning being forbidden by his majesty, the princess and whole bevy of bridesmaids were arrayed in white, she bearing a crown of pure gold upon her head, and all her followers "so adorned with jewels that her path looked like a milky way." The deputy master of the ceremonies could scarcely find words to express to his correspondent in the country the unbounded magnificence which his eyes had been doomed to look upon. "The bravery and riches of that day," Sir John Finett informed his friend, "were incomparable; gold and silver laid upon lords', ladies', and gentlemen's backs was the poorest burden, and pearls and costly embroideries were the commonest wear. The king's, queen's, and princess's jewels only were valued that day by his majesty himself at nine hundred thousand pounds sterling." What made the king undertake the valuation of all the expensive toys and nicknacks, the deputy master of the ceremonies did not inform his correspondent; but he, probably, had some idea of pawning or selling them, the bankruptcy of the royal exchequer having reached its lowest ebb. The feudal aid towards the marriage of the princess, which had been levied some months before, had only produced twenty thousand pounds, while James had promised his daughter a dowry of fifty thousand pounds, besides which he had spent sixty thousand more upon festivities and the entertainment of the count palatine. Nothing remained under these circumstances but to increase the already overwhelming burthen of the royal debt, and to raise fresh loans, which brought sufficient to allow the king to send away his son-in-law and daughter in the middle of April, the former consenting to take twenty thousand pounds as the first instalment of his wife's portion. When the raising of loans was going on, Robert Carr, to show his liberality as well as attachment to the royal family, sent for some officers of the revenue, and delivering to them the key of a chest, bid them take its contents into the king's treasury. The officers, opening the chest, found twenty-five thousand pounds in gold, and disposed as ordered of this fraction of Carr's wealth, not a little amazed at the profits accruing from being the minion of such a bankrupt king.

The affairs of the favourite gave rise to much comment at the time of the departure of Princess Elizabeth and her husband, not only on account of his extraordinary contribution to the royal exchequer, but for another far weightier cause. Since his rise to power, Carr had attached to himself a gentleman of high talent and a refined scholar, Thomas Overbury, who assisted him in the management of all the important affairs of state which he took upon himself, acted as his confidential secretary and councillor, and tried by every means to hide his gross ignorance and utter want of education. For several years Carr and Overbury appeared to live in the greatest intimacy, in consequence of which the latter was flattered and caressed by all who were anxious to gain the favour of the minion; the king made him a knight, and the highest nobles courted his society, while the court poets ascribed to him every accomplishment and every virtue under the sun. This lasted till the spring of 1613, when all on a sudden a change took place in the behaviour of Carr to his companion, caused by the latter opposing his intercourse with the profligate countess of Essex, and attempting to prevent his marriage to her. The wretched woman had tried for some time past to effect this union, scheming primarily to get rid of her nominal husband, by murder or otherwise; and hearing that the intimate friend of her lover had used his influence to draw him back, her rage knew no bounds, and she forthwith took steps for his destruction. Exercising unbounded influence over her paramour, she had little trouble to effect her purpose. On the demand of the minion, Overbury was thrown into the Tower, nominally for having declined to go on a diplomatic mission to Russia, but in reality with the scarcely disguised object of getting rid of him by poison. All his friends were strictly prohibited from seeing him, and his sole attendant, preparing his daily meals, was a ruffian, named Weston, who was employed expressly on account of his knowledge of drugs. His doings exciting the suspicion of the lieutenant of the Tower, the latter was dismissed in a hurry, the king appointing in his stead Sir Gervase Elways, an instrument notoriously fit to commit crime to any amount. Slow poisons were now regularly administered to the unfortunate prisoner, his daily food, and even the water given to him, being tainted with deadly powders. For upwards of three months his strong constitution, and the employment of antidotes which he procured secretly, resisted the effects of the poison, till both the favourite and his mistress became frightened at dark rumours of the murder that was being committed getting beyond the walls of the Tower, the public voice accusing even the king of having a hand in the foul deed, which was to send to the grave a man likely to bring infamy upon him by the disclosure of certain secrets. To finish their suspense, the conspirators had recourse to more potent drugs, and at length, when worn down to a skeleton and covered with sores, a clyster of corrosive sublimate put an end to Overbury's life, on the 15th of September, 1613. The body of the murdered man was secretly buried, a few hours after he had succumbed, within the walls of the Tower, it being given out that he had died of an infectious and loathsome disease; and one of his friends who demanded a coroner's inquest was seized by the agents of Carr, and the promise of keeping quiet extorted from him by threat of instant death. His friend killed, the murderer entered upon preparations for getting married to the murderess, making all haste to cement the bonds of crime by the bonds of wedlock.

In order to marry her paramour, Lady Essex had to be in the first instance divorced from her husband, which was accomplished in a way disgraceful to the king and to all concerned, and causing an outcry of offended public morals that struck deep at the roots of the throne, and even of the established church. The countess began her proceedings by presenting a petition to the king asserting the impotency of her husband, and requesting that her grievance might be investigated, and, if the charge should be found correct, that she might be declared free to marry another. James thereupon, with uncommon alacrity, appointed twelve commissioners, half of them bishops and half lawyers, to investigate the matter, placing at their side a jury of midwives and matrons, whose report was to guide the verdict. The jury began their duties forthwith by citing the countess before them, and she objecting, on the plea of bashfulness, to come and show her face, a lady completely veiled and wrapped up was introduced for examination, which made the report turn as desired. The proceeding was enough to disgust the more respectable among the commissioners, and the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of London, and three of the lawyers who were included in the commission, at once declined further action, and although the king personally descended so far from the decorum of his station as to urge the primate in the most pressing manner to continue his services, he remained unmoved, and the other dissentients followed his example. But there was no want of willing tools to assist James and his minion, foremost among them Thomas Bilson, bishop of Winchester, who worked so actively as to gain in a short time from his colleagues a formal verdict of the nullity of the marriage, his zeal being recompensed by his son being knighted, and he himself admitted into the privy council. The dissolution of her tie having been pronounced, the lady lost no time in exchanging the connubial vow with Robert Carr. A few days after the divorce, James turned his favourite into an earl of Somerset, and, on the 26th of December, three months after the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, his assassins celebrated their nuptials at Whitehall in presence of the king, the queen, and the whole court. The pomp exhibited on the occasion was held to be superior even to that of the marriage of Princess Elizabeth; the king in person gave away the profligate bride, stained with the dye of the murderess, and a sumptuous pageant was performed afterwards at the palace, in which the whole royal family took part. A similar entertainment was presented by the benchers of Gray's Inn, originated by Sir Francis Bacon, who succeeded by his eloquence in overcoming the natural repugnance of his colleagues to this act of sycophancy. The authorities of the city likewise gave a splendid feast to the newly-married couple, bowing before them with almost slavish deference. On the earl and his partner entering the hall where the feast was provided, the trumpets blew, singers raised their voices, the city orators delivered addresses of congratulation, and the mayor and aldermen came forward in their scarlet gowns to do honour to the illustrious visitors. At the sumptuous banquet which followed, they were waited on by the most eminent men of the twelve great companies: after supper there was a gorgeous masque, followed by dancing and a second feast, and it was not till three o'clock in the morning that the bride and bridegroom returned to Whitehall, escorted by the mayor and alderman of the city. Never had the dignitaries of England's capital committed a more undignified, a more vile and contemptible act. The populace felt it; and except among the bespangled men in office, there was not a single voice from the crowd that cried welcome to the titled felons as they passed from Whitehall Palace to the city, and from the city back again to Whitehall.

The happiness of the much-worshipped guilty pair, whatever there was of it, did not last long. It was generally remarked that, almost immediately after Overbury's death, the countenance, gait, and whole appearance of Robert Carr, or, as he was now called, the earl of Somerset, underwent an extraordinary change. All the beauty and graces of his youth seemed to fade on a sudden before the withering sense of secret and atrocious guilt; his bright, sparkling eyes lost their lustre; his rosy cheeks appeared wan and hollow; an air of profound neglect became apparent in his deportment, his dress, and manners; and instead of continuing to be the leader of all court festivities, the gayest among the gay, he began to affect solitude, looked morose and melancholy, and even in presence of the king got sullen and dejected. James was quick in perceiving the change; and he had no sooner observed it, than he determined to get rid of the pleasant minion who was becoming unpleasant. He was the more anxious to do so, as a new object of affection had burst upon his eyes in a handsome youth called George Villiers, the son of a Leicestershire squire, educated in France, where he had been made an adept in dancing and a pink of politeness, and who had been despatched by his mother and friends, well perfumed, and with a stock of elegant clothes, to push his fortune at court. The pretty youth at once attracted the royal notice, and from the moment hundreds of hands were ready to lift him upwards, and hundreds of tongues eager to sing his praise. Among those anxious to see a new minion installed at court was Archbishop Abbot, who had taken a deep dislike to Somerset, on account of the latter having come to engage in secret transactions, and holding constant interviews with priests and Jesuit emissaries, which the primate feared might lead to the allurements of the king towards Romish superstition. Deeming this danger the greatest that could fall upon England, Archbishop Abbot set to work with intense zeal to get the old favourite out of and the new favourite into the good graces of his majesty, throwing aside the dignity of his high position so far as to take George Villiers personally by the hand, and adding a knowledge of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England to his other accomplishments. Somerset, keenly on the watch against his enemies, did all in his power to stop the rise of his youthful rival, but to no effect; and in the spring of 1616 he had the deep mortification of seeing George Villiers knighted and sworn in a gentleman of the bedchamber, the primate giving a religious aspect to the ceremony by laying his hand upon the head of the new knight, and enjoining him to pray to God daily for grace to serve the king faithfully, and to fill the ears of his majesty with nothing but the truth. The action delighted James, who exclaimed that "it was counsel fit for a bishop to give to a young man;" and resolving, on the spur of the moment, to do something eminently charitable and religious, he directed his new minion to wait upon the old one with a courtly offer of becoming "his creature," sending at the same time an intimation to Somerset that it was his pleasure he should receive the tender with graciousness. But the earl, unfortunately, was in one of his morose moods, and repelling the advances of the handsome youth treading in his steps, he cried, "I will have none of your service, and you shall have none of my favour; but I will, if I can, break your neck, and of that be confident." The words were sufficient to seal Somerset's fate.

Having dared to oppose his new choice, James at once resolved not only to discard but to ruin his old favourite, and he set to work with more than usual duplicity and falsehood. He first sent for the lieutenant of the Tower, getting from him all the particulars relating to the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury; and the depositions having been sworn to, the poisoner Weston, and several others who had taken part in the foul deed, were apprehended and examined in their turn. The murder having been brought home directly, by the united testimony of all the accomplices, to Somerset and his wife, the king, who had conducted personally all the proceedings, secretly instructed the lord chief justice, Sir Edward Coke, to issue his warrant for the commitment of the guilty couple to the Tower. On the day the warrant was to be executed, October 15, 1615, James kept his minion close to his side, professing an extraordinary show of affection, and hugging and kissing him as he had not done for many months. The officers of justice having presented themselves to apprehend Somerset, he trembled in every limb, and then, appealing to his royal friend, cried out that "never was such an affront offered to a peer of England in presence of the king." "Nay, man," quoth James softly, patting his victim on the back, "if Coke sends for me I must go." The consolation having not the desired effect, James assumed a more pathetic attitude. As described by Sir Anthony Weldon, one of the clerks of the Board of Green Cloth, "the earl, when he kissed his hand, the king hung about his neck, slabbering his cheeks, saying, 'For God's sake, when shall I see thee again? On my soul, I shall neither eat nor sleep until you come again.' The earl told him on Monday, this being on the Friday. 'For God's sake, let me,' said the king. 'Shall I, shall I?' then lolled about his neck. 'Then, for God's sake, give thy lady this kiss for me.' In the same manner at the stairs' head, at the middle of the stairs' foot. The earl was not in his coach when the king used those very words—in the hearing of four servants, of whom one was Somerset's great creature, and of the bedchamber, who reported it instantly to the author of this history—"I shall never see his face more." According to another account, given by Roger Coke, a contemporary writer, his majesty was pleased to exclaim, on seeing his minion dragged off, "Now the devil go with thee, for I will never see thy face more." Somerset could not carry the kiss given him by his royal patron to his wife, for she had been arrested before him, and they were kept in strict seclusion, neither allowed to see each other, nor any of their friends. A few days after their arrest, the chief agents who had helped them to accomplish the murder of Overbury, the governor of the Tower, Sir Gervase Elways, the poisoner Weston, a woman named Turner, a fashionable beauty, intimate with Somerset's wife, and several others, were put on their trial, found guilty, and sentenced to death. Among the accused was Sir Thomas Monson, chief falconer, and one of the royal favourites, who had been apprehended on a judge's warrant, without the knowledge of James, and was placed at the bar with the other prisoners. The king learning it, and fearing that Sir Thomas might tell things which he did not wish to be known, had him carried off by yeomen of the guard in the midst of the examination, and taken to the Tower, from which he was liberated a few weeks after. The rest of the criminals were duly sent to the scaffold, the beautiful mistress Turner appearing at the gallows stylishly dressed, in ruffs and jewels, as if going to a ball. Almost all the great ladies of the court went in their coaches to Tyburn to see her hung, admiring in her a heroine of the day. Under the distinguished patronage of such high persons as the earl and countess of Somerset, poisoning was getting to be nearly looked upon as one of the fine arts.

The trial of Somerset did not take place till May, 1616, six months after his arrest and the conviction of his accomplices. The delay was occasioned by the intense alarm of the king that his old favourite might become the revealer of secrets "concerning his honour," to prevent which he entered into a private correspondence with Sir George More, newly appointed lieutenant of the Tower, instructing him to work upon the fears as well as the hopes of his prisoner in such a way as to induce him to keep his lips closed regarding all matters that had passed between him and his royal master, who still professed to be his friend. Somerset's conduct had nothing in it to reassure the trembling monarch; for although confined in the most rigorous manner, and shut off from all intercourse with the outer world, he behaved in the most arrogant way, telling Sir George More that his royal friend and patron dared not send him to the scaffold, and finally despatching a message to the king threatening to reveal "their secret" should his pardon not be immediately granted. On this the affright of James increased, and he went to direct a piteous note to his lieutenant, begging him to do his best to bring the terrible prisoner to reason. "Good Sir George," his majesty wrote, "I am extremely sorry that your unfortunate prisoner turns all the great care I have for him not only against himself, but against me also as far as he can. I cannot blame you that you cannot conjecture what this may be, for God knows it is only a trick of his idle brain." "If he would write or send me any message," James continued, "concerning this poisoning, it needs not be private; if it be of any other business, that which I cannot now with honour receive privately, I may do it after his trial and serve his turn as well." In another note, James told his lieutenant, "Without the knowledge of any, I have put you in that place of trust which you now possess, and I must now use your trust and secrecy in a thing greatly concerning my honour and service;" adding, in the next letter, "Let none living know of this." But all the efforts of James's agent to pacify the caged minion proved fruitless; and as a last resource it was determined to bring his spouse to trial before him, she having made already a full confession of her guilt, the public announcement of which seemed best made to terrify him into quietness, as his sole chance of life was restricted henceforth to the hope of obtaining the royal pardon. Accordingly, on the 24th of May, 1616, the countess of Somerset was brought to the bar at Westminster Hall, under an extraordinary display of ceremony, the lord chancellor riding into court on horseback, followed by his attendants, and a crowd of peers and knights, forming a special commission appointed by the crown. The wretched woman stood pale and trembling before the judges, and without being pressed pleaded guilty to the charge of having poisoned Sir Thomas Overbury; which confession made, she broke out into a flood of tears, and on her knees in frightful anguish implored the peers to intercede for her with the king, that her life might be saved. The bystanders shuddered, listening to the tones of fearful guilt and fearful agony; there was a momentary pause, and then the chancellor put on the black cap, sentencing the prisoner at the bar to be conveyed to the Tower, and from thence to the place of execution, where she was to be hung by the neck: "And may God have mercy upon your soul!"

Somerset was brought to trial the day after his wife's condemnation, the 25th of March. On being informed of it the evening before, by the lieutenant of the Tower, he became very violent, declaring he would not leave his cell unless "they should carry him in his bed; that the king had assured him he should not come to any trial, neither durst the king bring him to trial." He continued talking "in an high strain" till the lieutenant got absolutely frightened, "began to quiver and shake, and however he was accounted a wise man, yet was near at his wit's end." According to Sir Anthony Welldon, curious eyewitness and quaint describer of many strange adventures in the strange court where he was holding a clerkship, "Now away goes Sir George Moore to Greenwich, as late as it was, being twelve at night, and bounceth at the back stairs as if mad, to whom came John Loveston, one of the grooms, out of his bed, inquiring the reason of that distemper, at so late a season. Moore tells him he must speak with the king. Loveston replies, 'He is quiet,' which in the Scottish dialect means fast asleep. Moore then says, 'You must awake him,' and was called in to the chamber of the king. He tells the king those pas-ages, and desired to be directed by the king, for that he was gone beyond his own reason to hear such bold and undutiful expressions from a faulty subject against a just sovereign. Upon which the king falls into a passion of tears: 'On my soul, Moore, I wot not what to do. Thou art a wise man, help me in this great strait, and thou shalt finde thou dost it for a thankful master,' with other sad expressions. . . . Sir George Moore returns to Somerset about three next morning, of that day he was to come to trial, enters Somerset's chamber, tells him he had been with the king, and found him a most affectionate master of him, and full of grace in his intentions towards him. 'But,' said he, 'to satisfie justice, you must appeare, although return instantly again, without any further proceedings; only you shall know your enemies and their malice, though they shall have no power over you.' With this trick of wit he allayed his fury, and got him quietly, about eight in the morning, to Westminster Hall; yet he still feared his former bold language might revert again, and being brought by this trick into the toil, might have more enraged him to fly into some strange discovery; for prevention whereof he had two servants placed on each side of him, with a cloak on their arms, giving them withal a poremptory order, if that Somerset did any way fly out on the king, they should instantly hoodwink him with that cloak, take him violently from the bar and carry him away, for which he would secure them from any danger, and they should not want also a bountiful reward." The Tower lieutenant's own reward was a present of fifteen hundred pounds—a somewhat moderate recompense to "goode Sir George" for all his trouble and ingenuity.

The use of the four servants with the big cloak was not required after all, and they failed to add a dramatic scene to the annals of English jurisprudence. Somerset, confident of the royal pardon, behaved with great calmness before the judges at Westminster, denying the whole of the charges brought against him. He was treated in a very tender manner by Sir Francis Bacon, who stood forth as public prosecutor, and made it apparent by his whole demeanour that he regarded the trial more as a matter of form than as an affair by which the life of the accused was placed in jeopardy. Even after the judges had retired, and coming back brought in a unanimous verdict of guilty, wound up by the lord chancellor's awful sentence upon him to be led to the gallows and hung by the neck, the earl retained his composure, merely remarking he hoped the court would recommend the king to exorcise his prerogative of mercy. In the meanwhile, James seemed to feel the terrors of the trial far more than his prisoner, evidently mistrusting the power of the persuasive and clever arrangements of the lieutenant of the Tower. He was "in restless motion all the day," according to Welldon, "sending to every boat he saw landing at the bridge, cursing all that came without tidings, and would have easily judged all was not right, as there had been some grounds for his fears of Somerset's boldness, but at last one bringing him word he was condemned, and the passages, all was quiet." The feeling of relief experienced by James in learning that his old minion had not brought forth the threatened disclosures was so great that he not only issued his pardon without delay, but even granted him the splendid annuity of four thousand pounds per annum, and went so far as to order that the arms of Somerset, notwithstanding his being condemned of felony, should remain suspended in the chapel of the knights of the Garter at Windsor. The countess obtained her reprieve at the same time with her husband, and to soften public indignation, naturally excited that the confessed chief instigator in Overbury's murder should escape while her tools had suffered on the scaffold, the king ordered Sir Francis Bacon, before setting his hand to the pardon, to insert a clause into the document stating that she had been led away. Obedient to the royal will, Bacon, without remonstrance or compunction, wrote thereupon on the paper the manifest falsehood, contradicted by her own declarations before the judges, that she had been drawn into the crime "by the procurement and wicked instigation of certain base persons." For some unexplained reasons, the chief of them being probably the constant terror of James that his former companion might divulge secrets, Somerset and his wife continued residing in the Tower for several years, living together in a certain amount of state, and having a daughter born to them during the time—subsequently married to the first duke of Bedford. Finally, by an order in council, dated January 18, 1622, they were made to reside in the country, it being decreed, "according to his majesty's gracious pleasure and command, that the earl of Somerset and his lady do repair either to Grays or Cowsham, the Lord Wallingford's houses in the County of Oxon, and remain confined to one or either of the said houses and within three miles compass of the same." Here and at other places the discarded favourite lived to a good old age, occasionally visited by James, who hung on his neck, "shedding many tears." The companionship, on the whole, seemed natural.

By the change of the king's minions and chief advisers the government gained little in dignity, and the country profited still less. George Villiers, though possessed of a few more accomplishments than Robert Carr, had even less wisdom, and led by him, James rushed on headlong in his career of imbecile tyranny, having not even the merit of vigour to redeem it from utter contempt. The instalment of the new favourite was marked in the first instance by an increase of extravagance on the part of the king, which passed all bounds, and soon left not only his treasury absolutely empty, but cut off the very sources from which he had managed for some years to draw his income. Benevolences, loans, illegal imposts, monopolies, the sale of honours and dignities, and other streams, which had hitherto fed the royal exchequer, were all alike exhausted, while the expenditure augmented constantly, the sums that could be wrung by force or fraud from the people kept growing smaller and smaller, the very titles of knighthood, which had been formerly sold for three hundred pounds, not bringing more than sixty, with a want of purchasers even at this price. To call together a new parliament and ask for supplies now became a necessity, which, highly obnoxious as it was to the king, could no longer be forborne. Being pressed hard by his privy council, James consented to the issue of writs for new elections early in the spring of 1614, and on the 5th of April, he opened the session in person. In a long speech, abounding as usual in pedantry and conceit, he told the members of the House of Commons that they had been called together chiefly for the purpose of relieving his wants, and that he expected they would do so speedily and effectually. He would not bargain with them for their money, James concluded his oration, but would see what they would do in their love, he himself having given them a great proof of his affection by having recourse to them, rather than relying upon his royal prerogative, which placed the lives and fortunes of his subjects at his disposition. The commons listened in deep silence to the speech from the throne, and meeting the next day, they decided by a large majority to send an address to his majesty, stating that they could not enter on the vote of supplies before the chief grievances which had been put upon paper by the late parliament, dissolved three years before, had been remedied, and moreover a distinct promise had been given by the government that all illegal exactions, laying on of imposts, and interference with public rights by means of proclamations, should be abandoned for the future. The address had scarcely passed, when James again made his way into the House of Commons to deliver another harangue. This parliament, he told the house, he meant to be a parliament of love, desirous that all the world should see his own love to his subjects, and the love of his subjects to their king. God was loved for the gift which He gave, and he, who as king represented God, would begin by offering them a gift, which he expected would meet with ample and cheerful retribution. An offer of great concessions, he said, should be laid before them immediately, and in the meanwhile he would be glad if instead of talking of general grievances, required by the nation, each member would present them on behalf of his own constituency, as "to heap them together in one scroll like an army did but cast aspersions upon him and his government, savouring more of discontent than of desire for reformation." He wound up by declaring his determination not to give up "any of the honours and flowers of the crown," but promising at the same time that he would not stretch his prerogative further than his predecessors had done. Again the commons listened in deep silence, as if trying to guess the meaning of the strange words uttered by the king. It seemed as if they could as little understand him as he could them—they, representatives of a people gone through the burning fire of the reformation, through flames licking up all idol-worship, and he, poor, witless crown-bearer, holding himself forth as a god. That he was a very ugly god was all they knew.

In the new House of Commons the Puritan element was stronger than in any that had yet met in England, which was strikingly manifested a few days after James had informed the members that he "as king represented God." On the motion of John Pym, a Somersetshire country gentleman, who appeared for the first time in parliament, elected by the borough of Calne, it was resolved that all the members should receive the holy communion together, the church of St. Margaret's being chosen for the purpose, in preference to Westminster Abbey, "for fear of copes and wafers-cakes." One of the objects of Pym and his friends in making the proposal was to see whether any recusants, or secret adherents of the Romish faith, had slipped amongst them; but when the day of communion, the 17th of April, arrived, it was found that there was not a single member of the house who had absented himself from church. On meeting again for discussion, it was resolved another time that the grant of supplies to the king should not be taken into consideration before the just demands of the house had been fulfilled, and security been given that henceforth the government should be carried on in a constitutional manner, and abstain from all arbitrary actions, especially the illegal assessment of imposts. In the debate upon the subject, some of the members expressed themselves with great boldness. Thomas Wentworth, a Puritan lawyer, member for the city of Oxford, said he must warn the government that the Spanish king had lost the Low Countries by imposing illegal burthens; that all the power of the greatest of the French monarchs had not saved them from dying like calves upon the butcher's knife; and that princes who taxed their people as they had done might read their destiny in Daniel's prediction that there should stand up a ruler of taxes in the glory of kingdom, but that within a few days he should be destroyed. In the wake of the member for Oxford came Christopher Nevill, a younger son of Lord Abergavenny, who poured forth a torrent of strong language against the despicable minions who had grasped the supreme power, declaring that they were "spaniels to the king and wolves to the people;" and he was followed by Sir Walter Chute, who spoke in the same strain, and by John Hoskins, who went so far as to threaten the favourites who were misgoverning the country with an imitation of the Sicilian Vespers. The speeches put James into excessive anger, and after sending several messages to the house, requesting an immediate satisfaction of the wants of his exchequer, and meeting with no obedience, he suddenly, on the 7th of June, dissolved parliament, and the following day sent Wentworth, Nevill, Sir Walter Chute, and Hoskins to the Tower. Four more members, Nicholas Hyde, Sir Roger Owen, Sir Edward Phillips, and Sir

John Saville, were placed under temporary arrest "for licentiousness of speech," while the rest were almost driven out of London. At court the energetic measure of James was looked upon as a great victory, and the favourites nicknamed the dissolved legislature, which had passed no bills during the two months' session, "the addled parliament." Not being naturally sharp-sighted, the court minions as yet were unable to perceive the very big eggs the commons were hatching.

The king's impotent wrath did not last long. Obtuse as was his mental vision, James could not help becoming conscious of the dark clouds that were gathering before him, with the huge murmur of dissatisfaction arising on all sides, and a vague alarm soon got the upper hand over all other feelings. The four members of the House of Commons who had been thrown into the Tower were liberated one after the other, in the course of a few months, John Hoskins alone being retained somewhat longer, in close examination as to what he had meant by threatening the bosom friends of his majesty with Sicilian Vespers. He parried the attack with much humour, saying, that as a member of the bar he was accustomed to deal in figures of speech without being aware of the exact signification, and that as far as the Vespers were concerned he knew nothing of them, nor of Sicilians, his only knowledge of races being that of English and Scotch, the latter in particular, they seeming to have grown of late excessively in numbers. The danger of meddling with such a lawyer was too great to be ventured upon by the advisers of James, and he was set free accordingly in the spring of 1615, after a ten months' imprisonment. All hopes of obtaining the desired supplies from the House of Commons being at an end, the king had again recourse to his old arbitrary measures for getting money into his ever empty treasury, beginning with the impost going by the name of benevolence. In the autumn of 1614, little more than two months after the prorogation of parliament—which was not again to assemble for the next seven years—the privy council despatched circulars to all the sheriffs and judges of assize of the kingdom, asking them to raise as large sums as they possibly could from the people of the different counties, both for the necessities of his majesty and the defence of the realm against foreign enemies. Making clever use of events that had recently taken place in Germany, the circulars stated that the elector of Brandenburg, the king's ally, had been deprived of his possessions by a Roman Catholic army, directed by Austria and Spain; that the elector palatine, his majesty's son-in-law, was placed in a position of considerable danger; and that it was highly probable that Protestant Germany conquered, an attack would be made upon England, to re-introduce papistry. The appeal, composed by Sir Ralph Winwood, secretary of state, the only man of talent left among the councillors of James, was but partly successful, not more than sixty thousand pounds being raised by it in the course of twelve months. To this sum the bishops, government officials, and wealthy citizens of London, upon whom the strongest pressure could be put, contributed more than one half; and a considerable portion of the rest was only raised under the energetic opposition of the people, and almost by force. Many things indicated that the resistance of the House of Commons to the arbitrary course of the government had resolved itself into a resistance of the nation.

The first signs of opposition showed themselves in the west of England. In Devonshire, the majority of landowners steadfastly refused to pay the benevolence, notwithstanding the threats of the judges of assize and other officers to whom was left the collection of the tax; and on these threats becoming more urgent, they forwarded a remonstrance to the capital, strongly condemning the illegality of the whole proceeding. The people of Somersetshire followed the same course, specially appealing to the act of Richard III. against benevolences, and their example was imitated in Dorset, Wilts, and other counties, which issued protests signed by the most influential persons. In reply to them, the government summoned three or four of the justices of the peace from each of the recalcitrant counties to the capital, not at once, but successively, so as to prevent a common plan of action, and work upon the fear of individuals rather than communities. Admitted before the privy council, the country gentlemen were overwhelmed with a flood of records and documents, serving to show them how entirely wrong was the opinion of the illegality of benevolences, the lord chief justice himself taking pains to prove that though abolished by the statute of Richard III., they had been raised again under the Tudor sovereigns, and as such been established "de facto." Coming from the mouth of so great a lawyer as Sir Edward Coke, it was not for poor justices of the peace to doubt; and they returned to their homes in submissive spirit, improved upon by the despatch of fresh circulars from the council urging more rapid progress in the levying of the "voluntary contributions," with strong hints that only those subscribing largely would be considered loyal subjects, and the names of the rest noted down as inclined to sedition. But the threat was not sufficient to allay resistance, which even became stronger in some places, as in Marlborough, where a gentleman of property, Oliver St. John, put himself boldly forward as the champion of the opposition. On the new appeal of the privy council reaching the town, the mayor applied to St. John, among other inhabitants, to furnish his share to the benevolence; but the latter not only refused to pay his money, but wrote to the justices of the county, protesting against the further levy of the imposts. In his letter, St. John declared that all such contributions were contrary to Magna Charta, and other statutes, as well as to the often cited act of Richard III.; and after having further argued that those contributing to the benevolence put themselves against parliament, which had thought fit to deny supplies to the crown, he wound up by charging the king with a breach of his coronation oath in attempting to subvert the constitution of the realm. The letter was replied to by the right royal argument of the writer being arrested and thrown into the Tower, to be placed before the judges of the Star Chamber. In the trial that ensued, Sir Francis Bacon, turning away more and more from the cause of justice to become a slave of the court and of his own ambition, took a conspicuous part as public prosecutor, which led to the condemnation of the accused. Oliver St. John was condemned to pay a fine of five thousand pounds and to be imprisoned "during the king's pleasure," for having presumed to speak of Magna Charta and the liberties of the nation.

While the courageous conduct of the citizen of Marlborough, and his persecution by the despotic Star Chamber tribunal, was yet engaging public attention, another trial, springing out of the levying of the new imposition, came to create still greater excitement. A clergyman of puritanical tendencies, Edmond Peacham, rector of Hinton St. George, in Somersetshire, had been put into prison on frivolous grounds; and in searching his house a bundle of loose papers was found, containing, among other matters, a sheet of notes drawn up in the form of a sermon. The notes touched upon the chief subjects of popular agitation, the arbitrary assessment of taxes, the misconduct of the officials, the illegality of the king, and the licence and oppression with which his minions ruled the country. When James had come to the throne, it was further stated, he had promised justice and mercy, but his subjects had hitherto found neither, and it was possible the people might in the end rise in rebellion under the terrible burthen of despotism weighing upon them, or, if heaven willed, the king might some day be smitten with a death as sudden as that which overtook Nabal or Ananias. Strong as were the expressions used, the papers containing them were yet clearly insignificant, if not inoffensive, inasmuch as they formed the mere private utterances of the writer, not having been looked upon by any other eyes but his own, and nothing amounting to publication of any kind having taken place, nor being likely to take place. Nevertheless, the king had no sooner heard of the existence of the sheet of notes, when he worked himself into a fit of insane excitement, loudly declaring he would make an example of the author. Always scenting plots and treasons in the air, he fancied he could see in the sermon-paper the proof of a frightful conspiracy against himself, for which he found sufficient evidence in the fact of Somersetshire, the home of the writer, having been one of the first counties to remonstrate against the levying of the benevolence. By order of James, the rector of Hinton St. George, an aged man, was thrown into the Tower, and examined as to the plot in which the king asserted he was engaged; and on his sternly declaring that he knew of no conspiracy whatever, and had written the few notes which had been found in his study merely "after the example of preachers and chroniclers," the royal order was given that he should be put to the torture. The command was executed in the most barbarous manner, in the presence of a number of state dignitaries, including Sir Francis Bacon, neither pride, nor shame, nor love of country or of justice, stirring the heart of the great philosopher to keep him from the last degradation of court worship, that of doing hangman's duties. But not all the fiendish cruelty of his persecutors could wring from the old clergyman the lie which they wanted him to declare; "nothing could be drawn from him," Secretary Winwood, one of the examiners, reported; "he persisting in his obstinate denials, before torture, in torture, between torture, and after torture." James now determined to put his victim on trial for treason, notwithstanding the opinion of the lord chief justice, who with all his sycophancy could not help declaring that the writing of the notes, of which alone the prisoner could be found guilty, was no felony, a mere declaration of the sovereign's unworthiness to govern not falling within the penalty of treason. However, Bacon, more obsequious than even Coke, took the king's part, consenting to be the executor of his behests. To insure the condemnation of Peacham, he was removed from the Tower and sent to take his trial at Taunton, two judges of assize, loyal up to the standard of the solicitor-general, going the same road. Having been found guilty of high treason, on the 7th of August, 1615, the old minister was condemned to be hung, drawn, and quartered, but he escaped the final ignominy by death in prison, the result of the torture and other sufferings. It was the foulest murder that had yet stained the reign of James.

The money raised by the extortions of the benevolence commissioners lasted but a very short time, and in the spring of 1616 the king's exchequer was as empty as it had ever been. To fill it anew, recourse was had now to the extraordinary expedient of surrendering to the Dutch government the three so-called "cautionary towns" of Brill, Flushing, and Rammekins, garrisoned by English troops in virtue of treaty stipulations entered into with Queen Elizabeth, and renewed subsequently, for one-third of the debt for which they were held as security. The sum owing by the Dutch, and which they had commenced to repay, was six hundred thousand pounds, and the amount James agreed to accept as payment in full was two hundred and fifteen thousand pounds, the round two hundred thousand to go into his own treasury, and the odd fifteen thousand to be made over, in lieu of claims, to the garrisons of the three fortified places. The agreement was duly signed on the 23rd of April, 1616, and the government of the republic closing up their very profitable bargain by depositing the money at once, the king for a month or two revelled in the unusual luxury of ready cash. It went fast enough, however, the crowd of hungry court parasites swooping down upon the heap of Dutch gold like vultures upon a lost sheep, and the chief favourite himself preferring sterling coin to any other remuneration for his eminent services. George Villiers, made into an earl of Buckingham, and ruling the king and the kingdom under the title of master of the horse, had just received the grant of several large estates, for the improvement of which he found himself in urgent want of money, and on his hint to the effect, James hastened to give him the greater part of the treasure that had come to him so opportunely. It was no mean sacrifice on the part of the loving sovereign, he having previously made up his mind to spend the Dutch gold in an excursion to Scotland, planned for the double purpose of astonishing his old subjects by the magnificence of his deportment, and of extinguishing Presbyterianism and its preachers, whose insults of former times kept rankling in his breast. To give up this great scheme entirely was not to be thought of; nevertheless, the money being gone, it had to be postponed for a season, during which time the king made desperate efforts to raise another fund, by creating new monopolies, imposing fresh taxes, and dragging wealthy people before the Star Chamber on all kinds of accusations, to be cleared only by the pay of enormous fines. In addition to the sums so raised, the king borrowed about one hundred thousand pounds from London merchants, native and alien, promising to pay ten per cent. interest; and thus equipped set out for Scotland, early in the summer of 1617. A week before his departure, Bacon obtained the reward of his services to the crown by being appointed lord chancellor, in the place of Ellesmere, who had died a short time previous. Bacon had to thank the minion before whom he had been cringing for the appointment, the announcement of which to him was accompanied by the message that he, Buckingham, "had obtained the seals for him, but with this assurance, that should he ever requite him as he had done others," namely, his old friend and patron, the earl of Essex, "to whom he had been more bound, he would cast him down as much below scorn as he had now raised him high above any honour he could ever have expected." The spectacle of this man Bacon, sublime genius such as heaven never created another in the realm of Britain, crouching at the feet of a brainless court minion, came to tower above any other in showing the utterly corrupting influences springing from and surrounding the throne of the first of the Stuart kings.

Buckingham played a leading part in the royal visit to Scotland, by taking upon himself all the arrangements of the journey, attending to every affair of state, receiving deputations and issuing edicts, and visibly guiding the king, and pointing out the direction in which he was to go. James made his way to the north very slowly, travelling not more than a dozen miles a day, hunting a little, as far as increasing obesity allowed him, and drinking a great deal, and thus managed to get to the Border in about a month and a half. On crossing the Tweed, at Berwick, his majesty was received by delegates of the nobility and the towns of Scotland, who had come to greet him on his first return to his native country, which they managed to do at a very small cost, by delivering long Latin orations and carefully abstaining from processions, triumphal arches, and other expensive pageantry. The Latin speeches continued the whole way from Berwick to Edinburgh, everywhere officials performing the chief duties of the reception, and the people of the towns and villages looking on with cold apathy, evidently far more alarmed than pleased at the sight of their old sovereign. That Scotland had never been so happy, so quiet, and so prosperous, than since he had turned his back upon it, was what all knew fully; and all dreaded, too, that his return, however temporary, would be productive of evil, the rumour that he was going to attempt changes in the civil and religious government of the country, and to upset its democratic institutions in favour of others more absolutistic, having long been current. The fears were but too soon to be realized. Immediately after his arrival in Edinburgh, at the beginning of June, the king summoned a parliament, and the first business brought before it was that of ecclesiastical reforms, several bills proposing the introduction of the chief rites and ceremonies of the episcopal church, as well as the establishment of an inquisitorial High Commission Court, being intended to give effect to them. The bills met with the most determined opposition of the representatives of the towns no less than those of the nobility, the former trembling for their faith, and the latter, principal holders of church lands, for their estates; but in the end an act was forced through the assembly declaring, "that in ecclesiastical affairs whatever should be determined by the king, with the advice of the prelates, and a competent number of the clergy, should receive the operation and force of law." The act was about to receive the royal assent, in the usual manner, by the king touching it with the point of the sceptre, when the attitude of the Presbyterian clergy stopped him in his course. In a great remonstrance, couched in terms half imploring and half threatening, the ministers disputed the right of the estates to meddle with religious affairs so far as to alter the fundamental institutions of the national faith; and they at the same time entreated the king, before proceeding further in his course, to hear the clergy, about to meet in a general assembly at St. Andrew's. James consented to the proposal, partly from fear and partly from conceit. The ministers of his native country, he had not yet forgotten, were a powerful body, and though he had no love for them, he had no objection to their admiring his oratorical talent. A journey to old St. Andrew's offered opportunity for a great many speeches, and the display of a fabulous amount of theology.

The St. Andrew's meeting was not so numerously attended as the king had been led to expect, consisting moreover of bishops and the clergy already in communion with the church of England or inclined to it, which put his majesty, prepared both to dazzle and defeat his enemies, into great ill-humour. It showed itself at once by his entering, instead of upon arguments, on the demand that the whole of the ministers should subscribe to five articles, all of them in direct opposition to the teachings not only of the Presbyterian faith, but of all the more advanced reformers even in the English church. The five points propounded were that the Eucharist should be received kneeling; that it should be administered in private to the sick and dying; that baptism should be given privately in cases of necessity; that confirmation should only be bestowed by the bishops; and, lastly, that the great festivals in commemoration of events in the life of Christ, instituted by the church of Rome, should be again duly celebrated. The rites and practices enjoined in these articles were precisely those most objected to by the English Puritans in the service of their own church, being considered relics of popery; and the proposal of the king, therefore, created profound consternation among the Presbyterian ministers. Some of them proudly refused even to discuss the matter, while others, more timid or submissive, fell upon their knees, supplicating James not to enforce his demands, but to postpone the discussion of them till the convocation of a general synod. The king promised this, but at the same time went to work in the most arbitrary manner, enforcing his own views. Dissolving the parliament at Edinburgh, he established, in virtue, as he declared, of his own inherent prerogative and absolute power, the High Commission Court, the bill for which had been thrown out; and setting the new tribunal to work at once, he cited three of the most eminent Presbyterian ministers, Calderwood, Ewart, and Simpson, before it, under the accusation of having stirred up rebellion. Their real crime consisted in having drawn up the remonstrance which had been presented to James in the capital, and of having further distinguished themselves by exhorting their brethren in the ministry to stand true to the faith which they had been preaching all their lives, disregarding alike promises and threats to swerve from it. The offence was great enough to insure immediate conviction from the new despotic tribunal, acting entirely under the behests of the king, the same as the High Commission Court of England. By its decision, Ewart and Simpson were suspended from their ministries and put into prison, while Calderwood, the most learned and most influential of the three champions of religious right, and as such especially obnoxious to his majesty, was exiled from the kingdom. The tyrannical measure created a storm of excitement and indignation all through Scotland, in the midst of which James thought fit to slip out of the country, without waiting for the meeting of the general convocation of the clergy, which he had promised to attend. Towards the end of August, he recrossed the Tweed in great hurry, and the people of Scotland saw their king no more.

In the same month when James had started on his short excursion to the northern kingdom, another illustrious traveller left England on a great maritime expedition to the south. Sir Walter Raleigh, after spending twelve weary years in confinement in the Tower, had some time previous obtained his release, by means of a large bribe to the reigning favourite, and had set out on another journey of exploration to the mysterious empire of Guiana, on the borders of the Orinoco River, visited by him more than twenty years before, in 1596, when in the prime of his life and fortune. The professed object of his new adventure was the working of a large gold mine discovered by him on his first trip; and to win over both the king and the minion, through whose hands everything passed, he formally assigned to the crown one-fifth part of the bullion to be imported into England. This was enough to arouse the cupidity of James, making him not only give his consent to the scheme, but appoint Raleigh commander-in-chief and admiral of the expedition under his orders, with power of martial law over all officers, sailors, and soldiers. In order to equip his fleet, Raleigh sold everything he possessed, even to a small estate settled upon his wife, for which he received two thousand five hundred pounds; and with this and other sums, raised on loan from friends and relatives, he managed to fit out fourteen small vessels of fishing-boat size, together with one ship of larger tonnage, carrying thirty-six pieces of ordnance, which he called the "Destiny," and to the command of which he appointed his eldest son, Walter. On the 28th of March, 1617, the little fleet dropped down the Thames to sail round the coast to Plymouth, where it was joined by a number of gentlemen eager to share the hazards and the glory of so renowned a sea-captain as Raleigh. The squadron finally put to sea in July, but was detained by contrary winds for more than a month near the Irish coast, and encountering dreadful storms on the Atlantic, did not reach the continent of South America till the beginning of November. Arrived at the mouth of the Orinoco, Raleigh fell ill of fever, so as to be unable to move, and not wishing to delay his work, sent five of the best ships, under his son and Captain Keymer, an officer who had been with him in 1596, up the river towards the gold mine, while he himself remained at Trinidad to prepare against an expected attack of the Spanish fleet. Captain Keymer and young Walter Raleigh ascended the Orinoco as ordered, but when arrived near the mine were attacked by a large Spanish force under General Palameca, governor of the town of Santa Thome. A battle ensued, in the course of which Walter Raleigh, fighting bravely at the head of his troops, was killed by a pistol shot, which so enraged the men that they stormed Santa Thome and put it on fire, driving the enemy into the woods. But the valour of the handful of Englishmen was thrown away, for returning the day after their defeat in overwhelming numbers, the Spaniards compelled them to take to the ships again; and at the beginning of March, 1618, Captain Keymer rejoined Raleigh, telling him that their forces had been routed, that half his men had been killed, and that his son was among the slain. The hero's despair and anguish on learning the fatal news found vent in bitter reproaches, which had such an effect upon Keymer that he retreated to his cabin and destroyed himself. An attempt of mutiny among the sailors followed; and Raleigh, seeing the ruin of his expedition irretrievable, set sail again for Europe, bowed to the ground with grief and the loss of all his hopes.

The report of the failure of Raleigh's undertaking reached England before his arrival, leading the king to assume all on a sudden the air of an outraged defender of public peace and international rights. Deeply vexed with the disappointment of not getting his expected share from the great gold mine, and frightened besides at the threats of the Spanish ambassador, Sarmiento de Acuna—better known under his subsequent title of count de Gondomar—James determined to take his revenge upon the unfortunate hero, and punish him for his want of success. What added greatly to this determination was the influence which the Spanish envoy had obtained at court, by bribing Buckingham, and deluding the credulous king with the hope of obtaining for his son Charles the hand of the eldest daughter of Philip III., with a dowry of several millions. The negotiations for the marriage, entirely delusive on the Spanish side, had been carried on for several months, but on the news of the burning of the town of Santa Thome reaching England, Gondomar at once rushed to the king, declaring that they would have to be broken off unless the pirate, as he called Raleigh, should receive condign punishment. Thereupon James forthwith issued a proclamation, stating that the invaders of Guiana had infringed the royal commission which authorized them to search for gold, and, accusing them of scandalous outrages, invited all who could give information against them to repair to the privy council. Three weeks after the proclamation, at the beginning of July, 1618, Raleigh landed at Plymouth; but before he had been many hours on shore he was arrested, taken to London, and thrown into the Tower. James by this time had given Gondomar, on the demand of King Philip, the distinct promise that the enemy of Spain should be killed, and the only consideration remaining was how best to effect the deed. To put the hero upon his trial for landing in and attempting to reconquer a country which he himself had taken possession of twenty years before in the name of Queen Elizabeth, seemed dangerous in the excited state of public feeling; and after some irresolution, and consultation with the lord chancellor, James made up his mind to kill him simply under the old charge of conspiracy, for which he had been condemned at Winchester, and been lying many years in the Tower, after respite from the block. This having been settled, the solemn machinery was gone through of issuing a writ of habeas corpus, upon which Raleigh was carried, on the 26th of October, before the judges of the King's Bench, and asked whether he had anything to say why the execution of the verdict of death, passed upon him fifteen years before at Winchester, should not take place. He had then been condemned on the accusation of being in league with the king of Spain, and the sentence was now to be carried out for having entered upon hostilities against the king of Spain. Brazen-faced as were the men lifted on the bench of judges by a government as utterly corrupt as that of James and his minions, they could hardly help a sense of shame stealing over them in addressing Raleigh.

The aged hero, now near sixty-six, tottering under a fit of prison ague, and borne to the earth by the terrible weight of his sorrows and sufferings, remained silent for a moment after the judges had addressed him, and then murmured that he was too weak from illness to be able to speak. On being told that his voice was audible enough, he summoned strength for a few remarks. "My lords," he exclaimed, "all I can say is this, that the judgment I received to die so long since cannot now, I hope, be strained to take away my life, for since it was his majesty's pleasure to grant me a commission to proceed on a voyage beyond the seas, wherein I had power as marshal on the life and death of others, so, under favour, I presume I am discharged of that judgment. By that commission, I gained a full pardon and new life: for he that hath power over the lives of others, must surely be master of his own. Under my commission I undertook a voyage to honour my sovereign and enrich his kingdom with gold, of the ore whereof this hand hath found and taken in Guiana; but the enterprise, notwithstanding my endeavours, had no other success than what was fatal to me, the loss of my son, and the wasting of my whole estate." Raleigh then entered upon an explanation of the causes of his failure; but before he had proceeded far he was interrupted by the lord chief justice, Sir Henry Montague, the successor of Coke, who had fallen under the royal disgrace and been deprived of office for not showing himself sufficiently obsequious in the trial and judicial murder of Edmund Peacham. Sir Henry told Raleigh, with admirable hypocrisy, that he need not defend his conduct in the expedition to Guiana, that being not under trial, the sole cause why he had been brought into court, in preparation for his execution, being that of his former sentence for treason, delivered at Winchester. A faint flush overspread the wan face of Raleigh; and unable to conceal his disdain of the mendacity confronting him, he exclaimed, "If such is your lordship's opinion, I can only put myself under the mercy of the king." And, lifting anew his feeble voice, he added, "His majesty himself has been of opinion, as known to some that are now present, that in my former trial I have received hard measure: had he not been exasperated against me, certain I am, I might have lived a thousand years before he would have taken advantage thereof." Again the lord chief justice interrupted him, and without further formality pronounced sentence of death. On his concluding with the words "Execution is awarded," Raleigh once more addressed the court with the calmness which had never forsaken him. "My lords," he said, "I desire this much favour, that I may not be cut off suddenly, but may be granted some time before my execution to settle my affairs and my mind. I would beseech the favour of pen, ink, and paper, thereby to discharge myself of some trusts of a worldly nature that were put upon me. I crave not this to gain one minute of life, for now being old, sickly, disgraced, and certain to go to death, life is wearisome unto me." Then, raising his voice as high as his remaining strength allowed, he exclaimed, with great solemnity, "Here I take God to be my judge, before whom I shall appear shortly, that I was never disloyal to his majesty, which I shall justify where I shall not fear the face of any king on earth: and so I beseech you all to pray for me." Upon this he was led back to prison, where he was informed soon after that he was to die the next morning. With a meanness surpassing itself, James would not grant his illustrious victim even the few days' respite he had demanded, but ordered that he should be led to the block at once. Accordingly, on the morning of Friday, the 29th of October, Raleigh was taken by a strong guard under the sheriffs of London and Westminster to the scaffold, erected at the Old Palace Yard, which was surrounded by an immense multitude. After addressing the people, once more asserting his entire innocence of the crime on which he was convicted, he went to examine the axe that was to strike off his head. Passing his finger along the edge, to feel whether it was keen enough, he said to the sheriff, smiling, "Tis a sharp medicine, but a sound cure for all diseases." The executioner, as if conscious that his axe was to sever from its body the noblest head in the realm, hesitated a while to deal the fatal blow, when Raleigh, turning round on the block, addressed him with great composure. "What dost thou fear?" he exclaimed; "strike, man!" Then the glittering steel descended, and the hero's blood gushed forth in one thick stream—a stream enough to cover with infamy for all ages the name of one of the vilest sovereigns that ever disgraced the throne of England.

After the murder of Raleigh, the opposition to the government increased visibly throughout the country, and there were many signs of England getting to the verge of a revolution. Levying taxes and imposts without parliamentary sanction, and having recourse to the most frightful extortions to provide for his own wastefulness and that of his great and little minions, the king had come to be utterly detested; and there was scarce a man in the whole nation beyond the throng of sycophants surrounding the throne and feeding upon the fat of the land, not looking with mixed hatred and indignation upon the spectacle presented by him and his court. Buckingham had become absolute ruler of the weak and vicious master who had raised him from the dust, and while assuming the government of the realm in his name, looking upon England like nothing else but a fertile tree from which to strip the fruit, to the very last blossom, did not forget to pull all his friends and relations up to the golden height to which he had risen. Sir Anthony Weldon, looking upon the spectacle before him with curious eye, inwardly contrasting it with that which he had witnessed in the preceding reign—his father, like himself, having been attached to the household of “the never to be forgotten Queen Elizabeth, of happy memory”—put a graphic description of it on paper. “And now Buckingham,” he records, “having the chancellor, treasurer, and all great officers, his very slaves, swells in the height of pride; summons up all his country kindred, the old countess [minion’s mother, brought up from the Leicestershire wilds and turned into a countess] providing a place for them to learn to carry themselves in a court like garb. But because they could not learn the French dances so soon as to be suitable to their gay clothes, country dances, for their sakes only, must be the fashion of the court, and none else must be used. Then must these women-kindred be married to earls, earls’ eldest sons, barons, or chief gentlemen of greatest estates, so much that the very female kindred were numerous enough and sufficient to have peopled any plantation; nay, the very kitchen wenches were married to knights’ eldest sons. Yet, as if England had not matches enough in the kingdom, they married, like the house of Austria, in their own kindred, witness the earl of Anglesca, who married a cousin german. Now King James, that naturally in former times hated women, had his court replenished with them, and all of the kindred. Little children did run up and down the king’s lodgings like little rabbit starters about their burrows. Here was a strange change, that the king, who formerly could not endure the queen and her children in his lodgings, now you would have judged that none but women frequented them; nay, but the kindred had all the houses about Whitehall, as if they had been bulwarks and flankers to the citadel.” The corruption created by this state of things was boundless, spreading far and wide, in ever increasing circles. The whole administration of the state, to its farthest ramifications, became venal; all posts and offices were put up for sale, more or less openly, by the favourite and his relatives, who acted as money-takers; everything was to be obtained by bribes, and nothing without them. There were none that could escape the foul taint pervading the whole atmosphere of court and government, from the philosopher Bacon, who prostituted his mighty intellect and the immortal aspirations of his soul to obtain the smiles of the minion, to the lawyer Coke, who made a sacrifice equally as great to obtain the same end. Having fallen into disfavour at court, and lost his place for not lending himself readily enough to judicial murder, Coke fretted for a while in obscurity, and then resolved to get into office again by selling his only daughter to Buckingham’s brother. It was in vain the young girl, who abhorred the match, having given her heart to another, protested against it, and even fled from home, accompanied by her mother; the great lawyer followed them both, and seizing wife and child, threw the former into prison, and married the latter by force. The action so much pleased the favourite, the kidnapped girl having brought a large fortune to his brother, that he re-installed Coke in his former seat at the privy council board, to the intense mortification of Bacon, who detested the fallen lord chief justice as a rival. It was the natural culmination of general depravity that the two greatest intellects of the age should hate each other like fiends.

Early in March, 1619, little more than four months after the murder of Raleigh, the queen died; but her decease was so little noticed either at court or among the people that not even the date of it was preserved. Openly neglected by her husband, and little regarded by her sons, either Henry, the eldest, or Charles, who succeeded him as prince of Wales, she had long sunk into such total insignificance that even the Jesuits, who for a time kept hovering about her, to get what they could out of her Roman Catholic predilections, gave her up as a tool not worth employing. When hearing that his wife was very ill and on the point of death, James got very concerned—not, however, about her life, but her jewelry. He was aware of her possessing an immense stock of diamonds and other precious stones; and his fear was that unless he, or Buckingham, equally interested in the jewels, could seize them in time, her attendants would pilfer the lot, his suspicions being directed against two of them in particular, a waiting woman known as “Danish Anna,” and a Frenchman called Pierrot. Therefore, though not visiting his spouse when lying on her death-bed, James sent her an earnest exhortation to make her will, with full specification of property attached; and on her refusal to do so, the archbishop of Canterbury and bishop of London were despatched by him to add the weight of their influence for getting at the diamonds. But the queen was obstinate, as against her unbeloved husband, so to the eloquent prelates, who kept preaching to her on the uncertainty of human life, and the duty of all persons stricken with illness to set their affairs in order, and the archbishop and bishop having taken their departure, Pierrot and “Danish Anna” had it all their own way. On the night of her decease, the two were almost alone with the queen, and the woman, by command, brought her a large goblet of Rhenish wine. “Now have I deceived the physicians,” the dying consort of James exclaimed, swallowing the wine at a draught; and on her eyes getting heavy, she added, in a whisper, addressing her female attendant, “Come, lie down by me, and sleep.” The woman went to sleep, and when awaking found that her royal mistress was lying unconscious at her side, apparently dead. Physicians and clergymen were called in now, but they only heard “five or six little moans;” it was “the happiest going out of the world that any one ever had,” as described by an eyewitness. James had no sooner heard of his wife’s death than he ordered the whole of her property to be carried before him, at Greenwich Palace, for personal inspection. “All her coffers and cabinets,” as recorded in a manuscript account, “were brought from Somerset House in four carts, and delivered by inventory to his majesty, by Sir Edward Coke and the queen’s auditor. The king examined all. He found that the queen had received from Herriek, her jeweller, thirty-six thousand pounds’ worth of jewels, of which no vestige appeared; the jeweller produced the models, and swore to the delivery of the property.” Pierrot and Danish Anna were thereupon taken in custody by order of the king; but their imprisonment led to nothing, and neither the jewels, nor an immense sum of money which the queen was known to have hoarded, was ever recovered. The ghastly farce ended by James ordering a splendid funeral to his consort, after she had been dead for more than two months. On a hot day in the middle of May, an immense procession of courtiers had to walk, following the bier containing the royal corpse, from Somerset House to Westminster Abbey; "they came lagging along, tired with the length of the way, every private lady having twelve yards of black broadcloth about her; and the countesses sixteen yards of the same." The chief mourner in the long procession was Charles, prince of Wales, who alone attracted the attention of the vast crowd lining the streets, gaping at the dismal ladies in broadcloth, and at the youth that was to be king of England. Probably, among the multitude stood a burly young man, a native of Huntingdon, entered as law student at Lincoln's Inn, by name Oliver Cromwell.

Popular dissatisfaction was at its height in the year following the death of the queen; but just at the moment when it seemed as if the whole nation was about to rise, to overthrow one of the most wretched governments ever known to England, events occurred which withdrew for a time the attention of the people from home affairs, directing it, with intense earnestness, to the continent of Europe. The mighty struggle between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, which had occupied the greater part of the civilized world for nearly a century, with alternate rise and fall like the tides of the sea, now the new faith getting the upper hand for a while, then the belief of ages asserting its time-grown power, and then again both resting in a deep lull of exhaustion, was once more breaking forth with extreme violence, foreboding a battle fiercer than any that had yet left its trace on the blood-stained earth. The kingdom of Bohemia, cradle of the reformation, where Johan Huss had lighted the torch of free inquiry a century before Martin Luther arose in Germany, stood forth as the new battle-field of religion; attracting the trembling gaze of all the Protestants of Europe, and in a very special manner that of the people of England. Roused into despair by the intolerable despotism of the house of Austria, which, aiming to extirpate the new religion with fire and sword, was weighing as heavily upon Bohemia as the power of Spain had been lying upon the Netherlands, the countrymen of Huss, after long suffering, at last grasped the sword as a final remedy, determined to throw off the yoke of oppression or to perish in the struggle for freedom. The commencement offered high hopes of success; in a short space of time the Austrian troops were driven from the country, and the nation assuming once more their old right, never relinquished, of choosing a ruler, a parliament met at Prague to elect a king of Bohemia. The votes fell upon the elector palatine, Frederick V., son-in-law of King James, the choice being due mainly to the fact of his connection with Protestant England, from which moral aid no less than physical assistance was expected. Frederick V. hesitated for a while to accept the dangerous crown offered to him, feeling instinctively that his head was not strong enough to bear it; but his wife, ambitious, energetic, and zealously Protestant, managed to overcome all his scruples; and being led by her to the Bohemian capital, he was solemnly crowned king on the 4th November, 1619. The news of the event created great stir all over England and Scotland, which was increased to an extraordinary degree by the reports following in the wake of it. With the election of Frederick V. to the crown of Bohemia, the signal was given for the commencement of the long threatening battle between the Roman Catholics and the reformers of Germany; and while the princes of the Protestant Union on the one hand took up arms for the new king, the Kaiser on the other side launched the ban of the empire against him, confiscated his hereditary estates on the Rhine in favour of the duke of Bavaria, head of the Catholic League, and called in a Spanish army to take possession of them. Thirty thousand Spaniards, under the marquis of Spinola, ablest commander of Philip III., at once advanced from Hainault and Luxemburg into the palatinate, and seizing the country, almost without resistance, commenced a frightful persecution, burning and slaying Protestants without regard to age or sex, not sparing even infants at the breast of the mother. The massacres of the French St. Bartholomew, and the horrors perpetrated by Alva and his Council of Blood in the Netherlands, were once more re-enacted among the peaceful and industrial people on the banks of the upper Rhine.

On the report of the new carnage, committed by priests and their tools, reaching England, the most intense excitement arose instantly among all classes of the population. That Protestants of a kindred race should be foully butchered by Romish fanatics was in itself enough to rouse the spirit of all the reformers of England and Scotland; but the feeling was made more vehement by personal sympathy with the ruler of the palatinate, and his spouse, princess, and now Queen Elizabeth, the latter enjoying a large amount of popularity, on account of the amiability of her manners, as well as her known attachment to the Protestant faith. Soon after the arrival of the sad news, addresses and petitions came pouring in from all parts of the country calling upon the government to aid the Protestants on the Rhine by sending out an army; traders, merchants, landowners, students, and professors, offered to go out as volunteers; and the archbishop of Canterbury himself addressed a public letter to Sir Robert Naunton, secretary of state—successor of Sir Ralph Winwood, who had died the year previous—advocating war. "I am satisfied in my conscience," the primate wrote, "that the cause is just, wherefore they [the Bohemians] have rejected that proud and bloody man [the Austrian ruler], and when God hath set up the prince that is chosen to be a mark through all Christendom, to propagate his gospel, and to protect the oppressed, I dare not, for my part, give advice but to follow where God leads." To impress the king, to whom the letter was in reality directed, Archbishop Abbot then went on to give theological reasons for entering upon war, by quoting and explaining for the purpose the seventeenth chapter of Revelation, "The Beast that thou sawest was and is not, and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the Beast that was, and is not, and yet is." The reference to the Apocalypse was not without effect upon the king, he himself having expounded the Beast, and given his decision that it meant the bishop of Rome, and that popery was the Babylonish harlot; nevertheless, though agreeing in the main with the archbishop, he hesitated to follow his advice upon two, to him, very important grounds. The first was that any aid given to the Protestants of Germany would be certain to make an end of his darling project to marry Prince Charles to a Spanish infanta, with mountains of gold; and the second, equally momentous, that by an open alliance with his ambitious son-in-law he would overthrow at a stroke his constantly asserted dogma of the divine right of kings. It was not only incompatible with this grand tenet to countenance the Bohemians in deposing, upon any plea or pretext, the sovereign who had once occupied their throne, and electing another at their own pleasure, but James had laid it down repeatedly that there was an implicit tie among princes, which must withhold them from ever countenancing such practices against each other. However, the high theories of the king soon began to be heavily shaken by the storm of popular excitement that kept rising against them from all parts of the country; and after a few months of painful vacillation, James found himself compelled to give way to the war cry, so far as to allow about two thousand English and Scotch volunteers, under the young earls of Oxford and Essex, who bore a large part of the expenditure of the undertaking, to start for Germany. At the same time, he tried to redeem his fault in the eyes of the Spanish ambassador by protesting that he was acting under compulsion, making use of the greatest duplicity to obtain his end. To the envoys from Germany and Bohemia, who had arrived soon after the election of Frederick V. to solicit his aid, James told, with tearful eyes, that he would do everything in his power to assist his dear son and the true faith, while he assured Count Gondomar, immediately after, that his son-in-law was a villain and a usurper, and that nothing should be wanting on his own part to effect his ruin. As far as he was able, his majesty kept both promises.

The two thousand volunteers hurrying to the Rhine to assist their Protestant brethren, achieved nothing, their numerical weakness being assisted not even by the moral power of coming forward as the representatives of England and Scotland. While they were fighting, James went begging to the enemy, despatching a special ambassador, Viscount Doncaster, to the Kaiser, Ferdinand II., with instructions to intercede in favour of his misguided subjects, not soliciting justice but pardon. Ferdinand, with well-merited contempt, treated the English envoy like an impostor, refusing at first altogether to see him, and though promising it afterwards, not admitting him to audience till after long delay, the viscount during the interval following on the heels of his imperial majesty in many travels and progresses with dog-like attachment. In the mean time, James continuing in his supplicating attitude, while the volunteers whom he had started were being massacred by Spinola, the fate of Bohemia was decided in another direction. Frederick V. had shown from the first moment of his occupation of the new throne that he was not the man to hold it, for instead of organizing a firm government, and welding the host of his warlike subjects, full of ardour, and brave like lions, but without discipline, into a strong army, fit to withstand the inevitable shock of the advancing Austrian troops and the battalions of the Catholic League, he behaved as if the kingdom into which he had come was the garden of Eden, existing in blissful ignorance of the clang of swords and rattle of muskets. He got up magnificent processions and splendid banquets, rearranged the library in the Hradschin, and formed a picture gallery; but while thus fostering high art, fifty thousand Austrians and Bavarians came pouring in over the mountain ranges on the south and west, disputing his crown and his life. It was only when hearing that the enemy was advancing in rapid marches upon Prague that he gathered some troops around him to defend the kingdom; however, it was too late, and before even his hasty preparations had been accomplished, the enemy was standing under the walls of the capital. There were not more than twenty thousand Protestants under arms to oppose the approach of the Austrians and Bavarians, who, besides the power of numbers, possessed that of a most skilful commander-in-chief, in the person of John Tserclas, count of Tilly, descendant of a noble Dutch family, educated in diplomacy by the Jesuits, and in the art of war by Alva. Pushing forward in long strides towards the Bohemian capital, disregarding the native guerilla forces hovering about him, and bent only upon getting a grip at the head of his foe, Tilly reached it early in the morning of the 8th of November, 1620, and at once proceeded to attack the troops of Frederick. The latter, commanded by Prince Christian of Anhalt, a general possessed of much talent, though wanting in energy, had taken up a very strong position on the top of the White Mountain, a steep eminence adjoining the city and surrounded by earthworks. There was some hesitation visible in the ranks of Tilly's soldiers on being bidden to climb upward on the White Mountain, right into the mouth of the cannon spitting volumes of fire and flame; but a word from the commander restored their courage. "Sons of the church," he cried, "the Lord has given the foe into our hands: onward!" At the first onset, the Catholics were driven back; then Tilly himself gathered a body of veterans, and sword in hand stormed up the hill. In the course of less than an hour all was over, Prague conquered, and the cause of Protestantism annihilated in Bohemia. The son-in-law of King James was sitting at dinner while the battle of the White Mountain was being fought; but he had curiosity enough to leave his meal and get upon the high city wall adjoining the royal palace, to see how matters went. Observing the advance of Tilly and the massacre of his own troops, he got down again from the wall, packed up his valuables, and left the capital, while Bothlen Gabor, with ten thousand Hungarians, was coming to his aid, and had arrived within a day's march of Prague. Curses and taunts followed in the wake of the flying sovereign, whose reign had not endured a twelvemonth; and to his life and memory claiming the title which the Germans gave him, of "Der Winterkönig," the winter-king.

The battle of the White Mountain—commencement of the most horrible series of carnages ever perpetrated by men professing themselves Christians, distinguished in history as the Thirty Years' War—was followed by important consequences in England, no less than in Germany. After years of gloomy wrath at the corruption, weakness, and imbecility of the government, the patience of the people gave way at last, and, blind as he was in his conceit, James himself began to see the necessity of a change. It made itself felt most strongly, as far as he was concerned, in the utter inability of raising money by whatever means; the labouring classes openly refused to pay the illegal imposts any longer; the merchants declined to grant any more loans to the royal exchequer; and the landowners and wealthy citizens would purchase no more titles, or buy places and situations under the crown for their friends and relatives. Even the Hebrew bankers of Amsterdam and Augsburg, who lent money to Christian kings at twenty-five per cent., dismissed the offers of James for further transactions, the rumour of an impending revolution in England having spread all over the Continent, and his tenancy of the throne being deemed so precarious as not to be able to be discounted at the Exchange. Nothing therefore remained but to invoke the aid of parliament once more; and Buckingham, as distressed for money as the king, having given his consent, the summonses for another meeting of the representatives of the nation, after a lapse of ten years, were issued towards the end of 1620. To dispose the commons to enter more readily upon the supply of his wants, James made it publicly known that he intended to assist the Protestants of Germany, going so far as to declare the same in his proclamation for the meeting of parliament. "Although the making of war or peace," his majesty declared, with mingled pride and condescension, "be a secret of empire, and a thing properly belonging to our high prerogative and royal and imperial power, yet nevertheless, in causes of that nature which we shall think fit not to receive but to communicate, we shall ever think ourselves much assisted and strengthened by the faithful advice and general assent of our loving subjects. Moreover, no man is so ignorant as to expect that we should any ways be able—moneys being the great sinews of war—to enter into the lists against so great potentates without some large and bountiful help of treasure from our people, as well towards the maintenance of war as towards the relief of our crown and estate." The proclamation was not ill received, the promise of war apparently throwing into the background for the moment all other feelings of opposition to the government; and parliament had no sooner met, on the 30th of January, 1621, when the demand for money was at once taken into consideration. After some short but unusually sharp debates, it was resolved, on the 15th of February, to grant his majesty two subsidies, the ready vote of which pleased James so much that he returned exuberant thanks, telling the commons that though the supply was small he preferred it to millions, as being freely and lovingly given, adding that he in return would show his affection by respecting freedom of speech in parliament. The words showed that James as yet understood very little the temper either of the people or of the House of Commons. With the latter, the time was past for higgling about money matters; it was a feeling, not of weakness, but of never-known strength, relying upon the outspoken national will, which made them throw the subsidies at the feet of the king. This done, the commons felt their arms freer for the struggle; they wanted not his majesty's consent for freedom of speech, but were quite prepared to assert the right for themselves.

It was only a few days after the grant of his supply that James discovered the true spirit of the representatives of the people. Without the least hesitation, and acting as if the sacred veil surrounding the throne had all at once been torn into shreds, the commons set to reform the terrible abuses under which the country suffered, evidently determined to look no more to the king and his favourites, but to take the government of the realm into their own hands, until the time that order and legality should have taken the place of anarchy and corruption. The reform movement commenced with an onslaught upon the chief instruments used by the court in exacting oppressive imposts, in the shape of patents and monopolies; and two creatures of Buckingham, Sir Giles Mompesson and Sir Francis Michell, both local magistrates, or "basket justices," as the people called them, for keeping ever-open boxes for the receipt of bribes, were singled out for the first attack. It was so energetic as to paralyze all resistance; neither the king nor Buckingham had courage enough to shield their tools: and while Michell, upon a vote of the House of Commons, was dragged to the Tower, Mompesson, to escape a similar fate, fled from the country. Victorious in the first assault, the commons now began to fly at higher game, and the terrible word "impeachment" began to resound for the first time among them. Hitherto, they had acted without the assistance of the chamber of the lords, which in all previous sessions had shown itself the dumb servant of the crown; the times, however, were so far altered that the peers themselves were now compelled to obey the national mandate, and on the invitation of the members of the lower house they promptly joined in the attack on James's government. It was decided that the commons should act as public prosecutors, and the lords as judges; and a committee for the purpose having been formed on the 12th of March, with Sir Robert Philips, a distinguished lawyer, as chairman, the lower house commenced proceedings with great activity. Mompesson and Michell, the "basket justices," having been condemned to imprisonment and heavy fines, Sir John Bennet, judge of the Prerogative court, was impeached next for corruption in his office, and found guilty and sentenced accordingly. Doctor Field, bishop of Landaff, was next impeached for being concerned in a matter of bribery in the Chancery court, and he also having been convicted, Sir Henry Yelverton, the king's attorney-general, was brought to the bar of the House of Lords on the accusation of having drawn out patents for monopolies, contrary to common law and the enactments of parliament. His defence was that he had been forced by Buckingham to commit the deeds with which he was charged, and that he supposed he was acting under direct orders from the king; but the plea availed him nothing, and he was sentenced to be imprisoned, and to pay a fine of fifteen thousand pounds. There was a moment's pause after the conviction of the attorney-general; it was as if the two houses were drawing breath for a greater effort than any yet accomplished. Determined to "strike high" at last, the commons struck at the head of the administration, the ablest brain in all England, and the most dangerous tool, therefore, of a worthless despotism. On the 20th of March, Sir Robert Philips, in the name of the committee over which he was presiding, recommended proceedings to be taken against the lord chancellor, Sir Francis Bacon, elevated two months previously to the dignity of Viscount St. Albans. It was not lightly the impeachment was made against the greatest of living Englishmen; "a man endued with all parts both of nature and art," Sir Robert Philips remarked, with grave mournfulness, "as that I will say no more of him, being not able to say enough."

The impeachment of Bacon fell startling upon the ear of James, and still more upon Buckingham, fully able to appreciate the value of the magnificent instrument which he had raised, and which was upholding his own power. However, as gratitude and the desire of mutual obligation were things unknown to the nature of the favourite, he made no efforts to save his great adherent, his only desire being to save himself. All that he did was to present to the lords a letter from the chancellor, in which the latter petitioned that the house would "maintain him in its good opinion without prejudice till his cause was heard," as well as allow him convenient time to make his defence, with the assistance of counsel, and the privilege of excepting against and cross-examining the witnesses of the prosecution. The peers returned a courteous and favourable reply to these demands, expressing a hope that he would succeed in clearing his honour, but begging that he would lose no time in preparing his defence. To facilitate it, parliament was prorogued from the 27th of March to the 18th of April, Buckingham advising the step a little out of regard for Bacon, and a great deal for his own advantage. Resolved not to be dragged down with the chancellor, but to sacrifice him without delay, the favourite had been looking about for a successor fit to take his place, and thought he had found the latter in John Williams, dean of Westminster, and former chaplain to Lord Ellesmere, Bacon's predecessor on the woolsack. The dean, a native of Aberconway, Carnarvonshire, born in 1582, had already been employed in various services by Buckingham, who found his keen, clear intellect of the greatest use; and with the danger of the chancellor's impeachment coming upon him, he at once hurried to Williams for advice. The counsel was given, without loss of time, and was so remarkable as deeply to impress the favourite. "Your lordship," said the dean, in a written communication, "is jealous, if the parliament continue in this vigour, of your own safety, or at least of your reputation, lest your name should be used and be brought to the bandy. Then follow this parliament in their undertakings, and you may prevent it: swim with the tide, and you cannot be drowned. They will seek your favour, if you do not start from them, to help them to settle the public frame as they are contriving it. Trust to me and your other servants, that have some credit with the most active members, to keep you clear from the strife of tongues. But if you assist to break up this parliament, being now in pursuit of justice, only to save some cormorants, who have devoured that which must be regorged, you will pluck up a sluice which will overwhelm yourself and others. The king will find it a great disservice before one year expire: the storm will gather, and burst out into a greater tempest, in all subsequent meetings. Do not delay one day before you give your brother, Sir Edward, a commission for an embassy to some of the princes of Germany, or the Netherlands, and despatch him over the sea before he be missed. Those empty fellows, Sir Giles Mompesson, Sir Francis Michell, and others, let them be made victims to the public wrath. Nay, my sentence is, cast all monopolies and patents of griping projections into the dead sea after them. I have searched the signet office, and have collected almost forty, which I have hung in one bracelet, fit for revocation. Damn all these by one proclamation, that the world may see that the king, who is the pilot that sits at the helm, is ready to play the pump, to eject such filth as grew noisome in the nostrils of his people. And your lordship must needs partake in the applause." Small as were his brains, Buckingham could not fail seeing that here was a dean cut out to be a prime minister.

So much was the favourite struck with the advice of his correspondent, that he sought him, took him by the hand, and instantly carried him before the king. They found his majesty, as related by John Hacket, friend and biographer of Williams, "accompanied in his chamber by the prince [of Wales], and in serious discourse together upon the same perplexities." Buckingham having read aloud the paper of his companion to James, the latter commended it, as containing thoughts originally sprung from himself; "and whatsoever seemed contentious or doubtful to the king's piercing wit, the dean improved it to the greater liking by the solidity of his answers." "Whereupon," says John Hacket, continuing his relation, "the king resolved to keep close to every syllable of those directions. Out of this bud the dean's advancement very shortly spread out into a blown flower. For the king, upon this trial of his wisdom, either called for him, or called for his judgment in writing, in all that he deliberated to act or permit in this session of parliament, in his most private and close consultations." Immediately after the recess, the impeachment of the chancellor was brought before the lords; there were twenty-eight separate charges of bribery and corruption laid against him, all so well substantiated that a defence seemed nearly impossible. Bacon felt it, and aware that his only hope to maintain himself was in a dissolution of parliament and another trial of regal despotism on a firmer basis than before, which vanished with the acceptance of Dean Williams' policy to "swim with the tide," he made his submission at once, confessing his guilt in terms as eloquent as abject. In a paper which the prince of Wales delivered to the peers on the 24th of April, he told his judges, in "words that come from wasted spirits and an oppressed mind," that his misdeeds were great, and that he had "one only justification out of the justification of Job," in the phrase of the man in the land of Uz, "I have not hid my sins as did Adam, nor concealed my faults in my bosom." The lord chancellor continued, "It resteth therefore that, without fig leaves, I do ingenuously confess and acknowledge that having understood the particulars of the charge, not formally from the house, but enough to inform my conscience and my memory, I find matters sufficient and full to move me to desert my defence and to ask your lordships to condemn and censure me." After entering upon many pleas of extenuation, founded chiefly upon the mean defence that if he was guilty, others were guiltier, and that he had been corrupt only because the pestilence of corruption had spread far and wide, he concluded his confession by laying down the judgment which he thought would meet his case. "Let my penitent submission be my sentence," he exclaimed, "and the loss of the seal be my punishment; and I pray that your lordships will spare any further sentence, but recommend me to his majesty's grace and pardon for all that is past." Having fallen so deep in his own abjectness, most of the lords and commons felt inclined to accede to the request and spare the great man, whom they had treated throughout with unusual deference, the marvellous qualities of his intellect enforcing upon them a respect which they could not feel for his actions. But it was now the turn of the king and Buckingham to plead for severity. Having learnt the advice of Dean Williams by heart, James had left the helm, and commenced "to play the pump;" and to show his zeal in the new vocation in which he had started, he deemed it incumbent upon him to pour off the best of his own partisans as first "victims to the public wrath."

The reading of Bacon's appeal and confession profoundly moved the House of Lords; but on the instigation of some of Buckingham's friends, it was resolved nevertheless that the submission was not sufficient, inasmuch as he had acknowledged no particular offences, and attempted moreover to qualify his guilt by entering upon pleas of extenuation. It was decided therefore to send to the chancellor the details of the accusation framed by the committee of the lower house, and to request him to give an explicit answer to each. Bacon complied with the demand so far as to admit unreservedly the greater number of the twenty-eight charges brought against him, qualifying the rest, but giving a direct denial to none. The new confession having been read before the peers, they declared themselves satisfied, whereupon commissioners were despatched to the chancellor, who had taken to his bed, labouring under real or feigned illness, to inquire whether the paper was under his own hand, and whether he would stand to it. "My lords," he cried, piteously, "it is my act, my hand, my heart: I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed." The great seal was then delivered by Bacon; and the next day, on the demand of the speaker of the House of Commons, the peers pronounced judgment. It consisted of four articles:

"That the Lord Viscount St. Albans, lord chancellor of England, shall undergo fine and ransom of forty thousand pounds; that he shall be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure; that he shall be for ever incapable of any office, place, or employment, in the state or commonwealth; that he shall never sit in parliament, nor come within twelve miles of the court." The sentence was not carried out in its severity, for the fine was immediately remitted by the king, who seemed to feel a sense of shame creeping over him for the part he was playing, and the imprisonment in the Tower only lasted two days, at the end of which Bacon retired to his estate of Gorhambury, near St. Albans. It would have well become the great thinker to spend here in rest and retirement the rest of his days, devoted to study and the outpouring of his mighty genius; yet the corrupting influences of the court of James held him too deeply in their fangs to allow such quiet and noble existence, which might have reconciled the world to him, and him to the world. Instead of leading a philosopher's life in his beautiful retreat, an earthly paradise, where faithful friends and admirers were not wanting, Bacon kept hankering after place, money, honours, and dignities, debasing his great mind by sending the most abject letters to the king. "Help me, dear sovereign, lord and master," one of them ran, "and pity me so far as I, that have borne a bag, be not now in my age forced to bear a wallet; nor I that desire to live to study, may not be driven to study to live." And in another petition, "That, which I thirst after as the hart after the stream, is that I may know by my matchless friend [Buckingham] that presenteth to you this letter your majesty's heart, which is an abyssus of goodness, as I am an abyssus of misery. I have been over your man, and counted myself but an usufructuary of myself, the property being yours. Now, making myself an oblation, do with me as may best conduce to the honour of your justice, the honour of your mercy, and the use of your service, I resting as clay in your majesty's gracious hands." Fortunately for the last renown of the great man, neither the "dear sovereign lord," nor "the matchless friend" attended to his supplications; and he was suffered to die in peace, five years after, leaving, as stated in his will, his name and memory "to the judgment of charitable men, to foreign nations, and to future ages."

The resolute energy with which parliament set to work in overthrowing his corrupt administration, made such an impression upon the weak and deceitful mind of James that he abandoned for the moment, or professed to abandon, all his high notions of royal prerogative, exhibiting the greatest eagerness to adopt reforms, and to cast abuses, as Dean Williams had recommended, into "the dead sea." In a visit made to the House of Lords, he gave vent to an extraordinary speech, remarkable alike for its humble and almost penitential tone, as for its indecorous reference to the credit of his minion. After applauding the efforts made by both houses to eradicate the corruption which he had sown, and continued sowing, he exclaimed, "I do assure you had these things been complained of to me before the meeting of parliament, I would have done the office of a just king, and out of parliament would have punished them as severely, and peradventure more than ye intend to do. But now that they are discovered to me in parliament I shall be as ready in this way as I should have been in the other; for I confess I am ashamed, these things proving so as they are reported to be, that it was not my good fortune to be the only author of the reformation and punishment of them by some of the ordinary courts of justice. Nevertheless, I will be never a whit the slower to do my part for the execution. So precious unto me is the public good, that no private person whatsoever, were he never so dear unto me, shall be respected by me, by many degrees, as the public good." His majesty then launched forth in praise of his minion: "One that sits there," he said, pointing at him, "who hath been ready upon all occasions with good offices, both for the house in general, and every member in particular." "The virtue, it appears, had its own reward; "for I remember," James continued, "that since the beginning of this parliament, Buckingham hath told me he never found such quiet and rest as in this time from projectors and informers, who at other times miserably vexed him at all hours." Then came a curious passage. "And now," concluded the king, "I confess that when I looked before upon the face of the government, I thought, as every man would have done, that the people were never so happy as in my time; for even as at divers times I have looked upon many of my coppices, riding about them, and they appeared to me on the outside very thick and well grown, but when I turned into the midst of them, I found them all bitten within, and full of blains and bare spots. Even so this kingdom, the external government being as good as ever it was, and having as learned judges as ever it had, and for peace both abroad and at home, I may truly say, being more settled and longer lasting than ever before, together with as great plenty as ever, so it was to be thought that every man might sit in safety under his own fig and vine tree: yet am I ashamed, and it makes my hair stand upright to consider, how in this time my people have been vexed and polled by the vile execution of projects, patents, bills of conformity, and such like, which, besides the trouble of my people, have more exhausted their purses than subsidies would have done." These were fine words, if sincere; yet not a man who heard them believed, or could believe, in their sincerity.

It was soon discovered what objects James had in view in playing the penitent. Not many days had elapsed after making his "wooing speech," as sarcastic members of the lower house called the "hair stand upright" oration, when he went to the lords to deliver a second address, the commons being invited as before to give their attendance. Commencing with loud praise of the zeal of both houses for the redress of grievances, the king soon went to the main topic, which consisted in nothing less than the demand for a fresh supply. He explained that the amount of the two subsidies granted some months before, at the commencement of the session, and which he once more thankfully acknowledged, had been already expended, the greater portion of it in succours to the princes of the Protestant Union, and to his daughter and her family, now refugees in Holland. It was owing to his unwearied efforts, he said, that a momentary truce had been concluded between the contending parties in Germany, which might end in a peace, to which his own negotiations were tending; but that nevertheless if war should break out again, he was prepared to support the Protestant cause by force of arms. But neither his negotiations, nor the levy of an army, could be carried on without a new liberal supply, for the grant of which he pressed in the most urgent manner, adding a solemn protestation that he would not dissolve parliament till all the matters in hand, including the reform of the administration, had been satisfactorily settled. It was with natural incredulity that the two houses listened to the splendid promises and engagements of the king, it being generally known that he was doing nothing whatever for the Protestant cause he professed to have so much at heart, but that, on the contrary, the most welcome visitor at court was the count de Gondomar, whose negotiations for the marriage of the infant to the prince of Wales, and an intimate political alliance between Spain and England, were carried on with the greatest activity. Under these circumstances, the commons refused to grant any further subsidies unless some actual proofs, more than words, had been given, that the foreign Protestants should receive the hearty assistance of the government; and as these were not forthcoming, they set again to work in the reform of abuses, entrenching daily more upon what James conceived to be his royal prerogative. Their career was suddenly brought to a stop by the king, who, seeing he could get no money, commanded the lord treasurer, on the 4th of June, to adjourn parliament for five months, till the 16th of November. It was in vain the commons protested against this step, arguing that adjournment was not in the option of the sovereign, but of each house in itself, to maintain which position they requested a conference with the peers. However, the lords declined to join in the protest of the lower house, in gratitude for which James paid them a visit, returning thanks in person. The commons thereupon gave way; but before dispersing they made a solemn declaration, which was entered in the journals of the house, of their readiness to spend their lives and fortunes in vindication of the Protestant religion, at home and abroad, "as that, by the divine help of Almighty God, which is never wanting to those who in His fear shall undertake the defence of His cause," the nation "may be able to do that by the sword which by a peaceable course cannot be effected." The solemn pledge "was sounded forth with the voices of them all, withal lifting up their hats in their hands as high as they could hold them, as a visible testimony of their unanimous consent, in such sort that the like had scarce ever been seen in parliament."

During the prorogation of parliament, the king filled the high post which Bacon had vacated, giving the great seal to the shrewd adviser introduced to his notice by Buckingham, Dean Williams. The appointment created great dissatisfaction, both as being due to the influence of the favourite, and as falling upon a clergyman, who seemed unfitted by habit and training to all the first judicial office in the realm. To allay the excitement, Dean Williams had the wisdom of proposing to the king that he should hold the post in the first instance on probation for a year and a half, during which time he should be regarded only as a commissioner, with two judges at his side as assessors, to guide his decisions, stipulating moreover not to take the title of chancellor, but the more ancient one of lord keeper. This having been assented to, the displeasure of all, except the lawyers, who for a term refused to plead before their chosen head, subsided, and the new lord keeper had the satisfaction of opening parliament, on the appointed day in November, in the name of the king, for whose absence illness was made the excuse. He began by stating that his majesty during the recess had embarked in the greatest efforts towards assisting the oppressed Protestants of Germany; that he had sent "heroically" forty thousand pounds of his own money to keep together a body of troops under Count Mansfield, battling on the Rhine against the armies of the Catholic League; and that he intended to do much more yet, if only obtaining the goodwill of parliament. This meant a supply, the necessity for which the lord keeper demonstrated in eloquent terms, calling for further proofs upon Viscount Doncaster, who had just returned from his continental embassy, and who proceeded now to give a long account of it. The story unfortunately was not one to which Englishmen could listen with much pride. Though embellishing his account as much as possible, and hiding the indignities he had received, the viscount had to report that his mission had not brought the least practical result, the Kaiser having blandly declined to entertain any of his peace proposals, and the duke of Bavaria, whom he had visited subsequently, having treated with something very much resembling ridicule his solicitation to be so kind as to give up the conquered palatinate to its original sovereign. To efface the bad impression made by the relation of the embassy to the Catholic princes of Germany, showing too clearly the contempt into which the government of England had fallen on the Continent, the lord keeper addressed the two houses in another oration, in which he promised, in the name of the king, that active steps should be taken to assist the German reformers, making the whole dependent only upon an immediate vote of supplies. Among the lords the feeling was in favour of the king; but the House of Commons was less than ever in a mood to sanction the policy of James, or put faith in his declarations, and postponing the grant of subsidies, they resolved, in the first instance, to draw up a remonstrance, setting forth the existing grounds of national dissatisfaction, and pointing out the required changes. It was a bold step, and momentous in its consequences, signal and commencement of the great struggle between king and parliament, which involved in its results both the fate of the Stuart sovereigns and the higher destinies of England.

The remonstrance of the commons was divided into two parts, the first enumerating "the causes of the great and growing mischiefs," and the second stating "what be the remedies." The latter clauses necessarily were of most importance, as involving the first attempt of the representatives of the nation to dictate to the crown and to take part in the government of the kingdom, and the direction of its foreign as well as home policy. First among all the "remedies" proposed by the commons was that of declaring war against the great Catholic powers. "That seeing this inevitable necessity is fallen upon your majesty," the remonstrance ran, "which no wisdom or providence of a peaceable and pious king can avoid, your majesty would not omit this just occasion speedily and effectually to take your sword in your hand. That, once undertaken upon so honourable and just grounds, your majesty would resolve to pursue and more publicly avow the aiding of those of our religion in foreign parts, which doubtless would reunite the princes and states of the Union, by those disasters disheartened and disbanded." That your majesty would propose to yourself to manage this war with the best advantage, by a diversion, or otherwise, as in your deep judgment shall be found fittest, and not to rest upon a war in these parts only, but that the bent of the war and the point of your sword may be against that prince, whatsoever opinion of potency he hath, whose armies and treasures have first diverted and since maintained the war in the palatinate." The next recommendation was to break off all negotiations for the marriage of the prince of Wales to the Spanish infanta, in order "that, to frustrate their hopes for a future age, our most noble prince may be timely and happily married to one of our own religion." As to grievances regarding the internal administration of the kingdom, the commons confined themselves to former petitions on the subject, but laying special stress upon the necessity "to put in execution the laws made for preventing of dangers by popish recusants and their wonted evasions," and protesting likewise against the imprisonment of Sir Edwin Sandys, a member of the lower house, who had been put into prison during the recess, though not, as the lord keeper had taken care already to explain, on account of anything said or done in parliament. The remonstrance concluded by an earnest appeal to the king not to overlook it, but to give his full regard to the submissive counsel tendered by his subjects. "This," said the commons, "is the sum and effect of our humble declaration, which we, no ways intending to press upon your majesty's undoubted royal prerogative, do submit with the fulness of our duty and allegiance to your most princely consideration. The glory of God, whose cause it is; the zeal of our true religion, in which we have been born, and wherein by God's grace we are resolved to die; the safety of your majesty's person, who is the very life of your people; the happiness of your children and posterity; and the honour and good of the church and state, dearer unto us than our own lives, have kindled those affections truly devoted to your majesty."

The king's rejoinder to the important document drawn up by the commons was as weak and irrational as it could possibly be. Before even the remonstrance had been delivered to him, he protested against it in the most foolishly arrogant terms, such as could not have any other result than that of fanning resistance to his own policy. The protest of James was in the form of a letter to Sir Thomas Richardson, speaker of the House of Commons, which in itself was a most irregular and indiscreet proceeding. "Mr. Speaker," wrote the king, "we have heard by divers reports to our great grief that our distance from the Houses of Parliament, caused by our indisposition of health, hath emboldened some fiery and popular spirits of some of the House of Commons to argue and debate publicly of matters far above their reach and capacity, tending to our high dishonour and breach of the prerogative royal. These are therefore to command you to make known, in our name, unto the house, that none therein shall presume henceforth to meddle with anything concerning our government, or deep matters of state, and, namely, not to deal with our dearest son's match with the daughter of Spain, nor to touch the honour of that king, or any other of our friends and confederates, and also not to meddle with any man's particulars, which have their due motion in our ordinary courts of justice. And whereas we hear they have sent a message to Sir Edward Sandys, to know the reasons of his late restraint, you shall in our name resolve them that it was not for any misdemeanor of his in parliament; but to put them out of doubt in any question of that nature that may arise among them hereafter, you shall resolve them in our name that we think ourself very free and able to punish any man's misdemeanors in parliament, as well during their sitting as after, which we mean not to spare hereafter, upon any occasion of any man's insolent behaviour there that shall be ministered unto us, and if they have already touched any of these points which we have forbidden, in any petition of theirs which is to be sent unto us, it is our pleasure that you shall tell them, that, except they reform it before it come to our hands, we will not deign the hearing nor answering of it. Dated at Newmarket, the 3rd of December, 1621." The commons listened very quietly to the reading of the strange communication, embodying threats so preposterous as to defeat their own object; nevertheless, though feeling a sort of contempt for the menaces hurled at them by the king, to pass his letter over altogether seemed impossible, and in order to refute the propositions it contained, it was resolved by an immediate vote to frame a reply to it, containing a firm assertion of the rights and privileges of the national representatives. James was working very hard to hammer the soft iron of the House of Commons into hard steel.

The new remonstrance, voted by a very full house, was dignified and vigorous, though still extremely humble in tone. The commons began by professing their sorrow at the displeasure shown by his majesty's letter to the speaker, yet declaring that they take comfort to themselves in the assurance of his grace and goodness, and of their own trust and loyalty, in reliance of which they hope they "may not undeservedly suffer by the misinformation of partial and uncertain reports, which are ever unfaithful intelligencers." They therefore begged his majesty would vouchsafe to understand from themselves, and not from others, what their humble petition and declaration, resolved upon by the universal voice of the house, did contain; they also begged that his majesty would not henceforth give credit to private reports against all or any of the members of the house on whom they themselves should not have inflicted a censure, and that in the meantime they might "stand upright" in his royal judgment. Adverting then to the cause of their assembling in parliament, and to the particulars of information laid before them by the government, the commons declared their being of opinion that they "were called to a war" for the Protestant interest, and against the king of Spain, who had five armies on foot, and was known to have occupied the greater part of the palatinate, and that this subject therefore had been much dwelled upon in their petition and declaration. They added that although they could not conceive that the honour and renown of his majesty and his heirs, the patrimony of his children, invaded and possessed by their enemies, the welfare of religion and the state of the kingdom, were not any time worthy their attention, yet that at this time they were clearly invited to take these matters into their most serious consideration. It was on these considerations they hoped his majesty would now be pleased to receive their humble petition and declaration at the hands of their messengers, and having read it, to give his gracious reply to the chief points, not forgetting the true and weighty interest they felt in his own prosperity and that of the royal family, and the welfare of the state and commonwealth of England. The document wound up by an earnest and emphatic protest. "And whereas your majesty," said the commons, "doth seem to abridge us of the ancient liberty of parliament for freedom of speech, jurisdiction and just liberty of the house, and other proceedings, wherein we trust in God we shall never transgress the bounds of loyal and dutiful subjects—a liberty we assure ourselves so wise and so just a king will not infringe, the same being our ancient and undoubted right, and an inheritance received from our ancestors, without which we cannot freely debate, nor clearly discern of things in question before us, nor truly inform your majesty. We are therefore now again enforced in all humbleness to pray, your majesty to allow the same, and thereby to take away the doubts and scruples your majesty's letter to our speaker has wrought upon us." The remonstrance was voted unanimously, amidst great silence of the commons, all seeming to feel that it was less a time for speeches than for actions.

James was very quick in forwarding a rejoinder, as intemperate in language as his letter to Sir Thomas Richardson, to the new declaration of the lower house of parliament. "It began by a querulous lament of the house always finding fault with his doings, instead of giving him some share of praise for good government, which, his majesty said, he might claim on various accounts, notably for abolishing by proclamation six or seven and thirty patents—out of five hundred he had established. "But not only have we heard no news of all this," James observed, fretfully, "but, on the contrary, great complaints of the danger of religion within this kingdom, tacitly implying our ill government on this point. And we leave you to judge whether it be your duties, that are the representative body of our people, so to distaste them with our government, whereas it should be your duty, with all your endeavours, to kindle more and more a dutiful and thankful love in the people's hearts towards us, for our just and gracious government." With respect to being taxed with trusting uncertain private reports and partial information, his majesty remarked, modestly, "We wish you to remember that we are an old and experienced king, needing no such lessons, being in our conscience freest of any king alive from hearing or believing idle reports," adding that if he had personally received the declaration and petition, instead of admitting its contents indirectly, he could have returned no other reply to the messengers than that the contents were unlawful and unworthy of an answer. "For as to your conclusion thereof," he continued, alluding to the final paragraph of the great remonstrance, "it is nothing but 'protestatio contrario facto,' for in the body of your petition you usurp upon our prerogative royal, and meddle with things far above your reach, and then, in the conclusion, you protest the contrary, as if a robber would take a man's purse and then protest he meant not to rob him." After much more language to the same effect, and taunts of the commons wishing to invest themselves "with all power upon earth, lacking nothing but the pope's to have the keys also both of heaven and purgatory," James went on to blame them severely for daring to touch upon his relations with the Spanish monarch, commenting upon "the particular ejaculations of some foul-mouthed orators against the honour of that king's crown and state," and finally told them, in as plain terms as possible, that their business was to vote supplies, and not interfere with his government, quoting to the effect the Latin proverb, "Let not the shoemaker go beyond his last." The royal epistle concluded with a sentence which, if a little more gracious in tone than the preceding part of the communication, nevertheless embodied an assertion more momentous than any other, backed by a strong threat. "Although we cannot allow," the king exclaimed, "of the style in which ye speak of your ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wished that ye had said that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us, for most of them grow from precedents, which shows rather a toleration than inheritance: yet are we pleased to give you our royal assurance that as long as you contain yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties and privileges as ever any of our predecessors were, nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative. But your house shall have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown, the contrary of which would enforce us, or any just king, to retrench them of their privileges that would pare his prerogative and flowers of the crown." It was impossible for James to express more undisguisedly his absolutistic notions, including the theory that parliament existed only upon sufferance, or what he might consider good behaviour, and accordingly his words brought the all-significant controversy to a crisis. The visors had fallen from the faces of both the combatants in the great duel, and it remained to be seen who first would draw the sword.

taking up the challenge hurled at them from the throne. James, foreseeing to some extent the effect of his letter, accompanied it by an order of prorogation of parliament, which was communicated by the prince of Wales to the clerk of the lower house. But the artifice had no effect in subduing, or even postponing, the eagerness of the representatives of the nation to rush into battle for their good cause; and before separating, the same day on which the royal message and notice of prorogation had been received, the 18th of December, 1621, they made reply to it in a new remonstrance, more striking, and more important than any of the previous documents. After a long and spirited debate, which lasted till six o'clock at night, the discussion being continued, almost for the first time in parliamentary history, by candle-light, a solemn vindication of national rights, and protest against royal despotism, was framed and adopted, with a resolution that it should be entered upon the journals of the house. "The commons now assembled in parliament," the declaration ran, "being justly occasioned therunto, concerning sundry liberties, franchises, and privileges of parliament, amongst others here mentioned, do make this protestation following. That the liberties, franchises, and jurisdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England; that the urgent and arduous affairs concerning the king, state, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England, and the maintenance and making of laws, and redress of mischiefs and grievances, which daily happen within the realm, are proper subjects and matter of council and debate in parliament; that in the handling and proceeding of those businesses, every member of the house of parliament hath, and of right ought to have, freedom of speech to propound, treat, reason, and bring to conclusion the same; that the commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of these matters, in such order as in their judgment shall seem fittest; and that every member of the said house hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation, other than by censure of the house itself, for or concerning any speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament or parliament-business. And that if any of the said members be complained of and questioned for anything done or said in parliament, the same is to be shown to the king by the advice and assent of all the commons assembled in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information." The great protest having been entered "as of record," the speaker told the house that they stood prorogued for two months, till February, 1622; upon which the members quietly dispersed, conscious of having entered upon a course ending either in ruin to themselves, as individuals, or a bright and glorious prospect of freedom for the nation.

The wrath of James on hearing of the proceeding of the commons was unbounded; throwing off his habitual timidity, and forgetting that he was very ill, or at least reported to be so, he hurriedly quitted Newmarket, "slavoring at the mouth," rode to London, and called the privy councillors, together with six of the judges, around him at Whitehall. This done, he had the clerk of the House of Commons brought up, and commanding him to produce the journals, he with his own hand erased the parliamentary declaration of independence, giving at the same time an order that his valorous deed should be registered by a special act in the archives of the privy council. After this exhibition of temper, and specific announcement of the royal will, the reassembling of parliament was out of the question; and on the 6th of January, 1622, the king dissolved it by an offensive proclamation, assigning as motive of the measure the inordinate liberty assumed by some members of the lower house, "evil-tempered spirits who sowed tares among the corn." The proclamation wound up with the gracious assurance of his majesty that he intended to govern well, and might feel inclined, at some future period, to summon another parliament. James's new plan of governing well was unfolded within a few days by a step of the most arbitrary kind, the imprisonment and persecution of the leading members of the House of Commons, who had taken part in drawing up the petitions and remonstrances. Two of those, Sir Robert Philips, and Sir Edward Coke, the great lawyer, were sent to the Tower; three more, John Pym, Thomas Malleny, and John Selden, were confined in other prisons; and five others, Sir Thomas Crew, Sir James Perrot, Sir Dudley Digges, Sir Edwin Sandys, and Sir Nathaniel Rich, were banished to Ireland, under the pretext of executing a royal commission. The ire of James fell most heavily upon Coke, although his participation in asserting the rights of parliament had been of the most moderate kind, confining itself to the strictly legal aspect of the great question under debate. But neither his extreme obsequiousness to the court, shown on every occasion, nor the important and to him degrading services he had rendered to the crown in former times, could save him from the vengeance which the king, in the flush of his new excitement, determined to shower upon all the opponents of his cherished prerogative; and the ex-lord chief justice having been put into close confinement in the Tower, his papers were seized, his house was locked up, his property confiscated, and he was struck off the list of privy councillors, upon which he had got, after his first disgrace, at such a heavy expense, by selling his daughter to the brother of the minion. To complete his ruin, James ordered that Coke should be sued for a large debt which, it was pretended, was due from Sir Will'm Hatton, the first husband of his wife, to Queen Elizabeth, and a suit was instituted to the effect in the court of King's Bench. However, the royal vengeance broke down signally on this point, for at the trial the verdict went against the king, the opinion of the crown lawyers themselves being at the side of the persecuted chief justice, the attorney-general exclaiming, when a brief was handed to him in the case, "Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth whenever I open it against Sir Edward Coke." That men like Coke, grown grey as slaves of despotism, and insatiable of honours and dignities which the court could bestow, should arrive to be ranked as enemies of the throne, and become martyrs in the popular cause, was of all others the most striking proof that the whole nation was rising in firm opposi-

The dissolution of parliament having destroyed all further chance of getting his ever-augmenting necessities supplied in a legal manner, James had once more recourse to what were termed, in bitter humour, benevolences. They grew more and more into undisguised robberies, the choice being left to all men known to be possessed of some wealth, either to pay the sums fixed upon by the king's agents, or to suffer for a refusal by imprisonment, or any other of the many means of retaliation within the power of an arbitrary government—a government, too, getting careless even of the appearance of illegality, utter corruption having destroyed all sense of shame. To accelerate the tardy flow of money into the royal exchequer, the privy council, in the summer of 1622, directed circular letters to the judges, to the high sheriffs, the mayors, bailiffs, and justices of peace all over the country, dwelling upon the grievous wants of the treasury, and urging all functionaries to subscribe liberally themselves, as well as to urge every person within their sphere of influence to do so, concluding with the injunction that if any individuals should "out of obstinacy or disaffection, refuse to contribute herein proportionately to their estate and means," their names should be sent to the government for further orders. The resistance which these measures of oppression and barefaced spoliation naturally encountered among the people, was met with on the part of the government by an organised system of terrorism. Together with the letters of the privy council, the king, according to Roger Coke, grandson of Sir Edward, "ordered the judges on the circuits to make it an article in their charges, that his majesty, taking notice of the people's liberal speaking of matters far above their reach, and also of their licentious and undutiful speeches touching state and government, notwithstanding several proclamations to the contrary, was resolved no longer to pass it without the severest punishment, and they were to proceed to do exemplary justice where they should find any such offenders." While thus oppressing his subjects, driving them to the verge of rebellion, James continued in active negotiations with the Spanish court for the marriage of the prince of Wales with the infanta, his poverty, and the hopelessness of obtaining parliamentary subsidies, making him more anxious than ever to lay hold of the golden stream expected from the connection with the owners of the treasure-laden Indies. To lead him on and dazzle him with false hopes as long as possible, Count Gondomar, who continued representing the court of Madrid in England, raised his demands higher and higher, inducing the king to make all sorts of concessions to the Roman Catholics, in view of a princess of their faith coming into the country. At his instigation and that of Buckingham, who had long been in Spanish pay, the king gave orders, a few months after the dissolution of parliament, to liberate all Catholics confined on account of religion. "I am to give you to understand from his majesty," the lord keeper signified to the judges and sheriffs, "how his royal pleasure is that upon receipt of these writs you shall make no niceness or difficulty to extend his princely pardon to all such papists as you shall find prisoners in the gaols for any church recusancy whatsoever, or refusing the oath of supremacy, or dispersing popish books, or hearing or saying of mass, or any other point of recusancy which doth touch or concern religion only and not matters of state." The decree, one of the most commendable ever issued by James, gave rise to infinite indignation all through the kingdom, the cry being that the papists were getting the upper hand, and would end by massacring their old opponents, and for a time, the resentment of the people made them forget all other causes of dissatisfaction, even the financial extortions. As yet, the flower of tolerance had not sprung up on the soil of Britain, and zealous Protestants would have been content even to suffer despotism, provided its iron heel was firmly planted on the neck of their religious foes.

National excitement about the Spanish match, and the leaning of the king towards Roman Catholicism, culminated early in the year 1623, in consequence of an incident of a somewhat fantastic kind, which created an extraordinary stir among all classes of the population. The news suddenly flew about that the prince of Wales, accompanied and guided by Buckingham, had set out on a secret and mysterious journey to Madrid, with the object of wooing the long-negotiated infanta in person, making the acquaintance of her family, and forming an intimate alliance between the courts and governments of England and Spain. The report was perfectly true, and the details of the whole affair, highly characteristic of the condition into which the court of England had drifted, were well made to excite public curiosity. Ever since the rise of Buckingham into royal favour, he had been trying to secure the attachment of the heir apparent, as well as the king; with respect to Prince Henry, he had tried in vain, but after his death he had been somewhat more successful with Prince Charles, although it was reported that at times there existed a certain coolness between them. Charles, born in 1600, was now growing into manhood; and the king, though not more than fifty-six, was getting visibly enfeebled, physically and mentally, leading all courtiers to begin worshipping the rising sun, and to attempt to catch some of his rays. To Buckingham, now in the zenith of his power and glory, the worship was an all-absorbing necessity. As far as James was concerned, he could expect no more favours, having obtained already every gift in the power of the king to bestow; nothing was ever denied him, and there was apparently nothing which he scrupled to ask. The doting king was even contented to live himself in want and poverty that he might shower riches with a more lavish hand on his minion; and sublime as were his theories of the majesty of a heaven-ordained sovereign, he was willing in practice to submit almost blindly to the will and pleasure of the fatuitous and capricious favourite, bearing it meekly if, as often happened, the latter did not observe towards him even the common decencies of outward respect. That his power would continue as long as James's life lasted, Buckingham felt no doubt, being conscious that the mere force of habit was adding every day to the mastery he had established over the imbecile old monarch. But his life once run out, there was not a minute's security of power, and terrible, indeed, would be the fall from the dazzling height to which he had risen, should the new king frown upon him, instead of smile. The very possibility of it was death to a man in Buckingham's position; and to give the host of bitter foes, whom envy and dislike had raised around him, no chance of expecting it, he had tried hard for a long time to ingratiate himself in the affections of Prince Charles. A certain amount of attachment, real or pretended, had been the result, but intimacy was yet wanting, and to achieve it the favourite at last conceived the scheme of taking the prince, under his own wings and protection, to Spain. The plan, strange as it was, seemed to promise notable advantages; the long journey offered more than anything else that could be thought of the means of breeding intimacy; the bride at the end, whose goodwill the favourite intently desired to gain, was likewise an object of importance; and last of all, the romantic adventure, for as such Buckingham wished it to be considered, presented extraordinary facilities for initiating the heir to the throne into the gaieties and corruptions of fashionable life. The minion had already acquired the fame, great in an immoral age, of being the most licentious man of the day, and he could feel, therefore, some confidence of being able to make himself minister of pleasure, and through it master of a hopeful young king.

There was some difficulty in gaining the consent of James to the roving expedition, he feeling instinctively the objects of it, and being most unwilling, besides, to separate himself, if only for a few months, from his darling favourite, his "Steeny," as he had come to call him. But Buckingham had long ceased to beg, and got into the habit of commanding, so that there was no resistance possible on the part of his helpless majesty. All the preparations for the journey, which was to be absolutely secret, having been completed, the king at the last moment had a fresh access of fear and trembling, struck by the thought that he might lose, through the dangers of the journey, his only son, his "Baby Charles," as well as his beloved minion. On this, as told by Edward Hyde, Lord Clarendon, "he fell into a great passion with tears, saying to them [Buckingham and the prince] that he was undone, and that it would break his heart if they pursued their resolution." He then explained all his fears and all his objections, "ending with the same passion and disorder with which he had begun, and conjuring them, with sighs and tears, to press him no longer to a thing so contrary both to his reason and interest." Charles, who had set his mind on the journey, full of its promised delights, begged his father not to prevent it; but the favourite, better acquainted with the feeble mind with which he had to deal, took another tone, telling James, with great rudeness, "that nobody would believe anything he said when he retracted so soon the promise he had so solemnly made, and that he plainly discerned it proceeded from a breach of his word, in communicating with some rascal who had furnished him with those pitiful reasons he had alleged." The scolded king, after passionately protesting, with many oaths, that he had kept the matter, as enjoined, a strict secret, received at length forgiveness, and was then told that the travellers intended setting out in two days, taking with them only two attendants, Sir Francis Cottington, one of the gentlemen of the prince's bedchamber, who had been educated at Madrid, and Endymion Porter, employed for many years as the king's agent at the court of Spain. The announcement conveyed a ray of hope to James, and he sent at once for the bedchamber gentleman. "Cottington," his majesty exclaimed, "here is Baby Charles and Steeny, who have a great mind to go by post to Spain, to fetch home the infanta, and will have but two more in their company, and have chosen you for one. What think you of the journey?" Not instructed beforehand in his part, Cottington said something about the dangers of the trip, whereupon the poor king threw himself at once on his couch, crying, "I told you so, I told you so before: I shall be undone, and lose Baby Charles." Buckingham now sprang forward in a rage, asking the bedchamber knight how he dared to interfere in matters of state when his sole duty was that of obedience, which put James into a new agony, on behalf of the servant who, as he well knew, would suffer for answering him honestly. "Nay, by God, Steeny," he took courage to exclaim, "you are much to blame to use him so; he answered me directly to the question I asked him, and very honestly and wisely, and you know he said no more than I told you before he was called in." After this daring observation, the minion's wrath again fell upon the king, and he was glad enough in the end to withdraw all further opposition, starting the adventurers on their journey with a father's blessing. On the 17th of February, 1623, Prince Charles and Buckingham took leave of James, and set out for Spain, with full pockets, false beards, and fresh names, the heir of the kingdom calling himself John Smith, and the actual ruler figuring as his uncle, Thomas Smith.

John and Thomas reached Dover in safety, where their two attendants were waiting for them, having a vessel ready, which quickly carried them to Calais. But before getting to Paris they were recognized on the road, so that the queen regent of France, widow of Henry IV., had time to prepare for the arrival of the illustrious guests, and they were magnificently entertained at court, great care being taken to bring the heir apparent of England face to face with her majesty's oldest marriageable daughter, a young and pretty lady of fifteen, called Henrietta Maria. After enjoying a "masking dance," and several other court shows, in which the little princess was made to take a part, John and Thomas Smith stuck their false beards on again, and set out for Madrid, where, by dint of hard riding, they arrived on the 6th of March, before their attendants, who were left on the road, and the report of their coming had reached either the Spanish court, or the English ambassador accredited at it, Lord Digby, earl of Bristol. Immense was the surprise of the latter dignitary when, in the dusk of the March evening, the proud favourite, who had frowned upon him in London not many months before, entered his apartment with a large portmanteau in his hand, telling him that the prince of Wales was waiting outside in the street till informed that he might come in and have a quiet lodging. Scarcely trusting his ears or eyes, the ambassador hurried out to meet the prince, and having conducted the two high and mighty travellers, with their portmanteaus, to his own bedroom, listened with utter astonishment to the relation of their adventures, and the object of their journey. It was with no little fear and trembling the earl heard of the plans of Buckingham, and the manner in which he wished to carry them out. To woo a princess in a novel, romantic sort of way was all very well, and could do no harm as far as the lady herself was concerned; but Bristol knew what neither the prince of Wales nor the minion were dreaming of for a moment, that the proposed marriage had never been seriously entertained by the Spanish court, but had been put forward only as a diplomatic trick. Fully acquainted with the dark policy of the government at which he stood accredited, he knew moreover that if following the course bent upon at that moment, the rulers of Spain would be more likely to keep the heir of England and Scotland in prison than to send him home with a wife. The state of public feeling in England and the attitude of parliament, were no secrets at Madrid, nor the inability of James to retain the nation from drifting into a great war in favour of Protestantism, so that really the inducement to lay hold of the heir apparent and keep him as hostage was great enough to tempt even politicians more scrupulous and honest than the Jesuit-bred statesmen holding the helm of the Spanish vessel of state, and representatives as such of the interests of all Catholic Christendom. The chief of these statesmen, and for the time despot of Spain, was Count Gaspar Guzman de Olivarez, who had seized the reins of power on the death of King Philip III., in February, 1621, and was ruling absolutely in the name of his son, Philip IV., a youth of seventeen, entirely addicted to pleasure, and averse to all serious occupation. Olivarez, previous to his access to power, had been Spanish ambassador at Rome, and being still in intimate connection with the pontifical government, a hint from the latter, or a turn in the religious struggle in Germany, seemed enough to open the gates of some prison, or palace doing duty as such, to the legitimate heir of the greatest and now strongest Protestant nation in the world. All these thoughts, with many others, at once crossed the mind of the earl of Bristol when ushering Buckingham and the prince of Wales into the bedroom of the British embassy at Madrid, and he could not help communicating some of his fears to the favourite. But the latter only laughed. Accustomed at all times to treat the weightiest matters of state as court intrigues, he could not bring himself to look upon the trip to Spain like anything else but a pastime. Viewed from the sublime heights to which he had risen, the actions of nations appeared to Buckingham but as bits of a pantomime, and the whole world as a theatre, of which he had taken possession as stage manager, chief harlequin, and clown of clowns.

The first doings at Madrid of the prince of Wales and his leader and companion were of pleasant aspect, as the favourite himself had the kindness to inform King James. "Dear Dad and gossip," Buckingham wrote to his majesty; "On Friday last we arrived here at five o'clock at night, both in perfect health, and the next morning we sent for Gondomar [former ambassador of Spain at the court of England, and now a member of the privy council of Philip IV.], who went presently to the count of Olivarez, and as speedily got me, your dog Steeny, a private audience of the king; when returning to my lodging, the count of Olivarez, himself alone, would accompany me back again, to salute the prince in the king's name. The next day we had a private visit of the king, the queen, the infanta, Don Carlos, and the cardinal [sister and brothers of his Catholic majesty], in the sight of all the world; and I may call it a private obligation hidden from nobody, for there was the pope's nuncio, the emperor's ambassador, and the French, and all the streets filled with guards and other people. Before the king's coach went the best of the nobility, and after followed all the ladies of the court; we sat in an invisible coach, because nobody was suffered to take notice of it, though seen by all the world. In this form they passed three times by us; but before we could get away, the count of Olivarez came into our coach and conveyed us home, where he told us the king longed and died for want of a nearer sight of our wooer. First, he took me in his coach to go to the king; we found him walking in the street, with his cloak thrown over his face, and a sword and buckler by his side; he leaped into the coach and away he came to find the wooer in another place appointed, where there passed much kindness and compliment to one another." This letter—dated Madrid, the 10th of March, 1623, and signed "Your humble slave and dog, Steeny"—was followed by another, written several days after, which still continued to paint the sunny aspect of things. It told "dear Dad and gossip" how the Baby went "to kiss hands privately in the palace;" how "the king would not suffer him to come to his chamber, but met him at the star foot;" how "by force he would needs convey him half way home;" and how, in stalking along, after, probably, much consumption of the best Spanish grape-juice, "they were both almost overthrown into brick pits." Pleasant as was Buckingham's letter, there was a postscript to it which somewhat frightened the "dear Dad and gossip" to whom it was addressed. "They are hankering upon a conversion," the minion told his majesty in an off-hand manner, as if mentioning some trifles; "for they say that there can be no firm friendship without union in religion." The "hankering" expressed but half the truth; for from the moment of his arrival at Madrid becoming known, the heir apparent had found himself surrounded by priests and Jesuits, many of them English, who left no means untried to shake his Protestant convictions, using alternately theological arguments, the decoys of fair voluptuous beauty, and hints scarce concealing the darkest threats. Count Gondomar himself had the effrontery to tell Prince Charles that an Englishman had just been appointed privy councillor to the king of Spain, who had sworn never to rest till the Catholic religion had been re-installed in his native country. "The count of Olivarez watches our prince as a cat doth a mouse," James Howell, a travelling tutor and commercial agent, passing through Madrid, wrote to a friend; and there were many people who thought with him that the son of King James had got into a mouse-trap, and would have difficulty to get out again.

The general feeling in England when the sudden departure of the heir apparent became known was one of consternation. All trembled under the influence of a twofold apprehension, the dread being that either he would be kept a prisoner by the Spaniards, as hostage for the non-interference of his future subjects in the religious struggles on the Continent, or, what created still more alarm, that he would return a convert to the Roman Catholic faith. To dissipate the latter fear, loudly expressed on all sides, James despatched two orthodox chaplains after the Baby, "together," as he informed Buckingham in a letter, "with all the stuff and ornaments fit for the service of God." But with an eye to the forthcoming marriage, and the hoped-for Spanish ducats, his majesty did not pack off the "stuff" and the chaplains without taking his precautions. "I have fully instructed them," he wrote to Steeny, "that all their behaviour and service shall, as I hope, prove decent, and agreeable to the purity of the primitive church, and yet as near the Roman form as can lawfully be done, for it hath ever been my way to go with the church of Rome usque ad aras." The same letter notified to the Baby and Steeny the arrival of other no less important presents. "I send you also your robes of the Garter," the "dear Dad and gossip" wrote, "which ye must not forget to wear upon St. George's day, and dine together in them, if they can come in time, which I pray God they may, for it will be a goodly sight for the Spaniards to see my two boys dine in them. I send you also the jewels, as I promised, some of mine and such of yours, I mean both of you, as are worthy the sending. For my Baby presenting his mistress, I send him an old double cross of Lorain, not so rich as ancient, and yet not contemptible for the value; also a good looking-glass, with my picture in it, to be hung at her girdle, which ye must tell her ye have caused it so to be enchanted by art magic, as whensoever she shall be pleased to look in it she shall see the fairest lady that either her brother's or your father's dominions can afford." "Your poor old Dad is lazier than ever he was," his majesty concluded his epistle, "both of his right hand and foot, and writes this out of his naked bed." To convey all his presents, chaplains, church vestments, robes, and diamonds, with a whole host of noblemen and court functionaries, appointed to wait upon his "two boys," James put half the navy of England in requisition, together with the whole diplomatic talent of the kingdom, to carry orders of the Garter and of St. George. The lords Carlisle, Mountjoy, Holland, Andover, Denbigh, Vaughan, Kensington, Rochford, and a crowd of other peers of the realm were hurried off to Spain; and in their company went a little man who achieved a greater success at the Spanish capital than any one else, Archibald Armstrong, the favourite court fool of James. It was a mark of particular tenderness and affection on the part of the king to give the loan of his fool, as well as of his chaplains, to Steeny and the Baby, and Archibald, or Archy, as he was generally called, appreciated the compliment by making himself quite at home at Madrid. "Our cousin Archy," James Howell wrote home, "hath more privilege than any, for he often goes where the infanta is with her meninas and ladies of honour, and keeps a blowing and blustering amongst them, and flirts what he lists." Archy deserved the honour of representing King James at the court of Spain, if for nothing else, for a very clever piece of wit uttered soon after the departure of the prince of Wales. "I must change caps with your majesty," said Archy, hopping along the table. "Why?" inquired the king. "Why, who sent the prince into Spain?" quoth the fool, gravely shaking his head. "But supposing the prince should come safely back again," James cried, somewhat alarmed. "Why, in that case," Archy replied very slowly, "in that case I will take my cap from my head, and send it to the king of Spain."

After a month's sojourn at Madrid, matters assumed a somewhat serious aspect for the English heir apparent. He had offered his hand to the infanta, and was accepted; but accepted on terms to be dictated by the Spanish government, and from the fulfilment of which, he was beginning to see, it would depend whether he was allowed to return to England or not. Olivarez first demanded that the future queen should have the free exercise of her own religion, which was granted as a matter of course, and he next desired that the early education of her children should be left to her, which was also allowed, after some hesitation. The point then insisted upon was that the royal children, if preferring to remain attached to the Catholic faith, like their mother, should not be debarred from the right of succession; to this demand the prince of Wales at first demurred, but finally assented, on the advice of Buckingham, the idea, perhaps, occurring to the latter that the English nation might feel disposed, should the time arrive, to settle the little matter their own way, irrespective of agreements signed at Madrid. Having obtained all that he wished in regard to the marriage and its offspring, Count Olivarez went a little further, and insisted upon stipulations in favour of the English Roman Catholics. To all of them the prince of Wales had to subscribe, and he agreed in the name of his father, who had granted him full power to the effect, that the Catholics under his sceptre should not be troubled henceforth in the exercise of their religion, that no oath should be imposed upon them against their faith, and that all penal acts against them should be repealed. All this, far beyond the power of either King James or his son, having been conceded, Olivarez on a sudden demanded securities for the due fulfilment of the articles, hinting very distinctly that the marriage could not take place without. The prince now got fairly frightened, and had thoughts of running away, which he announced to his father in a letter smuggled out of Spain by Sir Francis Cottington. The note elicited an epistle full of wailings from James. "Your letter by Cottington," he told the Baby and Steepy, "hath stricken me dead; I fear it shall very much shorten my days, and I am the more perplexed that I know not how to satisfy the people's expectation here, neither know I what to say to our council. As for my advice and directions that ye crave, in case they will not alter their decree, it is in a word to come speedily away, if ye can get leave, and give over all treaty. And this I speak without respect of any security they can offer, except ye never look to see your old Dad again, whom

I fear ye shall never see, if ye see him not before winter. Alas, I now repent me sore that I ever suffered you to go away. I care for match nor nothing, so I may once have you both in my arms again. God grant it, God grant it, God grant it! Amen, amen, amen!"

The determination of Prince Charles to escape from the match was owing in great part to the counsels of Buckingham, who, after several months' sojourn at Madrid, had conceived a hatred against Count Olivarez and the chief members of the Spanish government. It was owing, in the first instance, to a slight put upon him in the negotiations for the marriage, which he resolved never to forgive. Not having a very clear notion of his exact official position in England, and looking upon him as a mere young courtier serving as companion to the prince, the Spanish ministers entrusted with the conduct of the matrimonial negotiations, all grandees of the first class, had asked for his credentials before admitting him to their deliberations, and on his not being able to produce any, had simply shown him the door, admitting him only when at length the proper documents arrived. The insult, which he held it to be, deeply rankled in the breast of the vain and haughty minion, who, to put himself on a more equal footing with the grandees, had obtained the title of duke since his arrival in Spain; and his exasperation greatly increased at the private treatment he met with at many of the houses of the high dignitaries of state, where he appeared in company with the prince. From the commencement, the old grandees had been shocked by the airs assumed by the minion, particularly his insolent behaviour towards the prince, whom he called, by all sorts of nicknames; and they were still more shocked by the way in which he went running after their own wives and daughters, seemingly under the impression of being still in the realm of the "dear Dad and gossip," who had often assisted him in spreading nets for the decoy of fair and frail ladies, with sublime disregard of husbands and fathers. His conduct towards the wife of Count Olivarez put the climax to all his offences of the kind, resulting in mortal hatred of the powerful minister, which Buckingham did his best to return. Thus, before he had been three months in the Spanish capital, the favourite found the whole court and nobility arrayed against him, and from that moment resolved that the prince should never wed the infanta, if he could help it. He had the more cause to arrive at this determination, as he could clearly see that the princess herself had conceived as deep a dislike to his person as any one at court, probably for the good reason of having learnt that he was doing all in his power to corrupt her future husband, his efforts to this effect going so far as to surround him with quite a crowd of loose characters. To persuade Charles to break off the match was no great difficulty for Buckingham, who had obtained by this time the ascendancy over the mind of the prince, which had been one of the objects of the journey, and in the end a neat plot was settled between them. In order not to bring the vengeance of the Spanish government down upon them, the heir apparent and his guide agreed to continue the marriage negotiations with the greatest ardour, to sign every paper laid before them, to swear to everything they were asked to, and to run away just in time to escape the tying of the nuptial knot. The plan was executed with the greatest skill, to the infinite credit of Steeny, as well as the Ruby.

The solemn farce commenced towards the end of July, when Prince Charles and his companion had been enjoying for nearly five months the hospitality of the court of Madrid. By this time, the marriage treaty was drawn up and ready; all matters relating to the alliance had been fully discussed and settled; and nothing was wanting to proceed to the celebration of the nuptials but the dispensation of the pope, required in all unions between Roman Catholics and Protestants. The document was expected to arrive in the middle of August, and the wedding was fixed to take place on the 29th of the month; but a fortnight or three weeks before, the prince sought King Philip, and with tears in his eyes told him that his father had fallen very ill, and had ordered him to come home at once, so that the nuptials would have to be postponed. He proposed at the same time that the marriage should be celebrated by proxy, the English ambassador, the earl of Bristol, serving as his representative, and that his bride, the infanta, should be transported immediately after by the navy of England to her new home, and into the arms of her affectionate husband. Philip IV. assented to all these proposals, whereupon the prince and Buckingham, with immense alacrity, made everything ready for their departure. The day previous, the heir apparent of England solemnly confirmed by oath upon the Bible the articles of the treaty, witnessed the taking of a like oath by the king of Spain, his privy council, and all the great officers of state, and publicly deposited in the earl of Bristol's hands a proxy, empowering him to marry the infanta a certain number of days after the arrival of the papal dispensation. The parting interview with the infanta—described as "a very comely lady, rather of Flemish complexion than Spanish [mother, an Austrian princess of the big-lipped Hapsburg race], fair-haired, and carrying a most pure mixture of red and white in her face"—was affecting in the extreme, Prince Charles playing the disconsolate lover to perfection. "Many rich presents," Bristol reported, "were given on both sides; the prince bestowed upon the queen the biggest crown pearl in the world, between two diamonds; he gave the infanta a rope of pearls, and an anchor of great diamonds—symbol of constancy—with many other jewels. Never prince parted with such an universal love of all; he left every mouth filled with his commendations, every one reporting him to be a truly noble, discreet, and well-deserving prince." So much was King Philip taken with the splendid acting of his English brother-in-law, that he ordered a marble trophy to be erected at the place where they parted, and for his sake even looked kindly upon the favourite, giving him many presents, among them a great number of camels and asses. The latter, Buckingham made over at once to the "dear Dad" at home, thinking they were more particularly intended for him. "Five asses I have sent you," he informed his majesty, "two he-asses and two she-asses, with a young one. Also five camels, two hes and two shes, with a young one; there is an elephant, too, worth your seeing. My Lord Bristol sayeth he will send you more camels; and when we come ourselves we will bring you horses and asses enough."

Leaving Madrid in the middle of August, the prince and his companions pushed rapidly towards the coast, where the English fleet was waiting, though the young king, evidently fascinated with Charles, seemed loth to part with him, escorting him as far as the Escorial, and from thence again, after several days' feasting, to Campillo, where they finally separated, with "wonderful great endearments and embraces in divers postures." Having shaken off his majesty, the travellers hurried on with new energy, and passing Segovia and Valladolid, at the end of a week reached the port of Santander, in Old Castile, fixed upon as place of embarkation. Getting to within a dozen leagues on the road before Santander, they were met by a detachment of English sailors, under Sir John Finet, who had come inland in apprehension of the prince's safety, unaware of the delay caused by King Philip's feastings at the Escorial. The exultation, described by Sir John, was great on both sides. "For besides the joy his highness received at our encounter and the fleet's arrival, the news of which, he said, made him look upon me, when I told it, as one that had the face of an angel, the duke of Buckingham, when I afterwards met him and told him the like, to express his content, kissed me, and drawing from his finger a diamond of above an hundred pounds' value, gave it me for a present." No sooner had Charles set foot on board ship, when he loudly expressed his intention not to marry his betrothed bride; and to seek a pretext for a breach, the next day sent one of his attendants back to Madrid with a letter to the earl of Bristol, commanding the latter not to use his proxy "till sufficient security should be given against the infanta throwing herself into a nunnery after the espousal, and thus frustrating himself and the country of the hopes of posterity." The alarmed ambassador, feeling that he was being placed in a terrible position, at once hastened to Count Olivarez, to communicate his orders, and to his great relief found that the Spanish government was willing to subscribe to almost anything the prince might ask, the infanta, as well as her brother the king, having taken him into a real affection, to the extent of making the marriage, which at first had been looked upon as a matter of mere policy, an actual love-match. Having obtained the assurance that all possible securities should be offered "against the infanta throwing herself into a nunnery," of which, indeed, there did not seem to be the slightest chance, she being an uncommonly merry little lady, the earl of Bristol communicated the same to the prince of Wales in a letter of much import. After telling Charles that the poor infanta "would take it most heavily" if he were to break off the match under some futile excuse, he entreated him, almost passionately, not to listen to the whisperings of false councillors. "God forbid," said the earl, "that either any personal distastes of ministers, or any indiscreet or passionate carriage of business, should hazard that which his majesty and your highness have done so much to obtain, and whereby doubtless so much good and peace is to accrue to Christendom by the effecting of it, and, contrariwise, so much trouble and mischief by the miscarriage of it." "I shall conclude," the letter ended, "by entreating your highness that if you would have things go well that a post may instantly be despatched back unto me, authorising me to deliver the power upon the arrival of the dispensation, and having taken fitting security in the particular point. And this, I earnestly beseech your highness, may be done with all possible speed and secrecy, that the Spanish ambassadors may not know that ever there was any suspension made of the delivery of the powers."

The letter reached the prince of Wales a few days after his arrival in England, when he had begun taking, at the instigation of Buckingham, all possible steps to annul the treaty of marriage. After a prosperous voyage across the Bay of Biscay and the Channel, the prince and his great companion had landed at Portsmouth on the 5th of October; early on the morning of the 6th of October they arrived at York House, London, and hearing the king was at Royston, they at once set out to meet him. "The joy at the interview," Bishop Hacket recorded, "was such as surpasseth the relation. His majesty in a short while retired, and shut out all but his son and the duke, with whom he held conference till it was four hours in the night. They that attended at the door sometimes heard a still voice, and then a loud; sometimes they laughed, and sometimes they chafed; and noted such variety as they could not guess what the close might prove." The final "close" was what most men with a real insight into the state of affairs expected, the absolute victory of Buckingham. The report of his son and minion of their intention not to fulfil the treaty with the king and court of Spain, and to break off, at the last moment, an alliance on which he had set his whole heart for years, at the first moment intensely distressed James, and brought on a paroxysm of tears; but this over, he got more cheerful, and content with his own utter helplessness, assumed a swaggering air, pretending as usual that all was being done by his directions and under his impulse. "At supper the next day," as related by Bishop Hacket, "that sentence fell from his majesty, which is in memory to this hour, 'That he liked not to marry his son with a portion of his daughter's tears,'" which showed the fiction which had been told to "dear Dad," and which he had been pleased to adopt. But a new perplexity arose when, immediately after the despatch from the earl of Bristol arrived, stating the willingness of the Spanish court to give the securities demanded by the prince of Wales, and thus destroying his pretext for breaking the treaty. Scarcely knowing what new claim they should bring next forward, a long consultation ensued between Charles and the favourite, and they decided, and made the king consent to their decision, to send orders to the earl of Bristol to insist upon the reconstitution of the prince palatine into his dominions previously to the celebration of the marriage. It was an entirely novel demand, unwarranted by any stipulation; for although James had been full of hopes that the Spanish match would lead to the restoration of his son-in-law, yet it had been specially agreed that the interests of the prince palatine should not be made the subject of treaty till after the arrival of the infanta in England. Again the couriers hastened back to Madrid, delivering their despatches to the English ambassador; and again the latter, deeply humiliated at the part he had to play, communicated his orders to Count Olivarez. To his infinite surprise and astonishment, the new demand was granted almost instantaneously. Olivarez told the earl of Bristol that the rich provinces on the Rhine should be taken, if necessary by force of arms, from the elector of Bavaria, head of the Catholic League, and be given back to the prince palatine and his Protestant friends; and to make the superb engagement the more gracious, the young king himself handed his written promise to the English ambassador. The latter, on this extraordinary exhibition of friendship and goodwill, deemed it impossible that any further obstacles to the marriage could be imposed; and feeling sure to get the approval of James, he positively engaged to deliver the proxy, intrusted to him by the prince of Wales. The papal dispensation having arrived in the meantime, the marriage day was fixed by royal proclamation; the whole nobility of Spain were invited by the king to be present at the auspicious ceremony, and the authorities of all the towns and seaports of the kingdom were ordered to prepare festivities for the occasion, to discharge the great ordinance, and distribute alms to the poor. At the beginning of December the prince of Wales learnt that, whether he wished it or not, he would have a wife before Christmas.

There could be no longer any doubt now, either to Charles or Buckingham, that the time of pretexts was gone by, and that they must openly declare their intention to tear the marriage treaty to pieces. The king having been reduced to the verge of idiocy, wailing half the day, and laughing and playing with his Archy the other half, no obstacles offered to even a declaration of war against Spain; and, aiming at this end, Buckingham forthwith despatched fresh couriers to the earl of Bristol, with royal letters strongly blaming his precipitancy in engaging to carry out the marriage, and ordering his immediate departure from Madrid. The messengers arrived but three days before the date fixed for the proxy nuptials, on whose account the whole kingdom was preparing to break forth in rejoicings, and the influence of which had already had the effect of arresting the progress of the great war of religion in Germany. Philip's indignation, on learning at the last moment the gross insult heaped upon him and his family, knew no bounds; he immediately commanded his sister to lay aside the title of princess of Wales, which she had adopted for some months, to cease the study of the English language, and to return all the presents given to her by her false wooer. Further edicts of the king ordered all ships of war to be got ready in the harbours of Spain in preparation of hostilities against England, while at the same time the battalions of Spinola on the Rhine were hurled forward once more upon the scattered troops of the princes of the Protestant Union. The wrath of Philip, naturally great, nevertheless did not blind him so as to be in doubt of the actual causes of the outrage committed upon his dignity and the honour of his sister, and while panting for revenge upon the chief authors, he treated the English ambassador with marked respect.

On presenting his letters of revocation to Count Olivarez, the minister delivered to the earl of Bristol a long message from his sovereign, stating that the king had been informed that the earl would, probably, have to suffer on his return to England for the honest zeal he had shown in carrying out the treaty of marriage sworn to by the prince of Wales, and that, in consequence, as a token of his majesty's respect and affection, as well as in compensation for any loss of fortune that might fall upon him, he was requested to name any gift, worthy of himself and his majesty, that might be bestowed upon him—no estates, no honours, no dignities in the king of Spain's disposal should be denied him. The earl, with much dignity, replied that what he had done was by command of his master, without any intention to serve Spain, so that his Catholic majesty owed him nothing; and that whatever reason he might have to fear the power of his enemies, he trusted in his own innocence, and the sense of justice of his royal master. Before leaving Madrid, the ambassador wrote to James, informing his majesty that he had contracted a debt of fifty thousand crowns, as well as pledged the whole of his own and his wife's jewels, for the prince of Wales, and that not having a quarter of the money necessary for his journey, he humbly asked to be reimbursed at least a portion of his outlay, so that he might be able to pay the most pressing of his creditors. There was no reply to the letter, very unpleasant, in all probability, to his majesty, whose exchequer was drained more completely than ever. The extreme poverty of the ambassador became known to the Spanish government, and on the eve of his departure Count Olivarez visited him once more, offering him, in a very delicate manner, a large sum of money, and on his refusing the gift, urging the acceptance on the ground that nobody would know of it. "Yes," the ambassador interrupted the minister, "one person would know of it, who would be certain to reveal it to the king of England, and that is the earl of Bristol."

The breach with Spain made Buckingham all on a sudden the most popular man in England. The people thought they had not curses enough to heap upon his head on learning that he had run away with the prince of Wales to fetch home the infanta, and they now thought they had not plaudits enough to lift him to the skies on hearing that his advice had led to the destruction of the hated alliance, and would probably lead to a war with the great Catholic power. Formerly he could not pass along the streets without being insulted; now he could not pass for the crowd of enthusiastic worshippers surrounding him, who hung to his skirts, lighted bonfires under his windows, and made the air ring with songs in his praise. In the intoxication of his newly-risen popularity, Buckingham assumed the airs not only, but the functions, of a dictator, treating the king with more insolence than ever, and insulting all the members of the privy council not falling in with his own views. There were a great many of these opposed to his new policy; some of them secret Catholics and old friends of Spain, and others sincere Protestants objecting to a renewal of English wars on the Continent, and cherishing the idea that more might be done for the oppressed reformers of Germany by entering into friendly relations with King Philip, and using his influence to make an end of the frightful struggle for religion that was desolating central Europe than by anything English armies, necessarily weak and small in numbers, were likely to achieve. The latter party, strongly represented among the upper classes, urged moreover that it was a disgrace to England that the treaty with the ruler of Spain, solemnly signed and sworn to by the heir apparent of the kingdom, should be cast to the winds without the slightest justification, and at a moment, too, when the alliance promised to be of infinitely more advantage to the Protestant interest than to that of its opponents. They urged, too, that the young king, known as not at all bigoted, had already given an extraordinary proof of his goodwill by the promise of reinstalling the count palatine, and might be expected to do still more, while, on the other hand, the coming of the infanta to England could not possibly do the least harm, her power as queen consort being too small to be of the least appreciable influence among a people sincerely and energetically attached to the Protestant faith. These were weighty reasons against Buckingham's policy, made more so by being held by a majority of the privy councillors, no less than by the king himself, who, however, was unable to act up to his convictions as long as the shadow of his minion's influence was hanging over him like a nightmare. Nevertheless, those who watched James sharpest could see that he was brooding over his wrongs and his humiliation. The insulting manner in which he was generally treated by Buckingham stung him deeply, and the more so as he could not fail perceiving that the prince of Wales was held under as absolute command as himself by the favourite, which made him angry enough at times to give way to bitter speeches, though only in his absence. It was sufficient, however, to stir up a silent conspiracy among the host of enemies of Buckingham; they could not forget that as the capricious fancy of the feeble monarch had raised him to his giddy height in a short space of time, so it might throw him down from it in an instant. They worked hard, the plotters, and rumours began flying about of a probability of the favourite being sent to the Tower, when all of a sudden he tore the web that was weaving around him to pieces with a strong hand, by persuading the king to sign the order for a new convocation of parliament. Never before in his life had Buckingham shown so much wisdom as he did in this simple act.

But very little effort was required to induce James to give his consent to another meeting of the national representatives. He felt no love for them; but he was so wretchedly poor at the moment as to be inclined to be grateful to his bitterest enemies for giving him some money, and Buckingham pledged his word that the supplies should be forthcoming from the new commons, and sufficiently liberal, too, to compensate for at least part of the expenditure incurred in the costly Spanish journey, which and not been recouped, as James had fondly speculated, in the rich dowry of the infanta. The prospect thus held forth was enough to make the king willing, and even anxious, to face the two houses of parliament once more; and the writs for new elections having been despatched and acted upon with unusual celerity, it was announced by proclamation that the session would open on the 12th of February, 1624. The lords and commons were in their places on the appointed day to listen to the speech from the throne; but at the very moment when the king was preparing to start for the short journey to parliament, the report of the death of his cousin, the duke of Lennox, was handed to him, whereupon he returned instantly to his chamber, ordering the postponement of the session for a week, and declaring his inability to give utterance to any other words but of grief, exclaiming mournfully, alluding to the death, not long before, of another relative, the marquis of Hamilton, "When the branches are cut down, the tree cannot long remain." It seemed as if the sudden decease of the duke of Lennox, a mild, unassuming man, filling very unostentatiously the honorary position of high chamberlain and lord admiral of Scotland, left an impression upon James's mind that his own dissolution was at hand, and that his days, fast becoming days of misery, were destined not to outlast far the growing leaves of another summer. The feeling served to spread a soft dignity, alien to his usual manners, over the king's character, and to give an altogether new tone to the speech which he delivered before the two houses of parliament on the 19th of February. It began with a protestation, not quite consistent with the truth, but sounding solemn on the lips of a monarch who believed himself standing on 'the brink of another world, that he had been striving hard to accomplish and foster the welfare of all his subjects, his whole life having been devoted to the task, and that never king had governed "with a purer, sincerer, and more incorrupt heart." He then continued, "Much hath been talked of my remissness in maintenance of religion, and suspicion of a toleration; but, as God shall judge me, I never thought nor meant, nor ever in word expressed, anything that savoured of it. It is true that at times, for reasons best known to myself, I did not so fully put those laws in execution, but did wink and connive at some things which might have hindered more weighty affairs; but I never, in all my treaties, agreed to anything to the overthrow and disagreeing of these laws." Having thus as he deemed justified his long negotiations with the great Catholic power of the Continent, and apathy to assist the German Protestants, the king desired that both houses of parliament would consider the state of religion, as also how far aid might be rendered to his daughter, the princess palatine, her husband, and children. Finally, as regarded the topic uppermost in all men's minds, the state of relations with Spain, James expressed himself very cautiously, forbearing to speak of the marriage negotiations as entirely broken off, but promising that a full account and explanation of the subject should be given by the duke of Buckingham, his most trusty friend and adviser. There were loud and numerous cheers at the conclusion of the speech from the throne, some few for the king, and many more for his trusty friend, and now master.

Buckingham delivered his promised narrative of the Spanish journey on the 24th of February, at a general conference of the lords and commons, held at Whitehall, the prince of Wales standing at his side; and the applause with which his utterances, especially his denunciations of Spanish policy, were greeted, at once showed that he had become the most popular personage in parliament, as well as out of it. The recital of what he and the prince had been doing in Spain was a series of in part gross misrepresentations, and in part absolute falsehoods; he informed the members of both houses that they had found nothing but perfidy at the court, and among the members of the government of King Philip; that the artifices and deceptions they met with in the course of their negotiations made them conclude that the steps taken towards the marriage were more trickeries; that the restitution of the palatinate, which had ever been regarded as an essential preliminary to the matrimonial alliance, was not seriously intended by the Spanish king; and that in the end, after enduring much bad usage, the prince had been obliged to fly from the country, without any hopes either of obtaining the infanta or of restoring the elector palatine. Standing close at Buckingham's side while the narrative was being delivered, the prince of Wales not only supported the mendacious fabrication by his silent authority, but added to its effect by supplementing particulars of the story, and directly attesting the truth of the whole, thus leaving no cause for doubt to hearers too much inclined already to believe what they were told. The end of the speech was greeted by the most enthusiastic cheers, which reverberated in the streets and the house of commons, the people lighting fresh bonfires, and the national representatives going so far in their admiration as to applaud Sir Edward Coke on calling Buckingham the saviour of the country. It but added to the sudden immense popularity of the favourite that the Spanish ambassador, with somewhat imprudent zeal, sent energetic remonstrances to the king and the House of Lords, complaining of the calumnies uttered against his royal master, and demanding the head of the calumniator by way of satisfaction. Buckingham could well afford to laugh at the impotent menace. The lords, without so much as offering the ambassador the hearing which he demanded, at once proceeded to justify all that he had said and done, vouching for the truth of his narrative by a general vote, and signifying their approbation of it moreover by an address to the king, in which they dwelt upon what they called his faithful services to the state. A similar address, fully as eulogistic of the duke, was delivered by the commons, the latter setting themselves to vouch as fervently as the lords for his veracity, and approving it in the highest terms of commendation. The reply of the king was peevish, and visibly imbued with a growing sentiment of jealousy against his minion, borne along now on the wings of immense popularity. His majesty told the lords and commons that there was no need for them to become sponsors for the duke's fidelity, of which he himself had taken all along, and was still ready to take the credit, as well as the responsibility. "The greatest fault," he exclaimed, "if it be a fault, or leastwise the greatest error, I hope he shall ever commit against me, was his desiring this justification from you, as if he should have need of any justification from others towards me, for being my disciple and scholar, he may be assured I will trust his own relation." It sounded as if James felt at last that he was sinking into utter obscurity, even the outward glories of his kingship being usurped by the "disciple" whom he had raised from the dust.

England was now drifting fast into war with Spain. At the end of February, an address was carried through both houses, without a single dissentient voice, praying the king not to proceed in his treaties with Spain, either for the marriage of the prince of Wales, or the restoration of the palatinate, and boldly declaring that the latter could be recovered only by force of arms. In reply, the king expressed his readiness to listen to the advice of parliament to enter upon war, provided they would supply him with the funds necessary for carrying on hostilities, hinting at the same time that he wanted a large supply, on account of the many and great charges resting upon him, the vast expense incurred by the prince's journey to Spain, and the cost to which he was put by the maintenance of his daughter's children abroad, who, without his assistance, would "eat no bread." Upon this intimation a joint address was framed by both houses, declaring the absolute willingness of lords and commons to stake their persons and their fortunes in the contest for the Protestant cause, and offering the king three subsidies and three fifteenths, not for the relief of his private wants, of which they thought proper to take no notice, but solely for the purpose of making war against the Spaniards and the troops of the Catholic League. The address was carried to James by a deputation headed by the archbishop of Canterbury, who on delivering it made some severe reflections upon the treachery of the Spanish government, which elicited a curious reply from the king. "I have nothing to say to the preamble of my lord of Canterbury," drily remarked James, "but that he insinuated something in it which I cannot allow of, for whereas he said I have showed myself sensible of the insincerity of those with whom I lately had to deal, and of the indignity offered to my children. In this you must give me leave to tell you that I have not expressed myself either sensible or insensible of the good or bad dealing: it was Buckingham's relation to you which touched upon it. But it must not bar me, nor make Jupiter speak that which Jupiter speaks not; for when I speak any such thing, I will speak it with that reason, and back it with that power which becomes a king." It was a vain boast of a very decrepid poor old "Jupiter," who, as all knew, had long lost his thunderbolts. To resist the declaration of war was no more in the king's power, and after liggling for a few days longer about money matters, demanding six subsidies instead of three, but getting a blank refusal, he was fain at last to give his consent to the commencement of hostilities. It was declared by royal proclamation that the treaties made with Spain had come to an end, to which edict, at the desire of the commons, there was added another, commanding a strict enforcement of the whole of the penal statutes against the Roman Catholics. The judges and magistrates of the kingdom were instructed to see carefully that no recusants should escape through the meshes of the laws hung around them; new officers were appointed to watch Roman Catholics, and to arrest every person going to hear mass in the houses of the foreign ambassadors; and, lastly, all missionaries, priests, and Jesuits were ordered to leave England immediately, under penalty of death. When giving his final assent to the demands of the two houses of parliament, James delivered a remarkable protest. "Assure yourselves," he cried, addressing the lords and commons, "my delay hitherto was upon hope to have gotten it [the palatinate] without a war. I held it by a hair, hoping to have gotten it by a treaty; but since I see no certainty that way, I hope that God who hath put it into your hearts thus to advise me, and into my heart to follow your advice, will so bless it that I shall clear my reputation from obloquy, and, in despite of the devil and all his instruments, show that I never had but an honest heart."

War having been declared against King Philip, the Spanish ambassador, the marquis of Inojoso, proceeded to take his departure, but before leaving made a great effort to overthrow Buckingham. He had often tried, after the sudden turn of affairs had taken place, to get a private audience with James, so as to open his eyes to the real cause of the proceedings of his favourite, but had constantly been disappointed by the vigilance of the latter, who, with the prince of Wales, kept watching every movement of the king. But at the farewell audience, the marquis found opportunity, while his secretary held the prince and Buckingham engaged in conversation, pretending to tell them important news, to slip a paper into the king's hands, making signs to him to indicate that he must read it alone. James did as desired, with the result of getting into a thorough state of alarm and consternation. The paper told the king that the prince and Buckingham were holding him in confinement, every person around him being in their pay; and that a scheme had been laid for restraining him from government, and enforcing his abdication, the first great step towards which was the beginning of a war, which would put troops at the disposition of the conspirators, enabling them, with the help of parliament, to seize his person, and put any restraint that might be desired upon his liberty of action. To save himself from his enemies, James was advised to sign immediately an order for the arrest of Buckingham, to dissolve parliament, and to surround himself with new advisers, the earl of Bristol being indicated among the number. In a postscript to the paper, it was stated that if his majesty should desire any further information, or proofs of the conspiracy, two persons, one of them the secretary of the Spanish embassy, and the other a holy priest, were ready to furnish all that was required. In his intense agitation, James adopted the proposal, and with the connivance of one of the bedchamber gentlemen, the secretary and his companion, the latter a priest not only but a Jesuit, were brought into his presence, and filled his head with such stories as to drive him for the moment to the verge of insanity. Believing nearly all that was told him about the intentions of his son and of Buckingham, he yet could not resolve upon any act, but kept on alternately blustering and whining, throwing out at the same time mysterious and broken speeches, the only effect of which was to put his keepers more on their guard. However, all on a sudden, the king seemed to have made up his mind for a great design; he declared his intention to remove from London to Windsor, ordered his carriage, asked his son to take seat at his side, and when Buckingham was on the point of following, intimated to him that he must stop behind. The minion was seized by sudden terror at the announcement, and feeling as if the mountain to the top of which he had raised himself was collapsing under him all at once, like the vision of some hideous dream, his head got giddy, his courage left him, and he broke out into a flood of tears. Then the king began crying too, and the prince of Wales followed the example, and while all three were weeping in chorus, the royal carriage drove off, leaving the duke behind, utterly disconsolate and wretched. He instinctively divined that his next journey would be to the Tower, and to prepare for it, he went home and got rid of another flood of gushing tears.

Still weeping, "stretched on his couch in an attitude of despair," the cast-off minion, dictator in parliament, and most popular man in England, was found by his friend, John Williams, the lord keeper, lately promoted to the bishopric of Lincoln. Bishop Williams, since his access to power, had elaborated a most perfect spy system, which enabled him at present to see much clearer than Buckingham through the dark web of intrigue that was spinning at court, and he now came to give his patron help and advice, and, above all, that courage of which he was so much in want. The right reverend lord keeper had learnt from the mistress of the Spanish secretary of embassy, one of the creatures in his pay, that the king had gone to Windsor to free himself from his presumed confinement, and punish the conspirators who wished to deprive him of the crown, and he therefore advised Buckingham to hurry after his majesty immediately, and, as he valued his life and his liberty, "not to stir from his person night or day." The counsel was too good not to be followed. Gathering pluck, the minion followed on the heels of his royal master, and planting himself at his side like a shadow, made all further communication with the agents of the Spanish ambassador impossible, intimidating at the same time his feeble mind so much as to make him give up all further thoughts of ridding himself of his tutors and effecting his liberation. The danger past, Buckingham set to punish the ambassador of Philip IV., driving him from the kingdom with ignominy, after which he went to curb other foes, by bringing accusations against them in parliament, reviving the formidable system of impeachment which had been brought into use in the previous session against Bacon and others. The first of his enemies thus punished was the lord treasurer, the earl of Middlesex, a former tool of the favourite, who had been taken by him from a London counting-house and raised to his high position, but whom he now wanted to cast down again for disobedience, and for opposing his war policy. On the demand of Buckingham, backed by the prince of Wales, the commons at once impeached the earl on the ground of bribery, notwithstanding the extreme opposition of James, who declared that the conviction of his treasurer would prove "such a wound to the crown that could not easily be healed." But it was in vain that the king himself hurried into parliament, and in suasive speech endeavoured to apologize for Middlesex; the commons turned a deaf ear, and maintaining their charge, the treasurer was found guilty by the peers, condemned to lose his place, to pay a fine of fifty thousand pounds, and to be imprisoned in the Tower during his majesty's pleasure. James was furious, and his fury made him prophetic. "By God, Steeny," he cried, falling in great choler upon his minion, "you are a fool, and will shortly repent this folly, and will find that, in a fit of popularity, you are making a rod with which you will be scourged yourself." Then, turning round upon his son, the king cried, "And you, too, will live to have your belly full of parliament impeachments, and when I shall be dead, you will have too much cause to remember how much you have contributed to the weakening of the crown." The prediction—reported by Lord Clarendon, in the "History of the Rebellion"—was destined to be fulfilled sooner than either James or Charles could expect.

Having done all that Buckingham required, parliament was prorogued on the 29th of May till October, and then dissolved. Before the prorogation, some feeble attempts were made by the favourite, absolute ruler of the realm at this moment, to enter upon the war for the humiliation of Spain, which he had so much at heart, but they proved abortive, the kingdom having sunk to such a state of utter helplessness and debility as apparently not to be able to produce either soldiers or sailors, ships or guns. Generals and admirals had become as rare as statesmen; there was not a single individual in all England and Scotland competent to direct the movements of an army; and as for naval commanders, the race, so noble and so numerous but a generation before, seemed to have become extinguished all on a sudden, leaving Buckingham to assume, in addition to all his other titles, that of high admiral. To extricate himself from the difficulty of fighting without fighting-men, the duke-admiral, immediately after the prorogation of parliament, entered into agreements with France, Savoy, Venice, Denmark, and Sweden, for a common attack upon the armies of Philip IV., these states to furnish soldiers for the war, while England was to provide money. The treaties destroyed the very object which the nation and the House of Commons had in view in desiring the commencement of hostilities, inasmuch as they ceased to make the struggle one for the Protestant cause, France and Savoy, as well as Venice, though anxious to break the overbearing sway of the great family occupying the thrones of Spain and Austria, having not the least intention to assist the German reformers, but feeling inclined rather to crush them, in conjunction with the princes of the Catholic League. However, the agreements came to nothing in the end, through the failure of Buckingham to keep his part of the stipulation, that of providing money. The greater part of three subsidies and three fifteenths voted by parliament, amounting altogether to about three hundred thousand pounds, were spent in a few months after they had found their way into the royal exchequer, nothing going to its destination but various small sums sent to the leader of the Protestant

Union, and to the family of the prince palatine, ex-king of Bohemia, now living upon alms in Holland. The prospects of war becoming altogether indefinite, Buckingham stirred in another direction by entering upon matrimonial negotiations with the French court, proposing that the prince of Wales should marry the Princess Henrietta Maria, third daughter of Henry IV., and sister of the reigning monarch, Louis XIII. The match was approved of by the queen-mother, Marie de Medici, hatred of Spain inclining her for the moment to assist the views of Buckingham, so as to bring about a close alliance of all the European powers against Philip IV. and his Austrian relatives; and on her instigation Louis XIII. consented to despatch a special ambassador to England to conclude the treaty of marriage. The affair was carried on with so much haste that in the course of little more than a month everything was signed and sealed, and the heir apparent was again placed under the solemn obligation to take unto himself a wife—the engagement to the infanta being legally still in operation, and considered so by the court of Spain. Except by forwarding the new policy of Buckingham and of the prince of Wales, the French marriage treaty, which was signed on the 10th of November, 1624, was not in any way so favourable as that sworn to by Charles at Madrid, for besides containing all the stipulations regarding religion insisted upon by the Spanish government, it gave the Princess Henrietta Maria far greater rights than conceded to the infanta, granting her, among other privileges, that of educating her children till the age of thirteen, while at the same time her dowry was fixed at only one hundred thousand pounds, or one-tenth of that of the daughter of Philip IV. When becoming known, the French treaty created the greatest dissatisfaction, so alarming to Buckingham as to drive him to make one more effort to commence hostilities against Spain, and to let the huge war-cry of the people drown all other shouts.

The first step in commencing war was to find a military commander, and none being to be had in England, Buckingham cast his eyes upon the German Count Mansfeld, one of the best captains of the Protestant Union, and who had won distinction in several campaigns against Bavaria and Austria, though unfortunate in all his encounters with Tilly, greatest of Catholic generals, who had won against him the important battle of the White Mountain, which took the Bohemian crown from the head of James's son-in-law. On the invitation of the king, Mansfeld came to England late in the autumn of 1624, landing almost naked, the ship conveying him being wrecked on the coast and all the crew drowned; but the misfortune was little to a man of his stamp, and he immediately set to work carrying out the task for which he stood engaged, that of first raising troops and afterwards leading them to battle. It was stipulated that he should have twenty thousand pounds a month, and twelve thousand soldiers, which latter were to be raised by impressment in London and other towns; and upon these conditions he promised to do his best to recover the Rhenish provinces for their legitimate ruler, the prince palatine. The twelve thousand men having been pressed into service, they were driven down to Dover, the vilest rabble that ever marched on the road; and having hung a number to encourage discipline, but without any attempt of drilling the rest for soldiers, the swarm of unclean beings was put on board ship and carried across the Channel. Arrived at Calais, the French governor refused to let them land, although he was told that the duke of Buckingham had obtained from Louis XIII., in the negotiations springing out of the marriage treaty, the promise of a free passage through his territory for the English army that was to reconquer the palatinate. However, the governor of Calais did not think himself justified to consider the ragged, mutinous crowd which Count Mansfeld had brought into the harbour an army, and energetically opposed their getting on shore until having received further and more specific instructions from his government. The instructions were long in arriving, and after a troublesome delay, Mansfeld found himself compelled to make sail for the coast of Holland, and succeeded in running his transports up the River Scheldt, near the island of Walcheren, in the province of Zealand. But here again the same want of orderly arrangements as at Calais became visible. The favourite, into whose hands an ill fortune had thrown the government of England, was entering upon what he intended to be a mighty war, with less preparation than upon which he would have hazarded a court entertainment; all that he had done towards the great struggle that was to lay the power of Spain in the dust, was to kidnap a crowd of unfortunates, mostly rogues and vagabonds, to park them like slaves on board fishing-boats, taken forcibly from their owners, and to start them on the sea, whichever way the wind might blow them. He had entered upon no written treaty for the passage of the kidnapped Englishmen through France, but trusted to vague verbal promises, and with the government of Holland he had made no agreement of any kind. The consequence was that the Dutch authorities, with more severity than the governor of Calais, not only refused a landing to Mansfeld's soldiers, but even forbade them to purchase food. As excuse for this gross inhumanity, unpardonable on the part of a people bound to England by so many ties as the Protestants of the Low Countries, the plea was put in that there existed a scarcity of provisions in the towns of Zealand, which might lead to great distress if food was allowed to be taken away. The patriotic Zealanders adhered to their resolution even on the breaking out of a dire famine on board the crowded English fleet, which, coupled with disease, carried off in a very short time more than one-half of the wretched involuntary soldiers, imposing upon Mansfeld, who himself had to suffer from hunger and illness, the duty of taking back the surviving men under his command to England. Returned to their native soil, the remnant of Mansfeld's troops, pale, emaciated creatures, with fever and starvation engraven on their faces, speedily deserted, thus bringing the superb design of Buckingham to humble the greatest military power in the world by the weight of his personal hatred to a premature end. The expedition to Zealand was the concluding event of the reign of James. All during the autumn of 1624 the king had been suffering from illness, springing out of a complication of disorders, rheumatism, stone, and gout, to which was added, in the first month of 1625, a new disease, which the doctors called the quartan ague. It was caused, they said, by drinking too much wine and eating too much fruit, and they recommended abstinence in both respects; but James would not hear of it, and kept drinking and eating more than ever. "Truly," Bishop Goodman reports, "I think his majesty did feed a little more than moderately upon fruits; he had his grapes, his nectarines, and other fruits, in his own keeping, and besides we did see that he fed very plentifully on them from abroad. I remember that the gardener who sometimes did present him with the first strawberries, cherries, and other fruits, was kneeling to the king with some speech, desiring his majesty to accept them, and that he was sorry they were no better, with such like complimentary matter; but the king never had the patience to hear him one word, but his hand was in the basket. After this eating of fruit in the spring time, his body fell into a great looseness, which, although while he was young did tend to preserve his health, yet now, being grown towards sixty, it did a little weaken his body; and going from Theobald's to Newmarket, and stirring abroad when the coldness of the year was not past, it could not be prevented but he must fall into a quartan ague." Upon his getting apparently dangerously ill, in the second week of March, James was taken back to Theobald's, and the doctors began operating upon him, together with Buckingham, who, in addition to his other numerous occupations, was fond of practising as an amateur physician. The doctors gave his majesty internal medicines, and the duke offered him powders and applied outwardly a "black plaister," which acts were afterwards very much talked of, giving rise to multifarious rumours of poisonings. "The king," according to Roger Coke, "having had an ague, the duke of Buckingham did, upon Monday, the 21st of March, when in the judgment of the physicians the ague was declining, apply plaisters to the wrists and belly of the king, and also did deliver several quantities of drink to the king, though some of the physicians did disallow thereof, and refused to meddle further with the king until the said plaisters were removed." As reported by Sir Anthony Welldon, the king frequently implored the earl of Montgomerie, one of the attendants he most trusted, to be careful that he had fair play, exclaiming on one occasion, when told that the ague was seldom fatal, "Ah, it is not the ague that afflicts me, but the powder I have taken, and the black plaister they have laid on my stomach." The suspicions of the dying monarch were probably unfounded, for it required no other poison than what he himself had taken to overthrow a diseased body, governed by a diseased mind.

The end of James was nobler than nuth of his life, full of calm, quiet courage and Christian resignation. On Wednesday, the 23rd of March, there was a consultation of all the physicians, and the opinion came to was that the illness of the king must prove fatal in a very short time. The lord keeper, Bishop Williams, who had never left the bedside of James from his first illness, went to him with the announcement

"I come," he said, "to your majesty with the message of Isaiah to Hezekiah, to exhort you to set your house in order, for your days are numbered in the world." To which the king replied, "I am satisfied, and I wish you to assist me in preparing to go hence, and to be with Christ, whose mercies I pray for and hope to find." Feeling his strength decline, he sent for his son, whom he retained in conversation for three hours, solemnly exhorting him to lead a religious life, to uphold the church of England, and to take the family of the palatine under his protection. On Thursday evening, the 24th of March, the king received the sacrament, and then fell into a lethargic state for forty-eight hours, breathing heavily, and with his tongue so swollen that it was with difficulty he could make himself understood. A little before break of day on Sunday, James slightly rallied, and expressed a wish to have another interview with Prince Charles, who on hearing it arose instantly, and in his night-dress knelt at the foot of the bed. The king made a convulsive effort to raise himself on his pillow, bending forward as if desirous to communicate something of importance, but though his lips were seen moving, the words could not be understood. Then all present sank on their knees in silent prayer, joined in by the dying monarch in scarce audible "Veni, Domine Jesu;" a few moments after his head sank back, and he ceased to breathe, without any appearance of pain. The lord keeper thereupon approached the death-bed, and closed the eyes of the king.

To the right reverend lord keeper also fell the task of preaching the funeral sermon at the burial of the king in Westminster Abbey. It was a very remarkable sermon. "Solomon," he exclaimed, "was the only son of his mother: so was King James. Solomon was of complexion white and ruddy: so was King James. Solomon was an infant king: so was King James. Solomon began his reign during the life of his predecessor: so did King James. Solomon was twice crowned and anointed a king: so was King James. Solomon was learned above all princes: so was King James. Yet, towards the end, King Solomon had secret enemies, and did go to war while close to the grave: so had, you know, and so did King James. And Solomon slept with his fathers and was buried in the city of David, and his son Rehoboam reigned in his stead."

SECTION II.

Charles I.

THERE were few tokens of public lament on the death of James, and few expressions of joy at the accession of Charles. Having remained for twenty-four hours at the mansion where his father's corpse was lying, Charles took coach at Theobald's on Monday, the 28th of March, and rode to London, with his friend and inseparable companion, the duke of Buckingham, at his side. The same day the heralds proclaimed the king's accession at Whitehall and Cheapside, under heavy gusts of rain and wind, among crowds looking as gloomy as the sky. It was not the weather alone, nor the uncertainty of political events, that oppressed the feelings of the multitude, but the dread of the plague, which had just made a fresh appearance in the city, unusually early in the season and unusually threatening, and was stalking around rapidly to gripe its victims. Possessed of more physical courage than his father, King Charles on his part showed no fear of the plague, but went freely among the people, talking to all in a condescending manner, and making visible efforts to gain personal popularity. His whole mind seemed bent towards this one object, to the neglect of higher aims; for it was known in a few days that he had made no changes in the government, intending to keep the whole administration of the kingdom in the old groove, and leaving the supreme power more than ever in the hands of Buckingham. The first matters in which he himself took an active part were the burial of his father and his own marriage, for both of which he made preparations at the same time. On the 30th of March, three days after the death of his parent, he signed the ratification of the treaty of marriage with Princess Henrietta Maria of France, and the wedding by proxy took place on the 1st of May. On the 3rd of May there was a general illumination of the capital in honour of the king's marriage, the bells of all the churches ringing, and bonfires in every street; and four days after, on the 7th of May, the king buried his father at Westminster with immense pomp, he and Buckingham following the bier as chief mourners. Immediately after the funeral Buckingham started for Paris to bring home the bride. He went accompanied by an immense retinue of nobles, guards, and attendants, such as had not been seen in the train of an English ambassador since the days of Cardinal Wolsey's visit to Francis I., and his arrival in the capital of France was made the occasion of grand festivities, prepared under the auspices of a new ruler which the kingdom had lately received, and who, holding his power on the same tenure as Buckingham, was anxious to make the latter his friend. The name of the new ruler was Armand, Jean Duplessis, Cardinal Richelieu. By a remarkable concurrence of circumstances, it had come to pass that the three most powerful monarchies of Europe had arrived to be governed, at one and the same time, not by kings but by kings' favourites, the count of Olivarez wielding the sceptre of Spain, the duke of Buckingham that of England, and Cardinal Richelieu that of France. The fate which made minions monarchs had certainly been least propitious to England.

The meeting of Buckingham and Richelieu, though ostensibly bearing upon nothing but the ceremonies of a royal marriage, was yet of considerable political importance. The cardinal had only been in power for about a year on the arrival of Buckingham, but the time had been long enough to manifest the chief objects of the new policy which he wished to inaugurate, and which on the whole were well made to receive the co-operation of England. To achieve the greatness of his country, the key-stone of his ambition, Richelieu aimed at establishing a strong government, strong within, and strong without; the first object he meant to accomplish by breaking the paramount away of the nobility, either by force or intrigue, opposing to the turbulent barons the industrial middle classes, and the second by humbling the political power most opposed to the rising influence of France, the house of Spain-Austria. Both of these aims, but especially the second, might fairly claim the sympathy of England, the more so as being already pledged to a war in aid of the Protestant interest in Germany, which in its main features was nothing but an attempt to hew down the iron dominion of Spanish and Austrian swords, sole opponent to the peaceable growth and progress of the new faith in the lands that had been the cradle of the reformation. That France and England combined should enter upon the mighty struggle, was evidently the clearest interest of each, if not an absolute necessity, and Richelieu so far understood it that during all the marriage negotiations he had kept this end in view, bringing it more distinctly forward when finding himself face to face with the illustrious favourite who was standing at the helm of the English vessel of state. But the cardinal had yet to learn the true character of the man whom chance had raised to such high position; his expectations of Buckingham's talent were not great, but yet were far above reality, and before the minion of two kings had been a week in Paris, Richelieu saw that for the time being he must dispense with the co-operation of England in his foreign policy. At the first interview the cardinal conceived a strong antipathy against the vain, frivolous, and conceited favourite, who assumed the airs of an irresistible conqueror, with the fate of the world lying in his hands; and the aversion thus created was raised to deep enmity by subsequent events, not unlike those which had happened at Madrid two years before. Always engaged in attempts of seduction, as among the chief objects of his existence, Buckingham had no sooner arrived in Paris when he tried to get intimate with the principal court beauties, and with extraordinary audacity offered his gallantries even to the young queen, the wife of Louis XIII. Neglected by her consort, and not much above the standard of the most licentious court in Europe, the royal lady listened with marked favour to the compliments of the handsome English duke, who in a short space of time became her declared lover, and the constant companion of her idle hours. There were rumours whispered about that her majesty had admitted the favourite even to nocturnal meetings; and the scandal became so great that the king himself, very indifferent otherwise to what was going on around him, had a message conveyed to Buckingham, informing him that though as ambassador he enjoyed immunity from the Bastille, he yet was not beyond the reach of secret daggers. The effrontery of the favourite was not abashed by the threat, and he was heard to boast publicly that he would continue to visit the queen against all the power of France. Watching these doings, Richelieu trembled with inward rage. Under his priestly robes and cold diplomatic manners the cardinal hid burning passions; he, too, had lifted his eyes to the youthful queen, but had been spurned and treated with contempt, till his affection was turned into bitter animosity. His hatred now was transferred to his successful rival, and conquered by Buckingham in the field of love, he determined to take his revenge in the field of politics.

After several weeks' festivities, the favourite left the French capital on the 3rd of June, with his charge, Princess Henrietta Maria, accompanied by the young queen and Marie de Medici as far as Amiens, where, as whispered by the court gossips, the matrimonial honour of Louis XIII. was sullied by another clandestine interview. On the 12th of June the illustrious travellers crossed the Channel, and that night Henrietta Maria, who had assumed the title of queen of England, slept at Dover Castle, while King Charles rested at Canterbury. The next morning, his majesty rode forward to receive his spouse, and his meeting her at the castle gave rise to a somewhat lively scene. Since he had seen her in Paris, two years before, Henrietta Maria—now little more than fifteen—had grown considerably, and scarcely knowing her again, Charles looked at her with some surprise. "Then the king," reported an eyewitness, "took her up in his arms, kissed her, and, talking with her, cast down his eyes towards her feet, which she soon perceiving showed him her shoes, saying to this effect, 'Sir, I stand upon my own feet, and have no helps by art; thus high I am, and neither higher nor lower.'" Describing the personal appearance of the new queen consort of England, the witness adds: "She is nimble and quick, black-eyed, brown-haired, and in a word, a brave lady." From Dover, Charles took his nimble and quick little spouse in slow stages, by way of Rochester and Gravesend, to London, entering the city in a splendid barge, but amidst a deluge of rain, as violent as that which had greeted the heralds on the day of proclamation. The people, still scared by the raging of the pestilence, seemed pleased with the lively appearance of the young queen, but looked with ill-concealed dislike upon the long train of priests following in her rear, they appearing to watch every one of her movements, while scowling, with an air of defiance, upon such signs of Protestant worship as were visible around them. The evil impression of the first day was not lessened by what the multitude afterwards learned about the doings and surroundings of the youthful princess whom Buckingham had brought over from France. Zealous Protestants repeated to each other with horror that she had not less than twenty-nine priests with her, besides one bishop, under thirty years of age, and an unknown number of Jesuits and laymen suspected to be Romish agents. Mass was celebrated with great pomp on Sundays and saints' days in the queen's private chapel at Whitehall; and though the king had given orders that none but the servants and attendants of his consort should be admitted, it was believed that the prohibition was not strictly kept up, and that many English subjects, secret and professed Roman Catholics, took advantage of the opportunity to join in the celebration of the rites of their church. Charles himself was not at all pleased with the injudicious ardour of the priestly crowd hanging about his wife, and who were besetting him daily for new favours, while thronging her chamber to such an extent as almost to exclude his presence. In the first week of their arrival they demanded that a chapel should be built for their especial use within or near St. James's Palace, and on the king's refusal, Henrietta Maria put on sullen looks, showing protracted bad humour. By this time Charles as well as others had discovered that though the nimble and quick young lady of fifteen could be very agreeable if she liked, she also understood the art of making herself very disagreeable. "The queen," a court gentleman, master Meade, informed his friend in a letter, "howsoever little of stature, and of pleasing countenance, if she be pleased, is yet full of spirit and vigour, and of more than ordinary resolution. Divers of us being at Whitehall to see her, being at dinner, and the room somewhat over-heated with the fire and the company, she, with one frown, drove us all out of the chamber. I suppose none but a queen could have cast such a scowl."

It was not long before the thoughts of the people were taken off from the new queen to weightier affairs. Writs for a new parliament had been issued soon after the proclamation of Charles, and the session, after several short prorogations, was opened on the 18th of June, a few days after the entry of Henrietta Maria into the capital. The king opened parliament in person, many of the members noting with surprise his wearing a crown, contrary to the custom of English kings previously to their coronation, disregarded in this instance, as many said, through his majesty wishing to express distinctly that he claimed his supreme power by right divine, and not by any election, or popular recognition, which the ceremony of coronation might seem to represent. What was more noted still than the wearing of the crown was, that the king's speech was somewhat peremptory in tone, although sensible on the whole, and agreeably distinguished by its brevity from the long rambling orations of the previous occupant of the throne. But in its purport it was the same: his majesty was in great want of money, and implored the representatives of the people to grant him a supply, as soon as possible, and as large as possible. Charles told the commons with much candour that his father had left him no other legacy but a debt of nearly a million sterling; that his sister and brother-in-law had added to it, and continued adding; and that he himself since his accession had already been compelled to incur large liabilities, so that altogether it was of the utmost necessity to relieve his wants without delay, in order not to impair the honour and dignity of the crown. The speech from the throne gave rise to but few comments, the members agreeing as to the indispensableness of voting a supply, though not as to the amount. Some thought it reasonable, before entering at all upon financial matters to ask the king for the redress of grievances, complained of, but not remedied, in the former reign; others desired an account of the employment of the last subsidy, granted for the recovery of the palatinate; while others again proposed, before doing anything else, to discuss the state of religion, and to insist upon the strict enforcement of the laws against Roman Catholics, some of which, it was said, had been illegally suspended by the government. The last subject at once gave rise to a spirited debate, and seemed on the point of engrossing the attention of parliament, when a mightier topic even than that of religion presented itself to view. The plague knocked at the door of the House of Commons. "While we are now speaking," said a member, interrupting the religious debate, "the death-bell is tolling every minute." Seized by a sudden panic, the commons quickly passed a vote for two subsidies, qualifying the smallness of the grant by the declaration of its being "the first fruit of their love to their prince," and then adjourning their sittings. Not to hear the fatal bell again "tolling every minute," it was decided at the same time that a proposition made by the government should be accepted, which was that parliament should reassemble, at the end of its adjournment, not at Westminster but at Oxford.

The Oxford sittings opened on the appointed day, the 1st of August, amidst universal excitement, caused by the news of strange events which had reached England during the recess. King James, a few months before his death, had consented to accommodate his royal ally, Louis XIII., with the loan of eight men-of-war, one of them a ship of the royal navy, called the "Vanguard," and the others large merchant vessels, heavily armed, and pressed into service for the purpose of making war upon Spain. The agreement concluded with the French monarch was that the eight men-of-war should join his own fleet, about to proceed to the port of Genoa, one of the chief arsenals of Philip IV., and should either make an attack upon that place, or watch the shipping entering and leaving it, capturing as many prizes as offered themselves. At the death of James, the fleet had not yet sailed for Genoa, Louis XIII. having come to the conclusion that he could employ it much better than against the most Catholic king, namely, against his own Protestant subjects. For some time past the Huguenots, suffering under fearful oppression, had taken to arms again to protect their lawful privileges, notably those conceded by Henry IV. in the Edict of Nantes; and to be in a better attitude to treat with the government, they had seized the city and fortress of La Rochelle, old centre of Protestant movements, and which had served many a time before as last refuge of the persecuted martyrs of religion. It was to reconquer the Huguenot city that Louis XIII. stopped the expedition into the Spanish seas, ordering all the ships composing it, including the English vessels, to proceed to Dieppe, and to wait there till being ready to fall in full force upon La Rochelle. King Charles and Buckingham, when applied to give their consent to the new arrangement, were unscrupulous enough to do so; but the officers and crews of the eight men-of-war openly refused to obey the orders communicated to them by the French admiral, and being led towards Dieppe, they broke out into tumult, and forcibly turned their ships homeward, declaring that they would rather be hanged in England than be slaves to the French king and fight against their own religion. They all returned to the Downs, from whence the captain of the "Vanguard," and general commander of the English squadron, Vice-admiral Pennington, wrote to the king, informing him of the mutinous conduct of his crews, and asking for further orders. In the mean time deputies of the Huguenots had arrived in London, imploring the government not to lend

English vessels for their destruction, and the king solemnly promised not to do so; but the assurance had no sooner been given, when Charles, with scandalous duplicity, sent an express to Pennington, commanding him to surrender the "Vanguard" to the French, and to compel the other seven ships, "even to sinking," to follow the example. The vice-admiral obeyed his orders; he laid hold of the merchantmen, fired after them on their attempting to escape, and succeeded in delivering up to the French the whole squadron, except one ship, the "Neptune," the captain of which, Sir Ferdinand Gorges, returned shot for shot, and made his way home. The crews of the seven remaining vessels, even when surrounded by French men-of-war, refused to turn their hands against the Huguenots; they took to the boats and deserted in bodies, some going to the defenders of La Rochelle, and others returning to England. They spread all over the country, their voices raised against the perfidy of King Charles and his advisers.

When Charles opened the adjourned parliamentary session on the 1st of August, in the great hall of Christ Church, Oxford, gloom and resentment were depicted on all countenances. No cheers greeted the speech from the throne, the chief subject of which again was a demand for money to cover the necessities of the royal exchequer, and also "to carry on the war." The king gone, the general indignation burst forth. One member said as war had been spoken of, he should like to know exactly with what power England was at war for the time being, and how the hostilities were carried on, while another, going a step further, boldly denounced Buckingham as the curse of the country, and the originator of the perfidy of lending English ships to attack men dear to the whole nation, the Protestants of La Rochelle. At the second sitting of the commons, it was decided not to grant any further subsidies to the crown till the often complained of grievances were remedied, and the administration of home and foreign affairs carried on in a more honest manner. In the debates that ensued, speaker after speaker repeated that the public money was ill employed, and the king ill advised; that the improvidence of the government had reached such a height that it could be endured no longer; that the war engaged in by the former parliament, and for which subsidies had been voted, was "managed by contrary designs;" and that, finally, they "had reason to petition the king for a stout hand and sounder counsels to manage his affairs." The animosity against Buckingham manifested in the House of Commons was stronger still among the lords, where the earl of Bristol, who, after his return from Spain had been kept under restraint by the favourite, was giving vent to his wrath. After giving a full account of the negotiations for the hand of the infant, he denounced Buckingham as being the sole cause of the rupture with Spain, brought on for merely personal objects, to satisfy his spite against the count of Olivarez, and against the true interest of England. An inquiry was resolved upon, but before it had commenced the favourite came forward with a threat against Bristol. "I am minded," he cried, "to leave that business asleep, not if it should awake, it will prove a lion to devour him who co-operated with Olivarez." On the ninth day of the session the king himself made his appearance in the House of Lords, and summoning the commons to the bar, told them to make haste to vote his supplies; they were losing time, he said, in idle discussions, dangerous, if for no other reason, for that the plague, creeping slowly up from the capital, might reach them. He ended by informing the commons, sarcastically, that if not voting the required subsidies immediately, he would have to take care of their health for them, and, sending them to their homes, try to manage without them and their money. The threat had no other effect than that of bringing on a short discussion about the emergency of granting a supply. A few members seemed in favour of it, on the ground that it would be wise to conciliate the king, whose necessities, as all knew, were really pressing; but in reply to this it was said that more necessity was a bad counsellor, made use of a continual argument for supplies, in all parliaments, and "that those who had put the king and kingdom to such constant necessities and hazards ought to answer for it." A proposition for the impeachment of Buckingham followed in the wake of the debate, on the first news of which Charles abruptly signed an order for the dissolution of parliament. It was read by commission on the 12th of August, the Oxford session having just lasted twelve days. Though short in space of time, it widened immensely the great gulf that was opening between parliament and the throne.

Among the people the sudden dissolution of parliament was little noticed for the moment, the attention of all being absorbed by the dreadful spread of the plague. Superstition added to its terrors; the unheard-of growth of the pestilence, it was said, was a judgment of heaven for the king having wedded a "papist and idolator," and bringing a swarm of priests into the country, who intended upsetting the true faith and light anew the fires of persecution. It was remarked also that the reign of James had commenced with a pestilence, but much milder than the one now raging, which was held to prognosticate evils of far direr import than any that had yet fallen upon the suffering nation. The horrors of the plague were vast enough to generate such and other conceptions. Its fury was greatest in the capital; but the ghastly contagion gradually crept through the provinces and the spirit of self preservation predominating over every other feeling, all intercommunication ceased, towns separating itself from town, and village from village, till the houses themselves became fortresses, and friends and relations looked upon each other with fear and dread. Sir James Whitelock, puisne judge of the court of King's Bench, "a stout, wise, and learned man" was one of the witnesses of the pestilence in the capital, and his son left an appalling description of it in some "Memoirs" which he composed. In the middle of summer, 1625, he says, "the plague so raged in London that in one week there died five thousand persons; it was also spread in many places in the country. In some families, master and mistress, children and servants, were all swept away. For fear of infection, most persons who were to pay money did first put it into a tub of water, and then it was taken out by the person that was to receive it. When the plague was somewhat assuaged, and there died in London but two thousand five hundred in a week, it fell to Judge Whitelock's turn to go to Westminster Hall, to adjourn Michaelmas term from thence to Reading. Accordingly he went from his house in Buckinghamshire to Horton, near Colnbrook, and the next morning early to Hyde Park Corner, where he and his retinue dined on the ground, with such meat and drink as they brought in the coach with them, and afterwards he drove fast through the streets, which were empty of people, and overgrown with grass, to Westminster Hall, where the officers were ready; and the judge and his company went straight to the King's Bench, adjourned the court, returned to his coach, and drove away presently out of town." Another description of the aspect of London under the plague, in the summer of 1625, and the disorganization of all society, was left by William Lilly, who got famous subsequently as "astrologer," but for the time being did not occupy himself with the stars, but was living in the humble capacity of servant to a shopkeeper in the Strand. His employer ran away when the danger of the pestilence became serious, leaving him alone in charge of the house. "My master was no sooner gone," says Lilly, "when I bought a bass viol, and got a teacher to instruct me; the intervals of time I spent in bowling in Lincoln's Inn Fields with Wat the cobbler, Dick the blacksmith, and such like companions. We were sometimes at our work at six in the morning, and continued till three or four in the afternoon, many times without bread or drink all that while. Sometimes I went to church and heard funeral sermons, of which there were great plenty; at other times I went early to St. Antholin's, in the city, where there was every morning a sermon. The most able people of the city and suburbs were out of town; if any remained, it was such as were engaged by parish officers to remain. No habit of a gentleman or woman continued. The woful calamity of that year was grievous, people dying in the open fields and in the streets. At last, in August, the bills of mortality had so increased that very few people had thoughts of surviving the contagion." The plague did not cease in London till October, by which time the great city had assumed the stillness of a graveyard. No war, however fierce, could have produced a title of the ravages of the hideous pestilence, sprung, according to the Puritans, from want of godliness, but, in good truth, rather from want of cleanliness.

Charles exhibited considerable personal bravery during the whole time of the plague, due in part to the entire occupation of his mind with a great scheme propounded by Buckingham. Seeing all his popularity gone, and an impeachment hanging over his head, in the event of the meeting of another parliament, which was inevitable, the favourite had conceived the idea of making himself the darling of the nation once more by striking a grand stroke against Spain, productive if successful, of fame as well as riches. The plan was simply to walk in the steps of the sea-kings, or pirates, of the reign of Elizabeth, and by waylaying the "plate fleet" on the return from America, to turn the vast stream of treasure flowing periodically from the West Indies into Spain for a moment upon England. But to lay hold of the Spanish gold, English gold was required in the first instance; and to obtain it, and the means for fitting out a fleet, Charles and Buckingham set to work with a zeal worthy of a nobler cause. Letters under the privy seal were issued to all the nobility, gentry, and clergy, to all the officials under government and of town corporations, to all landowners, and to every man in the kingdom known to be possessed of any means, entreating the persons named to contribute to the wants of the king, and aid him in defending the state against its enemies, with hints that, in case of non-compliance, more would be taken by force than was now asked from the free goodwill of his majesty's subjects. The letters, more decisive in tone than the old appeals for benevolence, and likewise more forcible by coming directly from the crown, resulted in the flow of considerable sums into the royal exchequer; and the money thus gathered being carefully husbanded, Charles reducing his own expenditure to the lowest dimensions, stopping all court festivities, and depriving himself even of personal luxuries, it was found possible to buy and hire a fleet of eighty vessels, most of them of small size, and to press into service nearly ten thousand people, landsmen, and sailors, the scum of the seaport towns. Having succeeded thus far, Buckingham induced the states of Holland to add a squadron of sixteen sail, all good ships, manned by thoroughly efficient mariners, to the fleet he had raised, representing to them the expedition as a sort of a religious crusade against the arch-enemy of Protestantism, and, what detracted nothing from its pious aspect in the eyes of the Dutch, proving that it was certain to pay cent. per cent. The sixteen sail of the Netherlands were a most valuable addition to the undertaking, but it was not obtained without a very serious drawback, all but destroying its advantages. The king and Buckingham had kept the destination of the fleet which they were preparing the greatest secret, bent heart and soul upon the success of the enterprise, and conscious that it was to be obtained only by strict concealment of their movements. But the secrecy was destroyed the moment negotiations were opened with the states general; the members of the republican government could not keep their tongues, and some weeks "ere the fleet went out of the Downs," as stated by James Howell, "the 'Mercurius Gallo-Belgicus' had it in print that it was for the strait's mouth." The doings of the "Mercurius," one of the first handlings of the periodical press, were sufficient to disgust King Charles for ever with the insignificant-looking yet formidable little sheets of printed matter, regularly issued, that sprang up in his reign, and which the world came to denominate newspapers.

Having collected his armament, with orders to join the Dutch squadron in the Downs, Buckingham made a fatal blunder by appointing to the command-in-chief of the expedition one of his personal friends, Lord Wimbledon, a man of sense and of some accomplishments, but utterly destitute of both naval and military knowledge. Wimbledon himself protested against the choice, but the king, obstinate in carrying out whatever his favourite advised, insisted that he should accept the appointment, declaring, what was but too true, that he had no real sea-captains among his subjects, and basing thereupon the argument that a landsman, not devoid of brains, might as well direct a fleet, intended not to give a great battle, but to capture a comparatively defenceless crowd of half-armed merchantmen, as some nominal admiral and vice admiral. Further opposition being out of the question, Wimbledon took his post as ordered, at the commencement of October, 1625; and, giving the signal, the seventy-six ships, largest fleet that had been seen in the Channel since the time of the Invincible Armada, lifted their anchors in the Downs, and steered southward. The weather was favourable till the Bay of Biscay was reached, where a gale scattered the ships, driving one of them, the "Jang Robin," upon the French coast, leaving one hundred and thirty men to be swallowed up by the waves. Disasters now followed each other thick and fast, and the commander confessing his own helplessness in referring everything to the deliberation of so-called councils of war, composed of men as ignorant of naval affairs as himself, complete anarchy broke out in the fleet. Some advising to fight the Spaniards on land, others on sea, and others half way between land and sea, in some convenient harbour, Lord Wimbledon, with strong predilections for the firm earth on which he had lived all his life, decided finally on adopting the first counsel, and set some five thousand men ashore near Cadiz, with orders to take the city by storm. The five thousand, dregs of the low population of London, Portsmouth, and Plymouth, did not much like the storming operation, and instead of marching straight along the road to Cadiz, they dispersed into the country to right and left, in sharp look-out for cash-boxes, valuables of all kinds, and, more than everything else, good wine. Of the latter article there was abundance; the wine harvest of the year had been plentiful, and the produce being excellent, the invaders did so far justice to it as to get dead drunk at every opportunity. The enraged peasantry now took up the defence of the country and of their homes, and began killing the drunken creatures with spades and knives, not without frightful cruelty, tearing off ears, and plucking out eyes. It was with great trouble Wimbledon got one-half the men he had sent on shore back to the ships, and, setting sail again, he had to learn that while his soldiers had been invading the cellars of the Cadiz wine merchants, the great "plate fleet," carrying a gigantic amount of treasure, twice that of any preceding year, had run into Lisbon, quite safe and undisturbed. In the hope of laying hands upon a stray carrack, he made his way again to the north, hugging the Spanish coast, but had not got far when a contagious fever broke out on board one or two of the vessels, which led him to issue an insane order for the distribution of the sick invalids all over the fleet. Incapacity could go no further, and the last decree of the commander-in-chief settled the fate of the expedition. Without a single prize, with a death-list of five thousand, and with all his ships turned into floating hospitals, Wimbledon made his way back to England, and after a three months' absence returned to Plymouth, where the mob, after much hooting and hissing, made an attempt to stone him. The rabble of the old seaport town might have forgiven the noble lord the loss of life caused by his incompetency for the post he was filling, but they could never pardon that he had brought back no gold.

The king, among whose good qualities was a disinclination to vindictiveness, showed more sorrow than anger on learning the disgraceful failure of the expedition on which he had set such high hopes, and instead of signing a warrant for the arrest of the unfortunate commander, as demanded by several of his enemies, merely forbade him to appear at court. But even this seemed hard measure to Lord Wimbledon, and he bitterly complained to his friend and protector, Buckingham, of the treatment. "I have been your officer," he said, "in as difficult and miserable an action as ever any one hath undertaken, and with as little assistance as ever any one had, for many of those who should have assisted me were more careful in betraying me than in forwarding his majesty's service." He reminded the favourite, moreover, that the place of commander-in-chief had been forced upon him, absolutely against his own will, and that he had gone so far, in order to escape the responsibility thrust upon him, as to warn the king that evil would happen through the appointment; "and had it not been for my obedience to his majesty," he added, "and my good affection to your excellency, I would rather have been torn in pieces than to have gone with so many ignorant and malicious people." It was impossible for Buckingham not to see the justice of these arguments; but something remained to be done to wipe out the damage and disgrace of the Spanish enterprise, and after consulting with the king, it was decided to make a great attempt towards regaining the palatinate. In the first instance, with a view towards this object, Buckingham resolved to form an army to attack the forces of Philip IV. holding possession of the German provinces on the lower Rhine; and money being again the primary requisite, Charles gave his consent to the sale of the superfluous plate in the royal household, as well as the pawning of the crown jewels. To effect this object, and at the same time enter into treaties with the states general for carrying out the war on the Continent, Buckingham himself went to the Netherlands, where he was so far successful as to raise the sum of three hundred thousand pounds from the pawnbrokers of Amsterdam and the Hague, leaving the regalia of England with the Hebrew individuals advancing the cash, and who put them by in their grimy stores, among other articles of a miscellaneous nature. More difficult than this financial transaction were the diplomatic negotiations upon which Buckingham entered next with the government of the states general. The political leaders of the republic, reasonably angry for the total failure of their cent. per cent. expectations in the Cadiz lottery, absolutely refused to connect themselves in any way with the new speculation in Germany, distrustful of Buckingham's ability to procure either good soldiers, or a general able to cope with such veterans as Spinola and Tilly, and equally distrustful of the sovereign in whose name the war was to be undertaken, the prince palatine. The brother-in-law of Charles had been living now for more than four years with his wife and children in Holland, dependent entirely upon the bounty of his English relatives, and so far degraded by misfortune as to lose all the nobler qualities of his character, his former religious enthusiasm turning gradually into scepticism, his princely freedom into vulgarity, and his high-handed munificence into parsimoniousness. The last was a quality too well known to the Dutch themselves to endure it in a foreigner; and seeing the royal refugee live in a style not better than that of a pushing cow-keeper, or dealer in herrings, and in order to save a few pence, travel in the common market boats, among peasants and labourers, they had come to feel a profound contempt for him, firm in the belief of the "Winter King" having lost all chances of rising in the world. After a month's stay at the Hague, Buckingham found that there was no hope to engage the Dutch government to help him reconquering the palatinate, and he thereupon prepared to bend his steps to Paris. The journey into France had been contemplated by him for some time, and with much eagerness, due less to the desire of meeting with the ministers of Louis XIII. than that of meeting with his wife.

In preparing to revisit France, Buckingham had forgotten the existence of a formidable enemy to his own private objects, a man whose greatness he as yet was unable to acknowledge, and of whose political power even he had no true conception. Cardinal Richelieu had no sooner heard that the audacious lover of the queen intended to present himself again at court, when he interposed his fiat, positively prohibiting the mighty favourite to cross the frontier. Affronted beyond measure, yet the more eager under increasing difficulties to see the royal lady upon whom he had temporarily set his affections, Buckingham sent one of his intimate friends, the earl of Holland, to Paris, to examine the state of affairs at the court of Louis XIII., so as to discover whether the French government would really dare to risk his enmity should he insist upon not allowing himself to be excluded from the kingdom. The report of the earl left no hopes for Buckingham to be able to enter France, or at least to get out of it alive. "I have been a careful spy to observe intentions and affections towards you," the envoy wrote, "and I find many things to be feared, and none to be assured of a safe welcome. For the king continues in his suspicions, making as they say very often discourses of it, and is willing to hear the cardinal say that the queen hath infinite affections—you imagine which way. They say there is whispered among the foolish young bravados of the court that he is not a good Frenchman who suffers you to return out of France, considering the reports that are raised. Many such bruits fly up and down. I have since my coming given the queen mother, by way of discourse, occasion to say somewhat concerning you, as the other night, when she complained to me that things were carried harshly in England towards France," alluding to the excitement caused by the loan of the men-of-war to serve against the Huguenots; "I then said that the greatest unkindness and harshness came from hence, even to forbid your coming hither, a thing so strange and so unjust, as our master had cause, and was infinitely sensible of it. She then fell into discourse of you, desiring you would respect and love her daughter, and likewise that she had and ever would command her to respect you and follow you, and follow your counsels, with many professions of value and respect unto your person; but would never either answer what I complained of, or invite you to come hither." Cardinal Richelieu did not know what he was doing in interfering with the amours of George Villiers, son of a Leicestershire squire, perfect dancer, pink of politeness, and model of elegance at the court of two kings. No sooner had Buckingham learnt that the refusal of his entering France and making love to the young wife of the sovereign was absolute, when he arrived at a grand resolution. It was nothing less than to reverse the policy of England, and to make war upon Louis XIII., ally of the German Protestants, at the same time with fighting against Philip IV., chief enemy of the Protestants. Good luck and the talent of his dancing-master having given the fate of a great nation into his hands, Buckingham could not conceive why the nation should not assist him in carrying out his personal amusements, as well as his little bits of personal spite.

With his determination fixed, the favourite returned to England in January, 1626, to prepare for war, as well as to grace by his presence two events of importance, the coronation of the king and the opening of another parliament. The coronation took place on the 2nd of February, and was marked by a display of extraordinary pomp and ceremoniousness, so as to be, in the words of a contemporary, "one of the most punctual since the conquest." It was distinguished further by the absence of the queen, who had begun to quarrel continuously with her royal husband, owing in part to the interference of Buckingham, and who now refused to be crowned, declining even to go as a spectator to Westminster Abbey, contenting herself to look upon the procession from a window at Whitehall, while the ladies of her suit kept frisking and dancing around her, as if to express their contempt of the magnificent show. But the absence of the consort of Charles was more than atoned for by the brilliant appearance of the favourite, who had taken upon himself for the day the duties of lord high constable, and as such guided the king to the throne, and kept close to his side during the whole of the ceremony. Charles on his part neglected nothing to distinguish his friend, and on Buckingham stretching forth his arm to lead him to his regal seat, offered his own hand in return, while exclaiming, full of smiles, "I have as much need to help you, as you to assist me." The coronation rite was performed by Archbishop Abbot, who, after having anointed the king's naked shoulders, hands, arms, and head, behind a screen, in order not to offend the Puritans, who looked upon these observances as popish abominations, brought his majesty forward to present him to the crowd within the abbey. "My masters and friends," the primate exclaimed, "I am here come to present unto you your king, King Charles, to whom the crown of his ancestors and predecessors is now devolved by lineal right, and he himself come hither to be settled in that throne which God and his birth have appointed for him, and therefore I desire you, by your general acclamation, to testify your consent and willingness thereunto." A dead pause ensued, not a voice being lifted to greet the king, who was standing there bare-headed, with the favourite to his right, and the archbishop to the left. The suspense becoming painful, the earl marshal, Lord Arundel, stepped forth from the midst of the royal guards, and in commanding tone desired the people to cry "God save King Charles." Many of the spectators now responded to the appeal, and the shout arose on all sides, faintly echoed by the people without the abbey, "Long live King Charles." Languid and weak as were the cries, they plainly told that the hearts of his people were not with King Charles.

Four days after the coronation, on the 6th of February, 1626, the king opened his second parliament. Charles went in person to Westminster, but did not deliver the speech from the throne, leaving the duty to the lord keeper, Sir Thomas Coventry, successor of Bishop Williams, who had offended the favourite, and been chased from his post. The oration pronounced by the new lord keeper was a very singular one, not a little astounding to the hearers. "If we consider aright," Sir Thomas told the lords and commons, "and think of that incomparable distance between the supreme height and majesty of a mighty monarch, and the submissive awe and lowliness of loyal subjects, we cannot but receive exceeding comfort and contentment in the frame and constitution of this highest court, wherein not only the prelates, nobles, and grandees, but the commons of all degrees have their part, and wherein that high majesty doth descend to admit, or rather to invite, the humblest of his subjects to counsel or conference with him." Making a large allowance for official hyperbolism, the commons yet thought the language somewhat too strong, and hastened to show the king that they did not agree with it. As always, the demand for subsidies had been the chief topic of the speech from the throne, and the house forthwith resolved that no question of a grant could be entertained as long as the government refused to remedy old and new grievances. A formidable list of these was drawn up at once and presented to the king. The principal points dwelt upon were the continued abuses in the levying of illegal taxes, imposts, and customs duties; the exaction of benevolences, specially prohibited by acts of parliament; the creation of new monopolies, patents, and privileges; the sale of honours and places of judicature; the prodigality and malversation of the servants of the crown; the misemployment of three subsidies and three fifteenths voted by previous parliaments; and, finally, "the not guarding of the narrow seas," and "the diminution of the kingdom in strength and honour." In the wake of the long list of complaints followed accusations against Buckingham, pointed out as "the great delinquent." To subdue the gathering storm, and prevent, if possible, the threatened impeachment from taking effect, Buckingham lost no time to make the king interfere, and Charles, at his dictation, addressed a message to the House of Commons. "I must let you know," his majesty informed the house, that I will not allow any of my servants to be questioned among you, much less such as are of eminent place, and none unto me. The old question was what shall be done to the man whom the king shall honour; but now it has been the labour of some to seek what may be done against him whom the king thinks fit to honour. I see you especially aim at the duke of Buckingham: I wonder what has so altered your affection towards him. I do well remember his favour with you in the last parliament of my father's time; what he hath done since to alter and change your minds I know not; but can assure you he hath not meddled or done anything concerning the public or commonwealth but by special directions, and as my servant." Charles concluded, "I wish you would hasten my supply, or else it will be worse for yourselves, for, if any ill happen, I shall be the last that shall feel it." The threat was replied to by an energetic protest of the members of the lower house, followed by the impeachment of Buckingham. "It is the ancient, constant, and undoubted right and usage of parliaments," the commons exclaimed, "to question and complain of all persons, of what degree soever, found dangerous to the commonwealth, in abusing the power and trust committed to them by the sovereign." The impeachment of Buckingham was resolved upon after a long and serious deliberation of the united lords and commons, held within doors locked and bolted, the chief speaker and accuser of the favourite being Sir John Eliot, a Cornish gentleman, and representative of Cornwall. With undaunted courage, fully conscious that he risked his head in the words he was uttering, he charged Buckingham with ruining the country by his pride, selfishness, and ambition, winding up his speech by comparing him to Sejanus, the blood-stained minion and prime minister of the Emperor Tiberius. A thrill of excitement seized the assembly, when Eliot, having drawn his full-length picture of the English Sejanus, exclaimed, "My lords, you see the man!"

Charles was transported with rage on hearing that the act of impeachment had passed. He instantly ordered the arrest of Sir John Eliot, as well as of another member, Sir Dudley Digges, who had seconded his motion; and while both were being dragged to the Tower he himself hurried to the lords, to tell them to beware of his anger in sitting as judges in the trial of the duke. Fearful of carrying matters to extremity, the peers seemed to hesitate for a moment, and on the lower house forwarding a message requesting that Buckingham might be committed to custody, they declined to comply with the demand. To follow up the advantage thus obtained, the court party in the commons, not very numerous, but possessing a few good speakers, made a great effort to stay further hostilities by pointing to the dangers of the struggle. Sir Dudley Carleton, ambassador to the states-general, and a warm adherent of Buckingham, who had lifted him to his post, was the first to come forward with an harangue which created great stir, though not of the kind desired by the orator. He told the commons that having long lived abroad, he had seen the poverty and wretchedness existing among continental nations, compared with whose state that of England was a paradise. "In foreign countries," Sir Dudley cried, "the people look not like ours, with store of flesh on their backs, but like ghosts, being nothing but skin and bones, with some thin cover to their nakedness, and wearing wooden shoes on their feet: a misery beyond expression, and that we are yet free from." The commons listened to the argument of the "store of flesh" on the backs of Englishmen being due to the king and his favourite with great demonstrations of incredulity; and on the speaker concluding, "Let us be careful then to preserve the king's good opinion of parliaments, which bringeth happiness to this nation, and makes us envied of all others," a storm of indignation broke loose. "To the bar! to the bar!" many of the members shouted, resolute to have the courtier ask pardon on his knees for the foolish things he had uttered, implying, as was thought, a menace on the part of Buckingham of his being able to reduce the whole English people to slavery, indigence, and wretchedness, or, perhaps, even to that culmination of all earthly distress, the "wearing of wooden shoes," truly characterized as "a misery beyond expression." A humble apology saved the ambassador from going to the bar, and the incident passed, the house resolved itself into a grand committee, protesting against the imprisonment of two of their members, after which the indictment against Buckingham was proceeded with. The accusation consisted of thirteen separate charges, the principal of which were, that he had invested himself with several of the highest offices of state, never before held by one person; that he had procured unjustly honours and wealth for his poor kindred and worthless dependants; that he had sold places of trust under government and in the courts of law; that he had appropriated to himself large sums from the royal exchequer; that he had culpably neglected his duties of high admiral; that he had extorted the sum of ten thousand pounds from the company of East India merchants, by staying their vessels from sailing; that he had caused the "Vanguard" and other ships to be given up to the French king, knowing them to be designed against the Protestants of La Rochelle; and, lastly, that he had given, or caused to be given, a plaister and potion to King James, in his mortal illness, "a transcendent presumption of a dangerous quality." The impeachment framed, it was carried, on the 8th of May, to the upper house, and another vote was passed by a large majority, requesting the lords to commit the duke of Buckingham to the Tower.

Buckingham showed no signs of fear under the storm that was breaking over him. Confident in the power of royalty to protect him, he treated the accusation of the commons in an off-hand manner, with a sort of calm mockery, and while the impeachment was hanging over his head went in as candidate for the high honorary dignity of chancellor of the university of Cambridge, which had become vacant by the death of the earl of Suffolk. The election was carried in his favour, at the interference of the king, who made the choice of his friend a question of loyalty to the throne; and the result so much pleased Charles that he addressed a public letter of thanks to the members of the university, commending them for their obedience to the royal mandate, and at the same time praising and vindicating the duke. Choosing to consider his election to the Cambridge chancellorship as a popular protest against the animosity of the House of Commons, Buckingham got more elated than ever, riding about publicly at the side of the king, and accompanying him to parliament to elude the commons for their insolent behaviour. "I have been too remiss, hitherto," Charles exclaimed, addressing the lords, in complaint of the doings of the lower house, "in punishing such speeches as concern myself: not that I was greedy of their moneys, but that Buckingham, through his importunity, would not suffer me to take notice of them, lest he might be thought to have set me on, that he might come the forwarder to his trial. And to approve his innocency, as touching the matters against him, I myself can be a witness to clear him in every one of them." The king's speech was followed by an address of Buckingham, containing his defence against all the articles laid to his charge in the indictment of the commons. He denied either altogether, or explained and extenuated the charges of corruption and extortion; slurred over and scarcely touched such points as the lending of ships to France and the giving of the "black plaster" to King James; and for the rest, and in all the main points, sheltered himself by the plea that all that he had done had been in absolute obedience to the late and the present king, and that he had never been anything else but a humble servant of royalty. The peers did not receive the defence as warmly as Buckingham expected, refusing even to transmit it to the commons, and it became clear, more and more, that nothing could save him but an immediate dissolution. To prepare for the step, most serious under the circumstances, the king despatched another message to the Speaker of the lower house, pressing for the vote of supplies. "We hold it necessary by these our letters," his majesty wrote to the leader of the commons, "to give them this our last and final admonition, and to let them know that we shall account all further delays and excuses to be express denials, and therefore we will and require you to signify unto them that we do expect that they do forthwith bring in their bill of subsidy, to be passed without delay or condition, so as it may fully pass the house by the end of next week at the furthest, which if they do not, it will force us to take other resolutions." Having decided already that the reform of grievances and, above all, dismissal of Buckingham should precede the vote of any supply, the commons began to frame a declaration acquainting the king with their resolve; but the debate had scarcely commenced, when the usher of the Black Rod summoned them to the bar of the House of Lords. At the foot of the throne stood the royal commissioners, preparing to read the decree dissolving parliament, awaiting only to begin their task the return of some of the peers who had hurried to Charles, imploring him as he valued the peace of the realm, his own happiness, and that of his subjects, not to take the hasty course advised by Buckingham. On his refusal, they begged, more passionately still, that he might suspend his resolution at least for a few days, but the reply of the king was, "Not a minute." The commissioners now read the royal decree; and the same day, the 15th of June, 1626, the gates of the houses of parliament were closed, and the members returned to their homes. Before dispersing, the commons issued a protest against the acts of the government, which they had printed and dispersed among the people, but which the king ordered to be burnt. Charles had yet to find that fire was but a poor weapon of defence against the printing press.

Buckingham's first effort after the dissolution of parliament was to get money. The cash raised by the pawning of the crown jewels had long been spent, and once more the royal exchequer was perfectly empty; and being in urgent want of fresh supplies, not only for the ordinary objects of expenditure, but to make preparations for carrying out his war schemes against France, he made desperate efforts to procure the required treasure, not scrupling how or where to get it. As a commencement, writs were issued under the privy seal, demanding loans from the nobility, and all men of property, as well as all town corporations, the sums to be advanced being fixed in each case, and set at a high figure, that of the city of London, among others, at the large sum of one hundred thousand pounds. Together with the privy-seal writs, letters were issued to the people in general, calling for a benevolence, equal in amount to three parliamentary subsidies, while at the same time commissions were granted to the archbishop of York, and other bishops and church dignitaries, to compound with the Roman Catholics of their dioceses for all acts of recusancy committed by them since the tenth year of the reign of James, or which should be committed by them in future, for any term not exceeding forty-one years, such compositions to be held good, "any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding." All this being not deemed sufficient to raise the sums required by Buckingham, the king issued a decree ordering that the duties of tonnage and poundage should be levied and paid in the same manner and to the same amount as if voted by parliament; and to coerce the people into payment, commissions of muster and array were given to the lord lieutenants of the various counties, with large powers, never before known, of executing martial law in case of "invasions, insurrections, and riots." More ingenious still, the power of the church was brought in aid of the illegal loan and tax-gatherers, by the king sending round, in his own name, a set of instructions to the clergy, enjoining them to preach the merits of lending or giving money without authority of parliament, and to make this duty appear as essential to salvation. The instructions, most skilfully worded, and which had much of the desired effect, were drawn up by a very remarkable man, advanced and patronized by Buckingham, and fast rising into fame, William Laud, the son of a clothier at Reading, who had come to be bishop of St. David's, with aims not stopping short of the primacy. Under Laud's guidance and supreme direction, a regular confederacy of clergymen, mostly of Romanist tendencies, had been forming for some time, with the avowed object of taking an active part in the contest that was opening between two great powers and two great principles—a king, claiming to rule by divine right, and to be infallible like the pontifex, on the one side, and a puritanical parliament, Protestant in politics as well as religion, on the other. The dissolution of the second parliament of Charles was the signal for the commencement of the religious agitation; and soon a number of pulpits throughout the country began to resound with sermons full of the doctrine of the divine right of kings, and the duty of subjects to render passive obedience in all things to the anointed of the Lord. But the preaching in most places took very little effect. The people everywhere had become instinctively conscious that having done with a divine-right pope, there was no room left on English soil for a divine-right king; and the question coming home directly to all by an appeal in the simplest form, one to pockets and purses, the response, too, was of the simplest and most decisive kind. "No parliament, no money!" the London populace shouted; and "No parliament, no money!" the people repeated all over the kingdom.

By the combination of all the new means of exaction, very large sums of money were raised, allowing Buckingham to hire ships and enlist soldiers for the war against Louis XIII., which, in the first instance, was to shape itself into assistance given to the Huguenots. Before entering upon hostilities abroad, the favourite found it requisite to fight a small battle at home against the same enemy, and to expel the crowd of French priests and ladies in attendance who had come into England with the queen, and who, being made aware of his newly-born Huguenot sympathies, moved heaven and earth to destroy his influence. The task of getting rid of the small army of Frenchmen and Frenchwomen snugly settled at the English court was not very difficult, inasmuch as the strangers suffered not only under excessive unpopularity, but had come to be greatly disliked by the king himself, who felt disgusted with their constant claims upon his purse and his power, and fancied, besides, not without reason, that they were withdrawing from him the affections of his wife. The measure of the offences of the priests and priestly assistants got full to overflowing on their entering, in the summer of 1626, upon the mad step of leading the queen to Tyburn, to do penance at the foot of the gallows on which Father Garnet, the chief of the English Jesuits, and other participators of the gunpowder plot, had been hung, or, in Roman Catholic phraseology, had received the crown of martyrdom. It was enough to raise a tremendous outcry of the puritanical clergy against the doings at court; and in the heat of it, prompted and led by Buckingham, the king determined to cast out his French tormentors by the most summary process. The deed was accomplished not without trouble, amusingly sketched in the letter of master John Pory, one of his majesty's grooms in attendance. "On Monday last, about noon," John Pory informed a friend, towards the end of July, 1626, about six weeks after the dissolution of parliament, "the king came into the queen's apartment, and finding some Frenchmen, her servants, unreverently dancing and curveting in her presence, took her by the hand and led her into his lodgings, locking the door after him, and shutting out all, save only the queen. Presently, upon this, my Lord Conway called forth the French bishop, and others of that clergy, into St. James's Park, where he told them the king's pleasure was that all her majesty's servants of that nation, men and women young and old, should depart the kingdom; he also gave the reasons that enforced his majesty so to do. The bishop stood much upon it, that being in the nature of an ambassador, he could not go unless the king his master should command him; but he was told again that the king his master had nothing to do here in England, and that, if he were unwilling to go, England would find force enough to convey him hence. The bishop had as much reason to be loth to depart as the king and all his well-affected subjects had to send him packing, for he had as much power of conferring orders, and dispensing sacraments and oaths, as the pope could give, and so by consequence was a most dangerous instrument to work the pope's ends here. The king's message being thus delivered by my Lord Conway, his lordship, accompanied by master Treasurer, and master Comptroller, went into the queen's lodgings, and told likewise all the French that were there that his majesty's pleasure was they should all depart thence to Somerset House, and remain there till they heard further of his majesty's pleasure. The women howled and lamented as if they had been going to execution, but all in vain, for the yeomen of the guard, by my lord's appointment, thrust them and all their country folks out of the queen's lodgings, and locked the doors upon them. It is said that the queen, when she understood the design, grew very impatient, and brake the glass windows with her fist; but since, I hear, her rage is appeased, and the king and she, since they went to Nonsuch, have been very jocund together." Young Henrietta Maria had too much of the blood of the Italian Medici in her to find many admirers in her adopted country; and now sober English Protestants blamed her as severely for breaking windowpanes at St. James's, as for getting "jocund," immediately after, at Nonsuch.

In moving the tribe of French priests and bed-chamber women from St. James's Palace to Somerset House, the king had taken but the first step towards their expulsion, and he had to find that the second, to get them across the Channel, was equally, if not more difficult. Not to have too much shrieking and howling from the women, Charles commenced by trying the power of fair words, backed by liberal bribes, and with this object went on a personal visit to Somerset House. "He went thither," John Pory informed his friend, "and made a speech to them, to this purpose. That he hoped the king his good brother of France would not take amiss what he had done, for though he would not tax particular persons, yet the French servants had occasioned many jars and discontents between the queen and him, such indeed as longer were insufferable. He prayed them, therefore, to pardon him if he sought his own ease and safety, telling them moreover that he had given orders to his treasurer to reward every one of them with a year's service. So the next morning there was distributed among them eleven thousand pounds in money, and about twenty thousand pounds' worth of jewels." The French greedily pocketed the money and the jewels, and everything else they could lay hands upon, including, as reported indignantly by John Pory, "all the queen's apparel and linen," leaving "but one gown and two smocks at her back."

and still, after all, refused to go, pleading that they must wait for orders from France. But Charles's patience now was at an end, and determined to finish with the dreadful people who were sticking to him like leeches, he sent a short, and not a little characteristic note, dated "Oaking, the 7th of August," to Buckingham, in reply to one from the favourite, complaining of the obstreperousness of the Somerset House guests. "Steeny," his majesty wrote, "I have received your letter by Dick Graham: this is my answer. I command you to send all the French away to-morrow, out of the town. If you can, by fair means, but stick not long in disputing; otherwise force them away like so many wild beasts, until ye have shipped them, and so the devil go with them. Let me hear no answer but the performance of my command. So I rest your faithful, constant, loving friend, Charles Rex." Buckingham hastened to carry out the order within the specified time. By his directions, "the captain of the guard, attended with a competent number of his yeomen, as likewise with heralds, messengers, and trumpeters, went to proclaim his majesty's pleasure at Somerset House gate, which, if not speedily obeyed, the yeomen of the guard were to put in execution, by turning all the French out of the house, head and shoulders, and shutting the gate after them. Which news the French no sooner heard, when their courage came down, and they yielded to be gone the next tide." Not to leave anything more to the goodwill of the stiff-backed foreigners, several of whom, especially the young bishop, "stood upon their punctilios," Buckingham had them packed into barges, by the yeomen of the guard, and transported to Gravesend, and from thence, in forty coaches, groaning under the weight of luggage, to Dover, where they were safely shipped for Calais. The queen, hearing of the treatment her friends were undergoing, once more set to breaking window-panes, besides tearing her hair and storming against Buckingham, regarding him as the author of all her troubles. "Steeny" succeeded in quieting her, when at the height of excitement, by a terrible hint, fearfully expressive of the position he had come to assume. "Madam," said the favourite, "there have been queens in England who have lost their heads on the scaffold." Royalty was falling very low to lead subjects to utter such words.

At the court of France the expulsion of the queen's attendants was generally looked upon as the forerunner of a declaration of war on the part of England. Louis XIII., stirred from his usual apathy by the moanings and maledictions of the proscribed priests, expressed his readiness even to commence the struggle; but Cardinal Richelieu, not misled by passion, but holding steadfast to the dictates of cool statesmanship, thought otherwise, and on his demand the king consented to send a special ambassador to London, to see whether peace could not be maintained. The envoy, François de Bassompierre, marshal of France, distinguished for his military genius, his wit, and his profligacy, landed in England at the end of September, and was received on his arrival in a very friendly manner both by the king and Buckingham, the latter buoyed by the hope of the marshal being the bearer of some love-token from the fair spouse of Louis XIII., which might lead to his seeing her again. A private interview having destroyed his anticipations in this respect, Buckingham did his best to excite Charles against the French government, and succeeded so well that at a private audience granted to Bassompierre a fortnight after his arrival, the king showed inclinations to lay his hands upon him. After a warm discussion, arising out of remarks about the treatment which the queen's servants had received, Charles suddenly exclaimed, excited by some words which he construed into a threat, "Why do you not execute your commission at once, and declare war against me?" and on the ambassador replying, somewhat pretentiously, "I am not a herald to declare war, but a marshal of France, to make it when declared," the king got into the most violent anger. Fearing that blows might be struck, Buckingham, who was standing by, with his hat on, showing his usual want of deference to his royal friend and master, then threw himself between the two antagonists, and, crying out in a familiar manner, "I am come to make peace between you two," made an end of the quarrel. Bassompierre was, or professed to be, utterly shocked at the impertinence of the duke in the action; but it had the effect nevertheless of making him very anxious for further private audiences with Buckingham, instead of with his majesty, judging very truly that the great questions of peace or war could be far better solved in the former than in the latter. It was not long before the gay and gallant marshal and the sprightly favourite came to understand each other. Buckingham made no secret to his new diplomatic confidant that all he wanted was to be permitted to visit the court of Louis XIII. and his queen freely, and as a honoured guest, and that at this price he would guarantee not only the maintenance of good relations between England and France, but would bring about a more intimate alliance than had ever before existed between the two governments. The terms appeared fair to Bassompierre, who individually deemed himself justified to assist any man in making love to any woman, whether a queen or a sempstress; and feeling desirous, besides, for complicated political reasons, springing out of the turmoil of French party contests, to help in maintaining peace with England, he worked hard to get the propositions of Buckingham accepted by his own government. However, though Louis XIII. had relapsed into his habitual indolence, and the queen mother interposed no obstacles to the scheme which would lead her fair daughter-in-law into a renewal of her love intrigues, Cardinal Richelieu remained firm in his old resolution, and his final instructions to the marshal-ambassador were that Buckingham could not be permitted to revisit the French court on any account. Before the mandate arrived, the favourite, trusting in the vague assurances of Bassompierre, had gone so far as to get the king to sign his appointment as ambassador extraordinary to France, and the last check received therefore added the anger of wounded pride to his amorous disappointment. Seeing that his mission to England had come to an end, the marshal left in the middle of December, accompanied as far as Canterbury by Buckingham, who was hoping against hope that the decision against him would be reversed. Bassompierre had fresh letters from his government before reaching Dover, but they only contained another negative to his proposals, which he conveyed in a polite note to the favourite, and then set sail across the Channel. Buckingham hurled after him a declaration of war against France.

The commencement of the struggle was not quite so easy as expected by the favourite. He had hoped that his announcement of giving aid to the oppressed French Protestants would raise a storm of religious enthusiasm all through the kingdom, similar to that which had lifted him to the height of popularity after breaking with Spain; but the expectation was not fulfilled, the deep sympathy for the Huguenots on the one side being counteracted by the equally deep distrust of his own motives. It was impossible for the people not to remember that but a year before Buckingham had lent English ships of war to the king of France to ruin the very men he now wanted to protect; and though accustomed of late to great changes and shiftings of policy, this one appeared too sudden to all to be looked upon with any kind of confidence. Nevertheless the war preparations, entered upon energetically by the favourite, had the usual result of creating a war fever, which went gradually growing in intensity until it had acquired all the dimensions needful for the execution of the first part of the project, that of relieving La Rochelle, the inhabitants of which, after a short period of peace, had again risen against the government, and had drawn a royal army under their walls. With the growing tide of popular excitement, money as well as troops came flowing in faster and faster, until Buckingham found himself once more the hero of the day, with half a million sterling at his command, and seven thousand men willing to fight for him. Having appointed himself commander-in-chief of the expedition, the favourite set sail from Portsmouth, in nearly a hundred small ships, on the 27th of June, 1627, and after being rudely tossed about the Channel for a fortnight, came to anchor at the isle of Oleron, opposite La Rochelle, on the 11th of July. Another grave disappointment here awaited Buckingham. Instead of admitting him with open arms into their city, as he had expected, the Huguenots refused to let his fleet enter the harbour, under the plea that there was no room, but in reality out of well-justified mistrust. Having been their enemy not many months before, they could scarcely believe that he should have become their sincere friend all on a sudden; and to try his sincerity, they invited him to take possession, in the first instance, of the isle of Ré, an island about twenty miles long and five miles broad, forming, together with Oleron, the entrance to the roadstead of La Rochelle. Buckingham, though deeply stung by the evident suspicions against him, nevertheless accepted the offer, and disembarking a portion of his troops, went to the attack of the royal troops stationed in the island, a force of three thousand men, under Count Toiras, an old and experienced general. At the first onset, the English were repulsed, but rallying, and backed by the fire of the heavy cannon from the fleet, they rushed upon the enemy a second time, and put him to complete rout. Buckingham himself fought with great bravery, excited by the thought of breaking his way by force into France, and of being able to get face to face with the hated cardinal, dwelling with the besieging army before La Rochelle. The eagerness was well grounded, the contest, as existing, being less a war between England and France, than a duel between Buckingham and Richelieu.

The first brilliant success of the English troops was not followed up by the commander, who showed his utter military incapacity by neglecting not only the lessons of ordinary warfare, but even the dictates of common sense. Instead of pursuing his victory, and driving the whole of the royal army from the island, comparatively easy in the wake of their defeat, Buckingham allowed Toiras to take up a strong position in and around the citadel of St. Martin, the largest of two newly constructed, but not quite completed fortresses, situated on an eminence, on the northern coast of the island. While the royal troops were entrenching themselves here, and drawing supplies from the mainland, Buckingham remained entirely inactive at the place where he had disembarked, as if irresolute what to do next, till at the end of a week, when the French had completed their preparations, he roused himself at last and set out for St. Martin. On the way thither stood the fortress of La Prée, second of the island, a stronghold of considerable importance, yet without defenders for the moment, and which needed only to be occupied to give the invaders a firm grasp of the island; but the English commander-in-chief did not give it a look, marching leisurely on to St. Martin, and sitting down, on the 27th of July, under the gun of the citadel. Richelieu breathed freely on seeing his adversary commit these huge blunders. He had trembled at the news of Buckingham's victory, which, if duly pursued, would have made the capture of La Rochelle impossible, leaving its harbour for ever open to English vessels; but he could no longer doubt now that the success of the favourite had been a mere accident, and the conviction served to instil new energy into his ever active mind. The greatest weakness of France was its possessing no navy, and to offer resistance to the fleet preparing to bring aid to the Huguenots, Richelieu had, some months before, purchased seven large ships of war at Amsterdam, pretending them to be destined for a descent upon the Spanish coast; these now he ordered up in great haste, pressing at the same time every sailor and every fishing-boat along the coast, from Bordeaux up to Dieppe and Calais, into service, and directing all to meet in the narrow channels between Rochfort and the isle of Oleron. While thus working night and day with marvellous activity, dictating despatches to all parts of France, visiting personally every important point along the coast, and spending his whole private property to supply the dearth of the royal exchequer, Richelieu had the satisfaction to see that the man who had come to measure himself with him had sunk to a state approaching nihility. After leading his forces to the attack of St. Martin, and finding that the citadel could not be taken in a day, Buckingham had retired on board his ship, a vessel furnished with the utmost magnificence, like a swimming palace. Here he conceived a new idea, that of offering peace to Louis XIII. in affection to his consort, declaring that for her sake alone he would spare France, into which he had entered victoriously, the horrors of war, on no other condition on his part than that of being permitted to lay his homage at the feet of the queen. The message he forwarded by a special embassy, headed by one of his relatives, and conducted by a nobleman of the isle of Ré who had been taken prisoner, to the king, who was staying with the army in the camp before La Rochelle. Before despatching his envoys, Buckingham, according to the relation of Tallemant des Réaux, "confessed his love to the nobleman, whom he led into the state apartment of his vessel. The apartment was most magnificently gilded, and splendidly furnished, a rich Persian carpet covering the floor: on the one side was placed a sort of altar, over which hung the portrait of the queen, with large tapers burning in front. Thon and there he solemnly charged the noble messenger to seek the queen, and to declare to her his love, his adoration." The isle of Ré nobleman deemed the scene so romantic as to transmit it to posterity, unaware, perhaps, of the passionate lover of his queen having a fair young wife and several small children at home.

Sadly devoid of the spirit of romance, Richelieu would not allow the envoys of Buckingham even to enter the king's presence and to deliver their messages, and driving them back whence they had come, told them that the time for talking was past, and that of fighting had arrived. It was indeed time for action on both sides, for the month of October had come, without any decisive event taking place, Buckingham's army, after a close siege of more than two months, still investing the little fortress of St. Martin, killing helpless women and children, but inflicting no harm upon the garrison, whom it was intended to reduce by hunger. The plan promised success, for in the first week of October the troops under Tóiras were beginning to feed upon dry roots, with not enough provisions of any kind to subsist for another fortnight; and to testify the extremities at which they had arrived, a daring soldier, named La Pierre, broke his way through the English camp, and swimming across the arm of sea, three miles broad, dividing the isle of Ré from the mainland, made his way to Richelieu. The latter had just completed all his preparations, and in the night from the 7th to the 8th of October, a squadron of thirty-five fishing-boats, mostly propelled by oars, with six hundred men on board, pushed off from the port of Sables d'Olonne, on the coast of Vendée, and meeting with few obstacles, succeeded in breaking through the English lines and throwing provisions for two months, with large stores of war, into St. Martin. The feat discouraged Buckingham so much that he gave orders to raise the siege, but was persuaded to postpone the execution for a few days, a fleet carrying a new army of five thousand men being expected every moment from England. But instead of five thousand Englishmen, six thousand Frenchmen disembarked on the island at the end of forty-eight hours, their landing having become possible by the disgraceful negligence and incapacity of Buckingham, who with a hundred vessels under his command, guided by Huguenot pilots, the boldest and most experienced sailors of the west coast of France, had yet been inattentive to the simple duty of blockading the port of Sables d'Olonne, where Richelieu was concentrating all his armaments, as well as guarding the half a dozen bays and harbours on the isle of Ré from which alone approach by sea was possible. The arrival of the French troops had the effect of changing Buckingham's long-continued idleness into sudden audacity. With headlong fury, displaying great personal courage but painful want of sense, he led his forces to the assault of the citadel of St. Martin, choosing the strongest side for point of attack, and having been beaten back here with great slaughter, all the ditches and trenches being filled by English corpses, retreated towards the peninsula of Oie, a small tongue of land, separated from the rest of the isle of Ré by low marshes and a canal. In this position, the most unfavourable that could have been chosen in the whole island, cut off from the sea and his fleet by the fort of La Préce, of which he had neglected to take possession at the commencement, and which was now bristling with cannon, Buckingham was attacked by the royal army under Marshal Schomberg, one of the best generals of Richelieu. A fierce, short, and merciless fight, a carnage more than battle, sufficed to crush the English force; and leaving his great ordnance, with more than two thousand dead men behind in the fatal swamp, Buckingham had to fight his way to the coast, his road marked by one long streak of blood. There was a large and powerful fleet, recently reinforced from England, yet left to continue the struggle, and deputies from La Rochelle on their knees implored him not to desert the Huguenot cause, but Buckingham showed utter dejection, and declared he must go home. Embarking his troops again, he sailed homeward in the middle of November, while forty-four English flags were taken, by order of Richelieu, in procession through France, and hung up in the cathedral of Notre Dame.

Landing at Portsmouth towards the end of November, 1627, the unsuccessful commander-in-chief was near being stoned by the enraged populace. There was one great outcry against him throughout the whole of the kingdom, and the only voice seriously and warmly lifted in his defence came from the king himself. With a steadfastness in his attachments which would have been above all praise if guided by wisdom, instead of by mere obstinacy, Charles refused, against the advice of every one of his councillors, to withdraw his support from Buckingham on account of his manifest incapacity, but, on the contrary, seemed to cling the more heartily to him the more he was being attacked. Lingered a few days at Portsmouth, after his landing, as if half ashamed to show his face at court, the king despatched a courier to his friend, with a letter abounding in expressions of love. "I assure you," Charles wrote, "that with whatsoever success ye shall come to me, ye shall be ever welcome, one of my greatest griefs being that I have not been with you in this time of suffering, for I know we would have much eased each other's griefs. You cannot come so soon as ye are welcome, and un-

feignedly in my mind, ye have gained as much reputation with wise and honest men as if ye had performed all your desires." Then, concluding in a still more tender strain, "I have no more to say at this time, but conjure thee, for my sake, to have care of thy health." The favourite hastened to obey the invitation, and at the commencement of December, he and the king were again in each other's arms. There were long consultations now as to the course of policy that would have to be adopted to still the intense excitement that was breaking forth all over the country with the spread of the report of the failure and disgrace of the French expedition, and the symptoms of resistance to the levy of taxes illegally decreed, which were manifesting themselves at the same time. Buckingham's advice was a bold one, that of calling together a new parliament. Though fully aware that the experiment was dangerous, as far as he himself was concerned, he yet trusted to be able to avert the peril of another impeachment by prosecuting the war against France with increased energy, and while frankly confessing his want of success, to declare his determination not to rest till he had saved the Huguenots from their oppressors. It was clear that such a policy, if carried out tolerably well, offered great chances of success, the hatred of the people against Buckingham being insignificant compared with their love of Protestantism, leaving his most determined foes ready to forgive past sins in expectation of noble deeds to come. Less enthusiastic than his favourite, and with more dislike for the action of popular assemblies, Charles made some opposition to Buckingham's proposal, but had to give way before long, and on the 29th of January, 1628, the writs were signed for the convocation of another parliament, to meet on the 17th of March following. To prepare for the meeting, Buckingham spread the rumour of an intended invasion of the kingdom by a combined Spanish-French force, and at the same time assembled two fleets in the Downs, destined, as was made known all through the country, the first for the defence of the realm, and the second for the relief of La Rochelle, now closely invested, by land and water, by the troops of Louis XIII. The French king, after the departure of the invaders of the isle of Ré, had nominated Richelieu to the supreme command-in-chief of all his forces, under the title of lieutenant-general, and under his energetic prosecution of the war the cause of the Huguenots seemed getting desperate. They laughed at first on seeing the cardinal, in his red hat and his priestly garments, ride about at the head of a brilliant suite of officers and generals, they on horseback and he on a donkey; but their laughing soon ceased and gave way to terror. Even an ass was terrible, bestriddden by a man like Richelieu.

Not deeming the creation of a war fever in favour of the Huguenots sufficient for his protection and the execution of his plans, Buckingham had recourse to another more direct means for seeking popularity. On his advice, given publicly, so as to become generally known, the king liberated Sir John Eliot and Sir Dudley Digges from the Tower, where they had been kept since the last session, and likewise ordered the release of a number of knights, gentlemen, and London citizens, seventy-eight altogether, who had been thrown into prison for non-payment of the arbitrary loans, imposts, and assessments. The measure had a good effect, so far as to produce some popular applause for the favourite, but which found its counteraction in the grave fact that nearly all the liberated persons, champions of constitutional right and determined enemies of royal absolutism, were elected to seats in parliament, Westminster taking the lead in the movement by returning two men of republican tendencies, Bradshaw, a brewer, and Maurice, a grocer. Some weeks before the time fixed for the opening of the session Charles had come to be aware that the parliament about to assemble would assume a tone bolder than any that had yet rung in his ears, and very likely resort to proceedings bearing the stamp of rebellion against his authority. The fear drove him to adopt an unusually haughty attitude when addressing the lords and commons, on the 17th of March, in the speech from the throne. "These times," Charles exclaimed, "are for action, wherefore, for example's sake, I mean not to spend much time in words, expecting that your, as I hope, good resolutions, will be speedy, and that you will not be spending time unnecessarily, or, I may better say, dangerously." After some further remarks to the same effect, his majesty continued, "I think there is none here but knows that common danger is the cause of this parliament, and that supply is at this time the chief end of it. I, therefore, judging a parliament to be the most ancient, speediest, and best way, in this time of common danger, to give such supply as to secure ourselves and to save our families from eminent ruin, have called you together. Every man must now do according to his conscience: wherefore if you, as God forbid, should not do your duties in contributing what the state at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, use those other means which God hath put into my hands to save that which the follies of particular men may otherwise hazard to lose. Take not this as a threatening, for I scorn to threaten any but my equals, but an admonition from him that both out of nature and duty hath most care of your preservations and prosperities. And though I thus speak, I hope that your demeanours at this time will be such as shall not only make me approve your counsels, but lay on me such obligations as shall tie me by way of thankfulness to meet often with you." The king concluded, somewhat descending from his high tone, "You may imagine that I came here with a doubt of success of what I desire, remembering the distractions of the last meeting. But I assure you that I shall very easily and gladly forget and forgive what is past, so that you will at this present time leave the former ways of distractions." Had it been the especial wish of Charles irreconcilably to offend the representatives of the nation, he could not have adopted better means than to address them thus, in the style of naughty schoolboys, deserving a whipping for making "distractions," and to be pardoned if promising future good behaviour; yet, as if all this was not enough, the king had no sooner finished his speech, when the lord keeper, Sir Thomas Coventry, arose, to add his share, as head of the government, to the studied insult. After going through a long and rambling oration, full of threats, the lord keeper wound up by telling the two houses that if the parliamentary supplies were delayed, "necessity and the sword of the enemy will make way to others." He concluded his harangue by crying, with high emphasis, "Remember his majesty's admonition: I say remember it!" There was little need of the exhortation, and little chance of his majesty's words being soon forgotten.

The effect of the speech from the throne became visible immediately in the demeanour of the House of Commons. It was an assembly such as England had never yet seen, composed of the wisest, the wealthiest, and the most earnest men of the nation, men thoroughly conscious of what they were doing and where they were going, in all matters resolute and self-reliant, and not inclined to give way an inch in the defence of their own rights and the rights of the people against a despotism claiming to exist as a divine institution. The temper of the house was shown in the very first speeches, listened to by all with breathless attention, and followed by vehement applause, taken up out of doors, and re-echoed all over the realm. "We form the great council of the kingdom," Sir Francis Seymour cried, "and here with certainty, if not here only, his majesty may see, as in a true glass, the state of the realm. We are called hither by his writs, in order to give him faithful counsel, such as may stand with his honour, and this we must do without flattery. We are also sent hither by the people to deliver their just grievances, and this we must do without fear. Then let us not act like Canibyses's judges, who, when their approbation was demanded by the prince to some illegal measure, said that 'though there was a written law, the Persian kings might follow their own will and pleasure.' This was base flattery, fit for reproof, but not imitation; and as fear, so flattery taketh away the judgment. For my part, I shall shun both, and speak my mind, with as much duty as any man, to his majesty without neglecting the public. But how can we express our affections while retaining our fears, or speak of giving till we know whether we have anything to give? For if his majesty may be persuaded to take what he will, what need we give? That this is held by some and hath been done appeareth by the imprisonment of gentlemen for refusing the loan, who, if they had done the contrary for fear, would have been as blameable as the projectors of that oppressive measure. Yet, to countenance these proceedings, it hath even in the pulpit been preached, or rather prated, that 'All we have is the king's by divine right.' So when preachers forsake their own calling, and turn ignorant statesmen, we see how willing they are to exchange a good conscience for a bishopric. I must confess, he is not a good subject who would not, willingly and cheerfully, lay down his life when that sacrifice may promote the interest of the sovereign together with the good of the commonwealth. But he is not a good subject, he is a slave, who will allow his goods to be taken from him against his will, and his liberty against the laws of the kingdom." Following in the wake of Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Robert Philips exclaimed, concisely summing up the general debate. "The grievances by which we are oppressed I draw under two heads: acts of power against law, and the judgment of lawyers against our liberty." After citing several illegal judgments passed within his memory, that by which the Scots, born after the accession of James, were admitted to all the privileges of English subjects, another by which illegal imposts had been warranted, and a more recent one, given in the preceding year, and which had caused great commotion all through the country, by which the judges had sanctioned the arbitrary arrests of the king for refusal to contribute to his loans, he broke forth in a burst of excitement. "I can live," he cried, "though another who has no right be put to live along with me, nay, I can live, though burdened with impositions beyond what at present I labour under: but to have my liberty, which is the soul of my life, ravished from me, to have my person pent up in a jail, without relief of law and to be so adjudged—O improvident ancestors! O unwise forefathers! To be so careful in providing for the quiet possession of our lands, and the liberties of parliament, and at the same time to neglect our personal liberty, and let us lie in prison, without redress or remedy. If this be law, why do we talk of liberties? Why trouble ourselves with disputes about a constitution, franchises, property of goods, and the like? What can any man call his own, if not the liberty of his person? I am weary of treading these ways, and therefore conclude to have a select committee, in order to frame a petition to his majesty for redress of these grievances." The words struck a chord in every breast, and found an echo in every homestead in England. All demands for liberties henceforth went merging in the one cry for personal liberty, which became the watchword of the nation.

The extraordinary vigour and earnestness of the debates in the House of Commons both startled and alarmed the king; but his first surprise having subsided, he made another attempt to intimidate the members, and, forwarding a message to the speaker, peremptorily demanded the immediate vote of a supply. The demand was not without supporters, and, but for the unwise harshness of the terms in which it was couched, would have been taken into consideration at once, many of the parliamentary leaders, among them the veteran, Sir Edward Coke, speaking in favour of it. The great lawyer, formerly the tool of despotism, but since his fall looked upon as a sincere friend of the people, advocated the conditional grant of a supply on account of the necessity to carry on the war in aid of the Huguenots with all possible energy, and to prevent a rumoured coalition between France and Spain, for the invasion of England. His arguments were taken up very skilfully by Sir Dudley Carleton, who insisted that in the perilous state of foreign affairs there ought to be no divisions between the king and parliament. "The first sower of distractions among us," he exclaimed, "was an agent of Spain, Count Gondomar, that did his master great service here and at home. Since that, we have had other ministers who have blown the fire: the ambassador of France told his master at home what he had wrought here the last parliament, namely, divisions between king and people, and he was rewarded for it. Whilst we sat here in parliament, there was a parliament of Jesuits and other ill-willers within a mile of this place, the fact of which was discovered by letters sent to Rome." This was intended in praise of Buckingham, chief motor, as all were aware, in expelling the French priests; but the effect of the laudation was not great, and after listening to several other speeches, less and less decisive, in favour of a compliance with the royal demand, the commons took up the great debate on personal liberty and the rights of parliament and of the nation. Among the new speakers who attracted the attention of the house was Sir Thomas Wentworth, member for Yorkshire—celebrated subsequently as earl of Strafford—who, after fluctuating some time between court and parliament, had become a zealous champion of popular rights. After severely castigating the doings of "projectors and ill-ministers," appellations given to the tools and dependants of Buckingham, he launched forth upon the great topic of debate, and urged the passing of a solemn declaration embodying all its points, and establishing a new relationship between the rulers and the ruled. "These men," Wentworth exclaimed, referring to the ill-ministers, "have introduced a privy council, ravishing at once the spheres of all ancient government, destroying all liberty, and imprisoning us without bail or bond. They have taken from us—what shall I say? Indeed, what have they left us? By tearing up the roots of all property they have taken from us every means of supplying the king, and of giving voluntary proofs of our duty and attachment towards him. By one and the same thing have the king and the people been hurt, and by the same must they be cured. We must vindicate—what? Now things? No! Our ancient, legal, and vital liberties, by reinforcing the laws enacted by our ancestors, and by setting such a stamp upon them that no licentious spirit shall dare henceforth to invade them." The spasmodic excitement of the speech but faintly reflected the lofty exaltation to which the spirit of the representatives of the people had risen in the discussion of the great subject engrossing all minds, and which got shaped into a definite form at the end of two months. On the 28th of May, the commons, accompanied by most of the members of the upper house, obtained an audience of the king, and presented to his majesty and prayed his assent to a bill embodying the demands of parliament and of the nation, called the Petition of Right.

The Petition of Right, memorable document of all times, ran as follows:—"Humbly show unto our sovereign lord the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled: That whereas it is declared and enacted by a statute commonly known as 'Statutum de tallagio non concedendo,' that no tallage or aid shall be levied by the king or his heirs in this realm without the goodwill and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm; and whereas, by authority of parliament holden in the five-and-twentieth year of the reign of King Edward III. it is declared and enacted that from thenceforth no person shall be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, because such loans were against reason and the franchise of the land. And whereas, by other laws of this realm, it is provided that none should be charged by any charge or imposition called a benevolence, or by such like charge: by which the statutes before mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent in parliament. Yet, nevertheless, of late divers commissions directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have issued, by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty, and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered unto them not warrantable by the laws or statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance and give attendance before your privy council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted; and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in several counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majesty, or your privy council, against the laws and free customs of this realm. And whereas also, by the statute called 'The Great Charter of the Liberties of England,' it is declared and enacted, 'That no free man may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.' And whereas, in the eight-and-twentieth year of the reign of King Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, 'That no man, of what estate or condition that he be, shall be put out of his land or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.' Nevertheless, against the tenour of the said statutes, and other the good laws and statutes of your realm to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned without any cause showed, and when, for their deliverance, they were brought before justice, by your majesty's writs of habeas corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy council, and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with anything to which they might make answer according to the law."

The Petition of Right then continued: "And whereas of late great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants against their wills have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people. And whereas also, by authority of parliament, in the five-and-twentieth year of the reign of King Edward III. it is declared and enacted, "That no man shall be forejudged of life or limb against the form of the Great Charter, and law of the land," and, by the said Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of the same realm, or by acts of parliament. And whereas no offender, of what kind soever, is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: Nevertheless, of late divers commissions, under your majesty's great seal, have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the justice of martial law against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanour whatsoever, and by such summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and then to cause to be executed and put to death according to the law martial, by pretext whereof some of your majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death, when and where, by the laws and statutes of the land, they had deserved death; by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed. And whereas also, sundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming an exemption, have escaped the punishment due to them by the laws and statutes of this realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused or forbore to proceed against such offenders, according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the same offenders were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid, which commissions, and all others of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this realm—They do therefore humbly pray your most excellent majesty: That no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent, by act of parliament. And that none be called to make answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted, concerning the same, or for refusal thereof. And that no freeman in any such manner as is before mentioned be imprisoned or detained. And that your majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, and that people may not be so burthened in time to come. And that the aforesaid commissions for proceeding by martial law may be revoked and annulled, and that hereafter no commissions of like nature may issue forth, to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid, lest, by colour of them, any of your majesty's subjects be destroyed or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land. All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm. And that your majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, that the awards, doings, and proceedings to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence or example. And that your majesty would be also graciously pleased, for the further comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that in the things aforesaid, all your officers and ministers shall serve you according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom."

Charles took four days to consider the weighty document laid into his hands, and on the fifth, the 2nd of June, he went into parliament to give his reply. It was vague in the extreme, and disappointing to both the friends and the opponents of royal absolutism. After assuring the two houses in general terms that his great object was to give them satisfaction, he pronounced his assent to the Petition of Right, but not in the usual form, "Soit droit fait comme il est désiré"—let justice be done as desired—but in a new mode of expression, looked upon by all as a subterfuge and equivocation. "The king willeth," was the entry in the parliamentary journals, "that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppressions, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds himself in conscience as well obliged as of his prerogative." It was the height of folly on the part of Charles to think that such shifting play upon words, framed merely to deceive, would satisfy men pleading as earnestly for their rights as the commons had done, and showing themselves as earnestly determined to enforce them by any means at their command. The indignation broke loose as soon as the members of the lower house, returning from the bar of the lords, had resumed their seats. Sir John Eliot was the first to give vent to his feelings; in the words of one of his colleagues, John Alured, returned to parliament for the borough of Hedon, Yorkshire, "he stood up and made a long speech, wherein he gave forth so full and lively a representation of all grievances, both general and particular, as if they had never before been mentioned." Eliot was followed by Sir Robert Philips, who, with the most pathetic earnestness, bewailed the unhappy issue of all their well-meant endeavours to cure the sufferings of the people, by giving the king true information of the state and of the demands of the nation. "But," he exclaimed, "we being stopped, and stopped in such a manner as we are enjoined, so we must now cease to be a council: I hear it with grief, as the saddest message of the greatest loss in the world." The debates culminated in a scene unparalleled in the annals of the House of Commons. On Sir John Eliot making an allusion to Buckingham, as the author of all their evils, he was stopped by the speaker, who cried, "There is a command upon me that I must order you not to proceed," which words were scarcely from his lips when all the members rose in a body to protest against any restriction being laid upon their discussions. "The house was much affected to be so restrained," John Alured described the scene, "since the house in former times had proceeded by finding and committing John of Gamut, the king's son, and others, and of late have meddled with and censured the Lord Chancellor Bacon and the Lord Treasurer Middlesex. Then Sir Robert Philips spake, and mingled his words with weeping; John Pym did the like; and Sir Edward Coke, overcome with passion, seeing the destruction likely to ensue, was forced to sit down when he began to speak, through the abundance of tears. Yea, the speaker in his chair could not refrain from weeping and shedding of tears, and there were many whose great griefs made them dumb and silent."

The extreme agitation, which he could scarcely understand, was a source of new alarm to the king, and his apprehensions greatly increased on learning that the house had dared at last, notwithstanding the prohibition laid upon the speaker, to bring an accusation against Buckingham. Sir Edward Coke led the attack, in a speech the boldness of which was not a little due to the personal hatred he bore against the favourite, who had hurled him from his high position. "Let us palliate no longer," Coke exclaimed; "if we do, God will not prosper us. I think the duke of Buckingham is the cause, and till the king be informed thereof, we shall never go out with honour, nor sit with honour here. That man is the grievance of grievances: let us set down the causes of all our disasters, and they will all reflect upon him. As for going to the lords, as some propose, that is not via regia. Our liberties are now impeached: we are deeply concerned. It is not via regia, for the lords are no participant with our liberties. It is not the king who restrains us, but the duke." Here the orator was interrupted by loud shouts "Tis he! Tis he!" and the cries having subsided, John Selden arose, and demanded that a new impeachment should be drawn up against Buckingham. "All this time," he cried, "we have cast a mantle over what was done last parliament; but now, being driven again to look to that man, let us proceed with what was then well begun. Let us renew the charge, the charge that was made in the last parliament against him, to which, in sooth, he made an answer, but so insufficient that we might demand judgment upon that very answer only." The proposition having met with unanimous applause, the house made preparations for proceeding against Buckingham; but before the judicial committee had been formed to resolve upon the terms of the indictment, the king, anxious to save his friend, hurried once more to the House of Lords, and had the commons summoned to the bar. It was late in the day, at four o'clock in the afternoon of the 8th of June, and most of the members having left, the regular sitting being at an end, they had to be called together in great hurry. The king's speech, listened to with the deepest attention, was of an extremely affectionate character. He told the lords and commons that he had come to give a more full and direct assent than he had done six days before to the Petition of Right; not that he deemed the former one was not complete, but to prevent all misunderstanding in the matter, and to show that there was no dissimulation in either his words or action. Then, addressing the speaker, "Read your Petition," he cried, "and you shall have such an answer as I am sure will please you." Having been read aloud, the king ordered the clerk of parliament to sign his assent to the Petition in the usual form, after which he continued: "This, I am sure, is full, yet no more than I meant in my first answer. I believe you neither mean to hurt, nor can hurt, my prerogative. I assure you that my maxim is that the people's liberties strengthen the king's prerogative; and that the king's prerogative is to defend the people's liberties. You see now how ready I have shown myself to satisfy your demands, so that I have done my part; wherefore, if this parliament hath not a happy conclusion, the sin is yours." His majesty's conversion to the parliamentary creed had been somewhat too sudden to give full faith in its durability; nevertheless the joy of the people was unbounded on learning that the Petition of Right had become one of the statutes of the realm, and that a new charter of freedom had been added to Magna Charta. In London and all the large towns bells were rung and bonfires lighted, and a day of jubilee celebrated all over the kingdom.

It was well understood in the House of Commons, though not mentioned openly, that the price at which the king had given his "Soit droit fut comme il est désiré" to the Petition of Right was not only the staying of the impeachment against Buckingham, but the vote of a liberal supply; and in order that the members might not forget his wants in their satisfaction, Charles gave them a hint in another message, excessively friendly in tone. The message was read on the 10th of June, three days after the king's visit to parliament; and in it the members were informed that his majesty was pleased that their Petition of Right, together with his assent, should not only be recorded in the journals of both houses, but likewise in all the courts of law, and that moreover it should be printed and freely distributed among the people. The gracious communication concluded with the assurance that his majesty would be ready at all times to listen to the proposals of his faithful commons, entreating them in return not to delay any longer the vote of the much-needed supplies. Thus politely put forward, the demand was immediately obeyed, and the next day the king was gratified by the grant of no less than five subsidies, a larger amount than he had ever obtained before. Charles expressed his extreme contentment at the vote, and there were all outward appearances that complete harmony would be re-established in his relations with the House of Commons, when all at once there arose a fresh subject of disturbance. While passing the duties for tonnage and poundage, which were to be granted to the king for one year, it was resolved by the majority to add to the vote a protest against the illegal raising of these taxes that had taken place, chiefly by the advice of Buckingham, and the mentioning of the hated name created such tumult as to cause the word impeachment once more to be uttered. It was enough to decide Charles to make an end of a parliament from which he had got all that he wanted, and which henceforth threatened to be only a source of danger to his friend; and the same day on which the impeachment question had come on again, he hurried to the House of Lords to prorogue the session. He went in such haste that the peers had not even time to put on their robes, and they and the commons alike were astonished when they heard the pretences on which they were to be sent home, and the declaration which followed. "It may seem strange," Charles exclaimed, speaking very hurriedly, "that I come so suddenly to end this session. Before I give my assent to the bills, I will tell you the cause, though I must avow that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one that a while ago the House of Commons gave me a remonstrance, how acceptable, every man may judge; and, for the merit of it, I will not call that in question, for I am sure no wise man can justify it. Now, since I am truly informed that a second remonstrance is preparing for me, to take away the profit of my tonnage and poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my crown, by alleging I have given away my right thereto by my answer to your Petition, this is so prejudicial to me, that I am forced to end this session some few hours before I meant, being not willing to receive any more remonstrances to which I must give a harsh answer. And since I see that even the House of Commons begins already to make false constructions of what I granted in your Petition, lest it be worse interpreted in the country, I will now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof. The profession of both houses, in the time of harmonizing this Petition, was no way to trench upon my prerogative, they saying they had neither intention nor power to hurt it; and therefore it must needs be conceived that I have granted no now, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my subjects. Yet, to show the clearness of my intentions, and that I neither repent nor mean to recede from anything I have promised you, I do here declare myself that those things which have been done, whereby many have had some cause to expect the liberties of the subjects to be trespassed upon, which indeed was the first and true ground of the Petition, shall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice, and on the word of a king you shall not have the like cause to complain. But as for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me, I am sure, to grant. To conclude, I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have spoken at this time to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your Petition; but especially you, my lords the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of laws." There could be no longer any doubt that, as far as lay in his power, King Charles would make the Petition of Right a dead letter.

The sudden and unexpected prorogation of parliament produced but little effect among the people, all eyes being turned once more upon the prosecution of the war against the French king, in favour of the Huguenots. While the House of Commons had been deep in the discussion of the Petition of Right, a second expedition had sailed for La Rochelle, consisting of about sixty vessels, four of them of from one thousand to twelve hundred tons, seven of five hundred, and the rest of smaller size, but all of them well armed, and abundantly supplied with ammunition and provisions, the latter destined in great part for the inhabitants of the besieged city. Buckingham had taken great interest, and spent above a hundred thousand pounds of his own money, in the equipping of this fleet, to the command of which he appointed his brother-in-law, the earl of Denbigh, he himself deeming it unsafe to leave the country while parliament was sitting. Denbigh quitted Portsmouth on the 1st of May, and on the 11th of the month arrived in the roadstead of La Rochelle, opposite the isle of Ré, where he threw anchor. He had hoped to sail right into the harbour, but was infinitely surprised to find it barricaded by an immense stone wall, in front of which, attached by chains, lay a crescent-shaped chain of boats, bristling with guns; and his astonishment was not lessened on perceiving that the whole aspect of the besieged city had undergone an extraordinary change since he had seen it last, from on board the fleet commanded by his brother-in-law. With a fertility of resources and an energy truly marvellous, Richelieu had, in the few months since he had assumed the command in chief of the royal army, created works such as Europe had not seen since the time of the Romans. Deeming the capture of La Rochelle of the highest importance, less as a punishment of heretics than for the establishment of a powerful central government, he had built a complete circle of fortresses, three leagues in length, and consisting of eleven large towers and eighteen redoubts, around the city, so as to shut all the entrances from the land side. Gigantic as was this work, it was nothing compared with the rest of the plan conceived by the cardinal for locking up the insurgents in their great maritime stronghold. As long as the sea was open to them, and England was mistress of the seas, he knew they could not be conquered; and his greatest efforts therefore were bent upon removing the Huguenots from the ocean, and the ocean from the Huguenots. An Italian engineer, Pompeo Targone, had proposed to him more than two years before to bar the entrance into the harbour of La Rochelle, sixteen hundred yards, or nearly a mile, in breadth, by a floating stockade and stout iron chains; but the uselessness of the undertaking in keeping out a strong enemy having been demonstrated, Richelieu hit upon a far mightier one, that of building a wall across the sea. Louis XIII. laughed at the idea as visionary, and all the military engineers were unanimous in asserting that it could not be done; but Richelieu discovered a mason of Paris, Tiriot by name, who said it could be done, and he accordingly set him to do it. The mason, with five thousand soldiers under his orders, began his task by sinking several hundred vessels, loaded with stones, along his line of sea wall, and on the top of them he piled masses of granite, carried along upon tramways constructed on a new and ingenious model. The waves swept away the first part of the wall as soon as it had reached the surface of the sea, but the mason kept on piling stone upon stone until his work was completed. In May, 1628, when the earl of Denbigh with his sixty vessels appeared in the offing, the ocean fortification had just been finished, a small opening being left in the centre for the movement of the tides, but which was guarded by a strong fort on each side, while four more citadels, two on each of the extremities of the wall, defended it in its whole length. Chained to the wall seaward, Denbigh counted twenty-four ships of large tonnage; while on the other side, with guns turned upon the Huguenot city, lay thirty-seven more vessels, the decks swarming with soldiers. Richelieu looked with pride upon his work, which he had completed, he said, with one little mason against three great kings, those of France, of Spain, and of England. The king of England he justly counted last in the list.

The cause of the Huguenots looked desperate, but was less so than it seemed to the earl of Denbigh, who from the top of his own large admiral's ship kept gazing with fear and trembling upon the long line of sea wall, and the longer lines of forts behind, from which the cannon belched forth unceasingly. There was a great man without the walls of La Rochelle, but there were many greater men within. The metropolis of French Protestantism had no high towers, no walls of granite to oppose to its assailants; but it had stronger defences than these in the arms and breasts of ten thousand warriors, resolved to hold the city, or to perish under its ruins. To show their determination, they elected, on the third of March, 1628, while Richelieu's fortresses were rising on all sides, threatening to crush them under the weight of their heavy ordnance, for their mayor and commander-in-chief Jean Guiton, a man of iron, old captain of Huguenot fleets, moulded in the type of the English sea-kings of the Elizabethan age. At the moment of his election, Jean Guiton rose among the Elders sitting in the town hall, and striking the table with his dagger, threatened to kill with his own hand the first who should speak of surrender. Nine days after, on the 12th of March, Richelieu attempted an assault, but was beaten back with immense loss, even the women coming forward to hurl stones upon the Catholic soldiers. His sea wall getting more advanced, the cardinal despatched a herald into the city on the 25th of April, asking the Huguenots to yield, and offering them a complete pardon, in the name of the king; but Guiton refused even to see the herald, threatening that if another were to come, he should be hung on the summit of the pharos overlooking the port. Richelieu soon perceived that it would be all but impossible for him to take the city by storm, the more so as disaffection was rife among his own troops, especially the officers and nobles, jealous of his rise and the visible tightening of the reins of government in his hands; and discarding all further schemes of assaults, he proceeded to starve the city into submission. All supplies by land and sea were rigorously cut off, and several inferior commanders, who, against bribes, allowed small quantities of victuals to pass through their lines, were shot on the spot. The system of terrorism had its effect, and the store of provisions within the city having been consumed in the long siege, hunger began to reign when the end of April approached. Boundless, therefore, was the exultation of the Huguenots on seeing, on the 11th of May, the English fleet under the earl of Denbigh in the offing. All thought that the end of their miseries had come; they sank on their knees in the streets to offer prayers to the Almighty for their release, bringing forth their last fragments of food to feast the poor and the maimed, and the stern mayor himself could not prevent a tear of joy escaping his eye. Communication was immediately established with Denbigh's ships, a number of bold sailors offering to risk their lives in pushing with the tide through the opening in the sea wall; and by them the English commander was told that there would be little difficulty for him, possessing tall ships and heavy ordnance, to silence the small batteries constructed by Richelieu on the dyke, to cut his way through the chain of vessels on both sides, manned by very indifferent sailors, and more formidable in appearance than in reality, and to enter the harbour in triumph. But Denbigh hesitated, and instead of acting at once, set himself to wait. He waited and watched, day after day, from the 11th of May till the 18th; he saw the royal troops making gigantic efforts to strengthen their fortifications on the sea part and all along the shore; he saw them planting cannon on every available point, and sinking vessels in the harbour entrance; and having observed all very carefully and very patiently, he hoisted his sails at the end of seven days, gave the signal to his fleet to veer round, and steered homeward. On seeing the tall masts of the English fleet disappear on the horizon, a wild cry of rage and despair broke forth from the besieged Huguenot city.

The cry found its echo in England. Even Buckingham felt the disgrace inflicted upon the English name through the dastardly timidity of his brother-in-law, and to atone for it made immediate preparations for starting a third expedition, larger than any of the preceding ones, to relieve La Rochelle. To induce the Huguenots to hold out as long as possible, he despatched at once a vessel with provisions, which safely got into the besieged city, together with the message that his majesty of England was fitting out one of the most powerful navies ever seen on the seas for their assistance, and that he had made a solemn promise to save them, whatever might happen. On receipt of this welcome message, the negotiations which had been opened with Richelieu, under strong opposition from the mayor, were broken off; Jean Guiton, momentarily deposed, was reinstated in power, and a law was passed setting death upon all further attempts to treat with the enemy. Thus the month of June came to an end, and with it the small stock of food within the city, reducing the inhabitants to live upon rats, mice, and other vermin, and to still the pangs of hunger by gnawing skins and leather. All eyes were strained from morn to night in looking westward for the expected succours, but one week passed after the other in vain hopes; the ocean rose and the ocean sank, the fatal bar on the harbour seemed getting higher and higher, and no ships with the English flag, more dearly prayed for than the sight of angels, appeared on the wide sea. In the middle of July starvation began to do its work, and the streets came to be filled with skeleton-like corpses; to reduce the number of hungry mouths, Guiton ordered all the cripples, the aged, the helpless, and the women not capable of bearing arms, to be turned out of the gates, and be driven towards the enemy. Richelieu refused to receive them; but the iron mayor would not readmit them either, and the unfortunates had to perish in the ditches between city and camp, the royal soldiers firing upon them, out of pity, to end their miseries. Now a revolt arose in the besieged city, spreading to the council-table, on which Guiton and the Elders were sitting in permanence, he with his broad dagger in front. Two of the Elders fell upon him, but he shook them off as a lion would a pair of dogs, and driving them into the street, ordered that they should be shot, which fate they escaped only by forcing the gates and running, at the head of their party, into the camp of the royalists. Jean Guiton, having few more hopes left to conquer, and wishing for nothing but to die a honourable death, next proposed to the friends that kept rallying round him, to issue forth with him from the city, to trample down all obstacles, to break their way to the commander-in-chief, and slaying him to throw confusion into the ranks of their enemies. The scheme, which, it was admitted by the proposer, would have cost every life engaged in it, was overruled in the council of the Elders; they still believed in the ruler of England, though Guiton warned them not to set their trust in kings. After some debates it was decided to despatch new messengers to the English government, in addition to several members of the Rohan family who had been acting for some time as envoys of the French Protestants, with entreaties that the promised aid might be sent without the loss of another day. At the end of July the messengers presented to the king and Buckingham their supplication, couched in the most touching language, imploring the king by all that he held dear on earth and in heaven to come to the relief of the dying Huguenot city. Charles appeared deeply touched, and with a great oath vowed that he would hazard his three kingdoms to rescue La Rochelle from the grip of Richelieu.

For once, Charles seemed in earnest, as well as Buckingham, although their earnestness was not great enough to be free from indolence and selfishness. While parliament was sitting, both the king and his friend were too occupied with their own affairs to do more than give orders for the equipment of the third French expedition; but the session over, Buckingham went in person to Portsmouth, to superintend all the arrangements for getting the fleet, of which he was to take the chief command, ready for sea. The preparations were on the grandest scale, Charles devoting all the money he was able to procure to the purchase of ships, cannon, ammunition, and provisions, and Buckingham himself contributing a quarter of a million sterling of his own money to raise the enterprise to the highest state of efficiency. By the middle of August, Portsmouth harbour had come to be crowded by one hundred and thirty vessels, including many of large size, as well as a number of fire-ships, and others specially prepared to break down and destroy Richelieu's sea wall, to attack it above and below water, and explode petards under the forts. The fleet was under orders to sail on the 25th of August, and as the day approached, Buckingham's enthusiasm in the undertaking appeared to increase, and he loudly declared to Benjamin de Rohan, marquis of Soubise, chief of the Huguenot envoys, that he would be the first man to set his foot upon the dyke before La Rochelle, "to die or do the work." The king, too, now went down to Portsmouth harbour, taking up his quarters at the mansion of Sir Daniel Norton, at Southwick, five miles from the town, which, and all the neighbourhood, began swarming with courtiers, sailors, and soldiers, besides crowds of French refugees, who had arranged to sail in the vanguard of Buckingham's fleet. Buckingham felt in high spirits, his imagination full of the glory he was going to achieve at the head of his mighty armament; and getting up on the morning of Saturday, the 23rd of August, he was in such "well-disposed humour," as related by James Howell, that "he cut a caper or two, and being ready, and having been under the barber's hand, went to breakfast, attended by a great company of commanders." Before passing into the room where the breakfast was laid, the duke was met by Soubise and a number of other Frenchmen, who had news from La Rochelle, and "their discourse, according to the natural custom of that nation, and by the usual dialect of that language, was held with that passion and vehemence that the bystanders, who understood not French, did believe that they were very angry and that they used the duke very rudely." In the midst of the noise and tumult, a man of tall stature and military appearance, who had been leaning against the window of the apartment, quietly stepped forward, drew a long knife from under his coat, stretched his arm over Buckingham's shoulder, and plunged the steel into his breast. The stroke was well aimed, going right to the heart. "The villain hath killed me," the duke shrieked, and pulling the knife from his bosom, fell down dead.

For a moment there was enormous confusion; the whole glittering crowd seemed to get frantic on beholding the duke, but a few seconds before the ruler of England, stretched lifeless on the floor, stiff and stark. "No man," according to Lord Clarendon, "had seen the blow, or the man who dealt it; but in the confusion they were in, every man made his own conjectures, and declared it as a thing known, most agreeing that it was done by the French, from the angry discourse they thought they heard from them. And it was a kind of miracle that they were not all killed in that instant; the soberer sort, that preserved them from it, having the same opinion of their guilt, and only reserving them for a more judicial examination and proceeding." The excitement having somewhat subsided, a hat was seen lying on the floor, and, picked up, was found to have a paper sewed up inside, with the words, in writing, "That man is cowardly base, and deserveth not the name of a gentleman or soldier, that is not willing to sacrifice his life for the honour of God, his king, and his country: let no man commend me for the doing of it, but rather discommend themselves as the cause of it, for if God had not taken our heart for our sins, he had not gone so long unpunished.—John Felton." There could be no doubt that the hat and the writing came from the assassin, and an immediate chase taking place after him, it was not long before a man without a head-covering was seen walking very leisurely along one of the passages of the house. "Here is the fellow that killed the duke!" many voices cried at once; and others asking, "Which is he? Which is he?" the man came forward, and, with great composure, exclaimed, "I am he!" Bound hand and foot, he was carried at once to the guard-house, while mounted messengers sped away to carry to the king the sad news that his friend and favourite had been murdered. "His majesty was at the public prayers of the church," Clarendon reports, "when Sir John Hipposely came unto him, and, without any pause in respect to the exercise they were performing, went directly to the king, and whispered in his ear what had fallen out. His majesty continued unmoved, and without the least change in his countenance, till prayers were ended, when he suddenly departed to his chamber, and threw himself upon his bed, lamenting, with much passion and with abundance of tears, the loss he had of an excellent servant, and the horrid manner in which he had been deprived of him, and he continued in this melancholy and discomposure of mind many days." There were many who fancied the tears of his majesty to be not altogether genuine, under the belief, as expressed by Lord Clarendon, "that the accident was not very ungrateful, or at least that it was very indifferent to him, as being rid of a servant very ungracious to the people, and the prejudice to whose person exceedingly obstructed all overtures made in parliament for his service." Those who knew the king best, and who were aware how like his character was, in most respects, to that of his father, held to this opinion, which, however, did not seem justified by the manner in which Charles treated his friend's memory. He made ample provision for Buckingham's wife and children, watching personally over their welfare, and likewise, says Clarendon, "took a wonderful solicitous care for the payment of his debts." The latter act of friendship was deemed so marvellous as to create universal astonishment at court as among the people.

After remaining two days at Portsmouth, cross-examined by the royal chaplains, who acted as judicial inquisitors, the assassin of Buckingham was carried in chains to London, reviled on the road by some over-zealous adherents of the government, but openly praised for his deed by many among the lower classes. "Now God bless thee, little David!" an old woman cried at Kingston-on-Thames, addressing the murderer, who to her seemed the slayer of wicked Goliath; and from many another mouth came the "God bless thee!" before the train reached the Tower. Put to interrogatories before several members of the privy council, the prisoner declared that his name was John Felton; that he was the younger son of a Norfolk gentleman in reduced circumstances; that he had been serving as lieutenant in the expedition to the isle of Ré, and had been ill-treated by the duke of Buckingham, and that the latter had likewise unjustly refused him a commission in the new enterprise. He affirmed, however, that personal motives had not driven him to commit the murder, but solely regard for the public weal, he looking upon the duke as "an enemy of the people." The immediate instigation to the deed, he said, had been a sermon to which he had listened at St. Faith's church, in which the preacher spoke in justification of every man being, in a good cause, the judge and executioner of sin, which he interpreted as specially meant for him. Leaving the church, he further told the examiners, he espied "a tenponny knife" in the window of "a bye-cutter's shop on Tower Hill," and having purchased it, he made a sheath for it in the lining of his pocket, "so as it might be drawn forth at any moment with one hand." Being asked whether he had any confederates, he denied it energetically, and persisted in his denial even when threatened with the rack. The king expressed a wish that torture should be employed to draw from the criminal any secrets of which he might be possessed; but the judges who had taken the trial in hand sternly opposed it as illegal, and the chief examiner deputed by the privy council, the earl of Dorset, after violently advocating the use of the rack, ended by condemning the use still more violently. It was Dorset who had first threatened the prisoner with torture, to show his zeal for the murdered duke, with whom he had been on very bad terms; and on repeating his threats again and again, he received at last an answer which made him very quiet and thoughtful. "I have already told the whole truth," Felton exclaimed, fiercely, "and have nothing more to say; but if I be further questioned by torture, I accuse you, and you only, my lord of Dorset, to be of conspiracy with me." The earl now came suddenly round to the view of the judges regarding the illegality of torture, and hurried on the trial, which took place on the 27th of November. Declared guilty on his confession, Felton was condemned to be hung at Tyburn, and his body to be taken to the place where the murder had been committed, and there to be hung in chains on a gibbet, which sentence was carried into execution at the end of a few days. His illustrious victim had been buried more than two months before, in an extraordinary singular manner, little becoming the condition of a royal favourite, friend of two kings, and virtual ruler of the realm for more than a dozen years. The funeral ceremony took place at ten o'clock at night, on the 18th of September, "in as poor and confused a fashion," in the words of an eyewitness, "as hath ever been seen." The procession came "marching from Wallingford House, over against Whitehall, to Westminster Abbey, there being not much above a hundred mourners, who attended upon an empty coffin, borne upon six men's shoulders, the duke's corpse itself having been interred the day before, as if it had been feared the people in their madness would have surprised it. But to prevent all disorder, the train bands kept an order on both sides of the way, all along from Wallingford House to Westminster Church, beating up their drums loud, and carrying their pikes and muskets upon their shoulders, as in a march, not trailing them at their heels as is usual at a mourning." The empty coffin formed a strange conclusion of a most strange career, unexampled almost in history.

On the very same day on which the coffin of the murdered favourite passed through the ranks of the London train bands, the fleet which he had equipped set sail from Portsmouth. Its command was intrusted by the king to the earl of Lindsey, a man of moderate ability, with some experience of the sea, but chiefly recommended to Charles as being an agreeable courtier and warm advocate in the House of Lords of the divine right principle. Contrary winds kept the huge fleet for some time beating about the Channel; and it was not till at the end of nearly a fortnight, on the morning of the 30th of September, that the hundred and thirty vessels came to draw up in an immense crescent in front of La Rochelle, opposite Richelieu's dyke. The spectacle was grand and magnificent in the extreme, but the cloudy eyes of the dying Huguenots had not vigour enough left to enjoy it. Three-fourths of the inhabitants of the unhappy city had perished from hunger and disease, and the remaining fourth, scarce six thousand people, kept alive by unknown and often horrible means, had barely strength to drag their weary limbs along the ramparts, and to point their heavy muskets at the crowd of enemies encircling them. Attempts at negotiation had been made again and again by Richelieu, but they were sternly refused by the mayor, Jean Guiton, who had come to rule the besieged city with a rod of iron; he alone now represented government and the assembly of Elders, and sitting at the council-table, with his great dagger stuck up in front, surrounded by a guard of fanatic Huguenots, not a soul dared to whisper a word about surrender. On his own brother pointing out to Guiton that they would have all to die of hunger, "Well," he replied, "as long as a single man remains to shut the gates, it will be enough;" adding, with a ghastly smile, that if chance would have it that he should survive with but one more, he would draw lots with him who should eat the other. The dread guard of the mayor, iron-hearted warriors, with souls full of love, and brains full of hatred, grimly applauded his words, and on the impulse of the moment, lifting up their swords, they took a fresh oath to conquer or to die. Every ray of hope and of life now centred in the arrival of the English fleet; and again from early morn to late at night all eyes were strained in gazing towards the western horizon, until, when day after day and week after week had passed, some thousands of eyes could gaze no longer, dim with the shadow of death. Hope itself had perished in the besieged city, when, in the bright dawn of the last day of September, the long-delayed fleet was seen stretched out in the offing, the high ocean disappearing behind the forest of masts, and sails, and streamers, looking gorgeous like the vision of a dream. But there was no token of joy and delight heard within the walls of La Rochelle when the mighty armament appeared in view; to the Huguenots all life had become a fearful dream, and they had ceased to laugh and had ceased to weep. Yet they had not ceased to pray, and the first stupor of mute transport overcome, they crept upon the ramparts, in view of the sea, and poured out their souls in thanksgivings to the Almighty. And many sank down to pray, and rose no more.

The state of the Huguenots of La Rochelle was no secret to the commander of the English fleet, but he went to work nevertheless as if preparing for a show, instead of for the task of saving thousands of human creatures who counted their lives by minutes. For three long days, which to the dwellers in the doomed city seemed years, he remained in entire inactivity, and on the fourth only, he moved forward leisurely to the attack upon the French squadron, moored against the sea wall. The earl of Lindsey, like his predecessor, the earl of Denbigh, seemed to be altogether disinclined to fight, but Richelieu soon forced him into combat by assuming the offensive. The three days' idleness had been enough to show the great cardinal the mould of which the new English commander was made, and when Lindsey's huge crescent of ships advanced, favoured by a strong tide, it found the French fleet ranged in battle order, with the king looking on from the highest citadel on shore, and Richelieu himself standing in the centre of his wonderful dyke, his red hat flapping in the wind like the plume of a field-marshal. Before the English had got their guns in order, the French began firing, first slowly, and then faster and faster, till with the heat of battle increasing on both sides, a furious cannonade sprang up along the whole of the two lines, raising peals of thunder that seemed to shake the ramparts of the city, and clouds of smoke obscuring sea, and land, and sky. The tumult of the struggle kindled the warlike ardour of the Huguenots within the city, and taking to boats and small rafts which they had constructed, they attempted to assault Richelieu's dyke and ships from the one side while the English were bombarding from the other. Jean Guiton and his men were near scaling the sea wall, but the cardinal's quick eye had followed their movements, and they were hurled back by a discharge from all the batteries, while at the same moment a squadron of heavily-armed vessels advanced towards the English fleet. Without awaiting their coming Lindsey, who had seen several of his fire-ships stranded, and great damage inflicted upon others, gave the signal to retreat, resuming the position he had left in the morning. The next day, the 5th of October, the contest was renewed on both sides, but with less spirit than before; and before noon arrived, a rising gale gave the English commander the pretext to retire a dozen miles to the south, into the sheltered roads between the isle of Aix and Rochefort. From here, Lindsey sent envoys to Richelieu to negotiate in favour of the Huguenots, but the cardinal refused all intercourse, telling the messengers that the king of France could not allow foreigners to interfere between him and his subjects. The haughty reply was due to a great extent to the fact of the cardinal becoming certain that La Rochelle would surrender in a few days, a new revolution having broken out in the unhappy city, resulting in the party inclined to peace getting the upper hand. After the retreat of the English fleet, Jean Guiton was the sole man left advocating continuance of defence; and the certainty of death by hunger appearing too frightful a prospect to all the rest to be voluntarily chosen, they sent a deputation to Richelieu offering submission. The cardinal was human and generous enough not to drive his enemies to despair by exacting an unconditional surrender; and on promising the defenders of La Rochelle not only a complete amnesty, but likewise freedom of worship, the gates were thrown open at once. On making their entry into the city, Richelieu and his staff of officers stood aghast at the sight that met their eyes; there were long rows of cadaverous human forms stretched along the dark arcades of all the thoroughfares; the living men, terrible to look at in their grisly haggardness, seemed reeling about more than walking; and hundreds of them were beheld falling upon the royalist soldiers, tearing the bread slung across their shoulders away from them, and devouring it in the road with untamable greed. The cardinal immediately ordered ample stores of provisions to be brought into La Rochelle, and to be distributed freely, which munificence brought tears into the eyes of most of the people, who fell on their knees as he passed along. But one man kept bold upright, his looks breathing defiance when face to face with Richelieu—the mayor, Jean Guiton. Approaching him, the cardinal first bent his head and stretched out his hand, treating Guiton as if still chief magistrate of the city and head of the Huguenots. Richelieu had conquered the iron mayor, and shown that he was far the greater man.

The English fleet kept loitering on the coast for nearly a month after the fall of La Rochelle; and it was not till the 11th of November that the earl of Lindsey, having lost seventeen of his vessels, ordered the rest to return home. He had some fears regarding the reception he would meet with in England; but his apprehensions were unfounded in so far as he himself remained unmolested, the rage of the people about the disgrace inflicted upon the country venting itself against the new advisers of the king, to whose orders, it was generally believed, the defeat of the fleet and fall of the Huguenot city was due. The enormous power which Buckingham wielded had fallen on his death mainly into the hands of the queen and of Laud, bishop of London, who employed their influence upon the king, either directly or through dependants of their own making, for the establishment of a firm despotism, both in church and state. The effects became visible almost immediately in a renewal and increase of all the arbitrary measures so strongly complained of during the last parliamentary session, and which had given rise to the Petition of Right. Illegal taxes continued to be raised as largely as ever; men who refused to pay them were cast into prison; and the Star Chamber and High Commission Court were set to work anew to suspend the course of ordinary law, and to punish all those who entered the slightest opposition to the arbitrariness of the government. To carry out the system of tyranny thus inaugurated, tools were not wanting, for besides the men lifted into power by Buckingham, to whom Charles continued as warmly attached after his death as before, a number of others were found willing to assist in widening the gulf between the people and the throne. Among the most notable of these was Sir Thomas Wentworth, distinguished up to this time as an opponent of royal despotism, and looked upon as one of the chief leaders of the popular party in the House of Commons, but who had recently been made president of the council of the north, with the dignity of viscount. He became a renegade immediately after the assassination of Buckingham, the disappearance of the favourite opening a wide scope to his ambition; and his example was followed by a number of inferior men, formerly professed liberals, whom the king made privy councillors, with the distinct understanding that they were to aid him in annihilating the growing power of parliament. Of his intention to commence the struggle forthwith, Charles made not the least secret, speaking of it to all with whom he came into contact and declaring it still more publicly in several of his appointments. Sir Richard Weston, one of the most unscrupulous of the creatures of the late favourite, and as such particularly obnoxious to the people, was made lord treasurer, while Dr. Montague, a divine who had sought fame and promotion by upholding absolutism from the pulpit, and been prosecuted on this account by the House of Commons, had the bishopric of Winchester given to him; and another disciple of Laud, Dr. Mainwaring, who had been condemned on the same ground by the peers, obtained the deanery of Worcester, which was followed by his promotion to the see of St. David's. Under these circumstances, further doubts as to the aims of the king were impossible; and all saw that the final struggle which was to decide whether England should continue to be ruled by the arbitrary will of a single man, more or less fluctuating according to the pressure exercised upon it by minions and adventurers, or whether the laws and government of the nation should be formed and moulded by the nation, could not fail to commence before long. There were some few who held that physical power would have to decide the great question in the end, but the majority of the people seemed to be under the impression that the battle could be fought on the floor of the houses of parliament. On Wentworth taking his post as president of the northern council, with evident willingness, like all apostates, to run into excess of zeal, John Pym, his former colleague, shook him by the hand, exclaiming, "We shall meet again in Westminster Hall."

The meeting soon came, and with it the first scene of the battle. Having been prorogued from the 20th of October, 1628, to the 20th of January, 1629, parliament opened on the latter day amidst a state of general excitement, caused both by the publication of the details of the ignominious French expedition, and the report of a very remarkable act of duplicity on the part of the king. The latter was the first subject of debate, started by a member asking, amidst the deep silence of the house, whether the Petition of Right, with the royal assent thereto, had been duly enrolled among the statutes, according to the promise made by his majesty. An examination of the Journals sufficed to show that the act was indeed enrolled, but with the king's first evasive answer, in place of his legal assent, to which moreover the speech which he had pronounced on the last day of the session, which invalidated its main provisions, had been appended. On investigating the matter further, it was found that the proper documents had been given by the clerk of the House of Lords to the printer of the Journals, who had then duly composed and struck off fifteen hundred copies, but that, before they were sent out, the attorney-general, acting in the name of the king, had interfered, and ordered the false edition complained of to be issued from the press. The trick was so despicably mean that the commons, aroused though they were by the new despotic tendencies of the crown, felt all but ashamed to inquire too deeply into the subject, and, passing from deceit in words to deceit in acts, they proceeded, without loss of time, to consider how far the settled provisions of the Petition of Right had been invaded and violated. They soon found matter enough for discussion, reports coming in from all sides of extortions practised by the agents of the king, of arbitrary arrests, of persecutions by the Star Chamber, and of a general disregard of the right of property and the lives and liberties of the subject. The case of a city merchant named Rolls, a member of the house, especially attracted attention by the openly expressed tendency of the executive to violate the laws of the land. On his refusal to pay certain illegal duties, the merchandize upon which it was laid had been confiscated; and the complaints made by him and protests of an appeal to parliament had produced no other result than the mocking reply, "If the whole parliament were in you, we would take your goods." It was enough to rouse the ire of the commons, and the officers who had uttered the words were at once summoned to attend before a committee of the house. Most unexpectedly, the king stayed the summons, avowing that the persons complained against had acted under his orders; he at the same time invited the two houses to meet him at Whitehall for an explanation. The meeting took place on the appointed day, the 24th of January, both the lords and commons being numerously represented. Charles delivered a very curious address, the obvious purport of which was to create a division among his antagonists by detaching the upper from the lower house, and bringing the former over to his own interest. "The care I have," he exclaimed, "to remove all obstacles that may hinder the good correspondency, or cause a misunderstanding, betwixt me and this parliament, made me call you hither at this time, the particular occasion being a complaint lately moved in the lower house. For you, my lords, I am glad to take this and all other occasions whereby you may clearly understand both my words, and actions, for as you are nearest in degree, so you are the fittest witnesses for kings." Charles ended by demanding that the duties of tonnage and poundage, constituting the chief revenue of the crown, should be granted to him, not for one year only, but for life. It was equivalent to asking to relieve him of the necessity of summoning parliament any more for the rest of his reign.

A few days were enough to show the king that the commons had not the least intention to abdicate the important position to which they had risen. Instead of complying with his wish and legalizing obnoxious taxes, they set themselves to discuss the great religious questions which occupied all the earnest men of the nation. That the king was striding fast towards Roman Catholicism, dragged on both by his consort and by Laud, whose influence over him was daily growing, very few could doubt who watched both his words and his actions; and it became of the highest necessity therefore to put a stop to a movement which threatened to place the nation again into bondage, political as well as religious. It had been discovered some time before that in the last French expedition gross deceit had been used, no relief of the defenders of La Rochelle having ever been intended, but, on the contrary, the queen and her party having zealously worked at the destruction of the Huguenots; and the certainty that this anti-Protestant policy was still reigning was sufficient in itself to excite great apprehensions among the people, and engage the most earnest consideration of the commons. Almost immediately after the conference at Whitehall, it was decided by them to establish a committee on religion, the action of which soon absorbed the almost exclusive attention of the house. On the 2nd of February, instead of the bill upon tonnage and poundage, which he was expecting anxiously, the commons presented to Charles a petition asking him to appoint a day of general fast on account of the distressed state of the foreign Protestant churches. The king replied, with much truth, that fighting would do the foreign churches far more good than fasting; but he derogated from the answer by telling the petitioners, in the same breath, that he would not allow them "to meddle with religion" before they had voted his taxation bill. The injunction not to meddle was rather a spur than otherwise, the commons being fully aware that the question of religion, at which his majesty professed to sneer, was at the very basis of their existence, and acting upon this conviction, the debates on the forbidden topic became more and more excited. "The misfortunes we suffer are many," Sir John Eliot exclaimed, in an impassioned speech; "Arminianism undermines us; popery comes in upon us. They mask not in strange disguises, but expose themselves to the view of the world. In the search of these, we have fixed our eyes not on the actors, the Jesuits and priests, but upon their masters, those who are in authority. You have some prelates who are their abettors: the great bishop of London, we know what he hath done to favour them. This fear extends to some others: the lord treasurer, in whose person all evil is contracted, both for the innovation of our religion, and the invasion of our liberties, he also is a great enemy of the commonwealth. I have traced him in all his actions, and I find him building on the grounds laid by his master the great duke: he is secretly moving for our interruption. And from fear they go about to break parliaments, lest parliaments should break them. I find him the head of all that party, the papists, and all the Jesuits and priests derive from him their shelter and protection." Soon after Sir John Eliot had sat down, a thick-set man, with a swollen and roddish countenance, a sharp and untunable voice, dressed slovenly in a plain cloth suit, creased linen, old-fashioned ruffles, and a bandless hat, rose to address the house. "I have heard," he stuttered forth, "from one Dr. Beard, that Dr. Alabaster hath preached flat popery at St. Paul's Cross, and that the bishop of Winchester commanded him, as his diocesan, to preach nothing to the contrary. And Dr. Mainwaring, so justly censured for his sermons in this house, hath been preferred to a rich living. If these are steps to church preferment, what may we not expect?" "What may we not expect?" the shrill voice repeated. All eyes were turned upon the speaker, who appeared to be a new man in the house. "Who is that sloven?" Lord Digby inquired of his friend John Hampden, member for Wendover. "That sloven," Hampden replied, quietly, "whom you see there, who hath no ornament in his speech; that sloven, I say, if we should ever come to a breach, which God forbid: in such a case, I say, that sloven will be the greatest man in England." The sloven, just sent into the House of Commons by the electors of the borough of Huntingdon, was called Oliver Cromwell.

The attack upon his new advisers, the Romanist bishops, exasperated the king as much as that made in the preceding session upon his great favourite; and to crush the debate opened by Sir John Eliot, in the bud, he forthwith resolved to prorogue parliament, with a view to its dissolution. On rising, the same day on which Eliot had spoken, the 2nd of March, the Speaker, Sir John Finch, announced from the chair that he was the bearer of a message from the king, commanding him "to adjourn the house until Tuesday come seven-night following," or the 10th of March. A number of members at once rose, protesting against the order on the ground that the right of adjournment belonged to the house and not to his majesty; and Sir John Eliot, suiting the action to the word, in disregard of the royal message, brought forward a remonstrance against the further levying of illegal imposts. The Speaker refused to put it to the vote, upon which a violent tumult broke out in the house. When it had somewhat subsided, John Selden, member for Lancaster, held in high respect by all for his great learning and eminent knowledge of the law, succeeded in obtaining a hearing. "Master Speaker," he cried, "you cannot refuse to put the question when we command you. We sit here by command from the king, under the great seal, and you are by his majesty, sitting in his royal chair before both houses, appointed our Speaker, and you therefore cannot refuse to do your office." Trembling all over, the Speaker pleaded that he had the express command of the king to cease his functions after delivering the message, after which declaration he made a movement to quit the house. But he had no sooner risen, when the door was locked by those nearest, and a number of members pounced upon Sir John Finch, took him by the shoulders, and held him down by force in his chair. Others, adherents of the court, hurried up at the same time to set him free, and a strange scuffle ensued, enlivened by the screams of the faint-hearted Speaker, who took to weeping like a great boy. "I do not say I will not," he cried, with big tears running down his healthy cheeks, addressing the hard hands that clasped his shoulders; "I do not say I will not, but I dare not. Do not seek my ruin: I dare not sin against the command of my sovereign." It was in vain that John Selden pleaded and argued with the poor Speaker, and even that his near relative, Sir Henry Heyman, member for Hythe, addressed him in a tone of mingled contempt and indignation. "I am sorry I am your kinsman," Sir Henry cried, "for you are a disgrace to the country, and a blot upon a noble family. All the dangers that will follow, nay, our destruction, shall be laid by posterity as the issue of your baseness, and shall be remembered with scorn and disdain." "I propose for my part," he added, "that since the fellow will not do his duty, that he be called to the bar, and a new Speaker be chosen." The proposition was not accepted, the members behind the chair protesting that Sir John Finch was quite in their hands, and as good as riveted to his seat. "God's wounds," one of them, Benjamin Valentino, member for St. Germans, cried, "he shall sit still till it pleases us to rise." Deep silence now ensued, in the midst of which Denzil Holles, eldest son of the earl of Clare, and member for Dorchester, came forward to read a solemn remonstrance drawn up by Sir John Eliot. "Whoever," the remonstrance ran, "shall bring in innovations in religion, or by favour seek to extend, or introduce, popery and Arminianism, or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy; whoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or shall be an actor, or instrument, therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth; and if any merchant, or other person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberty of England, and an enemy to the same." The remonstrance was voted by acclamation, amidst tremendous excitement, which had not yet subsided when a loud knocking, as of heavy arms, resounded against the door, together with the shout of many voices demanding admittance in the name of the king. Charles had arrived at the House of Lords and summoned the Commons to the bar, and none of them appearing, and the usher of the Black Rod reporting that the door was locked against him, had ordered the captain of the guards to force it open. A conflict seemed imminent, and many hands were grasping the hilts of their swords; but prudence prevailed at the last moment, and the door being unlocked, a short vote was passed adjourning the house to the 10th of March, after which the majority of the members dispersed in all directions. Only a few of them, headed by Sir John Finch, who was drying his tears, went to the bar of the lords to bow before the king.

The breach now was complete. A few days after the scene in the House of Commons, Sir John Eliot, Donzil Holles, John Selden, and six others who had taken a prominent part in the proceedings, were arrested and sent as close prisoners to the Tower, under the accusation of having instigated the people to sedition. On the day to which parliament had been prorogued by his order, the 10th of March, the king went in great state to the House of Lords, and without requiring the attendance of the commons, pronounced sentence of dissolution. "My lords," Charles exclaimed, "I never came here upon so unpleasant an occasion, that of dissolving a parliament, and therefore men may have some cause to wonder why I should not rather choose to do this by commission, it being a general maxim of kings to leave harsh commands to their ministers, so that they themselves be left to execute only pleasing things. Yet considering that justice as well consists in the punishing of vice as in reward and praise of virtue, I thought it necessary to come here to-day, and declare to you, and to all the world, that it was merely the undutiful and seditious carriage in the Lower House that hath made the dissolution of this parliament; and you, my lords, are so far from being any causers of it, that I take as much comfort in your dutiful demeanour as I am justly dissatisfied with their proceedings. But to avoid mistakings, let me tell you that it is far from me to adjudge all the house alike guilty, for as I know there are many there as dutiful subjects as any in the world, so I know that it was only some few vipers among them that did cast this mist of undutifulness over most of their eyes. To say truth, there was a good number there that could not be infected with this contagion, insomuch that some did express their duties in speaking, which was the general fault of the house the last day. To conclude, as these vipers must look for their reward of punishment, so you, my lords, must justly expect from me that favour and protection that a good king oweth to his loving and faithful nobility. And now, my lord keeper, do what I have commanded you." Bowing to the ground, and then raising his head again, the lord keeper cried, "My lords and gentlemen of the House of Commons, the king's majesty doth dissolve this parliament." To speak to the people, as well as to his "faithful and loving nobility," Charles immediately after issued a proclamation, justifying the sudden dissolution of the third parliament of his reign, and intimating very distinctly his intention not to summon another for a long while to come. "We have showed," he said, "by our frequently meeting our people, our love to the use of parliaments, yet the late abuse having for the present driven us unwillingly out of that course, we shall account it presumption for any one to prescribe any time unto us for parliaments, the calling, continuing, and dissolving of which is always in our power. We shall be more inclinable to meet in parliament again when our people shall see more clearly into our interests and actions, and when such as have bred this interruption have received their condign punishment." It was impossible for the king to expose with more frankness his aim of establishing a government as absolutely despotic as any the world possessed.

The first step of Charles in the new violent course in which he had embarked, was to take his revenge upon the imprisoned members of the House of Commons, or to send "the vipers" to "condign punishment." To effect it, the ancient parliamentary privilege of right of speech had first to be overthrown, and feeling somewhat doubtful whether it could be done easily, with a due observance of legal forms, Laud advised the king to inquire beforehand of the judges how far they would lend themselves to the scheme. This was done accordingly, and with results somewhat unexpected to Charles. A few of the highest legal functionaries, looking wistfully about, doubtful whether, in the impending storm, the parliamentary ship could help being wrecked on the rock of kingly power, gave mysterious and evasive answers to the question as to whether the representatives of the people were liable to punishment for their actions in parliament; but the greater number of the judges, including all those of an inferior grade, replied by a direct and distinct negative. In the meanwhile, Sir John Eliot and his fellow-prisoners had sued for writs of habeas corpus; but the attorney-general opposed the return on the plea that they were detained for notable contempts, and for stirring up sedition, alleged in a warrant under the king's sign manual. On the counsel for the prisoners urging the insufficiency of this return, among others as being opposed to the principles laid down in the Petition of Right, the attorney-general startled his hearers by the assertion that the Petition of Right had never received the king's assent, and was no law, and that even though his majesty in his innate goodness might feel inclined, should occasion offer, to keep the principles of the Petition in view, their explanation must be left to him. The judges hesitated what course to take, fearing the king, and yet dreading the wrath of future parliaments; and in the end, to steer a middle course, they sent a humble petition to Charles, telling him "that by their oaths they were bound to bail the prisoners; but deemed proper before they did so, or published their opinions therein, to inform his majesty thereof, and humbly to advise him, as had been done by his noble progenitors in like case, to give his consent to the bail." Looking with proper disdain upon his judges, of whom he spoke as "oracles and riddles," the king did not even reply to their petition, which led to the issue of the writs of habeas corpus. But though issued, they could not be served, Charles resorting to the mean artifice of removing the prisoners from the Tower, and sending them to other prisons for a time, until the writs had lapsed. The indignation aroused by this proceeding, among the lawyers as well as the people at large, had the consequence of somewhat checking the heat of the king's resentment; and the attorney-general was ordered to drop the prosecution against six of the imprisoned members of the House of Commons, and only prepare charges against the remaining three, Sir John Eliot, Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine, the first two for words spoken in parliament, and the last for violence to the Speaker. The trial came on before the judges of the court of King's Bench in October, after the prisoners had been suffering close confinement for nine months, and ended in a verdict of guilty, and the condemnation of the accused to terms of imprisonment and fines varying in amount. Benjamin Valentine, "because," as stated in the judgment, "he is of less ability than the rest," was ordered to pay a fine of five hundred pounds; Denzil Holles of one thousand pounds; and Sir John Eliot, described as "the greatest offender and the ringleader," a fine of two thousand pounds, and to all was decreed imprisonment "during the king's pleasure." Holles and Valentine were liberated after about eighteen months' confinement; but Eliot, thrown into a horrible underground dungeon in the Tower, with water oozing between the stones, and without the allowance of fire even in winter, was killed at the end of three years' suffering. It was a murder committed by Charles which neither parliament nor the nation could ever forget or forgive.

Having punished the enemies of his prerogative, the king set himself with great zeal to fill his treasury, choosing by preference such means as had been condemned repeatedly as illegal in the House of Commons. The duties of tonnage and poundage, with several other arbitrary imposts, were not only levied as before, but greatly augmented, and the goods of all refractory taxpayers distrained without mercy. Heavy punishments were inflicted, besides, upon all persons who showed the least resistance in words or deeds to the extortions practised upon them, the Star Chamber tribunal in all such cases pounding down upon the offenders, who could deem themselves fortunate if escaping with their lives. On one occasion, a wealthy merchant and alderman of London,

William Chambers, was arrested for refusing to pay an enormous impost upon a bale of silk; and being carried before the privy council, a sense of intolerable injury moved him to exclaim "that in no part of the world were merchants so screwed up as in England: even in Turkey they had more encouragement." Though only uttered before a few members of the government, the remark was deemed a libellous publication, and the Star Chamber, into which he was dragged, condemned Chambers to pay a fine of two thousand pounds, and to be imprisoned "during the king's pleasure." The unfortunate alderman had to remain in gaol for above six years, and was turned out at last a beggar, with the utter ruin of his fortune as well as his health. Examples like these went far to produce at least outward quietness; the taxes flowed in freely, and the royal exchequer became better filled than it had been for a generation. However, the money did not come in too fast; for great as was the supply, the greed of the courtiers was greater, and the extravagance of the queen's household alone was sufficient to devour the produce of all the imposts that could be raised in the kingdom. To supplement the sources of revenue, the advisers of Charles, chief among them the lord treasurer, Sir Richard Weston, who had been raised, after the dissolution of parliament, to the peerage under the title of earl of Portland, practised several other means for extorting money, some of them old and some new. One of these was the revival of an obsolete custom by which all who were qualified were bound to take up their knighthood or pay a fine for not doing it. By enforcing this species of feudal tribute as strictly as could be done, Charles managed to press about a hundred thousand pounds out of the landowning class, but not without raising for himself about a hundred thousand enemies in the same direction. What embittered still more the dissatisfaction caused by the tax upon unwilling knights was a partial revival of the ancient forest laws, by which the king claimed all the lands coming within the description of royal forests. Many of these domains had been "disafforested" for generations, and fallen into the possession of private owners, chiefly among the landed gentry; but they had to give up what they considered their property on the mere demand of the solicitor-general, no prescription being allowed to be pleaded against the crown's title. The forests of Epping and Hainault in Essex were so extended by these royal claims as to include nearly the whole county; the boundaries of Rockingham Forest in Northamptonshire were enlarged from six to above sixty miles; and a great part of the New Forest in Hampshire was taken away from private owners and added to the crown property. At the same time, enormous fines were imposed on all trespassers, and many noblemen and gentlemen suffered severely for their encroachments, while others, the earl of Southampton among the number, were entirely ruined by the confiscation of their lands. Though advantageous as a fiscal measure, the step proved one of the gravest political blunders which even so unwise a king as Charles could commit. Hitherto, the chief element resisting his despotic encroachments had been within the population of the larger towns, the crowds gathered in the folds of Puritanism, and the industrial and mercantile classes in general; but he now created a new enemy, more formidable than any yet arrayed against him, among the landed aristocracy. To reconcile the former was a comparatively easy matter; Charles needed but keep the promises made in assenting to the Petition of Right and govern with fairness and justice, discarding priests and Jesuit prelates, for whom personally he felt little inclination, and the classes which had hitherto opposed him in parliament would have worshipped him. The industrious citizen, loyal to the core of his heart, wanted nothing but to be left alone, and to enjoy the fruit of his labours in peace, anxiously ready at any time to become a faithful and obedient subject; but it was otherwise with the new class which, with terrible imprudence, the king seemed bent upon making his enemies. All parliament and the people might absolve Charles, but the angry squires from whom he had taken their lands would be certain to be his unforgiving foes till death.

By the various financial expedients to which he had recourse, the king found that he could raise money enough to defray the expenses of court and government during a time of peace; but it was not sufficient for aggressive purposes, and being still nominally at war with France and Spain, he hastened, immediately after the dissolution of parliament, to enter into negotiations with both Louis XIII. and Philip IV. Since the English government had been content to leave the Huguenots without stipulation to the mercy of their sovereign, there was nothing to impede an amicable arrangement with that court, and a few ambassadorial interviews sufficed for the conclusion of a treaty, which came to be signed in the autumn of 1629. With Spain the difficulties were somewhat greater, not, however, on account of any unwillingness, on the part of either Philip IV. or his ruling minister, Count Olivarez, to enter into friendly relationship, but because of the resistance of the queen, who seemed determined now for the first time to make her political influence openly felt. Having solely the interests of her native country at heart, Henrietta Maria did all that was in her power to cross the arrangement with Spain, and succeeded so far as to stop for more than a year the signature of the treaty of peace, ardently desired by Charles and all his new advisers, as well as by every member of the Spanish government. To overcome the opposition of the queen, Olivarez finally hit upon the curious expedient of intrusting the diplomatic negotiations, instead of to ordinary ambassadors, to eminent artists, a class of persons for whom her majesty, with the true Medici blood in her veins, had always shown particular fondness. The first man picked out by the shrewd Spanish minister for the purpose was Balthasar Gerbier, a native of Antwerp, distinguished as painter and sculptor, but more distinguished still as a most accomplished courtier and man of the world. He commenced his ambassadorial career by inviting Charles, his queen, and all the ladies of honour to a supper which cost above a thousand pounds, and in return brought him the honour of knighthood, together with the permission to paint the portraits of both their majesties. It was a decided progress in diplomacy, the fact being certain that Spaniards and Englishmen could not kill each other as long as Sir Balthasar was busy with his brush; however, the negotiations went on very slowly, and to accelerate them, and assist the artist-ambassador, Olivarez despatched a second in the person of the illustrious Peter Paul Rubens, now in the height of his fame, and considered the greatest painter of the age. Rubens arrived in England early in 1630, and having been received with the greatest distinction at court, immediately took up the thread of diplomacy with such skilful handling that peace was concluded before the summer had come, though the actual signing of the treaty by Charles and Philip IV. did not take place till the month of November. Both kings showed their gratitude to the famous artist by knighting him, in addition to which Charles gave him a commission to paint the ceiling of the banqueting-house at Whitehall, at a cost of three thousand pounds. Peter Paul Rubens joined to all these presents one of his own, by taking unto himself a young and exquisitely beautiful wife, Helena Fourment, a native of Bruges. Helena was sixteen, and Peter Paul fifty-three; but the union, like everything else the world-famed painter undertook in the course of his life, proved fortunate and of happy issue. Having thrown off the grey care of politics, Charles made the nuptials of the great diplomatizing artist the object of some brilliant court festivities, in return for which distinction the latter exerted himself to bestow immortality upon the first Stuart king of England. While Sir John Eliot was dying in prison, and every champion of freedom and of justice was hunted after and persecuted, Rubens was busy at Whitehall painting the apotheosis of King James.

The year in which Rubens came to England, and peace was concluded with Spain, was productive besides of an occurrence important to the nation, and which brought the domestic felicity of Charles to the culminating point. On the 29th of May, 1630, the queen gave birth to a son, who in baptism obtained the name of Charles. It was not the first offspring of the royal marriage; for in the preceding year Henrietta Maria had brought forth a male child, but which had lived only long enough to give rise to a vigorous effort of the priests of her majesty's household to gain it for Rome, by the administration of certain rites, and an equally determined effort of the Protestant chaplains at court to defeat the "popish plot." Puffed about between the excited warriors of the two creeds, the poor infant, a weakly and sickly little thing, had died; and to prevent another fatality of the kind, Charles himself took to looking after his spouse in her new pregnancy, and this time succeeded in keeping the baby alive, though with some difficulty. Some time previous to the birth, efforts, diplomatic and otherwise, commenced to add to the number of priests and priestly agents smuggled into the royal household, the French ambassador, marquis de Chateaufeuf, going so far as to insist on the appointment of a bishop, as well as of a physician, specially attached to the queen. Charles steadily refused, notwithstanding which the offered physician made his appearance at court, introduced by the marquis, who blandly pleaded his own instructions as an offset to the king's objections. The pride of Charles being roused by those repeated attempts to upset his authority even within the walls of his own house, he got rid of the crowd of intruders by forcible ejection; but the French priests or bishops were no sooner gone when the trouble began with the English bishops. The great question, which stirred the court to its very foundations, was who should baptize the baby; the right was claimed on the one side by Archbishop Abbot, representing the more liberal section in the church, and on the other by Bishop Laud, leader and head of the small but energetic party accused by Oliver Cromwell of preaching "flat popery." Legally, the right belonged to the primate, the archbishops of Canterbury being possessed of the ancient privilege of acting as ordinaries of the household of the king and queen wherever it might be, and to perform all the rites of the church for the members of the royal family; but after some slight hesitation in the matter, the king overruled the claim, and appointed Laud to perform the baptism. To leave no doubt as to the reason which had given rise to the selection, Bishop Williams, the late lord-keeper, one of the chief adversaries of the "flat popery" party, was excluded from the general invitation given to the other church dignitaries, for which he revenged himself by remarking that if present at the baptismal ceremony he could not have joined in the last four words of the prayer composed by Laud for the occasion: "Double his father's graces, O Lord, upon him, if it be possible." The words, half ludicrous and half blasphemous, and justly characterized by the bishop of Lincoln as "three-piled flattery and loathsome divinity," were, nevertheless, by special command of Laud, inserted in the public prayers for the new prince of Wales, and proved sufficient to stifle whatever little enthusiasm there existed for the birth of a heir to the throne. The report of the event had been received by the Puritans throughout the kingdom with indifference, if not with sorrow and displeasure. "I remember," Bishop Hackett left on record, "that being at a town in Gloucestershire when the news came of the prince's birth, there was great joy shown by the parish, in causing bonfires to be made, and the bells to be rung, and victuals to be sent to those of the younger sort who were most busily employed in the public joy; but from the rest of the houses, being of the Presbyterian or Puritan party, there came neither man nor child, nor wood, nor victuals, their doors being shut close all the evening as in a time of general mourning and disconsolation." "One of their leading men," the bishop continues, "scrupled not to observe at an entertainment, whilst others were expressing their satisfaction, that he saw no great cause of joy in it, for that God had already better provided for us than we had deserved in giving such a hopeful progeny by the queen of Bohemia, brought up in the reformed religion, whereas it was uncertain what religion the king's children would follow, brought up under a mother entirely devoted to the church of Rome." Charles, who liked to speak of the Puritans as visionaries, was right so far that they enjoyed very clear and distinct visions, though not as religious enthusiasts merely, but as far-seeing politicians and statesmen.

The hope and trust which drew the hearts of the Puritans of England towards the descendants of the king's sister, the crownless queen of Bohemia, was stirred by some remarkable events which took place in Germany shortly after the birth of the prince of Wales. Ever since the commencement of the frightful war waged by the house of Austria for the extermination of Protestantism in central Europe, the cause of the reformers had been proceeding in a downward course; against them were arrayed the best disciplined troops, the strongest artillery, and the most skilful generals in existence, and for them there was nothing but a number of weak and detached bodies of volunteer soldiers, zealous for the truth, but without good military commanders, without warlike experience, and almost without arms. Protestant England, the only natural ally from which Protestant Germany could expect powerful assistance, sufficient to keep on even terms with the mighty enemy, was looking on, not coldly, but helplessly; and the offers of France to give aid, not from religious sympathy, but out of political jealousy, being made to create profound distrust, nothing remained for the small phalanx of the soldiers of the reformation than to fight the battle single-handed, and with very small chances of success from the commencement. Whatever these chances of war were, they were dispelled by the result of the first ten years' struggle, which ended in the scattered forces of the Protestant Union being beaten on all points, and compelled to retreat to the borders of the Netherlands and the lowlands on the North Sea and the Baltic, while hordes of Hungarians, Spaniards, and Italians, brigands more than soldiers, went ravaging all the rest of Germany, burning cities, towns, and villages, revelling in murder and the most horrible crimes, and stamping out all signs of industry and civilization in one immense track of fire and blood. All hopes of saving their lives, their property, and their religion, had begun to vanish from the hearts of the followers of Luther, when on a sudden there occurred a change so mighty and so extraordinary as to strike amazement among the populations of Germany, and raise among the pious Protestants a belief in the direct interference of heaven. On the 13th of June, 1630, two weeks after the birth of an heir-apparent of England, Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, landed in Pomerania at the head of fifteen thousand men, to save Protestantism in Germany, if not on the continent of Europe, from utter extinction. The army he brought seemed absurdly small for the grand object in view, and so entirely inadequate to cope with the fighting savages, more than a hundred thousand in number, enrolled under the banner of Kaiser and Pope, that the chiefs of the Catholic League, on hearing of the arrival of the Scandinavian monarch, nicknamed him "the Snow King," prophesying he and his army would melt in going southward. But the fifteen thousand Swedes of Gustavus Adolphus did not dissolve in striding southward from the Baltic shore, but marched from victory to victory. They were not mere soldiers fighting for pay, or ambition, or any other worldly cause, but stately,

God-fearing men, fonder of psalms than of battle songs, commencing their daily work with prayer, their hands firmly grasping the hilts of their avenging swords, but their eyes more firmly directed towards all-avenging heaven. As they marched onward, the whole rabble of murderers and assassins, representing the papal armies, flew before them like chaff before the storm; and in the course of a few months the greater part of northern Germany was cleared from priests and brigands. Never before had the nations of Europe beheld the outward aspect of Protestantism in so grand a form as in the fifteen thousand warriors of Gustavus Adolphus.

Among the English Protestants the sudden appearance of Gustavus Adolphus as saviour of the reformed faith in Germany created the most profound excitement. It found vent in the streets and the pulpit, and even in the privy council chamber voices were heard for an alliance of England with the Swedish king. Charles himself appeared not at all disinclined to the proposal, deeming it would lead to the restoration of his brother-in-law, the prince palatine, for whom he felt some affection; however, being well aware that he could never dream of engaging in war without the assistance of parliament, he carefully suppressed his feelings, professing to be able to do more for the German Protestants by diplomatic negotiations than by force of arms. To show his ability, the king forthwith appointed a special ambassador to proceed to the courts of Austria and Spain; but before the envoy had yet started, he allowed himself to be persuaded to embark in another scheme, strongly marked by that duplicity which characterized every one of his actions. The new plan to which Charles gave his approbation consisted in furnishing armed assistance to the Swedish king, though not open but in secret, and in such a manner that it should appear to the Catholic princes with whom he was going to negotiate as if done against his own will and express order. It was through the persuasion of the queen, always bent upon advocating the interests of France, that Charles was brought to adopt this notable scheme, the author of which, the marquis of Hamilton, was moreover his kinsman and one of his personal favourites, and as such did his best to carry the project into execution. James Hamilton, third marquis of Hamilton, and subsequently first duke, who was now beginning to play a prominent part at court and in the government, had only reached the age of twenty-four, but his skill in intrigue, worthy of an older head, was showing itself already to a remarkable degree. Having formed the acquaintance of Charles while prince of Wales, he made the best of it after his accession to the throne, when he was appointed successively, in spite of his youth, master of the horse, a gentleman of the bed-chamber, and a privy councillor. While Buckingham was in power, he sided with him and against the queen; but after the death of the favourite, he executed a graceful turn, and enrolled himself among the ardent followers of her majesty. Though not in the habit of selecting new friends from old enemies, Henrietta Maria made an exception in the case of the marquis of Hamilton, owing to very peculiar circumstances. Among the throng of courtiers in the royal household was a handsome youth of graceful manners, Henry Jermyn, son of the vice-chamberlain, Sir Thomas Jermyn, who had obtained the favour of the queen to such an extent, and so visibly to all eyes, that the strangest rumours were current regarding their intimacy. Over this person James Hamilton obtained, by means not very honourable to either of them, a decided influence, which led to the betrayal of certain secrets affecting the character of the queen, and still further, to her majesty becoming the warm friend and patron of the marquis. Backed by her influential support, Charles consented to give to his young favourite the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, with permission to enlist six thousand men, half English and half Scotch, and lead them to the assistance of the king of Sweden. The work was accomplished successfully, though not so secretly as Charles would have wished; and early in the autumn of 1630, the English-Scotch force, consisting of six regiments of foot soldiers, landed at the mouth of the Oder, and soon after effected a junction with the army of Gustavus Adolphus, on its march towards Silesia. Hamilton's men were received with great joy by the German reformers, who held them to be the forerunners of mightier aid, happily ignorant of the origin of the enterprise, and of the character of the knot of courtiers and intriguers that were guiding the destinies of Protestant England.

The assistance given by Hamilton's brigade to Gustavus Adolphus and the cause of Protestantism proved of the slightest. Partly owing to want of discipline among the ill assorted and untrained soldiers, and partly to the entire inefficiency of their youthful commander, they gained no other renown than that of fighting in the rear of the Swedes at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, in the spring of 1631, and subsequently, on the 7th of September, in the great battle of Leipzig, in which Gustavus Adolphus achieved a decisive victory over General Tilly, utterly annihilating the forces of the Catholic League, and freeing Germany from the Baltic to the Danube. Before this event, the six regiments led by Hamilton had dwindled down, through famine and disease, caused by the most wretched mismanagement, to less than one half their original strength, and having come to quarrel with all the officers, and all the officers with him, the marquis decided upon relinquishing his command, and leaving his men to their fate. Embarking in haste, he suddenly reappeared at the English court, to the delight of the king, but less to that of the queen, who had been cherishing expectations that a glorious death on the battle-field would be in store for the friend and confidant of her favourite. In common justice, the award of death, with deduction of glory, should have been voted out to him even now, and there were not wanting voices demanding that the marquis ought to be hung for deserting his troops in the field; however, the cry was vain and useless, and James Hamilton could afford to despise it, sitting under the shield of the king as well as the queen. Upon the latter he established new claims of gratitude, soon after his return to England, by taking her part in a contest that engaged the attention of both their majesties and of the whole court to an infinitely higher degree than the victories of Gustavus Adolphus, the life and death struggle of the German nation, and the fate of Protestantism. One of the queen's maids of honour, a noble lady of the house of Villiers, had been seduced by Henry Jermyn, her favourite; and the affair causing great scandal, and coming to the ears of Charles, he had decided that the profligate youth should repair by marriage the wrong he had done, or, in case of refusal, should be committed to the Tower. However, the judgment was easier delivered than carried out; and those who did not know it before, soon found that Henrietta Maria had come to have the upper hand over her consort. She strenuously insisted that Henry Jermyn should neither marry the fair and unhappy Villiers nor go to the Tower; and being possessed of far more determination than her royal lord, she in the end carried her point. During the continuance of this intrigue, and struggle for dominion between Charles and his spouse, the whole crowd of courtiers split into two parties, called respectively "the king's side" and "the queen's side," all men of prudence, foresight, and due regard of their own interests, such as the marquis of Hamilton, ranging themselves naturally under the latter division. It was not long before the open secret became generally known that England had passed from the sceptre of Charles under that of Henrietta Maria.

One of the first uses which the queen made of her newly-acquired power was to recall her old household, turned away so summarily by Buckingham, and to increase it by a whole colony of Capuchin friars, recommended to her by her mother as particularly zealous and active in the search after proselytes. The friars had not been many months in England, when they found that the private chapel assigned to the Roman Catholics of the household was not by far large enough, whereupon the queen extorted the consent of her husband to build a new and spacious church for them within the quadrangle of Somerset House. To add to the boldness of the step, made to exasperate to the utmost not only the Puritans, but the whole mass of earnest Protestants, Henrietta Maria took a pride in showing at a public ceremony the part she had taken, and forced her husband to take, in accommodating the heretic-seeking Capuchin friars. "Her majesty with her own hands," recorded an eyewitness of the scene, "helped to lay the two first corner stones of the church, with a silver plate of equal divisions between them, which stones, in the presence of two thousand people at least, the priests consecrated with great ceremony, having caused to be engraven upon the upper part of that plate the pictures of their majesties as founders, and on the lower side those of the Capuchins as consecrators." The ceremony in itself was enough to irritate and enrage the people, and the indignation kept on increasing at the sight of not only daily processions of priests and friars, but of the gradual spread of Roman Catholic ceremonies in the London churches, and all places of worship under the control of Laud and his adherents. Not long after the laying of the foundation stone of the Somerset House establishment, Laud re-consecrated St. Catherine's Creed church in the city, which had undergone some repairs, by a ceremonial with which the Capuchins themselves declared themselves highly pleased. At the bishop's approach to the western entrance of the church, some of his attendants cried out in a loud voice, "Open, open, ye everlasting doors, that the king of glory may enter." Thereupon the doors flew open, the procession entered, and Laud, falling down upon his knees, raising his eyes, and extending his arms, exclaimed, "This place is holy; the ground is holy: in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, I pronounce it holy." Advancing next towards the chancel, the bishop took up dust several times and threw it into the air, and when near the communion-table, now styled the altar, he took a written book, from which he pronounced curses upon all who should henceforth profane the holy place, bowing to the east at the end of every curse, and calling out, "Let all the people say Amen." The curses were followed by prayers, and those by a sermon, after which Laud administered the sacrament in a manner entirely novel to most of the spectators. Approaching the table, he made several low bows, and slowly going to the side where the bread and wine were standing, hidden under a thick cover, bowed seven times more. He then, after reading many prayers, went to the bread, and gently lifted up the napkin under which it was laid; but on a glance at it suddenly dropped the napkin, flew back several steps, bowed thrice towards it, and again drawing near, repeated his bows. He next laid his hand upon the cup containing the wine, but instantly withdrawing it, retired, went bowing repeatedly, retired once more and advanced again, and finally seized the chalice. The ceremony ended by the bishop taking the sacrament himself, and dispensing it to a few of his chief attendants, but allowing none of the inferior clergy, or of the congregation, to be partakers. Laud's doings were repeated from mouth to mouth, creating undisguised horror among the Puritans. It was known that the king intended to make him primate of all England, as soon as he could get rid of Archbishop Abbot, already under the royal disgrace, and it was whispered, moreover, that he had received the offer of a cardinal's hat from Rome. With such reports, the apprehension of England falling again under the dominion of the pope ceased to be a mere alarming rumour, but got the belief of the nation.

It detracted nothing from the abhorrence which the Puritanical part of the population began to feel towards the queen, as the author of the whole Rome-ward movement manifested in the government, that while encouraging the spread of these ceremonies of the ancient church upon which the Protestants looked as blank idolatry, to the utmost of her power, she was indulging at the same time in personal amusements considered absolutely vicious and immoral. At the beginning of November, 1631, the queen gave birth to another child, a daughter, baptised with immense pomp by Laud, the name of Mary being given to her; and as soon as she had recovered from her confinement, a series of theatrical representations took place at court, in which her majesty came forward as an actress. As yet, no lady had ever dared to appear on the stage in England, for although the consort of James and her attendants had performed in court masques, their acting was mute, and little more on the whole than a display of fancy dresses with dancing. Great, therefore, was the horror of the people on learning that the queen was publicly performing, before the courtiers and other persons invited, at a theatre erected in Whitehall, not only dancing and in female costume, but reciting speeches and singing songs. The first play in which she took a principal part was called "the Queen's Pastoral," and written by Walter Montague, second son of the earl of Manchester, a handsome youth, highly in the good graces of her majesty, so much so as to attract the enmity of Henry Jermy, whose own independent code of morals did not free him from the pains of jealousy. The news of the Whitehall performances, with the rumour of many matters connected with them, incensed the Puritans and all earnest Protestants as much as the protection of Capuchin friars, and mummeries introduced into the service of the church of England, and the public indignation found vent in a number of pamphlets and books, reflecting, with more or less violence, upon the immorality of stage plays and players. Very shortly after the acting of "the Queen's Pastoral," Laud showed to her majesty a book fresh from the press, called "Histrio-Mastix, the Player's Scourge," written, as stated on the title-page, by "William Prynne, an Utter-barrister of Lincoln's Inn," in which theatrical performances were described as "the very pomps of the devil which we renounce in baptism," the proof being in "the concurring authorities of sundry texts of Scripture, of the whole primitive Church, of fifty-five synods and councils, of seventy Fathers and Christian writers, and of above one hundred and fifty foreign and domestic Protestant and Popish authors." The bishop, with great zest, pointed out to Henrietta Maria a particular passage characterising "women actors" as "notorious w—," which put her into furious anger, and in her rage she ran at once to the king, calling upon him to vindicate her honour by the exemplary punishment of the libeller. The epithet which exasperated her majesty, she deeming it personal, was not meant as such, the "Histrio-Mastix" having been published several weeks previous to her appearance on the stage; however, Laud, although thoroughly well informed in the matter, took care to encourage the mistake by hints and insinuations, his object being to punish the author for attacks upon himself. More than a year before, the "Utter-barrister of Lincoln's Inn" had brought out a book reflecting severely upon the doings of the Romish party in the church of England, which the bishop of London had been unable to prosecute, owing to the friends of the author obtaining for him protection against the proceedings of the High Commission Court. Laud now deemed it time to take his revenge, and having inflamed the queen, a royal mandate was issued for committing Prynne to close custody in the Tower, preparatory to being put on his trial before the Star Chamber. The bishop little knew, when obtaining the signature of Charles to the order, to what a storm, centering on his own head, it would lead in the end.

In selecting William Prynne for persecution, as one among a hundred writers who were attacking his innovations in the church, Laud intended to strike terror in the ranks of the Puritans, but the extreme severity with which he went to work defeated its own object, and served only to increase the bitterness of the strife. After being shut up for many months in a damp and horrible dungeon, the author of the "Histrio-Mastix" was put on his trial, charged with the same crime which had brought Sir John Eliot and his colleagues to the Tower, that of having incited the people to sedition. The accusation was perfectly absurd in this case, Prynne's book, a huge quarto of more than a thousand closely-printed pages, which he had taken seven years to compose, being nothing more than an exposition of Puritan views concerning worldly amusements, such as dancing, drinking, acting, and similar diversions; and though the expressions employed in condemning these evils were very strong, they were not more so than those in current use at the time. The greatest severity of the author was directed against stage plays, though he naively admitted that he had only been once to a theatre, inveigled by false friends, and on this occasion had sat during the whole of the performance with his hat over his eyes, inwardly shocked at the "exorbitant corruptions" that were taking place in his own immediate neighbourhood. His chief argument against the stage, besides its immorality, was that many of the classical dramas that were performed would lead to a revival of idolatry; and he dwelt strongly upon the fact, almost incredible, but asserted to be true, that "above forty thousand plays" had been written within a few years, and many of them "printed on better paper than the Bible itself." He mentioned further, as a most shameful thing, that "they have now their female players in Italy and most foreign parts, and they had such French women-actors in a play not long since personated in Blackfriars' play-house, to which there was great resort." Together with stage plays, he strongly condemned love-locks, hair-powder, the effeminate fashions of the men, and the cropped hair of "our men-women monsters," while dancing he characterized as a thing "to God's and Christ's dishonour, religion's scandal, chastity's shipwreck, sin's advantage, and the eternal ruin of many precious souls." "Dancing," he added, "yea, even in queens themselves, and the very greatest persons, who are most commonly devoted to it, hath been always scandalous and of ill repute among the saints of God." Laughing itself Prynne condemned as "eachinnations unbecoming a Christian," and to the ordinary plea for so-called innocent amusements, he replied that if necessary in the country, there was no need for them at least in London, where men could go and hear excellent sermons almost every day in the week. Perhaps there were a great many Englishmen, sincere Protestants otherwise, not agreeing entirely with the author of the "Histrio-Mastix;" but few, on the other hand, though opposed to his views, could deny that his aims were sincere and well meant, tending solely to benefit his fellow-men. On putting William Prynne on his trial, therefore, Laud threw out a fierce challenge to Puritanism, and, changing his former defensive, but an offensive mode of warfare, commenced a struggle the result of which neither he nor any of his adherents were able to foresee.

The trial of Prynne before the law lords of the Star Chamber occupied three days, and created the most extraordinary excitement among the people, both on account of the subject in question, and the violent speeches of the prosecuting party, resembling more the language of Spanish inquisitors than of English judges. Prynne's defence to the charge of stirring up sedition was as calm as sensible; he made a solemn affirmation of his entire attachment to the king's person and government, declaring "that he had taken his oath of allegiance and supremacy in the university of Oxford and inns of court, where he had taken his degrees, and that it never entered into his thoughts to approve of schism and sedition; but that if anything in his book had, contrary to his own meaning, a misconstruction towards his majesty's government, he was ready to prostrate himself at his majesty's feet and crave pardon and grace." This was not what Laud and his Star Chamber confederates wanted; and drowning the modest defence of the Puritan writer under a torrent of abuse, continued for several days, they finished by passing upon him a sentence of all but unheard-of cruelty. "We are troubled here," exclaimed Lord Chief Justice Richardson, a tool of the bishop of London, "with a monster, nay monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens. I do not think this Prynne is the whole writer in the book, but that there are many heads and hands in it besides himself. I would to God in heaven that the devil and all else that had their heads and hands therein were here; for I think they are ill-wishers to the state, and deserve severe punishment. For the book, I do hold it a most scandalous, infamous libel to the king's majesty, a most pious and religious king, and to the queen's majesty, a most excellent and gracious queen, such a one as this kingdom never enjoyed the like, and I think the earth never had a better." Next, the earl of Dorset, courtier ranged on "the queen's side," broke in with a long and extravagant tirade, exhorting his colleagues in the Star Chamber to punish the author of the "Histrio Mastix" with the utmost severity. "It is not," cried the earl, "the attorney-general that calls for judgment, but it is all mankind; they are the parties aggrieved, and they call for judgment. This Prynne, I do declare you to be a schism-maker in the church, a sedition-sower in the commonwealth, a wolf in sheep's clothing, in a word, omnium malorum nequissimus. I should fine him ten thousand pounds, which is more than he is worth, yet less than he deserveth; I would not set him at liberty, no more than a plagued man or a mad dog, who, though he cannot bite, he will foam. He is so far from being a social being that he is not a rational soul. He is fit only to live in dens, with such beasts of prey as wolves and tigers like himself. Therefore I would condemn him to perpetual imprisonment, as those monsters that are no longer fit to live amongst men, nor to see the light. Now, for corporal punishment, my lords, I do not know whether I should burn him in the forehead or slit him in the nose. He that was guilty of murder was marked in a place where he might be seen, as Cain was. I should be loth he should escape with his ears for that he might get a periwig which he now so much inveighs against, and so hide them, or force his conscience to make use of his unlovely love-locks on both sides. Therefore I would have him branded on the forehead, slit in the nose, and his ears cropt, too." The recommendation of Dorset was to a great extent noted upon, as expressing the wishes of the queen respecting the treatment her defamer should receive. Prynne was condemned to stand twice in the pillory, once in Westminster, and once in Cheapside, to lose an ear at each place, to pay a fine of five thousand pounds, which far exceeded his means, to be degraded from the bar and at the university, and, lastly, to be imprisoned for life. The "Histrio-Mastix," termed "ordure," or filth, by the judges, as a special insult directed to the Puritans, was ordered to be burnt by the common hangman, in imitation of a practice of the Spanish inquisition, unknown as yet in England. To introduce step by step that remarkable institution, one of the most powerful aids of an ecclesiastical or divine-right government ever invented, seemed among the great schemes of the bishop of London.

Prynne bore the cruel punishment to which he was condemned with great fortitude, although it was executed with frightful barbarity. The hangman, by special order, it was believed, of Laud's agents, instead of cutting, began to saw off the first ear he was to lose at Westminster, taking part of the cheek with it; covered with blood the unhappy author was then led to Cheapside, where the other ear was sawed off, and while standing in the pillory, in the torture of his sufferings, a heap of his books were brought and burnt before him, very nearly inflicting death by suffocation. He had nevertheless courage enough to address the bystanders, mostly Puritans, deeply sympathising with the martyr of their faith, in strong language, reflecting upon the injustice of his sentence, and condemning the "popish innovations" which were bringing misery upon the land. For this speech, Laud took steps to punish his antagonist by carrying a new accusation against him before the Star Chamber judges; but though he was not glutted with vengeance, they were, and they told him that the ravings of men in agony were beneath his notice. Finding he was not supported sufficiently in the course he was treading, the bishop sent a long letter of complaint to Wentworth, who was more and more rising in influence with the king, complaining of the tolerance shown to "those wretches," the Puritans, and particularly the writers among them. "A little more quickness in the government," the bishop opined, "would cure this itch of libelling, and something more that is amiss besides," alluding to Protestant heresy in general. To make up for the want of "quickness in the government," Laud dragged a number of Puritans who had been speaking and writing against him before the Star Chamber, while at the same time he continued persecuting Prynne and his friends with undisguised malignity. Having plundered the unfortunate author of the "Histrio-Mastix" of all his property, and reduced him to a prison allowance bordering upon starvation he forced him to accept the charity of his friends, yet made it dangerous for them to give it. Several citizens of Chester, who had visited Prynne while on his way to Carnarvon Castle, where he was to be imprisoned for life, were prosecuted by the High Commission Court, their houses were broken into and ransacked by pursuivants, and they were condemned to large fines, and forced to make a public acknowledgment of their offences. A poor limner of Chester was likewise prosecuted before the High Commission Court for making a drawing of Prynne, by desire of one of his friends, and being found guilty of the crime, was ordered to be imprisoned, and to have all his pictures burnt by the hangman. Even Prynne's servant was indicted before the ecclesiastical court for having spoken words in praise of the goodness of his master, and expressed his belief that he had been harshly treated, for which misdemeanour the judges condemned him to pay a fine of a thousand pounds, and to be imprisoned till it was paid, which, as he did not possess a thousand pence, was equivalent to a sentence of imprisonment for life. It was impossible for Laud to do more to make Prynne a martyr of Protestantism, and to raise the whole nation against himself for leading the way to another Marian persecution.

Having obtained, as he deemed, a decisive victory over the Puritans of England, Laud persuaded the king to set out on a progress to Scotland, to introduce into his northern realm, as well as in the south, the peculiar form of ecclesiastical government of which he was the founder and champion. The ostensible object of Charles's journey was said to be his wish to be crowned at Edinburgh; but this was known to be a mere pretext, as he had often declared his conviction of the coronation ceremony in the north being not only unnecessary, but against the principle of the complete union of the two kingdoms, which he desired to uphold, and which he had loudly proclaimed at his accession in adopting the novel title of king of Great Britain. However, Charles, bending like a reed before those who understood how to guide him by flattery, and obstinate only against the upright demands of honest men, allowed himself to be easily talked over by his favourite bishop; and seemingly forgetful that he had been sitting eight years on the throne, he suddenly announced that it was of absolute necessity that he should go through the ceremony of being crowned king of Scotland. All through the spring of 1633, the most extensive preparations were made for the journey, and in order to swell his train and augment the effect of that exhibition of power by which he meant to overawe the people in the north, Charles issued his commands to the chief members of the nobility to attend him in his progress, at their own expense, and with a due retinue of servants. It had been intended in the first instance by Laud and the king to take the queen, with her whole train of priests, Jesuits, and Capuchin friars, to the north, but the plan was frustrated by the delicate health of Henrietta Maria, who was again in expectation of being confined, and the royal procession finally started without her, towards the end of May. An immense display of pomp, and great demonstrations of at least outward loyalty, attended the king on the journey from London to Edinburgh, which occupied twenty-four days, and was in many respects similar to that of his predecessor, sixteen years before, the chief difference being that of Laud taking the place of Buckingham in the organization and direction of all affairs. After banqueting a great deal along the road, the earl of Newcastle, among others, providing a dinner, which, as certified by Margaret, his wife, "cost my lord between four and five thousand pounds," and by other testimony, "was such an excess of feasting as had never been before known in England," Charles reached Edinburgh in the middle of June. The king's entry and investment with the crown were managed on a scale of unlimited splendour, to the loudly expressed disgust of the citizens of the capital, who had to pay the expenses of both shows, to which they were the less reconciled as the last of them was an exhibition undisguisedly popish in their eyes. In the coronation ceremony, which took place at Holyrood church, Laud was the principal figure next to the king, the archbishop of St. Andrew's acting under his orders, and giving great offence to the people by the introduction of an altar, and of rites bordering very close on those of the mass. "There was," as described by John Spalding, "a four-nooked taffil, in manner of an altar, standing within the kirk, having standing thereupon two books, at least resembling clasped books, called 'blind books,' with two chandlers, and two wax candles, which were on light, and a basin, wherein there was nothing. At the back of the altar, covered with tapistry, there was a rich tapistry, wherein the crucifix was curiously wrought, and as the bishops who were in service, passed by this crucifix, they were seen to bow their knee and beck, with which their habit was noted: all which bred great fear of inbringing of popery." To add to the indignation of the spectators, the archbishop of Glasgow, an old man, was violently removed from the side of the king by Laud, because not dressed in the embroidered robes which had been prepared for his use, but which he scrupled to wear. "Are you a churchman, and want the coat of your order?" Laud fiercely exclaimed, and pulling the archbishop away, ordered the bishop of Ross to take his place. It was not a spectacle to edify the vicious Presbyterians that were looking on at the ceremony in Holyrood church.

Immediately after the coronation, a parliament assembled at Edinburgh, which was opened by Charles in person. Great efforts having been made to secure the return of members subservient to the crown, the king had the satisfaction to see his first proposals carried out immediately and without the slightest opposition. The session began with the vote of a supply to an unprecedented amount, a land-tax of four hundred thousand pounds Scotch, and the sixteenth penny being granted to the king for six years, besides which the ordinary rate of interest was reduced from ten to eight per cent., and the difference of two per cent., taken from the creditor, was vested in the king for three years. Finding his northern subjects thus far obedient, to an unexpected degree, Charles, energetically prompted by Laud, went a step further by introducing bills providing for an alteration in the public worship. An act in three articles was brought forward by the king, the first confirming a power which former sovereigns of Scotland had arrogated to themselves of altering the habits of the clergy, the second ratifying all former statutes respecting the extent of the crown's prerogative concerning religion, and the third making preparations for recovering the patrimony of the church out of lay hands. To secure the passing of his propositions, of such import that it could scarcely be expected that any other but an assembly of the most courtiers would give their consent to them, Charles personally attended every day in the house of parliament, acting sometimes the part of a president, and sometimes that of a clerk. The members nevertheless were startled at the act laid before them, and several of them had the courage of at once declaring that it was absolutely impossible that the changes proposed should become the law of the realm. "I have sworn with your father," Lord Melville, a nobleman far advanced in life, and known for his attachment to the royal family, exclaimed, addressing the king; "I have sworn with your father, and the whole kingdom, to the Confession of Faith, in which the innovations intended by these articles were abjured, and I cannot now break my oath." Much disconcerted by the remark, and other signs of opposition, Charles furtively quitted the room, but soon returned, and assuming a jaunty air, commanded the members not to deliberate but to vote. Then, sitting down next to the clerk of the house, he took a pencil and a sheet of paper to write down the names as they were called upon to vote, crying out at the same time. "I shall know to-day who will do me service." Contemptible as was the process of intimidation on the part of a king, it yet failed to give the desired majority to the bill; however, Charles obtained his end by forcing the clerk-registrar to make a false return of the votes, so as to make it appear that the act had passed. On the declaration being made, several lords, in surprise and indignation, started up on their seats, one of them, the earl of Rothes, challenging the clerk to prove his return, and openly charging him with fraud. But Charles instantly interfered, commanding him to be silent, and quiet having been restored, the legislative farce came to an end. The dissolution of parliament followed soon, and after erecting Edinburgh into a bishopric, and appointing Laud a privy councillor of Scotland, the king hurried back across the Tweed, warned, by numerous tokens of disaffection on the part of the people, against prolonging his stay. His money having been all spent in shows and processions, Charles returned to London in somewhat unroyal style, "making a posting journey to the queen at Greenwich," where he arrived on the 20th of July, having crossed the Thames at Blackwall without passing through the metropolis. Less than three months after, on the 13th of October, 1633, Henrietta Maria presented her husband with another son, who was baptised James, in memory of his grandfather.

The baptism of the royal infant was performed at St. James's Palace by Laud, now archbishop of Canterbury, the high dignity, for which he had long been waiting, having become vacant on the 4th of August by the decease of Abbot. He was invested with the primacy the very same day on which Abbot died; and the same day, too, by his own admission, the extraordinary offer of a cardinal's hat was made to him. To any man of common or average honesty, the invitation to change his religion like an old coat, which was necessarily involved in the offer, would have appeared a terrible insult; but Laud by no means took it as such, but, on the contrary, seemed pleased with the invitation to become an apostate. Not declining the offer of a cardinalship all at once, it was repeated to him some days afterwards, when he went to the king to ask for advice in the delicate matter. He himself, he confessed, felt some reluctance to accept, and equal reluctance to refuse; "somewhat dwelt within me," the primate of all England expressed it, "which would not suffer that, till Rome were other than it is." The meaning of it seemed to be that Rome was not near enough to England yet, or rather England not near enough to Rome, and the red hat therefore appeared of premature birth. The king fully agreed with the conscientious scruples of his friend and advisor, and counselled him to leave the hat alone for the present. "His majesty," Laud noted down in his diary, "very prudently and religiously, yet in a calm way, the person offering it having relation to some ambassador, freed me from that trouble." It was trouble, indeed, and more than trouble, that would have been in store for the primate had he listened to the voice of the tempter, and made endeavours to fasten the cardinal's hat to the top of the archiepiscopal mitre. His notion, and that of the pope and great Catholic powers, evidently was that England, as of yore, would bend under the behests of a prince, adapting itself to a change of religion as of ordinary policy; but he and they forgot, or did not know, that the century that had gone by since the first Protestant archbishop of Canterbury received the pallium from Rome had raised a new England on the ruins of the old; and they did not know, moreover, or would not know, that the eighth Henry himself, unscrupulous despot though he was, could not have established a new faith if the new faith had not been deep already in the hearts of the people. It was sheer madness to think for a moment that a king as weak and vacillating as Charles could break the iron phalanx of English Puritanism, with no better and truer man for general than a prelate whose power was based upon sycophancy, and whose religion centered in the worship of clothes. While Laud was scheming the alliance of Canterbury and Rome, persuaded that he had laid Puritanism in the dust, because having successfully cut off the ears of an unfortunate writer, and sent a number of others to the Tower, the immense mass of the population saw nothing but ridicule in his frantic efforts to become a prince of the church. "See the prelate of Canterbury," said one of the tracts of the day, published not long after Laud's instalment in the primacy—"see the prelate of Canterbury, in his ordinary garb, riding from Croydon to Bagshot, with forty or fifty gentlemen, all mounted, attending upon him; two or three coaches, with four or six horses apiece in them, all empty, waiting on him; two or three dainty steeds of pleasure, most rich in trappings and furniture, led by him; and wherever he comes his gentlemen ushers and his servants crying out, 'Room, room for my lord's grace: gentlemen, be uncovered, my lord's grace is coming.' Again, if you should meet him coming daily from the Star Chamber, and see what pomp, grandeur, and magnificence he goeth in, the whole multitude standing bare whenever he passeth, having also a great number of gentlemen and other servants waiting upon him, all uncovered, some of them carrying up his tail, others going before him, calling out to the folks to take off their hats and give place; tumbling down and thrusting aside the little children a-playing there, flinging and tossing about the poor costermongers and sauce-wives' fruits and puddings, baskets and all—you would think, seeing and hearing all this, and also the speed and haste they make, that it were some mighty proud Nimrod, or some furious Jehu, running and marching for a kingdom, rather than a meek, humble, and grave priest." Keeping his eyes fairly open, the son of the Reading clothier could scarcely fail to see, in sober moments, that though he might proceed a certain distance towards Rome, he could not go all the way, without formidable tumblings and tossings of disrespectful crowds. London costermongers seemed natural enemies of London cardinals.

The temporary refusal of the cardinal's hat by Laud did not interrupt, but rather improved the good relations that had come to exist between the English government and the court of Rome. For some time past diplomatic agents of the pontiff had been living in London, and on the other hand envoys of Charles had taken up their residence near the Vatican; but these arrangements, more or less clandestine in their nature, were made more complete soon after Laud's instalment in the primacy. The pope's representative, a shrewd ecclesiastic named Panzani, having died, a priest of Scottish birth, John Con, was nominated his successor, under the appellation of "envoy to her majesty the queen;" in return for which courtesy Charles hesitated not to appoint a brother of the marquis of Hamilton as special ambassador at Rome, investing him with the corresponding title of "envoy from her majesty the queen." The immediate result of these appointments was a vast increase of intercourse between the courts of England and of Rome, as well as the growth of a very notable scheme, originally propounded at Madrid by the great minister of Philip IV., and which had been nursed and was warmly advocated by the pontiff. It was nothing less than a proposal for the invasion of the Netherlands by the combined arms of Spain and England, the spoil of the latter, in case of success, to be the isles of Zealand, with parts of South Holland, and the rest to fall again under the sceptre of the original rulers of the country. Besides and above his share in the conquest, Charles was offered, as first prize of the undertaking, the restoration of the palatinate to his brother-in-law, and the solemn guarantee of Philip IV. to uphold the latter in his possessions against all his enemies, including the princes of the Catholic League. The plan, wild as it seemed, as well as entirely opposed to English policy, took firm root in the heads of the king and Laud, both anxious for an intimate alliance with the great Catholic power, and both full of antipathy to the religious and political constitution of the growing commonwealth of the Netherlands, the overthrow of which they desired as much as Philip IV. himself. Approved of in principle, the negotiations for the English-Spanish alliance advanced rapidly; and at the end of a few months, a treaty was drawn up and signed by Lord Cottington, special envoy of Charles at the court of Madrid, on one part, and Count Olivarez on the other, stipulating that in consideration of the interference of his majesty, King Philip IV., for the restoration of the prince palatine, a certain number of English ships should co-operate with a Spanish fleet in the invasion of the Netherlands. The agreement was not immediately ratified, for before doing so there was a task of some importance to be accomplished by the government of Charles. Lord Cottington had promised ships to Spain when his royal master had no ships, the whole navy, like much else in England, being rotten and unfit for service. A new fleet, therefore, had to be built before the invasion of Holland, or of any other country, could be dreamt of, and to build it was not very easy with an empty exchequer and no hope of parliamentary grants. Amidst these difficulties, not a little perplexing to the advisers of Charles, one of the dependants of Laud, William Noy, a clever lawyer, filling the post of attorney-general, came forward with a new contrivance for raising money which appeared nothing less than a stroke of genius. Noy had been employed for some years in suggesting plans for extorting illegal contributions from the people, under some pretence or other; and to assist the fertility of his own imagination, the state paper records in the Tower had been opened to him, to discover in the financial doings of the past material for the future. In hunting, or "moyling," as he called it, among the musty old parchments, mute witnesses of bygone tyranny, a ray of light had broken in upon him in the discovery that there was one tax left for the use of his employers by which vast sums might be drawn from the pockets of the people. From the earliest times, the seaports and maritime counties of England had been compelled to furnish ships for the public service; and it struck the attorney-general that this obligation, though only in force during periods of actual warfare, might be converted into a regular impost by the king requiring the whole of his subjects, whether living inland or near the shore, to give him ships, or, better still, to give him the equivalent for ships in ready cash. The suggestion was too brilliant not to be immediately approved of by the king, and William Noy himself was ordered to draw out the royal warrant imposing the new tax. A week after handing in his paper, on the 6th of August, 1634, the "moyling" attorney-general suddenly died, his busy career upon earth coming to a fit close by the establishment of "ship money."

The first gathering of the novel impost was as successful as expected by the promoters of the scheme. Under the pretext that it had become necessary to fit out ships for protecting, more effectually than had been hitherto done, the commerce of England in distant countries, as well as the fisheries in the Channel and the North Sea, annually invaded by Dutch and French mariners, Charles issued, early in October, 1634, writs addressed to the corporation of London and the principal seaports, ordering them to supply the crown with a certain number of vessels, or, if unable to do so, to pay down fixed sums in satisfaction of the demand. The money equivalent having been settled below the value of the ships, it was preferred by all the parties assessed, bringing a rich stream of gold into the empty royal treasury. All the seaports paid their contributions readily, except London, the corporation of which made opposition to the tax, not on account of its illegality, but as excepted by virtue of sundry old charters, privileges, and acts of parliament. In consequence of this plea of exception, some of the leading citizens refused to pay "ship money;" but a few of them being thrown into prison and condemned to large fines, the rest gave in, and the full tax of thirty-five thousand pounds was discharged by London. The success of the experiment thus far induced the king to follow out the scheme traced by Noy, and to extend the levying of the new impost from the seaport towns to the population of the whole kingdom. Early in 1634, writs, under the seal of the privy council, were issued to the sheriffs, informing each that his county was assessed at a certain number of ships for the fleet for the ensuing year, and that the charge was estimated at a certain sum, which he was ordered to levy in the same way as parliamentary subsidies. The demand fell startling upon the people of the inland counties; and the sheriffs themselves being unable to explain by what law or precedent they could be called upon to furnish ships, or means to build ships, there arose strong opposition on all sides, which was quenched only by a notice from the privy council that a case should be laid before the judges, who should decide whether the tax was legal, or the contrary. As a preliminary to the new movement, the king arbitrarily discharged the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, Sir William Heath, an upright lawyer, from his post, and appointed in his stead Sir John Finch, former Speaker of the House of Commons, a person possessed of few legal acquirements, but with the largest amount of obsequiousness. As soon as the change had been accomplished, the case of the crown was stated in a royal letter addressed to Sir John Finch and his brother judges, and their opinions demanded on the legality of the new tax. The reply obtained, as stated in the memoirs of Judge Whitelocke, "after much solicitation by Lord Chief Justice Finch, promising preferment to some, and highly threatening to others whom he found doubting," was so satisfactory to the king that he ordered it to be enrolled in all the courts of law and to be publicly read at the assizes. It was to the effect that when "the good of the kingdom in general" was concerned, or when there was danger of war, his majesty might require his subjects, by letters under the great seal, to provide such ships, so armed and provisioned, and for such time, as he should deem fit, and that his majesty might enforce the aid to be rendered, of the extent of which and time of duration he was the sole judge. The decision was looked upon as a mighty triumph of the royal prerogative, and put Laud and his adherents into ecstacy. In a letter to the primate, Sir Thomas Wentworth, his intimate friend, gave vent to his satisfaction by declaring the "opinion" of Lord Chief Justice Finch and his eleven brethren "the greatest service the legal profession hath done the crown in this time." "But," added the apostate of the popular cause, now fast advancing, by the grace of Laud, to the office of prime minister, "unless his majesty hath the like power declared to raise a land army upon the same exigent of state, the crown seems to me to stand but upon one leg at home." Here was the outspoken thought of the party into whose hands the government of England had fallen. A king all powerful in theory, and placing his will above law and parliament, and a priesthood, centralised under a strict hierarchy, preaching up the doctrine of divine right, wanted, even Archbishop Laud felt, yet something more of physical strength, to be found only in a good fleet and a well-disciplined body of soldiers, to sit safe. King Charles needed a tripod, and only when upheld by the three stout legs of clergy, army, and navy, could he hope to struggle successfully with his opponents, and to defy both parliament and the nation.

After the opinion of the judges had been given in favour of the crown, the resistance to the "ship-money" tax ceased for a short while, and the large sum of two hundred and twenty thousand pounds had already been collected through the kingdom, when all at once several cases of fresh resistance caused alarm to the government. The first came from a citizen of London, Richard Chambers, who brought an action against the lord mayor for imprisoning him on account of his refusal to pay the assessment of a former writ. The magistrate in his defence pleaded the writ as a special justification, which was admitted by the judges of the King's Bench, and the action was dismissed, the counsel for the prosecution being specially forbidden to argue against the lawfulness of the new impost. The decision produced much exultation at court; but before it had subsided, another far more threatening case of resistance manifested itself in a district long known for its attachment to the principles of constitutional government, the county of Buckingham. One of the sheriffs of the county had called upon the owner of a plot of land situated in the parish of Stoke-Mandeville to pay his share of "ship money," amounting to twenty shillings, and upon protest being made against the legality of the assessment, the case, by special desire of the appellant, was brought before the court of Exchequer. Small as was the sum in dispute, it was not long before the question of its payment, or non-payment, came to excite the deepest interest in the whole nation, both on account of the subject-matter involved and of the man who brought it under discussion, with the openly declared object to stand forward as champion of the liberties of the people of England against an arbitrary government. The champion, owner of the plot of land in Stoke-Mandeville, and of many broad acres besides, was John Hampden, a native of London, born in 1594, the descendant of an ancient Saxon family, settled in Buckinghamshire since the reign of Edward the Confessor, and which also possessed large estates in Essex, Berks, and Oxfordshire. Though having sat as member for Grampound and for Wendover in the two last parliaments, and taken an active part in the proceedings of the majority, John Hampden had hitherto been considered a man of extraordinary quietness, and about the last person in the kingdom likely to oppose the payment of a tax ordered by the king, and declared legal by the lord chief justice and principal judges of the realm. However, under the appearance of great meekness and diffidence, Hampden veiled a correct judgment and an indomitable spirit, which had brought him into prison some years before, in 1626, when he had declined to contribute to one of the forced loans of the king, justifying his refusal by the interdict passed in parliament against such loans. He now once more ventured to vindicate right against might, deeming it high time to show that justice had not yet become quite extinct in the realm, or, if extinct, to let the fact become openly known, both as a warning and a stimulant. His conduct of the great affair was marked by the deliberate spirit of a perseverance that nothing could shake; assailed by threats on all sides, he yet never for a moment swerved from his enterprise, on which he was determined to stake his whole fortune, and, if necessary, his life. More than six months were spent by him in consultation with the lawyers he had engaged to conduct his case, the chief of whom, Oliver St. John, was his kinsman and intimate friend, it being carefully settled among them that the action should be carried on with the greatest prudence, that the king and his prerogative should be referred to only with deep respect, and that, under avoidance of all declamation and abstinence from all hazardous principles, the arguments should rest solely on the laws, constitution, and history of the realm. Thus prepared, the trial commenced on the 6th of November, 1637, before the judges of the Exchequer Chamber, all England looking on in eager expectation.

The trial lasted thirteen days, amidst ever increasing excitement, which gradually communicated itself to the very poorest among the people, who had never before taken an interest in law or politics. The simple question put forward by Hampden, who stood in the position of defendant, was whether the king had a right, on his own allegation of public danger, to require an inland county, namely Buckinghamshire, to furnish ships, or a prescribed sum of money by way of commutation, for the defence of the kingdom?

Oliver St. John elucidated the question in a speech which lasted three entire days, and the arguments of which, embracing the whole constitutional history of England, were resumed in four main points. They were that, first, the fundamental laws of the kingdom had provided for the public safety and protection by the military tenures, the tenures of the cinque ports and other maritime towns, the crown revenues, and the parliamentary supplies. Secondly, that the kings of England possessed no general right of taxation, as was proved by the exaction of loans, or benevolences, for a sovereign who had the right to demand money would never condescend to borrow it, or ask for it as alms; and that, moreover, numerous charters and statutes, from William the Conqueror downwards, had expressly declared that no taxes should be levied without the consent of the people, represented in parliament. Then, thirdly, that numerous precedents, one of which exactly met the present case, showed that if the realm was in danger, as alleged by the king, the two houses of parliament ought to be summoned, without loss of time. In the second year of Richard II., when the kingdom was in imminent danger of invasion, an assembly of peers was convoked, and upon demand lent their money for the public service, but they declared at the same time that they could vote no supply without the sanction of the commons, and advised the speedy summoning of parliament. On the other hand, in the case before the court, no plea of imminent danger and urgent necessity could be brought forward by the crown, because the writs for "ship money" were issued avowedly six months before the ships were said to be required, giving an interval quite sufficient for the assembling and consulting of parliament. And, fourthly and lastly, that, setting aside all previous statutes and precedents, the exaction of "ship money" was a plain violation of the Petition of Right. In answer to these arguments, the crown lawyers appealed to the series of records which the diligence of Noy had collected among the state papers in the Tower. On close examination, however, it turned out that most of them were mere commissions of array, issued in very early times, when as remarked by one of the counsel of Hampden, "the government was more of force than law," and when "all things concerning the king's prerogative and the subjects' liberties were upon uncertainties." The crown lawyers thereupon, assisted in their pleadings by nearly all the judges, who openly took a part against the defendant, fell back upon their main argument, in the assertion that the king possessed inherent and transcendent prerogatives, one of which, they said, was the power of arbitrary taxation. The declaration was echoed all along the judicial bench. It was an error, Judge Berkeley affirmed, to hold that by the fundamental laws of the realm the king could be restrained from taking money without the consent of parliament. "The law," he exclaimed, "knows no such king-yoking policy: the law is itself an old and trusty servant of the king; it is his instrument, or means, which he useth in governing his people. I never heard, or read, that lex was rex; but it is known, and most true, that rex is lex." Chief Justice Finch, more fierce than any of his brother judges in the assertion of unlimited royal prerogative, laid down the new doctrine that no act of parliament could bar a king of his regality; "wherefore," he cried, "acts of parliament which take away his royal power in the defence of his kingdom are void. They also are void acts of parliament which bind the king not to command the subjects, their persons, and goods, and I say their money too." Nothing more showed the boldness of Hampden and his friends than to attempt to assert the majesty of law before such a lord chief justice.

After the part which a majority of the judges had taken in the proceedings of the great trial, there could be no doubt on which side they would give their verdict. They might have delivered it the last day of the sittings, or, with equal justice, even before the trial; but to save appearances, and impart into the judicial farce they were playing the aspect of solemnity, Sir John Finch and his brethren waited half a year, not pronouncing their decision till the 12th of June, 1638. Seven of the twelve judges pronounced absolutely and unreservedly for the crown; three more decided against it on technical grounds, but gave an opinion in its favour on the general question; and only two, Sir John Denham and Sir George Croke, had the courage and the honesty to deliver a verdict for the defendant. Small as was the minority standing up against the new-old doctrine, preached by Judge Berkeley, of rex being lex, even one of them at least could not come to act up to his conscience without a great inward struggle. "Judge Croke," says Whitelocke, "of whom I speak knowingly, was resolved to deliver his opinion for the king, and to that end had prepared his argument. Yet a few days before he was to argue, he had discourse with some of his nearest relations, and most serious thoughts of this business, and was heartened by his lady, who was a very good and pious woman, and who told her husband upon this occasion, 'that she hoped he would do nothing against his conscience, for fear of any danger or prejudice to him or his family, and that she would be contented to suffer want, or any misery, with him, rather than be an occasion for him to do or say anything against his judgment or conscience.' Upon these and many like encouragements, but chiefly upon his better thoughts, he suddenly altered his purpose and arguments." Croke's colleague, Denham, fell ill for sheer anxiety in pondering how to express the dictates of his conscience without offending the king; he in the end delivered his decision in writing, and subsequently, law getting somewhat more in the ascendant, became so proud of it as to order that his opinion should be annexed as a codicil to his will. Notwithstanding the verdict of the judges, which the king's advisers looked upon as another great victory, it soon became apparent to all who had eyes to see that the popular cause had been immensely advanced by the legal contest. The length to which the trial had been protracted was of infinite damage to the pretensions of the crown, as attracting the attention of vast masses of the population who before had been content to pay taxes without troubling themselves about the manner in which they had been assessed, but who now became aware of the fact, painful above all others, that they had been robbed. Within a few months after the trial, and before even the judges had given in their decisions, the resistance to the payment of "ship money," which had previously been smothered to a great extent, was displayed in every county; and though the privy council insisted for a short while longer to exact payment with some rigour, the number of those who refused soon became so great as to make punishment an impossibility, so that the tax virtually ceased to exist. The national feeling on the subject was forcibly expressed in the unbounded popularity and applause which hailed the patriot who had carried on the constitutional struggle with such undaunted perseverance. The name of Hampden grew instantly the most distinguished in the country, and his chief counsel and friend, Oliver St. John, previously, as reported by Sir Thomas Wentworth, "known to be of parts and industry, but not taken notice of for practice in Westminster Hall," derived from his exertions a reputation "which called him into all courts, and to all causes, where the king's prerogative was most contested." To Hampden the popular voice gave a title nobler than any other, calling him "the father of the country."

The king's warlike intentions, result of the secret league with Rome and Spain, which had led originally to the invention of the "ship-money" impost, got stifled some time before the tax succumbed under the indignation of the people. Charles was so far in earnest to carry out the wishes of the Spanish government that, with a portion of the proceeds of the tax, he fitted out some thirty vessels, and commenced hostilities against the Netherlands, under the pretext of the British fishing grounds on the eastern and southern coasts having been invaded by the mariners of the republic. But the fleet, placed under the command of the earl of Northumberland, insufficiently manned, and ill provided with arms and ammunition, had to beat an ignominious retreat before a portion of the navy of Holland, which stationed itself at the mouth of the Thames, threatening to stop the commerce of the capital should the English government make the least attempt to interfere again with Dutch fishermen, wherever they might choose to exercise their industry. Charles gave way at once, and under the protection of their own superior fleet, the Dutchmen continued spreading their nets as before off the British coasts, refusing even to pay for a royal license, issued as a last show of authority. To redeem his sullied honour, the king next despatched his naval squadron to the Mediterranean, with orders to bombard Salée, a fortified seaport town of Morocco, which had become a dangerous nest of pirates, who among others had captured a great many English merchantmen, and carried off the crews as slaves. The bombardment took place, but little was gained by it, beyond the destruction of a few walls, raised up as soon as they were knocked down; and the earl of Northumberland was glad at length to conclude a treaty with the sultan of Morocco, making an end of the war upon no other stipulation than the release of the English captives. The few vessels constituting the royal navy returned soon after to port, and for some time to come English influence ceased upon the seas, as it had ceased already upon land, on the Continent and elsewhere. Though boasting constantly that, by reason of his wise neutrality, he was holding the balance of Europe in his hands, Charles, in reality, was looked upon with profound contempt by all the powers, none of whom could feel attached to him as a true friend, and none of whom could fear him either as a bold or powerful enemy. The disdain was hidden in most cases under the usual diplomatic courtesy, but showed itself, now and then, in the treatment given abroad to English ambassadors, and the manner, both scornful and pitiful, with which their demands were listened to by the continental potentates and their ministers. Charles himself at last could not shut his eyes to the humiliating position to which he had sunk, and the reflection roused in him a momentary fit of warlike fever. In the autumn of 1637, while the nation was watching the progress of the "ship-money" trial before the judges of the Exchequer Chamber, the earl of Arundel presented himself before the king on his return from a continental mission. He had been sent to negotiate with the Kaiser in the forlorn cause of the palatine family, which had changed in aspect since the death of the unhappy "Winter King," in 1632; and he came to report now that he had been not only entirely unsuccessful, but had met with such insolence and actual insult as made it impossible for him to prolong his stay at the imperial court. On getting this account, the pride of Charles flared up at once, and he began talking wildly about war. Laud, who never forgot that war meant parliament, vainly tried to pacify his majesty, but could not stop him from signing a hasty agreement with the French ambassador, and taking other measures towards embroiling himself with Austria. Seeing that he could not reckon upon the assistance of Laud in his enterprise, the king wrote to Wentworth, informing him of all that he had done and meant to do. "Upon Arundel's return," Charles informed his trusty counsellor, standing next to Laud in his confidence, "I have perceived that directly which heretofore I have much feared, to wit, the impossibility of restoring my sister and nephews by fair means. This has made me fall in with France in a strict defensive league—the treaties are not yet ratified by France, but I make no question of their ratifying of them—and if we, and the French confederates [Denmark, Sweden, and the Netherlands], can agree both how and what to ask, upon refusal, or so long delay as upon agreement set down we shall account as ill as a denial, we are jointly to proclaim the house of Austria, with all their adherents, our enemies. But I have professed that all my warfare must be by sea and not by land. What likelihood there is that upon this I should fall foul with Spain, you now may see as well as I; and what great inconvenience this war can bring to me, now that my sea-contribution is settled, and that I am resolved not to meddle with land armies, I cannot imagine."

Wentworth's imagination was able to see the great inconvenience far more clearly than the king, and his reply frankly told his majesty that he could not go to war without before summoning a parliament, even although the judges had "settled" the "sea-contribution," that is, given their verdict for the legality of the "ship-money" tax. Having more reason, as an apostate from the popular cause, to fear the advent of a new parliament than even Laud, he at the same time wrote a letter to the archbishop, entreating him to use his whole influence to prevent the fatal issue from taking place. "Good my lord," Wentworth addressed his friend and patron, "if it be not too late, use your best to divert us from this war, for I foresee in it nothing but distractions to his majesty's affairs, and mighty dangers to us that must be the ministers, albeit not the authors of the counsel. It will necessarily put the king into all the high ways possible, else will he not be able to subsist under the charge of it; and if these fail, the next will but be the sacrificing of those that have been his ministers therein. I profess I will readily lay down my life to serve my master, for my heart should give him that very freely; but it would something trouble me to find even those that drew and engaged him in all these mischiefs busy themselves in fitting the halter about my neck, and in tying the knot sure that it should not slip." Laud fully agreed with Wentworth about the necessity of maintaining peace; but meeting with some obstacles in bringing the king to discard his fitful war schemes, his natural obstinacy being backed for the moment both by his consort and a powerful French party, led by the earl of Holland, it was resolved by the archbishop to bring his friend into more immediate contact with Charles than he had hitherto been. Although one of the chief guides of the policy of the government since the dissolution of parliament, Sir Thomas Wentworth had stayed away from court, engaged in functions not less important than those of actual prime minister. After establishing, under the title of Lord President of the Council of the North, an unlimited despotism in the northern counties of England, exacting taxes with the most cruel severity, and "laying by the heels," as he called it, all who dared to oppose his rule, Charles, much pleased with his system, had sent Wentworth as lord-deputy to Ireland, and he proceeded to Dublin in the summer of 1632, retaining still the presidency of the north. Holland at the time was in its customary state of anarchy, the people fighting with each other, but all in tolerable union against the government; and one English viceroy after the other had vainly tried to bringing order into the frightful chaos. To succeed better than his predecessors, Wentworth, having on his demand been armed with extraordinary powers, at once declared his intention of ruling with a rod of iron, unmerciful to those who resisted his rule. He entered upon his duties with great state, ordered the ceremonial of the English court to be observed at Dublin Castle, established a life guard to execute his behests, and treated the ministers and peers of Ireland with a haughty dignity to which they were entirely unaccustomed. He next summoned a parliament, dexterously managing that it should consist exactly one half of Protestants and the other half of Roman Catholics; and having obtained by intrigue the extraordinary grant of six subsidies, he set the two religious parties quarrelling with each other, before they had begun the enumeration of "grievances" that were to come after the vote of the supply. As expected by the lord-deputy, the quarrel in a moment grew into furious warfare; and the Catholics having been routed by the Protestants, he took to "laying by the heels" the leaders of the victorious party, declared parliament dissolved, and his will to be the supreme law of the kingdom. "Now I can say," Wentworth wrote to Laud, at the end of not quite two years' stay in Ireland, "that the king is as absolute here as any prince in the whole world can be."

DUBLIN CASTLE.

The lord-deputy, in establishing his iron despotism, had a higher object in view than that of merely reducing Ireland to obedience. His plan, conception of a vast if corrupt mind, was to treat England and Ireland combined like the double-bodied Dublin parliament upon which he had exercised his statecraft, using each alternately as hammer and as anvil, and in turn vanquishing one by the other. It seemed to him that if English troops had been able, under his energetic generalship, to hammer the discontented Irish people into obedience to the crown, Irish soldiers might accomplish the like task in England; and keeping the great design steadfastly in view, he set to organising a powerful army, as well as to collecting an immense fund for maintaining it, stretching for both purposes his despotic power to the utmost, and hanging and imprisoning all who dared to oppose his will. In order to increase his revenues, he caused the crown lawyers to find or make flaws in the titles of the whole of the estates in the province of Connaught; he browbeat and terrified the juries summoned to try the validity of these deeds, and on the jury at Galway refusing to find a verdict for the crown, he fined the jurymen four thousand pounds each, and cast the sheriff who selected them into prison, where he soon after died. In the same way he punished remorselessly all who ventured to thwart his schemes, or interfere with his vicious personal inclinations. He debauched the daughter of Lord Ely, lord chancellor of Ireland, and then commanded him to settle all his estates according to her wishes, and on the chancellor's refusal, he was immediately turned out of office and cast into prison. For a slight remark, which he construed into an insult, he dragged another nobleman of high standing, Lord Mountnorris, lord-treasurer of Ireland, before a court-martial composed of his own creatures, and wrung from them a verdict of death, which, with pretended leniency, he changed into life-long imprisonment, while confiscating the whole of his property. After governing Ireland in this fashion for four years, Wentworth, in the summer of 1636, made a hasty visit to court, and was received with open arms by Charles and Laud, notwithstanding the loud popular outcry that was rising against him on account of his tyrannical proceedings. To set it at defiance, the lord-deputy made a detailed report of his Irish administration at an open meeting of the privy council. He spoke with pride of having brought, in the course of a few years, the church of Ireland into strict conformity with that of England, of having reduced the people to submission to the crown, of having established a large and increasing revenue, and, lastly, of having created an army, well paid, well disciplined, and ready to do whatever ordered in mute obedience. That army, Wentworth more than hinted, could be spared very soon in Ireland, since he was making preparations for ruling the island kingdom by lawyers instead of soldiers. What he had already achieved, he said, was to have "the ministers of justice not warped by any importunity or applications of private persons, and though never in so much power and estimation in the state and with the subject as now, yet contained in that due subordination to the crown as fit, ministering wholly to uphold the sovereignty, and carrying a direct aspect upon the prerogatives of his majesty, without squinting aside upon the vulgar and vain opinions of the populace." A sharp rule, he concluded, was necessary to cure sharp diseases, that of Ireland having been "a crown, a church, and a people spoiled," and "sovereignty going down the hill." The loud applause of the king and privy councillors greeted the finish of Wentworth's speech. All felt that he was the man of the situation, and that the rule of Ireland must be transferred to England.

Laud and his party were naturally anxious to secure the aid of Wentworth in the government of England as soon as possible, and the staff of the lord-treasurer becoming vacant in 1637, by the death of the earl of Portland, it was offered to the lord-deputy. He made some scruples in accepting it, feeling that his

Irish rule had not yet been firmly enough established to allow his absence, and the king agreeing in the necessity of a slightly prolonged stay, the post of lord-treasurer was provisionally given in commission, Laud taking upon himself the chief power, and leaving to one of his dependants and his successor in the see of London, William Juxon, the duties and responsibilities of the office. Upon the king's warlike fit coming on, early in the following year, the archbishop made another call upon Wentworth, very urgent this time, and which the latter felt unable to resist. He accordingly made all preparations to leave Ireland; but before they had been completed, events had taken place which entirely changed the aspect of political affairs. A dark cloud, which at first seemed utterly insignificant, had been gradually gathering in Scotland, and Charles discovered all on a sudden, to his extreme astonishment, that instead of making war upon Austria, he would have to gather an army and reduce his own rebellious subjects in the northern kingdom to obedience. The Scottish people actually had been in a state of revolution for more than a year before the king and his privy council paid the least attention to the matter; "there was so little curiosity," Lord Clarendon noticed, "either at the court or in the country, to know anything of Scotland, or what was done there, that when the whole nation was solicitous to know what passed weekly in Germany and Poland, and all other parts of Europe, no man ever inquired what was doing in Scotland, nor had that kingdom a place or mention in one page of any gazette." Archbishop Laud was the first to convey the news of a dangerous rebellion having broken out in Scotland to the viceroy of Ireland. "I know too well," he informed Wentworth, in July, 1638, "that very little trifles in church pretensions make much noise, and are hardly laid down, as you may see by the Scottish business, which is grown very ill. The Scottish business is extreme ill indeed, and what will become of it God knows, but certainly no good." A short month sufficed to fulfil all the apprehensions of Laud, and draw the attention of the king and the whole of England to "the Scottish business." In the middle of August, Charles summoned his privy council to meet at Theobald's, to consult the members upon the serious state of affairs in the northern kingdom, and "to take," as the earl of Northumberland, newly appointed lord high admiral, informed Wentworth in a letter, "his resolution to make peace or war with the Scots." The council was nearly equally divided between recommending a policy of conciliation and one of force in suppressing the revolt, Laud mainly advocating the former, and the earl marshal, the marquis of Hamilton, the latter. "Nothing that I have yet heard," Northumberland told his friend, the lord-deputy, "doth persuade me to be of the marshal's opinion. In the exchequer, being examined upon this occasion, there is found but two hundred pounds; nor by all the means that can be devised will it be able to raise more than one hundred thousand pounds towards the maintaining this war. The king's magazines are totally unfurnished of arms and all sorts of ammunition, and commanders we have none, either for advice or for execution. The people throughout all England are generally so discontented by reason of the multitude of taxes imposed upon them, as I think there is reason to fear that a great part of them will be readier to join with the Scots than to draw their swords in the king's service. And your lordship knows very well how ignorant this long peace hath made our men in the use of arms. These considerations move me to think it safer and better for the king to give them their own conditions for the present than rashly enter into a war, not knowing how to maintain, or, indeed, to begin it. God send us a good end of this troublesome business; for to my apprehension no foreign enemies could threaten so much danger to this kingdom as doth now this beggarly nation."

The "troublesome business" of the "beggarly nation" had arisen just a year before Laud and Northumberland informed the Irish viceroy of it, and was of infinitely more import than either of them imagined. It had sprung, in the first instance, as the archbishop remarked, from "little trifles in church pretensions," though what to him, freely meddling with mitres and cardinals' hats, appeared trivialities, seemed things of the highest moment to the people of Scotland. Ever since his coronation at Edinburgh, in 1633, Charles had tried to overthrow Presbyterianism and introduce Episcopacy into Scotland, working step by step to this end by establishing bishoprics, making changes in the church service, and sequestrating portions of ecclesiastical property which had fallen to the crown at the Reformation, but had been alienated during his father's minority. Silent as was the movement by which the king, acting constantly under the advice of his prelate-minister, was operating, it yet was closely watched by the Scottish nation, as touching the dearest interests of all, so that when, at the end of a few years, he made a stride somewhat more bold than his preceding steps, the smouldering fire of indignation all at once broke into open flame. In the summer of 1637, the Scottish clergy were called upon by Laud to receive a new body of canons, as well as 'a new prayer book, both approved of by the king, and varying from the English liturgy in points which indicated a nearer approach to the ritual of Rome. The new formulary of public devotion was appointed to be first read in all the churches on Sunday, the 23rd of July, 1637; and on that day the bishop and dean of Edinburgh, accompanied by the privy council of Scotland and the chief officers of state, went in procession to the High Church of St. Giles, which had been converted into a cathedral, and was crowded by an immense concourse of people, the female sex predominating. No sooner had the dean began the service, when the women set up a dreadful tumult, drowning the voice of the speaker under volleys of groans, hisses, and imprecations. "Let us read the collect of the day," at last the dean broke out, succeeding for a moment to make himself heard above the din and noise that was filling the air. But the effort only served to increase the uproar and excitement among the enraged Edinburgh females, who had found out the "popish points" in Laud's new liturgy sooner than the men. "Deil colie the wame of thee," screamed Jane Geddes, who kept a green stall in the High Street. "Wilt thou say mass at my lug?" and to impress her argument upon the dean, she took up the little three-legged stool upon which she sat and hurled it against his head. The action of fervent Jane found instant imitators, and a shower of heavy stools and solid clasp Bibles came forth from all directions, obscuring the air, and driving the dean into hasty retreat. It was in vain the bishop of Edinburgh, trusting to the reverence due to his high office, attempted to continue the service. A fresh shower of stools compelled him to fly also; and upon the rioters being expelled by the magistrates, the outside mob set to breaking the windows of the church, and attacked on leaving the bishop, who would have been murdered without the arrival of an armed force, by which he was escorted to Holyrood House. The tumult continued for several days, directed chiefly against those of the clergy known to be favourable to the new service book, all of whom were mercilessly handled by the rioters, "enraged women of all qualities," according to Robert Baillie, learned Presbyterian minister, and eyewitness of all the curious scenes. One of the most obnoxious of their ecclesiastical foes, the "enraged women of all qualities" attacked in the dusk of evening, "with heavy fists, staves, and peats, but no stones. They beat him sore; his cloak, ruff, and hat were rent; however, upon his cries, and candles set out from many windows, he escaped bloody wounds, though he was in great danger, even of killing." The next day "some of the meanest of the women were taken to the Tolbooth;" the others, those "of quality," the magistrates dared not touch, and tried hard altogether to represent, in their official reports to England, the whole affair as a mere passing commotion, due to the "rascal multitude." Charles readily believed the reports, little dreaming that the "neaves" of the angry women of Edinburgh were rolling up the kernel of an avalanche, which, thundering downward from the north, would bury him and crush his throne.

While the king was resting in studied ignorance of all that was going on in Scotland, the movement commenced at Edinburgh spread with extraordinary rapidity, losing its outward riotous forms, and gradually shaping itself into a great national resistance against the despotism of the crown. It began by the march, solemn and in perfect order, of vast crowds of people towards the capital, to protest against the innovations with which the kirk was threatened; the new comers were representatives of every class, nobles, landowners, farmers, citizens, tradesmen, and peasants, all bent upon the same great object, and all determined to gain it at the stake of their fortunes and their lives. They crowded the houses and the streets of Edinburgh, encamped at the gates and beneath the city walls, took possession of the churches, and besieged the hall of the privy council, the members of which demanded protection from the municipal councillors, but received for reply that they themselves were besieged. The privy council thereupon resolved to remove to Dalkeith, but before they could accomplish their intention they gave their consent to a stop of boundless import. Some of the leading men among the crowd that had come to Edinburgh, generally known as the "petitioners," proposed to the council to allow that representatives of the mass should be elected to manage the business of the whole body, in order to induce the people to return to their homes, and thereby prevent any dangers likely to accrue from the assemblage of the vast numbers that had flocked together.

The members of the privy council, either secretly conniving at the success of the revolutionary movement, or cherishing hopes of being able to divide, bribe, or intimidate the few elected deputies of the "petitioners" much easier than the great multitude, gave their approval of the proposition; and thus in an instant arose what was nothing less than a new representative government for Scotland. Amidst the most perfect order and deliberation, the immense crowd that had come up from all parts of the kingdom went to the election of a number of separate committees, or "Tables," as they were called, composed each of four members, who in turn appointed one of their number to form part of a central committee of superintendence and government. This done, the multitude dispersed to their homes, each man carrying with him the first orders of the executive, and making known the fact to all that henceforth no true son of the kirk must obey other rule than that of the "Tables." Formidable as was this new movement, and imposing by its calm earnestness, the king was yet unable to see it in its true light, and instead of investigating the causes of the great though quiet revolution that was taking place in Scotland, persisted in fanning the flame by means alike weak and overbearing. In February, 1638, after the "Tables" had exercised for nearly three months uncontrolled authority over the kingdom, Charles, by the advice of Laud, issued a proclamation in which he insisted on the acceptance of the new liturgy, declared the committees chosen at Edinburgh unlawful, and prohibited on pain of treason the reassembling of the "petitioners." It was intended by the king to keep the proclamation strictly secret till the last moment; but its contents became known to the leaders of the movement in Scotland even before it had left London, and they prepared to resist it by a display of strength, and union in power, greater than any yet made. At the same moment that the king's herald was reading the royal ordinance, a counter ordinance was issued and affixed to the market-cross at Edinburgh and at Stirling, protesting against the new interference with the rights and liberties of Scotland, and calling upon the people once more to assert their power in unanimous action. The appeal was responded to with an enthusiasm absolutely startling in its intensity; it went forth like a flash of lightning, and came back like lightning, and in a few days all Scotland was ranged, army-like, under the banners of the "National Covenant."

The new "National Covenant" was admirably devised to unite the whole people into a great and powerful bond of union. It was an engagement drawn up by Alexander Henderson, one of the most distinguished Presbyterian ministers, and Archibald Johnston, subsequently Lord Wariston, one of the best lawyers of Scotland, binding all participants to stand to the country and to each other, so that what should be done to the least of them "should be taken as done to all in general and to every one in particular." The "National Covenant" was designed after the model of that which the Lords of the Congregation had sworn to, a century before, for the defence of the Reformation, and it began by reciting the latter document, giving the same profession of faith, and the same form of abjuration of the doctrines and practices of the church of Rome. It then enumerated all the acts of parliament confirming the Presbyterian establishment, settling its forms, and inflicting penalties on its opponents, and concluded with the solemn vow to maintain the true religion, to resist all contrary innovations, errors, and corruptions, and to defend the kingdom's laws, liberties, and religion, "by the great name of the Lord our God." The Covenant had no sooner been proposed when it was adopted by the whole population with an exultation all but frantic in its vehemence. As the fiery cross was borne over the mountains in olden times to call the clans to arms, so swift-footed messengers, relieving each other from village to village, now carried with incredible rapidity the new summons to the remotest corners of the kingdom; and everywhere the people, rich and poor, young and old, men and women, came flocking together in churches and chapels, vowing, with uplifted hands and weeping eyes, to devote life and all things dear to them upon earth to maintain the National Covenant. When the news of these proceedings reached Charles, he came to perceive, though still very feebly, that the insurrection in the north was beginning to be of serious aspect, and that mere threatening proclamations were not likely altogether to extinguish it, which reflections induced him to send the marquis of Hamilton to Scotland, with the title of royal commissioner, and instructions both to flatter and to frighten the "rebels," and above all to make great promises to the leaders, but in such vague terms that they might at any time be withdrawn.

Cunning as was the policy, it had not by any means the success expected by the king. When the marquis arrived at Edinburgh, in June, 1638, nearly a year after the first breaking out of the rebellion, he was astounded at the spectacle that met his eyes, and lost courage so much as to play the part intrusted to him in an exceedingly awkward manner. He was escorted into the capital by fifty thousand Covenanters, while seven hundred ministers, dressed in the dark robes of the Puritan clergy, stood on an eminence by the road side, singing psalms as he passed. There was clearly little room for intrigue in the midst of national unanimity, and the first attempt at intimidation he tried met with instant failure. Charles had ordered a small vessel, with arms and ammunition for Edinburgh Castle, into the Firth of Forth, but as soon as it arrived in Leith roads, the citizens took the alarm, and large numbers formed themselves instantly into a municipal guard, strictly watching the walls and gates, and investing the approaches to the castle. A fortnight was sufficient to prove to the royal commissioner that his instructions did not meet the real state of things, and he thereupon wrote to the king, telling him that he must resolve upon one out of two courses, either to grant the Scottish people all their wishes, or to hasten down the whole fleet, with troops on board, to garrison Berwick and Carlisle, and prepare to follow in person with an English army. "Your majesty," Hamilton concluded, "will consider in your wisdom how far you may connive at the madness of your own poor people, or how far in your justice you will punish their folly; but certain it is that their present madness is such that nothing but extreme force will make them quit their Covenant, for all are ready, ere they give it up, to lay down their lives."

The reply of Charles breathed his inmost thoughts as a king. To him, now as always, the highest aims and noblest inspirations, even if expressed by the unanimous voice of a whole people, appeared like blackest crimes, if clashing with his own divine-right dogmas; and to uphold these he determined to continue his old policy of force and fraud with redoubled energy. "I expect," Charles told his representative in Scotland, "not anything can reduce that people to obedience but force only. In the meantime, your care must be how to dissolve the multitude, and, if it be possible, to possess yourself of my castles of Edinburgh and Stirling against the people. To this end, I gave you leave to flatter them with what hopes you please, so you engage not me against my grounds; and in particular that you consent neither to the calling of a parliament, nor of a general assembly, until the Covenant be disavowed and given up, your chief aim now must be to win time until I be ready to suppress them. But when I consider that now not only my crown, but my reputation for ever lies at stake, I must rather suffer the first, that time will help, than the last, which is irreparable. This I have written to no other end than to show you that I will rather die than yield to those impertinent and damnable demands, as you rightly call them, for to yield would lead to being no king in a very short time." In his first mandate, Hamilton had been ordered to declare the Covenanters traitors, by proclamation, if not giving up their "damnable demands" within six weeks after being summoned to do so; but the new commands went to modify somewhat the former arrangement. "As the affairs are now," the king instructed his commissioner, "I do not wish that you should declare the adherers to the Covenant traitors, until you have heard from me that my fleet hath set sail for Scotland, though your six weeks should be elapsed. In a word, gain time by all the means you can, without forsaking your grounds."

In conformity with these orders, the marquis began to temporize, and to listen to the explanations and proposals of the leading men among the Covenanters, with the result upon him of becoming impressed, if not with the justness of their cause, at least with its strength. Less blind to consequences than the king, he now began to plead with him to suspend his military preparations till matters had become more desperate; but Charles would not listen to the counsel, and continued to arm, though still deluding the people he intended crushing with promises of peace and conciliation. "As concerning the explanation of their damnable Covenant," he told Hamilton in another letter, "whether it be with or without explanation, I have no more power in Scotland than a duke of Venice, and I will rather die than suffer it. Yet do I commend the giving ear to the explanation, or anything else to win time. As for their calling a parliament, or general assembly, without me, I should not much be sorry, for it would the more loudly declare them traitors, and the more justify my actions. Thus you may see," his majesty concluded, "that I intend not to yield to the demand of those traitors, the Covenanters, who, I think, will declare themselves so by their actions before I shall do it by my proclamation, which I shall not be sorry for, so that it be without the personal hurt of you, or any of my honest servants, or the taking of any English place. I care not for their affronting or disobeying my declaration, so that it go not to open mischief, and that I may have some time to end my preparations." It was strange blindness in Charles not to see that his policy of fraud and duplicity defeated its own ends, since, with his court full of natives of Scotland, the chiefs of the Covenanters could not fail to be informed, almost as well as himself, of the progress of the "preparations."

By his urgent desire, Hamilton was allowed to return to England towards the end of August, and as soon as arrived at court had a series of secret conferences with the king and Laud. The royal exchequer being absolutely empty, Charles had met with the greatest difficulties in raising troops at home, and was now engaged in negotiating with the Spanish government for the loan of ten thousand veteran soldiers, experienced, through long campaigns in Germany, and the Netherlands, in butchering heretics. With these, and an army of Irishmen actively drilled by Wentworth, he intended to fall upon Scotland, so as to crush with one great blow the "damnable Covenant." But neither the Spaniards nor the Irish fighting men were expected to be ready to take the field for another three or four months; and it being absolutely necessary to amuse the "traitors" in the meanwhile, it was settled in the conference that Hamilton should go back to Scotland at once, and get up a dramatic performance on the largest scale, by summoning a general assembly, with full powers to debate upon everything and do nothing. The matter fully arranged, the royal commissioner went back to Edinburgh in October, taking with him a proclamation of Charles, couched in the most gracious terms, which granted all, or nearly all, that was demanded by the people; the new body of canons, the liturgy, and the High Court of Commission, being all declared to be abandoned, while a general assembly was appointed to meet in November, and a parliament of the nation in May of the following year. The surprise was universal; but the satisfaction of the first moment was followed by deep distrust. Besides the suspicions which the suddenness and unlooked-for amplitude of the concessions was formed to excite, the chiefs of the Covenanters, who kept up an intimate correspondence with some of the leaders of the popular party in England, as well as with several of the Scotch councillors and others in close attendance upon the king, were possessed of intelligence not leaving the slightest doubt of the new movement being absolute treachery, intended solely to gain time for war. However, they did not deem it fair to refuse the liberal offers of the king; and the general assembly of clergy and lay elders was convened to meet at Glasgow, and began its sittings on the appointed day, the 21st of November.

It was seen immediately after the opening of the assembly that the suspicions entertained against Charles were but too well founded. Instead of allowing the members to deliberate freely, as had been promised, the royal commissioner did nothing but impede the debates, bringing forward all kinds of protests, and these proving ineffectual to stay the rapid current of votes, he, before the end of a week, threw off the mask by pronouncing the dissolution. But it was too late now, for the assembly refused to be dissolved except by its own consent, so that the king and his commissioner found themselves caught in the meshes of their own duplicity. Strong in the unanimity of the nation, the members passed vote after vote, annulling as corrupt the whole of the acts of the six assemblies held in the last and present reigns, cancelling in form all the late innovations, and, finally, abolishing Episcopacy and restoring Presbyterianism throughout the whole of Scotland. To back the votes of the Glasgow assembly, the chiefs of the Covenanters in the meanwhile prepared for the now inevitable war. They despatched messengers to buy ammunition and arms abroad, sent the Covenant to the Scottish troops serving in Germany under the Protestant banner, and invited one of their best officers, Alexander Leslie, who had gained laurels under Gustavus Adolphus, to return home and take the command-in-chief of the national army. Before the general assembly, sitting a month, had registered its last vote, the army of the Covenanters was ready to take the field, fully conscious of the import of the coming struggle. "The Cantabrian faction," Robert Baillie said, "are hailing us all away to Rome for our religion, and to Constantinople for our civil policy." Robert Baillie thought, and every man that had sworn to the Covenant thought with him, that many a good sword must be uplifted, and many a tough battle be fought before the laws of Rome and Turkey should find their way into Scotland.

Long as he had been making his preparations, Charles was far from being ready for war when his northern subjects were facing him in battle array. His mental vision was too defective to perceive that the people of England as well as of Scotland were against him in the struggle he was entering upon, and that he was going into the fight, not as representative of a great principle, or of any considerable part of the nation, but merely as chief of the "Canterburian faction." However, he persevered, urged on by Laud and the queen, the latter exerting herself with extraordinary energy to obtain what seemed most wanting under the circumstances, funds for buying soldiers. Appreciating much more keenly than her consort the feelings of the people, but being at the same time fearfully daring and reckless in her movements, she persuaded him to allow her to raise funds from among the Roman Catholics, which she did by sending out official letters, headed "Henrietta Maria Rex," entreating all adherents of the old faith to contribute to the cost of the expedition which "called his majesty into the northern parts for the defence of his honour and dominions." Thus authorized, the Roman Catholics openly held a meeting in London, presided over by the papal ambassador, for the purpose of recommending the subscription to all persons of their religion, whether priests or laymen, throughout the kingdom, scarcely hiding the fact of their special sympathy with the expedition "into the northern parts." The sums obtained by these means were not inconsiderable, but the movement on the other hand greatly served to increase the distrust among the mass of the Protestants, who appeared all but ready to join in insurrection with the people of Scotland.

To heighten the difficulties of the king, the expected Spanish succours were refused him at the last moment, on account of some severe defeats suffered by the troops of Philip IV. on the Rhine, which made it impossible for him to withdraw any of his forces from that quarter. Almost simultaneous with the report of this failure, the news reached the court that the looked-for attack upon Scotland from the side of Ireland could not take place, the Covenant having found its way into the dominions ruled over by the lord-deputy, and threatening to upset all the fruits of his despotism, should he dare to leave the country with the troops prepared for the invasion. "It is not to be kept secret," Wentworth informed the primate in a ciphered letter, "that there are forty thousand Scots in Ulster able to bear arms: we hear the crack of it, if not the threat, every day in the streets. Neither if now all the English planted about the Derry be turned out, will they be the weaker for that. What will be the end, if we thus arm against ourselves? God send the Scots well into their right wits, say I; deliver the public peace from the ill of them, and me out of their fingers. You may pray as much, if you please, for your share; for they wish no better to you than myself, and that, believe me, is ill enough." Seeing the indecision of one of the most energetic of his advisers, Charles, to spur his zeal in the coming war, bestowed upon Wentworth a long-solicited honour by creating him earl of Strafford, giving him at the same time the title of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, a designation in abeyance since the government of the favourite of Queen Elizabeth. Nevertheless, Strafford could do no more than Wentworth, and spite of all his efforts, was kept in inactivity by the forty thousand Ulstermen, hearing the "crack" of their voices not only, but of their muskets.

After more than ten months spent in attempts to raise a great army, sufficiently powerful to overcome with one impulse all resistance on the part of the northern insurgents, Charles had to content himself at last with an impressed force of not one half the strength he had reckoned upon. Some thousand men, chiefly Roman Catholics, were enlisted by the aid of the pecuniary resources obtained by the queen's circulars, as well as by arbitrary loans, and for the rest he had recourse to a general levy. Though not authorized by law to be employed on foreign service, the militia of the different counties were ordered under training, and all refractory men thrown into prison; after which vast numbers of private persons were commanded by writs under the royal seal to supply men and arms in stated proportion to their rent-roll, or income. The lord-keeper at the same time issued summonses to the peers of the realm to meet their sovereign at the city of York, each attended by a due troop of armed followers, with full supply of war stores and ammunition. All being ready, Charles set out from the capital on the 27th of March, 1639, having previously appointed to the chief command of the army the earl of Arundel, a nobleman destitute of all military knowledge, and chosen only on account of his attachment to the Roman Catholic faith.

Great pomp was displayed on the march to York, which did not prevent the show of extreme dissatisfaction, even in the immediate neighbourhood of the king, many of the nobles uttering audible wishes "that the business were brought to a fair treaty." To stifle the dissatisfaction, which he considered little less than rebellious, Charles resolved upon a measure at once feeble and despotic, by drawing up a new military oath, which he ordered to be taken by all peers and persons of eminence. The oath, in addition to the ordinary declaration of allegiance, contained an engagement to oppose, to the utmost hazard of life and fortune, all seditions, rebellions, and conspiracies, and not to countenance or sympathise with any plots or intrigues, especially such as should "come veiled under pretence of religion." Several of the nobles, among them Lord Say and Lord Brook, "two popular men, and most devoted to the church," as described by Clarendon, absolutely refused to take the oath, declaring, in the presence of Charles, that "if the king suspected their loyalty, he might proceed against them as he thought fit, but that it was against the law to impose any oath or protestation upon them not enjoined by the law; and in that respect, so that they might not betray the common liberty." They also declared that they were willing to attend his majesty, but that he could not command their attendance out of the realm of England; adding, with great boldness, that they were not sufficiently acquainted with the laws of Scotland to form an opinion of the justice of the rebellion. Charles, in great anger, placed the two peers under arrest, but the increasing dissatisfaction among the leading officers and nobles obliged him to liberate them again in a few days. Many of the soldiers, too, began to show signs of mutiny, among them a troop of Irish sent by Wentworth, "a matter of fifteen hundred ragged Arabians," as described by Robert Baillie; and before the king had reached the Border, sitting down under shelter of the guns of Berwick Castle, it had become clear to all but himself that he was not in a position to do battle against the Scottish nation.

Between the army of the king and the army of Scotland the contrast was immense. While nothing but anger, dissatisfaction, and disorganisation prevailed in the royal camp, with not even a good general present to keep the unruly masses under proper discipline, the most perfect union existed among the forces of the Covenanters, welded together by enthusiasm in one strong body, and under the command of able and earnest leaders, at the head of them one of the most experienced war-captains of the age. Alexander Leslie, field-marshal in the Swedish army, and one of the most distinguished generals fighting for the Protestant cause in Germany, had returned to Scotland on the first summons of his countrymen, and having been appointed to the command-in-chief of the army of the Covenant, had already exhibited his genius in a masterly strategic movement. As soon as the news arrived that Charles had actually commenced war, by issuing a proclamation, dated from the city of York, declaring hostilities, the Covenanters, by a simultaneous and preconcerted movement, assailed the whole of the king's castles in Scotland, and succeeded in taking every one of them, with the exception of the little fort of Caerlavrock, near Dumfries. This achieved, and the country free from internal foes, Leslie gathered the whole of his forces and marched upon the Cheviot Hills, to face the royal army pushing in long strides towards the Tweed. On his way southward, the general of the Covenant learnt that an English fleet with four thousand men on board, commanded by the marquis of Hamilton, had appeared in the Firth of Forth, evidently intending to assault Leith, whereupon he at once turned aside to protect the capital.

But the step was unnecessary, the patriotism of the inhabitants having already done as much as could be achieved by the highest military skill. At the moment of the royal fleet coming in view, the whole population of the capital hurried down to Leith to defend it, and within a few days there arose fortifications, as if by enchantment, around the ancient port. Noblemen and gentlemen, ministers and merchants, lent their hands in making trenches and ditches, working like common labourers under the command of overseers, and even ladies of the highest rank, in a wild transport of enthusiasm, felt proud to soil their fingers in carrying sand, rubbish, and stones, to erect the battlements and fill up the ramparts. The sight of this immense outburst of patriotism seemed as if to paralyze the action of the commander of the fleet, unable, perhaps, to forget entirely that he was a Scotsman born, and he retreated seaward without making an attempt upon Leith, or even firing a shot against the newly-erected walls. Hamilton's retreat, the report of which was received at the head-quarters of the royal army at the moment of the king's arrival at Berwick, had a great effect upon making the desire before expressed by many of the English nobles, not to enter upon war against Scotland, all but universal, and the commander-in-chief, the earl of Arundel, was foremost in urging upon Charles the prudence of coming to a settlement before swords had been drawn, and rows of dead men had come to form a new barrier of hatred between the two countries. The king was still reluctant, though more than half persuaded of the necessity of peace; but after several days' reflection his pride and obstinacy once more prevailed over all other feelings, and he gave the signal to advance upon the Covenanters.

From his tent, at the south side of the Tweed, adjoining the gates of Berwick, Charles could see the vanguard of Leslie, twelve thousand stalwart men encamped at Dunse-Law, most of them "stout young ploughmen and highlanders, with their plaids, targes, and dorlacks," divided into groups, around standards bearing the arms of Scotland, and the golden lettered legend, "For Christ's Crown and the Covenant." Watching the ten thousand on Dunse-Law "through a prospect," or telescope, the king could see how grandly they looked down upon him and his army, careless evidently of his wrath, and calmly confident of their own victory. Instead of sharpening swords, or casting bullets, they quietly and solemnly marched to "sermons and prayers, morning and even, under the roof of heaven, to which their drums did call them for bells," while the men of the royal army, "ragged Arabians" and others, went about reeling drunk, filling the air with their vile oaths and curses. Having looked long enough, Charles conceived the idea to take the camp of the Covenanters by surprise; and before daybreak, on the morning of the 5th of June, he despatched the earl of Holland, with three thousand cavalry, mostly gentlemen, and the flower of the army, to drive the enemies from their position.

The sun rose before the three thousand horsemen had got half the way to Dunse-Law, about ten miles distant from Berwick; it was an intensely hot morning, "the hottest that had been known," and soon steeds and riders felt the effect of it in getting faint and exhausted. Arrived within a mile of the Scottish camp, the earl of Holland beheld, to his extreme surprise, the Covenanters close before him in full battle array, resting on their swords, and quietly awaiting his approach. Startled beyond measure at the unexpected sight, the earl, who had calculated upon finding the enemy fast asleep, at once beat a retreat, all his officers being unanimous to recommend it; and the whole force galloped back to Berwick faster than they had come, not without leaving a good many of their number on the road sinking under the intolerable heat. The bloodless victory was deemed a good occasion by the leaders of the Covenanters to hold out the olive-branch of peace, and the day after Holland's retreat the earl of Dunfermline was sent by them to the king to offer terms of agreement. Though still as obstinate as ever in giving way, Charles saw himself forced now to accede to the proposal, the certainty of a defeat, should he risk a battle, hanging over his head; and after a short demur he consented to four deputies from the Covenanters coming to Berwick to meet six commissioners appointed by himself, in order to arrange terms of peace.

The representatives on both sides met on the 11th of June, but they had scarcely began their deliberations when the king unexpectedly appeared among them, announcing that he had come to disprove "notorious slanders" of shutting his ear to his subjects, and finishing by telling the Scottish envoys, in a haughty and arrogant tone, that as they could never justify their rebellion, they must be content now to take his word to treat them leniently, submitting entirely to his award. Amazed at the bare offer of such insulting conditions, the Covenanters prepared to break off negotiations forthwith; but they were retained by the English commissioners, who insisted upon continuing the deliberations, notwithstanding the king's improper interference. An agreement was come to at the end of a few days, settling that both armies should be disbanded, that the royal fleet should be recalled from the Forth, that the king's castles should be given up again by the Covenanters, and, finally, that the affairs of Scotland should be left to the decision of a new general assembly and a parliament of the nation, the first of which Charles promised to open in person, within two months. The king consented to accept these terms, though visibly reluctant, and giving way only to the pressure of his nobles and officers, and on the 18th of July, 1639, signed the Pacification of Berwick.

Like most agreements made to unite extreme diversity of opinions, the articles of the Berwick treaty were vehemently condemned as soon as they became known, both in England and Scotland. On the one hand, the more zealous among the Covenanters were violently discontented at a settlement which nullified the decisions of the assembly of Glasgow, and included no final renunciation of Episcopacy, while, on the other side, the three principal advisors of Charles, the primate, the earl of Strafford, and the marquis of Hamilton, were unanimous in condemning the whole treaty as one which left rebellion unpunished not only, but victorious, and which in itself formed an abnegation of the great principle of the divine right and absolute authority of kingship, for which they had been struggling for years. To bring on another appeal to the sword soon became the object of both parties, but particularly of Land and Strafford, the latter exerting himself to an extraordinary degree to procure men and money for the purpose, going so far as to enter upon the dangerous path of summoning another Irish parliament for the vote of supplies. Less anxious for a renewal of hostilities, the Covenanters nevertheless thought it prudent to keep under arms, justly mistrustful of the king's intentions and future plans, no less than of the design of the "Canterburian faction." As a further precaution, the whole of the officers who had quitted foreign service to fight in the cause of their countrymen, including Alexander Leslie and his staff, were retained on full pay, and though the royal castles had to be surrendered in accordance with the terms of the treaty, care was taken to watch them in such a manner as to allow early repossession.

The feelings of the Scottish people, already greatly

exalted, were still more embittered by another gratuitous insult on the part of Charles. In reply to many reproaches made against them for not insisting upon better terms, the Scotch commissioners who had signed the Pacification of Berwick printed and published an apology for their conduct, in which they affirmed that verbal promises had been given by the king, and noted down by themselves on the spot, much more favourable to their cause than the public articles, which had been drawn up with an understood saving for what his majesty regarded as due to his prerogative and royal honour. The statement, which, given in full detail, bore a great semblance of truth, and fitted well, moreover, with the known habit of Charles of making great promises after he had found haughty language of no use, was vehemently denied by the king; and to prove his assertion against that of the four commissioners, he ordered all the copies of their declaration that had come into England to be seized, and to be burned by the hands of the hangman. Right royal and pontifical as was this mode of testifying to the truth, it had the effect of displeasing the Scotch people; and all over the country the action of the king was loudly blamed, while at Edinburgh the disaffection found vent in gross insults to the ministers of state, and all persons looked upon as adherents of the English government. The tumults were made a pretence by Charles of breaking his promise to open the general assembly of Scotland in person; and the ceremony had to take place in the presence of a new royal commissioner, the earl of Traquair, his predecessor, the marquis of Hamilton, engaging in the meanwhile to levy troops for another war. To gain time had once more become the sole object of Charles, and when, in one of its first sittings, the general assembly passed an almost unanimous vote for the total abolition of Episcopacy, Traquair was empowered to give the royal assent thereto, subject to certain limitations and distinctions, so worded as to afford a pretext for setting the whole measure aside on the first favourable occasion. Having played his part in the piece, assuming very devout airs, and even taking the vow of the Covenant, the royal commissioner prorogued the sittings of the general assembly in the second week of November. In the same week the earl of Strafford arrived in London, summoned by a letter under the king's own hand, requiring his immediate presence. He had "much, too much, private matter to require his counsels for some time," Charles informed the non-handled tamer of Irish rebels.

Strafford's appearance at court decided the still pending question as to war or peace with Scotland. Of all the enemies of the Berwick Pacification, he was the most decided, no less than the most energetic, holding, with much truth, that it would lead in its consequences to a complete overthrow of absolutistic government, in England as well as in Scotland. He therefore urged upon the king the necessity of recommencing hostilities without delay. But to do so, funds were urgently required, and all ways of raising money by arbitrary measures having been exhausted, even Strafford had to acknowledge that nothing but parliamentary supplies could furnish the means for carrying on the war. Though with as great an aversion as ever for parliaments, the earl had arrived at the conclusion that it would be vastly preferable to risk the dangers to be expected from calling another than to neglect reducing the Scotch to obedience, and this conviction now he did all in his power to impress upon the king. There was still much unwillingness on the part of Charles to commit himself to so decided a step, and in his perplexity he called the chief members of the privy council together, to give their advice in the matter. They all joined Strafford in recommending writs for a new parliament to be issued, on the ground that it would be impossible, not only to make war, but to carry on the government without fresh supplies, the exchequer having been so completely exhausted by the cost of the northern expedition, that not even the servants of the household could be paid their wages. Seeing the unanimity of his council, Charles put to them a final question. "If this parliament," he asked, "should prove as untoward as some have lately been, will you then assist me in such extraordinary ways as in that extremity shall be thought fit?" The unanimous reply was that all would do their utmost in upholding the royal privilege in ordinary, no less than "extraordinary ways;" whereupon the king gave his consent to the issue of the writs.

It was arranged that the session should begin on the 13th of April; and a month previous Strafford started for Dublin, to further by his dreaded presence the vote of supplies from the Irish parliament that had been summoned a short time before. By using promises and intimidation to the fullest extent, he succeeded in extracting four subsidies, after which he forced on the levy of eight thousand foot soldiers and one thousand horse, directing the whole of these troops upon Carlisle, to be ready to take part in the invasion of Scotland. Having accomplished all this within a fortnight, labouring with all but superhuman energy, Strafford re-embarked for England, intending to be present at the opening of the new parliament, upon which he could not help looking with some involuntary disquietude. The labours of the fortnight had so exhausted his frame that he had to be carried to the vessel which was to take him across St. George's Channel. It blew a gale when he set foot on board, and the fury of the storm continued increasing to such an extent that the captain refused to weigh anchor. However, Strafford compelled him to do so, and got safely landed at Chester; but on his arrival there, seemed more dead than alive, and was taken ashore in an unconscious state. The anguish of his body appeared but to aggravate the violence and harshness of his temper, and as soon as he felt strong enough to sit up, in bed, though not able to continue his journey, when in a litter, he wrote to the king, entreating him to save his cause by proceeding against all his enemies with the utmost severity. Believing himself in a dying state, Strafford's last regrets and complaints were about "the frowardness of this generation," which, he declared his conviction, would not be cured "till punishments be well and roundly applied." Charles received the counsel and warning just on the eve of opening parliament.

The opening ceremony took place with great pomp on the appointed day, the 13th of April, 1640. In his speech from the throne, Charles was very brief, and frank to the border of disdain, telling the commons, what indeed they did not ignore, that the direst necessity had compelled him to call them together. He then shortly hinted at his intention of recommencing war to reduce his Scottish subjects to obedience, asserting that they were plotting treason, and that a letter, signed by seven peers who had sworn to the Covenant, had been intercepted, requesting armed assistance from the king of France. The king had scarce entered upon this subject when, visibly troubled and embarrassed, he came to an abrupt end, and, dropping his speech, referred for further particulars to the lord-keeper, Sir John Finch. The latter, recently raised to his high dignity, in recompense of the slavish service he had rendered to the crown in his various functions of Speaker of the commons and lord-chief-justice, at once commenced addressing the two houses of parliament in a very curious harangue. He began by stating his opinion that "his majesty's kingly resolutions are seated in the ark of his secret breast, and it were a presumption of too high a nature for any Uzzah uncalled to touch it, or even to think of it. But," continued Sir John, "the king is now pleased to lay by the shining beams of his majesty, as Phœbus did to Phœton, that the distance between sovereignty and subjection should not bar you from that filial freedom of access to his person and councils. You must beware, however, that, like the son of Clymene, you aim not at the guiding of the chariot, as if that were within the testimony of affection, and remember also that though the king sometimes lays by the beams and rays of majesty, he never lays by majesty itself."

After this fine prelude, the lord-keeper proceeded to business, but still maintaining his exalted strain. Referring to the main subject in the speech from the throne, he characterized the conduct of the people of Scotland as "the most horribly rebellious" ever witnessed in any age or any nation, inasmuch as they had not only cast off the loyalty and obedience due to their natural sovereign, but gone so far as "to take up arms against the Lord's anointed." For this reason, he argued, another war had become of absolute necessity, Scotland being "the part of the royal dominions whither all the rhums and fluxes of factious and seditious humours are flowing," so that in subduing them his majesty did nothing more but uphold the rights conferred upon him "by the laws of God, of nature, and of nations." The lord-keeper deprecated beforehand any interference in the matter, declaring that all that was wanted from parliament was to vote the money for the war and be silent. "His majesty," he exclaimed, "will not endure to have his honour weighed at the common beam, nor admit any to step between him and his virtue, and, therefore, as he would upon no terms admit the mediation of any person whatsoever, so he should judge it high presumption in any to offer it." The warning was followed by an urgent exhortation to the commons to vote the required subsidies without the loss of a single moment. The royal coffers, he declared, were drained; and although whatever his majesty had taken from his people had, "like vapours exhaled from the earth, returned to it in refreshing showers," yet he could raise no more, and large debts had already been incurred upon the security of the king's personal estate and the credit of his servants. In conclusion, Sir John tendered the royal promise that, after the supplies had been voted, such time should be allowed to the lower house of parliament for the discussion of any matters of complaint "as the season and the state of affairs would permit." It was a song which, the commons fancied, they had heard before, and which somehow had lost its power of enchantment.

The parliamentary debates commenced, the day after the opening, with a discussion of grievances, not the slightest notice being taken of the eloquent entreaties, assurances, and warnings of the lord-keeper. Harbottle Grimstone, member for Colchester, a learned and upright lawyer, began the discussion by declaring his conviction that what the people wanted was a reform of government, and not a war against Scotland; and he was followed by John Pym, veteran leader of the liberal party, who, in a speech of two hours' duration, indicated the position which the House of Commons ought to assume, in justice to itself, and in justice to the nation. He exposed, with masterly force and clearness, though in very temperate language, and with an anxious assertion of the constitutional maxim that "the king can do no wrong," the manifold oppressions under which the nation suffered, the redress of which, he argued, was more absolutely urgent than any other matter, whether of peace or war. He further laid it down that the existence of these grievances "disabled" the House of Commons to grant a supply, and must do so until amended, the more so as to all other causes of complaint brought forward in previous sessions there was now added one more, graver almost than the rest, in the neglect of the advisers of the crown to summon a parliament for eleven years, instead of annually, as prescribed by statute. More speeches of the same nature followed within the next four or five days, to the exasperation of Charles, who continued sending messages to the Speaker, pressing for supplies, and reiterating the promise of allowing the discussion of grievances to take place afterwards. This taking no effect, the king next addressed himself to the lords, asking their intervention to procure for him the desired subsidies, in consequence of which the upper house issued an invitation to the commons to meet in a general assembly for the discussion of the question of supply.

The interference, unwise in every respect, produced nothing but indignant speeches in the lower house, the chief members of which declared the invitation of the peers to be a breach of privilege, which ought to be atoned for by a humble apology. The demand was roundly refused; more angry speeches followed, and on Monday, the 4th of May, the commons resolved themselves into a grand committee for discussing the state of the nation. The proceedings lasted from eight o'clock in the morning till six at night, when an adjournment of the debate took place till the following day. On the 5th of May, the members of the lower house met at the usual hour of eight; but before they had entered upon business, the Speaker being absent, they were summoned by the usher of the black-rod to the bar of the House of Lords. There the king was sitting in great state, addressing the lords, and scarcely deigning to give a look at the commons who came rushing in at the door. "I know," he exclaimed, "that they have insisted very much on grievances, and I will not say but there may be some, though I will confidently affirm that there are not by many degrees so many as the public voice doth make them. Wherefore I desire you to take notice, now especially at this time, that out of parliament I shall be as ready, if not more willing, to hear and redress any such grievances as in parliament." After launching forth into praises of the lords for their good behaviour, and chiding the commons for their naughtiness in not voting immediately the supplies demanded by him, the king finished by desiring the peers to assist him further with their counsels, stating, at the same time, that he found it incompatible with his dignity to allow the debates of the lower house to go any longer. "I will not," he cried, "lay this fault on the whole House of Commons: I will not judge so uncharitably of those whom, for the most part, I take to be loyal and well-affected subjects; but it hath been the malicious cunning of some few seditiously affected men that hath been the cause of this misunderstanding." Then, turning to Sir John Finch, he exclaimed, "And now, my lord-keeper, do as I have commanded you." "My lords," said Sir John, "and you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, the king's majesty doth dissolve this parliament." The members silently dispersed in all directions, some melancholy and others gay. Among the latter was John Hampden's friend, Oliver St. John, who being asked the cause of his inward satisfaction, replied, with lawyer-like shrewdness, "We are getting on very well. matters must be worse before they can get better."

Having dissolved his fourth parliament, after a session of only twenty days, Charles undisguisedly declared his intention of carrying on the government in a purely despotic manner. In a proclamation to the people, he explained that he had dissolved the newly-elected House of Commons because of its audacity in meddling with his administration of the realm, and finding fault with many things, "like as if kings were bound to give an account of their regal actions, or of their manner of government, to their subjects assembled in parliament." Together with issuing this proclamation, Charles resumed his old practice of imprisoning those members of parliament who had shown themselves particularly hostile to his policy, and four of them were sent at once to the Tower, while others were punished in various ways. The next great object was to get soldiers and money for the war against the Covenanters. The earl of Strafford, who had shaken off his illness and come to court during his parliamentary debates, exerted himself to the utmost in the matter, transferring for the purpose his Irish policy into England. Writs under the privy-seal for so-called benevolences were immediately issued, the obnoxious "ship-money" was ordered to be again levied with the utmost rigour, and all who made opposition to being robbed and plundered were thrown into gaol. "The only way with gentlemen who will not pay," cried Strafford, repeating a favourite phrase, "is to send for them and lay them by the heels."

Among the new schemes of the earl was that of coining four hundred thousand pounds' worth of base money; but the king, according to Thomas May, "waived that upon reasons which the merchants gave of the inconveniences of it," the "reasons" being backed by the offer of a considerable loan. Not content, however, with this offer, contributions towards the war were asked of all persons known to possess a certain amount of wealth, and several aldermen of London were committed to prison for refusing to make out lists of their fellow-citizens whom they judged substantial enough to be worth plundering. At the same time, orders were sent to the sheriffs of all the English counties to impress a given number of men for the king's service, to train them for the militia, to furnish them with coat and conduct-money at the public charge, and to send them to specified places on the Border, with quarters in private houses along their route. The sheriffs obeyed most unwillingly; and the execution of the orders for the impressment caused universal indignation and resentment, leading in many instances to tumult and bloodshed. In various districts the new levies rose upon their officers, firing at them, and refusing to be led to the war; and nearly everywhere the lowest rabble only could be got to shoulder the musket, put on a striped coat, and march off to the Border. Peter Heylin, one of the king's chaplains, looking on at the armed horde tramping northward, bitterly wailed that they were "so ill principled, or so ill-persuaded, that in their marchings through the country they brake into churches, pulled up rails, threw down communion-tables, defaced the common prayer-books, tore the surplices, and committed many other acts of outrageous insolence." Common soldiers as well as officers were heard to declare loudly wherever they went, that they were determined not to fight "the battles of the bishops."

The necessity of fighting, whether with willing or unwilling soldiers, came sooner upon the king than he or any of his advisers expected. While the English sheriffs were still engaged levying raw recruits by force, the Scottish army had come up to the Border, fully equipped, well provided with military stores, and animated by the highest enthusiasm. Together with the parliament at Westminster, another had been sitting at Edinburgh, under protest of the royal commissioner, and after remodelled the government, and changing its own constitution by the creation of a third estate, had finished the session by imposing a general tax for the support of the war, and transferring the executive power, nominally still vested in the crown, to a committee of estates. The tax was instantly and cheerfully paid by all classes of the people, who moreover assessed themselves in voluntary contributions, strenuously recommended by the clergy. All the women of the middle and upper classes set to work in making tents and accoutrements for the army, the ranks of which got thronged by volunteers; and long before the king had made a movement to take the field, there were nearly thirty thousand men ready to oppose him, in the defence of their religion and their civil liberties.

Alexander Leslie, as in the previous campaign, again took the command-in-chief of the forces of the Cove-

nanters, and towards the end of July led them towards the old encampment near the Tweed river, in sight of the ramparts of Berwick. Here he remained for three weeks, sending proclamations and circulars into England, desiring all friends of liberty to assist him in the overthrow of despotism, and at the same time perfecting the training and discipline of his troops, while the ministers, a numerous body, kept up their enthusiasm by daily sermons and prayers. Getting impatient at last at seeing no enemy in front, Leslie crossed the Tweed on the 21st of August, his men wading the river near the village of Coldstream, James Graham, fifth earl and first Marquis of Montrose, being the first to set foot upon English soil. There was no force to oppose the Covenanters nearer than Newcastle. Here Lord Conway, governor of the town, was gathering the vanguard of the royal army, commanding nearly ten thousand foot, and about two thousand horse, but the greater number of them undisciplined levies, ill armed, mutinous for want of pay, and entirely disaffected to the royal cause. Being as well acquainted with the strength of the Scottish army as with the weakness of his own, Lord Conway at first refused to march to the encounter of Leslie, certain of being defeated; however, urged onward by the directions, remonstrances, and taunts of the earl of Strafford, who had come to the north to look after the war preparations, and who, in his contemptuous abhorrence of the cause of the Covenanters, refused to believe in their valour and discipline, he swerved from his resolution, and went forth to meet the invaders.

Taking with him all his cavalry and about one-half of the infantry, picking out the best men under his command, Conway marched along the right bank of the Tyne to the ford of Newburn, where the Covenanters were expected to cross. He arrived there on the 28th of August, just before Leslie's army appeared in sight. The Scotch commander, without commencing hostilities, contented himself with demanding a free passage, and on receiving an energetic refusal, sent a few bullets across the river. At the sound almost of the first shot Conway's two thousand horse went galloping off to the south, and a few dozen rounds more drove the infantry in flying columns to the east. Not two score men had fallen before the entire English force was in disgraceful rout, the horse arriving the same evening at Durham, and the foot soldiers, under Lord Conway, at Newcastle. Here, a little before midnight, a council of war was held, in which it was decided to evacuate the town, and by five o'clock on the following morning, Saturday, the 29th of August, the whole royal army was in full retreat upon York. The same afternoon, the Covenanters marched into Newcastle, taking possession of the whole supply of provisions and ammunition, including five thousand stand of arms, collected for the invasion of Scotland.

The report of the Newburn rout, while it rejoiced the hearts of the Puritans and adherents of the liberal party all over England, threw the king into profound melancholy, bordering upon despair. It was the first great check that had been given to his indomitable pride as a sovereign by divine right, and his stubbornness in cleaving to the despotic rule of government prescribed by false or ignorant advisers.

His mental depression in seeing himself conquered by his enemies in a manner indicating absolute and irretrievable defeat, was so great as to throw him for several days on a bed of sickness. Rousing himself at last from his despondency, he hurried to York, under the walls of which he inspected the disorderly bands figuring under the title of the Royal Army. It was impossible for Charles not to see that the rabble passing under his eyes, some fifteen thousand head, though possibly fit to assist a despotic government in oppressing peaceful citizens, was utterly incapable to oppose a well-organised army like that of the Covenanters, so that there was clearly no other alternative but to enter into negotiations for peace. All the king's counsellors advised it except Strafford, who had taken the command-in-chief of the troops, and whose hatred of the Scotch rebels seemed to increase with the success of their arms. Though suffering under a complication of diseases, and so weak as to be scarcely able to bestride his horse, the earl vehemently urged Charles to continue the war, and to carry his end went so far as to threaten with instant death all persons who should enter into communication with the enemy. In the meanwhile, petitions arrived from many parts of England entreating the king to make peace, and some of them being presented by two noblemen at court, Lord Howard and Lord Wharton, the earl caused them to be arrested, convoked a court-martial, and presiding over it, demanded that they should be shot at the head of the army, as abettors of revolt. The officers composing the court listened in silence to the fierce language of Strafford, none of them daring to oppose him; but a pause occurring, the marquis of Hamilton arose, and addressed the furious earl. "My lord," said he, "when this sentence of yours is pronounced, are you sure of the troops?" Strafford turned away his head, as if struck by a sudden revelation.

It was well known all through the camp of the royal army that the commander-in-chief was the one man hated above all others by the soldiers, and that on the first tumult arising, a thousand swords would be pointed to his breast, instead of against the enemy. The earl did not shut altogether his eyes to the fact, and trembling lest his power should be suddenly crushed under the weight of his unpopularity, he tried to work upon the king through Laud. "Let his majesty but speak the word," he wrote to the primate, "and I will make the Scots go hence faster than they came: I would answer for it on my life. But the instructions must come from another than me." Laud but feebly supported his friend; and Charles, beholding the general hatred rising up against Strafford, due as much to his arrogant and irritable temper, aggravated by disease, as to his despotic inclinations, openly turned his back upon him, showing his readiness to desert him at the first opportunity. The king, all of a sudden, appeared to be seized with indescribable alarm, and absolutely helpless in his consternation. He could not make up his mind to negotiate with the Scotch army, rising before him like a gigantic specter, and yet he could not help perceiving that the humiliation was unavoidable, for the mob of soldiers around him went melting fast, deserting in companies and regiments, while an active correspondence with the Covenanters was carried on in his own immediate neighbourhood and under his very eyes. In his despair, wavering and undecided which way to turn, Charles on a sudden adopted a hint whispered by one of the courtiers, and summoned a Great Council of Peers of the realm to meet him at York. Such an assembly as this had not been called together since the feudal ages, and was altogether obsolete and out of place; nevertheless the king hoped it would impose by its time-worn character itself, and serve as a substitute for a parliament, while implicitly obedient to the crown. He evidently was further than ever from understanding the wants of his age and the desires of his subjects.

The Great Council of Peers met at York on the 24th of September, and the first decision come to was to appoint sixteen commissioners to treat with the Scotch army, and the second to advise the king to summon a parliament without delay. Charles felt amazed at the proceedings of the lords, entirely different from what he had been led to expect. However, resistance now had become impossible, and while withholding his immediate assent to the call of a parliament, he permitted the beginning of peace negotiations. The sixteen commissioners, eight earls and eight barons, at once set out for Ripon, to confer with an equal number of delegates from the army of the Covenanters, the latter having taken possession of part of Yorkshire, and the whole counties of Northumberland and Durham. As victorious party, the Scotch delegates had to put their terms, which were that all the acts of their late parliament and of the General Assembly should be ratified by the king; that the earl of Strafford and archbishop Laud should be brought to trial as "incendiaries;" and, finally, that the forces of the Covenanters should keep possession of all the places they occupied, and be maintained at the expense of the crown until the complete restoration of order, both in England and Scotland. The two last demands sounded harsh in the ears of the English lords, and gave rise to a pause in the negotiations; but the ultimate and most important article was yielded to at length from necessity, while the Scotch commissioners dropped the point concerning the trial of Laud and Strafford.

The result of the negotiations was a provisional agreement stipulating that the Scotch troops should receive regular wages from the Royal Treasury, the pay to begin at once, at the rate of eight hundred and fifty pounds sterling per day, and that they should not be disbanded until peace had been established on a durable basis. Charles gave his signature to the agreement, but could give no more, his treasury being absolutely empty, so that to procure the requisite funds for salaried Leslie's soldiers, the lords had to look to their own resources. After some deliberation, they sent four of their number to London, to raise a loan of two hundred thousand pounds from the City merchants, on the understanding of their being personally and jointly answerable for the debt. The merchants were not unwilling to lend their money on these terms, but added the condition that the government should issue at once writs for the meeting of a parliament, and that the final instalments of the loan should not be paid before the representatives of the nation had actually assembled. The demand was unnecessary, for the step of summoning another parliament had already been forced upon the king, now so helpless as to be a sovereign little more than in name. Strafford alone, of all his advisers, continued to put a bold front to the dark aspect of political affairs; but even he dared no longer to oppose the cry of the whole nation for a parliament, and only trusted to the chance of rushing, by the force of courage and of intrigue, through the dangers of the coming inevitable storm. Thus left entirely alone in his pride, his fear, and his sense of profound humiliation, Charles set his hand to a document prepared by the lord-keeper convening the lords and commons of the realm to meet at Westminster on the 3rd of November. A more important paper the king had never signed in his life than this one, creating the "Long Parliament."

England was stirred to its deepest depths all through the month of October, one thousand six hundred and forty. Every one, whether high or low, rich or poor, Protestant or Catholic, felt that the parliament to be elected would decide the fate of the kingdom more than any that had sat before, and great accordingly were the efforts of all parties to return men worthy of the situation. The struggle in one town, Cambridge, left on record by an eyewitness, was a picture of what went on all through the country. Cambridge had to return two members, and there were four candidates, two of whom, Sir Nathaniel Finch and Mr. Thomas Moantys, were specially and urgently recommended by the lord-keeper, Sir John Finch who possessed great influence in the town, while the other two were only of local fame. The last of the four candidates was a man who had sat in the third parliament of the reign for the borough of Huntingdon, of which he was then an inhabitant, but which he quitted afterwards to live on a large estate in the Isle of Ely, left to him by an uncle, where he took to farming and preaching Puritan doctrines, carrying on both in such a vigorous manner as to earn for himself the title of "Lord of the Fens." The name of this "lord" was Oliver Cromwell, and it was he who came to stand as candidate for Cambridge in the election of 1640.

The occasion was somewhat accidental. "Whilst Master Oliver Cromwell continued at Ely," a contemporary left on record, "there were discourses of new writs issuing out for the parliament, and about the same time, or a little before, it was the hap of one Richard Tyms, since alderman of Cambridge, and a man generally known, to be at a conventicle—as he usually every Sunday rode to the Isle of Ely for that purpose, having a brother who entertained him in his course—where he heard this Oliver with such admiration that he thought there was not such a precious man in the nation, and took such a liking to him that from that time he did nothing but ruminate and meditate of the man and his gifts. This Richard Tyms, before the writs were issued out, began to hammer in his head a project for getting Oliver chosen a Burgess for Cambridge, he himself being one of the electors. With this device he presently repaired to one Mr. Wildbore, a draper, a kinsman of Cromwell's, and after some commendatory language of Oliver, propounded to him the choosing of him Burgess, but to which Wildbore answered that it was impossible because he was no freeman of the town. This almost dashed the project; notwithstanding, as he was returning home, his mind gave him to ask the advice of his neighbour Ibbot, a tallow-chandler, whom he found working in his frock, but who gave him the same answer, and thereupon Tyms concluded to surcease the design, and departed. But before he was far from the house, Ibbot, hankering after the business, had thought of an expedient, and caused him to be called back, when he told him that the mayor had power to make a freeman: 'and,' saith he, 'you know Mr. Kitchenman, the attorney—who was a Puritan likewise—he and the mayor have married two sisters: it is possible he may persuade his brother to confer his freedom upon Oliver Cromwell; and to that purpose, you, and I, and Wildbore, will go to Mr. Kitchenman's presently, and speak to him about the business.' The scheme was carried out with wisdom and energy, and the worthy tallow-chandler, draper, and friends, fair representatives of the rising middle classes of England, sent the "Lord of the Fens" to represent Cambridge in parliament. A notable entry in the registers of the Cambridge corporation attested their success: "October 27th, 1640, magister Robson, Mayor. This day, the greatest part of the burgesses of this town being present in the hall, have chosen for burgesses of the next ensuing parliament for this town, Oliver Cromwell, esquire, and John Lowry, of the common council." As in the old university town on the Cam, so in most other places in the kingdom, Puritanism defeated episcopacy in the elections, and drapers and tallow-chandlers rode on the back of courtiers and lords.

All England seemed to have undergone a mighty change at the meeting of the new parliament, on Tuesday the 3rd of November, exactly a week after Oliver Cromwell, esquire, had been chosen member for Cambridge. "There was observed," Clarendon noted down, "a marvellous elated countenance in most of the members of parliament before they met together in the house; the same men who six months before were observed to be of very moderate tempers, and to wish that gentle remedies might be applied, without opening the wound too wide, and exposing it to the air, and rather to cure what was amiss than too strictly to make inquisition into the causes and origin of the malady, talked now in another dialect." John Pym, member for Tavistock, meeting Edward Hyde, member for Wootton-Basset, the future Lord Clarendon, some days before the opening of the session, observed to him, "that they must now be of another temper than they were the last parliament; that they must not only sweep the house clean below, but must pull down all the cobwebs which hung in the top and corners, that they might not breed dust, and so make a foul house hereafter; and that they had now an opportunity to make their country happy, by removing all grievances, and pulling up the causes of them by the roots."

were energetically opposed to the principle of absolute authority which he had adopted as rule of government, and to which he was obstinately determined to adhere. On the very morning when he was to go and open parliament, the cup of bitterness of Charles was filled to overflowing by a piece of ill news which upset the last of his hopes. Preparing for the parliamentary campaign, the king had fixed upon Sir Thomas Gardiner, recorder of London, as speaker of the commons, he being warmly attached to his cause and at the same time of considerable personal influence, "a man of gravity and quickness, that had somewhat of authority and gracefulness in his person and presence." Unfortunately for the expectations reposing in the choice, Charles did not keep his own counsel, but made his wish public, and from that moment the doors of all the election halls were shut against Sir Thomas Gardiner. The city of London, though having scarcely ever before refused a recorder who offered to become its representative, would not hear of Sir John as soon as it became known that his election was ardently desired by the king; and so great was the opposition against him that not even his name was allowed to be brought forward. The same happened in a number of other places, where the whole power of government was exerted to secure his return; and at the very last moment, when the king had already put on his royal robes to go to the House of Lords, he was informed that the man whom he wished to be, above all others, in parliament, would not be there. His mortification was so great as to make him postpone the opening of the session till the afternoon, "by which time he was to think of another speaker." The choice was a very difficult one under the circumstances, and scanning anxiously again and again over the lists of members, the king at last "pitched upon" William Lenthall, a benchler of Lincoln's Inn, and, according to Clarendon, "a man of a very narrow, timorous nature, and of no experience or conversation in the affairs of the kingdom, beyond what the very drudgery in his profession, in which all his design was to make himself rich, engaged him in." Having appointed the speaker, and somewhat roused himself from his deep despondency, Charles went into parliament, but eschewing all the usual pomp of royalty, and going, almost secretly, in his private barge to St. Margaret's stairs, and from thence through the church into the house of lords. The sea of stern and austere faces meeting him was not made to reassure the gloomy king. Besides the lords, spiritual and temporal, one hundred and forty-seven in number, there were four hundred and ninety-three members of the lower house, and, as reported by the representative of Wootton-Bassot, "not many members were absent." The assembly altogether "had a sad and a melancholy aspect upon the first entrance, which presaged some unusual and unnatural events."

In his speech from the throne, Charles showed a singular mixture of humiliation and conceit. He began by assuring both houses of parliament that he did now freely put himself upon the love and affection of his subjects, and desired them to consider the best means to make the realm both happy inwardly and secure against outward enemies. To carry out their and his desires, he assured them moreover, that he would "heartily concur" to give "satisfaction of their just grievances," in order "that the world might see his intentions to make England a glorious and flourishing kingdom." So far the address was fit enough for the occasion; but now the king launched out in an episode not a little offensive to his hearers. "I leave it to your consideration, my lords and gentlemen," he exclaimed, "what dishonour and mischief it might be, first, if for want of money my army be disbanded before the rebels be put out of the kingdom; secondly, if the securing against the calamities the northern people endure at this time is left so long as the treaty is on foot. In this I say, not only they, but all this kingdom will suffer the harm: therefore I leave this all to your consideration." It showed little wisdom on the part of the king to designate as "rebels" the dearest allies of the parliamentary majority he was addressing, and they audibly expressed their extreme dissatisfaction.

Charles had no sooner finished his short address, when Lord-keeper Finch arose, and gave vent to a very elaborate speech, full of flowers of rhetoric, of bombast, and of servility. He tried to impress upon the lords and commons the conviction, of which he declared himself full, that excepting the presence of the impious "rebels" in the north, the condition of the realm was the most happy and blessed it could possibly be; that all things were in a state of perfection, and that the golden age had returned for England. After drawing a full-length portrait of the king, whom he described as absolutely angelic in nature, endowed with all the gifts ever bestowed by heaven upon mortal beings, and all but godlike in soul and body, he went on to give an outline of some other figures in the golden-age picture. "Behold the king," Sir John cried, lifting up his hands, "in another part of himself, in his dearest consort, our gracious queen, the mirror of virtue, from whom, since her happy arrival, now after three lustres of years, never any subject received other than gracious and benign influence; and I dare avow, as she is nearest and dearest to our sovereign, so there is none whose affections and endeavours, his majesty only excepted, have, or do, or can co-operate more to the happy success of this parliament, and the never-to-be equalled joy and comfort of a right understanding between the king and his people. Then behold him in his best image, our excellent young prince, and the rest of the royal and lively progeny, in whom we cannot but promise to ourselves to have our happiness perpetuated. From the throne, turn your eyes to the two supporters of it; on the one side, the stem of honour, the nobility and clergy; on the other side, the gentry and commons. Where was there, or is there, in any part of the world, a nobility so numerous, so magnanimous, and yet with such a temper that they neither eclipse the throne nor overtop the people, but keep in a distance fit for the greatness of the throne? Where was there a commonwealth so free, and the balance so equally held as here? And, certainly, so long as the beam is duly held it cannot be otherwise." The Puritans listened in grim silence to the soft-flowing balderdash from the lips of the lord-keeper, probably not without secret thoughts, on the part of John Pym and friends, of sweeping away the oily old sycophant among other "cobwebs" breeding dust and obscuring the light in the fair realm of England.

After the formal opening by the king, the two houses of parliament spent several days in preparations, and on Friday, the 6th of November, the actual work of the session commenced. The aspect of the House of Commons was altogether remarkable. The commons, now as before, met in St. Stephen's Chapel, a long narrow chamber of the fourteenth century, with a western entrance and a large eastern window, in advance of the middle of which, at the distance of some few feet, stood the speaker's chair. The members were seated on rows of benches placed parallel to the walls of the chapel, and rising, as in an amphitheatre, from an open space in the centre of the nave. Besides the benches on the ground floor, another row was placed around the members' gallery, the ascent to which was by a "ladder" placed on the southern or right-hand corner from the entrance. On the floor of the house, at a short distance from the speaker's chair, and in front of it stood the clerk's table, at which were seated, facing the entry, two men of note, both authors, Henry Elsyng, chief clerk of the House of Commons, a native of Battersea and Oxford master of arts, and John Rushworth, assistant clerk, of a good Northumberland family, barrister of Lincoln's Inn, actively occupied in leisure hours to gather documents, great and small, into bundles of "Historical Collections," important to posterity.

Most of the members of the lower house of parliament occupied fixed seats, the position of some of which Sir Simonds D'Ewes, member for Sudbury, noted down in his "Journal." "At the upper end of the front bench," the diary records, "on the speaker's right, sits the elder Vane, secretary of state and treasurer of the king's household; and on the same side of the house Sir Edward Herbert, solicitor-general, Sir Thomas Jermyn, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Sir John Evelyn, Sir Henry Mildmay, William Strode, Alderman Isaac Pennington, Walter Long, and Sir John Culpeper. On this side, and exactly opposite the north end of the clerk's table, sit Edward Hyde and Lord Falkland, and, at the lower end, a taker of notes, Framlingham Gawdy by name." On this side also sat Oliver Cromwell, and not far off John Hampden, his kinsman. On the opposite benches, to the left of the speaker, facing Edward Hyde, sat Sir Simonds D'Ewes, author of the "Journal," and next to him John More, member for Liverpool, likewise "a taker of notes." Just under Sir Simonds was the place of "the younger Vane," son of the secretary of state, and direct opponent of his sire in politics; and near him were seated Oliver St. John, Donzil Holles, and Sir William Lewis, member for Petersfield. "Behind John More sit Henry Martin, Sir Thomas Barrington, and Sir Walter Erle: John Pym sits on the same side, close to the bar of the house, and by him Sir John Hotham," member for Beverley, professing great devotion to the popular cause, but secretly attached to the court. Among the other members sitting on this side, the left, of the speaker, were Arthur Goodwin, colleague of John Hampden in the representation of Buckinghamshire, Miles Corbett, Sir Thomas Bowyer, and Edmund Waller. In the gallery, reached by the "ladder," sat Sir Arthur Heselrige and Robert Holborne, one of Hampden's counsel in the ship-money trial; while under the gallery sat John Selden, member for the university of Oxford, "usually styled," according to Anthony a Wood, "the great dictator of learning of the English nation." Thus sat in the dim chapel of St. Stephen's the men whom England had sent to recast its national life.

The business of the house was opened by Sir Miles Fleetwood, who moved that a message should be sent to the lords, to ask that they would join with them in a day of fast and solemn prayer. It was agreed to unanimously, and the message despatched at once. "My lords," it ran, "the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the House of Commons having taken into serious consideration the weighty occasion of this assembly of parliament, concerning the true worship of Almighty God, the safety and welfare of the king and this whole realm, and well knowing the right way to obtain a blessed issue thereof is to implore the Divine assistance, the fountain of all wisdom and unity, to direct them in all their consultations, by one day's solemn humiliation in fasting and prayer, have commanded us, in confidence of your lordships' great piety, to desire you that you would be pleased to join with them to move his Majesty for his gracious allowance of so holy a preparation to the important affairs of both houses of parliament; which being first began and done here, as an example, that he would be pleased to appoint also a day for a general fast through the whole kingdom." Before the lords had returned their reply, the commons, anxious to lose no time, went to the appointment of a number of "grand committees," or congresses of the whole house, ordering that they should go into committee at two o'clock every afternoon; on Mondays, on the subject of religion; on Tuesdays, concerning trade; on Wednesdays, on grievances; and on Fridays, for courts of justice and privileges. Next John lym rose, and moved, "That in regard the complaints of the king's subjects in Ireland were many, who had undergone great oppression in that kingdom by mal government there, and had come to this parliament for relief, they might be referred to a committee of the whole house, to be appointed for that purpose only."

The motion gave rise to a lengthened debate, in which strong remarks were made upon the course of despotism inaugurated by the earl of Strafford, who, it was said, had "in all places where his service hath been used by the king, raised ample monuments of his tyrannical power," so as to prove himself "the principal author and promotor of all those counsels that exposed the kingdom to ruin." Sir John Clotworthy, member for Maldon, whose chief residence was in Ireland, spoke strongly "of the great abuse in the government there;" and though he was sparing in allusions to the lord-lieutenant, yet he was so plain in his description of his actions, as not to leave a doubt against whom his accusations were directed. The friends of Strafford at once protested "that this motion, as intended, by a side-wind, to accumulate complaints against him, in order to an accusation," which led them to move for a select committee, that the objects of the inquiry might be restricted to certain specific points, and the great general question of the government of Ireland might not come into discussion. It was the first party struggle that arose; and it ended by a vote adopting the motion of John Pym, that the whole house should go into committee on Irish affairs. Strafford fully comprehended the meaning of the vote, and hurrying up to London from York, where he had been with the army, entreated the king to allow him to reassume his post at Dublin, where his enemies could not reach him. But Charles, thinking that the services of the earl might yet be useful to him, would not consent; and in reply to his alarms, pledged his royal word that "as he was king of England he would secure him against any danger, and that parliament should not touch one hair of his head."

Strafford's interview with the king did not remain a secret; and knowing the daring character of the man, and full of disquietude that he might be harbouring some fresh scheme of violence, the parliamentary leaders determined to strike him down at once. The earl had arrived at court on Monday, the ninth of November; on the tenth he was confined to his bed by illness; and on Wednesday, the eleventh, John Pym rose, and stating that there was business of great weight to be commenced, desired that the lobby without might be cleared, and that the doors of the house be locked and the key laid upon the table. This done, Pym stood forward again, and in a long, earnest, and eloquent speech, impeached the earl of Strafford of treason against the commonwealth. After dwelling upon the miserable state and condition of the realm, due, he said, to a few usurpers of power, who had "contrived maliciously, and upon deliberation, to change the whole frame of government, and to deprive the nation of all the liberty and property which was their birthright by the laws of the land," he pointed to the chief malefactor. "Though I doubt not," he cried, "there may be found many of the class who have contributed by their joint endeavours to bring this misery upon the nation, yet there is one more signal in the administration than the rest. He is a man of great parts and contrivance, and of great industry to bring what he designed to pass: a man who in the memory of many present hath sat in this house as an earnest vindicator of the laws, and a most zealous assertor and champion of the liberties of the people, but who long since hath turned apostate from these good affections, and, according to the custom and nature of apostates, hath become the greatest enemy to the liberties of the country, and the greatest promoter of tyranny that any age hath produced." Then he named "Thomas, the earl of Strafford, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and lord-president of the council established in York for the northern parts of the kingdom;" moreover, "minister of great credit with the king and influence upon his counsels."

Pym had not finished his speech when there was a loud knocking at the door, caused by some messengers from the House of Lords. Affixious to learn what the commons were doing within their closed doors, the peers sent them an invitation to meet for a conference in the "Painted Chamber," in order to hear a report from the lords commissioners appointed to treat with the commanders of the Scottish army. The stratagem took no effect in breaking up the deliberation of the commons, and they merely returned an answer that they were "in agitation of very weighty and important affairs," so as to be unable to give their lordships the desired interview at once. The debate was then resumed, and a committee of seven members appointed to specify the charges against the earl of Strafford. On the committee were John Pym, John Hampden, William Strode, Oliver St. John, Sir Walter Erle, Lord Digby, and Sir John Clotworthy. They soon returned with the points of the accusation drawn out in full; upon which the commons passed an unanimous vote that the lord-lieutenant of Ireland should be forthwith accused at the bar of the upper house of high treason. By another vote, Pym was appointed to be spokesman for the occasion; and the doors being thrown open, between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, the leader of the commons issued forth, followed by above four hundred members, "and crossed over in the full sight of the assembled crowd to the house of lords."

Advancing, head erect and with proud dignity, to the bar, Pym declared his errand. "My lords," he exclaimed, "the knights, citizens, and burgesses now assembled for the commons in parliament, have received information of divers traitorous designs and practices of a great peer of this house, and by virtue of a command from them I do here, in the name of all the commons in parliament, accuse Thomas, earl of Strafford, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, of high treason. They have further commanded me to desire your lordships that he may be sequestered from parliament and forthwith committed to prison. They have further commanded me to let you know that they will within a very few days resort to your lordships with the particular articles and grounds of this accusation; and they do further desire that your lordships will think upon some convenient and fit way that the passage betwixt England and Ireland for his majesty's subjects of both kingdoms may be free, notwithstanding any restraint to the contrary." Strafford was at Whitehall with the king when the doors of the House of Commons were thrown open, and receiving instant notice of the step taken against him, he hurried into parliament to prevent the peers from granting the impeachment. His friends sought to retain him, yet he would not stop; and crying, "I will go and look mine accusers in the face," he tore himself away, and rushed into the House of Lords.

But Strafford had no sooner taken his seat, when cries from all sides commanded him to withdraw. For a while he disregarded the clamour, till, on its increasing in vehemence, the lord-keeper arose, telling him to leave, and charging the usher of the black rod to look well after him. But he still refused to give way, and would not retire before he had addressed the house. He began by lamenting "his great misfortune to lie under so heavy a charge," and stanchly professing his innocence, declared that he should be able to make it clear as noonday to all the world. In the meanwhile he desired that he might have his liberty "until some guilt should be made to appear;" warning the peers that if they were to commit him to prison upon the general charge, formulated against him with not the slightest proofs appended, they would go forth on a dangerous path, likely to be fatal "as a precedent to their own privilege and birthright." Having given vent to this burst of indignation, the earl retired, remaining in the lobby until the lords had discussed the manner of their proceeding "upon an impeachment in such general terms." The debate lasted little more than half an hour, after which Strafford was called in, and ordered to kneel at the bar. Having gone off his knees, with great reluctance, the lord-keeper read to him the decision of the peers. "My lord of Strafford," said he, "the House of Commons, in their own name and in the name of the whole commons of England, have this day accused your lordship to the lords of the upper house of parliament of high treason. The articles they will in a very few days produce, and in the mean time they have desired of the lords, and we have accordingly resolved, that your lordship shall be committed in safe custody to the gentleman-usher, and be sequestered from the house till your lordship shall clear yourself of the accusations which shall be laid against you." The earl bowed, and rising, attempted to address the house once more, but was prevented by the usher of the black rod leading him away. After a short stay in his own house he was conducted to the Tower.

The impeachment of Strafford, a masterstroke of energetic policy, in an instant and with all but marvellous rapidity overturned the whole fabric of government, leaving the House of Commons absolute ruler of England. It would have been not only practicable, but probably easy, for the king to dissolve parliament the day before, but the day after it was absolutely impossible. The arrest of the great earl, pillar of despotism, and the only man of the royal party who understood and dared to preach the doctrine of divine right kingship with the sword as well as with the lips, struck terror into the ranks of all the enemies of parliament. Those who had abused it loudest previously now became its humblest servitors, eagerly anxious to spring forward and obey its wishes. Before a single law had been passed in their favour, the whole of the Puritan ministers, as if by common consent, resumed possession of the pulpits and livings from which they had been expelled by the "Canterburian faction;" all the dissenting sects assembled publicly, without the least hindrance; and pamphlets and books of every description denouncing the enemies of the popular cause, or calling for reforms and changes, circulated in full liberty. The main desire of the whole tribe of courtiers and crown servants all at once seemed to be either to go over to the dominant party, or to hide themselves and pass unnoticed in the crowd; and the king himself attempted to conceal his alarm and uneasiness under the veil of complete apathy. Thus while royal and episcopal despotism was still standing nominally upright, and to all appearance untouched, with its full mechanism of judges, bishops, dignitaries in church and state, rites and ceremonies, the machine itself had become already motionless and powerless.

There was no intention to leave the dead hull in existence; but in the meanwhile other and more important matters had to be attended to. The great foe of freedom, Strafford, having been safely lodged in the Tower, the smaller foes were left alone for a short time, during which some pressing affairs had to be despatched. The first of these was the conclusion of a cordial agreement with the army of the Covenanters, which was effected by the sending of parliamentary commissioners to Durham, and the invitation to the king's "rebels" to send deputies to London to confer with the commons. A sum of one hundred thousand pounds, to be raised by assessment on the counties, was voted at the same time for the maintenance of the two armies in the north; and to defray immediate necessities a loan was demanded from the city merchants, and granted without the least difficulty. The chiefs of the Covenanters answered the invitation of sending envoys to the English capital very quickly, despatching a score of military officers and diplomatists, accompanied by as many divines. Among the latter was Robert Baillie, a learned and zealous minister of the kirk, who noted down various curious things he saw on the road. His party, travelling by post, was joined by "divers merchants and their servants," mounted on "little nags," which took them over the wild expanse of rock and moorland intervening between the Tyne and the Thames much more comfortably than the lumbering boxes upon wheels. The so-called "road" was "extremely foul and deep," and what did not reconcile the frugal travellers to it was to find "all the inns like palaces." "No marvel," Robert Baillie cries, "they extortion their guests: for three meals, coarse enough, we would pay, together with our horses, sixteen or seventeen pounds sterling." At Doncaster, the Presbyterian minister was "content to buy a woven waistcoat;" nevertheless, when arrived in London he had to preach to the commissioners at home, "having no cloaths for outgoing." He was extremely surprised at all that he heard and saw in the English capital, marvelling how a revolution like that which his eyes beheld could have been wrought during the four or five weeks the new parliament had been in session. "Episcopacy itself," he noted, "is beginning to be cried down, and a covenant to be cried up; some petitions have come from the town of London and a world of men, for the abolition of bishops, deans, and all their appurtenances, but it has been thought good to delay them till the parliament have pulled down Canterbury and some primo bishops. . . . Huge things are here in working: the mighty hand of God be about this great work."

Robert Baillie was right in thinking that to "pull down Canterbury and some prime bishops" would be the next great movement of the commons. From the moment of the arrest of Strafford, the fate of Laud and his chief adherents was sealed; but the abject demeanour of the primate, who went crawling in the dust so as to allow the storm to pass over his head, saved him for a few weeks, till at last, in the middle of December, the inevitable thunderbolt was hurled against him. On the 18th of the month, Denzil Holles, member for Dorchester, stood up in the House of Commons denouncing William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, as a "chief incendiary" in the government, and formulating against him an accusation of high treason. The motion was supported by several among them Harbottle Grimstone, the colleague of Denzil Holles. "Who is it but he only," Grimstone cried, "that hath brought the earl of Strafford to all his great places and employments? Who is it but he only that hath advanced all our popish bishops? I shall name but some of them: Bishop Wainwaring, the bishop of Bath and Wells, the bishop of Oxford, and he of Ely, Bishop Wren, the least of all these birds, but one of the most unclean." The impeachment of Laud was voted unanimously, and Denzil Holles carried the message to the bar of the lords. Somewhat to his surprise, the peers, temporal and spiritual, instantly admitted the accusation, and Lord-keeper Finch, with extraordinary zeal and alacrity, ordered the archbishop into the custody of the usher of the black rod, to be provisionally guarded in his own house, for ultimate transference to the Tower.

The zeal of Sir John Finch was due to the dark apprehension that his own time was coming, which occasioned frantic attempts to stave off the fatal hour by complete submission and the most servile attitude towards the new rulers. However, the lord-keeper's hopes of being pardoned the sins of the past by becoming an apostate, were all in vain, and but two days after he had sent his great patron, the archbishop, to prison, an indictment against himself was carried to the bar of the lords. Sir John behaved with consummate prudence on the occasion, and depositing the great seal of state on the woolsack, while placing himself as a poor suitor behind it, he entreated the messengers from the commons to allow him, before handing in the impeachment, to say a few words in his defence in their house. The permission was granted after some hesitation, whereupon the lord-keeper marched into St. Stephen's chapel, assuming an air of the most contrite humility, and delivered, "with an excellent grace and gesture, a most elegant and ingenious speech, partly a vindication of his conduct, partly a submissive appeal to their feelings and their favour," effecting so much as "to move many men to a kind of compassion." The soft flow of his rhetoric was interrupted for a moment by Alexander Rigby, member for Wigan. "Had not this syren so sweet a tongue," Rigby cried, "surely he could not have done so much mischief to this kingdom." Disregarding the obtrusion, and becoming more "elegant and ingenious" as he went on, Sir John continued talking till the time when he knew the lords had risen, after which it became impossible to deliver his impeachment at the bar of the upper house. With some misgivings as to having been enticed into a serious blunder, the commons adjourned thereupon till the next day, the 21st of December, intending to prosecute the indictment against the lord chancellor, and got him arrested early in the morning. But Sir John, feeling no inclination to become martyr in any cause, good or bad, furtively quitted his house at midnight, and making his way to the coast, safely got into Holland, in a disguise fitting him exceedingly well, that of an old woman.

The flight of the lord-keeper served but to quicken the zeal of the commons in punishing the oppressors of the nation. Notwithstanding his escape, he was voted formally guilty of high treason, the charge-sheet enumerating four causes, namely, "disobedience to the house, in refusal to speak at their command when he was speaker in parliament, in the fourth year of King Charles;" "for threatening some judges in the matter of ship money;" "for illegal and cruel judgments when lord justice of the common pleas;" and "for drawing that injurious declaration after dissolution of the last parliament." The decree for the arrest of the lord-keeper, wherever he should be found, having been issued, the commons proceeded with vigour against other delinquents. On the 22nd of December, Sir William Beecher, one of the dependants of the fugitive lord-keeper, was committed to the Fleet prison for several illegal acts of which he had been guilty; on the 23rd, six of the judges in the ship-money trial, Berkeley, Bramston, Crawley, Davenport, Trevor, and Weston, were compelled to give heavy securities to abide the judgment of parliament for their conduct; and on the 24th, a charge was filed against John Piers, bishop of Bath and Wells, of having made "innovations" in religion, and he was bound in ten thousand pounds to answer the charges against him.

To distribute rewards as well as punishments, the House of Commons at the same time, on the proposition of a special committee appointed to consider the case of sufferers for the popular cause, decreed that five thousand pounds should be paid to William Prynne, author of the "Histrio-Mastix," who had been so cruelly punished by Laud; and that sums to the same amount should be given to several other Puritans, notably, Henry Burton, a clergyman, and John Bastwick, a physician, who had been, with Prynne, the victims of the archbishop's despotism. They had been kept in dungeons in the isles of Scilly, Jersey, and Guernsey, up to the time of the opening of parliament; but so immediate was the influence of the new power even upon their fate, that Laud had given the order for their release before the session had lasted a week. Two of the sufferers, Prynne and Burton, arrived in London on the same day, the 28th of November, escorted in a triumphant manner, "being met upon the way," as told by the "secretary for the parliament," Thomas May, "some few miles from London, and brought into the city by five thousand persons, both men and women, on horseback, who all of them wore in their hats rosemary and bays in token of joy." Robert Baillie, too, saw the procession enter the city. "Burton and Prynne," he noted down, "came through the most of the city triumphantly; never here such a like show. About a thousand horse, and, as some of good note say, above four thousand; above a hundred coaches, and, as many say, above two hundred; with a world of foot, every one with their rosemary branch. Bastwick is not yet come from Scilly." The latter, very popular with the citizens of the capital for the boldness of his attacks upon Laud, which he had continued in prison from which he managed to fulminate letters and pamphlets, arrived in London ten days after his fellow-sufferers, and was received with even greater demonstrations of joy and triumph. He was escorted by the train bands and an army of horsemen, banners flying and trumpets sounding, and, night coming on before the procession had reached London, the whole city blazed up in a glare of torches. Look-

From the commencement of the session, the inhabitants of the capital had shown the most lively interest in the parliamentary proceedings, which increased soon to such an extent as to make them all but rehearse the debates in their houses and at the street corners. The loudest joy was shown at the news of Strafford's arrest; but not seeing it followed immediately by that of Laud, the citizens deemed it their duty to prompt the action of the commons by a monster petition. The petition, which was covered by twenty thousand signatures, and presented by Alderman Isaac Pennington, one of the members for the city, who was accompanied when carrying it to the house by a crowd nearly as large as that which had escorted Prynne, Burton, and Bastwick into London, demanded nothing less than the total abolition of the state church. It was argued by the petitioners that, episcopal government having proved very prejudicial and extremely dangerous to the commonwealth and to true religion, and the bishops having come to claim authority by divine right instead of their former simple tenure by appointment, mere reform of the abuses had been made impossible, and nothing remained but "total extirpation" of the mighty evil, which was but popery in a fresh shape. The prayer of the petition, on these grounds, was that episcopacy might be abolished, with all its dependencies, "roots and branches;" that all laws in its behalf might be repealed and made void, and that a new church government might be established "according to God's word rightly placed."

The demands went considerably further than the commons were as yet prepared to go, and all that was decided, therefore, after a long and warm debate, was that the petition "should not be rejected," but remain in the hands of the clerk of the house, with instruction, however, "that no copy of it should be given." At the same time, to appease the clamour of the twenty thousand signers of the petition, not very well content with a vote merely shelving their request, and declaring neither for nor against it, the commons decided to appoint immediately a new committee "to inquire of scandalous ministers." Some of the most zealous Puritan members having been nominated to serve upon this committee, which was invested with extensive powers it soon became a formidable engine for overthrowing, if not episcopal government, at least episcopal governors. The committee found, as reported by Thomas May, "two kinds of scandalous ministers; either loose livers, and men of a debauched behaviour, for many such were gotten into good preferments, and countenanced, to affront the Puritans, or else offenders in way of superstition. Of the former sort, many were in a short time accused, by degrees censured, and turned out of their livings; of the latter sort, there was no small number of offenders, nor in likelihood could that which had been the way to all high preferments want walkers in it." The number of clergy thus expelled, or otherwise "brought to torment," was very great; according to Thomas May, "it seemed a little doomsday."

In the mean time, while carrying things with a high

hand, though in a somewhat tumultuous manner, as if startled and perplexed by the sudden possession of immense power, the commons kept on a great task steadily before their eyes, the trial of the earl of Strafford. From the moment of his arrest the parliamentary leaders decided upon making the process against the earl an affair of state, and to put him forward as the incarnation of that despotism which had attempted, although without complete success, to annihilate all the liberties of the nation. In order to draw the attention, not only of all England, Scotland, and Ireland, but of the civilized world towards Strafford, and the defeat of the cause of which he had been the great and not undignified champion, all preparations for the trial were designed on the grandest scale. In the words of the "secretary for the parliament," the forms of proceedings were to be such "that no subject in England, and probably in Europe, ever had the like; so great as to be hardly called the trial of the earl of Strafford only. The king's affections towards his people and parliament, the future success of this parliament, and the hopes of three kingdoms depending on it, were all tried when Strafford was arraigned."

To conduct the proceedings with absolute fairness and justice, and leave no room for accusations that might be brought by the earl's friends of the law of the realm having become the vehicle of a new form of tyranny, more than four months were made to elapse between the arrest and the trial of Strafford, and he was furnished in the mean time with a detailed statement of the whole of the charges brought against him, and allowed the assistance of able lawyers to prepare his defence. The 22nd of March, 1641, was fixed for the commencement of the trial; but the outward preparations for it began as early as January, and were sufficiently large to put the citizens of the capital in a high state of excitement, detracting their attention from almost everything else. "The usual places for administering justice," says John Rushworth, assistant clerk in the House of Commons, and indefatigable taker of notes, "were thought too mean upon so great an occasion, and therefore scaffolds were erected in Westminster Hall, fit to receive so great an assembly as were to attend this trial. His majesty had a closet provided for him, the queen, and prince, near the place where the house of peers sat, to be every day at the trial of the earl, and hear what was said, and see what witnesses were produced, and take a full view of the greatness of the assembly, and yet remain privately in his closet, unseen. Seats were prepared for the lord high-steward and all the House of Lords, who sat as judges; and woollacks were placed for all the justices, or judges, to be their assistants. There were also seats provided for all the commons in parliament, though they came not with their speaker and his mace as a house of parliament, but as a committee of the whole house. Seats were likewise provided for the commissioners of the kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, which made it an assembly of three kingdoms. At the lower end of the scaffold a place was provided for thirteen members of the House of Commons, who were appointed for the earl's prosecutors, to manage the evidence against him; near to them was the place for the prisoner, with a table before him, and a desk to write upon, and a chair was set for him to rest himself when he found it needful. The books of his life, from the time of his admission into the cabinet of his prince's council, were exposed to the world's view; and the most profound learning of the laws of our country, the sharpest wit, and the deepest wisdom of our kingdom were employed to examine and measure what he had done, not only by those rules of justice whereby all our ordinary courts are wisely bound by our ancestors to proceed in the trial of criminals, but by those fundamental rules and maxims of our English government which parliament asserted to be the safeguard both of the king and the people."

The first day of the great trial, Monday, the 22nd of March, was spent in reading the articles of accusation, and the answers, given in writing, of Strafford. On this, as on every subsequent day, as long as the proceedings lasted, the lords were in their places as early as eight o'clock in the morning, while the king was usually half an hour before them. At the very commencement, in his nervous impatience to hear and see everything well, Charles broke down with his own hand the trollys which kept the royal box secret, so as to sit in full view of the public. The illustrious prisoner, upon whom all eyes were directed, far more than towards the king, who was, according to an eye-witness, "little more regarded than as if he had been absent, for the lords sat all covered," was conducted daily in a barge from the Tower to Westminster, in charge of the lieutenant, and surrounded by boats full of armed men. Arrived in the hall he at once took his seat at the desk, attended by four secretaries and several counsel. His behaviour and manners were full of dignity, according to the report of Robert Baillie, daily spectator of the extraordinary scene played off at Westminster Hall, and who went there in order to get a good place "a little after five every morning," or before the sun had risen. "The earl was always," Baillie noted, "in a suit of black, as in doole [mourning]. At the entry he gave a low courtesy; proceeding a little he gave a second; when he came to his desk, a third; then at the bar, the fore-face of his desk, he kneeled, and rising quickly he saluted both sides of the houses and then sat down. Some few of the lords lifted their hats to him."

The indictment against Strafford, which was read on the first day of the trial, consisted of twenty-eight articles, the substance of which was contained in six points, namely, that he had traitorously "endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and constitution of the two kingdoms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary government in their place; that he had traitorously assumed regal power over the lives and persons of the subjects in both kingdoms; that to enrich himself and carry out his traitorous designs, he had diverted public funds to his own private use; that he had traitorously abused the power and authority of his office by encouraging papists, that they might assist him in return; that he had maliciously tried to stir up enmity between the subjects of England and Scotland, and had thus caused the effusion of blood; and that, to preserve himself from being questioned or accused, he had endeavoured to subvert the fundamental rights of parliament. The proofs by which the whole of these articles of accusation were sustained had been drawn from a series of actions extending over the three great divisions of the earl's public life, those of his presidency of the northern provinces of England, of the government of Ireland, and of the rule of England, in the function of chief adviser of the king. As president of the council of the north, Strafford was charged with having procured powers subversive of the laws of England, and with having distinctly announced tyrannical intentions, by declaring that the people should find "the king's little finger heavier than the loins of the law." As governor of Ireland, he was accused of having publicly asserted "that the Irish were a conquered nation, and that the king might do with them as he pleased." As chief minister of England, he was charged with having advised the king to act in defiance of the fundamental laws of the realm, to coin base money, to impose arbitrary taxes, and generally to govern the kingdom by his own authority, without the authority of parliament. The reading of the charges occupied half a day, and the other half was taken up with the replies of the earl, carefully prepared and exceedingly able, but more specious than convincing. "His great object," Thomas May recorded, "was to keep off the blow of high treason, whatsoever misdemeanours should be laid upon him; of which some he denied, others he excused and extenuated with great subtlety, contending, to make one thing good, that misdemeanours, though never so many and so great, could not by being put together make one treason, unless some one of them had been treason in its own nature." Summing up his entire defence in a few words, the earl exclaimed, "I think no indiscretion, or unskillfulness, or passion, or pride of words can amount to treason; as for misdemeanours, I am ready to submit to your justice."

The great struggle commenced on the second day of the trial, when John Pym came forward as chief public prosecutor, in the name of the whole House of Commons, and as spokesman of the thirteen members who had been appointed to conduct Strafford's impeachment. "My lords," the stately orator and great political leader began his charge, "we stand here by the commandment of the knights, citizens, and burgesses now assembled for the commons in parliament, and we are ready to make good that impeachment whereby Thomas, earl of Strafford, stands charged in their name, and in the names of all the commons of England, with high treason. This, my lords, is a great cause, and we might sink under the weight of it, and be astonished with the lustre of this noble assembly, if there were not in the cause strength and vigour to support itself and to encourage us. It is the cause of the king: it concerns his majesty in the honour of his government, in the safety of his person, in the stability of his crown. It is the cause of the kingdom: it concerns not only the peace and prosperity, but even the being of the kingdom. We have the piercing eloquence, the cries, and groans, and tears, and prayers of all the subjects assisting us. We have the three kingdoms, England, Scotland, and Ireland, in travail and agitation with us, bowing themselves, like the hinds spoken of in Job, to cast out their sorrows. Truth and goodness, my lords, they are the beauty of the soul, they are the perfection of all created nature, they are the image and character of God upon the creatures. This beauty, evil spirits and evil men have lost; but yet there are none so wicked but they desire to march under the show and shadow of it, though they hate its reality. This unhappy earl, now the object of your lordships' justice, hath taken as much care, hath used as much cunning, to set the face and countenance of honesty and justice upon his actions, as he hath been negligent to observe the rules of honesty in the performance of all these actions. My lords, it is the greatest baseness of wickedness that it dares not look in its own colour, nor be seen in its natural countenance. But virtue, as it is amiable in all respects, so not the least is that it puts a nobleness, it puts a bravery upon the mind, and lifts it above hopes and fears, above favour and displeasure: it makes it always uniform and constant to itself. The service, my lords, commanded me and my colleagues here to take off the vizard of truth and uprightness which hath been sought to be put upon this cause, and to show you the actions and intentions of the earl in their own natural blackness and deformity."

Pym then went into the detail of the charges against the accused, and his articles of defence, replying to the latter point for point. Through nearly the whole of them ran the ingenious assertion of Strafford, that if he had acted in an arbitrary and despotic manner, which he did not altogether deny, he had been no worse, or more addicted to violence, than his predecessors in office, but rather more moderate. To which Pym replied, eloquently, referring chiefly to the earl's government of Ireland: "He speaks of his moderation, but when you find so many imprisoned of the nobility, so many men, some adjudged to death, some executed without law; when you find so many public rapines, so many soldiers sent to make good his decrees, so many whippings in defence of monopolies, so many jurors, because they would not give verdicts on his side, fined and imprisoned; when you find men of quality disgraced, set on the pillory, and other cruelties, as will appear through our evidence, can you think there was any moderation? And yet truly, my lords, I can believe that though if you compare his courses with those of men in other parts of the world, they will be found beyond all others full of tyranny and harshness; but that if you compare them with his own mind and disposition, perhaps there was moderation. The habit of cruelty in himself, no doubt, is more perfect than any act of cruelty; but if this be moderation, I think all men will, pray to be delivered from it. I may truly say that it is verified in him that 'the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel.'"

Strafford's verbal rejoinder to the imputations of the great leader of the commons was extremely skilful, and marked even by a certain rough eloquence, not unbecoming in a man whose career had been a practical illustration of the dogma of might standing above right. Even now, he did not disguise his fondness for the employment of physical force, acknowledging it in many bold utterances, which gained him the suffrages of all the Roman-Protestant priests, of all the courtiers, and all the ladies. "The clergy in general," Thomas May recorded, "were so much fallen into love and admiration of this earl that the archbishop of Canterbury was almost quite forgotten by them. The courtiers also cried him up; and the ladies, whose voices will carry much with some parts of the state, were exceedingly on his side. It was a very pleasant object to see so many Sempronias—all the chief court ladies filling the galleries at the trial—with pen, ink, and paper in their hands, noting the passages and discoursing upon the grounds of law and state. They were all of his side, whether moved by pity proper to their sex, or by ambition of being thought able to judge of the parts of the prisoner."

But all the love of the "clergy in general," of courtiers, and of "the sex"—the ladies with their soft hearts strangely forgetful that the hero before them had reduced thousands of families to ruin and misery, had shed the blood of human beings as merciless as a butcher in the shambles, and had endeavoured to bury the welfare of whole races under the rod of a barbarous despotism, looking upon nations like mere herds of tame animals—did not and could not avail the illustrious prisoner at the bar. The longer he fought against his prosecutors, the more it became manifest, and clear above any manner of doubt, that both his actions and his counsels had been to break down the barriers of law and of justice, and erect in their stead an edifice of tyranny based solely upon brute force. Among the most striking proofs to this effect was the conduct of the earl on the day of the dissolution of the short parliament of 1640, embodied in the twenty-third article of his impeachment. "The said earl of Strafford," the charge ran, "with the help and assistance of the archbishop of Canterbury, did procure his majesty to dissolve the said parliament upon the fifth day of May last; and upon the same day the said earl of Strafford did treacherously, falsely, and maliciously endeavour to incense his majesty against his loving and faithful subjects who had been members of the House of Commons, by telling his majesty they had denied to supply him; and afterwards, upon the same day, did traitorously and wickedly counsel and advise his majesty to this effect, viz., that having tried the affections of his people, he was loose and absolved from all rules of government, and that he was to do everything that power would admit; and that his majesty had tried all ways and was refused, and should be acquitted towards God and man; and that he had an army in Ireland—meaning the army consisting of Papists, his dependants, as aforesaid—which he might employ to reduce this kingdom." The charge thus formulated was founded wholly on examinations taken before the lords, and was nearly literally in the words of the several witnesses. Feeling conscious that if this part of the accusation against him was clearly proved, he was lost, Strafford exerted himself to the utmost to upset it. Yet all his efforts failed, till at last an almost accidental circumstance furnished overwhelming evidence of his guilt.

From the testimony of the witnesses examined in the upper house, it appeared that the words imputed to Strafford in the twenty-third article of the charge sheet were spoken at a meeting of the privy council, on the question, argued before the king, of finding means and money to carry on war against the people of Scotland. To substantiate the accusation, it was indispensable that all the councillors present at the meeting should come forward at the trial, the consent to which was extorted after great difficulty from the king, he releasing his advisers for the purpose from their official oath of secrecy. On being placed in the witness box, all the privy councillors, with the exception of two, who pleaded defective memory, deposed to Strafford having uttered the first part of the words with which he stood charged; but they professed at the same time not to know anything about the most important portion of the speech, the offer made to the king to bring over the Irish army to reduce England to subjection. The evidence on this point was solely that of the lord-treasurer and chief secretary of state, Sir Henry Vane, the elder, who had been brought to admit, with great reluctance, that the earl had advised the king to the effect, "You have an army in Ireland, and you may employ it to reduce this kingdom." Strafford altogether denied these words, accusing the lord-treasurer that he had invented them to ruin him; and the latter, sincerely attached to the royal cause, and frightened at the weight of his own evidence, which he had not perceived till, too late, seemed ready to admit that he had told an untruth, when a strange incident came to confirm the charge in an unexpected manner.

On the thirteenth day of the great trial, Saturday, the 10th of April, John Pym arose, and produced "a copy of notes taken at a juncture of the privy council for the Scots affairs, on the 5th of May last," which had been taken from the cabinet of the lord-treasurer, abstracted therefrom by his son, Sir Henry Vane the younger. "Secretary Vane being out of town," the story ran, "sent a letter to his son, then in London, with the key of his study, for his son to look in his cabinet for some papers there, to be sent to him. The son, looking over many papers, among them alighted upon these notes, which being of so great concernment to the public, and declaring so much against the earl of Strafford, he held himself bound in duty and conscience to discover them. He showed them to Master Pym, who urged him and prevailed with him that they might be made use of in the evidence against the earl of Strafford, as being most material, and of great consequence in that business." The notes produced contained the abridged report of a discussion that had taken place on the 5th of May in the privy council, in which King Charles, the lord archbishop, and the lord-lieutenant were set down as the principal speakers, under the initials of K. C., L. Arch., and L. L. The most important part of the dialogue between K. C. and L. L. was as follows:—K. C.: "How can we undertake offensive war if we have no money?" L. L.: "Borrow of the city a hundred pounds, and go on vigorously to levy ship-money. Your majesty having tried the affection of your people, you are absolved and loose from all rule of government, and to do what power will admit. Your majesty having tried all ways, and being refused, you shall be acquitted before God and man. And you have an army in Ireland that you may employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience." The lord-treasurer, sobbing violently and wringing his hands, admitted that the notes were his own. Strafford seemed utterly dismayed at the sudden production of the new evidence against him, till, on one of his friends suggesting that "this kingdom" might mean, not England, but Scotland, he roused himself to another effort. After denying again solemnly the charge brought forward in the twenty-third article, he cried: "And suppose I spake the words, which I grant not, yet the word 'this' cannot rationally imply England, because England was not out of the way of obedience, and because there never was any the least intention of landing the Irish army in England. Shall a man's life depend upon a single word?" The last question the lord-lieutenant of Ireland was well able to answer for himself, looking back upon the acts of his own despotism.

On the fifteenth day of the trial, Tuesday, the 13th of April, the earl of Strafford summed up his whole defence in a speech, the grandest he had yet made, in which he put forward a new plea, of high importance from a purely legal point of view. It was that, even admitting that what he had done was wrong, there was no law in existence forbidding it, or setting a penalty upon it; or, in other words, that there was no law in the statute book of England prohibiting a minister from counselling his sovereign to commit actions tending to the overthrow of the national rights and liberties. There was courage needed to set up such a defence, and he showed no want of it, nor of eloquence. "My lords," he exclaimed, rising as if for a final effort, the vast assembly being hushed in silence, "it is hard to be questioned upon a law which cannot be shown. Where hath this fire lain hid so many hundreds of years without any smoke to discover it, till it thus burst forth to consume me and my children? That punishment should precede promulgation of a law; to be punished by a law subsequent to the fact, is extreme hard; what man can be safe if this be admitted? My lords, it is hard in another respect that there should be no token set by which we should know this offence, no admonition by which we should avoid it. If a man pass the Thames in a boat, and split upon an anchor, and no buoy be floating to discover it, he who owneth the anchor shall make satisfaction; but, if a buoy be set there, every man passeth at his own peril. Now, where is the mark, where the token upon this crime, to declare it to be high treason? My lords, be pleased to give that regard to the peerage of England as never to expose yourselves to such moot points, to such constructive interpretations of laws. If there must be a trial of wits, let the subject-matter be of somewhat else than the lives and honours of peers. It will be wisdom for yourselves, for your posterity, and for the whole kingdom, to cast into the fire these bloody and mysterious volumes of constructive and arbitrary treason, as the Christians did their books of curious arts, and betake yourselves to the plain letter of the law, that telleth us what is, and what is not treason, without being more ambitious to be more learned in the art of killing than our forefathers. It is now full two hundred and forty years since any man was touched for this alleged crime, to this height, before myself. Let us not awaken these sleeping lions to our destructions, by raking up a few musty records that have lain by the walls so many ages forgotten or neglected. May your lordships please not to add this to my other misfortunes: let not a precedent be derived from me so disadvantageous as this will be in the consequence to the whole kingdom. Do not, through me, wound the interest of the commonwealth; and, however these gentlemen say they speak for the commonwealth, yet, in this particular, I indeed speak for it, and show the inconveniences and mischiefs that will fall upon it." If this part of the earl's speech was for the brain, the rest was for the feeling of his hearers. "And now, my lords," Strafford concluded his oration, "for my myself I have been, by the blessing of Almighty God, taught that the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of glory which shall be revealed hereafter. And so, my lords, even so, with all tranquillity of mind, I freely submit myself to your judgment; and whether that judgment be of life or death, 'Te Deum laudamus.'" Many of the listeners cried at this noble flight of oratory, which, however, appeared somewhat of the theatrical kind to Robert Baillie and his Scotch friends. "In the end, after some lachrymose and flogging," the honest Presbyterian minister noted down, "he made such a pathetic oration, for an hour and a half, as ever comedian did upon a stage. Doubtless, the matter and expression was exceeding brave: doubtless, if he had grace or civil goodness, he is a most eloquent man."

Pym's reply to Strafford was something more than "a pathetic oration." He began by upsetting the legal subtlety of the man whose whole career had been one long course of illegality, and who now pleaded that there was no special statute to meet his case, by a superb sentence. "The commons," he exclaimed, "charge the earl with nothing but what the law in every man's breast condemns: what is condemned by the light of nature, the light of common reason, the rules of common society." He then went on. "The law hath a power to prevent, to restrain, to repair evils; without this, all kinds of mischief and distempers will break in upon the state. It is the law that doth entitle the king to the allegiance and service of the people: it is the law that entitles the people to the protection and justice of the king. It is God alone who subsists by himself, and all other things subsist in mutual dependence and relation. He was a wise man who said that the king subsisted by the field that is tilled: it is the labour of the people that supports the crown. If you take away the protection of the king, the vigour and cheerfulness of allegiance will be taken away, though the obligation remains. But the law is the boundary and the measure betwixt the king's prerogative and the people's liberty. Whilst these move in their own orbs they are a support and a security to one another: the prerogative a cover and a defence to the liberty of the people, and the liberty of the people a sure foundation to the prerogative of the king. But if these bounds be so removed that they enter into contestation and conflict, one of these mischiefs will ensue—if the prerogative of the king overwhelm the people, it will be turned into tyranny; if liberty undermine the prerogative, it will grow into anarchy." After dwelling on the miseries caused by arbitrary government, to rulers no less than the ruled, Pym continued, in a warning voice, to which the occupant of the royal box would have done well to listen: "Arbitrary power is dangerous to the king's person and dangerous to his crown. It is apt to cherish ambition, usurpation, and oppression in great men, and to beget sedition and discontent in the people; and both these have been, and in reason ever must be, causes of great trouble and alteration to princes and to states. If the histories of those eastern countries be perused where princes order their affairs according to the mischievous principles of the earl of Strafford, loose and absolved from all rules and government, they will be found to be frequent in combustions, full of massacres, and of tragical ends of princes." Pym concluded his grand speech by a stern appeal to the judges to vindicate the majesty of the law and the outraged liberty of the nation, by declaring the earl guilty of high treason. "The forfeitures inflicted for treason by our law," he exclaimed, "are of life, honour, and estate, even all that can be forfeited; and this prisoner, having committed so many treasons, although he should pay all these forfeitures, will still be a debtor to the commonwealth. Nothing can be more equal than that he should perish by the justice of that law which he would have subverted. Neither will this be a new way of blood. There are marks enough to trace the law to the very origin of this kingdom; and if it hath not been put in execution, as he altogether, these two hundred and forty years, it was not for want of law, but that all that time hath not bred a man bold enough to commit such crimes as these."

As in most cases where criminal proceedings are protracted to undue length, so in the trial of the earl of Strafford the many days that elapsed before it came to an end served but to raise sympathisers for the accused, while it softened the ardour of his enemies. "The success of every day's trial was the greatest discourse, or dispute, in all companies," Thomas May noted. After the hated minister had been carried up and down the river, from the Tower to Westminster, and back again, for a fortnight, his wan and worn appearance attesting the fearful inward struggle he was undergoing, human sympathy began to break through political feelings, and, as recorded by May, "the people began to be a little divided in opinions." The visible turn in the state of public feeling led to a change in the mode of prosecution originally chosen against the earl, and it was resolved by the commons, after lengthened debates, to proceed against him by bill of attainder, instead of by impeachment. The bill, opposed by Pym and the more ardent members of the lower house, on the ground of its protracting the trial still longer, but adopted by the majority mainly for the reason that it would give to the proceedings against Strafford a more national character if he were declared guilty by the commons as well as by the lords, was read a first time on Tuesday, the 13th of April, a second time on the following day, and finally passed on the 21st of the month, by a majority of two hundred and four against fifty-nine, not including tellers. Pym and Hampden, though both opposed in principle to the bill of attainder, voted for it, and the only names of note in the minority were those of John Selden, Robert Holborne, and Lord Digby.

Lord Digby made a striking, though somewhat illogical speech against the bill, arguing that, however guilty, the king's adviser ought not to be condemned to death. "Truly," he exclaimed, "I am still the same in my opinions and affections unto the earl of Strafford. I confidently believe him to be the most dangerous minister, the most insupportable to free subjects that can be found. I believe his practices in themselves as high and as tyrannical as any subject ever ventured upon, and the malignity of them hugely aggravated by those rare abilities of his whereof God hath given him the use and the devil the application. In a word, I believe him to be still that grand apostate to the commonwealth who must not expect to be pardoned in this world till he be despatched to the other." After this terrible onslaught, more fierce than almost anything before uttered against Strafford, nothing less seemed possible than the urging that the earl should be instantly "despatched." However, Lord Digby concluded quietly: "And yet let me tell you, master speaker, my hand must not be to that despatch; I protest, as my conscience stands informed, I had rather it were off." Digby then voted against the bill of attainder, leaving the house unenlightened as to his real motives. They were revealed only a long time after by the confessions of Madame de Motteville, a vivacious French lady, attached to the queen's household, and one of the intimate companions of Henrietta Maria. The lady informed the world, in a book of "Memoirs," that the queen made the greatest efforts to save the earl of Strafford from his impending fate, intriguing to that effect with many members of the House of Commons. "Every evening," says madame, "was a rendezvous given, and the most mischievous of his enemies admitted to a conference with her by the way of the back stairs of the palace, leading into the apartment of one or other of her ladies of honour who happened to be off duty and away in the country." To make the best use of her personal charms, Henrietta Maria met such of the parliamentary leaders as could be induced to visit her in a lonely apartment, "lighted only by a flambeau which she held in her hand: she offered them all things to turn them from their purpose, yet gained no one but Lord Digby." If anything was wanting to ruin the earl of Strafford, the queen's intrigues and political movements "by way of the back stairs" were more than sufficient for the purpose.

The bill of attainder was sent from the House of Commons to the lords the same day it had passed the third reading, Pym carrying it, and notifying to the peers "that it was a bill that highly concerned the commonwealth in the expediting of it." Notwithstanding this message, the members of the upper house showed great reluctance to enter upon a rapid procedure; and to quicken their zeal, when a week had elapsed without their doing anything, great multitudes came from the city, crowding all the approaches to Westminster Hall, and filling the air with cries of "Justice! Justice!" At the same time, the names of the fifty-nine members of the House of Commons who had voted in the minority against the bill of attainder were posted up "at the corner of the wall of Sir William Brunkard's house, in the Old Palace-yard in Westminster," with the heading, "These are the Straffordians, betrayers of their country," which exposed those thus placarded to much obloquy, and even danger of attack by the mob. The majority in the commons, indignant at the procrastination of the lords, sent a message to the upper house on the 28th of April, by Edward Hyde, desiring once more they would expedite the bill of attainder, and expressing a belief that plots were being formed for the escape of the earl of Strafford from the Tower and his flight to Dublin, to head a revolt of the Irish army.

The message seemed to have little effect upon the peers, and seeing their unwillingness to obey the behests of the popular assembly as readily as before, the king deemed it a good opportunity to interfere in behalf of his minister. On the 1st of May, the bill of attainder being still pending, Charles, suddenly, and without previous announcement, went to the House of Lords, and ordered the commons to be summoned to the bar. The latter were not a little startled at the appearance of the messenger carrying the summons. "The treasurer," Sir Simonds D'Ewes entered in his diary, "being called forth to speak with Mr. James Maxwell, the usher of the black rod came in and told us that the king was come into the upper house, and expected us there. Some feared it had been to dissolve us, but others knew that it was only to speak to both houses concerning the earl of Strafford. Some would have gone upon Mr. Treasurer's intimation, but others showed that we ought not to go till Mr. Maxwell himself came to the house to give us notice thereof. So Mr. Treasurer offered to go himself, and to send Mr. Maxwell, to which the house assented. A while after Mr. Maxwell came in, bringing in his hands a white stick, that we might perceive he came not about a dissolution, for then he must have come with his black rod; and after he was come to the middle part of the house, he said, with a cheerful countenance, "Fear not, I warrant you!" Had Charles known what was going on within the House of Commons, he would have probably taken other steps than those of a humble suppliant to save the life of his great counsellor and restore his own fallen power. As it was, though the commons still stood in awe of the ancient authority of the crown, the bearer of the crown stood still more in awe of the new might of parliament, and from the moment this was known there could be no longer any doubt as to the issue of the battle.

It was the crisis of the struggle when the king took his seat on the throne of the House of Lords, on Saturday, the 1st of May, 1641. Had he possessed the courage at that moment to dissolve parliament in a constitutional manner, he might have very probably saved his minister, and, for the time at least, overthrown the popular party. However great their support out of doors, it would have been impossible for the parliamentary leaders to oppose the decree of dissolution, the power of which, as yet, was undisputedly vested in the crown, and once stripped of their authority, and reduced to the rank of simple citizens, they could have neither prevented the king from granting Strafford a pardon, nor of readmitting him into his counsels, nor of making attempts to overthrow the army of the Covenanters, the continued presence of which in England, and payment out of the public exchequer, was beginning to cause great national jealousy.

Fortunately for the cause of freedom, Charles was possessed of no more boldness than perseverance; and, always the creature of impulse, he was now impelled by it to an action necessarily fatal to his own designs. His first words were enough to reassure Pym and his colleagues, standing bold upright, though full of anxiety, at the bar of the House of Lords. Addressing the members of the lower house, more than the lords, and speaking in a very humble tone, the king told them, what they all perfectly knew, that he had been present at the trial of the earl of Strafford, from the beginning to the end, and that in his opinion the accused was guilty only of misdemeanour, and not of high treason. "It is not fit for me," he went on, "to argue the business, and I am sure you will not expect it. A positive doctrine best comes out of the mouth of a prince, and I must tell you three great truths. First, I never had any intention of bringing over the Irish army into England, nor ever was advised by anybody so to do. Secondly, there was no debate before me, either in public council or in private committee, of the disloyalty and disaffection of my English subjects. Thirdly, I was never counselled by any one to alter the least of any of the laws of England, much less to alter all the laws. I think nobody durst ever be so impudent as to move me to that, for if they had, I should have put a mark upon them, and made them such an example that all posterity should know my intention by it, for my intention was ever to govern according to the law. I desire to be rightly understood. I told you that in my conscience I cannot condemn him of high treason, yet I cannot say I can clear him of misdemeanours; therefore I hope that you may find a way to satisfy justice and your own fears, and not to press upon my conscience. I hope you know what a tender thing conscience is. To satisfy my people, I would do great matters; but in this of conscience, no fear, no respect whatever, shall ever make me go against it. Certainly, I have not so ill deserved of the parliament this time that they should press me in this tender point."

Of all the injudicious speeches delivered by Charles in the course of his life, one more worthless and unwise never came from his lips. The "three great truths" he told his hearers were, as every one of them knew, from facts clearly and abundantly proved at Strafford's trial, three great untruths; and if this alone was not enough to raise a feeling of contempt towards the king, the supplicating and almost whining tone of his address completed the impression. In the words of Clarendon: "The event proved very fatal; for the king no sooner returned from the lords, than the House of Commons, in great passion and fury, declared this last act of his majesty to be 'the most unparalleled breach of privilege that had ever happened; that if his majesty might take notice what bills were passing in either house, and declare his own opinion, it was to forejudge their counsels, and they should not be able to supply the commonwealth with wholesome laws; that this was the greatest obstruction of justice that could be imagined, and that they were bound to maintain the privileges of parliament;' with many other sharp discourses to that purpose."

The effects of the unwise step of Charles were felt immediately among the people, as well as in the House of Commons. Two days after the delivery of his speech, on Monday, the 3rd of May, a vast crowd of people from the city, to the number of five thousand or upwards, thronged down to Westminster, clamouring that sentence should be passed against Strafford, and threatening vengeance on all opposing the bill of attainder. The lords, feeling greatly alarmed at the tumult, at once despatched a message to the lower house, asking for a conference but received the reply that the members were engaged in business of the highest importance which could not be postponed. Since six o'clock in the morning the commons had been sitting with closed doors, to listen and debate upon a plot revealed by Pym "to distract the English army and debauch them against the parliament," which was serious enough to attract the whole of their attention. The plot, partly the invention of the queen and her priests, consisted in bringing the army from York to London, so as to give the crown power both to liberate the earl of Strafford and to overawe parliament; and it had proceeded so far that the two leaders, Henry Percy, brother of the earl of Northumberland, and Colonel George Goring, eldest son of Lord Goring, and governor of Portsmouth, had obtained the king's consent to the scheme, Charles showing himself reckless enough to bestow it not only verbally but in writing. A great many preparations had been made already, when the two leaders commenced quarrelling with each other for precedence, which led to Colonel Goring communicating some details of the enterprise to one of his friends, Lord Newark, who in turn disclosed them to others, till, by a singular train of circumstances, the affair came to the knowledge of Pym, who disentangled its mysteries with a skilful hand. On finding that everything had been discovered, the colonel came forward as an informer, confessing not only to the intention of the conspirators to bring the army to London and liberate Strafford, but to a plan of the queen, which, it was said, the king had also sanctioned, of introducing French troops into England, and in the first instance into Portsmouth.

The narrative of the plot by Pym caused the greatest consternation and excitement, under the influence of which it was resolved that a "Protestation" should be drawn up, similar to the Covenant of Scotland, binding all the members of the House of Commons to defend the "true reformed Protestant religion," "the power and privileges of parliament," and "the lawful rights and liberties of the people." Every member of the house, four hundred and fifteen being present, took oath on the Protestation, and set his name to it; and the exultation rising with the deed, it was decided to send the document to the upper house, that the lords likewise might append their signatures. With the London crowd still at the gates, the peers dared not refuse the demand, and all except two appended their names to the English Covenant. With still unabated excitement, the commons continued sitting by candlelight, and with closed doors, till eight o'clock at night. Votes were passed that commissioners should beset to the army in the north, that the militia forces in Wiltshire and Hampshire should be drawn towards Portsmouth, and those of Sussex and Kent around Dover, and that any person suggesting or advising the introduction of foreign troops into England should be deemed a traitor to the commonwealth. It was finally resolved upon to tender the Protestation to all subjects of the king, with the declaration that those refusing it should be looked upon as enemies of the nation. "This was conceived to be," according to Rushworth, "a true test of every good subject, a Shibboleth to distinguish the Ephraimites from the Gileadites."

The day after the drawing up of the Protestation, Tuesday, the 4th of May, John Pym brought forward a motion of higher importance than any that had yet been laid before the House of Commons. He and the other parliamentary leaders had been fully conscious all along, and the events of the last few days had impressed the fact with increased strength upon their minds, that the power which they had newly acquired was without substance as long as the king held the legal weapon of dissolution in his hands, and they now prepared to wrench it from him by a step of extraordinary boldness. The bill brought in by Pym, and for which he claimed the immediate attention of the house, simply enacted that "to prevent inconvenience which may happen by the untimely adjourning, proroguing, or dissolving this present parliament," its sittings should be permanent, so far that the king should have no power to end them or suspend them, without the assent of lords and commons by a formal vote. As direct ground, or pretext, for a measure effecting a tremendous change in the fundamental laws of the realm, and completely upsetting the old balance between parliament and royalty, Pym shrewdly put forward a money question, well fitted to veil the deep suspicion in the king's honesty, of which all men's minds were full, but which none felt allowed to express. It was the necessity of raising the necessary sums for the payment of the two armies in the north, which, as had been found already, could be done only on the faith of the representatives of the nation, the merchants of London and the monied interest of England generally refusing to make the least advances on mere crown guarantee. Latterly, some great capitalists had strongly demurred to enter upon any further loans until some assurance was given them that the parliament would not be as evanescent as most of its predecessors; and their protests were read by Pym, together with letters from the earl of Montrose, commander of the Scotch troops at Newcastle, intimating that unless some regularity of pay were secured to his men, they must resort to free quarters on the inhabitants of Northumberland.

The reasons thus given were deemed quite sufficient by the commons, and the bill upsetting the highest prerogative of the crown of England was adopted with great placidity. It was read three times on three successive days, and on Friday, the 7th of May, the commons resolved, by a nearly unanimous vote, "that this parliament shall not be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, but by act of parliament." As soon as passed, the bill was sent to the lords, who made a faint attempt to modify its effects by inserting a clause that the statute should continue in force for only two years. However, the commons were in no mood to undo their work by adopting such a limitation of the power which they had succeeded in grasping; and upon stoutly insisting that the bill voted by them should pass without change, the peers at once gave way. On Saturday, the 8th of May, at a very thin meeting of the upper house, many lords staying away for fear of the king, and many more for fear of the people, the bill for the continuance of parliament was adopted by a small majority, together with the act of attainder against the earl of Strafford. Both bills, more important in their consequences than any ever passed within the walls of St. Stephen's chapel, were laid before the king the same day, Pym and his colleagues showing a fierce determination not to lose a minute in the progress of the great battle in which they were engaged. A committee of both houses, with Pym for spokesman, and including, among others, Sir Simonds D'Ewes, carried the weighty document to Whitehall late on the Saturday afternoon. "The king," Sir Simonds noted down, "looking very sadly, said he would take time to consider, and give them an answer on Monday, at ten of the clock."

The hours that intervened between the Saturday afternoon and the Monday morning were pregnant with the fate of a king and the fate of a nation. Charles himself, small as was his sagacity, could not fail to see that the crisis at which he had arrived was the turning-point of his career, and that in his hands was left the decision of his own, as of England's weal and woe. Two roads, and two only, opened before him, between which he might make his choice as a wise sovereign, or either, at least, as an honest man: the first was to go frankly and uprightly with the representatives of the nation, and the second to go frankly and uprightly against them. A true king, seeking his happiness in that of the subjects entrusted to his care, could not but choose the first, but even the adoption of the second would not have been undignified or unbecoming in a monarch in the position of Charles. He possessed still the full legal and constitutional power to refuse his assent to both bills laid before him by the parliament; and he could give confidence to his friends, and extort respect even from his enemies, by showing his determination not to abdicate any part of his authority, nor abandon one of his most faithful servants. There were difficulties, but not insuperable, in carrying out the latter resolution. Though having lost the affection of his subjects by monstrous misgovernment, he was still sure of their loyalty, as long as keeping in the legal path and abstaining from arbitrary measures, and few were there prepared to be unfaithful to him as long as he was faithful to them and faithful to himself.

But to his own immense misfortune, no less than that of the nation, Charles resolved once more to act without faith, and to seek the relief of his difficulties by walking on the crooked road of fraud and duplicity. On the advice partly of his consort, who, like a true

Jesuit pupil, believed in nothing but plots and intrigues, and was now holding the threads of half a dozen conspiracies in her hands, and partly of some of the bishops of Laud's party, the king made up his mind to give his consent to the two bills before him; but at the same time to use all possible underhand means to free himself from the restraints thus voluntarily accepted. In order to make a compromise with his own better nature for consenting to the death of Strafford, he summoned the archbishop of Armagh, James Usher, a master in sophistry, to give him advice, religious as well as political, upon the subject. The archbishop, fully aware of the duties his majesty expected him to perform, entered with him into a long discussion "about conscience," laying it down, finally, as reported by Clarendon, "that there was a private and a public conscience; that his public conscience as a king might not only dispense with, but oblige him to do that which was against his private conscience as a man; that the question was not as to whether he should save the earl of Strafford, but whether he should perish with him; and that, lastly, the conscience of a king to preserve his kingdom, the conscience of a husband to preserve his wife, and the conscience of a father to preserve his children, all which were now in danger, weighed down abundantly all the considerations the conscience of a master or of a friend could suggest to him for the preservation of a friend or a servant." Having listened to this remarkable counsel, duly appreciating the fine distinction between the two kinds of consciences, private and public, it was impossible for Charles further to withhold his assent to the death of Strafford.

As promised, on Monday morning, the 10th of May, the king delivered his answers to the two bills presented to him on Saturday. The earl of Arundel and three other lords of the privy council having gone as a royal commission to the upper house, the commons were summoned to the bar, and informed that his majesty did give his assent to the act of attainder against the earl of Strafford, as well as to the bill suspending his royal prerogative of dissolving parliament. On the same day the warrant was passed under the great seal for the execution of the earl of Strafford, the time fixed on being Wednesday, the 12th of May. All seemed accomplished now, but, to their great astonishment, the commons were once more summoned to the bar of the lords on Tuesday, the 11th of May, this time to hear the reading of a letter from the king, carried, to add to its impressiveness, by the hands of the little prince of Wales, just eleven years old. It was a letter pitiful in the extreme, and such as, probably, no king had ever before written to his subjects. "My lords," the note ran, "I did yesterday satisfy the justice of the kingdom by passing the bill of attainder against the earl of Strafford; but mercy being as inherent and inseparable to a king as justice, I desire at this time in some measure to show it, by suffering that unfortunate man to fulfil the natural course of his life in close imprisonment, yet so that if he ever make the least attempt to escape, or offer, directly or indirectly, to meddle in any sort of public business, especially with me, either by message or letter, it shall cost him his life, without further process. This, if it may be done without the discontent of my people, would be an unspeakable contentment to me; to which end, in the first place, I by this letter do earnestly desire your approbation; and, to endear it more, have chosen him to carry it that of all your house is most dear to me. So I desire that by a conference you will give the House of Commons contentment, assuring you that the exercise of mercy is no more pleasing to me than to see both houses of parliament consent, for my sake, that I should moderate the severity of the law in so important a case. I will not say that your complying with me in this my intended mercy shall make me more willing, but certainly it will make me more cheerful, in granting your just grievances. But, if no less than his life can satisfy my people, I must say 'Fiat justitia.' Thus, again recommending the consideration of my intention to you, I rest your unalterable and affectionate friend, Charles Rex."

There was a postscript to the letter, more extraordinary almost than the note itself. "If he must die," his majesty observed, either believing in the utter uselessness of his plea for mercy, or wishing it to be so, "it were charity to relieve him till Saturday." The royal message had to be read twice, so passing strange seemed its contents; and having been taken into "serious and sad consideration" by the lords, the commons declining all interference, twelve peers were despatched to tell the king that the upper house could not advise either to alter the sentence against the earl of Strafford, or even to postpone his execution to the end of the week. While they were still speaking, sorrowful, and in deep humility, Charles interrupted them, crying, "What I intended by my letter was with an 'if'—if it might be done with the contentment of my people. If that cannot be, I say again, 'Fiat justitia!'" An hour after, the announcement was made to Strafford that he must die the next morning. He lifted up his hands in despair, crying, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation."

Strafford died with a fortitude becoming his character, though pursued to the last moment of his existence by the hatred of the people. Being led from his prison to the scaffold on Tower Hill, early on Wednesday morning, he stopped for a moment under the window of the cell where Laud was confined. On the archbishop coming forward to the iron bars, he bowed low, crying, "My lord, your prayers and your blessing." Laud stretched out his arms; but a glance at the condemned man, the scaffold, the executioner, and glittering axe, made him feel faint, and overcome with grief and horror, he sank to the ground. But the earl marched on boldly, amidst the yells and curses of the mob that was pressing upon him from all sides. Not far from the Tower gate the violence of the crowd became so great that the lieutenant of the guard desired a coach to be brought for his prisoner, fearing the multitude might tear him to pieces. However, Strafford declined the offer, exclaiming, with a smile, "No, master lieutenant, I dare look death in the face, and I hope the people too. Have you a care that I do not escape, and I care not how I die, whether by the hand of the executioner or the madness and fury of the people—if that will give them content, it is all one to me." Arrived upon the scaffold, not even the surging sea of human heads, more than a hundred thousand in number, a greater crowd than had ever before assembled on Tower Hill, made the earl tremble for a moment. After exchanging a few words with his brother, Sir George Wentworth, and listening to the spiritual consolation of the archbishop of Armagh, James Usher, he addressed the masses in a short speech, expressing his devotion to the church of England, his loyalty to the king, and his unaltered attachment to the people, but telling them, finally, that "he was come thither to satisfy them with his head, but that he much feared the reformation, begun in blood, would not prove so fortunate to the kingdom as they expected and as he wished." Then he said his last prayers, took off his doublet, arranged his hair carefully, so as not to interfere with the axe that was to fall upon his neck, and all preparations finished "with marvellous tranquillity," laid his head upon the block. The executioner severed it with one blow of his heavy axe, and holding it up by the hair over the scaffold, shouted "God save the king!" There was no response to the cry from the crowd, which for a moment appeared stupefied, satiated with the sight of the blood of their enemy.

Quietly and peacefully the vast multitude dispersed in all directions; but towards the evening the general satisfaction found vent in rapturous shouts and many noisy manifestations, intensely distasteful to the more fervent among the king's partisans. "To show how mad this people are," one of them, Sir Philip Warwick, wrote to a friend, "especially in and about this brutish city, on the evening of the day of the earl's execution, the greatest demonstrations of joy that possibly could be expressed ran through the whole town and country hereabout. Many that came up to town on purpose to see the execution rode back in triumph, waving their hats, and with all expressions of joy, and through every place they went crying, 'His head is off! his head is off!' In many places they committed insolences upon, and broke the windows of those persons who would not solemnize the festival with a bonfire: so ignorant and brutish is the multitude."

It was expected by the moderate men of all parties that the death of Strafford would calm the universal excitement, and give rise to more harmonious action between the king and parliament; but the events of the next few weeks made the hope of it extremely uncertain. The question of peace now more than ever depended upon the good faith and sincerity of the king. There could be no doubt that if he would honestly fulfil the expressed wishes of the nation, all excitement and angry feelings would soon be lulled to rest; but, on the other hand, there could be no doubt likewise, that if continuing his old course of double-dealing and dissimulation, the whole host of furious passions that had been aroused in the course of the last six months would flame up more fiercely and bitterly than before, leading to events the import of which as yet none could foresee. It was with intense anxiety, therefore, that all thoughtful men kept watching the conduct of Charles, and with more intense affliction still, that they perceived, at the end of a very short time, that he had learned absolutely nothing in the school of adversity. During the trial of Strafford, bills for the abolition of those obnoxious instruments of tyranny, the High Commission Court, the Star Chamber, and the Court of the Marches of Wales, had passed the commons, yet were not laid before the lords till after the earl's execution, and being approved of in the upper house, were then transmitted to the king, together with a new financial law, imposing a poll tax. The latter obtained at once the royal assent, but the former the king chose to ignore, in the hope, probably, that the bills might be forgotten in the multiplicity of legislative business before parliament; and it was not before he had been sharply reminded of his neglect that he sent them back as passed. The circumstance created much suspicion and discontent, which was greatly augmented on its being discovered that new plots were stirring at court.

The queen as before figured as chief mover and instigator in these plots. Her majesty had received just before, her mother, Marie de Medici, on a visit, the august lady having been expelled from France by Richelieu on account of her intrigues; and it was found now that she was continuing the same occupation in England, impressed with the idea of being able to restore the fallen fortunes of her royal son by holding long conferences with priests, Capuchin friars, and all kinds of adventurers, native and foreign. Charles himself was not directly at fault in the matter, for so far from appreciating the services of his vigorous mother-in-law, he exhibited a cordial dislike to her; nevertheless, the cabals she and her daughter set on foot were scarcely the less mischievous on this account, the king's name being freely used on all occasions, and his pride, weakness, and indecision played upon in a manner which left him in the position of an actual accomplice. The great object of Henrietta Maria, as of her bustling mother, was to bring the troops in the north of England to London, "to rally round the throne," which end they sought to achieve by keeping up a train of emissaries, and debauching as many officers and soldiers as they could lay hold of. It was impossible that these doings should not become known, and parliament hesitated not to put a stop to them at once. To get as near the originators as possible, the queen's confessor, Father Philip, a Jesuit deeply implicated in all the plots, was summoned to the bar of the House of Commons; but the priest had pluck as well as cunning, and on the summons being handed to him, he boldly refused obedience, declaring that he was under the orders of the king and queen, and not of parliament. Sharper measures now became necessary, and a warrant being issued against him, the Jesuit was committed to the Tower, after a vain attempt of his royal mistress to save him from the grip of the parliamentary messengers. Articles of impeachment were drawn up at the same time against Father Philip, but abandoned soon after, the commons deeming it beneath their dignity to prosecute a mere tool like him, as long as they could not reach the hands that set him in movement. It was resolved, in the meanwhile, to send a remonstrance to the king, requesting that he would be "very sparing in sending for papists to court;" and that the persons of the most active papists, of whatever degree, might be so restrained as was necessary for the good of the kingdom. Marie de Medici understood the purport of the message sufficiently well to express her intention to leave England forthwith; whereupon the commons, more gallant in the case than Cardinal Richelieu had been, at once declared their readiness to pay her travelling expenses.

In the midst of all these machinations, a great movement, almost unobserved by Charles, though infinitely more important than all the intrigues of queen, queen-mother, Jesuits, and Capuchins, was going on in the House of Commons. The great question of religion, hidden for a time under the all-absorbing trial of the earl of Strafford, was turning up again, and on its reappearance it was seen that the constitution of the lower house had undergone a vast change. The parties now had come to be more sharply divided, those in favour of the maintenance of episcopal government, whether moderate or extreme, had been brought to unite under a common banner, while their opponents of all shades had likewise ranged themselves together in close phalanx. All the great political leaders in the house, Pym, Hampden, and St. John at the head of them, who had hitherto discountenanced extreme measures, had now arrived to unite closely with the Puritan byterians, as the only party on whose co-operation they could reckon with certainty, whose devotion was inexhaustible, who alone had fixed principles, who were ardent and anxious to accomplish something more than superficial changes, which might be swept away by another turn of the wheel, and, finally, who had the means as well as the will to effect a complete revolution in church and state. The gradual progress of party movement exhibited itself clearly in the votes of the commons on religious subjects. The first largely-signed petition of the city of London against bishops was simply ordered to be shelved; but a similar petition from the country, coming a month after, was set aside only after a lengthened debate. More remonstrances of the same nature coming in, a special committee was appointed to consider them, and on its report, the commons, on the 10th of March, passed the resolution, "That the legislative and judicial power of bishops in the House of Peers is a great hindrance to the discharge of their spiritual functions, prejudicial to the commonwealth, and fit to be taken away by a bill."

The vote was the first sign of the new coalition that was rising into existence in the lower house, and it was followed by others more and more significant. On the 10th of March a resolution was passed against the employment of bishops and clergymen in the commission of the peace, and on the 22nd of the same month they were declared unfit to serve as privy counsellors or in any temporal office. A bill was next introduced, founded on these resolutions, and having passed through the regular forms, was sent to the upper house on the 1st of May. Here it was read a first and a second time, and referred to a committee, but on being reported on, the lords passed resolutions expressing general assent to the bill, opposing, however, the removal of bishops from their house. After several fruitless conferences, the commons refused the alteration, and the peers likewise declining to give way, the latter finally, on the 7th of June, threw out the entire bill at the third reading. As soon as the fate of the act was no longer doubtful, though before its actual rejection, the leaders of the House of Commons resolved to advance a long step. They held the time had come when, the lords spiritual and temporal refusing all compromise, they must lay the axe to the tree and hew down episcopacy itself. On the 27th of May, a petition from Lincolnshire, "with many hands to it," praying for the abolition of the government of archbishops, bishops, and subordinate church dignitaries, was presented by Sir John Wray, member for the county, and on the following day Sir Edward Deering, member for Kent, brought in a bill based upon this proposition, which was instantly read the first time. Sir Edward was not the framer of the all-important measure, but a humble tool, regretful, soon after, of his own acts. Repenting, the year after, that he had been bold enough to run a wreck at episcopacy, he published an "Apology," in which he disclosed the true authors of the great movement towards a second Reformation. "The bill," confessed the member for Kent, "was pressed into my hands by Sir Arthur Hesilrige, being brought unto him by Sir Henry Vane and Master Oliver Cromwell."

The "Lord of the Fens," silently rising in parliament, but as yet not before the public gaze, had somewhat miscalculated the position of parties in bringing in his bill for the destruction of episcopacy. Events had not marched quite far enough for such a step, and it became manifest in a few days that the measure, if passed at all through the lower house, would be carried by so small a majority as to give the lords cause to reject it immediately. The second reading of the bill was opposed by Edward Hyde, Sir John Culpeper, and other members who had hitherto been reckoned among the zealous adherents of the popular party, but who now refused to go with it. Edward Hyde, whose secession gave great delight to the court faction, he being looked upon as one of the ablest members of the lower house, opposed the measure on the ground that the church and state of England had flourished "many hundred years" in much happiness under the existing form of government, and that the matters contained in the bill were "of very great weight," which was undeniable. In reply to Hyde, Sir Simonds D'Ewes came forward, reminding him that the episcopal church of England, so far from being "many hundred years" old, had not yet roots of more than a century; to which Pym added that, during this comparatively short period, "the bishops had well nigh ruined all religion amongst us, and were not willing to yield to the least reformation." Denzil Holles stirred up the jealousy of the commons by telling them that "some of the bishops, since the opposition in the lords to the last bill sent up to them, had boasted that they would sit in the upper house in despite of the lower house." But notwithstanding all the arguments employed by Pym and his colleagues, the second reading of the bill was carried only by the small majority of 139 against 108, and having passed into committee, the leaders quietly resolved to postpone further efforts in the matter.

In the mean time it was deemed necessary to fortify the party organisation more than had been hitherto done, and bring over as many members as possible to the liberal-Protestant camp. The exertions made, rather characteristic of the time, were described by Lord Clarendon in his "Life," he relating what happened to "Mr. Hyde," that is to himself. "When Mr. Hyde sat in the chair, in the grand committee of the house for the extirpation of episcopacy, all that party made great court to him; and the house keeping those disorderly hours, and seldom rising till after four of the clock in the afternoon, they frequently importuned him to dine with them at Mr. Pym's lodging, which was at Sir Richard Manly's house, in a little court behind Westminster Hall, where he, with Mr. Hampden, Sir Arthur Hesilrige, and two or three more upon a stock kept a table, where they transacted much business, and invited thither those of whose conversion they had any hope. One day, after dinner, Nathaniel Fiennes, who that day likewise dined there, asked Mr. Hyde whether he would ride into the fields and take a little air, it being a fine evening, which, the other, consenting to, they sent for their horses; and riding together in the fields between Westminster and Chelsea,

CHELSEA HOSPITAL.

Mr. Fiennes asked him what it was that inclined him to adhere so passionately to the church, which could not possibly be supported. He answered, that he could have no other obligation than that of his conscience and his reason that could move with him, for he had no relation or dependence upon any churchman that could dispose him to it; but that he could not conceive how religion could be preserved without bishops, or how the government of the state could well subsist if the government of the church were altered, and asked him what government they meant to introduce in its place. To which he answered, that there would be time enough to think of that; but assured him, and wished him to remember what he said, that if the king resolved to defend the bishops it would cost the kingdom much blood, and would be the occasion of as sharp a war as had ever been in England, for that there was so great a number of good men who had resolved to lose their lives before they would submit to that government."

While the bill for the abolition of episcopacy was being discussed, rumours of plots and conspiracies went flying about the lower house, disturbing the debates, and giving rise to sometimes pathetic and sometimes ludicrous scenes. It was well known that extraordinary efforts were made by the king, not only to overthrow the bill, but to destroy the influence of the Protestant party in the House of Commons; and the fear was, that being goaded into madness by the instigations of the queen and the bishops together, he might have recourse some day to violent means to rid himself of those whom he was taught to look upon as his mortal enemies. Towards the end of May, the bruit of a new gunpowder plot got current among the members, causing such fright as to lead to an interruption of the sittings, and an order that all the cellars under the parliament building should be carefully searched, and the result be reported to the house. No fresh Guy Fawkes was found, and the whole story turned out an idle rumour; but this did not prevent the occurrence, a few days after, of a strange scene of alarm.

The scene was destructive almost of the dignity of the representatives of the nation. As told by Sir Simonds D'Ewes, indefatigable note-taker, "There were broken some few lathes in the lowest south window, at the going up of the gallery, which gave a sudden crack, and much affrighted the house. The gentlemen in the gallery most of them ran away into the committee chamber, where they drew their swords. It came by one Mr. Moile, who let a paper fall in the vacant place between the said window and the gallery, and stooping to take it up, with his weight broke a few lathes, which made a sudden noise, much like the fall of part of a scaffold. All the gentlemen under the gallery in an amaze leaped down, and some fell one upon another; some ran away out of the house, as my Lord Cranborne [eldest son of Cecil, earl of Salisbury, returned to parliament for Hertford] and others. The people also running amazed through Westminster Hall, old Sir Robert Mansell drew his sword, and bade them stand like true Englishmen, no one being able to report the cause of their flight; but no man stayed with him. But he advanced alone out of the hall, towards the House of Commons, with his sword drawn. Mr. Thomas Earle broke his shin, and Sir Frederick Cornwallis [representative of Evesham, distinguished member of the court party in the lower house, and particularly nice as to his personal appearance] had his hat all dusted with the lime that was scattered with the breach of the lathes. Mr. John Hotham met some of our house running away, and asked the cause; but they not telling it, pursuing their flight, he came to the door to inquire the cause, conceiving that there had been some division in the house concerning the deans and chapters. Sir John Wray conceived that there had been some treason against us; Sir Edward Rodney had a fall. After much confusion, the speaker, standing up a good while, did first spy the error before any other that stood at the upper end of the house where I was, near my constant place." Sir Simonds, together with many other members, felt somewhat ashamed of the whole affair, but could give reasons for it. "It is very true," he noted down, "that there hath been a great pusillanimity and weakness in such a great and honourable assembly as the House of Commons; but the truth is, the late great treacherous design of the Papists being not yet fully discovered, we may be a little excused in our too deep apprehensions."

The apprehensions, great already, were considerably increased towards the end of June, 1641, by the announcement that the king intended going to Scotland, and to enter into more intimate communication with his northern subjects. From what had come to their ears before, the leaders of the popular party in parliament had much reason to suspect the journey as being fraught with evil designs, the fact having been proved to them that the earl of Montrose, formerly one of the ostensible leaders of the Presbyterian party in Scotland, had for some time past been playing a very ambiguous game between the court and the Covenanters, evidently bent upon getting a part of the army to espouse the king's interests. Montrose was closely watched by his personal enemy and political rival, the earl of Argyll; and the latter having succeeded in getting into the secrets of a clandestine correspondence he was carrying on with the court, gave information thereof to his Presbyterian allies in the House of Commons, who at once took steps to frustrate the new conspiracy. On the motion of Pym, a committee of seven members was appointed on the 23rd of June, to prepare the heads for a conference with the upper house, which took place on the following day, the leader of the commons acting as spokesman. Pym now informed the peers that "they had lately found out very malignant and pestiferous designs, set on foot, or plotted, to trouble the peace of the kingdom, the which, though they were prevented, were still pursued," in consequence of which he brought forward ten propositions.

The first of the propositions was to disband the English troops, and to invite the chiefs of the Scotch army to return home and likewise discharge their men. It was absolutely necessary, Pym argued, that this should be done at once, as the maintenance of so many soldiers was not only an intolerable financial burthen, but a great source of political danger. The second proposal was to petition the king, either to give up his proposed journey to Scotland, or to postpone it until the two armies were disbanded, while the third was to petition his majesty, furthermore, to remove "all evil counsellors," and appoint such as the parliament might have cause to look upon with confidence. The fourth, fifth, and sixth propositions related to the queen, who was to be requested to take some trustworthy men into her service, to entertain "no Jesuits nor any native priests," to dismiss the college of Capuchin friars, to bring the royal children up in the true Protestant religion, and to discourage papists coming to court. The seventh proposal was to petition the king not to hold diplomatic intercourse with papal envoys, nor to appoint ambassadors to the pope, either in his own name or that of the queen, nor indeed, to keep up any communication with the court of Rome. The eighth proposition was to request his majesty that, for the security and peace of the kingdom, the places of strength and important posts in the administration might be "put into safe hands;" that the navy "under that noble lord, in whose honour the House of Commons stands secure," the duke of Northumberland, might be increased in strength out of the proceeds of duties and taxes already granted by parliament; and that "all suspected persons" might be removed from the command of ships. The ninth proposal was to the effect that a general amnesty for all offences might be granted; and the tenth, that a joint committee of lords and commons should be established to confer about the best means for securing these several ends, as well as to watch over and protect the welfare of the nation.

Far-reaching as were the whole of these demands, they were subscribed to without resistance by the members of the upper house, who seemed ready for the moment to adhere to anything, provided they could keep off attacks from the church establishment. The king, with faience of the policy of conciliation that he usually displayed, also received the petitions addressed to him in the most amicable manner, and, promising to do all that was desired of him, so much lulled the suspicions of the commons, that they withdrew their opposition to his northern journey, content to accept his royal word to disband the troops as soon as could possibly be done. This was exactly what Charles wanted. Always given to trust to lucky chances rather than the pursuit of firmly-laid plans, he was getting more and more into the position of a desperate gambler, staking his fortune now upon one card and now upon another. He had failed the year before in playing off England against Scotland, and felt feverishly eager at present to try the new game of Scotland versus England.

Charles set out for Scotland on Monday, the 10th of August, leaving in great haste, and neglecting at the last moment to provide for a regular government, notwithstanding the entreaties of parliament, which urged him to appoint a "custos regni," or lieutenant, during his absence. The king's own intention, not openly proclaimed however, was to leave his consort sole ruler in his absence, which was so far foreseen by the commons that they insisted beforehand upon the discharge of all her majesty's "extraordinary servants," a knot of priests and political emissaries; desiring likewise, that her mother, Marie de Medicis, should leave the kingdom, "for the quieting of jealousies in the hearts of his majesty's well-affected subjects." The intriguing royal lady accordingly left England a few days before the king's departure for the north, very indignant at the treatment she had received, but carrying with her a vast amount of treasure, partly the gift of her daughter and son-in-law, and partly of Pym and his colleagues, who, to get speedily rid of the dangerous visitor, allowed her ten thousand pounds out of the proceeds of the new poll-tax. Charles having declared his intention to delay his departure no longer than the 10th of August, the House of Commons held long sittings to pass the most pressing matters of legislation, meeting for this purpose even on Sunday, the 9th of August. However, the Sunday assemblies being looked upon by the majority as a deviation from parliamentary principles and practice, they apologized for it in an address dispersed among the people, as an act of necessity, with the appended declaration that it should not be drawn into a precedent.

Among the bills brought forward at the last moment was one by Sir Arthur Heselrige, member for Leicestershire, proposing that nominations to the command of the army and navy should be made only with the approval of the commons. However, the king, justly deeming that the measure, if passed, would be little else than a proclamation of want of confidence in him, succeeded in making a compromise with the propounders by offering to grant a commission of importance to the earl of Essex, son of Queen Elizabeth's favourite, who had come to be regarded as one of the most faithful adherents of the popular party in the House of Lords. In conformity with this agreement, Sir Arthur Heselrige dropped his bill, while Charles issued a patent nominating Essex, during his own absence from England, general-in-chief of all the royal forces south of the Trent, with power to raise troops in case of necessity. Having signed this important appointment, the king hurried off to the north, attended by but a meagre suit of courtiers, and taking with him in his coach three persons, the earl of Hamilton, his cousin, the earl of Lennox, newly created duke of Richmond; his nephew, Charles Louis, son of the unfortunate "Winter king," lately arrived on a visit to the English court.

The extraordinary haste of the king's departure, and his leaving unaccompanied by a single man whom they could trust, appeared ominous to the commons, so much so that it was resolved, after a short debate, to set a watch upon Charles's doings in the north, in the shape of a parliamentary commission. The peers, at a meeting of both houses, agreed to the proposal, and it was decided by a vote "to send a committee of lords and commons to attend his majesty in Scotland, to be present when the Act of Pacification should be transacted in that parliament, and to preserve the good intercourse and correspondence which was begun between the two nations." Two peers and four members of the lower house were intrusted with the important task, the vote nominating William earl of Bedford, Lord Howard of Escrick, Sir William Armyn, member for Grantham, Sir Philip Stapylton, member for Boroughbridge, John Hampden, and Nathaniel Fiennes, all of them adherents of the liberal party. The chief of their instructions was "to certify parliament from time to time of all occurrences which shall concern the good of this kingdom."

The precaution taken by parliament of watching the actions of Charles, by means of special commissioners following in his route, was not by any means a superfluous one, for it soon became fully evident that he had gone to Scotland with the determined object of seeking material help for renewing his old arbitrary policy. It was one of the king's huge mistakes, springing out of the narrowness of his views, to impute all the opposition he encountered to a few leading men, upon whom he looked, not as organs of public opinion, but as single individuals, moved more or less by personal interests; in consequence of which he always flattered himself with the hope of overthrowing every resistance to his rule, if only able to get particular persons out of his way, either by destroying or by corrupting them. His failure in subduing by these means his English enemies, he attributed mainly to want of time and opportunity; but he expected to be more successful in Scotland, on account of everything lying within a smaller focus, the men necessary to be killed or to be purchased being less numerous, and social life altogether on so aristocratic a basis as to give a few families the greatest power. Charles, moreover, had come to consider the army of the Covenanters as the origin and basis of the ascendancy of the English parliament; and fancying that it might serve as an instrument to be turned in more than one direction, he had for some time past opened communications with several of the military leaders, and been successful enough to gain over at least one person of influence in the earl of Montrose. In now going personally to Scotland, the king had a very clear, and seemingly not difficult object before him, in the attempt to win over, or if that could not be, annihilate two or three more of the leading men, which appeared to him sufficient to bend the rest to his will.

From above the crowd of his old opponents, whom Charles hoped to turn into new friends, there stood out four remarkable persons, Alexander Leslie, the earl of Montrose, the marquis of Hamilton, and the earl of Argyle, and he thought that if he could but master these, his end would be fully gained. The chances seemed slightest with Alexander Leslie, whose past career as a military leader had furnished proofs of his devoted adherence to the Presbyterian party. However, the general of the Covenanters had not absolutely refused the offer of an earldom held out before him by the emissaries of Charles, so that there was hope left. James Graham, earl of Montrose, was already entirely purchased. His towering personal ambition aimed at a viceroyalty in Scotland, which had been promised to him; and being possessed of considerable military genius, with great personal daring, he doubted not of being able to play a similar part in his native country to that acted by Strafford in Ireland. With the third person on the king's list, the marquis of Hamilton, the case was somewhat different. A Presbyterian at heart, he yet was, or at any rate appeared to be, full of devoted loyalty to the king; and those two being looked upon as wholly irreconcilable principles, it naturally followed that he was suspected of double-dealing both by his own countrymen and by Charles. The king had least reason to distrust his kinsman, since he had given him, in a written document, singularly characteristic of his own cunning, full license to enter into the most intimate intercourse with the Covenanters, to assume their manners, habits, and language, and by these means to act as a spy in their camp. Singularly enough, the noble marquis played the part assigned to him with such perfection as to raise doubts in the mind of the king whether he himself was not the dupe in the game; so that there arose after a while in him a floating suspicion that Hamilton meant to vault even higher than Montrose, and, proud of the royal blood in his veins, aspired to nothing less than the crown of Scotland. However, the marquis as yet had not got farther in his ambitious designs than to make himself head of the small party standing midway between the pure Royalists—a quite insignificant number of men, chiefly government officials—and the Covenanters, embracing the overwhelming majority of the nation, and who, while accepting the leadership of Alexander Leslie in military matters, owned as their great political guide, Archibald Campbell, earl of Argyle. It was the latter, a subtle thinker, able statesman, and skilful diplomatist, of whom the king stood most afraid, the chance of being able to win him over being apparently as slight as the difficulty to destroy him great. His fears increased when, on arriving at Edinburgh, Charles found that Argyle was carrying things with a high hand; that he had made himself absolute master of the capital, and even thrown the earl of Montrose into prison, under the accusation of treason. A law had been enacted, at the first raising of the standard of the Covenant, that none of the leaders should enter into correspondence with the court, on pain of death, and a letter of Montrose to the king having been intercepted by his watchful enemies, he was forthwith arrested and conveyed to Edinburgh castle. There seemed great probability that, under the very eyes of the king, the man who aimed to be the Stafford of Scotland would suffer the fate of his English prototype.

Startled though he was at the aspect of affairs in his northern capital, Charles acted with consummate ability. He began by flattering and caressing every man of importance with whom he came into contact, praised ministers for their eloquence, soldiers for their valour, and politicians for their wisdom; reminded all that he was born a Scotsman, and assured all that he was at heart a true Scotsman. To crown everything, the king determined upon stifling his religious convictions to the extent of attending Presbyterian worship, and even appointed Alexander Henderson, one of the authors of the Covenant, his private chaplain, stipulating that he should be with him night and day. This done, he opened parliament in a flaming speech, declaring that his patriotism and deep affection for his countrymen had driven him to revisit his native land; that he had come for the express purpose of remedying the "jealousies and distractions" of the last few years, and that he was bent upon giving them the most cheerful and ample fulfilment of all their claims and demands. After telling the members, finally, that he was the descendant of "one hundred and eight" kings of Scotland, he offered to ratify at once, by the national form of touching with his sceptre, the whole of the acts voted since the breaking out of hostilities. It seemed all very pleasant; nevertheless, the acting was so much overdone as to raise the suspicions of some of the parliamentary leaders, and Charles was told, politely yet firmly, that there was no necessity that he should put his sceptre out of place, since, by the law of Scotland and the stipulations of the last treaty, acts of parliament were valid without the royal assent. The slight show of opposition had no other effect than that of redoubling the visible anxiety of the king to gain popularity. He admitted the chief leaders of the Covenanting party to the privy council, bestowed the earldom of Leven upon Alexander Leslie, lavished titles and dignities upon all men of note, held long conferences with the most zealous ministers, and went to kirk as punctually and listened to the long sermons as patiently as if born and bred a Presbyterian.

All the while the king was planning murder. Almost from the moment of his arrival in Scotland, Charles had entered, by means of one of his bed-chamber gentlemen, William Murray, into secret intercommunication with the imprisoned earl of Montrose, the result of which was a plot for the assassination of Argyle, as well as Hamilton, the latter having made himself more and more suspicious by his close intercourse with the section of the Covenanters most opposed to the royal party. The plan was to seize both leaders at an audience with the king, by a hired gang formed by Montrose, known as the "Banders and Plotters," to accuse them of treason in the royal presence and that of a number of parliamentary leaders, and if offering the least resistance, or even uttering a word, which could not fail, to kill them on the spot. Everything was ready for the assassination, when, at the last moment, Hamilton and Argyle got warning of it, and had time to fly to Kinneir, where a number of their friends rallied round them. The news of the affair, which, mysterious as it was, people called "the Incident," created the wildest excitement throughout Scotland, and turned the current of popular feeling once more strongly against the king. "When we came to Edinburgh," Robert Baillie wrote to a friend, "we found ane very evil spirit had been stirring. A wicked plot, desperate, devilish, and now, to have accused, in presence of the king and parliament, Hamilton and Argyle of words of highest treason, and to have proven them by suborned witnesses. The grounds of this are not yet found out, you shall hear of it anon; and had it succeeded, we had fallen into a woful misery and ane bloody butchery. But God strangely discovering it, has made it evanish and turn much to our good." The story of "the Incident," as it turned to the good of the Presbyterian party, so it ruined all the expectations of Charles in his northern kingdom.

The news of the "wicked plot" found a powerful echo in England. It fulfilled the worst apprehensions of the leaders of the popular party, and they at once set to reorganize their strength, preparing to meet force by force should an attempt be made to overthrow parliament by fraud or violence. The commons had adjourned soon after the king's departure, appointing a committee, presided over by Pym, during the recess; but they reassembled immediately after the report of "the Incident," and at the first sitting, on the 20th of October, the great leader spoke in strong terms about "the mysterious affair in Scotland." He gave his opinion that "some of the parties suspected to have had a hand in that design are reputed papists," and deeming it probable that "they might have correspondency with the like party here," proposed that the lord mayor of London should be written to, and asked "to place convenient guards in several places of the city till he received further orders from the parliament." This was done immediately, after which Pym proceeded to take further measures for the security of parliament and the success of the great cause of which he had made himself the most forward champion. Keeping up a close correspondence with Hampden and Fiennes, the two most active of the parliamentary commissioners who had followed the king to Scotland, he was constantly well informed about all that was going on in the north, and, watching the progress of Charles's schemes there and nearer home with keen anxiety, prepared to parry stroke for stroke and thrust for thrust.

Pym was assisted in his momentous labours, on which not only the safety but the very existence of the popular party had come to rest, by a few of the abler or more influential members of both houses, who assembled either at his lodgings, or at Lord Mandeville's house at Chelsea, or at the earl of Holland's house at Kensington. Among the peers present at these remarkable gatherings, source of many measures involving the fate of the kingdom, were the earls of Essex and of Newport, Lords Saye and Sele, Mandeville, and Wharton; while of members of the lower house there were chiefly Oliver St. John, Denzil Holles, Sir John Clotworthy, and Lord Dungarvon, eldest son of the earl of Cork. One of the objects of the private assemblies over which Pym presided was to discuss and keep watch over the doings of the queen, who since the departure of Charles had taken up her residence at the secluded mansion of Oatlands, near Weybridge, in Surrey, where she was keeping court surrounded by the most devoted of the Royalist nobles and their open and secret friends. The deliberations of the Oatlands party might have remained a profound secret to Pym's cabinet councils at Chelsea and Kensington, but for the flitting to and fro of a beautiful and clever woman, Lucy, countess of Carlisle, sister of the earl of Northumberland, and bosom friend of the queen. Henrietta Maria had implicit confidence in the lovely, radiant creature, who, she believed, was devoted to her body and soul, her confessed object in visiting the detested parliamentary leaders being only to get at their secrets. But the queen little understood the real character of fair Lucy. A woman of strong intellect and passions, married to a simpleton, whom she detested and treated as a puppet, Lady Carlisle had other purposes than to discover state intrigues in engaging in meetings with John Pym. Attracted, like most women of her class, by talent and energy combined with success, the earl of Strafford had for some time arrested her fancy, leading her to pay him visits even when in prison, and to make some efforts to save his life. However, she was too strong-minded to be disconsolate when the grave closed over him; and so far from hating his foes, she turned with enthusiasm to the man whose superior genius had succeeded in subverting Charles's schemes, and bringing him to the block, and thenceforward she became the professed admirer of the great popular party leader. Being near sixty, and having too much real work on hand to engage in flirtation with a volatile, strong-minded lady, Pym at first treated her very coldly, which had the natural effect of inflaming her still more, until she seemed ready to fall in worship at the feet of the champion of liberty. Thus fair Lucy kept sliding from the lodgings of Master Pym to Oatlands palace, and from Oatlands palace back to Master Pym, leaving her royal bosom friend under the full impression that she alone profited by her movements.

Keenly watching the doings of the king and royal party, Pym, on receiving the news of "the Incident," could no longer doubt that the cause of liberty was threatened by another attack, which, if not warded off at once, might be its death-blow. Together with the reports from Scotland, there came others from Ireland of the same nature: there, too, the agents of despotism were hard at work with bribery and corruption, making every effort to prepare the army of eight or nine thousand Roman Catholic soldiers, which Strafford had raised for his own purposes, to become a fit tool in the royal interest. To add to all these sources of disquiet, it was found that the constitution of parliament itself was gradually undergoing a change, the attempts of Charles to draw influential members over to his side having proved successful in a number of cases, leaving the popular party extremely weakened for action. Among those of whose apostasy there could be no longer a doubt after the recess, were two prominent men who had taken an active part in the prosecution of Strafford and all the other measures leading to the overthrow of arbitrary power, Lord Falkland, and Edward Hyde, the future Lord Clarendon. The two carried with them a train of from twenty to thirty votes, and their defection was the more serious as it was accompanied by the indecisive attitude of another group of members, staining their eyes to see which way the tide would ultimately turn, and who came to be known as "Trimmers." The general attendance in the House of Commons, which had been from the commencement of the parliament rather irregular, showed likewise a marked diminution at the beginning of the second part of the session, the loss affecting chiefly the popular party, while the court faction and its new recruits mustered in great strength. The "Trimmers" and waiters on providence were in much doubt as yet whether the king or the old parliamentary leaders would get the upper hand in the great struggle that was darkly looming before the eyes of all, and not knowing which way to turn, they resolved to pursue the convenient course of absenteeism until fortune had declared itself more decisively. It was enough to shake the courage of men less determined than Pym and his more immediate friends and coadjutors; but to them the dangers, great as they were, served but as incentives to renewed displays of energy. The problem of saving liberty, not only from the attack of its powerful enemies, but from the vacillation and discouragement of its own faint-hearted friends, was a mighty one, yet they solved it in a manner worthy of them and worthy of their cause. After long and earnest discussion, the parliamentary leaders resolved to lay the case of the nation before the nation, in a final appeal, describing the past and present state of the realm, and leaving the people to decide in the last instance whether they would have back the past, or whether they would move onward to a different future. The appeal, one of the most remarkable documents of English history, was drawn up mainly by Pym, and the first rough draft of it was laid before the House of Commons on the afternoon of Monday, the 8th of November, 1641. It was then called a Declaration and Remonstrance to his majesty; but soon after, when stirring every heart in the nation, became known as "the Grand Remonstrance."

The preamble of the Grand Remonstrance, consisting of twenty clauses, and opening in the name of "the commons in the present parliament assembled," began by declaring that for the last twelve months they had been carrying on a struggle, the object of which was to restore and establish the ancient honour, the greatness, and the security of the nation. During this time, it was said, they had been called to wrestle with dangers and fears, with miseries and calamities, with distempers and disorders, so various, great, and pressing, that for a while the entire liberty and prosperity of the kingdom had been extinguished, and the foundations of the throne undermined. For this reason, and finding great aspersions cast on what had been done, many difficulties raised for the hindrance of what remained to be accomplished, and jealousies everywhere busily fomented betwixt the king and parliament, they had thought it good in this manner to declare the root and growth of the designs by which so much mischief had been caused, the height to which these had reached before the meeting of parliament, the means used for extirpating them, and, together with the progress made therein, the ways of obstruction that had occurred, and the course by which the obstacles still intervening could be finally removed. Then, in express terms, the "Declaration and Remonstrance" asserted the existence of a conspiracy to subvert the fundamental laws and principles of a just government, denouncing the conspirators as threefold; namely, first, the "Jesuited papists;" secondly, the bishops and ill-affected clergy; and thirdly, such counsellors, courtiers, and officers of state as had preferred their private ends and interests to those of the commonwealth. All the three classes of conspirators, it was said, acted under a common agreement and on the same principles, which were to keep up continual differences between the king and the people, and lower and degrade the Protestant religion in the persons of those best affected to it. The more immediate means of the conspirators were to put forward a claim of prerogative whenever a question of liberty was mooted, in order to set the authority of parliament at defiance and arrogate to themselves the places of greatest trust and power; and, on the other hand, by encouraging to the utmost such views of church doctrine and discipline as would establish ecclesiastical tyranny, to sow dissensions between common Protestants and those whom they called Puritans, including under the name all who wished to maintain unimpaired the laws and liberties of the realm and the purity and faith of the true religion. After this preamble came the body of the "Declaration and Remonstrance," consisting of two hundred and six numbered clauses, containing practical proofs and illustrations of the past and actual state of the kingdom and the grievances and wishes of the people.

The first reading of the document, which occupied the whole afternoon of Monday, the 8th of November, made so deep an impression upon the House of Commons, that Sir Edward Nicholas, one of the leading members of the court party, and private agent of the king, intrusted with sending to his majesty daily reports of parliamentary doings, wrote immediately to Scotland on the subject. He told

Charles that there had been read that day a most startling paper, reflecting so much to the prejudice of the government, that he was "troubled" to think what might be the issue if his majesty did not instantly return to London. Sir Edward added that he could not in any manner account for the so called Remonstrance as a party demonstration. "Surely," he wrote, "if there had been in this nothing but an intention to have justified the proceedings of this parliament, they would not have begun so high." The king doubted not that Pym and his colleagues were striking high, and at once replied to the communication. "You must," he ordered his agent, "speak with such of my servants that you may best trust, in my name, that by all means possible this Declaration may be stopped." Charles had not yet learnt that it was something beyond the power of royalty to stop winged words embodying truth.

Before the king's letter reached Sir Edward Nicholas, the debate of the commons on the Grand Remonstrance was far advanced, all other matters having been discarded to make way for it. The discussion commenced on Tuesday, the 9th of November, the day after the document had been laid on the table, and from the first moment it became evident that it was to be one of the mightiest party struggles that had ever taken place in parliament. At the beginning, the order of procedure was carefully settled. Every member who wished to do so was allowed to speak to each clause, and if desirous to have the clause amended, by previous leave of the house, then it was to be so altered, and the clause with the amendments put to the vote. Among the first speakers was Oliver Cromwell, who, in a few blunt words, demanded that a clause relating to popish intrigues should be made more stringent; he was followed by William Strode, member for Beralston, a fearless Puritan, who blurted out that the Remonstrance, though nominally addressed to the king, was meant for the people, and should be printed as soon as voted, and be sent "into the country to satisfy them."

Both on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 9th and 10th of November, the debate lasted till late at night; but on Thursday it had to be suspended, owing to the arrival of fearful reports from Ireland. Strafford's soldiers, in part disbanded, and mixed with a Roman Catholic rabble of the lowest classes, had tried to surprise the castle of Dublin, and failing in the attempt, had marched northward into Ulster, where it was reported a fanatic chieftain named O'Neill was standing at the head of thirty thousand men, proclaiming to act under a commission of King Charles, and threatening death to all Protestants and all adherents of the English parliament. The news of the insurrection having been communicated to the commons, Sir Benjamin Rudgard, "after a little silence," moved for measures to suppress it; he was followed by Denzil Holles, who proposed that the earl of Leicester, nominated some time before, by desire of the two houses of parliament, to the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, should enter upon his post with all possible speed. There again was "a little silence," and then, according to the relation of a member, an eye-witness, "Master Pym stood up, and said that no man could be more ready and forward than himself to engage his estate, person, life, and all for the suppression of this rebellion in Ireland, or for the performance of any other service for his majesty's honour and safety; but he feared that as the king gave ear to those evil counsellors about him, all that we did would prove in vain. He therefore desired that we might add some declaration in the end of these instructions, that howsoever we had engaged ourselves for the assistance of Ireland, yet unless the king would remove his evil counsellors, and take such counsellors as might be approved by parliament, we should account ourselves absolved from this engagement." Pym's motion was vehemently opposed by Edward Hyde, who declared it to be a "menace to the king;" but it was adopted nevertheless by a majority of one hundred and fifty-one to one hundred and ten. The figures indicated the actual strength of the popular party, which was yet to diminish before the Grand Remonstrance had passed.

The debate on the all-absorbing subject recommenced on Friday, the 12th of November, and lasted till Tuesday, the 23rd of November, amidst constantly-increasing excitement. Every day, from early morn till late in the evening, often till towards the hour of midnight, by dim shadowy candle-light, the discussion went on, getting more and more into red heat toward the finishing clauses, treating of the great topic of religion. The five clauses, from the 181st to the 185th, occupied by themselves two days and nights. They ran, "And now, what hope have we but in God? The only means of our subsistence, and power of reformation, is, under Him, in the parliament; but what can we, the commons, without the conjunction of the House of Lords? And what conjunction can we expect there, when the bishops and recusant lords are so numerous and prevalent that they are able to cross and interrupt our best endeavours for reformation, and by that means give advantage to this malignant party to traduce our proceedings? They infuse into the people that we mean to abolish all church government, and leave every man to his own fancy for the service and worship of God; they have strained to blast our proceedings by wresting the interpretations of our orders from their genuine intentions; they tell the people that our meddling with the power of episcopacy hath caused sectaries and conventicles, when it is idolatry, and the popish ceremonies introduced into the church by command of the bishops, which have not only debarred the people from them, but expelled them from the kingdom." And thus, with Elias, we are called by this malignant party the troublers of the state, and while we endeavour to reform their abuses they make us authors of those mischiefs we study to prevent. We confess our intention is, and our endeavours have been to reduce within bounds that exorbitant power which the prelates have assumed unto themselves, so contrary both to the word of God and the laws of the land; to which end we passed the bill for the removing them from their temporal power and employments, that so the better they might with meekness employ themselves to the discharge of their functions, which bill they themselves opposed, and were the principal instruments of crossing."

After some further protests to the same effect, the Remonstrance continued: "We have been maliciously charged with the intention to destroy and discourage learning, whereas it is our chiefest care and desire to advance it, and to provide such competent maintenance for conscientious and preaching ministers throughout the realm as will be a great encouragement to scholars, and a certain means whereby the want, meanness, and ignorance to which a great part of the clergy is now subject will be prevented. And we have intended likewise to reform and purge the fountains of learning, the two universities, that the streams flowing from thence may be clear and pure, and an honour and comfort to the whole land." The latter clause was attacked by many speakers, among them Sir Edward Dering, member for Kent, who maintained that all learning would come to an end if the great prizes in the church were abolished. "Great rewards," Sir Edward cried, "do beget great endeavours, and, certainly, when the great basin and cower are taken out of the lottery, you shall have few adventurers for small plates and spoons only. If any man could cut the moon all out into little stars, although we might still have the same moon, or as much in small pieces, yet we should want both light and influence." The imaginative member for Kent was replied to by the member for Bucks, who, arguing that there was authority for believing that the stars were more exalted in the church of Christ than the moon, quoted the first verse of the twelfth chapter of the Book of Revelations. "And there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars."

All during the debate on the Remonstrance, Sir Edward Nicholas kept up an uninterrupted correspondence with the king, describing the course of the discussions, and urging his majesty, in tones more and more full of anxiety, to return to London without a moment's loss of time, so as to prevent, if not the voting, at least "the dangerous printing." For a few days Charles disregarded the advice, but then all on a sudden, with his usual impulsiveness, he resolved to act upon it. On the morning of Monday, the 22nd of November, Pym learnt, to his great astonishment, that the king was hastening with all speed up from Scotland, and would, probably, be in London before the end of two or three days. The Declaration and Remonstrance had passed through all the clauses in committee late on the Saturday night, and was now lying on the table of the house, ready engrossed, awaiting the final vote, which, however, was not expected to be taken without another long and stormy debate. It was longer and stormier than feared by Pym and his friends, who did their best to hurry on the final decision, while the court faction, with Lord Falkland and Edward Hyde at the head, did everything in their power to impede it, their hopes being that the arrival of the king, mysteriously mooted about as to be followed by "a stroke," would bring them relief.

To follow out these tactics, the opponents of the Remonstrance rose one after the other, making long orations, all trying to prove that the House of Commons had no privilege to issue a document like the one that had passed through committee, to the people, as it was not only without precedent and unconstitutional, but derogatory to the king's honour. The latter point was brought forward with great warmth by Hyde, but replied to energetically by Pym, who insisted that the honour of the king was enshined in the safety of the people, and that the members of the House of Commons had no choice left but to tell the truth. Thus the debate went on hour after hour till midnight, but few members of the popular party leaving their seats, for fear that even a momentary absence of any of their number might be taken advantage of by their vigilant antagonists, and lead to the defeat of the all-important bill. Not all of the court faction showed as much zeal, and the dreary hour of midnight approaching, some few were seen to steal out of the house, faint with hunger, and no longer able to keep sleep from their heavy eyelids. Among these broken-down members was the king's correspondent, Sir Edward Nicholas, who crept home towards twelve o'clock to write a few words to his royal master. "The commons have been in debate about their Declaration," wrote Sir Edward, "ever since twelve at noon, and are at it still, it being now twelve at midnight. I stayed this despatch in hope to have sent your majesty the result of that debate, but it is so late as I dare not, after my sickness, adventure to watch any longer to see the issue of it. Only I assure your majesty there are divers in the commons' house that are resolved to stand very stiff for rejecting that Declaration, and if they prevail not, then to protest against it." If the court party failed, it was not for want of organisation.

It was nearly one o'clock in the morning when the first great vote was taken. On the question being put, "Whether this Declaration shall pass?" the house divided, amidst the most intense excitement, and the return being made by the tellers, it was found that one hundred and fifty-nine members had given their Yeas, and one hundred and forty-eight their Noes, so that the Grand Remonstrance was carried by the narrow majority of eleven. But another vote, scarcely less important than this first one, remained yet behind. No sooner had the numbers been proclaimed, when George Peard, member for Barnstable, moved that the Declaration should immediately be ordered to be printed. This had been understood all along; nevertheless, the minority, whose plan of action had been prepared to the minutest detail, professed to be taken by surprise, and got up a violent scene. Several members brought forward the extraordinary argument that the House of Commons had no right to print without the concurrence of the lords; to which Edward Hyde added, that if the motion was persisted in, he and his friends should ask leave to enter their protest. The little word protest, which seemed to drop almost accidentally from the lips of the leader of the opposition, but was, as announced by Sir Edward Nicholas to the king, the basis of the further operations of the court party, at once aroused a storm of indignation in the house.

It was impossible for Pym and his colleagues not to see that their antagonists were acting upon a deliberately-laid plan to destroy the authority of parliament by representing it publicly as split into two sections, a majority and a minority, the latter exercising rights independently of the former; and they lost not a moment to defeat this object. The right to protest, they said, never had been, and never could be admitted; the House of Commons was indivisible; it acted with one will and one power, and it exercised a sway with which individual claims were incompatible. Altogether indisputable and unquestionable as was the principle thus laid down, its assertion only served to rouse the court party to still greater vehemence. After several speeches, which could scarcely be heard in the general tumult, Geoffrey Palmer, a courtly lawyer of the Middle Temple, and member for Stamford, sprang to his feet, exclaiming that he should not be satisfied, both for himself and those around him, unless a day were at once appointed for discussion of the question as to whether the right to protest did not exist in the minority, and in the meanwhile he would move, with reference to such future debate, that the clerk of the house should now enter the names of all those who desired to protest. At these words the excitement reached its culminating point. As if seized by sudden frenzy, the whole court party rose in one body, shouting and gesticulating violently, to indicate that all their names should be entered for protestation. "All! all!" they screamed, as reported by Sir Simonds D'Ewes; "and some waved their hats over their heads, and others took their swords in their scabbards out of their belts, and held them by the pummels in their hands, setting the lower part on the ground. so as if God had not prevented it, there was very great danger that mischief might have been done. All those who cried 'All! all!' and did the other particulars, were of the number of those that were against the Remonstrance." To quell the tremendous excitement, Pym in the end consented to postpone the discussion upon the motion of the member for Barnstable, and the amendment "that this Declaration shall not be printed without the particular order of the house," was passed by a majority of twenty-three, the Yeas being one hundred and twenty-four, and the Noes one hundred and one. "And so," says Sir Simonds D'Ewes, "the house arose just when the clock struck two the ensuing morning." Never before had the commons of England held such a debate during such hours.

Hard as had been the struggle for the popular party, the victory was decisive. The waverers began to think that they could see the new run of the tide, and came crowding once more around the banner unfurled by Pym, who grasped it with firmer hand than ever, strong in the consciousness of a good cause, and of a nation ready to defend it. The growing power of the popular party became visible the third day after the passing of the Grand Remonstrance. On Thursday, the 25th of November, it was moved that Geoffrey Palmer, who had stirred up the commotion in the memorable night by asserting his right of protest, should be committed for the offence to the Tower. A warm debate ensued, at the end of which the motion was carried by one hundred and sixty-nine against one hundred and twenty-eight votes, or a majority of forty-one, much larger than any recorded since the commencement of the second part of the session.

While the commons were voting the committal of the champion of the court party, the king entered the city, on his return from Scotland. Through the efforts of a few energetic court partizans, chief among them Sir Richard Gurney, newly-elected lord mayor, a magnificent entertainment had been prepared for his majesty by the city authorities. With the queen and her children at his side, he rode in state through London, was greeted by the acclamations of common councilmen and functionaries, great and little, belauded to the skies by scarlet-robed aldermen, and finally escorted to Hampton Court by some companies of train bands. It would have been impossible for the king's admirers to do anything more mischievous, and more fatal almost, than to get up this splendid reception. Having failed to accomplish his objects in Scotland, Charles had come back partially inclined to give way to necessity, and attempt to make his peace with the popular party; but the adulation of the poor city magnates again turned him from his purposes, constantly fluctuating between attempts of crushing and of conciliating his supposed enemies. Spurred on by the queen, and by Lord Digby, who had come to play an important part in the councils of her majesty, Charles let not twenty-four hours pass before he rushed again into the fight.

On Friday, the 26th of November, the day after the king's arrival and procession through the city, the lord-keeper informed the House of Lords that he had "received a command from his majesty to tell them that his majesty had heard both houses had appointed guards to attend them for their security, in his absence, which he presumed they had reasons for; but now, upon his return, his presence would be a protection for them, and therefore he ordered the said guards to be dissolved." The message having been communicated to the commons, the latter at once resolved to protest against it, and a petition to the effect was instantly drawn up, and presented to the king. Among the chief reasons advanced for the continuance of the guards were "the jealousy conceived upon discovery of the design in Scotland for the surprising of the persons of divers of the nobility and members of parliament there, which had been spoken of here, a few days before it broke out, not without some whispering intimation that the like was intended against divers persons of both houses, which found the more credit by reason of the former attempts of bringing up the army, to disturb and enforce this parliament." The commons finished by declaring that they "do conceive there is just cause to apprehend some wicked and mischievous practice to interrupt the peaceable proceedings of the parliament still in hand, for preventing whereof it is fit the guard should be continued under the same command, or such other as they should choose." Whatever the faults of the commons in the eyes of the king, he could not complain that they were not frank and outspoken in their communications.

Before Charles had given an answer to the request of the lower house, the subject of the Grand Remonstrance came on again for discussion. Threatening as was the new attitude of the king, the leaders of the popular party had yet not given up all hopes of coming to an agreement with him, and in order to facilitate it, Pym proposed that to the Declaration voted by the house there should be added a humble petition explaining the former and stating the principal grievances of the commons and of the nation. The proposal having been adopted, a committee was appointed to draw up the paper, which was read by Pym on Monday, the 29th of November. It was to the effect that his majesty's faithful commons did with much thankfulness and joy acknowledge the great mercy and favour of God in giving his majesty safe and peaceable return out of Scotland into his kingdom of England, where the pressing dangers and distempers of the state had caused them, with much earnestness, to desire the comfort of his gracious presence, to help the endeavours of parliament for the averting of that ruin and disaster with which his kingdom at this time were threatened. For, having convinced themselves of the existence of a malignant party, having access to his person and councils, whose unceasing endeavours were to discredit his parliament, and to create factions among his people, they had, for the prevention thereof, and the better information of his majesty and all his subjects, been necessitated to make a Declaration of the state of the kingdom, as well before as after the meeting of parliament now assembled. Before submitting which, they desired frankly to point out with what dangers to the country, and grievous affliction to all loyal dwellers therein, the practice was attended of placing in employments of trust, and nearness to his majesty and the royal family, the most active members of the malignant party before mentioned, favourers in all respects of popery, and mere "engineers, or factors for Rome."

The commons justified their right to give this warning by the distractions and sufferings already caused by the continual tamperings with the army in England, by the "miserable incidents and jealousies" in Scotland, and by the "papist insurrection and most bloody massacres" in Ireland, winding up with the final requests that his majesty would please to concur with and second the desires of his people "in a parliamentary way," abridge the inordinate power of the prelates, remove the malignant and ill-affected from their places of influence, and for the future employ only such persons as parliament might have cause to confide in. Which humble desires being fulfilled, the commons declared themselves ready most cheerfully to aid his majesty in carrying on the government, to support the royal estate, and to uphold the power and prerogative of the crown, and by their loyal affections, obedience, and service, lay a sure and lasting foundation for the greatness of the king, and the happiness of his posterity in future times.

The Petition was adopted after a short debate, and the next day, Tuesday, the 30th of November, a deputation of twelve members was elected to carry it to the king, together with the Grand Remonstrance. Pym's name stood first on the list as spokesman, but he withdrew it in favour of Sir Ralph Hopton, a member of the court party, using his influence besides to procure the choice of Sir Richard Wynn, an officer of the royal household, member of Liverpool, and other adherents of the king, in the deputation. On his motion, it was finally ordered that Sir Ralph Hopton should only read the Petition, and place the Remonstrance into the hands of the king awaiting his majesty's gracious reply.

It was on the morning of Wednesday, the 1st of December, that the Grand Remonstrance was presented to Charles at Hampton Court. On arrival at the palace, the member for Liverpool, who had familiar entrance to his majesty, announced the parliamentary deputation, and they were admitted after the lapse of a quarter of an hour. Approaching the king, Sir Ralph Hopton was proceeding to sink on his knee, but Charles would not let him do so, requesting that all should remain standing during the audience. To the reading of the Petition he listened attentively, until Sir Ralph arrived at the passage charging certain unnamed persons with being "factious for Rome," when he exclaimed, smiling, "The devil take him, whosoever he be, that hath a design to change our religion." It was clear to all that his majesty was in excellent good humour, with none of his usual short, sharp ways about him, which became manifest still more after the Petition had been fully read and the Remonstrance been placed into his hands.

Charles showed no curiosity whatever to examine the latter important document, but appeared bent entirely upon a little gossip with the twelve honourable members of the House of Commons. They could scarcely understand what it all meant, until his majesty came more directly to the point by inquiring of Sir Ralph Hopton, in an off-hand manner, whether copies of the papers which he had taken the trouble of carrying to Hampton Court were to be given to others besides himself. Fervent royalist as he was, Sir Ralph saw the danger into which he was being led, and, bowing to the ground, replied that he had received no commission to say anything regarding what was to be done with the Petition and Declaration. "Then," the king quickly rejoined, "if you have no commission, you may speak as particular men. Doth the house intend to publish this Declaration?" Again, Sir Ralph and all his colleagues bowed, humbly informing his majesty that they could give no answer to his question. "Well, then," exclaimed Charles, his tone and manner undergoing a sudden change, "I suppose you do not expect me to answer now to so long a petition. But this let me tell you, I have left Scotland well and in peace; they are all satisfied with me, and I with them, and though I stayed longer than I expected, yet I think, if I had not gone, you had not been rid so soon of the army. And as to this business of yours, I shall give you an answer with as much speed as the weightiness of the business will permit." With this, Charles gave the members of the deputation his hand to kiss, smiling no longer; and on leaving the palace, Sir Ralph Hopton had brought to him the final royal message, "That there might be no publishing of the Declaration till the House of Commons had received his majesty's answer." The words sounded ominous enough, and were accepted by the commons as nothing else but a new threat.

Events were now fast drawing to a crisis. The rumour that the king intended to lay violent hands on the chief leaders of the parliamentary majority spread about among the people, and found general belief, not a little grounded on the fact that strange-looking groups of armed men were coming day by day into the city, some taking up their quarters in and near the Tower, some at St. James's palace, and many more moving to and fro between London and Hampton Court. Charles himself was reported, by those who had access to him, to be in an extraordinary state of excitement, giving audience to all sorts of unknown persons, shutting himself up for long secret conferences with Lord Digby and other royalists of the queen's party, who had for some time been advising extreme measures, and granting appointments to men distinguished for nothing but their unpopularity. The day after receiving the parliamentary deputation with the Remonstrance, he dismissed Sir Henry Vane from his place of secretary of state, appointing instead Lord Falkland, with Sir Edward Nicholas for assistant, while at the same time, Sir John Culpeper, the intimate friend of Lord Digby, and one of the foremost leaders of the court faction in the House of Commons, had given to him the chancellorship of the exchequer. An appointment, infinitely more startling than either of these, and which was deemed the undoubted forerunner of dark schemes, was made soon after in the nomination of a fresh governor of the Tower.

The governorship of the Tower, "bridle of the city," as the courtiers were in the habit of calling it, had been filled for some years by Sir William Balfour, a man of undoubted integrity and a tried friend of parliament, who had proved both his courage and his independence by interfering with several attempts made for the escape of the earl of Strafford, and refused an enormous bribe, offered, it was said, by the queen herself, to connive at it. To remove such a man from such a post at a time of general distrust, the air thick with rumours of plots and conspiracies, was a daring act on the part of Charles, the recklessness of which was augmented by all the attendant circumstances. In order to prevent the matter making much noise, the king, according to Clarendon, "gave Sir William Balfour three thousand pounds ready money, which was raised by the sale of some of the queen's own jewels;" and the cash, together with order of dismissal, having been handed over to Sir William, a royal patent was issued appointing "our trusty and well-beloved servant, Colonel Thomas Lunsford," governor of the Tower. The trusty and well-beloved servant thus nominated to hold the "bridle of the city" was, to the knowledge of all men, a swaggering ruffian and altogether infamous character, who had been compelled to fly the kingdom some years before to escape the aim of justice, and had shown himself ready at all times to lend his hand to any foul deed against remuneration.

It was a sheer act of desperation even to attempt such an appointment, which was instantly resented by the commons as a gross insult to them and to the people. The same day on which the royal patent was issued a vote was passed by them, without a single dissentient voice, declaring that "the House holds Colonel Lunsford unfit to be, or continue, lieutenant of the Tower, as being a person whom the commons of England cannot confide in." The vote was followed by a protestation "that there had long been a design of the papists to ruin the true religion, and that the appointment of Colonel Lunsford showed that the same design was growing to maturity: that, therefore, they protested and declared to all the world that they had done their utmost for the saving of the church and kingdom from ruin, and from the plots of the cruel and bloody papists." Charles felt startled at the vehemence of the opposition; and was startled still more when early the next morning his fervent partisan, the lord mayor of London, came hurrying up to Hampton Court, informing him that the city apprentices intended to rise in arms and storm the Tower if Colonel Lunsford was not removed from his post. Trembling before the violence of the storm which he had called up, the king gave way instantly, and Lunsford was dismissed the same day, a secret pension of five hundred pounds a year being assigned to him for further usefulness. Charles had played his first card in a great game of fraud and violence, and had lost it.

Before the king had lost this stake, the House of Commons had gained another victory. The question whether the Grand Remonstrance should be printed and published, notwithstanding the royal message conveyed by Sir Ralph Hopton, amounting to a clear prohibition, was debated warmly for two days, on Wednesday, the 15th, and Thursday, the 16th of December, and decided finally in the affirmative, by a vote which exhibited a marked decrease of the court party, the numbers being one hundred and thirty-five for, and eighty-three against the printing. The decision greatly exasperated the king, and to show his anger he had recourse to another wild menace by placing a body of halberdiers, under the command of the earl of Dorset, a nobleman deeply mistrusted by the people, around and at the entrances of the two houses of parliament. The appearance of the soldiers caused another scene of excitement among the commons. On Friday, the 17th of December, Sir Philip Stapylton, member for Boroughbridge, suddenly interrupted the proceedings by crying out that there was "a new guard set upon the house, of two hundred men with halberds;" which cry, as recorded by Sir Simonds D'Ewes, "caused great fear and bustle in the house, and caused us to leave the business we were about, though it concerned the relief and assistance of Ireland, and to look to our own present safety." Intense agitation prevailed for some time, and one member, Sir Richard Newport, attempting to go out, "there was a great cry, 'Shut the door! Shut the door!' whereupon he was brought back by Rushworth, the clerk assistant, and admonished from the chair, 'that, besides the general sense of the house, expressed by so many calling out to have the door shut, the greatness and weight of the matter in agitation might dissuade any man going out.'" Then a short and excited discussion arose, in the course of which Sir Thomas Barrington, member for Colchester during a number of parliaments, stated that it had never happened within his memory that a guard was set without the consent of the house, to which Sir Simonds D'Ewes added, significantly, that such a thing had been put in practice but twice for the last three hundred years, during the reigns of Richard II. and Henry VI., when "the consequences of it were fatal and deadly." Thereupon a resolution was passed that "the setting of any guards about this house, without the consent of this house, is a breach of privilege, and that therefore such guards ought to be discharged; and that this guard shall be immediately discharged by the command of this house."

The authoritative tone of the commons had its due effect upon the ever-vacillating mind of Charles, who forthwith drew back his halberdiers, alleging that they had been put only for the protection of the house against an expected crowd from the city, bent upon carrying a monster petition expressing approval of the attitude of parliament. The monster document, three quarters of a yard in breadth, and twenty-four yards long, with fifteen thousand signatures appended, arrived the next day, presented by one John Foulkes, "a merchant dwelling in Mark Lane," who spoke "in the name of the aldermen, common councilmen, and freemen of London," averring, among others, that "they could have got many thousand more names but for obstructions from the lord mayor and others." "Their coming down with the petition this afternoon," Sir Simonds D'Ewes entered in his diary, "happened by a strange providence of God; for if they had come yesterday, as they had appointed, then had those armed persons brought down likewise not only justified their assembling, but perhaps also offered violence unto them; neither could they then have come with so small a number, and in so orderly a manner as they did." The corporation petition was followed on the 23rd of December by another from thirty thousand "young men of London," praying, among other things, "that episcopacy be rooted out of the church of England." After the petition had been read, "there was a general silence for a while," and then Sir Simonds D'Ewes stood up and "desired the house to take notice in what an orderly and peaceable way a few of them had come to present this petition, and that they might receive the approbation of the house for the same." The approbation was freely and warmly bestowed, and before the king had left off mustering his halberdiers, it had come to be generally understood that the citizens of London were to be the guard of parliament.

There could now be no longer any doubt that Charles intended to have recourse to the last argument of kings, physical force. Towards Christmas he removed from Hampton Court Palace to Whitehall, where, as admitted by Hyde, now, with his friend Lord Falkland, one of his chief advisers, he got quickly surrounded, "besides his ordinary retinue and menial servants, by many officers of the late disbanded army," who "expected some further employment." In view of it they "offered themselves for a guard to his majesty's person, and were with more formality and ceremony entertained by him than, upon a just computation of all distempers, was by many conceived reasonable." The officers and soldiers thus enrolled as "a guard to his majesty's person," and for other indefinite purposes, thought it part of their duty to attack people going to the House of Commons to carry petitions or listen to the debates, and before long there were daily battles in the streets between St. Stephen's and Whitehall. As represented by Clarendon, the royal guards felt "warm with indignation at the increase of that vile rabble, which every day passed by the court, using, first, words of great contempt, and then, those words commonly finding a return of equal scorn, blows were fastened upon some of the most pragmatical of the crew." Thus in the course of little more than a week, and before the eventful year 1641 had come to an end, two camps had been formed in the neighbourhood of parliament—the "gentlemen of the late disbanded army" on the one side, and the "vile rabble" of London citizens, who impudently refused to accept blows from the gentlemen, on the other.

The aspect of Whitehall on Thursday, the 30th of December, was described by Thomas Smith, a gentleman in the household of the earl of Northumberland, residing at York House, to his friend, Sir John Pennington, admiral of the navy, lying in the Downs under secret orders from the court. "The 'prentices and our souldiers," wrote Thomas Smith, "have lately had some bickerings, wherein many of the 'prentices were wounded, and lost their hats and cloakes. This was done yesterday at Whitehall Gate, as the 'prentices were coming from demanding an answer of their petition lately exhibited to the parliament house. The souldiers continue in great numbers in Whitehall. These woundes of the 'prentices have so exasperated them that it is feared they will be at Whitehall this day to the number of ten thousand; whereupon the souldiers have increased their number, built up a court of guard without the gate, and have called down military company to their assistance: what will be the event, God knows." Another eyewitness of these portentous scenes, Captain Robert Slingsby, a warm adherent of the king, and likewise a correspondent of Admiral Pennington, referred to them as follows, in a letter dated the 31st of December, 1641. "Yesterday," he wrote, "about fifteen or sixteen officers of the army, standing at the court gate, took a slight occasion to fall upon the people, and hurt about forty or fifty of them; they in all their skirmishes have avoided thrusting, because they would not kill them. I never saw the court so full of gentlemen. This day, five hundred gentlemen of the inns of court came to offer their services to the king. The officers of the army, since these tumults, have watched and kept a court of guard in the presence-chamber, and are entertained upon the king's charge." The conclusion of the captain's letter was ominous. "The citizens," he informed Sir John Pennington, "for the most part shut up their shops, and all gentlemen provide themselves with arms, as in time of open hostilities. Both factions talk very big, and it is a wonder there is not more blood yet spilt, seeing how earnest both sides are. There is no doubt but if the king does not comply with the commons, in all things they desire, a sudden civil war must ensue."

England, indeed, was on the verge of a great civil war. A due contest, solely due to and prompted by the king. Already the clash of the mercenary swords which he had enlisted was heard in the streets of the capital; but as if fearful that the struggle would not begin soon enough, he hurried it on by a final measure, all but unexampled for perfidy and lawlessness. Naturally alarmed at the scenes of violence and bloodshed that were taking place under their very eyes, the commons, on the 31st of December, sent a deputation of seven members, with Denzil Holles for spokesman, to the king, representing that they fell under great danger from "a malignant party daily gathering strength and confidence," and entreating his majesty to allow them a guard out of the city of London, commanded by the earl of Essex. Charles told the deputation, in a strange, evasive manner, that if the petition were delivered to him in writing, he would consider it; but seeing the ill impression created by his reply, he quickly changed tone, exclaiming, that as the members of the lower house had been called together by his writ, "he would be as careful of their safety as of his own children." The reply having been reported to the commons, they adjourned over the new year, and on reassembling, on Monday, the 31d of January, 1642, they received the king's written answer to their last petition. "We do engage unto you solemnly," Charles wrote, "on the word of a king, that the security of all and every one of you from violence is and shall ever be as much of our care as the preservation of us and our children. And if this general assurance shall not suffice to remove your apprehensions, we will command such a guard to wait upon you as we will be responsible for to Him who hath charged us with the protection and safety of our subjects."

At the very moment when thus invoking the Almighty, and solemnly pledging his royal honour to abstain from violence, Charles was thinking of nothing but to betray the opponents whom he wished to lull into false security. While the House of Commons was being entertained with the friendly and affectionate assurances of his majesty, in the House of Lords, his attorney-general, Sir Edward Herbert, read a paper hurling the accusation of high treason against the principal leaders of the popular party, John Pym, Denzil Holles, John Hampden, William Strode, and Sir Arthur Heslridge. The peers, in the words of Clarendon, stood "appalled" while the attorney-general read out the document, which, he declared, "his majesty had himself delivered him in writing," containing the articles of accusation under seven distinct charges. They were, first, that they had "endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England, to deprive the king of his royal power, and to place in subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and estates of his majesty's loving people;" secondly, that they had "endeavoured, by many foul aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious unto them;" thirdly, that they had "endeavoured to draw his majesty's late army to disobedience to his majesty's commands, and to side with them in their traitorous designs;" fourthly, that they had "invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majesty's kingdom of England;" fifthly, that they had "endeavoured to subvert the rights and very being of parliament;" sixthly, that, "for the completing of their traitorous designs," they had "endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traitorous designs, and to, that end have actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament," and, finally, seventhly, that they had "traitorously conspired to levy, and actually have levied war against the king." The hour of midday was past when the attorney-general had finished reading the extraordinary document which he had received from Charles, he standing at the clerk's table of the upper house, and all the circle of peers around sitting "appalled." None of them uttered a word; whereupon the attorney-general ordered the king's serjeant-at-arms to go to the House of Commons and arrest the five members accused of treason in the name of his majesty.

The commons were not unprepared for the arrival of the serjeant-at-arms. On the afternoon of the same day on which they had been assured "solemnly, on the word of a king," of the "security of every one from violence," the leader of the majority arose to make a startling announcement. "The whole house, or at least the most of us," Sir Simonds D'Ewes noted down in his diary, "were much amazed at Master Pym's information, who showed us that his trunks, his study, and his chamber, as also the trunks, study, and chamber of Master Denzil Holles, were sealed up by some one sent by his majesty." This the house at once declared a grave breach of privilege, passing at the same time, without debate, a resolution that if any person whatsoever should offer to arrest or detain the person of any member, not having received the previous authorization of the house, it should be lawful for such member to stand upon his own defence, and to make resistance according to the protestation, taken in the earlier part of the session, to defend the privileges of parliament. "In the mean while, as recorded by Sir Simonds, "private information was given to us that the king's attorney had, in his majesty's name, in the lords' house, accused the said Master Pym, Master Holles, and some other members of our house of high treason; yet we accounted it a breach of privilege that their papers and effects should be sealed up before their crime was made known to this house. So we resolved it upon the question that this was a breach of our privilege, and then the house ordered that the serjeant should go presently to the lodgings of the said Master Pym and Master Holles, and break up the seals which were set upon their doors or trunks." The declarations of breach of privilege and orders of resistance having passed by acclamation, a deputation of three was appointed to confer with the lords, Sir Philip Stapylton, member for Boroughbridge, Nathaniel Fiennes, member for Banbury, and John Glyn, member for Westminster, being nominated for the purpose. They had answered to their names, and were about to proceed to the upper house, when it was announced that the king's serjeant-at-arms, with the mace in his hand, was at the door to arrest the five accused members of treason.

Supreme as was the excitement of the hour, the leaders of the commons lost not for a moment the sense of high dignity of what was due to them as representatives of the nation. To his demand to enter the house in the name of the king, the serjeant-at-arms obtained for reply that he must lay aside his mace, and it was not till divested of this symbol of authority that he was allowed to advance to the bar. He now proclaimed, amidst profound silence, that he had been commanded by the king's majesty, his master, upon his allegiance, that he should require of Master Speaker of the House of Commons to deliver over to him five gentlemen, members of the House of Commons, and those members having been delivered, he was commanded to arrest them in his majesty's name, of high treason. "Their names are," he concluded, "Denzil Holles, Sir Arthur Heselrige, John Pym, John Hampden, and William Strode." The last sound of his words having reverberated in the hall, there was deep silence for a minute or two, after which the king's serjeant-at-arms was ordered to wait outside until the pleasure of the house should be communicated to him. This done, the commons proceeded calmly to business, passing three important resolutions. By the first, a deputation was appointed to inform the king, that his message conveyed by the serjeant-at-arms "being matter of great consequence and concerning the privilege of all the commons of England," would be taken into serious consideration by the house; and that, in the mean time, the five accused members would be ready to answer any "legal charges" against them. By the second resolution, an order was directed to the city authorities, and intrusted for execution to Alderman Pennington and Captain Venn, members for London, that a military guard, drawn from the train bands, should be immediately provided for the protection of the House of Commons. By the third resolution, it was ordered that the speaker's warrant should be issued for committing to prison Sir William Fleming and Sir William Killigrew, king's agents, for violating the privilege of parliament by sealing up the papers and effects of several members of the House of Commons. The shades of night were falling after these proceedings had been brought to a close, and the sitting was adjourned to the following day. Previous to dispersing, an intimation was sent by the speaker to the king's serjeant-at-arms, who had attended all the while at the door, that he need wait no longer, as the reply to the message with which he had been intrusted would be carried to his majesty by members of the House of Commons. King Charles had lost another stake in the mighty game of hazard he was playing.

It was late in the evening of the eventful Monday, the 3rd of January, when the deputation sent by the commons were admitted to audience at Whitehall. The deputation consisted of four members, two prominent leaders of the majority, Sir John Hotham and Sir Philip Stapylton, and two of Charles's recently-appointed ministers, Lord Falkland and Sir John Culpeper, the latter chosen seemingly to remind the king that his own servants were bound, by ties which they could not break, to parliament and the nation, as well as to himself. Visibly excited, and as if scarcely able to collect his thoughts, Charles received the deputation in his cabinet, and their message having been read, he inquired of Lord Falkland, in a hasty manner, whether the commons expected a reply. In the same breath, before Falkland could answer, he cried out that the house should have his reply early the next morning, and that, for the present, they might take his assurance that all that had taken place had been done by his own special orders. No more words passed. The deputation bowed and withdrew, and Charles retired to his private apartments, where he remained in consultation with the queen and some of the most intimate of her advisors, including the French ambassador, during the greater part of the night.

More than ever in his life, the king seemed wavering and undecided. He could not help perceiving the desperate nature of the undertaking on which he was bent, and on which he was staking his crown, if not his life, and yet he had not strength nor wisdom enough to stop in his mad career. Fear, alarm, and the vague consciousness of wrong drew him backward; but vanity, egotism, and stubbornness propelled him on—and vanity and her blind sisters got the upper hand. Before midnight arrived he had resolved, under the fierce instigation of his thoughtless consort and her jesuitical counsellors, to pursue his career of violence, and had come to shape his future course by another fatal document under his own hand. It was a warrant addressed to the chief magistrate of the city, directly provocative of civil war. "To the lord mayor of London, our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor," the royal order ran: "We understand that the House of Commons hath sent to have guard of the train bands of that our city. Forasmuch as some of which said house are lately accused of high treason, our will and command is that you take especial care that none of our trained bands be raised without special warrant from us, and we shall take in our royal care that nothing shall be done to the prejudice or disturbance of our said city, which we shall be as vigilant to keep in quietness as others are to engage and put into tumult and disorder. But in case you shall find any great numbers of people to assemble together in a tumultuary and disorderly manner within our said city or the liberties thereof, our will and command is that you then cause so many of our trained bands to be raised as you shall think fit, well armed and provided, and that you give order to suppress all such tumults and disorders; and if they shall find resistance, and that the persons so assembled shall refuse to retire to their houses peaceably, or to render themselves into the hands of justice; that then, for the better keeping of the peace, and preventing any further mischiefs, you command the captains, officers, and souldiers of our said trained bands, by shooting with bullets or other wayes, to suppress such tumults, and destroy such of them as shall persist in their tumultuous ways and disorders: for which this shall be your warrant. Given under our hand, the 3rd of January, 1642. Charles Rex."

The important document was carried to the city by a privy-council messenger, one John Latch, who reported the result of his mission early next morning to Sir Edward Nicholas, secretary of state. "The clocks at Whitehall last night went too late," John Latch wrote; "the night was farther spent than they showed. My lord maior was in his bed before I came thither; yet I spake with him and delivered the letter: this morning he will call the sheriffs to him and open it." The clocks at Whitehall, indeed, were very much too late. Hours before "my lord maior" went into bed, and many more hours before he got out of it again, and had come to call the sheriffs together, the whole city was up and alive, ready to guard the liberty of the nation against all attempts of despotism. Long previous to midnight the acts and proceedings of the House of Commons were in print, and circulated in thousands of copies through the city; and the officers of the train bands, called together by the appointed commissioners, Alderman Pennington and Captain Venn, swore to shed their last drop of blood in the defence of parliament. Before the dawn of the 4th of January had risen over London, the immense majority of the population bearing arms was ready for the struggle which the king meant to provoke, "by shooting with bullets or other wayes," though not in the direction understood by him. Had Charles, instead of listening to French priests and English adventurers, but paid a short visit to the city while the over-loyal lord mayor was asleep and all other men awake, he might have yet come to stop in his frantic course.

There was nothing unusual in the outer aspect of the House of Commons at the meeting of the members on the morning of Tuesday, the 4th of January. Prayers having been said, Lord Falkland reported the result of the interview with the king on the previous evening, and the house was about to proceed to its ordinary business, when Alexander Rigby, a barrister of Gray's Inn, and member for Wigan, arose to make a communication. He said he had just learnt that the night before various messages, purporting to emanate from the court, had been sent to the armed companies of the inns of court, requesting them "to be in readiness this day to attend at Whitehall, and to be ready at an hour's warning to defend his majesty's person;" and having made some pointed remarks upon the singular notion of his majesty's life being in danger, he concluded by moving that four members, belonging to the inns, should proceed thither, and ascertain the facts by personal inquiry. The motion having been adopted, and the deputation despatched, the house, in conformity with a resolution passed the previous day, turned itself into a grand committee to investigate the charges of high treason brought against five of its members.

Pym was the first to arise, holding the articles of treason in his hand. With quiet deliberation, he read the charges one by one, gravely admitting that, if established, they undoubtedly amounted to high treason; yet at the same time expressing an opinion that there must be an extraordinary mistake as to the persons accused. Beginning with the first of the seven articles, accusing him and his colleagues of having "endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England," and of establishing "an arbitrary and tyrannical power," he read it twice, with comments, the allusions of which could not be misunderstood. "True, Master Speaker," Pym exclaimed, "this present parliament hath adjudged it treason to endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws of the land." Then he paused for a moment. "And, sir, it hath likewise been voted high treason to attempt to introduce into this kingdom a form of government arbitrary and tyrannical." Coming to the second article, charging him with endeavouring to "alienate the affections of his people" from the king, the orator's warmth visibly increased. If all his actions in the present parliament, Pym cried, his speeches and votes in favour of publishing a remonstrance against delinquents in the state; against ill-counsellors in government, and against ill-affected prelates in the church—if all this was really found to alienate the hearts of loyal subjects and good Protestants from their due obedience to his royal majesty, then did he avow himself guilty of that charge. Then, reading the third charge, accusing him and the other four members with having "endeavoured to draw his majesty's late army to disobedience," he made another short pause, leaving all to think of the repeated plots of the royal faction to overawe parliament, and of the crowd of soldiers of the "late army" collected at the moment around the king. Then all on a sudden he broke forth: "Yes, sir, it is undoubtedly treason, to raise an army to compel any parliament to make and enact laws without their free votes and willing proceedings therein." So he went on, the house silent as the grave, the members pale with subdued excitement.

Pym having concluded his speech, each of the other accused members, Holles, Heselrige, Strode, and Hampden, rose in succession, all declaring their entire innocence of the charges brought against them, and Hampden entering, moreover, a protest against obeying the commands of a king when contrary to the true religion and the ancient and fundamental laws of the land. The member for Buckinghamshire having concluded his speech, a momentary flutter of alarm ran through the house. "It was now generally declared," Sir Simonds D'Ewes, always writing, put down in his notes, "that there was a great confluence of armed men about Whitehall, and that between thirty and forty cannoneers went yesternight into the Tower, at ten of the clock. Also that the Hamlet men, who were to be ordinary warders there, had no arms given them, but that the bishop's men were well armed. Master Pym moved that we might send notice of these several informations and dangers into the city, to the lord mayor, aldermen, and council there assembled, and to let them know in what danger the parliament was; all which was done accordingly." The despatch of commissioners to the city did not decrease the general apprehensions, stirred by over new rumours. "Soon Master Nathaniel Fiennes and others," Sir Simonds noted in his book, "moved that some members of this house might be sent to observe what numbers of armed men were about Whitehall, and to know by what authority they were assembled there; but this order was not fully agreed upon when we adjourned the house, about twelve of the clock, for an hour's space."

It was a momentous hour for England. While sitting at dinner with his colleagues, Pym received a message from his fair friend, Lady Carlisle, informing him that the king had resolved to go to the House of Commons at the head of an armed band of ruffians, to seize him and the other accused members, and, should the least resistance be offered, to order a general carnage. Trustworthy as was the source, the communication appeared so monstrous and incredible to the valiant leader of the popular party, that he refused for a moment to believe it; and on the speaker resuming the chair, between one and two o'clock, he quietly went to his place in the house, to listen to various reports that were being made. They were all reassuring to a high degree. Richard Brown, member for Romney, and barrister of Lincoln's Inn, stated "that he had done the message of the house to the gentlemen of that society, whose answer was, that they had at first gone to the court last week, upon occasion of a report brought to them that the king's person was in danger;" but "that they had only an intent to defend the king's person, and would likewise do their uttermost also to defend the parliament, being not able to make any distinction between king and parliament; and that they would over-express all true affection to the House of Commons in particular." Next, William Ellis, member for Boston, and of Gray's Inn, "made the like relation;" as also did Roger Hill, of the Inner Temple, member for Bridport, and Philip Smith, of the Middle Temple, member for Marlborough, "with which several answers from the inns of court, the house rested exceedingly well satisfied." It was less the case with the next report, made by Nathaniel Fiennes, member for Banbury, who "made relation that he had been at Whitehall," but had learnt nothing but that the troops there "were commanded to obey Sir William Fleming in all things."

Fiennes had scarcely left off speaking, when a stranger, breathless with running, rushed into the house, and up to him. It was a friend of the member for Banbury, a gentleman of French extraction, Captain Hercule Langros, who came to tell him, in hurried whispers, that the king had left Whitehall at the head of a large body of armed men, and was advancing towards them. The news having been proclaimed aloud, a scene of extraordinary excitement arose. Aware, through the information received from Lady Carlisle, that the further presence of himself and his accused colleagues in the house would probably lead to a scene of frightful bloodshed, as all their friends would of necessity resist their being dragged away by force, Pym at once proposed that they should leave, to which all consented except the member for Beralston. "Master William Strode, the last of the five, being a young man and unmarried," Sir Simonds D'Ewes recorded, "could not be persuaded by his friends, for a pretty while, to go out, but said that, knowing himself to be innocent, he would stay in the house, though he sealed his innocency with his blood at the door. So, not being at last overcome by the importunate advices and entreaties of his friends, when the van, or forefront of those ruffians marched into Westminster Hall, nay, when no persuasion could prevail with the said Master Strode, Sir Walter Erle, his entire friend, was fain to take him by the cloak, and pull him out of his place, and so got him out of the house." The chimes of Westminster had just struck three when Strode was dragged away, and scarcely a minute after the king entered the house at the head of some five hundred cut-throats.

Deep silence once more fell over the assembly of the commons when the tramp of the armed cohort was heard at the door. All members kept their places, their eyes upon the speaker, William Lenthall, who sat enthroned in his chair, with the mace before him.

"There they sat," says John Forster, "Puritan and courtier, the pick and choice of the gentlemen of England; with bearded faces close-cut and stern, or here and there more gaily trimmed with peak and ruff; faces for the most part worn with anxious thoughts and fears, heavy with toil, weary with responsibility and care, often with long imprisonment; there they sat, in their steeple hats and Spanish cloaks, with swords and bands, by birth, by wealth, by talent, the first assembly in the world." The silence of the assembly lasted but a moment. Then, with a loud crash, the door burst open, and the king stepped over the threshold, accompanied by his young nephew Karl, eldest son of the Bohemian "Winter King." Entering the precincts of the commons, sacred from time immemorial, Charles ordered his rude followers to keep back; but they paid no attention to his command, and pushed in tumultuously. "Most of them were armed with pistols and swords," according to Sir Simonds D'Ewes; "and they forcibly kept the door of the house open, one Captain Hide standing next the door, holding his sword upright in the scabbard."

For a minute or two the king stood quiet, as if struck by the appearance of the scene before him; his eye, in the meanwhile, searching for the five members he had come to seize, and the one above all, the shadow of whose greatness had fallen over the throne. Not seeing Pym, "knowing him well," as recorded by Rushworth, Charles slowly bent his steps towards the speaker's chair. As he walked along the house, "we all," noted D'Ewes, "stood up and uncovered our heads, and the speaker stood up just before his chair. His majesty came the most part of the way uncovered also, bowing to either side of the house, and we all bowed again towards him, and so he went to the speaker's chair, on the left hand of it, coming up close by the place where I sat, between the south end of the clerk's table and me"—his majesty's flowing mantle all but touching the garments of a burly man sitting on the opposite side, Oliver Cromwell by name. As the king approached the chair, the chief of the commons went forward a few paces, upon which "he first spake," turning his face slightly towards the assembly. "Master Speaker," Charles exclaimed, "I must for a time make bold with your chair;" and without waiting for an answer, he went to the speaker's seat, and took his place upon the step, not sitting down, however, in the chair. Then ensued another long and "awefull" silence, and after the king had "looked a great while," evidently trying hard to collect his scattered thoughts, he at last broke forth with a short speech, interrupted here and there by his habitual stutter, but overcoming it again and again by convulsive efforts.

"Gentlemen," said Charles, "I am sorry for this occasion of coming unto you. Yesterday I sent a serjeant-at-arms, upon a very important occasion, to apprehend some, that, by my command, were accused of high treason; whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a message. And I must declare unto you, here, that albeit no king that ever was in England shall be more careful of your privileges, to maintain them to the uttermost of his power, than I shall be, yet you must know that in cases of treason no person hath a privilege. And, therefore, I am come to know if any of these persons that were accused are here." Here the king paused, casting his eye around the assembly, scrutinizing the hundreds of stern faces gazing upon him. "I do not see any of them," he stammered forth; "I think I should know them." A new pause followed, painful amidst the deep silence after which Charles continued his address, more and more awkward and incoherent in tone. "I must tell you, gentlemen," he cried, "that so long as these persons, that I have accused, for no slight crime, but for treason, are here, I cannot expect that this house will be in the right way that I do heartily wish it. Therefore I am come to tell you that I must have them wheresoever I find them." There was another long pause, uninterrupted by a sound, which ended by the king crying, with vehemence, "Is Master Pym here?" No reply came to the question. He then called for Denzil Holles, but still the general silence continued.

Seeing the same stern faces gaze upon him uninterruptedly, with no reply from any quarter, Charles grew nervously excited, and pressed the speaker to tell him whether the five accused members were within the house or not. On this, Lenthall, an ordinarily timid man, but made great by a great occasion, fell on his knees. "Your majesty," he exclaimed, "I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in this place; but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here; and humbly I beg your pardon that I cannot give any other answer than this to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me." The singularly appropriate reply seemed to confuse the king still more. "Well, well," he stammered rapidly, "tis no matter. I think my eyes are as good as another's." There was again silence, Charles looking, as noted by D'Ewes, "round about the house, to see if he could spy any of them," and in the end giving vent to an odd farewell address. "Well," he cried, "since I see all my birds are flown, I do expect from you that you will send them unto me as soon as they return hither. But I assure you, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other. And now, since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly, that whatsoever I have done in favour, and to the good of my subjects, I do mean to maintain it. I will trouble you no more, but tell you I do expect, as soon as they come to the house, you will send them to me; or otherwise I must take my own course to find them." With these words, Charles descended from the speaker's place; and, as recorded by the member for Sudbury, "went out of the house in a more discontented and angry passion than he came in, going out again between myself and the south end of the clerk's table, and the prince elector after him." The spell of silence which had hung so long over the commons now was broken, and half-stifled cries of "Privilege! Privilege!" went resounding through the hall of parliament while the king was marching to the door.

"As soon as he was gone," Sir Simonds D'Ewes continues his narrative, "and the doors were shut, the speaker asked us if he should make report of his majesty's speech. But Sir John Hotham said we had all heard it, and there needed no report of it to be made. And others cried to adjourn till to-morrow at one of the clock in the afternoon, upon which in the issue we agreed. And so, the speaker having adjourned the house to that hour, we rose about half an hour after three of the clock in the afternoon, little imagining for the present, at least a greater part of us, the extreme danger we had escaped through God's wonderful providence." "For the design was," the diarist adds, in a note to his day's journal, and before the entry of the morrow, "to have taken out of our house by force and violence the said five members, if we had refused to deliver them up peaceably and willingly, which, for the preservation of the privileges of our house, we must have refused. And in the taking of them away, they were to have set upon us all, if we had resisted, in an hostile manner. It is very true that the plot was so contrived as that the king should have withdrawn out of the house, and passed through the lobby or little room next without it, before the massacre should have begun, upon a watchword, by him, to have been given upon his passing through them. But 'tis most likely that those ruffians, being about eighty in number, who were gotten into the said lobby, being armed all of them with swords, and some of them with pistols ready charged, were so thirsty after innocent blood, as they would scarce have stayed the watchword if those members had been there, but would have begun their violence as soon as they had understood of our denial, to the hazard of the persons of the king and the prince elector, as well as of us. For, one of them understanding, a little before the king came out, that those five gentlemen were absent, 'Zounds!' said he, 'they are gone! and we are never the better for our coming!'"

The ardour of the king's followers was much greater than his own. They would have gladly set out for a hunt after the five members, who, as was generally known by the time Charles had left the House of Commons, were gone by water to the city, but he would not let them, and moody and sullen, discontented with himself and all the world, he returned to Whitehall. Vaguely the consciousness that he had played another tremendous stake, and had lost it, was dawning upon his mind; and in his distraction the idea occurred to him that he might make good in words what he had spoilt in performance, by publishing an annotated account of his intrusion into the House of Commons. With this object in view, the king sent, shortly after his arrival at Whitehall, for the assistant clerk of the house, whom he had seen busy writing in front of the speaker's chair while giving vent to his confused utterances. Arrived in the royal presence, John Rushworth was startled to hear the command from the king's lips to give up the copy of his majesty's speech that day, which he had been observed to take "in characters" at the table in the house. The young man stammered out excuses about its being forbidden to report the proceedings of the commons; but he was interrupted angrily by Charles, who cried, "I do not ask you to tell me what was said by any member of the house, but what I said myself." Longer resistance being impossible, Rushworth, as recorded by himself, "gave obedience to his majesty's command, and in his majesty's presence, in the room called the jewel house, transcribed his majesty's speech out of his characters, his majesty staying in the room all the while, and then and there presented the same to him."

The printed report of the king's speech in the House of Commons, intended to make it appear that he had acted in a legal manner, was sent the same night into the city, together with a proclamation reiterating the charges against the five members, and closing the port against any attempt they might make to quit the country. Charles still believed that the city was on his side, his confidence being based mainly on the accidental circumstance of the post of chief magistrate having come to be filled by a person strongly inclined to be a courtier. The belief exhibited, more than almost anything else, the marvellous conceit and ignorance of the king, and the isolation, and retreat among false counsellors, to which his despotic tendencies had driven him. At the very moment when he was making another appeal to the inhabitants of the capital, they had risen in arms against him. The first intelligence of Charles's attempt to seize the five members created a panic. "The shops of the city," according to Clarendon, "were generally shut up, as if an enemy were at the gates ready to enter and to plunder them; and the people in all places at a gaze, as if they looked only for directions, and were then disposed to any undertaking." London had started up in revolution, its sword pointed against the throne.

During the whole night, from Tuesday the 4th to Wednesday the 5th of January, the capital was in arms, the train bands guarding the gates, and excited people running about in all directions, crying that "the cavaliers," as the adherents of the court were called, had the intention "to fire the city," and "that the king himself was at the head of them." With daylight breaking on the Wednesday, the report that Charles was coming to the city got stronger, until it rose into seeming certainty about nine o'clock, when the great news flew from mouth to mouth that his majesty had left Whitehall already, and was advancing along the Strand towards Temple Bar. The news proved but too true. As incapable to learn from experience, as to open his eyes to the great fact that he was going to battle, not with a few parliamentary speakers, but with a whole nation, Charles had resolved to repeat his attempt of the previous day under infinitely more difficult and dangerous circumstances. To seize the five members of the House of Commons, now shielded by more than fifty thousand swords and a dense population of above a quarter of a million, the king set out for the city towards nine o'clock, accompanied by a small train of courtiers. The reception he met with from the crowds that had gathered in the streets was unfavourable in the extreme. All the way from Temple Bar to the Guildhall the people shouted "Privilege! Privilege of parliament!" and one citizen, less restrained than the rest, made himself conspicuous by flinging through the window of the royal coach, right into the king's face, a paper with the inscription, "To your tents, O Israel!"

Charles, now as always, acting in haste, had given no notice of his coming to the city authorities, and he had to walk up the steps to the Guildhall almost alone, while the lord mayor, common council, and aldermen, whom public rumour had advertised of his arrival, put on their robes and hurried up from their houses. The majority of them having assembled around him, together with a miscellaneous crowd of citizens, the king addressed his new audience in a short speech. "Gentlemen," he cried, "I am come to demand such persons as I have already accused of high treason, and do believe are shrouded in the city. I hope no good men will keep them from me: their offences are treasons and misdemeanours of a high nature. I desire your loving assistance herein, that they may be brought to a legal trial. And whereas there are divers suspicions raised that I am a favourer of the popish religion, I do profess, in the name of a king, that I did and ever will, and that to the utmost of my power, be a prosecutor of all such as shall any ways oppose the laws and statutes of the kingdom, either Papists or Separatists; and not only so, but I will maintain and defend the true Protestant religion, which my father did profess, and I will continue in it during life." Highly conciliatory as was the address, it had not the effect desired by Charles. A short silence followed the conclusion of the royal speech, after which, as reported by an eye-witness, Captain Slingsby, confused shouts arose among the audience, some calling out "Parliament! Privilege of parliament!" and others, "God bless the king!" the cries continuing "both at once a good while;" but the calls for "Privilege" gradually getting to drown all others.

"After some knocking for silence," Slingsby, loyal adherent of Charles, goes on to say, "the king commanded some to speak if they had anything to say. One said, 'It is the vote of this court that your majesty hear the advice of your parliament;' but presently another answered, 'It is not the vote of this court. it is your own vote.' The king replied, 'Who is it that says I do not take the advice of my parliament? I do take their advice and will; but I must distinguish between the parliament and some traitors in it, and those I will bring to trial!'" The last words Charles repeated again and again, stammering, "to trial—trial!" There was silence again for a few minutes, till the breaking out of a fresh incident, not a little characteristic of the whole memorable scene. "Another bold fellow in the lowest rank," Captain Slingsby continues in his narrative, "stood up upon a form and cried, 'The privileges of parliament!' and another cried out, 'Observe the man; apprehend him!' The king mildly replied, 'I have and will observe all privileges of parliament; but no privileges can protect a traitor from a trial—a trial!' And so departed. In the outer hall were a multitude of the ruder people, who, as the king went out, set up a greater cry; 'The privilege of parliament!'" To escape the cries of the multitude, the king, according to the report of another eye-witness, Thomas Wiseman, "bid himself to dinner to Sheriff Garrett's, where he stayed till three of the clock;" but to no other effect than that of increasing the excitement against him. "Returning to Whitehall," Wiseman says, "the rude multitude followed, crying again, 'Privilege of parliament! Privilege of parliament!' whereat the good king was somewhat moved, and, I believe, was glad when he was home." One more grand stake was thrown and lost.

While Charles was dining at the sheriff's house in the city, with cries of "Privilege!" under the windows, the commons reassembled at Westminster. The excitement of the previous day, not lessened by the king's visit to the Guildhall, was still in all minds, and the first proceedings of the house were to order that the doors should be locked, and the outer lobbies be cleared of all strangers; that no member should offer to go out without leave; and that some should send forth their servants to see whether any armed crowds were approaching the gates. These preparations, deemed necessary for immediate safety, finished, it was moved by Harbottle Grimstone, member for Colchester, that the house should adjourn for a week, till Tuesday the 11th of January, and that in the mean time the commons should be represented by a select committee, sitting at the Guildhall or some other place in the city. The motion was opposed with great energy by the court party, but after an hour's sharp discussion was adopted by a vote of 170 against 86. "And thereupon," Sir Simonds D'Ewes noted in his diary, "Sir John Culpeper, newly-made chancellor of the exchequer, and divers others, were named to sit as a committee at the Guildhall, in London, to-morrow morning at nine of the clock, and all that would come were to have voices; and they were to consider of the breach of the privilege of parliament by his majesty's coming yesterday." In addition to this, another vote passed that a message should be sent to the lords, to let them know that, "by reason of his majesty coming to our house yesterday in such a warlike manner, we had adjourned the house till Tuesday next, at one of the clock; and that we had in the meantime appointed a select committee to sit in the Guildhall, to which all the members of the house who would come were to have voices, to consider of the breach of the privilege of parliament and the safety of the kingdom."

The motion to transfer the seat of parliament for a time into the city had scarcely been adopted when a new panic arose. It was bruited at the doors that the armed bands of Whitehall had been let loose once more upon the House of Commons, and in the agitation of the moment the members were divided in opinion whether it would be best becoming their dignity to adjourn at once, or to remain on their seats awaiting the arrival of the royal mercenaries. Sir John Clotworthy, member for Maldon, a country gentleman of much Irish experience, accustomed to face all sorts of ruffians and cut-throats, insisted that they should stop; and to set an example of legislating under difficulties, he brought forward at once a series of motions, to which, however, the house showed little disposition to listen. There were many cries of "Move! move!" but many more of "Adjourn! adjourn!" and in the end, amidst increasing confusion, all the proposals of brave Sir John "were allowed and voted by the house, but in such haste as they would not permit the clerk to read them." "For," continues D'Ewes, "we had new alarms given us of the coming down of armed persons upon us, and it was generally reported also that his majesty had intended to come down to both the houses this afternoon, again attended with the desperate troop with which he came yesterday, and to have accused some other members, both of our house and of the lords' house, of treason, and to have seized upon their persons; but that, going into the city of London this morning, he was there so roundly and plainly dealt withal, by people of all sorts, who called upon him to maintain the privilege of parliament, to follow the advice of his great council in parliament, without which they were all undone, and that their blood would cry to Heaven for justice, and that they would with their lives and fortunes maintain the safety of his majesty's person, and the safety and privilege of parliament—some also throwing the printed protestation of the House of Commons into his coach as he went along—as that he both returned late out of the city, and altered, it seems, his former resolution."

The king's "resolution," unfortunately for himself, was still as unsettled as ever. At every successive check he received, his pride and obstinacy rebounded, and instead of learning wisdom from failure, it seemed to make him only the more stubborn in continuing in the old disastrous path. Deeply imbued with the divine-right superstition, fatal heirloom of the Stuart kings, but which they, of all men, were least fitted to exemplify, he could not bring himself for a moment to believe that he, the anointed sovereign, should be wrong in his doings and his subjects right in theirs. All that he had witnessed in the last days or weeks only proved to him that the "traitors" and "conspirators" were more numerous than he had at first imagined. It was exasperating, no doubt, that "treason" should be as rampant in the city as he had found it there; yet still the king did not come back disheartened, and in less than an hour after his return to Whitehall he set himself to make new endeavours for laying hold of the chief parliamentary traitors after whom he had been hunting for the last two days. In the teeth of the advice of nearly all the members of the privy council, Charles arrived at the determination to issue another decree for the arrest of the five members, and perceiving the unwillingness and all but open resistance of his ministers to the scheme, he drew up the order with his own hand.

The mandate—still existing in the original, the rough scrawl of Charles showing his fitful precipitancy—was addressed to "Our trusty and well-beloved councillor, Sir Edward Nicholas, our principal secretary of state," and ran as follows. "Charles Rex.—Our will and pleasure is that you forthwith prepare a draught of a proclamation declaring ye course of our proceedings upon the accusation of high treason and other high misdemeanours lodged against Mr. Donzil Holles, Sir Arthur Heselrige, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. William Strode, members of our House of Commons, who, being struck with the conscience of their own guilt of soe hainous crimes, have made their escape. And our will and pleasure is that you thereby commende all our officers, ministers, and loving subjects, to use their diligence in ye apprehending and carrying of them, and every of them, to our Tower of London, to be kept in safe custody, to be brought to triall according to justice. And that, moreover, you prohibitt all our loving subjects to harbor, relieve, and maintayne them, with any other fit clause. And for doing hereoff this shall be your sufficient warrant. Given at our court at Whitehall this fifth day of January in the 17th year of our of our reigne." It was an act of madness to issue such a proclamation, a fresh challenge, not only to the House of Commons, but to the whole city, already arrayed in arms against the crown, and priding itself in giving shelter to those whom the king accused of high treason. Sir Edward Nicholas and his other advisers vainly tried to persuade Charles to withhold his new edict. He insisted it should be issued, and to get his behest obeyed, wrote with his own hand the order "to our printer to print our proclamation." It was not strength, or perseverance for a principle, but weakness, hiding itself under the cloak of obstinacy.

If there remained any doubt yet as to the attitude assumed by the people of London in the struggle between king and parliament, it was dispelled by the first meeting of the commons in the city, on Thursday the 6th of January. While Charles on the preceding day had been all but hooted through the streets, the members of the lower house were received with marks of the deepest respect and affection, and carried in triumph to the Guildhall, where a deputation of the leading members of the common council, in their robes and chains, were waiting to receive them. A guard of honour, composed of the wealthiest citizens, each with his footman in livery behind him, was stationed in and around the Guildhall as special protection of the commons; while the train bands stood ranged further off, enclosing the representatives of the nation circle within circle. Nor were other attentions of a hospitable nature wanting. On suspending their deliberations, at the hour of dinner, the commons were surprised to find a banquet prepared for them, and apologize as they might, they had to sit down to it, and partake of "great choere." But the banqueting did not make earnest members forget the earnestness of the time, and the grand objects which had brought them to the city. "It was first debated and resolved," reports Sir Simonds D'Ewes, indefatigable as ever with his note-book, "that the impeachment of the five members was illegal, and a breach of the privilege of parliament. Then they fell in debate—which continued when I came in—that the scaling up of the doors of the chambers and studies of the said Master Pym and Master Holles, on Monday morning last, was a breach of the liberty of the subject and of the privilege of parliament; and this was also voted upon the question. Then we fell in debate concerning the king's issuing out warrants, signed with his own hand, to Mr. Francis and others his sorceants-at-arms, to attach their bodies, that they were illegal, and against the liberty of the subject." It was finally moved by Sir Henry Vane the younger, to "make some short declaration," and the proposal having been adopted, and a committee appointed, they retired to draw up the paper. While they were absent, "I departed," says D'Ewes, "from the committee, between two and three of the clock in the afternoon; but the declaration was afterwards brought in by the said committee, and allowed and voted, and also printed."

The declaration began by stating that a great breach had been committed against the rights and privileges of parliament, and the freedom of speech of the House of Commons, by the king's attempt to arrest the members, and then went on: "And whereas his majesty did issue forth several warrants, under his own hand, for the apprehension of the persons of the said members, which by law he cannot do, there being not all this time any legal charge or accusation, or due process of law, issued against them, nor any pretence of charge made known to the house, all which are against the fundamental liberties of the subject and the rights of parliament: whereupon we are necessitated, according to our duty, to declare, and we do hereby declare, that any person that shall arrest Mr. Holles, Sir Arthur Heselrige, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, or any of them, by pretence or colour of any warrant issuing out from the king only, is guilty of a breach of the liberties of the subject and of the privileges of parliament, and a public enemy of the commonwealth." The commons had hauled back the challenge thrown by Charles, and it remained to be seen whether the people of England were disposed to obey the orders of "the king only," or range themselves under the banner of "the commonwealth."

During the five days from Thursday the 6th till Monday the 10th of January, while the commons were sitting at Guildhall—changing the place of meeting at times, for more convenience, to Grocers' Hall—extreme agitation continued to prevail both at court and in the city. More than once the king was on the point of hurling the armed host of "cavaliers" that was crowding round him, including such men as Colonel Lunsford, the two-day governor of the Tower, against train bands and parliamentary traitors, but his courage each time failed at the last moment, and indecision constantly gained the upper hand, leaving him the prey of his own thoughts, and the vacillating tool of the swarm of needy and desperate adventurers congregated at Whitehall. Their schemes and plots counteracted so far upon the city as to keep the people in a perennial state of excitement, filling the air with ever-new rumours of assaults, fights, and battles to come. The alarm reached its zenith late in the evening of Friday, the 7th of January, by the arrival of a report that startled every soul in London. As recorded by D'Ewes, "this night a gentleman coming to the watch at Ludgate, between nine and ten of the clock, informed them that those soldiers and ruffians who came down to the house on Tuesday last had some design upon the city, to be executed this night; whereupon the city and the suburbs were almost wholly raised, so as within little more than an hour's space there were about forty thousand men in complete arms, and near upon a hundred thousand more that had halberds, swords, clubs, and the like. And the general cry of the city, 'Arm! Arm!' was with so much vehemency, and knocking at men's doors with so much violence, as some women, being with child, were so affrighted therewith as they miscarried; but after the lord mayor had sent to Whitehall and some other places, and found all things quiet, the streets were cleared within an hour's space, and every man retired to his house."

To prevent a repetition of such scenes, the commons, the next day, set themselves to place the military organization of the city on a better footing than it had hitherto been, by laying down fresh rules, and appointing new officers to the train bands, and nominating a commander-in-chief for the whole of the armed forces. The choice for the latter important post fell upon John Skippon, captain of the London military school, called the Artillery Garden, a pious man no less than brave soldier, who was invested with the title of "major-general of the militia of the city of London." There was much merriment among the fine courtiers at Whitehall at the news of the appointment, John Skippon being, as reported by Lord Clarendon, "altogether illiterate," and "from a common soldier had raised himself to the degree of a captain and to the reputation of a good officer," not by royal commission, but merely by his own merit. But the old "common soldier" proved a wonderfully good commander, upholding the strictest discipline, and gaining the hearts of his men as none ever had gained them before. When leading the city train bands, not long after, against the mocking cavaliers, they were made to feel the weight of the sword, no less than the power of eloquence of the "illiterate" captain. "Come, my boys," he would cry, "my brave boys, let us pray heartily, and fight heartily. I will share the same fortunes and hazards with you. Remember the cause is for God, and for the defence of yourselves, your wives, and children. Come, my honest brave boys, pray heartily and fight heartily, and God will bless us." It was the new language of a new race of Englishmen, unknown as yet at Whitehall, and incomprehensible in the court dialect.

The exaltation of the citizens of the capital greatly increased towards the end of the week in which the commons had sought a refuge in the Guildhall; and one of its effects was the expression of a strong desire among all classes that the national representatives should be taken back in a triumphal procession to Westminster, on the day appointed for reassembly there, Tuesday, the 11th of January. As the time approached, London got filled by vast crowds from all the neighbouring counties, who came to testify their sympathy and affection for the popular cause. Buckinghamshire alone sent up four thousand sturdy yeomen, farmers, and freeholders, all on their own horses, who had arrived specially to gather round and protect John Hampden; and equal and larger numbers flocked in from Kent, Essex, Surrey, Herts, and Middlesex, till the city seemed unable to hold the vast numbers of unbidden yet welcome guests. A singular spirit of brotherhood, never before witnessed, appeared to pervade the vast crowds that floated up and down, wave-like, through the narrow streets of the capital, with thousands of bright eyes looking down upon them from the high gabled dwellings. Master and servant, rich and poor, went mingling together; persons who had never beheld each other's face shook hands as they met—shook hands and passed on, without uttering a word, the radiant joy in their eyes alone expressing the purpose of their grasp.

The four thousand men from Buckinghamshire, with throngs of squires and freeholders from other counties, came riding into the city on Saturday, the 8th of January; and on Sunday the churches were crowded to such an extent that many of the ministers had to put their pulpits in the streets. Nearly all, with one accord, preached on the text of the hundred and twenty-second psalm: "Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together; whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord. For there are set thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David." Urged on by the boundless enthusiasm of the multitude, Pym and the other four accused members, who had hitherto abstained from taking part in the parliamentary proceedings, resumed their seats the next morning, Monday, the 10th of May, among their colleagues at the Guildhall. They were received with rapturous shouts of applause, taken up by the multitude outside the doors. Various deputations followed to heighten the exaltation of the hour. First came some hundred sailors and mariners from the port of London, with a petition signed on the spur of the moment by more than a thousand hands, offering, as told by the member for Sudbury, "to be with us to-morrow, to defend the parliament by water with muskets and other ammunition, in several vessels;" which offer "was accepted by us," with directions "to meet at the Hermitage at three of the clock the next morning." Next appeared a large deputation from the London apprentices, desiring, "in their own names, and in the names of all the rest, to guard the parliament to-morrow." The reply given to them was "to keep at home to-morrow for the guard of the city, whilst their masters did guard at the parliament," the humble answer to which was "that they would obey our command; and so departed." There were still more delegations behind. "Divors of the borough of Southwark," Twes put down in his notes, "then came and offered the assistance of their train bands to us to-morrow, to come and be our guard at Westminster. We told them that we hoped the city of London would take care for our guard; but accepted their offer with thanks, and desired them to be in the fields about Lambeth and Southwark in their arms." The Southwark deputation had scarcely left the commons when a piece of news of all-absorbing importance went flying from mouth to mouth. It was that the king had suddenly and secretly run away from Whitehall, no man knew whither.

Like all the resolutions of Charles, the great one of taking to flight, without the existence of the least indication of danger to his person to justify so extreme a step, was hastily taken and still more hastily executed. Up till the afternoon of Monday he kept wavering between opposite courses, reason telling him to make his reconciliation with parliament and his subjects, and pride to continue in his arbitrary career. With the queen, her priests, and the crowd of bootless adventurers at court all dragging in the latter direction, the mental struggle did not last long, and by three o'clock he had come to the determination to crown all his other senseless doings by making his escape from London. "Before his going," as related by Clarendon, "he sent to the earls of Essex and Holland to attend him in his journey, who were both by their places, the one being his chamberlain of the household, the other the prime gentleman of his bedchamber, obliged to that duty. The earl of Essex resolved to go, and to that purpose was making himself ready, when the earl of Holland came to him, and privately dissuaded him, assuring him that if the two went they should be both murdered. Whereupon they left the king to his small retinue, and in a most disconsolate perplexed condition, in more need of comfort and counsel than they had ever known him; and instead of attending their master in that exigent, they went together into the city."

The flight of Charles, followed by the desertion of nearly all the honourable men who had hitherto been adhering to his fortunes, threw the whole weight of political power at once into the hands of parliament, and more particularly the House of Commons. The return of the members from the city to St. Stephen's, on Tuesday, the 11th of January, was a triumph greater than even the most sanguine of them could ever have expected. On both sides of the River Thames, all the way from London Bridge to Westminster Stairs, the shore was crowded with people in their gayest festal attire, the train band in front with drums beating and banners flying, and the immense multitude behind, shouting welcome to the men who had overthrown that despotism which had weighed so long and so heavily upon the land. The members of the House of Commons went at midday from the city to Westminster by water, which was almost as crowded as the shore. "The Thames," says Clarendon, "was guarded with above one hundred lighters and long-boats, laden with nablettes and murderers, and dressed up with waist-clothes and streamers, as ready for fight."

The largest and most splendid of the barges belonging to the corporation of the city had been specially fitted up for the five accused members, and embarking in it "from the Three Cranes," they gave the signal for the immense procession to put itself in movement. "They returned," the under secretary of state

wrote to Admiral Pennington, "with such multitudes as had far more of triumph than guard; and the seamen made fleets of boats, which gave volleys all the way they went." "There was one circumstance not to be forgotten," Clarendon adds, "in the march of the city that day, when the show by water was little inferior to the other by land, that the pikemen had fastened to the tops of their pikes, and the rest in their hats, or their bosoms, printed papers of the protestation which had been enjoined by the House of Commons the year before, for the defence of the privilege of parliament; and many of them had the printed votes of the king's breaking their privileges in his coming to the house and demanding their members." The spectacle of a whole population thus rising up to proclaim its freedom was so grand altogether as to impress even the partisans of the court. "If I could be Pym with honesty," Sir Edward Dering, member for Kent, and warm adherent of the royalist party, wrote home to his wife, "I had rather be Pym than King Charles."

The first act of the commons, reinstalled at Westminster, was to pass a vote of thanks for "the great kindness and affection they had found in the city, and their zeal to the parliament." When the vote had been passed, the five accused members arose together, and while Hampden, Holles, Heselrige, and Strode stood silent and uncovered, Pym tendered, in the most impassioned language, his own hearty thanks and those of his colleagues to the citizens of London. He should never forget, he said, the unexampled scene they had that day witnessed, "and if their expressions of it, upon this extraordinary occasion, had been somewhat unusual, the house was engaged in honour to protect and defend them from receiving any damage." Then the sheriffs of the city were called into the house, and thanked by the speaker "for their extraordinary care and love expressed to the parliament," adding, "that they should have an ordinance of parliament for their indemnity," and declaring "that all their actions of respect and kindness, which they had showed to the lords and commons in London, and their attending them to and at Westminster, was legal and justifiable." The officers of the train bands, and the masters of the vessels in the river were likewise called in, and received the thanks of the speaker, who at the same time ordered Major-general Skippon to attend every day at Westminster, with such a guard as he thought sufficient for the guard of the two houses. This done, Arthur Goodwin, Hampden's colleague in the representation of Buckinghamshire, arose, asking that such of the gentry of his county as had been appointed to be the bearers of a numerous signed address to parliament might be called in to deliver it. The same being assented to, the Buckinghamshire deputation came in, and the spokesman informed the house that more than six thousand men of his county had come to London, every one of them ready to defend, with life and fortune, the honourable members of the commons, or, if need were, "to die at their feet."

The words were followed by cheers from the dense crowd blocking up all the passages to the house; and which, taken up by the multitudes outside, re-echoed again and again, sounding like distant thunder. "And then," Sir Simonds D'Ewes recorded, "they withdrew out of the house; but they were so many, and the press was so great in the lobby and rooms next without the door, that they were a good while before they could get out." The member for Sudbury, following the crowd, went out after it, and was recompensed for the trouble he took by a grand sight. "I went to walk a while in Westminster Hall," he noted in his diary, "and there stood many of the citizens, of the train bands of London, and of the eight companies, which guarded us this day by land, being in all two thousand four hundred men, in their arms, besides companies of the city of Westminster. And I saw upon the top of the pikes of divers of the Londoners the protestation, formerly framed and taken by the members of the House of Commons, and afterwards by most of the citizens, hanging like a little square banner; some had them also affixed, as I am informed, to their muskets; one had it fastened upon his breast, and it was also wrapped upon one of the ensigns." Sir Simonds felt, and many others felt with him, that there was as much eloquence in these little bits of paper, carried like banners by the people, as in all the din of cheers and speeches resounding in and around St. Stephen's Hall.

The first intoxication of victory over, the great question before the commons was their attitude towards the king. All hope of reconciliation was clearly gone with his flight from London, and there could be little doubt of his intention to raise a civil war for regaining the despotic power of which he had been dispossessed. However, his plans in this respect were not so manifest as to allow of energetic action, and the majority of the members of the house, moreover, were as yet so imbued with instinct loyalty that they dared not lift their hands or voices against the sacred person of the sovereign, even although the saving of the country from the most frightful of all evils depended upon it. Only a few of the boldest and most statesmanlike of the leaders of the popular party attempted, more or less secretly, to gain adherents to the proposal to force the king into abdication, and crown the prince of Wales, now twelve years old, surrounding him with such advisers as would give in their persons sufficient guarantee for the maintenance of the new and hardly-gained liberties of the nation. It was clearly the only scheme promising a solution of the terrible difficulties of the moment and escape from the horrors of civil war; nevertheless, the great body of the members shrank from the step with something like terror, and on Sir John Northcote, member for Ashburton, mentioning, a few days after the reassembly of the house at Westminster, that "it was reported by some that there was an intention to crown the prince and make him king," the words raised such a storm that he had to give up speaking.

The want of prudent energy thus shown by the men who had become the virtual rulers of the nation, as it could not but lead to the most deplorable consequences in the end, so was immediately fraught with an amount of wavering, if not dissimulation, that went far to frustrate all their actions. For a few days after his flight from the capital, Charles felt so dejected and dispirited that he would, probably, under gentle pressure, have signed his abdication and allowed his son to take possession of the throne, as the only alternative that would save his crown to his family. He and his consort made their way, first to Hampton Court, and from thence to Windsor, with scarcely any men of position as followers, and in such a state of poverty and wretchedness that they had to borrow money for their subsistence from their servants. "The prince [of Wales] one night wanted wine and another candles," one of the court attendants informed his wife in a letter of the 14th of January; likewise, "the king and queen are forced to lie with their children now," and "the king is so poor that he cannot feed them that follow him." What added greatly to the dejection of Charles was that even his consort, who hitherto had urged him on in his desperate career, was losing courage, being under the impression that parliament was going to impeach her, and that she might suffer the fate of Strafford. The fear so worked upon her mind that she conceived the plan of escaping to the Continent, with the double object of placing her own person in safety, and of enlisting mercenaries to fight the king's battles in the approaching civil war. Charles gave his consent to the scheme, though with great reluctance, being most unwilling to lose the society of his spouse, as well as afraid that her departure would still more endanger his cause. Her stronger will having gained once more the upper hand, the king allowed his consort not only to proceed abroad, but to lay hold of and take with her the crown jewels, agreeing that the national property should be converted into soldiers, guns and ammunition for making war upon the nation. The House of Commons, with lamentable weakness, made no opposition to the design, its veneration for the kingly office being still far stronger than its patriotic feelings and love of justice.

Having given his assent to the queen's departure, a new phase opened in the career of Charles. It now became his immediate object to gain time, and to amuse parliament with the appearance of granting what he was determined to resist, till he had set himself at the head of a military force, with which he could crush the hated representatives of the people and annul all their acts. A few days after the re-assembling of the commons at Westminster, he sent them a message declaring that he waived the impeachment for treason against the five members, and if still proceeding against them would do so "in an unquestionable way;" and on the house asking for proofs of the charges, he replied that he could not give his evidence, but that no time should be lost in preferring the indictment at common law "in the usual way." There appeared to be no suspicion among the members that they were being toyed with merely; and so far from throwing up the king's game, and proceeding to energetic measures, becoming the responsible and perilous position in which they were placed, they dallied on more loyally than ever, despatching humble petitions to Windsor, and receiving in return gracious replies, full of compliments, and obscure as oracles. To a request of extraordinary import, touching the appointments in the militia, which the commons desired should "be settled in every county upon such persons as the parliament should approve," Charles returned an answer of an exceeding cleverness, vague and well-bred enough to perplex the most headstrong of his antagonists. "The king," according to Thomas May, "in fair language desired the parliament, since the particular grievances and distractions were too many, and would be too tedious to be presented by themselves, that they would comprise and digest them into one entire body, that so his majesty and themselves might be able to make the more clear judgment of them, and that it should then appear, by what his majesty would do, how far he hath been from intending or designing any of those things which the too great fears and jealousies of some persons seem to apprehend, and how ready he would be to equal, or exceed, the greatest examples of most indulgent princes in their acts of grace and favour to the people."

The fine words, in such contrast to the acts of Charles as to be utterly absurd, "were received," as reported by May, "with thanks by the parliament, who resolved to take them into speedy and serious consideration." While thus beguiling his faithful commons, the king got everything ready for the warlike mission of his consort to the Continent, and the crown diamonds having been securely packed up, with as many other valuables as could be seized, they both started for Dover in the middle of February. The ostensible object of the queen's journey was to take her little daughter, Princess Mary, ten years old, who had been betrothed some months before to Prince William of Orange, to Holland, to learn Dutch; but the real intent of the expedition was so little hidden that it was a matter of open conversation in the city, where not a few of the more clear-sighted politicians gave vent to their grief and indignation that parliament, having been so bold before, should all on a sudden become so timid as to allow the open prosecution of the most nefarious designs for disturbing the peace of the nation. A kind of stupor, produce of the sudden and unexpected victory which they had achieved, and of a dark fear in the minds of many that it might drive them too far towards democracy, appeared to have fallen upon the House of Commons, and the members were roused from it only for a moment on learning that the king and queen, in their journey to Dover, had been joined by the prince of Wales. On this they sent an order to the marquis of Hertford, governor of the young prince, to bring the heir to the throne to London. But the command met with no obedience; and having put his wife and the regalia safe on board a Dutch vessel, on the 23rd of February, Charles turned round, with his son in his company, to make his way to the north of England and prepare for battle.

Now or never was the time for parliament to stop the further proceedings of the king, and smother the rising flame of intestine war. Unfortunately, though there was no want of courage on the part of the leaders, it failed the body of the members, and they could not be induced to go further than send off another petition. They humbly entreated Charles to continue his abode near London and his parliament, and not to take his son, the prince, out of those parts; "to which the king," says May,

"denied to give any other answer" than "that he conceived himself not safe in any place near London, and that he would take such a care of the prince, his son, as should justify him to God as a father and to his dominions as a king." It was evident, from the haughtiness of the language, that Charles was beginning to feel new ground under his feet. While the commons were strong, the king had been wavering, and now the commons were wavering the king got strong.

In moving northward, after sending the queen and her eldest daughter away, and taking the prince of Wales under his own charge, the plan of Charles was to seize the town of Hull, the most important military magazine next to the Tower of London, to raise troops, nominally for the suppression of the Irish rebellion, which his adherents were keeping alive and gradually fanning into a wide massacre of Protestants, and, when strong enough, and having received the foreign regiments whose help his consort was to purchase with the crown jewels, to march upon the capital and annihilate parliament and the opponents of his regal power. The scheme, due mainly to the fertile brain of Henrietta-Maria, was not without great chances of success under the existing indecision of the House of Commons; but at the outset the king was stopped in the speedy prosecution of his vast design by a powerful obstacle in his want of money. His consort had taken possession of nearly everything capable of being converted into coin, and the needy crowd of adventurers and soldiers of fortune who had hitherto been following in his track showed entire unwillingness to go further without being paid for their services. Thus the king's progress to the north was of extreme slowness. At Theobalds, Newmarket, Ely, and other towns in the eastern counties, where he stayed for several days, he had to receive new petitions from the commons, more and more urgent in tone, to which he replied in the old evasive manner, alternately coaxing and threatening the parliamentary messengers. At Newmarket, on the 9th of March, a select committee of both houses, headed by the earls of Pembroke and Holland, waited upon him with a long declaration, reiterating all the "fears and jealousies" so often expressed, pressing him again to put away the "evil counsellors" who were leading him into wrong paths, and particularly entreating him to return to the capital, into the midst of his faithful subjects. The declaration stated that both lords and commons "had searched their affections, their thoughts, considered their actions, and they found none that could give his majesty any just occasion to absent himself from Whitehall and his parliament, but that he might, with more honour and safety, continue there than in any other place." His desertion, they said, they took "as the heaviest misery to himself, and imputation upon them, that could be imagined, and the most mischievous effect of evil counsels; it rooted up the strongest foundations of the safety and honour of the crown, and it cast upon the parliament such a charge as was inconsistent with the nature of that great council, being the body of which his majesty was the head."

The conclusion of the address, as reported by Clarendon, was most pathetic, enough to touch any other man but Charles. "They besought his majesty to consider in what state he was, how easy and fair a way he had to happiness, honour, greatness, plenty, and security, if he would join with his parliament and his faithful subjects in the defence of the religion and the public good of the kingdom. That was all they expected from him, and for that they would return to him their lives and fortunes, and make their uttermost endeavours to support him, his just sovereignty, and power over them. But," they continued, "it was not words that could secure them in their humble desires. they could not but too well and sorrowfully remember what gracious messages they had from his majesty the last summer, when, with his privacy, the bringing up of the army was in agitation; they could not but with the like affections recall to their minds how, not two days before he gave directions for the impeachment of the five members and his own coming to the House of Commons, that house received from him a gracious message that he would always have care of their privileges as of his own prerogative, and of the safety of their persons as of his own children. That which they expected, and which would give them assurance that he had no thought but of peace and justice to his people, must be some real effect of his goodness to them, in granting those things which the present necessity of the kingdom did enforce them to desire. In the first place, that he would be graciously pleased to put from him those wicked and mischievous counsellors who had caused all those dangers and distractions; and, secondly, to continue his own residence, and the prince's, near London and the parliament, which, they hoped, would be a happy beginning of contentment and confidence between him and his people, and be followed with many succeeding blessings of honour and greatness to his majesty, and of security and prosperity to the nation." Never had parliamentary eloquence found nobler expression, in language coming alike from brain and heart. Unfortunately it was lost upon an empty brain and an emptier heart.

Charles's reply to the great declaration of the lords and commons was coarse and vulgar in the extreme. The reading of it by the earl of Holland he interrupted repeatedly with such ejaculations as "That's false!" and "It's a lie!" the latter one of his majesty's favourite phrases, but singularly out of place on this occasion. Having listened with much impatience to the end, the king told the deputation that he would give them a full reply the next day. "I am confident," he cried, stuttering as usual, "that you expect not I should give you a speedy answer to this strange and unexpected declaration. As concerning the grounds of your fears and jealousies, I will take time to answer them particularly, and doubt not but I shall do it to the satisfaction of all the world. God, in his good time, will, I hope, discover the secrets and bottoms of all plots and treasons, and then I shall stand right in the eyes of all my people." Having thus invoked heaven to discover plots, while he was plotting civil war, Charles continued, in a more rambling tone, "I still confess my fears, and call God to witness that they are greater for the true Protestant profession, my people and laws, than for my own rights and safety. What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to pass any one bill for the ease and security of my subjects? I do not ask you what you have done for me. Are my people transported with fears and apprehensions? I have offered as free and general a pardon as yourselves can devise. There is a judgment from heaven upon this nation if these distractions continue. God so deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of the true Protestant profession, and for the observation and preservation of the laws of the land, and I hope God will bless and assist those laws for my preservation."

The last words being uttered "suddenly and with some vehemence," the deputation thought fit to withdraw, after requesting that "since they were to carry back with them no other answer, his majesty would vouchsafe to give them what he had spoken in writing." This the king did the next morning; but his reply being extraordinarily vague, the earl of Holland made bold to ask him what were his real demands. "I would whip a boy in Westminster school that cannot tell that by my answer," cried the king, with great brutality; and being further entreated by the deputation to take pity upon the miseries of his subjects and return to the capital, he snappishly exclaimed that the declaration "was not the way to it." Then came a final explanation between Charles and the parliamentary deputation. To prevent, if possible, the threatening civil war from breaking out, the commons, in conjunction with the lords, had been trying for some time to get the king's assent to the bill vesting in them the appointment of the chief officers of the militia. Charles had hitherto refused it absolutely, and the earl of Pembroke now once more pressed him to grant the desired power, if only "for a time." "By God! not for an hour!" the king ejaculated; "you have asked that of me which was never asked of a king, and with which I will not trust my wife and children." So the interview ended, the king immediately after hurrying away from Newmarket further north, while the deputation, sad at heart, went back to London. "As soon as they returned," says Clarendon, "and reported to both houses what they had received, and in what disposition and temper they found and left the king, it was ordered that their declaration which they had sent to him should be speedily printed, and carefully dispersed throughout the kingdom, that the people might see upon what terms they stood." Parliament still trusted to the printing press, while Charles had already firmly grasped the hilt of his sword.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.

Leaving Newmarket, the king went to Huntingdon, and from thence to York, which he reached on the 19th of March, having gathered around him on the road a crowd of squires and nobles disaffected to the parliament, and levied contributions sufficient to hold together the throng of military adventurers and other "cavaliers" that had followed him, under somewhat loose discipline, from Whitehall. Arrived at York, Charles set to organise his forces, and deeming it time to lift, at least in part, the veil from his further movements, he sent a message to the House of Lords, with the information that he intended to go in person over to Ireland, "to chastise by force of arms those barbarous and bloody rebels," and for that purpose "thought fit to advertise the parliament that he intended to raise forthwith, by his commissions, in the counties near Westchester, a guard for his own person when he should come into Ireland, consisting of two thousand foot and two hundred horse, which he would arm at Westchester, from his magazine at Hull." The message was dated the 8th of April, 1642; but before it reached London, the commons, now at last awoken to a sense of the extreme dangers threatening the nation, had already taken some steps towards counteracting the aggressive movements of the king. They passed a vote, immediately confirmed by the lords, "that the kingdom hath been of late, and still is, in so evident and imminent danger, both from enemies abroad and a popish and discontented party at home, that there is an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his majesty's subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of the king and his people." This was followed by another still more significant resolution. It was to the effect "that the lords and commons, apprehending danger, and being sensible of their own duty to provide a suitable prevention, had in several petitions addressed themselves to his majesty for the ordering and disposing the militia of the kingdom, in such a way as agreed upon, by the wisdom of both houses, to be the most proper for the present exigence of the kingdom; yet they could not obtain it, but his majesty did several times refuse to give his royal assent thereunto." In consequence of which it was resolved now "that in case of extreme danger, and of his majesty's refusal, the ordinance agreed on by both houses for the militia did oblige the people, and should stand among the laws of the kingdom; and that such persons as should be nominated deputy lieutenants, and approved of by both houses, should receive the commands of both houses to take upon them to execute their offices."

The important resolution, amounting to little less than the grasping of the sword by parliament, was not passed without strenuous opposition of the minority, apparently more than ever afraid of the dismal black clouds hovering in the air, and inclined rather to bend anew under the heavy weight of kingly despotism than to face the unknown dangers in the trail of the rising spirit of democracy. In the upper house, the militia bill was agreed to only after a long and warm debate, and under the written protest of thirteen peers, the number including not only the known members of the court party, but several nobles who had hitherto voted on the liberal side, such as Lord Seymour and the earl of Southampton. The tearing asunder of old party divisions was no less marked in the House of Commons, the most resolute members of which, though not shrinking back from the stern duty imposed upon them, yet felt as if overborne by the immense weight of their responsibilities. "The weather was very cold," Sir Simonds D'Ewes noted, "and our debate full of sadness and evil augury, all conceiving, that whether we sat still or did proceed to settle the militia by authority of both houses, matters were now grown to a desperate pass." A little more determination, displayed a little earlier, might have chased the grisly phantom of civil war: now it was standing by, knocking at the door, and proclaiming loudly the advent of the revolution.

While the commons were still groping their way onward in fear and hesitation, the king began to act. After a fortnight's stay at York, Charles had succeeded in gathering near a thousand adherents, whose loyalty was flaming up in enthusiastic addresses, one of them entreating him to take up his temporary residence at Hull, and there to unfurl his standard. "Your royal person is," the writers declared, "the David, the light of Israel, and more worth than ten thousand of us." In conformity with the invitation, which, not quite accidentally, fell in with his own plans, the king moved towards Hull, intending to take possession of the place partly by stratagem and partly by force. Late in the evening of Friday the 22nd of April, the prince palatine, son of the "Winter King," accompanied by the younger brother of the prince of Wales, the duke of York, a boy of nine, who had just come up from Richmond to join his father, presented themselves at the town entrance, claiming to be the guests of the mayor for a night or two. They were admitted without hesitation, and splendidly feasted the next day at a banquet prepared in their honour, to which also the governor, Sir John Hotham, was invited. The banqueting was still going on when an express despatched by Charles came riding up, informing Sir John that the king had resolved upon honouring the town of Hull with a visit, to stay for a few days with his son and nephew, and to share the hospitalities which they were enjoying. On the heels of the first came a second messenger, not official, but despatched by some zealous patriots, who reported to the astonished governor that his majesty had with him a train of from five to six hundred "servants," all of them of singularly warlike appearance, high on horseback, with long dangling swords, pistols in their holsters, and steel-cased from head to foot. To admit such visitors, evidently coming for other purposes than merely to dine, was more than Sir John dared to do on his own responsibility. Though attached to the king, he yet had the fear of parliament before his eyes; and uncertain which way to turn, he summoned the magistrates and officers of the garrison to a consultation, resolved to act upon their advice. It was to the effect to admit the king and the prince of Wales, together with a dozen of their followers, but to exclude the rest, on the well-grounded plea that the entrance of armed strangers into the town was forbidden by the rules of service, as well as by a special act of parliament passed not long before. The notification, couched in the most respectful terms, was forwarded instantly to the king, who had come to be within a mile of Hull; and on his paying no attention to it, the governor, instigated by some of his chief officers, more warmly than himself attached to the popular cause, ordered all the gates to be shut, the drawbridges to be raised, and the whole garrison to be put under arms.

Charles fumed with rage when approaching Hull and seeing it closed against him. His expectation had been that he would be allowed to ride in quietly, and that a short and sharp fight in the streets, and seizure of all his antagonists at a banquet, or by night in their beds, would suffice to settle the fate of the town. Not strong enough to make his entrance by force, the king sat down for some hours at the gate, sending message after message to Sir John Hotham, the first full of flattery and the others of menace. Finding all fruitless, he ordered the duke of York and prince palatine to leave the town, and, they having joined him, he retreated to Beverley, and from thence despatched heralds proclaiming the governor of Hull a traitor, and all who obeyed him guilty of high treason. The only effect of the royal proclamation was that Sir John Hotham, "a man of a fearful nature and perplexed understanding," according to Clarendon, and who, in his opinion, "would have conformed to the king's pleasure if prepared dexterously befriend and in confidence," was driven temporarily into the ranks of Charles's fiercest enemies.

His first failure in raising the standard of civil war brought the king again for a moment back to his old hypocritical ways. Assuming the airs of a deeply-injured sovereign, he had the assurance to appeal to the House of Commons to set him right with his traitorous subjects, who had deemed laws of parliament higher than his own orders. From York, which he once more made his head-quarters, after the retreat from Hull, he sent a long message to the commons, declaring that the behaviour of Sir John Hotham had been the greatest indignity ever heaped upon him, the more so as Sir John "had justified his treason and disloyalty by pretence of an order and trust from them, which his majesty was confident they would not own, but would be highly sensible of the scandal he had laid upon them, as well as of his disloyalty to his majesty." The message not being immediately replied to, Charles despatched a second, more urgent one, to the members of both houses of parliament. "He was so much concerned in the undutiful affront he had received from Sir John Hotham, at Hull," his majesty wrote, "that he was impatient till he received justice from them, and was compelled to call again for an answer; being confident, however, that as they had been so careful to have put, though without his consent, a garrison into the town, to secure it and his magazines of war against any attempt of the papists, that they never intended to dispose and maintain it against him, their sovereign. Therefore, he required them forthwith, the business admitting of no delay, that they would take some speedy course that the said town with all its magazines might be immediately delivered up to him, and that such severe exemplary proceedings should be against those persons who had offered that insupportable affront and injury to him, as by the law was provided." Till this was done, he "would intend no business whatever, other than the business of Ireland."

The extraordinary missive, marvellous compound of frankness, impertinence, and duplicity, finished with the startling assertion that the walled towns of the kingdom belonged to the sovereign, the same as all personal property belonged to its owners. By being shut out of Hull, his majesty stated, he was "brought into a condition so much worse than any of his subjects, that while they all enjoyed their privileges, and could not have their possessions disturbed, or their titles questioned, he only might be spoiled, thrown out of his towns, and his goods taken from him." The time had come, he added, "to examine how he had lost those privileges;" and it was his intention "to try all possible ways, by the help of God, the law of the land, and the affection of his good subjects, to recover them, and to vindicate himself from those injuries; and if he should miscarry therein, he should be the first sovereign of the kingdom that had failed." It was a little constitutional question, this of his majesty's "titles" to his "possessions," which, there could be no doubt, clearly demanded a settlement.

The answer to the king's second message followed very quickly in an unanimous address of the two houses of parliament, prefaced by a declaration drawn up by the lords. In the latter his majesty was told, with a tone of sternness never yet displayed by the peers, "that Sir John Hotham had done nothing but in obedience to the command of both houses of parliament, and that the declaring of him a traitor, being a member of the House of Commons, was a high breach of the privilege of parliament; and, being without due process of law, was against the liberty of the subject and against the law of the land." The address following this declaration was very explicit, as well as elaborate, aiming to controvert point by point the strange legal and constitutional principles laid down by the king. After declaring that the two houses of parliament were prepared to accept the refusal of the governor of Hull to let his majesty enter the place as their own act, the document went on to say that it was not only irrational to maintain that this or any other town in the realm were royal property in the same sense as a man's goods, house, or jewels were his own; but that such a claim in itself formed the basis of a worse than oriental despotism. The address further argued that "though the king may be entrusted with public property for the common good, the powers delegated to him by the community are under the control of the nation;" that "the erroneous maxim infused into princes that their kingdoms are their property, and that they may do with them what they will, as if their kingdoms were made for them, and not they for their kingdoms, is the root of all their subjects' misery, and of all the invasions of their just rights and liberties;" that "the king is merely entrusted with the forts and magazines of war for the general good, and that the crown jewels themselves compose a part of this trust, being placed under his command only for public uses;" that "as these trusts are for the common good, so ought they to be exercised by the advice of both houses of parliament, authorized by the nation to see them properly discharged;" and, finally, that "even if it should be admitted, which was impossible, that his majesty had a property in the town and magazines of Hull, yet the parliament was entitled to dispose of his property, as well as that of his subjects, in such a manner as to secure the kingdom from danger."

Going on to combat the motive of precedents which the king had put forward, the address argued with deep sagacity that it was vain to urge precedents, since the representatives of the nation in parliament assembled might, upon better grounds, make precedents for posterity than their ancestors had done for them; and that if there were no precedents in their favour, it was merely because there had not hitherto been counsellors who attempted to alienate the people from parliament, and infuse into them disobedience to the fundamental laws of the realm, sacred guards of the freedom of the nation. "Were there ever," the address concluded, "such practices to poison the people with an ill apprehension of the parliament? Were there ever such imputations and scandals laid upon the proceedings of both houses? Were there ever so many and so great breaches of privilege? Were there ever so many and desperate designs against the parliament and the members thereof? If we have done more than our ancestors have done, we also have suffered more than ever they have suffered. And yet, in point of modesty and duty, we shall not yield to the best of former times, and we shall put this in issue, whether the highest and most unwarrantable precedents of any of his majesty's predecessors do not fall short and much below what has been done to us in this parliament; and, on the other side, whether, if we should make the highest precedents of other parliaments our patterns, there would be cause to complain of want of modesty and duty in us." Charles made no rejoinder to the address, but immediately after receiving it, on the 12th of May, summoned a meeting of all his adherents at York, and declared "that he was resolved, in regard of the public distempers, and the neighbourhood of Hull, to have a guard for his person." In the wake of this declaration, "the king," says Clarendon, "appointed such gentlemen as were willing to list themselves into a troop of horse, and made the prince of Wales their captain, and made choice of one regiment of the trained bands, consisting of about six hundred, whom he caused, every Saturday, to be paid at his own charge." The step was equivalent to a declaration of war, and considered as such by both houses of parliament.

As soon as the weighty intelligence arrived in London, the commons, in conjunction with the lords, formed themselves into a grand committee, to take up the gauntlet thrown down by the king. After a short but excited debate three resolutions were resolved upon and passed the same day, the 20th of May. The first ran: "It appears that the king intends to make war against the parliament, who, in all their consultations and actions, have proposed no other end unto themselves but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person." On the resolution being put to the vote, it met with sharp opposition: but, as reported by D'Ewes, "the hotter and more violent spirits prevailing in number, the question was carried affirmatively, although there were many negatives against it. Notwithstanding that, upon Mr. Pym's motion, seconded by myself, the words 'seduced by wicked counsel' were added after the word 'king.'" The next two resolutions passed "with little or no difficulty." They were: "That whensoever the king maketh war upon parliament, it is a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to the dissolution of the government;" and "that whosoever shall serve or assist him in such wars, are traitors by the fundamental laws of this kingdom; and have been so adjudged by two acts of parliament, 2 Rich. II. and 1 Hen. IV., and ought to suffer as traitors."

The passing of the three resolutions, definite reply to the war declaration of the king, was the signal for many members of the court party, in both the upper and lower house, to run away to York and openly range themselves under the banner of Charles. Among the first who took this step were Edward Hyde, Lord Falkland, and Sir John Culpeper. All three had been playing a very doubtful and undignified part in the House of Commons since the king's flight from London, acting as if they did not approve many of the doings of his majesty, while yet everybody knew that they were his advisers, and in constant and uninterrupted communication with him. Hyde, the leading man of the three, and suspected author of many of the proclamations and edicts issued by Charles, had arranged to follow his royal master before it had come to a complete breach between him and the parliament, but he remained longer at Westminster for the purpose of drawing others away from parliament and over to the king's side. His aim more especially was to seduce the lord-keeper of the great seal, Sir Edward Littleton, not so much on his own account, he himself being obnoxious to the king for his moderately liberal opinions, but to get possession of the symbol of executive authority entrusted to his hands.

After long secret negotiations, Littleton was induced to give his promise to join the royalists at York; however, when the moment arrived for the flight, he still hesitated, which led the king, who felt more and more anxious to procure the great seal, to have recourse to a measure of considerable boldness. In the middle of May, a day or two after he had taken the final step towards civil war by enrolling troops, Charles despatched one of his bedchamber grooms, a daring youth named Thomas Eliot, to London, with instructions to get the great seal from the lord-keeper, if possible by fair words, but if necessary by force. Eliot executed his commission with as much skill as audacity. As soon as arrived in London, on the 22nd of May, he obtained a private audience of Sir Edward Littleton, and informed him of his master's orders; and finding him unwilling to fulfil his demands, locked the door of the chamber, cocked a couple of pistols, and threatened to blow out his brains. For this argument Sir Edward was unprepared, and hesitating no longer, delivered up the seal, which the king's messenger carried off at once, in furious ride, to York. There remained nothing for the lord-keeper but to follow his assailant, being too deeply engaged in the intrigues of the court party to answer for the past; and in the afternoon of the 23rd of May, the announcement of his flight was made in the upper house of parliament, creating much consternation. It was shared in by the commons; while in the city there was a sort of panic for twenty-four hours, many of the people holding that all authority in the state rested with the actual possessor of the engraved stamp with which the bedchamber groom had run away.

Edward Hyde, Lord Falkland, and the other principal members of the court party in the House of Commons, took to flight immediately after the lord-keeper. Hyde, soon to be Lord Clarendon, shrewdest of the knot of political adventurers who resolved to throw in their fortune with the king, had been closely watched for some time by the leaders of the popular party, but managed to make his escape at the last moment by a somewhat vulgar display of cunning. Feigning to be very ill, he obtained on the day of Thomas Eliot's arrival in London the speaker's leave for a short absence in the country, and went to conceal himself at a friend's house near Oxford, a little away from the northern road, along which he meant to fly. Here he stayed, till learning that both the great seal and the lord-keeper had got away safely, when he himself slowly and watchfully crept towards the north, not however going directly to the king, so as to compromise himself irrevocably, but stopping at a distance from the royal camp, and remaining in the meanwhile in daily and almost hourly correspondence both with his friends at York and in London. His absence being noticed in the House of Commons, inquiries were made after him, when the speaker informed them "that Mr. Hyde had acquainted him with his going into the country to recover his health by fresh air, and that Dr. Winston, his physician, had certified that he was troubled with the stone." On this, George Peard, member for Barnstable, expressed his belief "that Mr. Hyde was troubled with no other stone than the stone in his heart, and therefore he would have him sent for wherever he was, for he was confident that he was doing them mischief wherever he was."

The motion was thrown out by the commons, on the good ground of not giving any undue importance to men who treated the misfortunes of the country as a political lottery; but the lords acted otherwise, and on the 25th of May, two days after the flight of Littleton, they ordered that an account should be taken of all the peers who had absented themselves, without permission, from their duties in parliament. The list having been made out, it was found that it comprised thirty peers, besides the lord-keeper, namely, one duke, one marquis, sixteen earls, and twelve lords, all of whom were summoned, by letter and proclamation, to appear at Westminster by the 8th of June. Twenty-one made no reply, indicative of their being still engaged in watching the ebb and flow of the tide before casting their fortune upon the waters. The other nine, the earls of Devonshire, Dover, Monmouth, and Northampton, and Lords Capel, Coventry, Rich, Howard of Charlton, and Grey de Ruthyn, returned a common answer, stating that they had gone to the city of York by order of the king, and intended to remain there by the same authority. The peers decided by a unanimous vote to communicate the letter to the commons, and on the 11th of June the matter was debated in the lower house. After a lengthened discussion, the speaker put the question, that the said nine lords had offered an affront to the parliament by going to York and not returning back when summoned, and that they might justly be suspected of furthering a civil war in the kingdom. Many being against the putting of this question, the house divided on it, appointing "Mr. Denzil Holles and Mr. Cromwell tellers for the ayes." The ayes having been found to number 109, and the noes 51, the house declared the nine lords who had espoused the cause of the king traitors to the commonwealth.

Both sides now entered into active preparations for the seemingly inevitable war. Charles had followed up the levying of troops in Yorkshire with the despatch of commissions of array, in his own name, through all the counties, and the two houses of parliament now in their turn ordered that the militia ordinance, passed a short time before, should be put into execution. Both the royal emissaries and the parliamentary commissioners exerted themselves to the utmost to carry out the orders with which they were entrusted, as well as to defeat their antagonists, and the result was no little disturbance, confusion, and distress in the quiet homesteads of England. The turmoil was heightened by constant change of sides among leading men in the counties, the result partly of unscrupulous bribery, and partly of great political vacillation. In Leicestershire, which was believed to be devoted to the popular cause, Henry Hastings, a younger son of the earl of Huntingdon, came forward all on a sudden and boldly proclaimed the king's commission of array, in defiance of the two members, Sir Arthur Heselrige and Lord Grey, who had come as parliamentary commissioners to organize the militia. In Buckinghamshire, one of the great strongholds of liberal opinion, parliament encountered a still more unexpected difficulty. On the 14th of June, John Hampden reported to the house that a general muster of the newly-raised militia of his county was to take place within a few days, but that Lord Paget, the lord-lieutenant, who had taken an active part in the measure, and was believed to be a firm adherent of the popular party, had run away to York. He therefore moved that either a new lord-lieutenant might be appointed, or that the deputy lieutenants might be empowered to fulfil his functions. "We all wondered," Sir Simonds D'Ewes recorded in his diary, "at the Lord Paget's mean and unworthy spirit to go to York to the king, having already mustered the county. Mr. Hampden and others were appointed to draw up an order." Like many of his noble friends, Lord Paget not long after ran back to Westminster with as much celerity as he had taken in galloping to York, evidently quite unable to find out which way the wind was blowing. A fine specimen of a somewhat numerous class, the Buckinghamshire lord-lieutenant incurred no very great obloquy by the twirls he executed; the worst that happened to him was being laughed at by his colleagues in the upper house. "My Lord Paget," wrote the earl of Radnor, a kind of D'Ewes among the peers, "in the beginning of this parliament was very fiery against the court; but afterwards ran away from the parliament with the old earl of Bristol, and remained a fiery courtier till the tide began to turn, and then warps off from the king. About 1641, coming to the court, talking with the queen, he boasted much of the power of the country lords, and said, 'Madam, we are as strong as Sampson!' 'My lord,' replied the queen, 'I easily believe it, seeing you want not among you the jawbone of an ass.' Ever after he was nicknamed 'Sampson.' This lord had a long lean face, not differing in length from that of an ass."

Although both houses of parliament were now roused to considerable energy, the king was yet more active, if not more successful in his war preparations, than they. On the 1st of May he published his commissions for the array of the northern counties, and the following day the spirit of the "Cavaliers" was cheered by the arrival in Kenningham creek of a small vessel from Holland, bearing stores of arms and ammunition sent by the queen. Henrietta

Maria, after selling or pawning the greater part of the English regalia, had managed to fit out the vessel, which she baptized "The Providence," in spite of the jealous watching of several parliamentary envoys, who, aware of the task in which she was engaged, tried hard to prevent both the disposal of the national property and the stirring-up of civil war by calling for the interference of the Dutch government. The latter felt well enough disposed towards a cause so much in harmony with their own great battle for civil and religious liberty; nevertheless, the authorities of the republic either had not, or professed not to have the power to prevent the glittering diamonds with which her majesty of England had absconded from finding their way into the outstretched hands of the eager pawnbrokers of Amsterdam, nor the gold advanced by them from flowing into the hands of other dealers, in exchange for powder and bullets, ships and ships' stores. To make up for their laxity in this respect, the rulers of the Dutch commonwealth treated the queen herself with the utmost disdain. "They showed," wrote one of the companions of Henrietta Maria, "no respect or veneration for her royal person; they entered her presence with their hats on; threw themselves on chairs close to her; stared at her from under the brim of their heavy beavers; and flung out of the room without bowing or speaking to her." The queen, though feeling deeply hurt at the treatment, accompanied at times by rude speeches broadly insinuating that she had stolen the diamonds which she was selling and pawning, nevertheless continued her task-work, the first fruit of which was the running of "The Providence" from Amsterdam to Hull, and up the Humber into Kenningham creek.

The arrival of the little vessel despatched by his consort was such a joyful event to Charles, that he celebrated it the next day, the 3rd of June, by holding a great review of his followers and adherents at Heyworth Moor. It was far more numerous than the king had foreseen, a crowd of nearly a hundred thousand men, citizens of York, on foot and on horseback, peasants, farmers, and freeholders, encircling the body of his own partisans, numbering, with the trained bands enrolled under the royal banner, not above two thousand. At the commencement of the review it was reported to Charles that a petition was being circulated among the crowd, which, in humble and affectionate terms, entreated him to banish all thoughts of civil war, and to make his reconciliation with the parliament. To put a stop to the "extreme insolence" of the multitude, the Cavaliers rode in upon the groups of people, snatching copies of the petition from the hands of the readers, and declaring to all that the king would never consent to receive the document. Charles himself, to prevent being addressed by any of his subjects, spurred quickly along the lines of his armed partisans; but before he had come to the end, a gentleman of about thirty years of age sprang forward from the crowd, bent a knee, and laid the dreaded petition on the pommel of his majesty's saddle. Seeing the movement, the king roughly urged his horse onward, to trample upon the intruder. However, the petition-bearer was of firm mould, keeping the animal at bay, and leaving Charles to turn aside with a scowl. It was the first, but not the last time his majesty set eyes upon the Yorkshire gentleman, whose name, as he learnt by-and-by, was Sir Thomas Fairfax.

The total of his forces having swollen, by gradual accumulation, to between three and four thousand men, Charles nominated his lord-chamberlain, the earl of Lindsey, commander-in-chief of the army, with Sir Jacob Astley, a man of some military experience, as major-general under him; and in conjunction with them drew up a plan of operations, the first part of which was the taking of Hull. But before marching to the attack of the place which he had been coveting for many months, and which, in the opinion of Thomas May, "did allure him to forsake the parliament sitting at London and visit the north," the king had recourse to another extraordinary piece of fraud. The attitude of the population at the review of Heyworth Moor had created in him apprehensions of meeting with resistance on the part of the people in his first aggressive enterprises; and to lull the excitement of the masses to sleep, no less than detain parliament from making any decided efforts to secure Hull, he got all the men of note who had rallied around him to issue a joint declaration protesting his love of peace, and solemnly denying all warlike designs and preparations. The extraordinary document, bearing the date of June 15, 1642, ran as follows: "We, whose names are underwritten, in obedience to his majesty's desire, and out of the duty we owe to his majesty's honour, and to truth, being here upon the place, and witnesses of his majesty's frequent and earnest declarations and professions of his abhorring all designs of making war upon his parliament, and not seeing any colour of preparations or counsels that might reasonably beget the belief of any such designs, do profess before God, and testify to all the world, that we are fully persuaded that his majesty hath no such intention, but that all his endeavours tend to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant religion, the just privileges of parliament, the liberty of the subject, and the law, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom."

To this declaration, as base in conception as form, no less than forty peers, great officers of state, or intimate advisers of the king, set their names, conspicuous among them being those of Edward Hyde and of Lord Falkland, the latter referred to on all occasions as the very soul of honour, and the one among all the partisans of the royal cause whose character was without blemish. In less than a fortnight after the issue of the solemn declaration of peace "before God and all the world," Charles set his troops in movement upon Hull, he himself marching at the head of them, accompanied by Hyde, Falkland, and the rest of his political and military advisers. The total forces under his command amounted to about three thousand foot and one thousand horse, and the numbers being deemed insufficient to take the town by assault, the king resolved to enclose it from all sides, so as to reduce it by starvation. For this purpose he began by employing the greater part of his infantry to cut trenches "to divert the current of fresh water that ran to Hull," while the cavalry took possession of the roads leading to the town, intercepting all communication, and posting up everywhere royal proclamations interdicting, on pain of death, to carry provisions thither. To the governor and garrison the attack thus treacherously made came entirely unexpected, but they met it with high courage and determination. "Sir John Hotham," recorded the "secretary for the parliament," Thomas May, "perceiving the king's intentions and endeavours, and knowing him to be in person within an hour and a half's march of the town, having first sent three messengers, one after another, with humble petitions to him, who were all laid fast by the king and not suffered to return, called a council of war, in which it was debated whether or not they should permit the enemies to march near the town with their ordnance, holding them play from off the wall and outworks, until the tide came to its height, and then draw up the sluice and let them swim for their lives. But a more merciful advice prevailed, which was, for prevention of so many deaths, to draw up the sluice presently, having the advantage of a spring tide, and drown all the country about Hull." The plan was carried out with the greatest success, all the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood acquiescing cheerfully in it, on receiving the governor's assurance that "whatsoever damage they received thereby should be repaired, by the authority of parliament, out of the estates of those persons who had been most active to assist the king in his designs."

BEVERLEY MINSTER.

The story of the siege of Hull, first notable event of the civil war, was noted down by "the secretary for the parliament" in detail, and with much graphic power. At the first approach of the king, "Sir John Hotham by letters informed the parliament in what condition the town was, desiring only, so it might speedily be done, a supply of money and victuals, with five hundred men. Upon which, by command of parliament, drums were beat up in London, and other adjacent places, for soldiers to be sent to Hull by sea. The earl of Warwick was desired by the Houses to send two of the king's ships from the Downs to Hull, to do as Sir John Hotham should direct for his best assistance. And Sir John Meldrum, a Scottish gentleman, an expert and brave commander, was appointed to assist Sir John in that service. The king's army were not confident to carry the town by plain force, making their approaches with great difficulty and disadvantage, and those for the most part in the night time, when undiscovered they burnt two mills about the town. They therefore had recourse to subtlety, and knowing some within the walls fit for their purpose, a plot was laid to fire the town in four places, which, whilst the soldiers and inhabitants were busy in quenching, two thousand of the king's army should assault. The sign to those within the town, when to fire those places, was when they discerned a fire on Beverley Minster; it should be assurance to them within the town that they without were ready for the assault. But this treason had no success, being discovered by one of the instruments, and confessed to Sir John Hotham. The townsmen of Hull were so far provoked by this treacherous design of their enemies, and so much animated against them, that they all entered into pay, and now the walls would not contain them. But five hundred of the town, conducted by Sir John Meldrum, issued out, about the end of July, upon their besiegers, who, seeing their approach, prepared courageously to receive and encounter them. But they were but a small part of the king's forces which were resolute to fight; the other part, which consisted of the trained bands of that country, were not forward to be engaged against their neighbours. The king's horse, and most resolute assistants, seeing themselves deserted by the foot, retired as fast as they could to Beverley; but Sir John Meldrum pursued them, slew two, and took thirty prisoners in the pursuit."

The end was disastrous for the king's partisans, or "Leaguers," as they were often denominated. "Not long after," says Thomas May, "when the supplies from London arrived at Hull, Sir John Meldrum, with a greater force, made so fierce a sally upon his enemies, as caused most of the leaguers to retire disorderly, one and twenty of them being slain, and fifteen taken prisoners. Sir John Meldrum, following the advantage of his success with a swift motion, arrived suddenly at a leaguer-town called Aulby, between three and four miles from Hull, where the king's magazine was kept in a barn, in which was a great quantity of ammunition, powder, and fire-balls, and certain engineers employed there for making of fireworks. Sir John suddenly set upon it in the night, drove away the guard, who consisted most of trained bands, and other Yorkshire men, bearing no great affection to the war, and therefore ran more speedily away, leaving their arms behind them. Much of the ammunition and arms they took away with them, fired the barn, the powder, and fireworks, and what else they could not carry with them, and returned safely again into Hull. Then the king, calling a council of war, and considering the ill success of his proceedings, and the preciousness of that time which he consumed there, by their advice resolved to break up his siege before Hull and march away." Before Charles had made good his retreat from Hull, a decisive vote was passed at Westminster. (On the 12th of July it was resolved, on the motion of Henry Marten, member for Berkshire, and reporter of the "Committee of Lords and Commons appointed to provide for the safety of the kingdom," that "an army shall be forthwith raised for the safety of the king's person, the defence of both houses of parliament, and of those who have obeyed their orders and commands, and for the preservation of the true religion, the laws, liberties, and peace of the kingdom." By a unanimous vote of both houses the command of the parliamentary army was intrusted to the earl of Essex.

Next to the army, the thoughts of the leaders of the House of Commons were turned towards the navy. Most of the common sailors were known to be warmly attached to the parliamentary cause, but this was less the case with the officers; and even as regarded the lord high admiral, the earl of Warwick, there was some uncertainty as to whether he would not prefer taking orders from York instead of from Westminster. Charles, with his usual rashness and want of judgment, settled the doubt by superseding Warwick, and conferring his place upon Sir John Pennington, a good sailor, who had long served as vice-admiral, but for various causes, among others his retrograde political opinions, had made himself highly unpopular. The king had no sooner taken this step, when the House of Commons reinvested Warwick with the command-in-chief, who thereupon hesitated not a moment to execute his powers and chase his hated rival from the scene. Having summoned the captains and chief officers of the various ships to give in their adherence to parliament, all obeyed except five, Captains Baily, Fogge, Slingsby, Wake, and the rear-admiral of the navy, who declared that they were under orders from the king to obey Sir John Pennington, and could follow no other command. After giving in this declaration, the five captains made preparations to desert with their vessels, but Warwick was on the alert. "He came to anchor about them," noted Thomas May, "and having begirt them, summoned them; upon which three of them came in and submitted, and two only, Captain Slingsby and Captain Wake, stood out. The earl let fly a gun over them, and turned the glass upon them, sending his boat, and most of the boats in the fleet, to let them know their danger if they came not within that space. But so peremptory was their answer, that the sailors grew impatient, and although they had no arms, assaulted them, seized upon their captains, being armed with their pistols and swords, struck their yards and topmasts, and brought them to the earl. Thus, by the wonderful courage of these unarmed men, the business was ended without effusion of any blood, when the earl was ready to give fire upon them."

Within a few days after the earl of Warwick had resumed the command of the royal navy, the loss of it was brought painfully home to the king by an event of some importance. Henrietta Maria, still busy in the Netherlands pawning crown jewels and buying guns and gunpowder, by the aid of which she meant to rebuild the edifice of absolutism in England, had fitted out another vessel, full of ammunition and war material of all sorts, and despatched it to Newcastle. The vessel, called "The Lion," commanded by a brave old sailor, Captain Fox, got safely out of the Zuyder Zee, and was nearing the English coast, when it was caught by adverse winds and driven into the Downs, in sight of Warwick's fleet. Being summoned to surrender, Captain Fox at first refused, and was about to engage in battle, intending, when driven to extremity, to sink his ship, when the mutiny of his English crew compelled him to strike his flag and submit at discretion. Vast stores of gunpowder, and no less than forty-two great pieces of brass ordnance were found in "The Lion," the capture of which for a moment disconcerted the whole of the king's movements.

By a mere chance it failed having a still more momentous result, by depriving Charles of the aid of an ally destined to play a very conspicuous part in the progress of the civil war stirred up by the royal faction. There embarked in "The Lion," when setting sail from Amsterdam, a nephew of Charles, one of the eight sons of the unhappy "Winter King," Prince Rupert. He was a youth of twenty-three, of little education, but fond of chivalric and warlike exercises; and this, and his impetuous character, brought Henrietta Maria to think that he would make a capital general in the service of her consort, fit to hew down all enemies of the throne, and to stamp out the plague of parliamentary government on the soil of England. The queen accordingly enlisted Rupert, who expressed the most eager desire to fight his uncle's battles; and surrounded by a train of French and other foreign adventurers, including his brother Moritz, the young prince started in "The Lion," with the blessing of Henrietta Maria on his head, and all the gold she could spare in his pocket. All went well for the first twenty hours, while "The Lion" was scudding along the lake-like Dutch lagoons; but the scene changed after the vessel of Captain Fox had got out into the open ocean, and went dancing about on long North-sea waves, lashed into foam by a strong north-easter. The fiery valour of the warlike son of the "Winter King," ready to annihilate at a stroke all the rebels against the authority of Uncle Charles, now collapsed on a sudden. Prince Rupert declared to Captain Fox that he felt abjectly miserable; that he repented the hour he had set foot on board "The Lion;" and that he wished he was dead, or, preferably, to be again on shore, away as far as possible from the ugly jumping North-sea waves. It was in vain that Captain Fox tried to break the despondency of his august passenger by using all his sailor eloquence, even giving his word of honour that the naughty waves would behave better by-and-by, if only his highness would have a little patience. But the prince refused all consolation, and insisted on being taken back immediately to the green Dutch shore, into the rural peace of cows, and cheese, and buttermilk. There remained nothing but to obey the orders of Rupert, as he had been invested by the queen with the supreme command of the expedition, and his highness and friends accordingly were landed again on the third day after starting. "The Lion," continuing her voyage, was captured in less than a week, leaving the nephew of King Charles under a full sense of the advantages of being sea-sick at the right time.

The capture of "The Lion" was a sore grief to the king, and, in his exasperation, he resolved once more upon rushing forward immediately into battle with his opponents. Driven back from Hull, he remained for a few weeks at York, gathering around him all the Roman Catholic squires of the northern counties, and as many adventurers, English and foreign, as could be got under his severe financial straits; and having collected, by dint of great efforts, a train of two thousand persons, he set out to perform an exploit half warlike and half theatrical. It was the raising of the royal standard at Nottingham. Disregarding the fact of having commenced hostilities ever since his arrival in the north, and shedding the blood of a great many of his subjects, Charles took up the attitude of a deeply-injured sovereign, finding himself suddenly face to face with rebels against his authority. After issuing various proclamations, professing, as usual, the greatest love for his people, and deepest attachment to parliamentary government, and throwing the whole blame of the distracted government of the kingdom upon half a score of "traitors" in the House of Commons, Charles set out from York, and, at the head of his two thousand retainers, slowly advanced towards Coventry, under the walls of which he set up a regular camp. Here he was joined by Prince Rupert and his brother Moritz, who had managed to get across the North sea in a temporary calm, and, rejoicing at the boldness of the deed, exhibited the fiercest mood. Possessing all the impetuosity of his unhappy father, but entirely wanting his education, his manners, and his other estimable qualities, Rupert came into England like a compound of Dutch boor and knight-errant of the middle ages, utterly ignorant of the people, and looking down upon them as upon a crowd of serfs, who might be crushed under the hoofs of his war-horse. He had not been many days with the king before his superior physical vigour asserted its natural ascendancy, and Charles, as wavering and irresolute as ever in his life, was drawn along helplessly by his new companion. Thus uncle and nephew set out together for the great dramatic performance at Nottingham.

It was altogether a curious and striking scene, the setting-up of the royal standard and formal proclamation of civil war. "Monday, being the 22nd of August," says Rushworth, "in the morning the king left his forces before Coventry, and with some lords and others in company rode to Leicester, where he dined that day at the abbey, the countess of Devonshire's house. Presently, after dinner, the king again took horse, and, with his company, rode to Nottingham, where was great preparation for the setting-up of the standard that day, as was formerly appointed. Not long after the king's coming to town, the standard was taken out of the castle and carried into the field a little on the back side of the castle wall. The likeness of the standard was much of the fashion of the city streamers used at the lord mayor's show, having about twenty supporters, and was carried in the same way: on the top of it hung a flag, the king's arms quartered, with a hand pointing to the crown, which stood above, with the motto, 'Give Cæsar his due.' The names of those knights-barons who were appointed to bear the standard, namely the chief of them, were Sir Thomas Brooks, Sir Arthur Hopton, Sir Francis Wortley, and Sir Robert Dodington. Likewise there were three troops of horse to wait upon the standard, and to bear the same backward and forward, with about six hundred foot soldiers. It was conducted to the field in great state, his majesty and Prince Rupert, whom his majesty had made Knight of the Garter, going along with it, with divers other lords and gentlemen of his majesty's train, besides a great company of horse and foot, in all to the number of two thousand. So soon as the standard was set up, and his majesty and the other lords placed about it, a herald of arms made ready to publish a proclamation, declaring the ground and cause of his majesty's setting up of his standard, namely, to suppress the rebellion of the earl of Essex in raising forces against him, to which he required the aid and assistance of all his loving subjects. But before the trumpeters could sound to make proclamation, his majesty called to view the said proclamation, which being given him, he privately read the same over to himself, and seeming to dislike some passages therein, called for pen and ink, and with his own hand crossed out and altered the same in some places, and then gave it to the herald, who proclaimed the same to the people, though with some difficulty after his majesty's corrections. After the reading thereof the whole multitude threw up their hats, and cried 'God save the king' with other such like expressions."

It was highly characteristic of Charles to call for pen and ink and correct his proclamation in the very sight of his armed followers ranged in battle array. The same unreadiness marked all his subsequent proceedings after the Nottingham ceremonial. Returning to the camp before Coventry, he made a languid attempt to seize the city; but seeing that the inhabitants guarded their gates well, and replied to his eloquent summons to surrender by still more eloquent shots from the walls, he quickly drew back, and took up fresh quarters some miles away, at St ne-leigh, near Warwick. The hasty retreat caused much discouragement among the partisans of the royal cause, and had the immediate effect of the council of the king itself splitting into two sections; the one, headed by Prince Rupert, advocating an immediate attack of the parliamentary forces which were slowly advancing from the south, and the other, under the earl of Southampton, advising further negotiations with a view to peace. At the first suggestion of negotiations, the king got violently angry; but the very next day he wheeled round, and consented to the despatch of commissioners to London, appointing for the purpose the earls of Southampton and Dorset, and Sir John Culpeper, member for Kent, recently arrived in the royal camp. The three started in great haste on the 26th of August from Nottingham, carrying with them an important document in the shape of a royal message addressed to both houses of parliament.

The message was in singular contrast with all the proclamations, letters, addresses, and other public utterances of Charles since his flight from the capital. "We have with unspeakable grief of heart," it ran, "long beheld the distractions of our kingdom. Our soul is full of anguish until we may find some remedy to prevent the miseries which are ready to overwhelm this whole nation by a civil war. And though all our endeavours, tending to the composing of these unhappy differences betwixt us and our two houses of parliament, though pursued by us with all zeal and sincerity, have been hitherto without the success we hoped for, yet such is our constant and earnest care to preserve the public peace, that we shall not be discouraged from using any expedient which, by the blessing of the God of mercy, may lay a firm foundation of peace and happiness to all our good subjects. To this end, observing that many mistakes have arisen by the messages, petitions, and answers betwixt us and our two houses of parliament, which happily may be prevented by some other way of treaty, wherein the matters in difference may be more clearly understood and more freely transacted, we thought fit to propound to you that some fit persons may be by you enabled to treat with the like number to be authorised by us, in such a manner, and with such freedom of debate, as may best tend to that happy conclusion which all good men desire; namely, the peace of the kingdom. Wherein, as we promise, on the word of a king, all safety and encouragement to such as shall be sent unto us, if you shall choose the place where we are for the treaty, which we wholly leave to you, presuming the like care of the safety of those we shall employ, if you shall name another place; so we assure you, and all our good subjects that, to the best of our understanding, nothing shall be therein wanting on our part which may advance the true Protestant religion, oppose popery and superstition, secure the law of the land, upon which is built as well our just prerogative as the property and liberty of the subject, confirm all just power and privileges of parliament, and render us and our people truly happy, by a true understanding betwixt us and our two houses of parliament. Bring with you as firm resolutions to do your duty, and let all our people join with us in our prayers to Almighty God for his blessing upon the work. If this proposition shall be rejected by you, we have done our duty so amply that God will absolve us from the guilt of any of that blood which must be spilt. And what opinion soever other men may have of our power, we assure you nothing but our christian and pious care to prevent the effusion of blood hath begot this motion; our provision of men, arms, and money being such as may secure us from further violence till it please God to open the eyes of our people."

It was a task of no slight difficulty to the great political leaders in the House of Commons to decide how to deal with this extraordinary communication.

There could not be the least doubt in the mind of any one that the king's message was a tissue of hypocrisy from beginning to end; and that while holding out the olive branch of peace, he was arming with all his might, and straining every nerve to gain his objects by bloodshed. Charles evidently had a double object in view in suddenly adopting the advice of his peace-loving councillors and entering upon negotiations, that of gaining time for further armaments, and the still more important one of throwing the whole responsibility of the terrible internecine contest which he was preparing upon his opponents. The latter aim he himself acknowledged, very imprudently, by stating that if his propositions be rejected he would hold himself absolved "from the guilt of any of that blood which must be spilt." Thus there was left to the representatives of the nation no other choice but that of either burthening themselves with a fearful charge, or of playing into the hands of the king by submitting to be toyed with during a period of the highest importance, and staying, in the very crisis of affairs, their preparations for defence, while he was completing his means of attack. It was a most perplexing, no less than most serious dilemma, and to escape from it required all the political sagacity of Pym and the other leaders of the liberal party of both houses. The result of their deliberations was the vote, by unanimity, of a most judicious reply to the king's message, a model of high statesmanship. "May it please your majesty," ran the document, "the lords and commons in parliament assembled, having received your majesty's message of the 25th of August, do with much grief resent the dangerous and distracted state of the kingdom, which we have by all means endeavoured to prevent, both by our several advices and petitions to your majesty, which have been not only without success, but there hath followed that, which no evil counsel in former times hath produced, or any age hath seen, those several proclamations and declarations against both the houses of parliament, whereby their actions are declared treasonable and their persons traitors; and thereupon your majesty hath set up your standard against them, whereupon your majesty hath put the two houses of parliament, and in them this whole kingdom, out of your protection. So that, until your majesty shall recall those proclamations and declarations whereby the earl of Essex and both houses of parliament, their adherents and assistants, and all such as have obeyed and executed their commands and directions according to their duties, are declared traitors, or otherwise delinquents, and until the standard, set up in pursuance of the said declarations, be taken down, your majesty hath put us into such condition that, whilst we so remain, we cannot, by the fundamental privileges of parliament, the public trust reposed in us, or with the general good and safety of this kingdom, give your majesty any other answer to this message." On receipt of this address Charles once more fell into an excess of fury, and sending instructions under his privy signet to his commissioners of array for England and Wales, commanded them to pursue the earl of Essex and the forces under his command as "rebels" and "traitors." In reply, parliament quietly passed an order directing Essex to sweep the rabble gathered under the Nottingham standard to all the winds. The commons felt that war could no longer be prevented, and the only desire and prayer was that it might be speedy and swift.

Essex put himself in movement at the beginning of September, making St. Albans his head-quarters. The parliamentary army under his orders numbered nearly fifteen thousand men, the greater part of them men of the middle and working classes, well armed and equipped, and in good discipline, forming in every respect a contrast to the half noble, half beggar crowd that had mustered under the royal banner. All the chief posts under Essex had been given to military men of tried reputation devoted to the liberal cause. The command of the foot soldiers was made over to Sir John Meyrick, who bore the title of sergeant-major-general; that of the horse to Sir William Balfour, called lieutenant-general; and that of the artillery to the earl of Peterborough, denominated general of the ordnance. An officer of Huguenot extraction, Philibert Emanuel du Bois, was lieutenant of artillery, and another, John Dalbier, quartermaster-general. The rest of the general officers were Sir Gilbert Gerrard, treasurer-at-war, Dr. Isaac Dorislaus, advocate of the army, and Lionel Copley, muster-master-general. There were twenty regiments of foot under as many colonels, including general officers, and seventy-five troops of horse under as many captains. Many members of the House of Commons, and a great number of wealthy and distinguished noblemen were serving in the parliamentary army. Lord Wharton was colonel of the 6th regiment of foot; Lord Brooke of the 9th; Lord Mandeville of the 10th; Denzil Holles, member for Dorchester, of the 13th; and John Hampden, "father of the country," and father of liberty, of the 20th regiment. Names quite as eminent were to be found among the captains of horse. Lord Brooke commanded the 6th troop; Lord St. John the 8th; Sir William Waller the 15th; Alexander Pym, eldest son of the leader of the House of Commons, the 29th; John Hotham, member for Scarborough, the 30th; Nathaniel Fiennes, member for Banbury, the 37th; Sir Arthur Heslridge, member for Leicestershire, the 43rd; Walter Long, member for Ludgershall, the 59th; James Fiennes, member for Oxfordshire, the 60th; and Oliver Cromwell, member for Cambridge, the 69th troop of horse. Another Oliver Cromwell, eldest surviving son of the member for Cambridge, was serving as cornet in the 6th troop, under Lord Brooke. The royalists themselves acknowledged that the "traitors" in the House of Commons were terribly in earnest.

The troops collected under the banner of Charles were, by the time the parliamentary army had taken the field, nearly as numerous as those commanded by the earl of Essex. But the only valuable portion of them was the cavalry, composed in part of the nobility and gentry of the northern, western, and midland counties; while the infantry, forming in numbers about one half of the royal forces, was the merest scum of the population, fond of plundering defenceless citizens, but not at all fond of fighting battles, and held together by no other ties than those connecting bands of robbers. With artillery the king was tolerably well provided, but both his horse and foot were ill supplied with arms and ammunition. "The foot," according to Clarendon, "all but three or four hundred who marched without any weapon but a cudgel, were armed with muskets and pikes, and had bags for their powder; but in the whole body there was not a pikeman who had a corselet, and very few musketeers who had swords. Among the horse the officers had their full desire if they were able to procure old backs and breasts, with pots and pistols, and carabines for their two or three first ranks, and swords for the rest; themselves, and some soldiers by their examples, having gotten, besides their pistols and swords, a short pole-axe."

When raising his standard at Nottingham, the king invested Robert Bertie, earl of Lindsey, with the chief command of his troops, giving him the title of field-marshal; but immediately after he made Prince Rupert general of the horse, "with power to act entirely independent of Lindsey, thus creating virtually two heads for his army, or rather three, he retaining to himself the right of giving orders regardless of both prince and earl. The two latter hated each other cordially, not merely like rivals, but as men antagonistic in every feature of their characters, and with nothing in common but love of licentiousness. Robert Bertie, as described by Lord Clarendon, "was a man of great honour, and spent his youth and the vigour of his age in military actions and commands abroad; and albeit he indulged to himself great liberties of life, yet he still preserved a very good reputation with all men, and a very great interest in his country, as appeared by the supplies he and his son brought to the king's army." Prince Rupert was a person of very different stamp. "His temper," the duke de Grammont, French ambassador, reported home, "had a violence which he scorned to control; his person was large, his carriage awkward, his manner was sometimes polite to excess, and sometimes brutal. His countenance was dry and harsh, even when he wished to soften it, but in his fits of ill-humour it was truly infernal." Rupert could speak but little English when arriving in the country; he nevertheless enriched the language at once by a new word, not previously known—the word "plunder." In return the people bestowed upon him the name of "Prince Robber."

After remaining about a week at St. Albans, organizing his forces, Essex marched forward to meet the royal army, in conformity with the orders of parliament. These were embodied in four clauses. The first ran: "You shall carefully restrain all impieties, prophaneness and disorders, violence, insolence, and plundering in your soldiers, as well by strict and severe punishment of such offences as by all other means which you in your wisdom shall think fit." The second instruction was: "Your lordship is to march with such forces as you think fit towards the army raised in his majesty's name against the parliament and kingdom. And you shall use your utmost endeavours, by battle or otherwise, to rescue his majesty's person and the persons of the prince and of the duke of York out of the hands of those desperate persons who are now about them." Essex was ordered in the third clause: "You shall take an opportunity, in some safe and honourable way, to cause the petition of both houses of parliament [praying for the king's return to London] to be presented unto his majesty; and if his majesty shall thereupon please to withdraw himself from the forces now about him, and to resort to the parliament, you shall cause all those forces to disband, and shall serve and defend his majesty." And fourthly: "You shall publish and declare that if any who have been so seduced by the false aspersions cast upon the proceedings of parliament as to assist the king in the acting of those dangerous counsels, shall willingly, within ten days after such publication in the army, return to their duty, not doing any hostile act within the time limited, and join themselves with the parliament in defence of religion, his majesty's person, the liberties and laws of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament, with their persons and estates, as the members of both houses and the rest of the kingdom have done, that the lords and commons will be ready, upon their submission, to receive such persons in such manner as they shall have cause to acknowledge they have been used with clemency and favour." Armed with these instructions, which clearly defined both his military and political duties, the parliamentary general passed onward in slow marches, taking possession, first of Northampton, and then of Coventry and Warwick, where he left garrisons, and next marching upon Worcester. The latter city, which had been made for a while the head-quarters of Prince Rupert, was taken after a sharp fight between the king's horse and the vanguard of the parliamentary forces, so that the two armies were now nearly face to face. For a few days they kept watching each other, and then engaged in battle.

On Wednesday, the 19th of October, news was brought to the earl of Essex that Charles, who had been staying for some time at Shrewsbury, where he had established a mint, and was coining money and issuing proclamations, was advancing in person to the south, evidently bent upon outflanking his opponents and effecting a diversion by threatening the capital. To prevent this, Essex resolved to set out immediately from Worcester in pursuit, without awaiting the arrival of his artillery, which had been left behind, owing to the negligence of the principal officer in charge of it. In order to escort the cannon which was coming up, three regiments of foot soldiers and ten troops of horse were left in Worcester, and with the rest of his forces Essex started eastward on Friday, and on Saturday, between nine and ten o'clock at night, reached Keynton, a small market town, six miles from Warwick, and about midway between Banbury and Stratford-on-Avon. Here the earl intended to rest his army during the Sunday, to await the arrival of his train with its convoy of horse and foot; but the king, who was only some six or seven miles off, frustrated this plan by marching upon him at once and offering battle. In doing so, Charles acted against the advice of his older officers, following mainly the counsel of Prince Rupert, who insisted that the opportunity of the enemy being temporarily devoid of artillery should not be lost.

Accordingly, at daybreak on Sunday, the 23rd of October, the king put his whole army in movement, and between ten and eleven o'clock Prince Rupert with the vanguard arrived at the top of Edgehill, a ridge overlooking Keynton and the vale of the Red Horse. He was surprised on seeing the parliamentary forces march out of the town and form into battalions at the moment he came to the brow of the hill. Essex, with all his officers, had been attending divine service in the morning, when in the midst of the service some peasants of the neighbourhood brought the earl intelligence that the royal troops were in advance upon him, and distant but a few miles. The earl did not interrupt the sermon, but listened attentively to the end, said his prayers, and then called his soldiers to battle. In little more than an hour ten thousand men stood ready to assert England's right to civil and religious liberty in a first great encounter of arms.

At two o'clock in the afternoon the whole of the royal troops, foot, horse, and artillery, had arrived at Edgehill, King Charles in the midst of them, on a splendid war-horse, clad in complete armour, over which hung a black velvet mantle with the star and George. Having posted his guns on an elevated position, he ordered the infantry and cavalry to descend the hill towards the enemy, who was advancing from Keynton, and had come to within a mile and a half. In numbers, the two armies now facing each other were not nearly equal, for while there were some fourteen thousand men fighting under the king's banner, there were not more than ten thousand on the other side. Moreover, the Royalists possessed greatly the advantage of ground, they leaning against the hill, while their opponents were in the plain, to which benefit was added that of a strong wind at their back. But their main superiority was in their heavy cannon and the absence of it in the parliamentary army; and to supplement the need, Essex had to employ all his strategic skill and warlike experience. His army consisted of eleven regiments of foot, forty-two troops of light horse, and about seven hundred dragoons. The main body of his cavalry, twenty-four troops, under commissary-general Sir James Ramsay, a Scotch officer, were placed on rising ground on the left wing, protected by several companies of musketeers, while the rest of the horse, commanded by Sir Philip Stapylton, were divided into three regiments, and formed on the right wing. The foot, which occupied the centre, were drawn up in three brigades. On the right, in the van, was a brigade commanded by Sir John Meldrum, and composed of the regiments of Lord Robartes and Sir William Constable; and on the left a brigade made up of four regiments, under the orders of Lord Wharton, Sir William Fairfax, Lord Mandeville, and Sir Henry Cholmeley. The Royalists were drawn up with almost all their horse in the right, where Prince Rupert commanded, opposing Sir James Ramsay; on the left there were mainly foot soldiers, among them the king's regiment of guards, known from their dress as the "Red Regiment," led by Lord Willoughby D'Eresby, son of the earl of Lindsey. The king's troop of mounted guards, commanded by Lord Bernard Stuart, had obtained leave to be absent from the royal person for the day, and to charge under Prince Rupert, who assigned them the first place on his wing. All the centre of Charles's army was composed of foot, drawn up in nine great bodies, and forming three brigades, under Sir Nicholas Byron, Colonel Richard Fielding, and Colonel Harry Wentworth. Sir Jacob Astley, the king's major-general, had under his orders the whole of the infantry, the earl of Lindsey, actual commander-in-chief, preferring to fight at the head of his own regiment, on account of a desperate quarrel with Prince Rupert, who had come to treat him with the greatest insolence. The old soldier loudly expressed his longing to rush into the thickest of the battle and to die, since live he could not with honour. His wish was to be fulfilled.

The battle commenced at three o'clock with an advance of the right wing of the royal army, and simultaneous discharge of cannon. Prince Rupert, dashing forward with impetuosity, immediately threw the parliamentary left in confusion, and several of the regiments here, composed of young recruits, at once turned and fled. It was in vain that Lord Wharton, Sir William Constable, and other officers, endeavoured to maintain discipline in their ranks, and stay the retreat. Under the influence of a wild panic, the fugitives refused to obey orders, and, tramping backward, drew with them the rear brigade, commanded by Colonel Essex, a chivalrous youth of high promise. Left alone, with but a few officers around him, the colonel was forced to seek his way as best he could to the right van, where he charged bravely, and fell mortally wounded in a gallant attempt to retrieve the honour of his regiment. The horse on the parliamentary left wing did not stand their ground much better than the foot, but their flight was not entirely due to causeless panic, but the off-spring, in part, of treachery. One of the colonels on this side, bearing the name of Sir "Faithful" Fortescue, had been for some time in secret negotiations with Charles, and having concluded these, and won over a sufficient number of his men with money from the new Shrewsbury mint, the gallant officer took the opportunity of Rupert's impetuous advance to go over with his whole troop to the Royalists, and joining in the charge with them. Sir Faithful did not get all the reward he expected from his perfidy; for his men in the confusion forgot to take off the orange scarf worn by the soldiers of the parliamentary army, in consequence of which they were fired into, at first by the party they wished to join, and afterwards, when fairly rolled up with them, by their former comrades, who, naturally furious at the treachery, killed the greater number of the troop.

The rush of the deserters nevertheless had a very ill effect upon the whole of the division commanded by Sir James Ramsay; for bewildered at the unlooked-for flight of their comrades, and doubtful of each other, they were unable to meet the fierce shock of Rupert's cavalry, and having fired off their carbines, they wheeled right about, abandoned their musketeers, and rushed galloping down from the high ground upon which they had been placed, directly upon a regiment of foot, commanded by Denzil Holles, the member for Dorchester, one of Charles's "traitors."

Holles and his officers made great efforts to rally the flying horse, and succeeded with three troops; but the rest rushed along madly, and, breaking through the regiment of foot, galloped on to Keynton in such panic as to carry away by sheer impetus their commander, who had to ride two miles before he could extricate himself. The fugitives were hotly pursued by the royalist horse as far as the town, where the natural instinct of Prince Rupert's men created a sudden and unexpected diversion. They smelt "plunder" in the long rows of carriages and waggons drawn up in the streets and market-place of Keynton; and forgetting everything else, they threw themselves from their steeds and eagerly broke open lids and boxes, shaping the most attractive of the contents into interesting bundles of movable property. The occupation of making these bundles, pursued with much artistic skill, lasted for nearly an hour, and had the consequence of saving the parliamentary army from defeat, and of saving King Charles the trouble of making his triumphant entry into London, victorious over all friends of liberty and other traitors.

While Rupert's horse were busy at Keynton, depriving by their absence the king of the most valuable part of his army, the fate of the battle was being decided on the slopes of Edgehill and in the Vale of the Red Horse. On the parliamentary left wing the gallantry had been all with the Royalists, but on the right, both the military skill and the courage of the contending parties was nearly equally divided, leaving victory to be the result of a severe contest. At the commencement of the struggle, while Sir James Ramsay's horse were being driven back by Prince Rupert, Sir Philip Stapylton pushed forward slowly but determinedly with the right wing of the parliamentary forces, the men advancing in a solemn, stubborn mood upon the enemy, encouraged by the word of their officers. Among these were various notable men, Captain Nathaniel Fiennes, Sir Arthur Heselrige, Lord Grey of Groby, and Captain Oliver Cromwell. The member for Cambridge, commanding a troop in Essex's own regiment, was foremost in the charge, which, from commencing with subdued force, gradually increased in vigour till it broke every opposing element. Falling upon a regiment of foot with green colours, they utterly routed it, and next rode into a small battery placed in the rear, the gunners within which were put to the sword and the cannon nailed up. While this was being done, Sir William Balfour came up with the rest of the parliamentary horse on the right wing, and all combined fell upon the centre of the royalist army, charging in the first instance the king's Red Regiment. It was scattered in an instant, and nearly every man taken or slain; the commander, Lord Willoughby, was taken prisoner, and the standard-bearer, Sir Edward Verney, hewn down and his standard seized.

The two regiments of Denzil Holles and Colonel Ballard, which their commanders after immense efforts had succeeded in rallying, now came on and charged side by side with the victorious right wing. Everywhere the Royalists gave way, and everywhere they were cut down. Sir Arthur Heselrige's cuirassiers, nicknamed "lobsters," from their dress, and

Lord Grey's troop of horse did great execution, wholly destroying one of the best disciplined bodies of the king's infantry, called the Blue Regiment. For a short time Charles himself, with his two sons, the prince of Wales and duke of York, were in imminent danger of being made prisoners; and they were saved only by the report that Rupert's horse were returning, which created a momentary confusion. The final issue of the struggle, it was felt on both sides, had come to depend entirely on the reappearance in the field of the king's right wing; but the troopers of Prince Rupert were still occupied in ransacking boxes and waggons, and before they had finished their task, the fierce game of war was played out. It was past five; the battle had been raging for more than two hours, and the falling twilight reminded the fighters on both sides to stay their bloody work for the day. The parliamentary troops of Essex, foot and horse, had exhausted all their ammunition, and the Royalists were scattered about in isolated groups, leaving both armies weary of the contest, and both uncertain of victory. With the falling darkness, the struggle ceased by tacit consent, and the king's soldiers retired in tolerable order over the hills which they had crossed at noon, while the earl of Essex kept possession of the Vale of the Red Horse—more than ever reddened by the blood of some four or five thousand dead and wounded strewn over it. Late at night, among the camp fires, many a Puritan preacher lifted his voice in the Red Vale, descanting upon the "goodly Sabbath-day's work," the battle of Edgehill.

Virtually, the battle of Edgehill was won by the parliamentary army, but the earl of Essex did not pursue his advantage, partly for want of military genius, and partly out of timidity. He was fully aware how narrow had been the margin, and how almost accidental the circumstances which separated his doubtful victory from a real defeat, and was unable therefore to summon up courage to follow the enemy, even after the regiments which he had left at Worcester had come to his aid. They arrived early on the Monday morning, and although nearly all the chief officers, foremost among them John Hampden, entreated him to push forward at once and to scatter the disorganised royal forces, Essex resisted their importunities, and so far from attacking the king, withdrew some troops that were standing in his way. Charles was not slow to turn the inactivity and sluggishness of his antagonist to profitable use, and assuming the air of a victorious general, he at once marched upon the fortified town of Banbury, which he was allowed to take without resistance, and from thence leisurely made his way to Oxford, one of the strongholds of the royal cause. For a moment it seemed as if he felt inclined to still bolder measures, by either throwing himself towards the capital or by offering another challenge to the parliamentary army, but he stopped short in his aggressive attitude, cowed, probably, by the intensely hostile spirit of the county population.

While supplies of all kinds were readily and cheerfully furnished by the peasantry to the parliamentary troops, they concealed and carried away from the Royalists all provisions for man or horse. As stated by one of the fervent adherents of Charles, "The very smiths hid themselves, that they might not be compelled to shoe horses, of which in those stoney ways there was great need." According to the same authority, the hostility of the people was owing, not so much to any deep-seated dislike of the cause or person of the king, but to a "prejudiced" ill-will against the soldiery fighting under the banner of Charles, notably the horsemen of Prince Rupert. The "prejudice" of the population of nine-tenths of all the towns and villages of England was to believe "that the Cavaliers were of a fierce, bloody, and licentious disposition, and that they committed all manner of cruelty upon the inhabitants of those places where they came, of which robbery was the least." It was in consequence of this feeling, that, on the arrival of the royal army at Edgehill, "there were very many companies of common soldiers who had scarcely eaten bread in eight-and-forty hours before;" and that after the battle, "many of the men who straggled into the villages for refreshment were knocked on the head by the inhabitants." No doubt the country people had taken close measure of both "Roundheads"—as the parliamentary troops, on account of the closely-cropped hair of the officers and soldiers of the Puritan party had come to be nicknamed—and the "Cavaliers." Leaving alone principles, the simple difference between them was that the "Roundheads" paid for what they required, which was more than was deemed necessary by the "Cavaliers" in general, and the men of "Prince Robber" in particular.

The menacing position taken up by the king after the battle of Edgehill, coupled with the hesitating behaviour of the earl of Essex, had an immediate and marked effect upon the proceedings of parliament. On the 4th of July a "Committee of Safety" had been appointed, in whom the executive was reposed, comprising five members of the upper house, the earls of Essex, Holland, Pembroke, and Northumberland, and Viscount Saye and Sele, and ten members of the House of Commons, Pym, Hampden, Holles, Marten, Fiennes, Pierrepont, Glynn, Sir John Meyrick, Sir Philip Stapylton, and Sir William Waller. The first actions of the Committee were of a very energetic nature, Pym and his friends ruling the deliberations and giving them a sort of republican character; but the doubtful issue of the important contest of arms in the Red Horse Vale made the new government, as well as parliament itself, split into two parties, the one advocating a more vigorous continuation of the war, and the other renewed negotiations with the king.

The section in the House of Commons which had all along opposed the resort to arms, comprising Edmund Waller, John Selden, Sir Simonds D'Ewes, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, and others of inferior talent, some of them secret partisans of the king, and others men of no particular convictions, now came forward all at once in a very loud manner, insisting that a final effort should be made to shed further effusion of blood. The leader of the party, Edmund Waller, long in correspondence with Charles, and who had obtained his leave to stay at Westminster and serve him there, showed himself most active in the prosecution of the scheme for renewing negotiations; and his efforts were successful so far as to induce a majority in the House of Commons, made up chiefly of wavering members, to consent to new proposals being made to the king. On the 3rd of November, eleven days after the battle of Edgehill, a petition for peace to his majesty, couched in most conciliating terms, was agreed on by the house, notwithstanding the energetic opposition of Pym, Strode, and others, whom Sir Simonds D'Ewes in his "Journal" characterized as "fiery spirits." There was now a great opportunity for the king to prove his constantly professed love of peace, and to regain the lost love of his subjects by ending in one stroke, wise no less than magnanimous, the endless misery of internecine strife. But magnanimity had as little entrance in the narrow and compressed mind of Charles as wisdom. He could bear reverses, like all small men, but could not bear success; and the merest gleam of it now once more made him intolerably haughty and despotic.

Having passed a resolution beseeching peace, the next step of the commons, voting, in conjunction with the lords, was an application to the king for a safe-conduct for some members of both houses to act as commissioners. The request was replied to by Charles in a very insolent strain, he granting it, but only on condition of the envoys not being "traitors," or excepted from pardon in any of his numerous proclamations. There was a great revulsion of feeling among both peers and commons, but especially the latter, when the royal message came to be read. However, the "moderate men," as Sir Simonds D'Ewes called his party, in opposition to the "fiery spirits," prevailed once again, and it was voted by a small majority that a list of the names of the commissioners should be forwarded to his majesty. The list had none but "moderate men;" nevertheless, one of them, Sir John Evelyn, member for Blechingley, was not deemed sufficiently moderate by Charles, and he refused to sanction his nomination. It was enough to exasperate all but the absolute partisans of the royal cause; and the king's decision being made known to the two houses of parliament, it was decided that the refusal of his majesty to admit Sir John was equivalent to a rejection of peace proposals. However, at the next sitting, the "fiery spirits" were once more outvoted, and the "moderate men" carried a resolution to the effect that the prayer for peace should be sent on to the king, and that Sir John Evelyn, though having been duly appointed, should be left to his own liberty to go or not as he thought fit. Thereupon the member for Blechingley forthwith, "in an excellent speech," as described by Sir Simonds D'Ewes, declared his intention to waive his right of going, after which the other commissioners, five in number, the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, and three commoners, at once set out to lay their humble petition at the feet of his majesty.

Charles had advanced in the meanwhile—in order, as it seemed, to quicken the zeal of his friends the "moderate men"—from Oxford to Colnbrook, on the borders of Buckinghamshire and Middlesex, and it was here that he received, on the 11th of November, the parliamentary envoys; and having made some vague assurances of his willingness to effect a peace, told them finally that he would be ready to receive distinct propositions at Windsor Castle, whither he was going to move. With this reply the commissioners returned to parliament, which then resolved to send Sir Peter Killigrew, member for Westlow, a zealous royalist, with an address to the king, renewing the offers of peace, and at the same time entreating his majesty to order a cessation of hostilities during the time of the treaty. Sir Peter started in all haste on Saturday, the 13th of November, but had not got further on the road than Brentford when he was stopped by armed men on horseback. They were "Cavaliers" under the orders of Prince Rupert. While the king was standing encamped with his army in Buckinghamshire, his majesty's nephew was doing a little business on his account by exploring the western part of the metropolitan county, and levying forced contributions upon the inhabitants. Rupert and his men had discovered that the nearer they came to London the more profitable became their peculiar mode of making war; and now, resting within ten miles of Gresham's Exchange, their hearts were yearning to teach the new word "plunder" to the citizens of the capital. It was thus the king's Cavaliers came tramping up the high road through Brentford, arresting the errand of Sir Peter Killigrew and the transport of the olive branch from Westminster to Windsor.

Rupert's Cavaliers had made good preparations for getting as far as possible into the gold-paved regions of the city. They had with them not only their carbines and swords, but some small field batteries, and in the afternoon of the day when Sir Peter was stopped, the sound of their artillery was distinctly heard all over London. The earl of Essex, who had come up with a portion of his army for the protection of the capital, was sitting in parliament when the dim roar of cannon fell upon his ear, and leaving hastily, he took horse and galloped off on the western road. He found skirmishing going on all along the river bank between Strand-on-the-Green and Brentford; but before he could well examine the scene of operations night set in, when both parties very sensibly desisted from fighting and went to supper and rest. The next morning, Sunday, the 14th of November, the whole city was up and alive with excitement, the train bands, with companies of volunteers of all kinds, marching towards Brentford by sound of drum and fife, and the rest of the population engaging to supply the defenders of liberty with victuals. As described by an eye-witness, a citizen warm in the good cause, all the inhabitants of London, "as soon as they were come from morning sermon, of their own voluntary and free accord took the greatest part of the victuals which they had provided for their own dinners, and carried it to the Guildhall, to be sent to the army. It was a wonder to see how many cart-loads of bread, cheese, and meat, baked, boiled, and roasted, of the best sorts, with great stores of pies piping hot, were on a sudden brought out of every street and parish to Guildhall. By certain relation, there were near upon one hundred cart-loads of victuals that day sent to the army; and there might have been abundance more if it could have been told what to have done with it, or how to have sent it. Great quantities of beer were also sent, besides a hog'shead or two of sack, and three or four hog'sheads of burnt claret." If liberty was doomed to perish, it was clearly not for want of victuals.

The zeal and energy of the citizens of London in the defence of their homes had its immediate effect upon the roving bands of Prince Rupert. As soon as the trained bands and volunteers, altogether some twenty thousand strong, had come within a short distance of Brentford, the Cavaliers set off on the retreat, scampering off even faster than they had come. Charles himself, who was cautiously advancing towards Kingston and Richmond, was drawn back by the flying mass of horse, and had to return to Hampton Court, where he stayed for twenty four hours, and then marched back to Oxford, making the orthodox university again his head-quarters. It would not have been very difficult at the moment for the parliamentary army, greatly reinforced by the London auxiliaries, to make a flank attack upon the Royalists and cut off their retreat to Oxford, a movement evidently commended by the circumstances, and strongly urged by John Hampden and other officers. However, the earl of Essex was too timid a general, and had too little of self-reliance to listen to such advice; and although, when the pressure upon him became very great, he allowed Hampden to take a couple of regiments of horse and start in pursuit of the flying enemy, he recalled him before he was a couple of miles away, assigning as a reason the necessity to defend the capital.

The general opinion was that Essex, himself not gifted with great military capacity, was swayed in all his actions by the counsels of a small knot of old soldiers of fortune, men who had spent their lives in wars in the Netherlands and France, and had come back now that there was a good opening for their trade at home. It was manifestly not in their interest to shorten the sanguinary strife between Royalists and Parliamentarians even for a day. England, they were thoroughly aware, was a land of milk and honey compared with France and the Low Countries, where the labour had been hard, the pay small, the comforts few, and the stripes many; and it was not in human nature to expect that these fighting men should give advice tending to throw them out of work, and prematurely end their agreeable existence. In consequence the ancient warriors used their influence upon the commander-in-chief to keep him as much as possible at rest, seeking no great gain and incurring no great risk, in which policy alone there was a chance of keeping up the even balance between the contending parties, and prolonging the war for a goodly number of years. Thus Charles was allowed to go back to Oxford from his hazardous expedition without being molested, and being established there at his ease, the earl of Essex likewise settled down in comfortable winter quarters in the county of Middlesex.

In parliament the conduct of Essex found its due echo. Great as was the fear of a return to absolutism, the apprehension of a prolonged civil war, of which no man could see the end, was still greater; and full of alarm, that, as actually conducted, the struggle might last for a generation, the desire for an accommodation with the king once more made itself strongly felt. Early in January, 1643, the party of the "moderate men" again got the upper hand over the "fiery spirits" in both houses of parliament, and it was voted by a considerable majority that another petition for peace should be addressed to his majesty. Charles, for the time, being in great want of money and of arms, showed himself a little less arrogant than usual, and on the 28th of January granted a safe-conduct to the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Holland, and eight members of the House of Commons, to deliver proposals for peace. The twelve commissioners made their entry into Oxford in great state, riding in four coaches, each drawn by six horses, and accompanied by a great number of servants in splendid liveries. Their reception by the Oxford populace was not very gratifying, for the mob of all ranks, deeming the magnificence of the dozen envoys too great for rebels, jeered and yelled as they passed along, a few giving vent to their feelings by throwing mud and stones at the Roundheads. However, this was compensated for to some extent by the gracious demeanour of the king. Charles received the parliamentary ambassadors in the garden of Christchurch, where he was walking with the prince of Wales, and having granted to all and each the favour of kissing hands, he asked that the peace proposals be read to him on the spot. The earl of Northumberland at once began doing so, but before he had gone far, the king interrupted him, after his accustomed fashion, by some frivolous remark. "Will your majesty give me leave to proceed?" Northumberland asked sternly, keeping, as noted by a bystander, "a stout and sober carriage." Charles felt abashed, and cried "Ay! ay!" after which the earl "read all through." Towering as was his pride, the king sadly wanted dignity.

The propositions framed by parliament, and laid before Charles at Oxford, were embodied in nine clauses. They were, first, "that the king would pass those bills which the house had made ready;" secondly, "to pass a bill for settling parliament privileges and liberties;" thirdly, "to bring to trial those delinquents whom the houses had impeached since January last;" fourthly, "to clear the six members accused of treason;" fifthly, "to restore all judges and officers of state lately removed;" sixthly, "to pass a bill for repaying the charge of the kingdom;" seventhly and eighthly, to pass "a bill for an act of oblivion," and "an act for a general pardon without exception;" and ninthly and lastly, to order "a cessation of arms for fourteen days, to agree upon these propositions." These conditions of peace, if anything, erred on the side of moderation, and there was nothing in them to prevent the king, had he accepted them, making himself again, within a short time after the signing of the treaty, as despotic a ruler as he had ever been in his life. However, Charles, "not liking nor yet utterly refusing the propositions," as stated by Thomas May, thought fit to resume his old policy of equivocation; and after amusing the parliamentary envoys for a week with fine speeches, and keeping them promenading in the gardens of Christchurch, he sent them back to London with five counter-proposals, in part absolutely unacceptable, and in part studiously vague and indefinite.

His majesty's demands were three in number, namely: first, "that his revenue, magazines, towns, forts, and ships, be delivered up to him;" secondly, "that all orders and ordinances of parliament wanting his assent be recalled;" and thirdly, "that all power exercised over his subjects by assessments and imprisoning their persons be disclaimed." His conditional offers, on the other hand, were summed up in two clauses, namely: "that he will yield to the execution of the laws against Papists, provided that the Book of Common Prayer be confirmed;" and "that such persons as upon the treaty shall be excepted out of the general pardon shall be tried by their peers only." In carrying these terms back to parliament, the commissioners, with scarcely an exception, felt that the king was not sincere in his dealings with them; and the conviction was so strong in the House of Commons, as to bring forth a resolution to send no reply to his majesty's counter-proposals, but drop all further negotiations and enter resolutely upon war. However, within a few days the peace party again got the upper hand, whereupon new negotiators came to be appointed, and another address to the king, very humble in tone, was despatched to Oxford. It only served to make Charles more arrogant in his demands; and while the "moderate men" in parliament exhausted all their eloquence to prove his majesty's wonderful love and affection for his subjects, his sole thoughts were bent upon raising fighting men and fanning the flame of civil war. His hopes of being able to rebuild his throne upon swords were stronger than ever for the moment; a new ally, to whom he trusted more than any other, having appeared in the field. While batch after batch of parliamentary commissioners were moving up and down between Westminster and Oxford, the bearers of long documents full of honeyed words, Queen Henrietta Maria was sailing across the German Ocean, bringing soldiers, and guns, and gunpowder to her consort. With her came the head that had hitherto been wanting to the royal cause.

After a year's incessant labour and intrigue; after bribing and cajoling the governors of the Netherlands republic; after pawning and selling the English crown diamonds, and raising goods and money by every effort of her elastic genius, Henrietta Maria at last had succeeded in getting together a fleet of eleven transports loaded with war material; and with it she set sail from Scheveningen, the port of the Hague, on the 2nd of February, 1643. The queen herself embarked in a man-of-war, the "Princess Royal," a deserter from the English navy; and besides it there went for the protection of the transports several Dutch ships, under the command of a noted sea hero, Admiral Van Tromp. When Henrietta Maria set foot on board the "Princess Royal," surrounded by a great train of ladies and gentlemen, soldiers, priests, and Capuchin monks, it was a splendid day, the sun shining beautifully; but the fleet had not been twenty-four hours at sea when there arose a terrific north-easterly gale, which spread consternation among the whole host of adventurers. All the ladies and not a few of the fine gentlemen wept and screamed incessantly; and the storm getting at its height, religious compunction seized every bosom, and the Capuchin monks and priests were called upon by a hundred voices to hear confession and give absolution. It could not be done with the usual privacy, for the voyagers were unable to move, the female companions of the queen being tied down in little beds against the sides of the pitching vessel, and the male courtiers lying prostrate on the floor in their ruffles and laces, a horror to themselves and to others. All were dreadfully sea-sick, but all were nevertheless very devout; and raising their voices as much as weakness and sickness allowed, the ladies and gentlemen loudly proclaimed their sins and misdeeds to the Capuchins, held in devout attitude by means of ropes. Almost the only one on board the "Princess Royal," besides the sailors, not a victim to the mal de mer, was the queen of Charles, who amused herself by listening to the confessions of her male and female train, remarking, with a complacent air, that "she supposed the height of their fears took away their shame of confessing their depravities in public." The extraordinary scene had no sooner come to an end when the gale abated, changing into a strong westerly wind; and the fleet being unable to make head against it, Henrietta Maria was compelled, after a ten days' tossing on the ocean, to return to Scheveningen, with the loss of two of her transports, ill compensated for by her memory enriched by a great many curious facts. She set sail again, with Van Tromp in the rear, on the 18th of February, and this time had a quick and prosperous voyage, the "Princess Royal" casting anchor in Burlington Bay, Yorkshire, on the evening of the 20th. The Dutch admiral had outwitted the earl of Warwick, who expected him at the mouth of the Humber, and before "the king's navy" could get in sight of Flamborough Head the queen's navy was discharging its combustible cargo on Burlington quay. There was war fuel enough in the nine transports of Henrietta Maria to set all England on fire for another couple of years.

The queen on landing was received by a troop of Cavaliers, nearly all Roman Catholics, a thousand strong, and under their protection, and that of the foreign mercenaries come over from Holland, she took up her residence in the town of Burlington, making it the head-quarters of a second royalist army. But she had been but forty-eight hours here when the van of Warwick's fleet, under Rear-admiral Batten, made its appearance in the bay, and began firing upon the Dutch transports actively engaged in discharging war stores and ammunition. The firing commenced in the night, putting for a moment the life of Henrietta Maria in jeopardy. "One of the ships," she informed her royal consort in a somewhat boastful letter, "did me the favour of flanking upon the dwelling where I slept, and before I was out of bed the cannon balls whistled so loud about me that the attendants insisted that I should leave at once. An adjoining house had already been knocked down, while two shots had fallen upon that in which I was, so that there was not much time to lose. Therefore I put on in haste a few clothes, and ran on foot to a little distance from the town, where I took to the shelter of a ditch. Before I could get there the bullets fell thick all around, and a servant was killed within seventy paces of me." The ditch itself did not afford complete protection to her majesty. "One dangerous ball," she wrote, "grazed the edge of our retreat, covering us with earth and stones, and the firing lasted uninterruptedly for some hours, until the turn of the tide." In her nocturnal flight the queen gave a great proof of her physical courage. "Her majesty," related Madame de Motteville, favourite lady of honour, "had an old brute of a dog, called Mitte, an ugly creature, but whom she loved much. When she had gone so far as the middle of Burlington High Street, she suddenly remembered that she had left Mitte at the mercy of the parliamentary cannon balls, upon which she instantly made her way back to the house we had left, rushed upstairs into her chamber, caught the animal, reposing on her bed, in her arms, and carried him off in safety." It is doubtful whether the impetuous royal lady, worthy scion of the Italian Medici, would have done as much for any man as for her poodle.

The landing of the queen and her war stores in Yorkshire caused the greatest excitement in parliament, and under the influence of it both houses resolved to regard her no longer as the wife of the sovereign, but as an armed enemy of the nation, and to hold her responsible for her deeds in the character she had chosen to assume. A motion to this effect was brought in at the end of March, but rested for a while in suspense. However, when it was seen during the next few months that Henrietta Maria was placing herself at the head of bands of Roman Catholics, wilder almost than Prince Rupert's Cavaliers, who were ravaging the whole of the north-eastern counties, all hesitation came to an end. On the 23rd of May one of the members for Yorkshire moved in the House of Commons the impeachment of the queen for high treason, and votes to that effect were carried without a division. The impeachment was taken up at once to the lords by Pym, and the next day, on the motion of Henry Marten, member for Berks, a committee was appointed to prepare the articles, which were drawn up and passed immediately after. At the same time, in its new energetic mood, the House of Commons took another important step towards the formal assumption of executive authority, independent of the crown.

On the 12th of May, John Glynn, member for Westminster, moved that a "new broad seal" should be made in place of that which Lord-keeper Lyttleton had carried off. The motion was strongly opposed, the debates on the subject running over several days; but on a division, on the 15th of May, the commons adopted it by a majority of eighty-six against seventy-four, upon which the bill was carried to the upper house. Here it met with greater resistance than had been offered to any former measure, and in the end, after long and unusually stormy discussions, was negatived. The matter was then allowed to drop for two months, till the middle of July, when the commons passed a bill ordering that a great seal should be made and be given into the custody of the speaker, but not to be made use of for the present. After another series of lively debates, the lords gave their assent to the use of the great instrument of authority, and an ordinance to this effect passed both houses, while at the same time six commissioners were nominated to form a board for the keeping of the seal. They were the earls of Kent and of Bolingbroke, Oliver St. John, member for Totness, John Wyld, member for Worcestershire, Samuel Browne, member for Dartmouth, and Edmund Prideaux, member for Lyme Regis. A step as important as the formation of this board, was taken in conjunction with the lords by the House of Commons, in the appointment of a regular ministry. It was headed by John Pym, who assumed the direction of military affairs, under the title of lieutenant of the ordnance, while William Lenthall, the speaker of the house, was made master of the rolls, and John Selden got the place of keeper of the records. The ordinance directing these appointments passed on the 9th of November, marking the date on which parliament, or rather the House of Commons assumed the formal executive as well as legislative authority of the realm.

The sudden energy of parliament was partly the result of desperation, all hope of accommodation with the king having come to an end, and the national forces succumbing almost everywhere under the attacks of the royalist troops. After remaining entirely inactive for more than four months, the earl of Essex had roused himself towards the end of April, and marching westward, had attacked the town of Reading, garrisoned for the king, and taken it almost without an effort. The leaders in the House of Commons now made great efforts to induce the "lord-general" to proceed to the siege of Oxford, and attempt to end the hateful contest by getting possession of the king; but Essex obstinately refused, and all the importunities of Pym, Hampden, and their friends—who had begun to lose confidence in the commander-in-chief, yet did not deem it wise to discard him, not knowing anybody else of sufficient trust to fill his place—could not persuade him to advance further than to Thame, ten miles from Oxford. Here he stationed his troops at the beginning of June; not, however, in a well-guarded camp, but dispersed all over the district, with very little regard to intercommunication, and still less watchfulness over the movements of the enemy. Prince Rupert, always hovering on the flanks of the parliamentary army, on the watch for plunder and glory, instantly availed himself of the earl's neglect and mismanagement, by making a bold dash in advance. Learning that a convoy containing some twenty thousand pounds in cash, for the payment of the parliamentary soldiers, was on the road from London to Thame, he sallied forth in the night from the 17th to the 18th of June, with about eight hundred of the most daring of his Cavaliers, and closely skirting the ground occupied by the troops of Essex, made his way right to the rear of them. He was nigh grasping the treasure he was longing after, when arrested in his course by a detachment of horse and foot that had come up in hurry for the protection of the convoy, in consequence of a warning given by a poor labourer. Greatly disappointed, Rupert resolved to have his revenge. Early in the morning of Sunday, the 18th, he swept down upon two regiments of cavalry, posted by Essex at Wycombe, in an isolated position, and before assistance could be brought he put to pieces or made prisoners nearly the whole of these troops. This news of the disaster was too much for Essex to bear, and he at once set out on the pursuit of Rupert. It proved an exploit costing more than it was worth.

The van of the force despatched by the lord-general was commanded by John Hampden and Colonel Gunter, and they met the enemy not far from Thame, on the road to Oxford. To intercept the retreat of the Cavaliers, Hampden moved several troops of horse to Chiselhampton bridge, covered by a regiment of foot; and seeing this, and his way across the Thames blocked, Rupert drew up in order of battle on a large plain called Chalgrove Field. A sharp exchange of shots followed immediately, the Parliamentarians keeping to the road, and then Cavaliers half hidden amidst the standing corn and among bushes. One of the first bullets that came hissing through the air hit Colonel Hampden in the shoulder, making the blood gush forth; but he uttered not a sound, contenting himself to ride away quietly from the scene of strife. He had a presentiment that his wound was mortal, and his first impulse was to proceed to a house at Pyrlton, a few miles off, where he had married his first wife, and where he thought it sweet to die. But the enemy kept spreading out in that direction, so he turned his horse's head, and rode off towards Thame, where he alighted at the dwelling of one Ezekiel Browne. The doctors came, and told him that there was hope of life; but he shook his head, and solemnly and earnestly prepared for another world. But before withdrawing his mind entirely from earthly affairs, he wrote a number of letters to his friends in parliament and in the army, entreating them to set to work in a more manly and energetic manner than had hitherto been done to secure the triumph of civil and religious freedom, and, if possible, end the horrors of a long civil war by a great, bold, and swift stroke. This task accomplished, among the most excruciating pains of body, he opened his soul to fervent prayer. "O Lord," he exclaimed, "save my bleeding country. Have these realms in thy especial keeping. Confound and level in the dust those who would rob the people of their liberty and lawful prerogative. Let the king see his error, and turn the hearts of his wicked councillors from the malice and sinfulness of their designs. Lord Jesus, receive my soul."

Towards midnight of Saturday, the 24th of June, the spirit of John Hampden passed away, the last words on his lips, breathing earnest prayers for the welfare of the nation. Two days after the "Father of the Country" was buried in the parish church at Hampden, accompanied to his last rest by the regiment he had commanded, the Buckinghamshire "green coats." The whole of the men followed the coffin bareheaded, their arms reversed, their drums and ensigns muffled; and as they went along they kept singing, in high-swalling melodious strain, the grand ninetieth Psalm: "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God. Thou turnest men to destruction, and sayest, Return, ye children of men. For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night."

The death of Hampden threw a deep gloom over the whole nation, which was increased by a course of political disasters that followed in its wake. For a time everything seemed to turn in favour of the king, and against the defenders of liberty, who were driven to the verge of despair by the ill-success of their great cause. Bands of Royalists, or of armed robbers bearing the name, were starting up all over the country, burning houses and villages, and murdering the inhabitants. Prince Rupert extended the scene of his devastations in ever-widening circle in the districts west of London; and Henrietta Maria, styling herself "generalissima" of his majesty's forces, carried on her operations on a still larger scale in the north; so that it seemed but too probable that before the year ended there would scarce be a county in England free from the horrors and miseries of civil war.

Independent of the two main bodies of troops opposing each other, the king's army and that of Essex, there were already half a dozen smaller collections of fighting men in the field on both sides, and the number threatened to multiply from week to week. Each county, and almost each town and hamlet, was divided into armed factions and confederations, acting sometimes under orders from either Oxford or London, but quite as frequently without, and carrying on a petty guerilla warfare utterly destructive to public welfare. From a general view, the parliamentary party was strongest in the eastern, midland, and south-eastern districts, the most industrious, populous, and intelligent of the kingdom; while the king had his adherents chiefly in the counties of the north, west, and south-west, containing fewer of the middle classes, but a predominance of the highest and lowest elements in the social scale, landowning squires and agricultural serfs. On the side of parliament was the advantage that the districts devoted to its cause were contiguous to each other, forming a strong girdle of defence around the capital; while on the other hand the royalist counties stretched in a long and narrow circuit, broken constantly by adverse regions, from the mouth of the Humber to the Land's End. But this benefit was more than counteracted by the superior energy, or rather unscrupulousness, of the men fighting for Charles, who hesitated not to rush onward with fire and sword in any direction to gain the slightest advantage, while their adversaries were moving about in the most guarded manner, careful to cause no more damage than absolutely necessary, and more bent upon healing than inflicting wounds.

It was by dint mainly of their relentless mode of warfare that the Royalists made everywhere progress in the summer of 1643. On the 30th of June, a week after the death of Hampden, the strongest body of parliamentary troops in the north, commanded by Lord Fairfax, was defeated by a royal corps, under the earl of Newcastle, in a severely contested battle on Atherton Moor, near Bradford; and simultaneously with the report of this disaster, parliament received the intelligence that the governor of Hull, Sir John Hotham, was on the point of surrendering that important town and arsenal to the queen; that Lord

Willoughby, sent to defend Lincoln, could no longer hold the city, being in direct want of food and ammunition; and lastly, that the Eastern Counties Association, a powerful confederacy in favour of the national cause, embracing the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Bedford, Essex, Lincoln, and Hertford, was about to be dissolved, and thrown open by the enemy. The evil tidings created universal consternation in the capital, but news still worse followed in the rear of them.

Hitherto, the spread of the Royalists over the west of England had been disputed with much success by a valiant body of troops under Sir William Waller, whose military talents were held in such high estimation by his friends and admirers, that they had come to speak of him as "William the Conqueror." However, the tide turned all on a sudden, and while Fairfax was routed in the north, Waller met in rapid succession with three great reverses, at Bradock Down, not far from Frome; at Lansdowne; and at Roundway Down, near Devizes; the last a most disastrous defeat, ending with the destruction of nearly his whole army. During the month of August all the great towns in the western counties, with the sole exception of Gloucester, fell into the hands of the king; the most important of them, Bristol, being surrendered by the governor, Nathaniel Fiennes, after but a feeble resistance. While thus misfortune upon misfortune accompanied the cause of the defenders of liberty, spreading a deep gloom in parliament and all over London, confidence in success had been brought to a pitch at the headquarters of Charles by the sudden and rather unexpected arrival of the queen. On the 13th of July Henrietta Maria entered Oxford, at the head of three thousand soldiers, and accompanied by a vast train of Cavaliers and courtiers, among the latter her very dear friend Harry Jermyn, companion of all her travels. Charles received his queen with a great display of pomp and ceremony, and ordered a medal to be struck in honour of the event. On it the two majesties were represented as seated on high thrones, the sun over his, and the moon and stars over her head, with the dragon Python, representing parliament and its adherents, lying dead at their feet.

It was a dark hour for the people of England, but at its darkest a ray of light came piercing through the shadows and the clouds. As yet the great weakness of the popular cause, more important than all others, was that it had found no military leader of sufficient genius to combine the moral and physical forces of the nation in the struggle for liberty, and thus to oppose the mere brute vigour of the champions of absolutism. It was high time that such a leader should come forward; and he came at last in the person of the member for Cambridge, Oliver Cromwell, known to his friends as the "Lord of the Fens." Like no other man of the age who rose above its din and confusion, Cromwell perceived the defects of the party with whom he had enlisted; and perceiving a remedy, too, hesitated not to apply it. "At my first going out into this enterprise," the "Lord of the Fens" said years after, addressing parliament in a very notable speech, "I saw our men were beaten at every hand. I did, indeed; and I desired Mr.

John Hampden that he would make some additions to my Lord Essex's army of some new regiments. And I told him I would be serviceable to him in bringing such men in as I thought had a spirit that would do something in the work. 'Your troops,' said I, 'are most of them old decayed serving-men, and tapsters, and such kind of fellows, and their troops are gentlemen's sons, younger sons, and persons of quality. Do you think that the spirits of such base and mean fellows will ever be able to encounter gentlemen that have honour and courage and resolution in them?' Truly I did represent to him in this manner conscientiously; and truly I did tell him, 'You must get men of spirit, and, take it not ill what I say, of a spirit that is likely to go on as far as gentlemen will go, or else you will be beaten still.' I told him so. I did, truly. He was a wise and worthy person; and he did think that I talked a good notion, but an impracticable one. Still I told him I could do somewhat in it. I did so, and the result was I raised such men as had the fear of God before them, as made some conscience of what they did, and from that day forward, I must say to you they were never beaten." Such the origin and history, in Cromwell's own brief words, sharp and trenchant like sword-strokes, of the new movement in the war which established the subsequently famous regiment of the "Ironsides," and which, by laying down a great principle hitherto wanting, definitely secured the victory of freedom over absolutism.

The "Ironsides"—so called after Oliver Cromwell himself, who first bore the nickname, his burly figure when seated on horseback exhibiting conspicuously the heavy steel coat—was formed soon after the death of Hampden; and the "men of spirit with the fear of God before them" had not long been raised before the great contest between king and nation took another turn. It manifested itself in a striking manner in a series of progressive movements of the parliamentary main body under Essex, which had hitherto lain in a nearly dormant state in the neighbourhood of the capital. Seeing the earl's inactivity, and flushed with pride at the many successes of his own troops, Charles left his headquarters at Oxford at the beginning of August, to proceed to the siege of Gloucester, the only city in the west which still held out against him. It seemed but too probable that Gloucester would share the fate of Bristol, being less strongly fortified, and far away from any succours of parliamentary forces; but the new "Ironside" spirit that had come to make itself felt would not bend its neck to the probability. There was a great clamour that Gloucester should not be allowed to fall, and though the earl of Essex showed his usual reluctance to move, pleading want of soldiers, he was forced, for the first time, to do so against his inclination. "It pleased God," wrote one of Cromwell's party, "that according to this extremity the resolutions of men were fitted; the city regiments and auxiliaries came cheerfully in to perform the service, and the poor remainder of the lord-general's old army was with all speed recruited."

On the 19th of May, Pym reported in the House of Commons that Essex would start for the relief of Gloucester on the 23rd, and punctually to the hour the army set out on its march. Early the following morning, the parliamentary troops, comprising eight thousand foot and four thousand horse, were reviewed on Hounslow Heath in presence of most of the members of both houses, and the same day they reached Colnebrook. From thence they went in forced marches to Gloucester, with swarms of Cavaliers constantly hovering around them, but doing little mischief, and on the 3rd of September Essex drew up his forces on Prestbury Hills, in sight of the closely-invested city, to the unbounded joy of the inhabitants. Charles, who had never reckoned upon the swiftness of movement and energy displayed in this instance by his antagonists, appeared as if paralysed at the approach of the parliamentary army, and breaking up the siege of the city, and setting his camp on fire, retreated in great precipitation. After relieving Gloucester, Essex turned aside to Tewkesbury, and made demonstrations as if going to advance towards Worcester. However, he stopped short in that direction, turning by a forced march towards Cirencester, which fell into his hands; and after sustaining at Hungerford a severe attack of Prince Rupert's cavalry, he arrived, on the 20th of September, at Newbury, where to his surprise he found the road to London barred by the royal army. King Charles had been drawn by some of his impetuous friends into hazarding once more the fortune of battle.

The fight commenced a little before noon, and lasted, with uninterrupted heat, till after sunset. Charles, stationed on a hill, with his back to the town of Newbury, garrisoned by his troops, held a most excellent position, and yet was not altogether confident of success. "He seemed to be possessed," according to Lord Clarendon's statement, "of all advantages to be desired: a good town to refresh his men in, whilst the enemy lodged in the field; his own quarters to friend, and his garrison of Wallingford at hand; and Oxford itself within distance, for supply of whatsoever should be wanting. The enemy was tired with long marches, and from the time that the prince had attacked them, the day before, had stood in their arms, in a country where they could not find victuals. So that it was conceived that it was in the king's power whether he would fight or not, and therefore that he might compel them to notable disadvantages, as they must make their way through or starve. This was so fully understood, that it was resolved over night not to engage in battle but upon such grounds as should give an assurance of victory. But contrary to this resolution—when the earl of Essex had, with excellent conduct, drawn out his army in battle order, upon a hill called Bigg's Hill, within less than a mile of the town, and ordered his men in all places to the best advantage—by the precipitate courage of some young officers who had good commands, and who unhappily always undervalued the courage of the enemy, strong parties became successively so far engaged, that the king was compelled to put the whole to the hazard of a battle, and to give the enemy at least an equal game to play. It was disputed on all parts with great fierceness and courage, the enemy preserving good order, and standing rather to keep the ground they were upon than to get more, by which they did not expose themselves to those disadvantages which any motion would have offered to the assailants. The king's horse, with a kind of contempt of the enemy, charged with wonderful boldness upon all grounds of inequality, and were so far too hard for the troops of the other side, that they routed them in most places, till they had left the greatest part of their foot without any guard at all of horse. But then the foot behaved themselves admirably on the enemy's part, and gave their scattered horse time to rally, and were ready to assist and secure them upon all occasions. The London trained bands, and auxiliary regiments, of whose inexperience of danger, or any kind of service beyond the easy kind of practice of their postures in the Artillery Garden, men had till then too cheap an estimation, behaved themselves to wonder, and were in truth the preservation of that army that day. For they stood as bulwark and rampart to defend the rest; and when their wings of horse were scattered and dispersed, kept their ground so steadily, that, though Prince Rupert himself led up the choice horse to charge them, and endured their storm of small shot, he could make no impression upon their stand of pikes, but was forced to wheel about." It was the first time the Royalists acknowledged the valour of their opponents, and proved how the "good notion" which Oliver Cromwell had tried to impress upon Hampden was spreading and bearing fruit in the parliamentary army, the Lord of the Fens having kept his word to "do somewhat in it."

The battle of Newbury, like that of Edgehill, after raging for about seven hours, resulted in a drawn contest, but with the victory leaning slightly to the parliamentary side. Essex, after spending the night on the field of battle, continued his march to London the next day unmolested, while the king withdrew his army to Oxford, leaving Prince Rupert to annoy the rear of the parliamentary force, and to ravage the country after his accustomed fashion. The return of Charles to his former head-quarters in the ancient university town, where Henrietta Maria, in his absence, had kept court with Harry Jermyn and her other Cavaliers, marked the beginning of a new era in the royal policy. Hitherto the king, though having a great number of Roman Catholics fighting under his banner, had been prudent enough not to make a too open display of his Romish predilections; but a change in this respect took place immediately after the strong-minded queen had come to reassert her old influence over her consort. By her advice, Charles put himself into communication with the wild hordes of brigands, passing nominally as rebels against English rule, who for some years past had turned all Ireland into a vast scene of murder and bloodshed, and offered to give them the sanction of his name if in return they would serve his cause in the civil war. A pact on these terms was soon concluded, and in the autumn of 1643, ten Irish regiments came to join the royalist troops, five of them landing at Chester, and the other five at Bristol.

Henrietta Maria and her friends were wild in rejoicing at this reinforcement of the king's armies, predicting immediate victories to come, but the shortsightedness of their calculations got evident before many weeks were over. The news of the arrival of the Irish auxiliaries had no sooner become known than a great number of noble and influential personages took wings from Oxford to London. At the beginning of November, the earl of Holland, a man of remarkable talent, who, after long playing an important part in the councils of Essex, had just come to join the royal cause, returned to Westminster, throwing himself upon the mercy of parliament, which passed over the offence of his desertion; and the example thus set was followed by several other waverers, whom the successes of Charles had allured. In December, the earls of Bedford and of Clare escaped back to their seats at St. Stephen's, which they had left in the previous summer; and several commoners, among them Sir Edward Dering, and Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, did the same. All of them openly declared, that however great their sympathy with the king, personally, or with the political principles involved in his cause, they would have nothing to do with the "popish party." They knew, and all men having eyes to see, knew, that, how many other corruptions might continue to live, the thing called popery was dead in England.

The change in the king's policy was accompanied by a great movement, at least of equal importance, on the part of parliament. While Charles was looking to Ireland for help, the leaders of the popular cause in the House of Commons turned their eyes to Scotland. On the motion of Pym, the commons resolved, almost unanimously, to send commissioners to Scotland, to request their brethren in that country to send an army to the succour of the English Protestants, in danger of falling under the yoke of the papists. Sir Henry Vane, member for Kingston-on-Hull, with three others, having been nominated envoys, they set out on their momentous errand at the commencement of August, while the king was besieging Gloucester, and were received with great enthusiasm at Edinburgh, where negotiations commenced at once with the government. They were carried on through the mediation of Alexander Henderson, one of the chiefs of the Presbyterians, and the Moderator of the General Assembly, who, rightly judging that the union between the two nations could not be effective if merely designed to satisfy temporary political objects, insisted upon introducing into the treaty of alliance some important religious clauses.

By the terms proposed by Henderson, the people of England and of Scotland bound each other to "prosecute incendiaries and malignants;" to "preserve the king's life and authority in defence of the true religion of both kingdoms;" to "extirpate popery, prelacy, heresy, schism, and profaneness;" and to "establish a conformity of doctrine, discipline, and church government throughout the island." The first three of these stipulations were assented to by Sir Henry Vane and his colleagues; but they felt strongly alarmed at the last, the "uniformity of doctrine" clause, for although the majority of both houses of parliament were inclined to presbyterianism, yet they knew that there was a numerous and most active body among them, as well as in the nation, who considered all ecclesiastical authority an invasion of the rights of conscience, and who were almost as much opposed to the "discipline" of Presbyterians, as to "prelacy," or even "popery." They were beginning to be known, and to make their importance, as a political as well as religious body, to be felt, under the denomination of the "Independents." Sir Henry Vane himself claimed leadership in the body, together with a number of other members of the House of Commons, among them the burly Lord of the Fens, very busy just now to "do somewhat" towards crushing political and spiritual authority together, and to leave no other guide and beacon standing but the "fear of God." In his own name, therefore, and greater ones fast rising into moment, the chief commissioner of the English parliament at Edinburgh stoutly protested against the "conformity of doctrine, discipline, and church government throughout the island," tendered by the Moderator of the General Assembly of Scotland.

The protest did not interrupt the negotiations for more than a few days, and both parties being sincerely anxious to carry through the work in hand, all difficulties, great or little, had to fall before their earnestness. It was settled, after some discussion, that the objectionable clause should be struck out and another inserted, declaring that the king was to be "preserved in its existing purity," and that the Church of England should be "reformed according to the Word of God," and "after the example of the best reformed churches," which left all desirable latitude to the Independents. Everything having been settled to mutual satisfaction, the Solemn League and Covenant, as the treaty between the two nations was to be called, was sworn to at Edinburgh on the 17th of August, and the next day the English envoys set out on their return journey to London, accompanied by a number of Scottish commissioners. The two houses of parliament at Westminster, after having consulted a meeting of divines convened for the purpose, sanctioned the treaty of Edinburgh on the 18th of September; and a week after, on the 25th, the whole of the lords and commons went in procession to the Church of St. Margaret, and took the oath of adhesion to the Solemn League and Covenant.

The scene, as described by an eye-witness, Bulstrode Whitelock, was most impressive. "Both houses, with the assembly of divines and Scotch commissioners, met in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, where Mr. White, one of the assembly, prayed an hour to prepare them for taking the Covenant. Then Mr. Nye, in the pulpit, made some observations touching the Covenant, showing the warrant of it from Scripture, the examples of it since the creation, and the benefit to the Church. Mr. Henderson, one of the Scots commissioners, concluded in a declaration of what the Scots had done, and the good they had received by such covenants; and then he showed the prevalence of ill counsels about the king, and the resolutions of the states of Scotland to assist the parliament of England. Then Mr. Nye, in the pulpit, read the Covenant, and all present held up their hands in testimony of their assent to it; and afterwards, in the two houses, subscribed their names in a parchment roll where the Covenant was written. The divines of the assembly and the Scots commissioners likewise subscribed the Covenant; and then Dr. Gouge in the pulpit prayed for a blessing upon it. There were two hundred and twenty-eight commoners and thirty-one peers who in St. Margaret's Church raised their hands to heaven, and swore to be faithful to the Covenant. At their meeting the following day the two houses of parliament voted an order for the ceremony to be repeated "the next Lord's day by all persons in their respective parishes;" and sixteen weeks after, on the 19th of January, 1644, a Scottish army, twenty thousand strong, crossed the Tweed.

On the eve of the important event which opened up an entirely new phase in the civil war, the English parliament and nation suffered an immense loss in the death of John Pym. Worn out by incessant toil, care, and anxiety for the public welfare, the great leader of the liberal party in the House of Commons, and virtual ruler of the kingdom since the flight of Charles from London, died on the 8th of December, 1643, not quite sixty years of age. It was said of Pym "that while he lived there was no law in England so potent as his will;" and although this amounted, superficially considered, to a heavy charge against the men of the ruling party in parliament, implying that they were guided more by persons than by fixed principles, it was substantially correct, though in a very different sense. Pym's greatness sprang almost solely from being the firmest and clearest exponent of the national will; he was the mouthpiece of that vast mass of the population surging upwards and aiming at higher forms of civil and religious life through the light of the Reformation. If he wavered at times, it was because they wavered; and the current being too strong for him, or any living being to direct, he could do nothing but swim with the stream. But he went along like a good and brave swimmer, with his eyes open, untouched by fear. Even his great political enemy, Lord Clarendon, acknowledged "he understood the tempers and affections of the kingdom as well as any man, and had observed the errors and mistakes in government;" adding, that "he had a very comely and grave way of expressing himself, with great volubility of words natural and proper." Pym was held to be the greatest orator of his age, and one of the most accomplished masters of parliamentary science ever born in England. His style was terse and nervous, no less than highly polished, and his reasoning close and vigorous, and enforced with great rhetorical skill. Taking care not to undertake too much at a time, he carried whatever he undertook, thus creating a feeling of security in his influence among his followers that was of incalculable benefit to the cause for which they were struggling. His last task, not one of the least important he achieved, the conclusion of the Solemn League and Covenant, and alliance of English and Scottish Puritanism, fitly closed his eventful earthly career. He stood bareheaded, with uplifted hands, at the head of the two hundred and sixty representatives of the nation who took oath in St. Margaret's church, and then he laid himself down to die. They fitly ordered him a burial in Westminster Abbey, to rest among the kings of England.

The conclusion of the great alliance, and march of a Scottish army across the Border, created intense consternation at the head-quarters of Charles. Short-sighted as was his whole policy, and narrow as were all his aims, the king could not help feeling that this was the greatest stroke as yet aimed against his cause, and that it was indispensable that something should be done to counteract it. There were many opinions among his advisers, an overhanging crowd of errant politicians, but the majority of them seemed to agree that it would be best to strengthen the royal influence by the creation of a sham parliament. The scheme was strongly advocated by the former member for Saltash, future Lord Clarendon, who now figured as chancellor of the exchequer, and, though mistrusted by the queen, exerted great authority. The chancellor urged, as related by himself, "that since the whole kingdom was misled by the reverence they had to parliaments, and believed that the laws and liberties of the people could not be otherwise preserved than by their authority, and that it appeared to be to no purpose to persuade men that what they did was against law, when they were persuaded that their very doing was lawful; it would be therefore necessary and could be only effectual to convince them that they who did those monstrous things were not the parliament, but a handful of desperate persons, who, by the help of the tumults raised in the city of London, had driven away the major part of the parliament, and called themselves the parliament, though they were in truth much the less and the least considerable part of it." Taking this as a basis of his plan, the ambitious minister, full of craft more than of wisdom, recommended his royal master to "issue out a proclamation to require all the members who had left the parliament at Westminster to repair to Oxford by a certain day, where his majesty would be willing to advise with them in matters of the greatest importance, concerning the peace and distractions of the kingdom." With his innate dislike of popular assemblies, Charles at first showed no liking to accept even the counterfeit legislature proposed by Clarendon; being, as stated by the latter, "in some apprehension that such a conflux of persons together of the parliament, who would look to enjoy the privileges of it in their debates, might, instead of doing him service, do many things contrary to it." However, on the chancellor of the exchequer representing eloquently that the persons to be used in the formation of a sham parliament "would be none but such as had already absented themselves from Westminster, and thereby incensed those who remained there, would not bring ill and troublesome humours with them to disturb that service which could only preserve them; but, on the contrary, would unite and conspire together to make his majesty superior to his and their enemies," Charles gave his consent to the scheme. Accordingly writs were issued in the name of the king, summoning both houses of parliament to meet on the 22nd of January, 1644, at the head-quarters of the royalist army.

The summons was obeyed by a hundred and odd ex-members of parliament, who had run away from Westminster, and were held to be not only harmless, but fit "to conspire together" under proper direction.

They were "graciously and solemnly welcomed by his majesty, with that ceremony which is used at the opening of a parliament," and even treated to a speech from a throne, although Charles, as was shown soon after, looked upon them with perfect contempt. The royal address was curious in many respects, not the least in his majesty referring to his countrymen as "foreigners." After briefly telling his audience that he was ready to receive from them "any advice which they thought would be suitable to the miserable and distracted condition of the kingdom," Charles went to the attack of the two houses of parliament, quite forgetting that by his new policy he ought to ignore them altogether. "My hope," he exclaimed, "was that, either by success on my part, or repentance on theirs, God would have put an end to this great storm; but guilt and despair have made these men more wicked than ever I imagined they intended to be; for instead of removing and reconciling these bloody distractions, and restoring peace to this languishing country, they have invited a foreign power to invade the kingdom."

The members of the Oxford assembly were quite ready to stamp Scotland as "a foreign power," and forthwith voted a bill declaring traitors all such of his majesty's subjects as did not resist the invaders from the north. This done, they resolved, under royal impulse, to make an attempt to induce the commander-in-chief of the parliamentary army to become unfaithful to his trust, for which purpose they sent him a long letter "by a trumpeter." Essex kept the trumpeter for a day or two, half inclined to hang him, but in the end despatching him back with a short note to the effect that, in command of one of the royalist regiments of parliament, the presence of those is necessary at Oxford. "My lord," the note ran, "I have received this day a letter from your lordship, and in trust, and do levy war against the parliament, parchment subscribed by the king, the duke of York, and divers other lords and gentlemen, but it neither having address to the two houses of parliament, nor being any acknowledgement of them therein, I could not communicate it to them. My lord, the maintenance of the parliament of England, and of the privileges thereof, is that for which we are all resolved to spend our blood, as being the foundation whereupon all our laws and liberties are built. I send your lordship herewith a national Covenant, solemnly entered into by both the kingdoms of England and Scotland, and a declaration passed by them both together. I rest your lordship's very humble servant—Essex." The attempt to gain the general over having failed, Charles forwarded a message to the two houses at Westminster, desiring "that a convenient number of fit persons may be appointed and authorised" to meet "an equal number of fit persons whom we shall appoint, in order 'to settle the present distractions of this kingdom.'" Had the king's peaceable intentions been serious, or even had he merely spoken in his own name, the message might not have been without effect. However, being evidently desirous as much as ever to wound more than to reconcile, he very grossly insulted the representatives of the nation by announcing that he was acting "by the advice of the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Oxford." The affront was met by a most dignified reply.

Impressed by the deep into of the great and final step they were taking, two houses at Westminster debated for three days in the presence of the Scotch commissioners about whose concurrence nothing was transacted, the answer that was to be sent to the royal message. The form of it was finally decided by a unanimous vote on the 9th of March by the lords and commons assembled in the part of England, taking into consideration a sent from your majesty, have resolved, with vice and consent of the commissioners of Scotland represent to your majesty, in all humility shewness, as followeth: That as we have all means for a just and safe peace, so will we be wanting to do our utmost for the procurement; but when we consider the expression of that letter of your majesty's, we have more a despairing thoughts of attaining the same for, because thereby those persons now assembled at Oxford, who, contrary to their duty, have deserted parliament, are put into an equal condition it. And this present parliament, condescending to the known and fundamental laws of kingdom, the continuance whereof is established by law consented unto by your majesty, is intended to be a parliament; the scope and intention of the letter being to make provision how all these, as is pretended, of both houses, may secure in a full and free convention of parliament if no other conclusion can be made, but that this present parliament is not a full nor free convention, and that to make it a full and free convention, the presence of those is necessary who, notwithstanding they have deserted that parliament, pretended to be members of the two houses of parliament. And hereupon we think ourselves bound to your majesty know, that seeing the continuance of parliament is settled by a law, which, as all laws of your kingdom, your majesty hath sworn to maintain, as we are sworn to our allegiance to your majesty, these obligations being reciprocal, we in duty, and accordingly are resolved, with our fortunes, to defend and preserve the just and full power of this parliament. And we beseech your majesty to be assured, that your majesty's royal and hearty concurrence with us will be the most effectual and ready means of procuring a firm and lasting peace in all your majesty's dominions, and of begetting a perfect understanding between your majesty and your people, without which your majesty's most earnest professions, and our most real intentions concerning the same, must necessarily be frustrated. And in case your majesty's three kingdoms should, by reason of the same, remain in this sad and bleeding condition, by the continuance of this unnatural war, their ruin, your majesty cannot be the least nor best sufferer. God in his goodness incline your breast, out of pity and compassion to those deep sorrows of your innocent people, to put a speedy issue to these desperate evils, by the joint efforts of both your kingdoms, now happily united in peace by their late Solemn League and Covenant; which as it will prove the surest remedy, so it is the earnest prayer of your majesty's loyal subjects, the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England. Grey of Warko, speaker of the house of peers in parliament, pro tempore. William Lenthall, speaker of the House of Commons in parliament."

Enough of words had now been exchanged, and the final appeal was to the sword. But before his majesty's Oxford comedians were allowed to go home to their wives, they had to pass a number of resolutions, imposing taxes upon the English nation, recommending forced loans for the maintenance of the royalist armies, and finally declaring the members of both houses of parliament traitors to the king and kingdom. All this having been accomplished to his satisfaction, Charles on the 16th of April dissolved the curious assembly his chancellor of the exchequer had swept together, and a few days after informed the queen in a letter of his satisfaction at having got "rid of this mongrel parliament." The mongrels, indeed, had become woefully unprofitable, whether for use or ornament: and the soft murmur of their obedient voices was lost in the terrible din of war gradually drawing nearer and circling around the headquarters of the king. By the middle of April, when the Oxford comedy was being played out, parliament had five great armies in the field, including the Scotch auxiliaries, and there seemed hope that the horrors of the civil war would be brought to an end at last in one great decisive battle. The earl of Essex was at the head of twelve thousand troops in the midland, and Sir William Waller with eight thousand in the western counties; while Sir Thomas Fairfax commanded six thousand well-disciplined soldiers to co-operate in the north with the twenty thousand Scots who had come across the border, and whose road southward was kept open by fourteen thousand men raised in the eastern counties, the flower of the national forces, under the leadership of the earl of Manchester, with Oliver Cromwell as second in command.

The first contest of arms of any importance that took place in the new year 1644 was under the walls of Nantwich, where Sir Thomas Fairfax, on the 25th of January, defeated and almost annihilated the five Irish regiments which had landed at Chester in the previous November. Turning eastward after this victory, Fairfax attacked and routed, on the 11th of April, a body of Royalists at Selby, in consequence of which the marquis of Newcastle, royalist commander-in-chief in the north, was compelled to fall back upon York, which he entered on the 19th of April, hotly pursued by the vanguard of the Scottish army. The latter, after effecting a junction with the troops under Sir Thomas Fairfax, at once laid siege to the headquarters of Newcastle, and both parties prepared to struggle to the utmost for the possession of York. To save the city, capital of the north of England, Charles at once ordered all his available troops forward, especially charging Prince Rupert, who was roaming about in Lancashire, to hurry to the relief of the city without a moment's loss of time. Rupert obeyed, and having safely crossed the river Ouse at Boroughbridge on the 30th of June, entered the city on the north, joining the twenty thousand men under his command to Newcastle's troops. The besiegers, who had invested the city mainly on the western side, broke up their works on the approach of the Royalists, moving towards the south, in the direction of Tadcaster, in order to effect a union with the earl of Manchester's forces. Prince Rupert, not content with relieving York, followed in the rear of the Scots and parliamentary troops, drawing Newcastle with him, and on the morning of Tuesday, the 2nd of July, both armies came to front each other on Long Marston Moor. Once again the fate of England was to be left to the chance of battle.

Long Marston Moor was singularly well chosen for the great contest of arms about to take place. A flat piece of moorland, extending south from the Ouse river for upwards of six miles, intersected by a broad ditch and some low ridges, but with very few houses and fewer trees to interrupt the view and the flight of deadly cannon and musket balls, it offered all the advantages that could be desired to carry out the science of murder on a grand scale. It was towards noon on the morning of the eventful 2nd of July, 1644, that the two armies of the Roundheads and Cavaliers placed themselves on different sides of the broad moor ditch, ready for the bloody task of the day. The forces of parliament, stationed on slightly rising ground, in a rather advantageous position, consisted of three great divisions, commanded respectively by Sir Thomas Fairfax, John Baillie, lieutenant-general of the Scots, and the earl of Manchester. Sir Thomas Fairfax formed the right wing, with eighty troops of horse in the first line, four thousand infantry, men of Yorkshire and the northern counties, behind them, and three regiments of Scotch lancers, under Lord Balgonie and the earls of Dalhousie and Eglintoun, in the rear. Next to Fairfax, commanding the centre, or "main battle," of the parliamentary army, stood old Alexander Leslie, now earl of Leven, with the bulk of the Scottish auxiliaries, entirely foot soldiers, under lieutenant-general John Baillie, and the earls of Lindsay, Cassilis, Dunfermline, Loudon, and Buccleugh, there being no Englishmen among them but a brigade of Manchester's foot and some ordnance in the reserve at the rear. Adjoining the Scottish foot on the other side, and forming the left wing of the parliamentarians, were the troops commanded by the earl of Manchester. They stood in three divisions; the left made up of Scotch dragoons, under Colonel Prizeall, the right of three brigades of foot soldiers, mostly men from the eastern counties, under Major-general Crawford; and the centre of five thousand English horse under lieutenant-general Oliver Cromwell, with three regiments of Scotch horse, under General David Leslie, in the reserve. Facing Cromwell, across the dark moor ditch, in command of the right wing of the king's army, stood Prince Rupert, also with five thousand horse, and some Irish foot under Lord Byron; while the centre of the royalist forces, all infantry, under General King, opposed John Baillie's Scotsmen; and the left wing, four thousand horse, under General Goring, confronted the division of Fairfax. In numbers, the hostile armies were nearly equal, each counting about twenty-five thousand men. For full eight hours, from eleven in the morning till seven in the evening, the thirty thousand kept looking forward fiercely, prepared to spring at each other's throats, and only awaiting the word of command. It was long in coming. "But surely," said Scout-master Watson, serving in Cromwell's horse, "had two such armies, drawn up so close one to the other, being on both wings within musket shot, departed without fighting, I think it would have been as great a wonder as hath been seen in England."

It was past seven in the evening; both armies had been facing each other motionless for hours, and many of the officers, thinking that the battle would not begin till the rise of another sun, were preparing themselves for rest, when suddenly the pent-up rage of war was set in motion, almost by accident. Ever restless in his movements, Prince Rupert began to erect, while the day was already on the decline, a new battery on the moor, somewhat closer than his other ordnance to the left wing of the parliamentary forces, and seeing this, Cromwell at once ordered two field-pieces forward, under the protection of two regiments of foot. The guns had to be brought down from a slight eminence, and their removal attracting the attention of some companies of musketeers who had been posted in the extreme van of the royalist right wing across the ditch, they forthwith opened a brisk fire. The crack of the muskets was the signal for a general engagement the whole of the length of the two lines, beginning on the parliamentary left wing, where Cromwell was standing with his "Iron-sides," on an elevation overlooking the dark moorland. "We came down the hill in the bravest order," Scout-master Watson said, "with the greatest resolution that was ever seen. The earl of Manchester's foot began the charge against some of the bravest of Newcastle's and Rupert's foot, Colonel Frisvold and his dragoons acting their part admirably, and driving the musketeers before them into the ditch." Amazed at the sudden attack, the vanguard of the Royalists, after a short firing on both sides, retreated in great confusion over the ditch, leaving behind four "drakes," or small field-pieces. It was in vain that Lord Byron with his Irishmen dashed forward to recover the guns; he was driven back instantly, the soldiers of his brigade increasing the thick stream of flying Royalists. "In a moment," the scout-master continues his relation, "we were past the ditch on to the moor, upon equal terms with the enemy, our men going in a running march. Our front divisions of horse charged their front; Cromwell's own division of horse, in which himself was in person, and in which were all their gallant men, charging the first division of Prince Rupert's, in which himself was in person, and in which were all their gallant men, they being resolved, if they could scatter Cromwell, all were their own. The rest of our horse, backed by Leslie's three troops, charged other divisions of theirs, and with such admirable valour as to astonish all the old soldiers of the army. Cromwell's own division had a hard struggle, for they were charged by Rupert's men both in front and flank." The troopers on both sides first discharged their pistols, after which, flinging the heavy weapons at each other's heads, they drew their swords. A stray shot grazed the neck of Cromwell, carrying great fear among his men, who thought that he was severely hurt; but he did not stop his horse for a moment, and riding on, cried gaily, "A miss is as good as a mile." All after him, in irresistible torrent, rushed the Ironsides, shouting the signal of the parliamentary army for the day, "God with us!"

"God with us!" cried the Roundheads, and "God and the king!" ejaculated the Cavaliers, and so they killed each other in the name of God. "For a good while they stood at the sword's point, hacking one another," says the scout-master, busily hacking himself; "but at last Cromwell broke through, scattering them before him like a little dust. At the same time, the rest of the horse on the parliamentary left wing had wholly broken through Prince Rupert's lines, and the Cavaliers did fly along by Wilstropwood side as fast and as thick as could be." After sending a party in pursuit of the fugitives, Cromwell and Leslie pushed onward with the main bodies of their horse and some regiments of foot towards the centre of the royalist army. "Manchester's foot," noted the active scout-master, "charged by our side, dispersing the enemy's foot almost as fast as they charged them; still going by our side, cutting them down, so that we carried the whole field before us, thinking the victory ours, and nothing to be done but to kill and take prisoners." In this struggle the three brigades of eastern counties men, commanded by Major-general Crawford, particularly distinguished themselves, "standing when charged like a wall of brass, and letting fly small shot like hail." Some few, however, detached themselves from their regiments to join in the pursuit of Rupert's horse, long the pride of the royalist army, but now galloping about in frightful disorder, driven mad by sudden panic. Dispersing thus over the wild and black moorland, one of the soldiers came across a peaceful son of the soil, undisturbed by the roar of murder that was going on in the distance, in his attention to turnips and cabbages. "For which party are you—king or parliament?" the trooper addressed the peasant, in alarmingly authoritative tone. "Whaat, has them two fallen out, then?" cried he of the turnips, in intense surprise. There were yet happy souls left in England—happy souls, not caring for "them two," even on the borders of Long Marston Moor.

The great battle on the moor lasted till an hour after sunset, with strange fluctuation of success on both sides. Cromwell's scout-master was entirely mistaken in deeming "the victory ours" while chasing Rupert's horse; for while the left wing of the parliamentary army was beating the Royalists, the centre, as well as the right wing, were being beaten and scattered in all directions. Between the division of Sir Thomas Fairfax and the troops of the enemy, under General Goring, "there was no passage across the ditch except at a narrow lane where they could not march except three or four in front, and upon the one side of the lane was a ditch and on the other a hedge, both of which were lined with royalist musketeers." Having passed with great loss through this defile, Fairfax's men were charged in a body, and although Sir Thomas himself made his way forward with a small squadron of horse, hewing the enemy down to right and left, the rest of his wing was defeated, his foot being thrown into complete disorder by the furious assaults of a picked body of northerners, known as the Whitecoats. The left wing of the Royalists, thus victorious, next turned upon the flank of the parliamentary centre, whose front was already hard pressed by the forces of General King and the marquis of Newcastle. After a brief and desperate struggle the Scotch gave way, their lines, formed half of pikemen and half of musketeers, getting into confusion under the repeated charges of the enemy's cavalry, so as to be no longer able to keep together. In vain the earl of Leven hastened from one part to the other of the field, endeavouring by words, and even by blows, to keep his men from running away. "Though you escape from the enemy," he cried, "yet leave not your general; though you fly from them, yet forsake not me!"

Attached as the soldiers were to their old commander, his words met with no attention in the general panic; and at last he himself, conceiving the battle utterly lost, was persuaded by the officers of his staff to turn his horse's head and go with the stream of fugitives. He did so, and never drew bridle till he came to Leeds, nearly forty miles distant, riding all the night in a cloak of "drap-de-berrie," belonging to a gentleman named Somerville, who noted down the fact as important to posterity. The other two commanders of the parliamentary army, Fairfax and Manchester, fled the same as Leven, but did not go quite so far, for on perceiving that they were not pursued, they turned round, and gathering as many troops as they could, once more charged the enemy. However, even to them the struggle seemed hopeless, and they sought death rather than victory. "It was a sad sight," an eye-witness exclaimed, "to behold so many thousands posting away, amazed with panic fears." Great numbers fled without striking a blow, some of the horsemen never looking back till they got as far as Lincoln, others nearly reaching Hull, and others Halifax and Wakefield. All along the roads the fugitives went, the news that the parliamentary army had been utterly routed, if not annihilated, spread like wildfire; and the intelligence reaching the royalist governor of Tickhill castle, five miles from Doncaster, he caused it to be transmitted by mounted messengers to Newark, and from thence to Oxford. On Thursday evening, the 5th of July, the streets of the old university town, head-quarters of the king, were lighted up by bonfires, and the next morning the bells of all the churches were set ringing, and the bishop and clergy, in high episcopal state, returned thanks to heaven for the great victory vouchsafed to his majesty.

The thanksgiving was somewhat uncalled for. The grim fight on Long Marston Moor, indeed, had been a great victory, but in favour of another majesty than the one prayed for at Oxford. Night was coming on when the right wing and centre of the parliamentary forces were flying from the field of battle, but at that very moment the fate of the all-important struggle was being decided in another quarter. Cromwell and his men had begun with success, and they kept it to the last in their grasp. Having cleared the field on their side, routed Prince Rupert's horse, and taken all his artillery and ammunition, the Ironsides came sweeping round to the part of the moor before occupied by the royalist left, expecting that their own right wing had done their duty as well as they themselves. It was not long before they were undeceived. However, this did not in the least detract from their calm courage; and neither wearied by their hot service, nor discouraged by the flight of their friends and the victorious shouts of their opponents, they rode forward in excellent order to a second charge. "And here," Scout-master Watson noted, "came the business of the day, nay almost of the kingdom, to be disputed; for the enemy, seeing us come in such a gallant posture to charge them, left all thoughts of pursuit, and began to think that they must fight again for that victory which they thought had been already got, they marching down the hill upon us from our carriages, so that they fought upon the same ground, and with the same front that our right wing had before stood to receive their charge, and we stood upon the same ground and with the same front which they had when they began the charge. Our three brigades of foot of the earl of Manchester being, on our right hand, on we went, with great resolution, charging them home, one while their horse, and then again their foot, and our foot and horse seconding each other with such valour, with such sound charges, that away they fled, not being able to endure the sight of us." By nine o'clock, when the battle had been raging for nearly two hours, Oliver Cromwell, valiantly aided by David Leslie and Colonel Friswell with his Scotch dragoons, had cleared the field, not only of all enemies, but recovered the ordnance and carriages of the parliamentary centre and right wing, and captured all those of the Royalists. Then commenced the pursuit of the defeated enemy. "We followed the chase of them," Watson says, "to within a mile of York, cutting them down, so that their dead bodies lay three miles in length." "The moon with her light," another eye-witness recorded, "helped somewhat the darkness of the season," in the task of making "dead bodies."

Long Marston Moor presented sights both terrible and grand the night after the battle. "The Prince of Plunderland," a spectator noted, "he that had by daylight plundered others, had his rich sumpter plundered by moonlight, for till twelve at night our soldiers had the slaughter of the enemy in woods and lanes and fields." The rabble of both armies was busy till sunrise stripping corpses, and when the morning came "it was mortifying to behold the naked bodies of thousands lie upon the ground, many not altogether dead." Yet while the vagabonds plundered, brave soldiers prayed. For some hours after the victory had been decided, and up till midnight, the earl of Manchester and other officers, not engaged like Cromwell in the pursuit of fugitives, rode about among their men, the earl "thanking them for the exceeding good service which they had done for the kingdom, but earnestly exhorting them to give the honour of their victory to God alone. He also further told them that although he could not possibly that night make provisions for them according to their deserts and necessities, yet he would without fail endeavour their satisfaction in that kind in the morning. The soldiers unanimously gave God the glory of their great deliverance and victory, and told his lordship with much cheerfulness, that though they had long fasted and were very faint, yet they would willingly wait three days longer rather than give off the service." It was no mere idle talk, for they could have had good reason to complain had they liked.

Victorious though they were, the soldiers of parliament and of the nation had neither food nor drink, nor the commonest of their wants supplied. Having drained the few wells on the moor down to the mud, they were obliged to drink water out of ditches and places puddled by the horses' feet; and a great number of the men "did not eat above the quantity of a penny loaf from Tuesday to Saturday morning, nor had they any beer at all." Nevertheless, the starving fighters for the national cause, notably those under Cromwell's command, manfully did their duty, not only as soldiers, but as Christians. After thanking God for having strengthened their arms and their souls to achieve so great a victory, they set to perform charitable offices, nursing the wounded and burying the dead. The number slain on the battle-field, and buried there in wide graves, was reported to amount to four thousand one hundred and fifty, and it was calculated that nearly three thousand of these were of the royal army. The smooth white skins of many of them gave reason to think that they were of "gentle blood," and in order that they might have a more honourable burial than the rest, the parliamentary generals freely allowed their corpses to be taken away. It gave rise to numerous touching scenes, some of them preserved in old accounts and family traditions. "Mary, daughter of Sir Francis Trappes," runs one of these, "married Charles Towneley, of Towneley, in Lancashire, esquire, who was killed at the battle of Marston Moor. During the engagement she was with her father at Knaresborough, where she heard of her husband's fate, and came upon the field the next morning to search for his body, while the attendants of the camp were stripping and burying the dead. Here she was accosted by a general officer, to whom she told her melancholy story. He heard her with great tenderness, but earnestly desired her to leave a place where, besides the distress of witnessing sorrowful things, she might probably be insulted. She complied, and he called a trooper, who took her 'en croupe.' On her way to Knaresborough, she inquired of the man the name of the officer to whose civility she had been indebted, and learned that it was Lieutenant-general Cromwell."

The results of the battle of Long Marston Moor were of the most important nature. Prince Rupert and the Marquis of Newcastle, who had long professed antipathy to each other, parted the morning after the struggle, the prince retiring to his former command in the west of England, while the marquis, deeming the royal cause in the northern counties, where all his own influence was concentrated, entirely lost, embarked at Scarborough for the continent. The city of York, abandoned to its fate, capitulated on the 16th of July, after which the combined armies separated, Manchester and Cromwell returning to Nottinghamshire, Fairfax establishing his headquarters at York, and the Scots, under Leven, marching to Newcastle, which they reduced after a short siege. By the sudden collapse of the king's cause in the north, the prospects of the two combatants in the civil war all at once underwent a vast change; and while on the side of parliament all was bright and hopeful, everything was gloomy and cheerless on the part of the Royalists. However, nearly one-third of the territory of the realm still adhered to Charles, at least nominally. From Oxford to the extremity of Cornwall the king held uninterrupted sway, and his authority was acknowledged all over North and South Wales, with the exception only of the castles of Pembroke and Montgomery, while several towns in the midland counties were garrisoned by his troops. Driven from the north, the west of England had now become the stronghold of the Royalists, which was so far acknowledged by Charles that he sent thither the prince of Wales, investing him with the nominal command of all his forces.

The queen had gone to the west a month previous to the battle of Long Marston Moor, not thinking her residence at Oxford quite safe; and taking farewell from her consort at Abingdon—farewell for ever!—had established herself at Exeter, where, on the 16th of June, she was delivered, somewhat to the surprise of the court, of a daughter. But Exeter was a badly-chosen place of refuge, for a fortnight after the accouchement of Henrietta Maria, the vanguard of the parliamentary forces, under the earl of Essex, approached to besiege the city. Still maintaining her haughty dignity, the royal lady demanded of Essex to allow her to retire to Bath for the sake of her health; the respectful reply to which was, that the lord-general had orders "to escort her majesty to London, where her presence was required to answer to parliament for having levied war in England." Henrietta Maria did not choose to accept the invitation, couched though it was in the most polite terms; and stealing out of Exeter in disguise, she hid herself for several days in a hut in the neighbourhood, "under a heap of litter," after which, rejoined by a few of her intimate friends and attendants, including her old favourite, Harry Jermyn, recently turned into a lord, she made her way to Falmouth. A small Dutch fleet, prepared for some time past for her flight, and, if necessary, that of the prince of Wales, was lying in Falmouth roadstead, and here the queen embarked on Sunday, the 14th of July, having just received the full details of the great struggle on Long Marston Moor. According to Rushworth, "the earl of Warwick had ordered several ships to attend at Toulbay to intercept and hinder her passage; yet her majesty, with a Flemish man-of-war and ten other ships, adventured out, and by the advantage of the wind avoided any annoyance from the parliament fleet, who yet pursued with all the sail they could make. One frigate came up and discharged several shots at them, but her majesty's ships, coming out fresh tallowed, and trained for so important a service, had the advantage of them in sailing; and to prevent the worst, there was provided a galley with sixteen oars, which might have garried off her majesty if they could have come up. But without needing to make use thereof, her majesty landed safely at Brest, in France, and resided in that her native kingdom from henceforth." Which was decidedly a blessing to England.

The march of the earl of Essex into the western counties, though fortunate so far as driving the wretched consort of Charles from the soil of England, was not otherwise distinguished by success. Being devoid of great cannons, and fearing that the siege of Exeter would last a long time without them, Essex withdrew from the city almost as soon as he had arrived, and went marching westward into Cornwall; evidently not very clearly knowing what he meant to do, but acting chiefly upon the advice of one of his favourite officers, Lord Roberts, who possessed large estates in the county, and was anxious to renew the long-lost pleasure of getting rents from his property. For this laudable desire the nation had to pay somewhat dearly. As yet the whole of the narrow peninsula, from the Exe river to Mount Bay, was faithful to the royal cause; and seeing the parliamentary general push forward into this sea-girt territory, sliding, as it were, into a net, or a great mousetrap, Charles determined to shut the gate behind, and lay hold of his prey.

The scheme was not very difficult to execute. Rupert's Cavaliers, learning that there was a splendid opportunity for plunder, the cash of the capital being securely packed in the coffers of Essex and of his faithful lieutenant, John Skippon, commander of the London train bands, came up in hasty strides from the midland counties, under the personal command of the king, and reinforced by great crowds of loyal Cornishmen, deeply antipathetic to the designs of Lord Roberts, they rushed down upon the parliamentary forces, numbering only about seven thousand men, encircling them within their grasp. Essex did not perceive their intentions till he found himself hemmed in among the hills between Bodmin, Lostwithiel, and Fowey, where daily, and almost hourly, skirmishing awaited him, "with ever growing scarcity of victual." He now made a desperate attempt to get out of the net, by forming a plan, according to which his cavalry, under Sir William Balfour, were to hew their way through the meshes spread by the enemy, while he himself, with all the foot and artillery in his possession, were to embark at Fowey in the ships of the fleet under Warwick, who was aware of his danger. But the design miscarried, as far as the embarkation of the foot was concerned, through the treachery of a Frenchman serving in the parliamentary army, who deserted into the camp of Charles, acquainting him with every particular of the earl's intended movements, and leaving him to take his own measures to prevent them. The horse had time to break through the enemy; but the bulk of his forces, being attacked when least prepared for resistance, Essex himself became panic-stricken, and fled away to Fowey, where he took ship on the 1st of September, in company with the chief officers of his staff, including the unfortunate Lord Roberts, most afraid of all to get face to face with his countrymen, friends, and tenants.

The flight of the commander-in-chief left the parliamentary army under the orders of Major-general Skippon, who forthwith assembled a council of war, and proposed boldly to assume the offensive. "You see," cried the brave train-band captain, "our general and some chief officers have thought fit to leave us, and our horse are got away, and so we are left alone upon our defence. That which I now propound to you is this: that we, having the same courage as our horse had, and the same God to assist us, may make the same trial of our fortunes, and endeavour to make our way through our enemies as they have done, and account it better to die with honour and faithfulness than to live dishonourable." It was a speech worthy of the man and of the occasion, but few only would listen to it; and easy conditions of surrender being offered by the Royalists, it was resolved by the war council that they should be accepted. Accordingly, on the 2nd of September, the day after the flight of Essex, they all laid down their arms, the swords being returned to the officers, and the whole of the cannon and ammunition, stores and baggage, having been delivered up, the men were conducted back to the outposts of Sir William Waller's army, at Poole and Southampton. By the terms of the capitulation, the parliamentary soldiers were to retain all their personal property; but before they reached their journey's end, they were not only robbed of all the money and valuables they possessed, but most of them had even the clothes taken from their back, giving them occasion to remember for a long time to come the "Prince of Plunderers."

Essex's flight, and the surrender of his troops, caused immense excitement in London, although the event was of no very great moment from a political point of view. "The parliament," says Rushworth, "soon caused the foot to be armed and clothed again, and the horse having forced their way, the army was speedily recruited, scarce a man having taken arms on the other side." Nevertheless, it was thought that Essex had shown great military incapacity, both in allowing himself to be surrounded, and in not making a good retreat, he being, to the very last moment, numerically stronger than the enemy. The murmur against the earl before long assumed the wider shape of a general protest against commanders drawn from the ranks of the nobility, it being undeniable that nearly all of them had been unsuccessful in the war, and that the only great victory over the enemy had been obtained in spite of them. What greatly embittered these feelings was the slowly growing religious feud in the House of Commons and among the educated middle classes from which it had sprung. While bowing down under adversity, with all their nerves strained to oppose the common foe, the two great parties of which the parliamentary majority was made up, the Presbyterians and the Independents, had worked zealously together for the same end; but the sunshine of prosperity had no sooner made itself felt when it asserted its usual effect in dividing those whose union had only been temporary, and more or less artificial. This was the more the case as both factions dissented from each other, not only about important questions of religion, or rather of church government, but about matters of civil polity, of equal importance to them and to the commonwealth. The Presbyterians were glad to avail themselves of the assistance of the Independents both to destroy the episcopal establishment and to curb royal absolutism; but here they wished to stop, aiming no further than to substitute ministers and ruling elders for bishops and priests, and a constitutional charter for the blind will of an irresponsible ruler. But the Independents were not at all inclined to arrest the course of the great revolution, which they had helped to set in movement, at those landmarks. Democratic in all their views, they would not submit to presbyters much more willingly than to priests, and had little greater faith in oligarchical than in monarchical forms of civil government; and having helped to clear the road for a certain distance, as far as their allies wished to go, they set to work with still greater zeal to strike out their own track. Indications of the career the Independents meant to pursue became visible immediately after the battle of Marston Moor, which made the whole party rise together with the great member of it who had won the victory. In and out of parliament constant attacks were made upon eminent leaders of the Presbyterian faction, such as Essex and Manchester; and the former, having fallen into general disfavour through his behaviour in Cornwall, the excitement went on increasing on all sides. But little now was wanting to bring the agitation of parties to an outbreak; and the events of the next few months sufficed to fan the smouldering fire into open flame.

Having driven the army of Essex into capitulation, the king, elated beyond measure by his victory, which he immensely overrated, turned eastward, loudly declaring his intention to fall upon the capital, and compel the parliament to accept peace upon terms dictated by him. However, his hasty march was much impeded before he had reached the borders of Wiltshire; and having pushed with great difficulty across the country as far as Hungerford, he was brought to a standstill by the van of the armies under Sir William Waller and the earl of Manchester, joined by the reorganised forces of Essex, who were coming up in quick marches to oppose his further progress. Some sharp skirmishing ensued, and was continued till the town of Newbury, where Royalists and Parliamentarians had a tough encounter the previous year, and of which the former now took once more possession. It was on the evening of the 26th of October that Charles marched into the place, and early the following morning, a Sunday, he found the united forces of Essex, Waller, and Manchester, drawn up in the field fronting him, and offering to engage in a second battle of Newbury. The king accepted the challenge, though numerically weaker than his opponents, and with troops exhausted by the long march from the extreme west of England, and the struggle commenced about four o'clock in the afternoon. After six hours' confused fighting the left wing of the Royalists drove back the Parliamentarians, but their right was compelled to give way before the onset of Cromwell's horse.

Charles withdrew his army from the field, marching off "by moonlight, at ten o'clock," towards Wallingford, on the road to Oxford, and leaving his artillery with a small garrison at Donnington Castle. Cromwell was very anxious to follow the enemy, and to turn the partly undecided contest into a victory; but his superior, the earl of Manchester, refused to let him do so; and though he urged and urged again the necessity of a pursuit, the earl remained obstinate. In consequence, no attempt was made even to seize Donnington Castle, which might have been done with comparative ease. Instead of it the parliamentary forces, as stated by Clarendon, "remained quietly at Newbury, in great faction among themselves, every man taking upon himself to find fault, and censure what had been done and what had been left undone." Charles was not slow in taking advantage of the quarrels of his adversaries, and eight days after the battle he boldly came back again to fetch the guns he had left at Donnington Castle. "The enemy's army," records Clarendon, "lay still at Newbury, perplexed with the divisions and factions among their own officers, without any notice of the king's advance, till a quarter of their horse was beaten up. The next morning [November 5th] the king put his army into battalia. Prince Rupert, who was now declared general, led the van, and got possession of the heath on the back side of the castle, from which a small party might have kept him, the entrance into it being very steep, and the way narrow. On that heath the king's army was drawn up about noon, every one being prepared to fight; and none of the enemy appearing, they marched by the castle, over the river by a mill, and two fords below it, without any opposition." Having stayed a night at Donnington Castle, and retaken possession of the whole of his ordnance in sight of the parliamentary generals, who were fronting him with troops nearly three times as numerous as his own, Charles graciously "resolved to attempt them no farther, but gave orders to retire in their view, with drums beating and trumpets sounding, the same way he came." Cromwell and his men ground their teeth; to them, as, indeed, to all beholders of the scene, there could be no longer any doubt that the earl of Manchester and his advisers and coadjutors were either traitors, or the most incapable commanders of armies that ever lived.

All was now ripe for an explosion. "In the House of Commons, on Monday, the 25th of November, 1644," it was entered in the "journals" of parliament, "Lieutenant-general Cromwell did, as ordered on the Saturday before, exhibit a charge against the earl of Manchester to this effect: That the said earl hath always been indisposed and backward to engagements, and the ending of the war by the sword; and for such a peace as a victory would be a disadvantage to, and hath declared this by principles express to that purpose, and a continued series of carriage and actions: That since the taking of York, as if the parliament had now advantage fully enough, he hath declined whatsoever tendeth to farther advantage upon the enemy, and neglected and studiously shifted off opportunities to that purpose, especially at Donnington Castle: That he hath drawn the army into, and detained them in such a posture, as to give the enemy fresh advantages, and this before his conjunction with the other armies, by his own absolute will, against or without his council of war, against many commands of parliament, and with contempt and vilifying of those commands." These charges having been read, it was resolved by the commons, though with great reluctance on the part of the majority, still representing the Presbyterian element, but cowed by the daily rising power of the Independents, that they should be sent to the House of Lords, with request to the accused peer to furnish an answer thereto. Manchester complied at the end of a week, but in a very unsatisfactory manner, his replies to the imputations laid upon him turning into mere counter-charges against his subordinate, the stern lieutenant-general. He accused the latter of having shown repeatedly disrespect to him, the earl; of having expressed sentiments inimical to the pride and glory of the realm, the English peerage; and, worse than all, of having not always shown due reverence to the person and character of his majesty the king. Instances were adduced in each case to prove the terrible accusations hurled against Cromwell. He was reported to have said, on one occasion, when ordered to amuse the commander-in-chief with his Ironsides at some grand parade: "If your lordship want to have the skins of the horses, this is the way to get them;" and on another, that "there would never be a good time in England till they had done with the lords." This was appalling enough; but the horror of all the sayings and doings of the lieutenant-general culminated in the utterance ascribed to him, that, "if he met the king in battle, he would fire his pistol upon the king as at another." It was, as remarked by Carlyle, "a thing hardly conceivable to the Presbyterian human mind," that, though in open war against his majesty, soldiers should dare to fire at "our poor semi-divine misguided father;" "divinity fallen insane," and accordingly Cromwell met with strong rebuke on all hands, ending in a violent attempt to bring him to justice as an "incendiary." Already the leaders of the Presbyterian party in both houses of parliament were getting in a mood which preferred to make war upon the Independents and republicans rather than the Royalists and absolutists.

The design to bring Cromwell to trial, and, if possible, to the block, was carried out with great concealment and not a little craft. Before disclosing their plan in parliament, Essex and his friends held several secret meetings at his house to deliberate upon the proper mode of proceeding; and after some discussion it was resolved to call in the assistance of two of the most eminent lawyers of the English bar, Sir John Maynard, and Bulstrode Whitelock, both Presbyterians. They were sent for late one evening, at the beginning of December, much to their astonishment. "There was no excuse to be admitted," Whitelock recorded, "nor did they know beforehand the occasion of their being sent for." Maynard and Whitelock found the leaders of the Presbyterian party assembled in conclave with several of the Scottish commissioners, Essex sitting at the head of the table, and the lord chancellor of Scotland acting as spokesman for "his excellency," the earl. "You ken vara weel," said his lordship, addressing the two lawyers, "that Lieutenant-general Cromwell is no friend of ours, and since the advance of our army into England he hath used all underhand and cunning means to take off from our honour and merit of this kingdom—an evil requital of all our hazards and services. But so it is; and we are nevertheless fully satisfied of the affections and gratitude of the good people of this nation in general. It is thought requisite for us, and for the carrying on of the cause of the two kingdoms, that this obstacle, or 'remora,' may be removed out of the way, who, we foresee, will otherwise be no small impediment to us and the good design we have undertaken. He not only is no friend to us, and to the government of our church, but he is also no well-willer to his excellency, whom you and we all have cause to love and honour; and if he be permitted to go on in his ways, it may, I fear, endanger the whole business. Therefore we are to advise of some course to be taken for prevention of that mischief. You ken vara weel the accord twixt the two kingdoms, and the union by the Solemn League and Covenant, and if any be an incendiary between the two nations, how is he to be proceeded against? Now the matter wherein we desire your opinions is what you tak the meaning of this word incendiary to be, and whether Lieutenant-general Cromwell be not such an incendiary as is meant thereby, and whilk way wud be best to tak to proceed against him, if he be proved to be such an incendiary. Now, you may ken that by our law in Scotland we class him an incendiary who kindleth coals of contention, and raiseth differences in the state to the public damage, and is 'tanquam publicus hostis patrie.' Whether your law be the same or not, you ken best, who are mickle learned therein; and therefore, with the favour of his excellency, we desire your judgment in these points." Thus spoke the lord chancellor of Scotland to Sir John Maynard and Bulstrode Whitelock, pillars on the mountain of English law. And the two "mickle learned" men, kept their keen eyes on his excellency and friends, wondering how clever they were to ask them to fetch their nits from the fire.

Bulstrode Whitelock was the first to open his lips in reply to the sapient speech of the lord chancellor. He informed his lordship that the word incendiary had exactly the same meaning in the law of England as in that of Scotland; but added, with great caution, that, as it seemed to him the matter to be considered was not the state of the law with regard to incendiaries, but whether they had good evidence of Lieutenant-general Cromwell being one of those who "kindleth coals of contention and raiseth differences in the state," and also whether, if they had such evidence, it would be legally available. "I take Lieutenant-general Cromwell," Whitelock added, with all the circumspection becoming an eminent lawyer, pattern and beacon of the English bar—"I take Lieutenant-general Cromwell to be a gentleman of quick and subtle parts, and one who hath, especially of late, gained no small interest in the House of Commons; nor is he wanting of friends in the House of Peers, nor of abilities in himself to manage his own part or defence to the best advantage. If this be so, it will be the more requisite to be well prepared against him before he be brought upon the stage." Sir John Maynard, as shrewd and as wary as his colleague, took care to chime in with the sentiments he had expressed. "Lieutenant-general Cromwell," Sir John pointed out with emphasis, "is a person of great favour and interest with the House of Commons, and with some of the House of Peers likewise, and therefore there must be proofs the most clear and evident against him to prevail with the parliament to adjudge him to be an incendiary."

The advice thus given caused a warm debate at the meeting presided over by Essex, ending in a resolution, come to some hours after midnight, to postpone action for the time. Some of the more hot-headed of the presbyterian chiefs, foremost among them Denzil Holles, who bore a deep personal hatred to Cromwell, "spoke smartly to the business," recommending fearless action; but they were overruled by the Scottish commissioners, who, with national caution, "were not so forward to adventure themselves, so that the blow was given up for the present." There was wisdom in this step, for the much-feared lieutenant-colonel had his eye upon his enemies even more than they had upon him. "They had some cause afterwards to believe," Whitelock noted, "that, at this debate, some who were present were false brethren, and informed Cromwell of all that passed among them." His foes as yet little understood the dreaded Lord of the Fens. While they were there talking, he was working, and while they were planning deep schemes, he was preparing simple acts.

A few days after the secret meeting at Essex's house, on Wednesday, the 9th of December, Cromwell arose in his seat in the House of Commons, amidst the deepest silence. "It is now time to speak," he cried, abruptly, "or for ever hold the tongue. The important question now is no less than to save a nation out of a bleeding, nay, almost dying condition, which the long continuance of this war hath already brought it into, so that without a more speedy, vigorous, and effectual prosecution of the war, casting off all lingering proceedings, like soldiers of fortune beyond sea, to spin out a war, we shall make the kingdom weary of us, and hate the name of a parliament. For what do the enemy say? Nay, what do many say that were friends at the beginning of the parliament? Even this; that the members of both houses have got great places and commands, and the sword into their hands; and, what by interest in parliament, what by power in the army, will perpetually continue themselves in grandour, and not permit the war speedily to end, lest their own power should end with it. This, that I speak here to our faces, is but what others do utter abroad behind our backs. I am far from reflecting on any. I know the worth of those commanders, members of both houses, who are yet in power; but if I may speak my conscience without reflection upon any, I do conceive if the army be not put into another method, and the war more vigorously prosecuted, the people can bear the war no longer, and will enforce you to a dishonourable peace. But this I would recommend to your prudence, not to insist upon any complaint or oversight of any commander-in-chief, upon any occasion whatsoever; for as I must acknowledge myself guilty of oversights, so I know they can rarely be avoided in military affairs. Therefore, waiving a strict inquiry into the causes of these things, let us apply ourselves to the remedy, which is most necessary. And I hope we have such true English hearts, and zealous affection towards the general weal of our mother country, that no members of either house will scruple to deny themselves, and their own private interests for the public good, nor account it to be a dishonour done to them whatever the parliament shall resolve upon in this weighty matter."

Cromwell having concluded his speech, Zouch Tate, representative of Northampton, a zealous Independent, but hitherto obscure member, sprang to his feet. "Two summers are passed over," he cried, "and we are not saved. Our victories, the price of blood invaluable, so gallantly gotten and so graciously bestowed, seem to have been put into a bag with holes. What we won at one time we lost at another. The treasure is exhausted, the country wasted; a summer's victory has proved but a winter's story. The game, however, shut up with autumn, must be played again the next spring, as if the blood was only shed to manure the field for a more plentiful crop of contention. Men's hearts have failed them with the observation of these things." He went on arguing that the protracted war and all its misfortunes were due to the causes already urged by the member for Cambridge, and asked permission to bring in a bill for their remedy. "There was a general silence for a good space of time," and then the representative of Northampton brought forward a bill, which was seconded by Sir Harry Vane, ordering "that no member of either house shall, during the war, enjoy or execute any office of command, civil or military." The bill, in its first reading, was adopted by a large majority, and an amendment excepting the lord-general, the earl of Essex, from the Act, was lost on a division by twenty-seven votes, in a house of one hundred and ninety-three members. Cromwell and his friends had laid the basis of the "Self-denying Ordinance," which once more altered the government of England.

But the parliamentary struggle for power as yet had only commenced) and the toughest part of it was still to come. It was in a moment of extreme alarm and trepidation, caused by the address of Cromwell, whose influence with the army was growing in a gigantic manner, that the commons passed the preamble of the Self-denying Ordinance; but when the second reading came on, two days after, on the 11th of December, the presbyterian majority were up in arms for the fight. The debate on this occasion was long and violent, and was renewed in four successive sittings, with ever-increasing heat, both on the part of the Independents and of the Presbyterians. The latter, though being able to throw out the Ordinance by an immediate vote, were afraid to do so, aware that public opinion was greatly in favour of it, and that the city with its trained bands was ready to back it by force; and all their efforts, therefore, were directed to destroy the real object of the bill, that of depriving all the noble lords, as well as the presbyterian leaders in the House of Commons, of their power in the army, by a series of amendments and exceptions. The effort not proving successful, the earl of Essex and his friends in their despair began opening fresh negotiations for the king. On being applied to secretly, Charles consented to grant a safe-conduct to six English and three Scottish commissioners, all of them members of the Presbyterian party, to lay a petition for peace before him; and although in the paper transmitted by the king the envoys were merely referred to as private persons, and the parliament not even mentioned, both the lords and commons in their majority took the insult quietly, and allowed their members to depart for Oxford with the drawn-up propositions.

Acquainted with the exact position of affairs at Westminster, Charles received the nine commissioners in a haughty and all but insulting manner. The earl of Denbigh, spokesman of the nine, having read the proposals, the king asked him, in an inascible manner, "Have you power to treat fully?" "No," replied the earl, bowing to the ground, "but we are to receive your majesty's answer in writing." "Then," Charles replied coarsely, though with much truth, "a letter-carrier might have done as much as you." His lordship's offended dignity made him bold to utter a faint remonstrance. "I hope," he whispered, "your majesty looks upon us as persons of another condition than letter-carriers." "Well, well," stammered the king, "I know your condition, but I say that your commission does not give you any power to do more than a mere letter-carrier might have done." After having been in humble attendance about his majesty for a week, openly laughed at by Prince Rupert and others, and treated with disdain by all the courtiers, who tried faithfully to reflect in their demeanour the tone of their royal master, the nine ambassadors had the honour of a farewell audience. It consisted chiefly in a sealed letter, directed to nobody, being handed to them to carry back to their employers. Some commissioners, among them Denzil Holles, summoned courage to lay in a lowly protest against the manner in which they were treated, reminding the king that it was usual to furnish political envoys with the copy of replies to their messages. But Charles laughed with scorn. "What is that to you," he cried, "who are but to carry what I send? If I will send the song of Robin Hood and Little John you must carry it."

Under any other circumstances further negotiations for peace would have been entirely out of the question after this insulting behaviour of the king towards the leaders of the parliamentary majority and chiefs of the government, but now, hard pressed as they were, they submitted to everything. Essex, Manchester, Denbigh, Denzil Holles, with four-fifths of the peers, and nearly two-thirds of the commons, felt a sincere abhorrence towards a return of royal absolutism, yet they at the same time had a still greater dread towards the advent of republicanism in church and state, and the fear of it overran all other considerations. While the Self-denying Ordinance was still under discussion in parliament, partly accepted in the lower house, but rejected in the upper, and then thrown as a shuttlecock from one to the other, a strong majority in the lords and commons resolved to make a great effort to come to terms with the king. Having humiliated his old antagonists and new friends to the utmost, Charles finally condescended to touch the olive branch held out to him, and a dozen commissioners having been nominated by him, and as many on the part of parliament, a great peace congress was opened at the town of Uxbridge on the 30th of January, 1645.

OXFORD PRINCE HOUSE.

The deliberations extended over twenty days, but, as was foreseen by all impartial observers, led to not the slightest result. It was clear from the beginning that the king did not wish to have peace on any conditions other than such as he might obtain at the very best by a series of great victories in the field and the complete military subjugation of the realm; and the action of congress, though carried on with great dignity, with a superabundance of fine orations and exchange of diplomatic parchments, resolved itself into a mere comedy. While the envoys of Charles were holding forth at Uxbridge, with inexhaustible eloquence, upon the necessity of an agreement, declaring that there was nothing in the world their royal master wished better than to restore the blessings of peace to his beloved subjects, his majesty was busy at Oxford negotiating with the king of France, the duke of Lorraine, and other continental potentates and chieftains, for the invasion of England by a foreign army. "Hope was given him," according to Thomas May, "from the duke of Lorraine of ten thousand men; and, for bringing of these soldiers into England, Goffa (major in the army, by turns Roundhead and Cavalier) was sent into Holland to arrange for shipping and other necessaries. The king likewise desired assistance at that time from the Irish rebels, and by his letters commanded Ormond (successor to the earl of Strafford) to make a peace with those rebels, and to promise and grant to them a free exercise of their religion, and to assure them that if, by their assistance, he could but finish his war in England, he would abrogate all those laws which had been heretofore made against the Papists there." The Irish negotiations were not entirely unknown at Westminster, and the mere rumour of them drove many a staunch Presbyterian for the time into the camp of the Independents. However deep the veneration for the royal dignity, they all in turn discovered that they could not trust the royal person.

Before the Uxbridge conference came to an end, a sanguinary drama, not without influence on the course of the abortive peace negotiations, had been played out in the capital. After lying a prisoner in the Tower for nearly four years, Archbishop Laud, once the greatest man in England, but now almost forgotten by the majority of Englishmen, was put on his trial before the House of Lords, for "papistical innovations" amounting to treason. The more immediate cause of the proceedings was the resistance of Laud to appoint to the rectory of Chatham, in Kent, of which he was the patron, a clergyman designated by the lords; the refusal being due to a wish of the king that the nomination should fall upon another person, his majesty evidently little caring to what dangers this would expose his old friend and servant. Laud's trial was conducted after the same despotic fashion he himself had exercised for years in the Star Chamber and High Commission Court, and the chief of the public prosecutors arrayed against him was William Prynne, the unhappy author and lawyer, whose barbarous treatment had drawn first upon the archbishop the execration of the people. Prynne was ordered by the House of Commons to draw up the articles of impeachment against Laud, which task he executed with much moderation, not imitated by the other lawyers engaged in the case. One of them, Sergeant Wild, in opening the accusation against the primate, declared vehemently that he had committed "high treason, treason in all and every part, and treason of the highest pitch and altitude," and that he had fully deserved a traitor's death, both by law human and divine. "Naaman," said Sergeant Wild, getting into Scripture, "was a great man, but he was a leper: this man's leprosy hath so infected all, that there remains no other cure but the sword of justice, which we doubt not your lordships will so apply that the commonwealth shall yet live again and flourish."

The lords passed the bill of attainder with but a few dissentient voices, yet made nevertheless some efforts afterwards to save the aged archbishop, which, however, were unavailing against the persistent determination of the Presbyterian party in the lower house to have his blood. After some delay, caused by the preparations for the Uxbridge congress, and the all-absorbing debates on the Self-denying Ordinance, Laud was finally condemned to death, and executed on the 10th of January, 1645. Though past seventy, the primate exhibited great courage on the scaffold, where several zealous ministers, together with a member of the lower house, Sir John Clotworthy, representative of Maldon, made some great but unavailing efforts to convert him to Presbyterianism. After a brief theological discussion, Laud turned his face away from the preachers, and to the executioner. "Here, my honest friend," said he, addressing the man, and handing him some money, "God forgive thee, and do thy office upon me in mercy." The executioner did his office as required, ending all earthly pain and trouble with one stroke of his axe, and then swinging the primate's hoary head aloft over the block, crying, "God save the king!"

Five days after the execution of Laud, on the 15th of January, the House of Lords, full of bitterness at the event, rejected by a large majority the Self-denying Ordinance, which had passed the commons some weeks previous. The reasons put forward in justification of this bold step were given with unusual frankness. It was said, and the fact was undeniable, that the Ordinance would have the immediate effect of lowering the social position of the entire hereditary nobility of the kingdom, by excluding them from all power and influence in the state, making the same over to the middle classes, already strongly represented in the House of Commons, and to the non-parliamentary section of which must fall, if the Act passed, all offices and dignities whatsoever. This was precisely the aim of the Independents, acknowledged in the saying attributed to Cromwell, that "there would never be a good time in England till they had done with the lords." However, it was not politic for the moment to avow the object too openly, and, therefore, after the upper house had rejected the bill of the member for Northampton by a decisive vote, it became necessary to go to work with somewhat more of circumspection than before. A few weeks' deliberation in committee resulted in the bringing forward of a fresh bill, called the second Self-denying Ordinance. It differed from the first by not laying down the general principle of disqualification, but merely enacting that every member of either of the two houses of parliament should be discharged from any office he might hold, civil or military, at the end of forty days, but not forbidding reinstatement, and reserving expressly to the lords and commons the right of exempting individuals. Though far less sweeping a measure in the new form than in the old, the party of Cromwell increased its effect by combining with it a reorganisation of the whole of the parliamentary forces, or, as it was denominated, placing the army on a "new model."

The plan proposed, and adopted after but little discussion by the House of Commons, was to keep on foot, not several bodies of troops as heretofore, but one sole army, under the supreme direction of a commander-in-chief, bearing the title of lord-general, with one lieutenant-general, one major-general, thirty colonels, and a proportionate staff of inferior officers, as subordinates. The effective of the army was fixed at twenty-one thousand men, comprising fourteen thousand foot, one thousand dragoons, and six thousand light horse. It was likewise settled that the total charge for the army, estimated at forty-five thousand pounds per month, should be raised by assessment throughout the kingdom; and the House of Commons went so far into the details of the "new model" as to nominate at once all the general officers. Sir Thomas Fairfax was appointed commander-in-chief, and John Skippon, worthy captain of the London train bands, major-general; while the intermediate dignity, that of lieutenant-general, was left open for Cromwell, who, as was understood by all parties, would have to be exempted from the Act, as the greatest military leader of the day. The "new model" was completed and passed by the commons, together with the second Self-denying Ordinance, on the 30th of March, and on the following day the bills were sent to the upper house. Further resistance to measures approved of by the whole nation had now become impossible on the part of the lords, and they gave their consent to them, with scarcely any debate, on the 3rd of April. The date opened a new epoch in the over more rapid march of the revolution.

On the same day on which the Self-denying Ordinance was passed by the lords, the earls of Essex and of Manchester, together with all the other peers who had held commands in the army, surrendered their commissions, the former general-in-chief making it a point of stating, in the letter containing his resignation, that he had performed his duty with faithfulness in the army "raised for the defence of the king, parliament, and kingdom." A few hours after the missive of Essex had been read before the commons, Sir Thomas Fairfax was solemnly introduced into the house, presented to the members as the new lord-general, and his commission handed to him by the Speaker. In it, the royal authority, and even existence of the majesty whom Essex had professed to serve, was quietly ignored, the army being referred to as assembled, not "for the defence of the king," but, more truthfully, for that of parliament and the nation. Fairfax assumed command forthwith, establishing his head-quarters at Windsor Castle, and setting actively to work in the task of reorganising and re-recruiting the army, his great object being to get the kind of men recommended by Cromwell, "such men as had the fear of God before them, and made some conscience of what they did." He was very successful in this undertaking, and with the active assistance of Major-general Skippon, most popular of all military commanders, old or new, succeeded in raising, equipping, and drilling a body of men such as for valour and discipline had never been brought into the field in the same number since the beginning of the civil war.

Their valour was soon to be tested, for the king, affrighted at the immense energy developed all on a sudden by his opponents, kept arming, too, with all haste, evidently bent on staking his fortune in another great battle. To meet him, Fairfax as well as the parliamentary Committee of Both Kingdoms, representing, since the death of Pym, the executive in the war department, exerted themselves to the utmost, both in hastening on the reorganisation of the army, and concentrating all available troops between the Thames and the Severn, so as to interrupt the king's communication with the west of England. Cromwell, who had been sent with Sir William Waller to oppose the progress of the Royalists in Somerset and Gloucestershire, was ordered, on his return to Windsor in the middle of April, to prevent the junction of Rupert's horse with the forces under the immediate command of Charles, whose head-quarters were still at Oxford. He executed his commission in the most brilliant manner, defeating the Royalists in three successive engagements, at Islip Bridge, Witney, and Bampton Bush; and after that stormed Bletchington House, a fortified mansion not far from Oxford, garrisoned by some hundred Cavaliers, under the command of Colonel Windesban. The loss of the latter place, upon which he set great store, enraged Charles so much that he ordered Windesbank to be shot for cowardice, but without a proper trial; and the unhappy colonel was murdered accordingly, "with his back to the wall of Merton College." In the meanwhile, amidst his small but not unimportant victories, Cromwell's term of military service, according to the prescriptions of the Self-denying Ordinance, was coming to an end; and as the final day approached he hurried once more to head-quarters at Windsor, "to kiss the general's hand and take leave of him." He arrived late at night; but the next morning, "ere he came forth from his chamber," a letter was handed to him, under the seal of the Committee of Both Kingdoms, desiring that he would retain his command "for forty days." Before the forty days had run out Cromwell had added another great deed to his military fame, raising him above the Self-denying Ordinance, with the shadow of his sword cast all over England.

Aroused by the progress of the parliamentary forces, who were gradually surrounding his head-quarters, the king left Oxford on the 10th of May with the whole of his army, numbering some ten thousand men. Breaking easily through the thin lines of his opponents, he advanced towards Rupert, who was ravaging Gloucestershire, and joining his troops, chiefly horse, to his own, set out on a march northward to relieve Chester, closely besieged by a small body of Parliamentarians under Sir William Brereton. They raised the siege on the approach of the royal army, upon which Charles suddenly turned round to the north-east, and advancing in long strides through Staffordshire, threw himself upon Leicester, which he captured, after but slight resistance, on the 1st of June. The report of it alarmed Fairfax, who was preparing the siege of Oxford, and leaving it, he immediately advanced to Northampton, where he was joined by Cromwell on the 14th of June, after which both started off in pursuit of the king. On the evening of the second day, Friday, the 13th of June, the van of the parliamentary army came in sight of the forces of Charles, lying idly on the borders of Leicester and Northamptonshire, quite ignorant of the approach of any enemy.

"Everybody believed," as recorded by Clarendon, "that Fairfax's army was much dispirited, and that it was now led out of the way that it might recover courage before it should be brought to fight with so victorious troops as the king's were; and therefore that it was best to find them out whilst their fear was yet upon them. All men concluded that to be true which their own wishes suggested to them. And so the army marched to Daventry, in Northamptonshire, where, for want of knowing where the enemy was, the king remained in a quiet posture the space of five days." His majesty was amusing himself shooting hares and rabbits when the news of the approach of the Parliamentarians arrived. "Upon the 13th of June," Clarendon continues, "the king received intelligence that Fairfax was advanced to Northampton with a strong army, much superior to the numbers he had formerly been advertised of. Whereupon he retired the next day to Harborough, and meant to have gone back to Leicester, that he might draw more foot out of Newark, and stand upon his defence till the other forces which he expected could come up to him. But that very night an alarm was brought to Harborough that Fairfax himself was quartered within six miles. A council was presently called, and the former resolution of retiring presently laid aside, and a new one as quickly taken 'to fight,' for which there was always an immoderate appetite when the enemy was within any distance. They would not stay to expect his coming, but would go back to meet him. And so in the morning early, being Saturday, the 14th of June, all the army was drawn up on a rising ground of very great advantage, about a mile south of Harborough, which was left at their back, and there put in order to give or receive the charge." King Charles was standing on the field of Naseby to fight his last battle.

"The old hamlet of Naseby," says Carlyle, "stands yet on its old hill-top, very much as it did in Saxon days, on the north-western border of Northamptonshire, some seven or eight miles from Market Harborough, in Leicestershire, nearly on a line, and nearly midway between that town and Daventry. A peaceable old hamlet, of some eight hundred souls; clay cottages for labourers, but neatly thatched and swept; smith's shop, saddler's shop, beer-shop, all in order, forming a kind of square which leads off southwards into two long streets; the old church, with its graves, stands in the centre, the truncated spire finishing itself with a strange old ball, held up by rods, a 'hollow copper ball, which came from Boulogne in Henry VIII.'s time'—which has, like Hudibras' breeches, been at the siege of Bullen." The ground is upland, moorland; though now growing corn, was not enclosed till the last generation, and is still somewhat bare of wood. It stands nearly in the heart of England. Gentle dulness, taking a turn at etymology, sometimes derives it from 'navel,' thus, 'Navesby, navi Navelshy, from being,' &c. &c. Avon Well, the distinct source of Shakespeare's Avon, is on the western slope of the high grounds; Nen and Welland, streams leading towards Cromwell's fen-country, begin to gather themselves from boggy places on the eastern side. The grounds are high, and are still, in their subdivisions, known by the name of 'hills,' as 'Rutput Hill,' 'Mill Hill,' 'Dust Hill,' and the like, precisely as in Rushworth's time; but they are not properly hills at all, but broad, blunt, clayey masses, swelling towards and from each other, like indolent waves of a sea, sometimes of miles in extent. It was on this high moor-ground, in the centre of England, that King Charles, on the 14th of June, 1645, fought his last battle."

The battle commenced at ten o'clock in the morning by an impetuous charge of Rupert's horse. The two armies were facing each other in very nearly the same strength and order as on Long Marston Moor, except that the Scottish forces were absent. Prince Rupert commanded the right wing of the Royalists, with Henry Ireton, a pupil of Cromwell, opposite on the parliamentary left; the centre on both sides was formed by the bulk of the infantry, the king's under the orders of Lord Ashley, and that of parliament under Fairfax; while the left of the Royalists, half foot, half horse, was placed under Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and the parliamentary right, nearly all horse, under Cromwell. Both the parliamentary army and the king's were drawn up on elevated ground, the first on "Mill Hill," and the other on "Rutput Hill," with a flat piece of ground, called "Broad Moor," between them, and it was on this plain that the brunt of the battle was fought. Rupert, rushing forward at the head of his Cavaliers with usual vehemence, at once broke down the parliamentary left, taking six pieces "of the rebels' best cannon;" and Ireton, badly wounded in the charge, having been made a prisoner, his men fled in all directions, hotly pursued by the Royalists. While thus one part of each army was withdrawn from the field, a tough contest went on between the remaining forces, headed by Fairfax and Cromwell on the one side, and Ashley and Langdale on the other. As described by Clarendon, "the Lord Ashley with his foot, though against the hill, advanced upon their foot, who discharged their cannon at them, but over-shot them, and so did their musketeers too. For the foot on either side hardly saw each other till they were within carbine shot, and so only gave one volley; the king's foot, according to their usual custom, falling in with their swords and the butt-end of their muskets, with which they did very notable execution, and put the enemy into great disorder and confusion."

The hand-to-hand struggle continued for about an hour, Fairfax himself, with Skippon and other parliamentary leaders, fighting on foot like common soldiers, alternately retreating and advancing, but at length driving the Royalists back in disorder. Before this had been accomplished, the onset of Cromwell's horse upon the king's left wing, under Sir Marmaduke Langdale, had led to a complete rout of the latter, decisive of the fate of the day. Overthrown on this side, the whole of the king's army got into wild confusion, as if seized by a panic; and though Rupert returned from "his fatal success" at the time the swords of the Ironsides were flashing over the heads, and howling away at the backs of Langdale's troopers; and though Charles himself, with a reserve of horse, composed chiefly of noblemen and gentlemen, made an advance to the front, the flight soon became universal. The king's troops, Lord Clarendon explains, "having, as they thought, acted their parts, could never be brought to rally themselves again in order, or to charge the enemy. And that difference was observable shortly from the beginning of the war in the discipline of the king's troops and of those which marched under the command of Cromwell—for it was only under him, and had never been notorious under Essex or Waller—thus though the king's troops prevailed in the charge, and routed those they charged, they never rallied themselves again in order, nor could be brought to make a second charge again the same day; which was the reason that they had not an entire victory at Edgehill. Whereas Cromwell's troops, if they prevailed, or though they were beaten and routed, presently rallied again and stood in good order." It was a notable "difference," the one thus plainly recorded by an enemy, exhibiting in a striking manner the comparative valour and value of soldiers fighting for pay or plunder, and of men battling for freedom and religion.

The defeat of the Royalists on the field of Naseby was absolute and irretrievable. The king himself made great efforts to rally his flying soldiers, but they were utterly useless, and about one o'clock in the afternoon, at the end of not more than three hours' fighting, he was forced from the ground by the tumultuous current that was receding backward, and driven on to Leicester, which he reached in the evening with two thousand Cavaliers. Behind him, on the broad dark moorland, now stained red with blood, three thousand stalwart men which had rallied round his standard in the morning were lying dead and wounded, and eight thousand more, together with all his cannon, guns, ammunition, and baggage, were laid hold of by the pursuing troops of Cromwell and Fairfax. Among the prisoners made by the parliamentary forces were a great many English "ladies of quality in carriages," and some ten score Irish ladies, not of quality, "with long skean-knives about a foot in length." More important than the capture of these camp followers in silks and rags, indispensable adjunct of royalist armies, was that of the private carriage containing his cabinet, with a large number of letters, and a quantity of "most secret papers." All these were sent to London, and having been carefully inspected by the Committee of Both Kingdoms, the House of Commons on its recommendation ordered that all the letters and other documents should be publicly read at Guildhall.

The reading took place on the appointed day, the 3rd of July, amidst an immense concourse of persons, many of whom had come from a long distance. It made a profound impression, dispelling all doubts as to the perfidy and hypocrisy of Charles. "From the reading of his letters," Thomas May recorded, "many discourses of the people arose, for in them appeared his transactions with the Irish rebels, and with the queen for assistance from France and the duke of Lorraine. Many good men were sorry that the king's actions agreed no better with his words; that he openly protested before God, with horrid imprecations, that he endeavoured nothing so much as the preservation of the Protestant religion and rooting out of popery, yet in the meantime, underhand, he promised to the Irish rebels an abrogation of the laws against them, which was contrary to his expressed promise contained in these words: 'I will never abrogate the laws against the papists.' And again he said, 'I abhor of bringing foreign soldiers into the kingdom,' and yet he solicited the duke of Lorraine, the French, the Danes, and the very Irish, for assistance. They were vexed also that the king was so much ruled by the will of his wife, as to do everything by her prescript; and that peace, war, religion, and parliament, should be at her disposal." There was a loud demand on all sides to have the documents thus exhibiting the character of Charles printed, and parliament having given its approval, a small quarto appeared soon after, entitled "The King's Cabinet opened; or certain packets of secret letters and papers, written by the king's hand, and taken from his portfolio on the field of Naseby, the 14th of June, 1645, by the victorious Sir Thomas Fairfax, in which are revealed many mysteries of state, which fully justify the cause for which Sir Thomas Fairfax gave battle on that memorable day." The little book did as much as Naseby battle to ruin despotism.

Virtually, the cause of Charles was lost on the field of Naseby. His friends and councillors confessed it openly; and had he himself but had the slightest regard for the sufferings and misery of the people, he must have felt it his duty, obstinate as he was, either to submit to the propositions of parliament, or to withdraw from the realm, and thus end the fearful intestine contest. However, the king did neither, but continued his course of war and devastation, rather increasing than diminishing its horrors. Being unable to hold himself any longer in the midland counties, he hurried, with the handful of Cavaliers still remaining faithful to his person, into Wales, proceeding in quick stages from Leicester to Hereford, from here to Raglan Castle, seat of the marquis of Worcester.

head of the Catholic party, and richest nobleman in England, and from thence on to Cardiff, where he stopped for some weeks, as if in indecision what to do next. Reports of the most gloomy kind were reaching him every day and almost every hour. Leicester had surrendered at the first summons; Bridgewater, hitherto deemed all but impregnable, capitulated after a short siege; and the last three fortresses in the north garrisoned by Royalists, Carlisle, Pontefract, and Scarborough, fell one after the other into the hands of the Scottish army which had been investing them. Having achieved their task in that direction, the Scots advanced in full force towards Hereford and Monmouthshire, upon which Charles, deeming himself no longer safe in his retreat, hastily quitted Cardiff, and flying across the kingdom, threw himself into Newark-upon-Trent, one of the great strongholds of his party.

There was evidently no plan or object whatever in this movement, and hearing that the Scottish horse were at his heels, the king rushed again to the west, by way of Oxford, declaring his intention to relieve Hereford, to the siege of which a portion of the troops of Scotland had sat down. They fled at his approach eastward, probably intimidated by the boldness of his march, and under the impression that he had succeeded in raising a new army, and Charles joyfully entered its gates, full of the belief that the star of his fortune was once more in the ascendant. But a day had scarcely elapsed before he was crushed under the weight of overwhelming evil intelligence. Though flying about wildly through the more central parts of the kingdom, the main hopes of Charles to renew the war on a larger scale rested on the possession of the west of England, and the certainty that he held still the greatest place in the west, the city of Bristol. All else being lost, he hoped to be able to establish here his head-quarters and the seat of his government, in such an imposing manner as to give courage to his wavering friends, to attract new bodies of troops around his person, and in the end to punish the rebels against his authority. But he had not been many hours at Hereford before he was horrified by the terrible news of the surrender of Bristol to the parliamentary forces under Fairfax. The city, mainstay of all the hopes of Charles, he learnt, had fallen on the first assault, and not only this, but had been given up by the boldest of royalist commanders, his own nephew, Prince Rupert.

For a moment the king seemed as if stunned by the intelligence that the capital of the west of England had surrendered, and that Rupert himself, who had solemnly promised to hold it at least four months, had given it up to the enemy. "He so little apprehended," Clarendon says, "the terrible information of the surrender of Bristol, that if the evidence thereof had not been unquestionable, it could never have been believed." Recovered from his stupor, Charles sat down to pen a letter to Prince Rupert—a curious document in more than one sense. "Nephew," the king wrote, dating Hereford, the 14th September, 1645, "though the loss of Bristol be a great blow to me, yet your surrendering it as you did is of so much affliction to me that it makes me not only forget the consideration of that place, but is likewise the greatest trial of my constancy that hath yet befallen me. For what is to be done, after one that is so near to me as you are, both in blood and friendship, submits himself to so mean an action—I give it the easiest term. I have so much to say that I will say no more of it; only, lest rashness of judgment be laid to my charge, I must remember you of your letter of the 12th of August, whereby you assured me that, if no mutiny happened, you would keep Bristol for four months. Did you keep it four days? Was there anything like a mutiny? More questions might be asked, but now, I confess, to little purpose. My conclusion is to desire you to seek your subsistence, until it shall please God to determine of my condition, somewhere beyond seas, to which end I send you herewith a pass. And I pray God to make you sensible of your present condition, and give you means to redeem what you have lost; for I shall have no greater joy in a victory than a just occasion, without blushing, to assure you of my being your loving uncle, and most faithful friend. Charles Rex." Rupert did not accept the royal order with becoming meekness, for instead of seeking a "subsistence" as recommended "somewhere beyond seas," he quietly trotted off, in the midst of a goodly number of friends and boon companions, to Oxford, paying not the least regard to the mandate of the "loving uncle." Though ever so many battles had been lost, over so many towns been surrendered, and over so many "ladies of quality" been taken from the gallant Cavaliers, life yet offered many pleasant things in the merry land of England, and it seemed utterly foolish to quit it in haste. So Rupert sent his compliments to Charles Rex, telling him that he was as sensible of his condition as could be desired; but that for the present he was determined not to leave the country.

It was impossible for Charles to be in a more pitiable, if not despicable, position than that in which he had now fallen. All those he counted his friends were leaving him one after another; his orders were disregarded and opposed in his very presence; his movements were watched by followers ready to turn enemies at any moment; and the few troops still adhering to his fortune in Wales and the western counties were gradually sinking into the condition of mere robbers and highwaymen. The ebb of his misfortunes seemed at the lowest; yet misfortune was as far as ever from teaching wisdom to King Charles. Still the road was open either to honest reconciliation with the nation and its representatives, or to self-banishment; but neither suited the king's perverse temper and love of obliquity, he being as much as ever persuaded that double dealing would lead him further than honesty. Bristol having fallen, and with it the all but last chance of success by arms, Charles commenced once more his old system of treacherous negotiations, opening a secret intercourse at the same time with the Irish, the Scotch, the Presbyterian party in parliament, and the Independents. To the Irish he promised the re-establishment of Roman Catholicism, and to the Scotch the annihilation of popery and episcopacy; to the Presbyterians he engaged himself to uphold with all his might their religious and political principles; and to the Independents he gave the solemn assurance that if they would join him he would assist them with all his powers in "rooting out that tyrannical government" the presbytery.

While thus scheming in all directions, his majesty informed Lord Digby, who was representing his interests in the west of England, that his nets were being so beautifully laid as to give hopes of early success in his great object "so to draw either the Presbyterians or the Independents to side with him for extirpating one the other that he should be really king again." But both parties had too long experience of the king's duplicity, and had learnt too much from the secret cabinet found on Naseby field, to be able to trust him this time, however much they might be inclined to take advantage of his humble position; and the parliamentary leaders to whom he addressed himself not sending even replies to his messages, all his expectations were soon confined to aid from the Irish insurgents. The latter were quite willing to enter into the part proposed to them, and after some little delay it was settled, by a secret agreement concluded at the commencement of October, 1645, that an army of ten thousand Roman Catholics was to be landed immediately at Chester to uphold the royal cause. However, before the Irish had set sail, Chester was captured by the Parliamentarians, and the last remnant of compact royalist bodies in the western counties, held together by the presence of the prince of Wales, being dispersed soon after, there was no more ground in England on which the invasion could take place. Driven before the spreading forces of Cromwell and Fairfax, the heir to the crown fled to the Scilly Islands, preparatory to going to Jersey and France, while the king himself started for Newark, "with three or four hundred horse as his entire army, and John Ashburnham, his valet de chambre, as his council."

At Newark, where he arrived on the last day of October, Charles had to undergo a last humiliation. Learning, on his arrival at the place, that Rupert was staying in the neighbourhood, he gave strict orders that the prince should not be allowed to approach him, issuing at the same time a writ for his confinement at Belvoir Castle "for not having given obedience to his former commands." Notwithstanding this, Rupert, accompanied by a suite of a hundred and twenty Cavaliers, went riding into Newark, and to the intense mortification of the king, was received with great demonstrations of honour by the chief officers of the garrison, as well as the governor, Sir Richard Willis, who quartered him at his own residence. From here Rupert made his way into the royal presence, followed by his whole train of armed men, and boisterously demanded to be listened to by his majesty. "I am come to render an account of the loss of Bristol," he cried, "and to clear myself from the imputations that have been cast upon me." Perplexed, and to some extent intimidated, the king made no reply, and supper being brought in at the moment, he sat down to it, suffered the company of his nephew, and afterwards withdrew to his room. The next day Charles consented to the calling of a council of war, which, presided over by Sir Richard Willis, and made up almost entirely of Rupert's friends, issued a declaration that the prince in surrendering Bristol had not been deficient either in courage or fidelity. Nothing more now could be done by the king against the nephew who had become his master. However, to punish Sir Richard Willis as far as he was able to do, he announced to the latter that he intended to remove him from his post as governor, in order to make him captain of the royal life guards. Sir Richard boldly refused to submit to this arrangement, declaring that people would regard his removal as a disgrace; and that, besides, he was not rich enough to fill the place near his majesty's person that was assigned to him. "I will see to that, and provide for your support," exclaimed Charles, and left the room. A few hours after, while the much humiliated king was sitting at dinner, Prince Rupert, Sir Richard Willis, and a score of officers of the garrison, rushed into the room. "What your majesty said to me this morning," shouted the irate governor, "is now the talk of the town, and very much to my dishonour." "It is not for any fault he has committed," cried Rupert, chiming in, "that Sir Richard loses his place, but for being my friend." The rest of the strange scene, painful exhibition of the fall of a ruler content with nothing but absolutism, is told by Clarendon. "The king," says he, "was so surprised with this manner of behaviour, that he rose in some disorder from the table, and would have gone into his bedchamber, calling Sir Richard Willis to follow him, but that the latter cried aloud 'he had received a public injury, and therefore he expected a public satisfaction.' This, with what had passed, so provoked his majesty, that with greater indignation than he was ever seen possessed with, he commanded them to depart from his presence, and to come no more into it," and this with such circumstances in his looks and gestures, as well as words, that they appeared confounded and departed the room, ashamed of what they had done. And yet as soon as they came to the governor's house they sounded to horse, intending to be gone." Charles intended to be gone, too, and the day after his nephew and friends had departed he quitted Newark to seek a last refuge at Oxford.

The ancient university city, head-quarters of the Royalists during the greater part of the civil war, had yet not been taken by the forces of parliament, and it was with the design of encouraging its defenders to hold out as long as possible that the king resolved to throw himself into it. But the task was not easily accomplished, the troops of Fairfax holding possession of all the country; and Charles, therefore, to get from Newark to Oxford, had to travel during the dark mostly, and over by-roads. He set out from the former place, with his beard shaved off and otherwise disguised, an hour before midnight on the 3rd of November, attended by several hundred horse taken from the garrison, and a small number of Cavaliers, anxious of rescuing the majesty of England from a state of absolute vagabondage. The flying troop, coiling around the king in a firm body, galloped along fast, reaching Belvoir Castle at three o'clock in the morning, without any interruption on the part of the Parliamentarians, who were camped thickly in this district. At the castle, a strong royalist position not yet captured, good guides were ready, together with one more troop of horse, under the governor, Sir Gervas Lucas, who relinquished his charge to follow his royal master. "The guides," the king's chancellor of the exchequer records, "attended his majesty till the break of day, by which time he was past those quarters he most apprehended; but he was still to march between their garrisons, and therefore made no delay, but marched all that day, and passed near Bulleigh-upon-the-Hill, a garrison of the enemy. From here some horse waited upon the rear, and took and killed some men, who either negligently stayed behind, or whose horses were tired."

The rest of the troop, with the concealed king in their midst, of whose presence the parliamentary soldiers did not dream, spurred on furiously, riding for dear life. Towards the evening, the king was so very weary and tired, that he was compelled to rest and sleep for the space of four hours, in a village within eight miles of Northampton. At ten of the clock that night they began to march again, and were before day the next morning past Daventry, and before noon came to Banbury, where the Oxford horse were ready and waited upon his majesty, and conducted him safe to Oxford that day. And so he finished the most tedious and grievous march that ever king was exercised in." Charles arrived at Oxford utterly helpless, and all but hopeless. He had no idea what to do, nor where to turn; and for more than a week he seemed utterly prostrate, at moments a prey to passionate bursts of despair, and at others sunk in deep silence and gloom. All the people around him, last adherents in misfortune, in the meanwhile pressed upon him the necessity to enter into fresh negotiations with the parliamentary government, to cease treating the representatives of the nation as "rebels," and to make peace on the best terms that could be obtained, or, indeed, on any terms. Charles gave way before the pressure, though much against his inclinations, and at the beginning of December forwarded a message to the lords and commons, offering negotiations, and asking "that they would send a safe-conduct for the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, Mr. John Ashburnham, and Mr. Geoffrey Palmer, by whom he would make such particular propositions to them as he hoped would produce a peace."

It was too late. Never had parliament been less inclined to peace negotiations, never more distrustful of the king's veracity and good intentions. At the very time when Charles asked the safe-conduct for his valet and three other gentlemen to carry "particular propositions," the leaders of the House of Commons held in their hands the secret documents disclosing his Irish intrigues, and his all but successful attempt to have England invaded from the west, and set up Roman Catholicism. A singular accident brought these notable papers to Westminster. On the 17th of October, the archbishop of Tuam, one of the rebel leaders, was slain in a skirmish under the walls of Sligo, and in his carriage were found copies of the secret treaty just before concluded by his party, as well as letters relating to the whole course of negotiations between the king and the Roman Catholics. Though aware of the duplicity of Charles, the members of the Committee of Both Kingdoms were so startled at the receipt of these documents, that they thought it necessary to keep them secret for a while, until the king had arrived at Oxford, when, learning that he was going to make another trial to beguile them with fair and false words, they laid everything before parliament.

It was all that was wanting to drive the members in violent antagonism to Charles, such as they had never before exhibited. For some time past the constitution of the commons had been undergoing a gradual change, reflex of a similar change in the nation. The brilliant victories of Cromwell and his Ironsides, and the high and manly tone that pervaded the actions of his party, in the cabinet as in the field, had given an immense increase of power to the Independents, so that they were fast rising from a minority into a majority. To place their influence on a secure basis, they tried hard to infuse new blood into parliament, aware that they could rely upon the constituencies of at least the towns; and though the Presbyterians made all possible efforts to counteract this scheme, they had to give way at last. It was first proposed on the 13th of September, 1644, to fill up the vacant places of those who had openly embraced the royal cause, as well as of the "Trimmers," who had slipped quietly away from Westminster by new elections, but after a stormy discussion the motion was negatived by a considerable majority. But it was brought forward again and again under various forms, till it passed at last at the end of eleven months. On the 21st of August, 1645, while the echo of Naseby's victory was resounding through London, the commons voted, upon a petition from the citizens of Southwark, but by a majority of only three members, that various boroughs not represented in parliament should have writes for new elections sent to them; the places specified in the first instance being Hythe, Southwark, and Bury St. Edmunds. The door, once opened in this manner, could no more be closed, and before the year had come to an end, there were one hundred and forty-six new men seated in the House of Commons. With a few exceptions, and those of no importance, the new representatives of the nation were Independents, some of them of the sternest sort, proclaiming their hatred of absolutism not only, but of royalty. Thus finally, when the king seemed really inclined, if not to be honest, at least to be humble, negotiating had become all but impossible. Swiftly the tide had been running; far more swift than the timid, the wavering, and the too subtle ones expected, and now it was too late.

To the king's demand to accredit his valet and three other courtly personages as peace commissioners, the commons, speaking in the names of both houses of parliament, made a curt reply. They told his majesty that it would be inconvenient, and might be of dangerous consequence, to admit those lords and gentlemen to come to them; but that they were preparing some propositions which, when finished, should be sent to his majesty in bills, to be signed by him, which would be the only way to produce a peace." The answer greatly discomfited Charles, who had been led to expect the immediate acceptance of his propositions. For a moment, he again assumed a high tone, and then relapsed into the silent mood, declaring himself careless as to what might happen. A hint from his valet Ashburnham, who had become one of his principal advisers, after a while decided him on striking out a new plan. It was to put himself in personal intercourse with the parliamentary leaders at Westminster, to see what he could effect by the charm of his kingly manners and language. Before carrying out this design, conscious that there would be greater safety for his own person if his heir was out of the way, Charles ordered the prince of Wales to leave the Scilly Islands, where he had taken refuge, and to go abroad, either to Denmark, France, or the Netherlands.

"I have resolved," Charles told his son, in a letter dated Oxford, the 27th of December, 1645, "to propose a personal treaty to the rebels at London, in order to which a trumpet is by this time there. My real security will be your being in another country, as also a chief argument, which speaks itself without an orator, to make the rebels hearken and yield to reason." The message forwarded by his majesty to the "rebels" was couched in exceedingly polite phrases, with not a trace of the old sublimity about it. Charles condescended to say, "that since all other overtures had proved ineffectual, he desired to enter into a personal treaty with the two houses of parliament at Westminster, and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, upon all matters which might conduce to the peace and happiness of the distracted kingdoms." His conditions were that he "would come to London or Westminster with such of his servants as now attended him, and their followers, not exceeding in the whole the number of three hundred persons, if he might have, the engagement of the two houses of parliament, the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, of the chief commanders of Sir Thomas Fairfax's army, and of those of the Scottish army, for his free and safe coming to and abode in London, or Westminster, for the space of forty days, and, after that time, for his free and safe repair to Oxford, Worcester, or Newark, if a peace should not be concluded." Six months before, the offer in all probability would have been willingly accepted, but now it was out of date. Naseby, the opened private cabinet, and the secret Irish treaty, had taught new things, and one hundred and forty-six new men in the commons were standing ranged in dense phalanx with the old "rebels" against all proposals coming from a perjured king.

There was some difficulty for the majority in deciding upon a judicious reply to the king's offer, which, viewed superficially, looked fair enough; and while the extreme party among the Independents seemed inclined to leave it altogether unanswered, the more moderate members desired to keep the door of communication open as far as possible. A middle course was adopted finally in sending Charles a reply, but framed in somewhat severe terms. The commons told him that it would not be desirable, nor could they give their consent that he should appear in the capital for the moment, "after so much innocent blood shed in the war by his commands and commissions." They stated further, "that until satisfaction and security were first given to both kingdoms, his majesty's coming thither would not only not be convenient, nor could be by them assented to, but they did not apprehend it to be a means conducing to peace to accept a treaty for a few days with any thoughts or intentions of returning to hostility again." The commons finally remarked, very justly, "that his majesty desired the engagement, not only of the parliament, but of the chief commanders in Sir Thomas Fairfax's army, and those of the Scottish army, which was against the privilege of parliament, as those could not be joined by them who were subject and subordinate to their authority."

Charles exhibited great irritation on receiving a reply he little looked for, and its bitterness made him give vent once more to some irrational threats as to the way he meant to punish all his adversaries. There came a quick answer to them in the shape of a parliamentary ordinance, voted by large majorities in both houses. It was resolved and ordered "that if the king should, contrary to the advice of the parliament already given to him, come, or attempt to come, within the lines of communication, that then the Committee of the Militia should raise such forces as they should think fit to prevent any tumult that might arise by his coming, and to suppress any that should happen; and to apprehend any that should come with him, or resort to him—and to secure his person from danger." To secure his majesty's person from danger, the commander-in-chief of the parliamentary forces likewise received instructions to proceed as fast as possible with the preparations for investing and reducing the city of Oxford. Hitherto, Fairfax, as well as Cromwell and the principal of the other generals, had directed their chief endeavours to the dispersion of the remnants of the royalist army, spread in many flying bands over the west of England and having accomplished their work with much success, the last task of the civil war devolved upon them. The board having been stripped of pawns, knights, bishops, and castles, it became time to offer checkmate to the king.

The great game, it was felt by all parties, was now fast drawing to an end. At the beginning of February, 1646, Fairfax's troops had come up to Oxford on all sides, but there was some hesitation to begin the actual siege, owing to an entire indecision of the parliamentary leaders as to what to do with the king after he had been captured. The wavering was taken advantage of by the few remaining friends of the king to make an attempt to save him. A French gentleman, monsieur de Montreuil, specially deputed by Henrietta Maria to assist her royal consort in his distress, took the lead in the matter, and on his pressing demand Charles allowed the opening of negotiations both with the leaders of the Covenanting array and the members of the government of Scotland for giving him an asylum and protection. It was a delicate task, and Montreuil did not execute it very well. Rebuffed, in the first instance, by the Scottish commissioners in London, and convinced, by a journey to Edinburgh, that there was nothing to hope from the Scottish parliament, the French diplomatist at last addressed himself to the generals of the army besieging Newark, who had so many fair words for him that he thought himself warranted to promise the king that if he would fly into the camp of the Scots they would receive him as their legitimate sovereign, shelter him from danger, and co-operate with him in coming to an agreement with the English parliament. But a second trip to Newark camp, and close communication with a number of the officers there, altered somewhat the opinion of monsieur de Montreuil, and on getting back to Oxford he informed Charles that he had been too sanguine before, and did not think that the Scots would be inclined after all to raise their arms in his favour. However, the king in the meanwhile had made up his mind to trust himself among and seek the aid of his Scottish subjects, in which resolve he was strongly backed by Henrietta Maria, who in several letters, following close upon each other, exhorted him to lose not a moment in carrying out the plan first proposed by her agent.

Time, indeed, was not to be lost, for the iron circle prepared to enclose the head-quarters of Charles was drawing more and more close; and though Sir Thomas Fairfax moved with extreme slowness, as it not very anxious to have an illustrious prisoner upon his hands, it was absolutely certain that before the month of April had come to an end the ancient city would be within his grasp. Though strongly fortified, surrounded on three sides by the Isis and the Charwell, and on the fourth by strong fortifications, Oxford was altogether unable to sustain a siege, being in want of provisions and ammunition as well as soldiers. Nothing therefore remained for the king but either to go boldly over into the parliamentary camp, or to fly. Charles chose the latter alternative, and a little before midnight on Monday, the 27th of April, he rode over Magdalen bridge out of Oxford, his beard cut, his features shaded by a broad brimmed hat, and a coarse cloak strapped round his waist.

In his flight the king was accompanied by only two persons, John Ashburnham, his valet, now personifying the master, his majesty riding behind him in groom fashion, and Dr. Hudson, a fox-hunting divine, well acquainted with all the lanes and by-roads of Oxfordshire and neighbouring counties, and engaged on this account to act as a guide. To escape pursuit, in case his escape from Oxford should become known to the besiegers, Charles and his companions first took the road to London, by way of Slough and Uxbridge, reaching the latter place, after a hard gallop across country, early on the morning of Tuesday, the 28th of April. Here they halted for a short while, and then spurred on to Hillingdon, a mile and a half nearer to the capital, its towers and steeples almost visible in the bright spring sun. The king felt more wavering than ever in his life at this last crisis of his fortunes. "His majesty," according to Dr. Hudson, "was much perplexed what course to resolve upon, whether to go to London or northward."

A little moral courage only was required to make Charles ride untended right into the midst of those he conceived his bitter enemies, and to turn them by bold confidence into friends. The result, in all human probability, would have brought him back to the throne, for loyalty was yet flaming high in thousands of breasts, and the sight of a king in the depth of distress was enough to gain over many a political foe. But Charles, with abundance of physical pluck, had but little of moral courage, and after looking for an hour in helpless irresolution eastward and northward, he turned towards Harrow-on-the-Hill. Here again, nearer still to the heart of his kingdom, to the great city the gates of which he might reach in an hour's ride, Charles stopped and hesitated, lost in painful indecision, till the sun was sinking in the west. Then he turned his horse's head once more and galloped off to the north. Past St. Albans the king and his two companions galloped, and past Dunstable, Leighton Buzzard, and Newport Pagnel, proceeding onward from thence through Northampton into Leicestershire, and stopping on the road to accept food and drink from hospitable squires, holding tables over ready spread for errant Cavaliers.

At Harborough, in Leicestershire, Charles expected to meet monsieur de Montreuil; but the diplomatist was not there, and uneasy at his absence, the king sent Dr. Hudson to seek him, while he himself turned direct east, and in slow stages, roaming from village to village, and constantly changing his disguise, made his way through the fens into Norfolk. At Downham, near the mouth of the Ouse, he sought for a vessel to convey him to Scotland, or at least as far as Newcastle; but having sought in vain, and in constant fear of being made a prisoner, he set to wandering through the dreary marshlands along the coast of Norfolk and Lincolnshire. After roaming about for a week, apparently without any settled purpose, Charles turned inland towards Nottingham, as if seeking to visit once more the town where he had raised, not quite three years before, his royal standard, emblem of civil war. But he did not get quite to Nottingham, but stopped short at Kelham Hall, two miles north-west of Newark-upon-Trent. Kelham Hall for the time being was the residence and head-quarters of Alexander Lesley, earl of Leven, commander-in-chief of the Scottish forces in England. To him, the royal wanderer forthwith introduced himself, and was gratified to see that, though evidently surprised, the earl and all his officers treated him with the most profound respect. Having been a vagabond for nine days, Charles once more felt himself king, and on the evening of the day of his arrival he summoned the officer of the guard to give him the password for the night. But Alexander Lesley interrupted while Charles was speaking. "Pardon me," said he, "I am the oldest soldier here: your majesty must permit me to give orders."

The news of the king having gone into the Scottish camp created the utmost consternation in London. In the House of Commons the belief was general that the whole was a carefully preconcerted scheme of the Presbyterian party to crush the Independents, and that Charles had given his aid to the former in order to be reinstalled in absolute power, on the sole condition on his part of accepting the Covenant. "The parliament," says Clarendon, "were so disordered with the intelligence that at first they resolved to command their general to raise the siege before Oxford, and to march with all expedition to Newark; but the Scottish commissioners at London diverted them from that, by assuring them 'that all their orders would meet with an absolute obedience in their army.' So they made a short despatch to them, in which it was evident that they believed the king had gone to them by invitation, and not out of his own free choice." The leaders of the Scottish army, on their part, were as perplexed what to do with the illustrious fugitive who had so suddenly and unexpectedly fallen into their hands as the Independent majority in the House of Commons was in alarm about their doings; and hearing of the great agitation in London, and the suspicions against them, they resolved upon retreating further north so as to hold their prize with greater security.

Charles was not at all unwilling to be taken nearer to the Border, feeling assured that the movement could not but increase the existing jealousy between the Presbyterian and Independent factions, from which he had long hoped to draw advantage; and to accelerate the step he gave orders to the governor of Newark, a few days after his arrival at Kelham Hall, to surrender the place. The command was at once obeyed; and immediately after the earl of Leven broke up his camp, and with the whole of his forces traversed the counties of Nottingham, York, and Durham, not resting till he arrived before Newcastle. While making in rapid strides for the north, the ministers of the kirk explained to the soldiers the state of the political situation from the pulpit. The first sermon preached before the army of the Covenant on the retreat to the Border, in the presence of the king and all the generals, was on the text of the three last verses of the 19th chapter of the second book of Samuel. Seldom did preachers find a text of Scripture more fitting for the occasion.

On the march from Nottinghamshire into Northumberland Charles was treated with much rigour, none being allowed access to him but a few persons appointed by the commander-in-chief of the Scottish army. Arrived at Newcastle, the king came to understand that he was completely a prisoner; but he learnt at the same time that there was one means offered to him which would not only end his confinement, but open again the road to the throne. This was to accept and to take the oath upon the Covenant. Charles, as usual, tried to gain his ends by half promises, which being taken for consent, the leaders of the army sent for Alexander Henderson, looked upon as the most eloquent minister of the kirk, to undertake his majesty's conversion to presbyterianism. Henderson arrived at Newcastle on the 16th of May, and forthwith began his labours. But his attempts to instruct the king were soon turned by the latter into a controversy as to the respective merits of episcopacy and presbyterianism, the whole ending in a sharp theological skirmish conducted not without acrimony on both sides. The discussion lasted for nearly two months, and while it was going on Charles, chafing more and more at his imprisonment, wrote letters to the governors of all the towns still attached to his cause, ordering them to surrender the places they held at once to the parliamentary forces, which commands were obeyed in all but a few instances. Having given this strong proof of his desire for an accommodation with the "rebels" in London, the king addressed the two houses of parliament in a long message. He explained his flight into the Scottish camp by stating that "being informed that their armies were marching so fast upon Oxford as to make that no fit place for treating, he did resolve to withdraw himself hither only to secure his own person, and with no intention to continue the war any longer, or make any division between his two kingdoms, but to give such contentment to both as by the blessing of God he might see a happy and well-grounded peace." To obtain it he sent the draught of a treaty proposing that all questions of religion should be settled "by the advice of the divines of both kingdoms assembled at Westminster," and that the command of the army and militia should be vested "in persons to be named for that trust by the two houses of parliament for the space of seven years, and after the expiration of that term as shall be agreed upon between his majesty and the two houses of parliament." For the rest, the king requested the lords and commons to draw up their own conditions of peace, and to send them to him speedily, he "being resolved to comply with his parliament in everything that should be for the happiness of his subjects, and for the removing of all unhappy differences that have produced so many sad effects."

The arrival of the royal message caused warm debates in both houses. Many of the commons were of opinion that it would be foolish to enter into any kind of treaty with an imprisoned monarch, he being able to repudiate it afterwards as made under compulsion; however, there were others who thought that it was necessary to make every possible effort to wrest from the hands of the northern allies the prize they had got, and the latter desire overruling all others, it was resolved to send the peace propositions desired by Charles to Newcastle. They were carried by four members of the lower house and two of the upper, one of the latter, the earl of Pembroke, acting as spokesman. On the 23rd of July the six commissioners were ushered into the royal presence, and Pembroke at once commenced reading the document intrusted to him, demanding, as terms of agreement, the adoption of the Covenant by the king, the abolition of episcopacy, the surrender to the parliament for twenty years of the command of the army, navy, and militia, and the exclusion of all who had taken a prominent part in the civil war, on the royalist side, from public employment. Before the earl of Pembroke had gone far in reading the propositions, he was interrupted by Charles. "I beg your pardon," he cried, "but have you any power to treat?" "No, your majesty," was the reply. "In that case," the king broke out, "a good honest trumpeter might, but for the honour of the thing, have done as much as you." The earl took no notice of the insult, but continued reading his paper in a respectful manner, his colleagues standing quietly around. The task finished, Charles again assumed a haughty attitude. "I suppose," he exclaimed, "you do not expect an immediate answer from me in a business of this importance?" "Please your majesty," Pembroke answered, "we are commanded to stay no longer than ten days." "Very well," rejoined the king; "I will give you an answer in proper time."

The answer, obviously dictated by self-interest, and that desire for peace and for "the happiness of his subjects" of which Charles had made so much in his message to parliament, could be but of one kind: it was to accept at once, without hesitation and without reserve, the propositions laid before him. All the friends he had still left, and all the advisers to whom he applied, entreated and urged him to do so; and Henrietta Maria herself, in a momentary fit of discretion, united her voice to those of the other counsellors in pressing the king to submit to the conditions offered by his victorious opponents, which, though severe, were not degrading, and altogether far more favourable than could be expected under the circumstances. But Charles withstood with obstinacy, apparently more than ever in his life inclined to reject the dictates of common sense, and take refuge in deception. He still relied upon intrigues, carrying on an active secret intercourse with the Roman Catholic insurgents of Ireland, who continued to promise great things; in the first instance money, for which the king was very eager, scheming to buy therewith his liberty. "If you can procure me a large sum of money," he told the earl of Glamorgan, his chief agent in Ireland, who was actively carrying on the negotiations; "if you can procure me a large sum of money, by engaging my kingdoms as security, I shall be glad, and as soon as I shall have recovered possession of them I will fully repay the debt." The week after despatching the note to Glamorgan, Charles delivered his answer to the peace proposals of parliament into the hands of the six commissioners. It was a blank refusal to accept the offered terms.

Great was the sorrow of the king's friends, and great the joy of his personal and political enemies, when it became known that once more, and probably for the last time, he had, blinded by conceit and stubbornness, rejected the olive branch held out to him. "What will become of us now that his majesty hath refused our proposals?" a moderate Presbyterian of the House of Commons inquired of a friend, a member of the advanced Independent party. "Nay: what would have become of us if his majesty had accepted them?" rejoined the latter, looking very grave and thoughtful. The refusal of Charles to come to a reconciliation with the parliament, coupled with his rejection of the Covenant, after two months' controversy with Alexander Henderson, immediately altered the attitude of the leaders of the Scottish army and government against him. The chancellor plainly and broadly told his majesty that by his act "he had lost all his friends in parliament, lost the capital, and lost the country; and that all England would join against him as one man to process and depose him, and to set up another government." To this he added that he must expect no longer to find an asylum and protection across the border; as a resolution had been passed by the General Assembly at Edinburgh, "that if the king should refuse to give satisfaction to his parliament he should not be permitted to come into Scotland." In the wake of this decision, which they took care to make known, the Scottish commissioners in London handed in a declaration to both houses of parliament, stating, in the name of their government, that they were willing "forthwith to surrender the garrisons possessed by them in England, which they did keep for no other end but the safety and security of their forces." They promised, moreover, "without delay to recall their army, reasonable satisfaction being given for their pains, hazards, charges, and sufferings, whereof a competent proportion to be presently paid to their army before their disbanding, and security to be given for the remainder, at such times hereafter as shall be mutually agreed on."

The communication made matters sufficiently plain for a clear understanding to be arrived at. The readiness of the Scottish allies to leave England on being paid for their services, included, as was tacitly understood on all sides, the leaving behind of the prize that had fallen into their hands at Newark; and this important point once settled, all that remained was to fix the exact value, in cash, of the "pains, hazards, charges, and sufferings" referred to by the commissioners. Half a million pounds sterling, it was hinted by them, would scarcely be sufficient compensation for the total amount of all pains and sufferings; and to accept anything less would be derogatory to the nation of Scotland. Upon this basis the negotiations commenced, the House of Commons voting, as a first sign of good-will, the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, in discharge of arrears of pay to the army of the Covenant, adding thereto the thanks of the nation for past services. In the wake of this was passed another vote declaring that the right of disposing of the person of the king belonged exclusively to the parliament of England.

The money claims of the Scots gave rise to some excitement in London, as well as much expression of ill feeling towards them. While some professed indignation that the northern allies should wish to be paid for having lifted their swords in defence of religion, others reproached them with the intention of selling the king, "as Judas Iscariot sold Christ." To give a reply to all the clamour and obloquy, the Scottish commissioners presented a paper, very dignified in tone, to both houses of parliament, in which they reiterated the willingness of their army to leave England, and justified their demand to be paid for the great services they had rendered to the nation. "The same principles of brotherly affection," they said, "which did induce both kingdoms to a conjunction of their counsels and forces in this cause, move us at this time to apply ourselves to the most real and effectual ways which tend to a speedy conclusion and amicable parting, and to the prevention of misunderstandings between the kingdoms in any of these things, which, peradventure, our common enemies look upon with much joy as occasions of differences. For this end we have taken no notice of the many base calumnies and execrable aspersions cast upon the kingdom of Scotland, in printed pamphlets and otherwise; expecting, from the justice and wisdom of the honourable houses, that they will themselves take such course for the vindication of our nation and army as the estates of Scotland have showed themselves ready to do for them in the like case. Upon the invitation of both houses the kingdom of Scotland did cheerfully undertake and hath faithfully managed their assistance to this kingdom, in pursuance of the ends expressed in the Covenant; and the forces of the common enemy being, by the blessing of God, upon the joint endeavours of both kingdoms, now broken and subdued, a foundation is laid and some good progress made in the reformation of religion, which we trust the honourable houses will, according to the Covenant, sincerely, really, and constantly prosecute till it be perfected."

The language was too calm and conciliating not to be responded to by both the lords and commons; and a special committee having been appointed to decide upon the claims of the Scottish army, an arrangement was come to within a short time. It was settled by vote and embodied in the form of a treaty, signed at the beginning of December, 1646, that the sum of four hundred thousand pounds should be given to the forces under the earl of Leven, quartered in the north of England, and that one half the amount should be paid down at once, and the rest when they had returned over the border. The two hundred thousand pounds thus promised were immediately raised, partly by the sale of church lands, and partly by loan in the city; and on the 16th of December the whole of the money was despatched from London in thirty-six waggons, containing two hundred cases, each secured with the seal of the two nations. A regiment of infantry, under the command of Major-general Skippon, escorted the treasure convoy, which entered the city of York—to which the outposts of the Scottish army had been advanced—on the first day of the new year, amidst the ringing of bells and discharge of cannon.

In the treaty concluded between the Scottish commissioners and the parliament, nothing was said about the disposal of the king, nor even his name mentioned; nevertheless it was fully understood that he was to be delivered up at the fulfilment of the principal stipulation of the agreement, the payment in cash of the two hundred thousand pounds. Charles himself remained in no ignorance about the fact; but, as in every other important crisis of his life, was in a state of extreme vacillation, and entirely undecided what to do. The best of his friends urged him to seek personal security in flight to France or the Netherlands, which could have easily been executed during the first months of his sojourn at Newcastle, inasmuch as the Scotch generals were greatly inclined to connive at his escape, so as to prevent his surrender to the English parliament, which many looked upon as a disgrace. However, the king refused to fly, mainly because his consort, who had strong personal reasons for not wishing his presence in France, advised him not to do so and thus the favourable time passed away, and the treaty being concluded, escape was out of the question. But at this last moment, when watched not only like a prisoner, but like one upon whom depended the payment of a very large sum, Charles attempted to regain his freedom. Learning that the thirty-six money-carts had left London, the king entered into an intrigue with some of his attendants, and disguising himself by means of a sailor's dress, in a dark night in the last week of December, he tried to elude the vigilance of his guards, and to get to Shields, where a Dutch man-of-war was lying to carry him off.

The scheme, known beforehand to the commander-in-chief of the army of Scotland, miscarried entirely, and the only result of it to the king was a more rigorous confinement than that previously ordered. At the same time measures were taken to insure his safe delivery to his English subjects; and the question coming before the House of Commons, a lively discussion ensued as to whether his majesty should be brought southward with some amount of ceremony, by commissioners specially appointed for the purpose, or whether Major-general Skippon should simply be instructed to receive him, together with the keys of Newcastle, and the receipt for his two hundred cases of gold. The latter appeared the form generally desired; nevertheless, at a final vote, taken on the 6th of January, 1647, inclinations more friendly to royalty prevailed, and it was settled to send nine commissioners to receive the king from the hands of the Scotch. They were at once chosen, the selection falling upon the earls of Pembroke and of Denbigh, Lord Montague, Sir John Coke, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Holland, Sir James Harrington, Sir Alexander Carew, and Major-general Brown, and the day after their nomination they set out for Newcastle. Charles, when hearing of the appointment of the parliamentary envoys, and being informed that simultaneously the estates of Scotland had consented to his surrender into their hands, exclaimed in the bitterness of his heart, "I am bought and sold."

The nine commissioners arrived at Newcastle on the 22nd of January, 1647, and having settled the money account with the Scottish army, the latter, on the last day of the month, gave over the town to an English garrison, and then rapidly recrossed the Tweed. Charles at first received the parliamentary envoys in a somewhat haughty manner, but at the end of a few days changed his tactics, and became most affable and pleasing in manners. He congratulated the earl of Pembroke, who was just sixty, on being able at his age, and in inclement a season, to undertake the long journey to the north without fatigue; and showed himself equally polite in his personal intercourse with the other commissioners, apparently bent to make it appear that he had not the least reluctance, but felt rather gratified to return to the capital and parliament, or, provisionally, to its neighbourhood. By a vote passed some days previous to the departure from London of the earl of Pembroke and his colleagues, the House of Commons had appointed Holmby Castle, near Northampton, a royal domain, inhabited by the first of the Stuarts, as the residence of Charles; and for this destination he and his parliamentary guardians, escorted by a regiment of horse, set out on the 9th of February, a day the king himself had fixed. The party travelled in slow stages, greeted all along the road by eager crowds, the behaviour of which showed that the veneration for the royal office and the wearer of the crown had not yet altogether departed from the country, rudely as it had been assailed in four years of war upon Royalists. In many villages, especially those remote from larger towns, the people asked to be "touched" for the king's evil; and although one of the commissioners was cynical enough to observe that the touch of the great seal of parliament might prove more efficacious than that of the middle-aged gentleman who was being conducted to Holmby Castle, the agriculturists of Yorkshire, Notts, and Leicester thought otherwise, and dropped down kneeling in the muddy roads as Charles came riding along in the midst of his custodians.

The preparations for the king's reception at the residence assigned to him by parliament were on a very liberal, and almost magnificent scale. He found house and table well furnished, with not only all the necessities he could want, but all the luxuries he could wish for, the only exception in the latter respect being that of episcopal court chaplains. These the House of Commons absolutely refused his majesty, although he pleaded hard for their coming, and provided him instead with clergymen who had seceded from the church. But Charles in his turn was obstinate, refusing to see the latter, nor even allowing them to say grace over his dinner and supper. As with other men of small brains and large conceit, religion with his majesty was essentially a matter of form, and but in a very slight degree of substance. His conscience as a Christian forbade him not to slay thousands and tens of thousands in battle, in satisfaction of his pride, and to gain his own personal ends; but it revolted against saying prayers and addressing the Almighty in any other but the high Anglican orthodox fashion.

With the king's removal to Holmby commenced a new and extraordinary struggle for power between the two great parties in parliament. Hitherto the Independents had carried it all their own way, not so much because possessing a numerical majority, which was often very doubtful, but on account of their strength in great men, nearly all the prominent leaders in the field belonging to their faction. But now that the war was at an end, a reaction set in. Regal autocracy having succumbed under the sword of Cromwell and his associates, the politicians in parliament, mostly members of the presbyterian party, speakers more than fighters, began to be afraid of the new power that had knocked the crown in the dust, and did all they could to bend it into obedience to their votes and resolutions. If prudently and cautiously undertaken, the dissolution of the great national army that had arisen might have been accomplished without much difficulty, as the vast majority of the men who had marched and fought under the parliamentary banner were not soldiers by profession, but peaceable citizens, anxious to return to their homes, and friends, and ordinary occupations. But as if determined to stir up these elements into fierce opposition, the Presbyterians, whose strength in parliament had been much increased by new elections undertaken since the humiliation of the king, set to work passing ordinances all but insulting to the army, and the immediate consequence was a strong ferment among the troops, which gradually ripened into revolt.

On the 19th of February, three days after the arrival of Charles at Holmby, a vote passed the commons that a great portion of the parliamentary forces should be immediately disbanded, and the rest sent into Ireland to subdue the chronic rebellion there; or, in other words, to reconquer, at, in all probability, an immense expenditure of blood, a country that had fallen into a state of the most savage anarchy. Terrible as was the task, the majority of Fairfax's and Cromwell's veterans, the strong, pious, psalm-singing men who had fought and been victorious at Marston Moor and Naseby, were quite willing and even anxious to undertake it, deeming it an act glorious to God to destroy popish superstition wherever it nestled, and making no other conditions to set out at once for Ireland than to receive their arrears of pay, and to retain their old commanders. Fair and natural as were these demands, the House of Commons, in its majority, refused to listen to them, and, assuming a haughty tone, passed a resolution ordering unconditional compliance with their orders. To carry them out a special committee, consisting entirely of Presbyterians, with Denzil Holles, a passionate enemy of Cromwell, at the head of them, was appointed forthwith, and invested with great powers for controlling and subduing the army. The report of these doings created a sudden stir among the armed masses spread all over the kingdom, garrisoning its towns and fortresses. For a moment they listened in silence to the news from Westminster, and then sprang to their feet.

The first sign of the intense disaffection prevailing in the army was a petition for redress of grievances presented to the House of Commons on the 25th of March. It was signed by only fourteen officers, they asking, in a humble tone, for an investigation into the condition of the troops, and offering at the same time some counsel as to the payment of arrears. The reply to this supplication was short. The fourteen were told that it did not become them to give advice to parliament, and that they would do well to attend to their duties and not meddle with matters above them. The arrogant answer served nothing but to add fuel to the fire. As soon as it became known in the army, another petition was prepared, much more firm and definite in tone, and signed by several hundreds of officers. It demanded that all arrears of pay to the parliamentary forces should be strictly liquidated; that no one should be obliged to go to Ireland against his will; that disabled soldiers and their widows and children should receive pensions; and that there should at once commence prompt and regular payments of wages, so as to allow the troops to live in decency, and prevent them from becoming a burthen upon the people among whom they were quartered.

The document wound up by a dignified justification of the right of petition, which by the tone of its former reply, as well as by one or two distinct resolutions, the lower house of parliament wished to withdraw from the army. "We hope," the address ran, "that in being soldiers we have not lost the capacity of subjects, nor divested ourselves thereby of our interests in the commonwealth, and that in purchasing the freedom of our brethren we have not lost our own. For our liberty of petitioning, we hope the house will never deny it to us, as it has not denied it to its enemies, but justified and commended it, and received misrepresentations of us. The false suggestions of some men informed you that the army intended to enslave the kingdom. We earnestly implore you to vindicate us, and that our hardly-earned wages may be cared for, according to our great necessities, more especially those of the common soldiers." Soon after despatching this petition, the principal signers of it, chiefly officers under Sir Thomas Fairfax, all belonging to the party of the Independents, set on foot a formidable organization within their own regiments, which before long spread over the whole army. The men of every squadron of horse and of every company of foot chose two deputies, or, as they were called, "adjutors," to represent their interests, and the whole of them met periodically in a council "to consult for the good of the army." It was the germ of a parliament of fighters that was to oppose a parliament of talkers.

As yet it was completely in the power of the House of Commons to quench the growing sedition of the army. Nothing was needed to satisfy the just demands for discharge of arrears of pay, than to make a call for volunteers to go to Ireland and to disband the rest of the troops, to reduce everything to order and obedience. But with a strange perversity, to be explained only by the fact of the two houses of parliament containing many Royalists in disguise, anxious to stir up another civil war, by which their cause could not but profit, both the lords and commons refused, and again refused, to accede to the prayers and petitions of the army, with the consequence of at last driving the majority of the men into open insurrection. On the 30th of April Major-general Skippon arose in his seat in parliament, and, according to the commons' journals, "produced a letter presented to him the day before by some troopers, in behalf of eight regiments of the army of horse." The letter "complained of the many scandals and false suggestions which were of late raised against the army in their proceedings; that they were taken as enemies; that they saw designs upon them, and upon many of the godly party in the kingdom; and that they could not engage for Ireland till they were satisfied in their expectations, and their just desires granted."

Feeling offended at the tone of the letter, or petition, which, among others, contained some remarks about the ambition of men who, "having tasted of sovereign power, wished to be tyrants," the commons ordered the bearers to be summoned to the bar of the house; and the next day "three troopers, Edward Sexby, William Allen, and Thomas Sheppard," were brought in by the usher of the black rod. "Where was this letter got up?" inquired the Speaker of the commons. "At a meeting of the regiments," was the reply. "Who wrote it?" he asked further. "A council of delegates appointed by the regiments," they answered. "Did your officers approve of it?" was the next question. "Very few of them know anything of it," replied the troopers, with some pride. "But do you know," said the Speaker, "that none but Royalists could have suggested such a proceeding? You yourselves, were you over Cavaliers?" They answered indignantly: "We entered the service of parliament before the battle of Edgehill, and have remained in it ever since." There was a moment's silence; then one of the three soldiers strode a step nearer to the bar. "I have received," he cried, "on one occasion five wounds. I had fallen. Major-general Skippon saw me on the ground: he gave me five shillings to get relief. The major-general can contradict me if I lie." "It is true, quite true!" exclaimed the old general, full of emotion. "But what," the Speaker continued, "means this sentence in which you speak of sovereign power?" With one voice the troopers replied, "We are only the agents of our regiments. If the house will give us its questions in writing, we will take them to the regiments and bring back the replies." A great stillness fell over the house. The three hundred representatives of "all the commons of England" could not but silently tremble at sight of the three representatives of the citizens of England trained in arms, who, spurred and booted, helmet on head and sword at the side, were standing there at the bar. Shrinking back in his chair, the Speaker told the troopers that they would have to attend the house when ordered on summons; upon which the three turned on their heels and stalked away, their heavy swords rattling on the floor.

Petitions and addresses from the army to the commons followed each other rapidly for a month after the appearance of the three troopers at the bar, yet to no visible effect. At times the Presbyterians seemed as if wavering under the policy they were pursuing, and inclined to give way to the demands of their armed antagonists; but this lasted only a short while, and the spirit of conciliation lapsing, the old animosity flared up higher than ever. It was felt on both sides, but more apparently on the part of the Presbyterians than on that of the Independents, that the great aims, religious and political, which they were pursuing, were all but irreconcilable. The church government of the Presbyterians, it was perfectly certain, was no more likely to be accepted by the Independents than episcopacy itself; while at the same time, the constitutional monarchy schemes of Denzil Holles and his friends seemed as futile and almost as bad to Oliver Cromwell and the stern, proud soldiers gathered around him, whose horses' hoofs had trodden a crown in the mire, as a return to the old paternal despotism of the Stuart kings. "What misery!" said Cromwell, one day, while petitions were flying fast from the army to Westminster, to his friend, Edmund Ludlow, a staunch republican;

"What misery to serve a parliament! Let a man be ever so true, if there is a lawyer to abuse him he can never recover it."

The sentiment was re-echoed among the best and most thoughtful of the soldiers. Nearly all of them were Independents, and all of them writhing under the consciousness, that after having left house and home, family and friends—after having staked their blood and their lives to free the nation from the burthen of unbearable tyranny and misgovernment, they should be treated with continually, little better than vagabonds, by a set of "lawyers" who had never soiled their ruffles in the service of the country, and whose whole merit was that of talking glibly. On the other hand, the leaders of the parliamentary majority had become fully aware—and felt it more and more now that the clang of arms had ceased and royalty was lying prostrate, an object of fear no more, but of pity—that it would be infinitely easier to amalgamate presbyterianism with moderate episcopacy than with the no-church system of the Independents; and that it would be better to re-erect a throne, even at the risk of seeing it encroach at times upon the boundaries of law, than let the English monarchy be changed into an English republic. Deeply impressed with these considerations, and evermore exasperated at the threatening attitude of the army, the presbyterian party in parliament resolved upon an extreme step. They opened secret negotiations with Charles, and he eagerly reciprocating them, the upper house at once, and with very unwise haste, voted that his majesty should be humbly invited to come nearer to London, the palace of Oatlands, in Surrey, being pointed out as a proper royal residence. It was on the 20th of May that the lords passed the vote, in which the commons were invited to join. The latter hesitated a while, perceiving the extreme imprudence of throwing off the mask while yet facing an armed enemy, but in the end were made to pass a similar resolution. It was a manifest challenge to the army and the Independents, and they hesitated not to take it up. They knew they must strike, and they struck hard and struck swift.

On the afternoon of Wednesday, the 2nd of June, King Charles was amusing himself playing at bowls on Althorpe Down, a little distance from Holmby Castle, when the parliamentary commissioners, who were watching "the sacred person of his majesty" day and night, noticed a stranger, an officer in the army, among the crowd of rustics who stood gaping around. The stranger was dressed in the uniform of a cornet of Fairfax's regiment of guards, quartered at Oxford, fifty miles away from Holmby; and anxious to know what had brought him so far, Colonel Greaves, one of the commissioners, went up to him and made some polite inquiries as to the condition of the troops under the commander-in-chief. The replies were short and somewhat disdainful; and while colonel and cornet were yet talking together, a report was brought to the former that a body of horse had been seen near Towcester, on the road apparently to Holmby Castle. "Did you hear of them?" asked the colonel of the stranger. "I did more than hear," said the latter, smiling. "I saw them yesterday, not thirty miles off." There was a sudden end of the game of bowls on Althorpe Down. Colonel Greaves and his colleagues humbly requesting his majesty to return with them at a sharp trot to the castle, where preparations were commenced immediately to resist the attack of an enemy, the drawbridge raised, and the cannon pushed forward on the walls.

The garrison was under arms, and everybody on the alert, when towards midnight the tramp of horses was heard in the distance, and shortly after part of a regiment of cavalry, some seven hundred men, came up under the castle gate, demanding entrance. "Who is your commander?" asked Colonel Greaves, who had hurried up in haste to the warder's tower. "We all command," was the many-voiced reply, truly republican in spirit, though against military rules. When the shouts of the horsemen had died away, one of them rode forward and saluted Colonel Greaves, who recognized in him at once the stranger of Althorpe Downs. "My name is Joyce," he cried, merrily, introducing himself. "I am a cornet in the general's guard, and I want to speak to the king." "From whom?" inquired the colonel. "From myself," replied the cornet. The parliamentary commissioners faintly laughed. "It's no laughing matter," exclaimed Cornet Joyce, laying his hand on the hilt of his sword. "I and my comrades did not come hither to talk to you, and with you I have no business. I want to speak to the king, and speak with him I will." The commissioners withdrew, ordering the garrison to hold themselves in readiness to fire upon the enemy without; but before they had finished their speech-making, eloquently exhorting the soldiers to be faithful to parliament, the drawbridge fell, the gates were flung open, and Cornet Joyce and his seven hundred steel capped companions came prancing into the castle yard. The soldiers of the garrison and the new-comers shook hands like old friends, and Colonel Greaves and his fellow-commissioners became conscious of the great fact that the army of England was in open rebellion against the parliament of England.

Cornet Joyce and his men, having got possession of Holmby Castle, appeared for a while somewhat undecided what to do. To seize the king, the most important figure in the great chess game opened between war-makers and law-makers, was their immediate object; but they had not quite settled in their own minds how to handle "the sacred person of his majesty," and therefore, once within the castle, with sentinels securely posted on the walls, they thoughtfully took supper and went to bed, postponing decisions of national importance till they had slept well. The next morning and afternoon Cornet Joyce was no more in a hurry than the night before; and it was only in the evening, when learning that one of the parliamentary commissioners had made his escape, with the design of fetching troops from London, that he became impatient, and insisted on seeing the king. The remaining commissioners and attendants made excuses of various kinds, keeping the cornet in conversation till nearly ten o'clock at night, when at last they told him that now his majesty had gone to bed. "Well, I do not care," replied Joyce. "I must see the king, whether in bed or not, for there are matters of importance to be undertaken." Which saying, he made his way gently to the sleeping apartment of Charles, at the door of which he was again stopped by servants, but after some delay was allowed to enter by express order of the king. A long conversation ensued, the cornet behaving most respectfully; and the tenor of the words exchanged soon showed the commissioners that there was no great unwillingness on the part of his majesty to be carried off by the troopers, so as to become a prisoner of the army instead of a parliamentary captive.

Keenly following the progress of the mortal strife that had sprung up between his enemies in the army and his enemies in parliament, Charles had already built new schemes on the advantages he might reap from the struggle, and fancied he might do better to throw himself into the arms of the Independents than into those of the Presbyterians. The former were not only the strongest materially, but their actions were most in sympathy with his own. He was not a great soldier, but he was a worse politician, and in his heart felt far more inclination to ally himself with the rough fighting men of Naseby and Long Marston Moor, who had dashed the purple from his shoulders, than with the glib orators who wished, as he imagined, to tie his hands and feet to a throne, and to reduce him to the position of a mere figure perched at the top of the constitutional monarchy house which they were building up. After an hour's discussion with Joyce, the latter having replied with all the frankness of a soldier to the many questions addressed to him, the king gave his promise to go to the army. The cornet had made a remark, speaking of the struggle for power between Presbyterians and Independents, which much impressed the king. "It has now come to this: they must sink us, or we must sink them," said Joyce, to which Charles nodded agreement, silently reflecting that a third alternative was just possible, and that a hope he had expressed a year before, in a letter to an adherent—"the Presbyterians and Independents may now be got to extirpate one another,"—would be fulfilled at last. Matters altogether looked promising, and the clock striking eleven, his majesty smilingly and graciously waived his hand to the diplomatic cornet. "Good-night, Mr. Joyce. I will readily go with you if your soldiers confirm all you have promised me. I will be with you to-morrow morning, at six. Good-night!"

Punctually at six o'clock on the morning of Friday, the 4th of June, Charles came down the staircase from his apartments to meet his new friends. The seven hundred were drawn up in the castle yard to receive his majesty, who, on approaching them, thought fit to go through a small comedy for the sake of the parliamentary commissioners looking on in unutterable astonishment. "Mr. Joyce," exclaimed Charles, trying to look a little angry, "I must ask you by what authority you pretend to seize me, and take me from this place?" "By authority," replied the cornet, not abashed, "of the army of England, in order to prevent the designs of its enemies, who would once more plunge the kingdom in blood." "This is no legal authority," resumed his majesty, grave as before. "But have you a written order from Sir Thomas Fairfax?" "I have orders from the army," said Joyce, "and the general is comprised in the army." "That is no answer," continued the king. "The general is not part of, I left at the head of the army. But have you a written warrant?" It seemed to the brave little cornet that the fun of the dialogue was wearing out, which made him reply, somewhat quickly, "I beg that your majesty will question me no further, for I have already said enough." But the king thought the comedy charming. "Come, Mr. Joyce," he cried, "be frank with me: tell me where is your commission?" "There it is!" the cornet said abruptly. "Where?" asked Charles. "There," repeated Joyce, pointing with his finger to the seven hundred behind him on horseback, stiff like statues. The king broke out laughing. "Certainly," he exclaimed, "your instructions are written in very clear characters. 'It is as fair a commission, and as well written, as I have ever seen in my life. You have a company of as handsome proper gentlemen as I have seen a great while. But yet you must know that, to take me hence, you must have force, unless you do promise that I shall be treated with respect, and that nothing shall be required of me against my conscience or my honour.' As with one voice, the seven hundred shouted, 'Nothing, Nothing!' "We should be most unwilling," added Cornet Joyce, "to force any man to act against his conscience, least of all your majesty." There was a short pause. "Now, gentlemen, for the place you intend to have me to?" Charles inquired. "If it please your majesty, to Oxford," replied the cornet. "That's no good air," said the king, musingly, both thinking himself that his old head-quarters were rather near to Westminster. "Then to Cambridge?" suggested Joyce. "No, I would rather go to Newmarket," said Charles, "it is an air that always agreed with me." "Be it so, your majesty," said the polite cornet, not unaware that "the air" of the Newmarket regions, home of not a few of the Ironsides, was held to be much better for Independents than their antagonists. The king was about to step into his coach, when one of the parliamentary commissioners, Major-general Brown, thought it his duty to make one more speech. "Gentlemen," he cried, addressing the soldiers with extraordinary deference, "we are here in trust from both houses, and wish to know whether you all agree to what Mr. Joyce has said?" "All! all!" shouted the troopers. "Let those," continued the major-general, "who wish the king should remain with us, say so." "None! none!" exclaimed all. Cornet Joyce was getting impatient, thinking they had had enough of parliamentary forms and ceremonies. "March!" he cried out; and the seven hundred horsemen, with the king in their midst, galloped away, across the drawbridge of Holmby castle.

The same day on which King Charles quitted Holmby, Oliver Cromwell left London. There was a rumour flying about that his liberty, if not life, was in danger, the most hot-headed of the Presbyterian party in the House of Commons having decided to have him arrested and bring him to trial as an "incendiary." Urged by his friends, he left the capital secretly, and without rest or stay rode on to Triploe Heath, near Royston, on the borders of Hertford and Cambridgeshire, where a great meeting of troops quartered in the eastern counties, and delegates from the principal divisions of the army in other parts of the kingdom, had been arranged to take place on the 10th of June. There were twenty thousand soldiers assembled on the occasion, "the remarkablest army that ever wore steel in this world," to discuss the state of the nation in general, and the relations of parliament and the army to each other in particular. A most important decision was come to by the vast meeting, that to march upon London, in defiance of a vote of the House of Commons, passed a short time before, ordering that the army should not approach within forty miles of the capital.

The march commenced the following day, and went as far as St. Albans, from which place a manifesto, subscribed by Fairfax, Cromwell, and eleven other generals and high officers, was sent to the lord mayor and aldermen of London, acquainting them with the intention of the army, and stating the reasons why it had put itself in movement. "The sum of all our desires," said the paper, written, to judge by internal evidence, by Cromwell, "is no other than this: satisfaction to our undoubted claims as soldiers, and reparation upon those who have to the utmost improved all opportunities and advantages by false suggestions, misrepresentations, and otherwise, for the destruction of this army, with a perpetual blot of ignominy upon it. Which injury we should not value if it singly concerned our own particular persons, being ready to deny ourselves in this, as we have done in other cases, for the kingdom's good; but under this pretence we find no less is involved than the overthrow of the privileges both of parliament and people, and that rather than they shall fail in their designs, or we receive what in the eyes of all good men is our just right, the kingdom is endeavoured to be engaged in a new war." "These are our brief desires," the document concluded, "and the things for which we stand, and beyond which we shall not go. And for the obtaining of these things we are drawing near your city, professing sincerely from our hearts that we intend no evil towards you, and declaring, with all confidence and assurance, that if you appear not against us in these our just desires, to assist that wicked party which would embroil us and the kingdom, neither we nor our soldiers shall give you the least offence. We come not to do any act to prejudice the being of parliaments, or to the hurt of this parliament, in order to the present settlement of the kingdom. We seek the good of all."

There was wild confusion in parliament when it became known that the army was marching upon London. The majority in the House of Commons had no material force to lean upon than the trainbands and other armed organizations of the capital, who were believed to be strongly attached to the presbyterian party, and willing to defend its interests with the sword. However, as the danger approached, the confidence in this support broke down entirely. The good citizens of London were ready to talk a great deal, to hold monster meetings, and get up monster petitions, signed by thousands, and full of grandiloquent expressions of unalterable attachment to the cause of parliament; but at the last moment, when the tramp of the twenty thousand steel-capped men came resounding on the high road from St.

Albans, the loudly-talking and gesticulating crowds looked at each other, and there were few who seemed ready to fight, and fewer still ready to lay down their lives for the parliamentary leaders. The lord mayor and aldermen had no sooner received the letter of the thirteen generals, than, with extraordinary haste, they donned their state garments, got up a glowing address to the valiant army, and went away from the Guildhall to the head-quarters of Cromwell and Fairfax, "in three coaches, with the due number of outriders."

Seeing the gates of the capital open before them, and no difficulty in that direction, the leaders of the army resolved to remain at St. Albans for a few days, to prepare the steps for another important measure which had been long under discussion among them. It came forth on the 16th of June, in the shape of an address to the commons, accusing of treason eleven members of the house, who were declared to be "chief authors of all these troubles;" and who, it was demanded, should be put upon their trial, and prevented from voting in the interim. The eleven members, all of them distinguished as presbyterian partisans, were Denzil Holles, representative of Dorchester, Sir Philip Stapylton, of Boroughbridge, Sir William Waller, of Andover, Sir William Lewis, of Petersfield, Sir John Clotworthy, of Malden, Recorder Glyn, of Westminster, Anthony Nichols, of Bodmin, Major-general Massey, of Wootton-Basset, Colonel Walter Long, of Ludgershall, Sir John Maynard, of Lostwithiel, and Colonel Edward Harley, of Herefordshire. The demand of the army leaders met with no resistance on the part of the parliamentary chiefs, whose former arrogance in refusing to treat with the soldiers gave way all at once to abject fear and humility. Not waiting even till their accusers had come face to face with them, the eleven members fled from the House of Commons as soon as they heard their names pronounced, some hiding themselves in the City, and others, still more under the influence of terror, asking the Speaker's leave and passport to go out of the kingdom. Denzil Holles, and his friends were not men devoid of personal courage, and their pusillanimity on this occasion showed that they knew themselves without support among the masses, devoid alike of sympathy with presbyterianism and the subtle theories of constitutional monarchy government.

After staying for more than a week at St. Albans, the army put itself in movement towards Windsor, accompanying the king, who, after his seizure at Holmby Castle, had been led in slow stages to Newmarket, Royston, and Hatfield, amusing himself on the road with hunting and feasting in gentlemen's houses, and proceeding finally to the head-quarters of Cromwell and Fairfax. The main object of the latter, in going to the royal residence in Berkshire, instead of to the capital, now appeared to be to come quietly to some arrangement with Charles, for which all preparations were made. He was not only treated with the greatest attention by all the officers of the army, but was allowed to form a court around him, to have intercourse, freely and without molestation, with all friends and adherents who wished to see him, even with emissaries from France; and, what pleased him more than all else, was permitted to have his own episcopalian chaplains, who read the church service in his presence morning, noon, and evening. On his expressing a wish to that effect, his three youngest children, the dukes of York and of Gloucester, and Princess Elizabeth, whom Henrietta Maria had left behind when escaping from England with her cavaliers, and who had fallen into the hands of the parliamentary troops at the surrender of Oxford, were allowed to see the king, the interview taking place at Caversham, near Reading. Charles, all the while, seemed to be in the happiest mood, making no secret to his confidential advisers that he was engaged in negotiations with the leaders of the army, which, he fondly believed, would soon seat him again on the throne.

The terms offered in this instance were more moderate than Charles could possibly expect, being far less exacting than what had been demanded of him at Newmarket. The Independents, as represented by Cromwell, Fairfax, and their partisans, required chiefly that the command of the militia, as well as the nomination of the chief officers of state, should be given to the parliament for ten years, and that all civil and coercive authority should be withdrawn from the bishops and clergy, but that episcopacy should subsist, together with presbyterianism, both to be on an equal footing, with liberty of conscience for all subjects. Certain other reforms were demanded, of importance to the nation, but none affecting the crown and its prerogative; as that parliaments should be annually, that small and decayed boroughs should be disfranchised, and that everything regarding the representation and the election of members should be left to the House of Commons. For a moment it appeared as if Charles was really willing to subscribe to these conditions, and the negotiations were so far advanced that the treaty between him and the representatives of the army, denominated "the settlement," was already drawn up and ready for signature. But now, at the last moment, the king once more drew back, refusing to ratify his previous engagements. He did so in words which could leave but little doubt of his being still engaged in double-dealing, holding out one hand to the Independents and the other to the Presbyterians, but honest towards no party, and anxious only that they should make war upon one another to his own ultimate benefit. "You cannot do without me; you will fall to ruin if I do not sustain you," he repeated frequently to the army leaders, after finally declining to put his name to "the settlement." Having arrived at this point in their understanding with the king, there seemed but one way open to the generals—to do without him.

The new hopes of Charles, which seemed to blind him to all considerations of even the most ordinary prudence, were based mainly on the attitude of a portion of the citizens of London. While the army was standing at St. Albans, ready at a moment's notice to swoop down upon the capital, everything had been quiet within; but no sooner had the march of the troops towards Windsor—looked upon as a confession of weakness, or at least irresolution on the part of Fairfax and Cromwell—become known, than the masses began again to stir, exhibiting their old antipathy to the Independent party. Towards the end of July, while the negotiations between the king and the army were making active progress, a monster petition, signed by nearly a hundred thousand individuals, was carried from the city to Westminster, calling upon parliament to order the suppression of all "conventicles," or meeting-houses of the Independents, and to rescue his majesty from the hands of the brutal soldiery who held him captive. At the same time another paper was laid up for signature at the Guildhall, intended to be the basis of a great league between Royalists and Presbyterians, all the subscribers binding themselves to oppose the Independent arms in hand, to keep away the troops from the capital, and to reinstall the king in power.

The Guildhall document having been covered with many thousands of names, the new faction, composed in part of the lowest rabble, to show their strength, marched in a great body to Westminster on Monday, the 26th of July, demanding the reinstatement of the eleven presbyterian members of the lower house who had been impeached by the army. "The apprentices," noted Bulstrode Whitelocke, member for Great Marlow, "and many other rude boys and mean fellows among them, came into the House of Commons, and kept the door open, and their hats on, and called out as they stood, 'Vote! Vote!' and in this arrogant posture stood till the votes passed in that way." The next morning, Tuesday, the house assembled at the usual hour; but armed crowds continuing to come down from the city, the leaders of the Independent party carried a vote for an adjournment till Friday, preparing, if order should not be restored by this time, to proceed to the headquarters of the army. The necessity for this step made itself felt sooner than expected, and on the commons re-assembling at the appointed day, it was found that nearly one-half of the members had withdrawn, the number including the Speaker, who had taken with him the symbol of authority, the mace. Nothing daunted, the remaining representatives, constituting the bulk of the presbyterian party, resumed their sittings, elected a new Speaker, borrowed a mace from the lord mayor, and set to work voting ordinances for the defence of London and the raising in mass of the inhabitants. But the martial ardour, fiercely as it was flaring up for a moment, scarcely lasted three days. On Saturday, the 31st of July, the capital was forming into a camp, with all the shops shut, and the principal streets turned into bivouacs for the militia and train bands. On Sunday, the first of August, the war fire rose to the highest pitch, twenty thousand men taking a great oath to uphold presbyterianism with their lives; yet the next morning already a reaction had set in, and before the evening of Monday, a large portion of the inhabitants of the city, and almost the entire population of Southwark, declined to fight, the news of the approach of the army having arrived in the course of the day. Before midnight had arrived the fact had become abundantly clear that the presbyterian party in London was not inclined to die with harness on its back."

Cromwell and Fairfax had not waited for the report of the final outbreak to put themselves in movement towards the capital. Their secret intelligence, and the little disguised expectations of the king, who had kept up all along an active communication with his new and old friends, had told them some time before what was likely to happen, and they were ready to start on the first signal. It came with the news of the reconstitution of parliament and the election of a fresh Speaker, which had no sooner arrived than the army strode forward, Cromwell leading the van with his Ironsides. On Hounslow Heath the troops mustered for a great review, attended by the Speaker and fugitive members of the House of Commons, who were received with shouts by the soldiers; and the review over, a "public declaration," signed by the commander-in-chief, was issued, "showing the grounds of his present advance to the city of London," and declaring his intention to enter the capital, if necessary, by force, in order to quench anarchy. But force had already become wholly unnecessary. On the army advancing from Hounslow to Brentford, the commander of the city militia, General Massey, "sent out scouts to Brentford," making men as if intending to offer resistance. "But ten men of the army," says Bulstrode Whitelocke, "beat thirty of his, and took a flag from a party of the city. The city militia and common council sat late, and a great number of people attended at Guildhall. When a scout came in and brought news that the army made a halt, or other good intelligence, they cry, 'One and all!' But when the scouts reported that the army was advancing nearer them, then they would cry as loud, 'Treat, treat, treat!' So they spent most part of the night. At last they resolved to send the general an humble letter beseeching him that there might be a way of composure."

There was not the slightest objection on the part of either Fairfax or Cromwell to arrive at a "composure," or peaceable agreement; and immediately after receiving the white flag of the authorities at the Guildhall, orders were given to the troops to proceed into London with arms lowered, as friends, and not as enemies. Accordingly, on the morning of Friday, the 6th of August, the army marched "three deep by Hyde Park" into the heart of the city, "with boughs of laurel in their hats." A week after, the king was transferred from Windsor to Hampton Court Palace, still treated with great show of reverence, and under no other guard than his word of honour not to escape, but stripped of all the attributes of royal power, with no more mention made of negotiations and "settlements." Just before the march of the army to London, Charles, in a conversation with the son-in-law of Cromwell, Henry Ireton, one of the shrewdest and most statesmanlike of the army leaders, had allowed himself to fall into the boastful, and not a little stupid utterance, "I must be allowed to play my game." Ireton quietly replied, "If your majesty has a game to play, we must likewise play ours." What the play would be, the king began to perceive at last, when hearing that the troops had entered London without the least resistance, victorious in peace, crowned with "boughs of laurel."

With the occupation of the capital by the army, and the entire collapse of the Presbyterian party, all the hopes of Charles, of his being able to reinstall himself in power by the antagonism of the two opposing factions in parliament and in the nation, came to an end. Henceforth the great question as to the future form of government to be established in the kingdom narrowed itself in a manner that Charles himself was no more concerned in it. His latest duplicity had made all men of the least influence in parliament or in the army unwilling to make attempts of further negotiations; and the discussions of the political leaders gradually turned towards the point as to whether it would be wisest to seat one of the royal children on the throne, with curtailment of the royal prerogative to a mere shadow, or whether the simply republican form of rule should be preferred. Some of the ablest men in the House of Commons unreservedly declared themselves in favour of the latter alternative, which also had the support of nearly all the superior officers of the army, and of a decided majority among the common soldiers. However, it seemed doubtful how far the nation at large was prepared to submit to the proposed new order of things, and the provisional conclusion came to was that it would be best to make no change for the moment, and to leave the crown on the head of Charles, nominally, for a little while longer.

The arrangement was the most favourable that could be come to in respect to the illustrious captive at Hampton Court, for as long as he bore the title of king, empty as it was under the circumstances, there seemed a possibility of his reoccupying the throne; any lapse of time, quietly passed, increasing his chances by softening political acerbities, and extinguishing the fierce hatreds of the civil war. However, it was not in the king's nature to be quiet and resigned; and even now, when every motive of pride, of self-interest, and of love for his children, whose succession could only be secured by a dignified behaviour on his part, went to urge him to acquiescence into inexorable facts, he appeared determined to act a suicidal part, by giving the reins to his irritability and waywardness of temper. With all his power taken from him, even that of intrigue, it seemed impossible that he could inflict any more mischief upon himself; nevertheless, he managed to do it by almost the only act he was still able to accomplish. Against the advice of every friend still faithful to him, but to the secret delight of his personal enemies, the king resolved to break his word of honour, and fly from Hampton Court. It was in vain his adherents told him that while within the walls of Henry VIII.'s palace he was still a crowned sovereign, with all the outward attributes of royalty around him; yet that once without he would be nothing more but an adventurer. Charles listened, but did not change his resolve, apparently bent to be either despot or adventurer.

The king effected his escape from the palace on the evening of Thursday, the 11th of November. He left his room accompanied only by a single servant, William Legge, and gaining the park by a back staircase, soon found himself at the side of the river, where a ferry boat was lying ready. Two more attendants, Ashburnham, his confidential valet, and

CHARLES I. A PRISONER IN CARISBROOK CASTLE.

Sir John Berkeley, joined Charles here, and in their company he crossed the Thames to the village of Ditton, and then took horse, shaping his course in a south-westerly direction, towards the borders of Hampshire. It was highly characteristic of the king, that though having resolved upon so momentous a step as that of risking his crown, and, perhaps, his life, by flight, he was quite undecided as yet where to go; and having ridden all night long in furious haste, his companions had to learn to their dismay the next morning, when changing horses at the little town of Sutton, that their movements were not regulated by any fixed plan, but left to chance. As chance would have it, a parliamentary commission was sitting at Sutton, at the very hostelry before which his majesty was alighting; and having learnt this much, he quickly galloped off again, declining the invitation into the place of public resort. Again the riders galloped on fast and furious, not resting till they arrived, with the sinking day, in view of Southampton.

Off the descent of an eminence near the town, Charles reined in his horse. "Let us alight," he cried, "and consult what is best to be done." The consultation was long and serious, but based on nothing better than surmises, hopes, and expectations of what might happen under certain circumstances; and the decision came to in the end by the fugitives was that they should go to the Isle of Wight, to throw themselves upon the protection of the governor there, Colonel Hammond, of whom it was strangely believed that he might forsake the trust of parliament, which had appointed him, to espouse the cause of a crownless king. The resolve was so manifestly absurd, that Charles himself hesitated to carry it out at once; and in order to see his way a little clearer, before trusting his person into the hands of Colonel Hammond, despatched Ashburnham and Sir John Berkeley forward to announce his arrival, while he, accompanied by William Legge, went to seek a temporary residence at Tichfield House, the residence of the earl of Southampton. The earl was not at home, but his mother willingly offered an asylum to the fugitive monarch for several days, which he spent in much care and anxiety, harassed by opposing thoughts. Always acting first and reflecting afterwards, Charles faintly began to see the rashness of his escape from Hampton Court, and the utter irrationality of the things he was attempting. He could have relied upon Cromwell and Fairfax, whose hands had been outstretched towards him to the last; but to throw himself absolutely upon the support of an obscure colonel, who might betray him, and at the very best could not render him the least assistance, seemed little less than madness. However, reflections now were vain; he had burnt his bridges behind him, and had to await the result.

While the king was staying at Tichfield House, a prey to dark care, the two messengers he had sent forward executed his behests with all possible speed. On the evening of the day they had left their royal master, Ashburnham and Berkeley arrived at Lynnhington, seeking the ferry to the Isle of Wight, and in hopes to meet the governor before the next morning. But it was blowing a heavy gale, and they had to wait for more than twelve hours before being able to cross the Solent; and having passed at last the narrow strip of sea, and got as far as Carisbrook Castle, the residence of Colonel Hammond, they learned to their intense disappointment that he left just before, and had gone to Newport. Thither they followed immediately, and spurring hard, overtook the governor on the road, acquainting him, in a very hasty and decidedly undiplomatic manner, at once with the object of their journey. Colonel Hammond was astounded as much as perplexed upon learning that the king had flown from the army, and was seeking a refuge in the quiet little territory under his administration. Naturally thinking of his own person in the first instance, he exclaimed, in bitter indignation, "Oh, gentlemen! you have undone me by bringing the king to this island. If he is not yet landed, pray let him not come; for what between my allegiance to his majesty and my trust to parliament and the army, I shall be confounded." A long discussion ensued on the road to Newport Castle, Sir John Berkeley pressing the colonel hard to assist the king in his great need, and earn his eternal gratitude; till in the end, won over partly by his arguments as well as by deeper calculations of self-interest, Hammond yielded, or appeared to yield, to the demands made upon him. "Well," he cried, "I believe his majesty has made choice of me as a person of honour and honesty, and I will not deceive his expectations." Sir John Berkeley did not like entirely the look accompanying these words, and still less the proposition of the governor which followed, that he himself would set out in their company to fetch the king. However, John Ashburnham, according to Berkeley's account, "embraced the motion most readily, and immediately went over the bridge into the castle, though I had the image of the gallows very perfectly before me."

It having been settled that Colonel Hammond should accompany them to the retreat of Charles, the travellers at once started for Cowes, where they engaged a boat to take them across Southampton water to Tichfield. Sir John Berkeley, mistrusting to some extent the loyalty of the colonel, had stipulated that the latter must go without any attendants. However, arrived at Cowes, Hammond insisted that the governor of the town, Captain Baskett, should be of the company; and his guides giving way, the four stepped together into the boat, and before the short autumn day had come to an end, found themselves in the courtyard of the old mansion where the majesty of England had taken refuge. Leaving Sir John Berkeley and the two strangers downstairs, Ashburnham first went into the chamber of the king, to inform him that the governor of the Isle of Wight had arrived in person, with a companion, to offer his services. On hearing the narrative of his favourite valet, Charles, more than ever under the influence of anxiety and suspicion, jumped up on his seat, striking his breast. "What, you have brought Hammond with you!" he exclaimed. "Oh, Jack! you have undone me, for I am by this means made fast from stirring." The reproach fell heavy upon faithful "Jack," and to clear himself, and give a new proof of his attachment to his royal master, he forthwith proposed the assassination of the colonel.

Charles did not receive the offer of his faithful valet with any show of indignation, but, on the contrary, listened to it with great bonignity. According to Ashburnham's own narrative, subsequently published, the king told him "that he had sent to Hampton for a vessel to transport him into France, and was in good hope to be supplied;" yet at the same time his majesty "very earnestly pressed to know how I would clear him of the governor." "I answered," says "Jack" the faithful, "that I was resolved and prepared to kill him and the captain with my own hands. His majesty—walking some few turns in the room, and, as he was afterwards pleased to tell me, weighing what I had proposed to him, and considering that if the ship should not come, it would not be many hours before some, in pursuance of him, would seize him, the consequence whereof he very much apprehended—resolved he would not have execution done upon the governor, for he intended to accept of what he had proffered, and go with him, and therefore commanded he should be called up." The valet bowed to the ground, and in accordance with the behest of the king went to summon the Isle of Wight governor, who did not dream how narrowly he had escaped being murdered. Charles received the colonel most graciously, smiling upon him as a dear old friend. "Hammond," he exclaimed, using the familiar tone, "after an intolerable restraint to my person at Hampton Court, I found there was a further design against my person by some which insinuated themselves into divers regiments of the army; and having an earnest desire of the settling of the kingdom in such sort as might best conduce to a lasting peace throughout my dominions, and not to be an instrument of stirring in a new war, I have thought good to come to this place, with confidence of your fidelity in protecting my person from danger, until, by such addresses as shall be made unto us by the parliament, there be a mutual agreement concluded, and our kingdom settled." The flattering speech did not make the governor forget his caution, and he merely replied that he would do "his utmost in fulfilling his majesty's just desires, in relation to the orders and directions he should receive from the parliament." It sounded not very reassuring. However, the king, with habitual dissimulation, professed to be mightily pleased at the reply, and declared his readiness to put himself at once under the protection of his presumed friend. Leaving the Southampton mansion, he stepped into the ready boat at Titchfield bay, and in the dark November evening was ferried across the sea to Cowes. Here he remained for the night, taking up his quarters at an ale-house, and the next morning was transferred to Carisbrook Castle under a guard of honour. His majesty had found another prison, not by any means as good as that from which he had escaped.

The king's flight was announced to the House of Commons by a short note from Oliver Cromwell, dated "Hampton Court, twelve at night, the 11th of November, 1647." "His majesty," Cromwell stated, "has withdrawn himself at nine o'clock. The manner is variously reported, and we will say little of it at present, but that his majesty was expected at supper, when the commissioners and Colonel Whalley missed him, upon which they entered the room. They found his majesty had left his cloak behind him in the gallery in the private way. He passed by the backstairs and vault towards the water-side." After the reading of the letter a vote was passed immediately, ordering all the ports to be shut, and all ships to be laid under embargo, so as to prevent the king's escape from the island. There was profound agitation in the house; but it was allayed at the end of three days, when there arrived a despatch from Colonel Hammond, "signifying that the king is come into the Isle of Wight." The same day on which this communication was made to parliament, Monday, the 15th of November, a subject almost more important than the flight of Charles engaged the whole attention of the commons, as well as the whole of the citizens of the capital. For some weeks past a strongly mutinous spirit had shown itself in several regiments of the army quartered near London, due, it was said, to the working of a new political sect that had arisen, the members of which went by the name of "the Levellers." Their chief aim was to organize a purely democratic government, to abolish the privileges of rank and birth, and establish perfect equality of all citizens before the law; and deeming that the simplest way of accomplishing this object was through the agency of the army, great efforts had been made to imbue the soldiers with the "levelling" spirit.

The ground thus sought was fully ready to receive the seeds, and in an extraordinarily short time a vast mass of the troops declared themselves in favour of entirely overturning the established order of things, and setting up instead new forms of political and social rule. A little more than a week before Charles's flight from Hampton Court, a deputation from the soldiers, consisting mainly of "adjutors," or "agitators," presented to General Fairfax two papers, the one entitled "the Case of the Army," and the other, "the Agreement of the People," stating their views and claims in firm terms. They demanded that a new constitution should be drawn up, establishing an English republic, and vesting the sovereign power of the state in the people and its representatives, the latter to be elected by household suffrage every three years. They also insisted upon extensive reforms of justice; security, for the lower classes as well as the higher, against arbitrary imprisonment; freedom from forced service in time of war; and, finally, complete liberty of conscience. The propositions went very much further than the majority of the House of Commons—made up of the moderate section of the Independents and such Presbyterians as had come to vote with them—had any desire to go, and on General Fairfax handing in the papers he had received, a storm of indignation broke loose. Both lords and commons passed resolutions declaring the proposals contained in "the Case of the Army," and "the Agreement of the People" destructive of all government, and expressing a wish that the commander-in-chief would forthwith suppress the function of the "agitators." Fairfax did so, but at the same time, to calm the ever-growing excitement by persuasive speech, ordered the greater part of the troops quartered near London, seven regiments altogether, to assemble for a general muster near the town of Ware, on the river Lea, about a day's march from London. The day appointed for the review was Monday, the 15th of November, and the early morning of it saw one half of the members of both houses of parliament on the road to Ware. The fugitive king for the moment was all but forgotten over the greater power, the mutinous army.

The seven regiments assembled, as ordered, "in Corkbush field, between Hertford and Ware," but with them came two more detachments of soldiers whose presence was neither desired nor requested by General Fairfax. They were a regiment of cavalry under Colonel Harrison, a stern republican, and a brigade of foot, commanded by John Lilburne, a distinguished soldier but vehement sectarian, who had contributed much to the victory of Long Marston Moor, and was looked upon generally as the chief of the "Levellers." The whole of the troops drew up quietly in Corkbush field, with the exception of the regiments of Harrison and Lilburne, who, from not having been summoned, arrived in a state of great excitement, every man having stuck on his helmet a copy of "the Agreement of the People," with the motto in front, "Liberty for England: their rights to the soldiers." Up and down their lines the "agitators" kept riding, encouraging the general exaltation, dwelling upon the justness of the demands of the army, and repeating everywhere that all true soldiers and Englishmen, having staked their lives in the overthrow of despotism, were bound now not to lay down the sword till the liberty of the country had been secured fully and for ever. In the midst of this fierce flare of political passions, Fairfax and Cromwell, accompanied by their staff, arrived on the ground, and ordering the troops to form a square, proceeded to read to them an address composed by the general council of officers. It was calm, but firm in tone, dwelling chiefly upon the dangers that would arise to the country from sedition among men whose highest duty was obedience; and while exhorting all to be quiet and submissive, ended with a promise that the just demands of the army should find full and warm advocacy in parliament, if the soldiers on their part would sign an engagement to return forthwith under the strict laws of discipline.

The address met with the most favourable reception, and even the troopers of Harrison's regiment, on hearing the promises made to all repeated to them from the lips of Fairfax, tore the "Agreement" from their helmets, exclaiming that they would be faithful to parliament and their generals. However, Lilburne's brigade of infantry still stood out, apparently more obstinate and rebellious than ever; and on Fairfax advancing in front of them, begging they would return to order and obedience, they greeted him with seditious shouts. Oliver Cromwell now galloped forward, resolution in his eye, and anger in every feature. "Take that paper from your hats!" he cried, his shrill voice dominating over the dull roar of the armed multitude. The command was not obeyed, most of the soldiers relapsing into grim silence, while a few broke out into shouts, assuming a menacing attitude. Cromwell could contain himself no longer, and dashing into the ranks of the mutinous troops, ordered eleven of the more conspicuous ring-leaders to be seized. It was accomplished without resistance from their comrades, and a court-martial having been formed on the spot, the eleven were tried for riot and sedition, and three of them condemned to be shot at once, in front of the army. After some further deliberation, the court resolved, on the intercession of Fairfax, to mitigate its sentence, ordering that only one of the three condemned men should be shot, the question as to who should be the victim, to be decided by a lottery between them. The fatal lot fell upon Richard Arnell, a brave soldier, and determined republican. Led out from the ranks, he saw the muskets of his comrades pointed to his breast without a stir, and sank in his blood with a last shout for the liberty of England. The vast crowd of armed men looked on in deep awe and horror, submitting to discipline, yet scarcely able to comprehend the fearful tragedy enacted before their eyes. If England was, as all expected, to become a republic, it seemed passing strange that the new era should commence with the shooting of a republican.

In breaking the mutinous spirit of the troops, Oliver Cromwell—upon whom all eyes had been directed for some time as both greatest military and civil leader, and as such, probable future ruler of England—played a somewhat vacillating part, not altogether free from the suspicion of dishonesty. While to all his intimate friends he made no secret that he was a republican at heart, and ready to subscribe to the main, if not to all the tenets of the democrats of the army, he at the same time regulated his more public utterances carefully, so as to be in accordance with the principles of the parliamentary majority, taking care not to say anything that might associate him with the dreaded "Levellers," the terror of all honest, middle-class citizens, before whose eyes the no-king system, with triennial parliaments and household suffrage, appeared like the forerunner of universal distribution of property. It was a course of no little difficulty which Cromwell had thus struck out for himself, but for some time he managed to keep in it with great skill, and broke down only when affairs had come to a crisis after the tragic incident on Corkbush field. The report of it was made by himself to the commons, earning the thanks of the house. However, in the very midst of this manifestation, he had to hear the sound of loud murmurs from both the extreme presbyterian and republican side of the house. Both parties had come deeply to mistrust his motives and his actions; and hesitating no longer to declare their suspicions, it was apparent that Cromwell would have to declare his policy frankly, unless he was prepared to succumb under the combined attacks of his old enemies and his old friends. For a moment he seemed as if in doubt which way to turn, but the short hesitation ended by his coming forth boldly as a representative of the demands of the army. That the essence of power was still, after all that had happened, residing with the army, he could not fail to perceive with his eagle glance, and he went to shape his objects accordingly. The first stupor produced by the shooting on Corkbush field having passed, deputation after deputation of soldiers and non-commissioned officers went to see him, declaring that no severity whatever would turn them from their great design of getting rid of the king and establishing a commonwealth of free citizens; and that if things should come to the worst, they would divide the army, being sure of two-thirds, and settle in another battle, or, if need be, in another score of battles, the great question as to whether England should be a monarchy or a republic. It was enough to decide Cromwell. He felt he was strong enough already to crush parliament, but he could never hope to conquer two-thirds of the great fighting host, his own Ironsides included, who had helped him to trample a crown in the dust. He hoped, with all the fervency of his passionate heart, to be one day a great statesman. However, as yet he was only a great general, and feeling powerless without the army, he went with the army.

Cromwell's movement towards the republican party had the effect of driving the House of Commons to make a final and almost desperate effort to come to an accommodation with the king. On the first report by Colonel Hammond that Charles had arrived in the Isle of Wight, stringent orders had been given, not only to secure his person, but to send his three attendants, Ashburnham, Berkeley, and Legge, as prisoners to London; but these injunctions were countermanded within a week, and others substituted, by which Hammond was to treat his prisoner with great respect, and to leave his servants near him, with a hint that fresh proposals for a "settlement of the nation" might be attended to favourably. The king took the suggestion with his usual eager and unreflecting haste, forthwith despatching Sir John Berkeley to the capital, intrusting to him letters to some of the chief Presbyterian leaders, as well as to Fairfax and Cromwell, of whose recent doings he was as yet ignorant. Fairfax had nothing but a stern military reply for the royal messenger. "We are the parliament's army," he exclaimed, "and we have no answer to give to the proposals of his majesty: our employers alone must judge of them." Cromwell spoke somewhat softer, if not quite so frankly, saying, "I will do my best to serve the king, but he must not expect that I shall ruin myself for his sake."

The reception given by the leaders of the moderate party in the commons to Charles's envoy was very different, they promising to strain every nerve to fulfil his majesty's wishes and bring about an accommodation. They fully kept their engagement; and after long and hot debates in the house, leading more than once to a disruption of all the old party ties, it was voted that four propositions should be presented to the king, in the form of bills, and that if he accepted them, he should be allowed his request to treat in person with the parliament. The propositions were, first, that the entire command of the sea and land forces should appertain to parliament for twenty years, with power of continuation thereafter in case the safety of the kingdom should require it; secondly, that his majesty should revoke all his declarations, proclamations, and other acts published against the two houses of parliament, imputing to them illegality and rebellion; thirdly, that his majesty should annul all the patents of peerage he had granted since the 20th of May, 1642, and grant no further peerages without the consent of parliament; and, fourthly, that the two houses should have the power of adjourning from place to place, at their discretion." Though opposed by both the extreme parties in the commons, and strongly protested against by the Scotch commissioners, who still claimed a right to interfere in all negotiations between the king and parliament, the Act embodying the four bills passed both houses by considerable majorities on the 14th December, and on the following day twelve commissioners, among them not less than eight earls, were appointed to carry the important document to the king. The twelve parliamentary envoys left London immediately with some pomp; but quietly in their wake, without any pomp, a deputation from the Scotch commissioners, consisting of three lords, set out for the Isle of Wight. They had proposals of their own to make, in rivalry to those of the parliament of England, thus starting a sharp competition for the favours of a king in prison.

Before either the commissioners of parliament or of Scotland had arrived at Carisbrook Castle, Sir John Berkeley had got back to the king, with full information of the designs of the competitive deputations. Charles was overwhelmed with joy at the news, which so unexpectedly renewed his old hope of his enemies hacking each other to pieces for his benefit. He had entertained just before thoughts of flying to France, but now resolved to postpone his escape for a short while. "I must wait," he said to Berkeley, "and settle with the Scots before I leave the kingdom; for if they once saw me out of the hands of the army they would double their demands." The parliamentary ambassadors and the Scots made their appearance almost simultaneously at Carisbrook, and to the first, Charles gave audience on Christmas eve. Having had their propositions read to him, he told them, full of smiles and grace, "he was assured that they could not expect a present reply, but he would take the same into consideration, and give his answer in a few days." The eight earls and their four colleagues of the lower house bowed and retired, after which the three Scotch lords were ushered in: They had a very simple, yet very weighty offer to make. It was that the king should bind himself to establish the Presbyterian system of church government under certain restrictions, one of them being that he himself and his family need not conform to it; and that in return, a Scotch army should invade England and reseat him on the throne.

The prospect of being able to raise another civil war, and revenge himself, sword in hand, upon all his foes, was too dazzling for Charles to be declined for a moment; and grasping his Scotch friends by the hand, he without hesitation accepted their terms. A complete treaty embodying them was prepared and ready for signature within twenty-four hours, and the instrument having been completed in due form, it was taken away by his majesty's valet, and buried for security in the garden of Carisbrook Castle. This little transaction finished, Charles once more received the parliamentary commissioners, more smiling and gracious than ever, handing to them a sealed envelope, which he said contained his reply. But they refused to receive it, declaring that they were not mere letter carriers, but compelled by their instructions to demand a direct and distinct answer to the propositions they had brought, further work they would have to undertake depending thereupon. Thus compelled, the king broke the seal of his letter and read it aloud. It was a clear and absolute refusal to accept the four bills. Silently the commissioners listened, and bowing low, retired from his majesty's presence, to hold a short conference with Colonel Hammond. An hour after, the tramp of horses in the courtyard announced their departure from Carisbrook Castle, on which Charles joyfully closeted himself with his confidential valet. It was arranged between them that they would make their escape from the island the same night in a French vessel, his majesty to reappear in his realm of England at the head of an army of his northern subjects. All was ready for the flight, when suddenly the tread of heavy footsteps and clang of arms was heard without. Astonished, Charles looked from his window, and beheld the castle gates closed, and the walls surrounded by guards, their polished muskets glittering in the evening sun. A trooper with drawn sword was pacing up and down on the piece of garden ground where lay the hidden document that was to give two kingdoms back to a subtle king. The trooper seemed to smile, and Charles hid his face in his hands.

In signing the secret treaty with the Scotch commissioners, the king had committed as one of the most treacherous, so one of the most fatal acts of his life. It was terrible blindness in Charles to suppose for a moment, that, watched as he was on all sides, his duplicity should remain unknown to the parliamentary commissioners, who, very naturally, were looking with intense suspicion upon the three northern lords who, unbidden, had followed them; and but for his constant practice of double-dealing, which had become part of his very nature, he must have seen that his whole course of action could lead to nothing but utter ruin. As it was, it required the stern evidence of loaded muskets and drawn swords under his window to prove the fact to the deluded monarch. The twelve parliamentary envoys, mostly high nobles, and all either Presbyterians or very moderate Independents, had come to Carisbrook Castle sincerely desirous, if not eager, to bring about an agreement between the king and the representatives of the nation; but they quitted the royal presence with loathing and disgust, leaving orders to Colonel Hammond to treat the prisoner under his charge with no further leniency, and to prevent his escape by every means. Returned to Westminster, the indignation which they felt came to be shared by the majority of both houses, giving rise to speeches such as had never before been heard within the walls of St. Stephen's.

The day after the commissioners had made their report, on the 3rd of January, 1648, Sir Peter Wroth, member for Bridgewater, a quiet country gentleman, whose voice was almost unknown in the House of Commons, arose in his seat, and gave vent to his feelings in words which seemed to come from the very heart of the assembly. "Mr. Speaker," cried the member for Bridgewater, "Bedlam was appointed for madmen, and Tophet for kings; but our kings of late have carried themselves as if they were fit for no place but Bedlam. I propose we lay the king by, and settle the kingdom without him. I care not what form of government you set up, so it be not by kings or devils." Henry Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, stood up after Sir Peter Wroth, speaking to the same effect, but with less excitement. "The king," argued he, "has denied safety and protection to his people by denying the four bills. Subjection to him is only in exchange of his protection to his people: this being denied by him, we may as well deny any more subjection to him, and settle the kingdom without him." Oliver Cromwell himself now arose, amidst the deepest silence of the house. "Mr. Speaker," he exclaimed, "the king is a man of great sense and of great talents; but so full of dissimulation, so false, that there is no possibility of trusting him. While he is protesting his love for peace, he is treating underhand with the Scottish commissioners to plunge the nation into another war. It is now expected the parliament should govern and defend the kingdom by their own power and resolution, and not teach the people any longer to expect safety and government from an obstinate man whose heart God hath hardened. The men who, at the expense of their blood, defended you from so many perils, will again defend you, with the same courage and fidelity, against all opposition. Teach them not, by neglecting your own and the kingdom's safety, in which their own is involved, to think themselves betrayed, and left hereafter to the rage and malice of an irreconcilable enemy, whom they have subdued for your sake. Let not despair teach them to seek their safety by any other means than adhering to you, who will not stick to yourselves." Having thrown out his rugged speech, Cromwell sat down, "with his hand on the hilt of his sword." No one rose after him, and the Speaker thereupon put the motion "to break off all intercourse with the king, and to make it high treason to address him without leave of the two houses of parliament" to the vote. The tellers counted one hundred and forty-two yeas, and ninety-two nays, or a majority of fifty in favour of the proposal of the member for Bridgewater, which was ordered thereupon to be sent to the lords, who likewise adopted it, against only two dissentients. The vote virtually made England a republic.

Immense agitation followed in the wake of the final parliamentary decision "to lay the king by." The monarchical feeling among the bulk of the people up to this time seemed to have been dormant rather than dead, and it now broke out with a strength which surprised the presbyterian party in parliament no less than the independents. Gatherings of excited crowds took place all over England as soon as it became known that kingship had been, or was to be abolished. At Colchester, Norwich, Canterbury, Maidstone, and many other places, the people broke out in open insurrection; several fortified towns of Wales, such as Pembroke, declared against parliament, expelling their garrisons, and hoisting the banner of King Charles; and, most important of all, the sailors of a portion of the fleet, comprising six men-of-war stationed at the mouth of the Thames, mutinied soon after against their officers, and ran away with the ships to Holland, putting them at the service of the prince of Wales. The general excitement was greatly increased by the news that there was likely to be an immediate war between England and Scotland. The Scottish commissioners, after returning from the Isle of Wight, and finding that the object of their journey had been frustrated, and was no longer a secret, appeared at first disposed to make attempts towards a reconciliation with the parliamentary majority; but seeing the sudden explosion of sympathy with the king, they changed their tactics, and all at once assumed a haughty air. Forestalling the accusations which they expected to be raised against them for planning another civil war, they shrewdly put themselves from the defensive into the offensive, charging the English executive with not having kept to the strict terms of the treaty of the previous year stipulating for the allowance of four hundred thousand pounds sterling as subsidies for their army, and demanding immediate payment of the arrears. High words ensued, and angry recriminations on both sides, ending in the departure of the envoys of Scotland to their own country, with the threat flung behind, that another army would soon cross the Tweed from the north.

The threat only served to embitter the sentiments of both houses of parliament against the king, and to drive the chief members of the government more and more to the extreme republican side. To them, as to all thinking men, it was manifest that in the dark aspect of political affairs, and general appeal to the sword, the army would soon be the chief, if not the only acting power in the state; and that therefore the policy advocated by the majority of soldiers and their chiefs would rule the realm. The soldiers, on their part, were not slow to express their political convictions, already sufficiently well known. On the 9th of January, six days after the passing of the vote "to lay the king by," a great deputation from the army, officers, privates, and non-commissioned officers, presented themselves at Westminster, to hand in an address to both houses. The address, on its heading, was stated to be, "A declaration from his excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax and the general council of the army, of their resolution to adhere to the parliament in their proceedings concerning the king," and it was couched throughout in the most energetic terms. "We do freely declare for ourselves and the army," said the signers of the declaration, "that we are resolved, through the grace of God, firmly to adhere to, and stand by the parliament in the things voted concerning the king, and in what shall be further necessary for the prosecution thereof, and for settling and securing of the parliament and the kingdom, without the king, and against him, or any other that shall hereafter partake with him." Plainspoken as was the address, neither the lords nor the commons hesitated to receive it with applause, and to express their satisfaction of it by votes of thanks to the army, passed by large majorities. The progress of opinion, from monarchy to republic, was evidently rolling on with terrific speed.

To prepare for the seemingly inevitable war with Scotland, as well as to gather power to suppress instantly the threatening risings of the old royalist factions, and of the multitudes suddenly inspired with sympathy for King Charles, the two houses of parliament decided, in the middle of January, to form a new executive, in place of the Committee of Both Kingdoms, left incomplete by the departure of the Scottish commissioners. The reconstituted government thus brought into life consisted of twenty members, seven of the upper and thirteen of the lower house, and was officially denominated the Committee for the Safety of the Commonwealth; but came to be known popularly, from the place where its meetings were held, as the Derby House Committee. Conspicuous among the twenty names to whom was intrusted the task of steering the vessel of state through the shoals and breakers now surrounding it on all sides, was that of Oliver Cromwell, and not many weeks elapsed before it became manifest to all eyes that he was the chief steersman at the helm. That he was not unworthy of the position, he proved immediately. His first effort was to put the army into good condition to take the field, and having accomplished this, in the course of the spring of 1648, he sent flying detachments into Kent, Essex, and some other of the eastern and south-eastern counties, where attempts at insurrection had taken place, and by a swift and energetic display of force quenched them in an instant. But nowhere had the Royalists, old and new, shown themselves in such strength as in South Wales, several of the strongest towns of which were in their possession, and to curb the revolt there, Cromwell put himself at the head of five regiments, and stormed westward in forced marches at the beginning of June. The bulwark of the insurgents in the west was Pembroke Castle, before which the general sat down; and taking it after a fortnight's siege, struck terror into the rest of the rebel forces, by putting all officers who had before served in the parliamentary army to the sword. "The persons exempted," he informed the Speaker of the House of Commons, in a letter dated the 11th of July, "are such as have formerly served you in a very good cause; but being now apostatized, I did rather make election of them, than of those who had always been for the king, judging their iniquity double, because they have sinned against so much light, and against so many evidences of divine providence going along with and prospering a just cause, in the management of which they themselves had a share." A week after penning this note all Wales was at the feet of Cromwell; but at the same moment the report arrived of the rising of two greater foes. Sitting at the castle of Pembroke, Oliver learnt that a Scottish army had crossed the Border, and that a Dutch-English fleet, under the command of the prince of Wales, had thrown anchor in the Downs.

The report of the invasion from Scotland gave rise to extreme terror all over the kingdom, and caused an immediate rising in London, which led to the presbyterian party once more getting the upper hand in parliament and reopening negotiations with the king. However, the attack from the north was far less formidable than either hoped by the friends or feared by the enemies of the king; and Cromwell, well informed in the matter, hesitated not to declare that he would drive the Scots back over the Border, and finish the war before the end of three months. In reality, it was but a small and comparatively powerless party in the Scottish nation and government which had any wish to restore Charles, and oppose the foundation of a free commonwealth in England; and all that the most zealous friends of the royal cause could effect, was to gather a body of fifteen thousand men, made up chiefly of raw levies, and only in a little part of veterans who had fought the battles of the Covenanters. The army of invasion, commanded by Charles's kinsman, the duke of Hamilton, crossed the Border on the 8th July, and at once advanced upon Newcastle, garrisoned by a few regiments of parliamentary troops, under General Lambert. The latter, in accordance with orders received from Cromwell, retired before the enemy, upon which the Scots pushed on to Durham, full of confidence, and not doubting that the road to the English capital was open before them.

But Cromwell already was on the march, to carry out the promise he had made of sweeping the new Royalists back to the north as fast as they had come. Starting from Pembroke on the 14th of July, he hurried, with a rapidity never before known, through Gloucester, Warwick, and Nottingham, to Doncaster, reaching the latter place with his horse in thirteen days, and effecting a junction with Lambert's cavalry. The foot, exhausted by the long tramp across England, came up a week after; and on the 7th of August the complete forces of Cromwell and Lambert joined hands at Knaresborough, forming, as recorded by an eyewitness, "a fine smart army, fit for action," but not more than nine thousand strong. In the mean time, while Cromwell was rushing north-westward, the Scots had proceeded slowly on their southern march, by way of Kendal and Hornby, halting at the latter place, to consider whether they should pass on through Lancashire, Cheshire, and the western counties, or through Yorkshire, and thence by the straight road to London. After some reflection, Hamilton chose the former route, against the advice of his officers, who held that Lancashire was dangerous, in case they should meet with any resistance, there being so many hedges and ditches to favour the parliament's "excellent firemen." However, Charles's kinsman would not listen, and pushed on in a most straggling manner to Preston, which he reached on Wednesday, the 16th of August, with the main body of his foot, the van of the horse having gone as far as Wigan, and the rear being behind at Kirkby Lonsdale. While thus stretched out, over a length of more than forty miles, Cromwell, who had been in search of the enemy for a week, came up with his "excellent firemen."

Though inferior in number, the compact body of veteran soldiers under Cromwell's command, falling upon the loose undisciplined masses that had crossed the Tweed, were all but certain of victory. In the straggling position in which the unskilfulness of their commander had placed them, the Scots could scarcely fight, but only submit to be killed; and killed they were accordingly, in a murderous charge, extending over three days, and called by the victorious party the rout of Preston. Descending the valley of the Ribble, Cromwell dashed in upon the main body of the Scotch army a little to the southward of Preston, on Thursday, the 17th of August, and attacking it fiercely, at once cut it into two, driving one part in wild confusion to the north, and the other, in still wilder disorder, to the south. Hamilton himself, heading the majority of the fugitives, fled on the road to Wigan, and having gathered some eight or nine thousand men around him near Standish, offered battle a second time to his pursuers, on Friday, the 18th of August. The result was even more fatal than the preceding day, the Scots being hewn down, wherever they attempted resistance, by the swords of the victorious Ironsides, whom Cromwell was leading to the charge. But a few regiments escaped, and succeeded in reaching Wigan, where their van was stationed, among the officers of which was Sir James Turner, "a stout pedant and soldier of fortune." Of the scenes that took place, when his unfortunate countrymen were rushing frantically into the town, Sir James left a striking description. "It was night," he says, "but the moon shone bright. A regiment of horse of our own appeared first, riding very disorderly. I got them to stop, and I commanded my pikemen to open, and give way for them to ride or run away, since they would not stay. But now my pikemen, being demented, as I think we were all, would not hear me, and two of them ran full tilt at me. One of their pikes, which was intended for my belly, I gripped with my left hand; the other ran me nearly two inches into the inner side of my right thigh, all of them crying, 'These are Cromwell's men.' While the Scots were thus, in mad consternation, falling upon and killing their own officers, Cromwell, whose very name was striking terror among them, was not ceasing his pursuit for a moment; and on Saturday, the 19th of August, engaged the flying enemy in a third battle at the village of Winwick, three miles north of Warrington. Like men driven to despair, with nothing but death visible on all sides, the Scots here made a last furious resistance, fighting, according to Cromwell's own account, with the utmost heroism.

"They maintained themselves," Cromwell reported to the Honourable William Lenthall, esquire, Speaker of the House of Commons, under date of August 20th, 1648, "with great resolution for many hours, ours and theirs coming to push of pike and very close charges, which at one time forced us to give ground. But our men, by the blessing of God, quickly recovered it, and charging home upon them, beat them from their standing, where we killed about a thousand of them, and took about two thousand prisoners, and prosecuted them home to Warrington town, where they possessed the bridge, which had a strong barricade and a work upon it, formerly very defensive." Further resistance on the part of the Scots had now become impossible, and the chief officer of the flying host, General Baillie, immediately after getting into Warrington, sent a message to Cromwell, "desiring some capitulation." "To which I yielded," Oliver goes on to report to the honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons. "Considering the strength of the pass," he continues, "and that I could not go over the river, within ten miles of Warrington, with the army, I gave him these terms: That he should surrender himself and all his officers prisoners of war, with all his arms, and ammunition, and horses, to me, I giving quarter for life, and promising civil usage. Which accordingly is done; and the commissioners deputed by me have received, and are receiving, all the arms and ammunition, which will be, as they tell me, about four thousand complete arms and as many prisoners. And thus you have their infantry completely ruined." The remainder of the Scotch troops, comprising the flower of the cavalry, and some of the principal officers, among them the duke of Hamilton, surrendered a few days after at Uttoxeter, and were sent as prisoners to Nottingham Castle. In less than a fortnight, every trace of the invading army had been annihilated; upon which Cromwell, bent upon healing wounds, as well as preventing further evil, determined to pursue his victorious career into Scotland. "I can say nothing," he wrote to his worthy friend, Oliver St. John, esquire, solicitor-general, just before starting for the north, "but surely the Lord our God is a great and glorious God. He only is worthy to be feared and trusted, and His appearances particularly to be waited for. He will not fail His people. Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord."

The defeat of the Scots saved England from a double invasion. While Cromwell was driving Hamilton's soldiers before him in Lancashire, the fleet which had come over from the Netherlands, under the command of the prince of Wales, was lying idle in the Downs, quite strong enough to sail up the River Thames and make an attempt upon London, but waiting, before doing so, to hear of the approach of the Scottish army to the capital. There was not a little mystery, which neither friends nor foes could solve, connected with the movements of this Anglo-Dutch fleet. It was believed to be entirely in the pay of the French government, and mainly under the direction of Henrietta Maria, who at first intended to make her favourite, Harry Jermyn, commander-in-chief; but having to desist from this plan, by a general outcry of the whole royalist body, had put her eldest son in his place. Nothing would have been easier for this great naval armament than to have taken the king out of his prison in the Isle of Wight, an act demanded by Charles himself in the most urgent manner. However, the queen—for reasons indicated by general rumour, which coupled her name constantly with that of Jermyn, once a groom and now a lord—would not consent to even an endeavour being made to save her husband. "It cannot be imagined," says Clarendon, faithful adherent of the royal cause, "how wonderfully fearful some persons in France were that he [the king] should have succeeded in his escape, and the dread they had of his coming thither;" and this being so, strict orders were given that the fleet should remain in the Downs. All that the prince of Wales did while lying here, in daily expectancy of news of Scottish victories, was to demand heavy contributions from the merchants of London, threatening that, if refused, he would burn all vessels belonging to them which he could seize. But he got nothing by the step, his attitude not being sufficiently martial to inspire fear even in ship-brokers. In the meanwhile, the House of Commons made the greatest efforts to bring together a sufficient number of men-of-war to drive the hostile fleet from the mouth of the Thames; and the sought-for reinforcements having come up from all quarters, the earl of Warwick, lord high-admiral of the parliamentary navy, made preparations to attack the enemy at the end of July. But at the moment everything was ready, the report arrived of the victories of Cromwell at Preston, Wigan, and Warrington, which had no sooner been brought to the prince of Wales, than he left his anchoring place in the Downs and sailed back to the Texel. Warwick followed close in the rear of the retreating fleet, avoiding all collision; and when the ships belonging to the English portion of it had cast anchor once more in Dutch harbours, he sent emissaries among the crews, to persuade them to return to their own country, under promise of full pardon. The measure was completely successful, leading to the recovery of most of the vessels, and of nearly every man who had deserted from the national fleet.

The prince of Wales, having got back safely to Holland, with apparently not a thought of the captive parent behind him, assumed great airs, and on the 21st of September, as recorded by one of his adherents,

"entered the Hague in thirty coaches." On the same day, Oliver Cromwell, at the head of four regiments of horse and six of foot, started out of Berwick, and "the Tweed being fordable," made his entry into Scotland, without the least opposition. To show that he was coming more as a friend than a foe, Cromwell, on passing the Border, issued a proclamation, which was scattered in numerous copies among the people. "Whereas we are marching," it ran, "with the parliament's army into the kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of the remaining part of the enemy who lately invaded the kingdom of England, and for the recovery of the garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle: These are to declare, that if any officer or soldier under my command shall take or demand any money, or shall violently take any horses, goods, or victual, without order, or shall abuse the people in any sort, he shall be tried by a council of war, and the said person so offending shall be punished according to the articles of war made for the government of the army in the kingdom of England, which punishment is death. Given under my hand, this 21st of September, 1648. Oliver Cromwell."

Reconciling the population by keeping to the promises thus made, and upholding the most vigorous discipline among his troops, Cromwell met with no opposition whatever in his march to the Scottish capital, where he was received with great demonstrations of honour and even affection. Before his arrival, the government had been entirely remodelled, in a sense favourable to England; and Cromwell found no difficulty in procuring assent to all his demands, tending to effect an intimate union between the rulers at Edinburgh and the Independent party in the House of Commons. In a letter to the Speaker, under date of the 9th of October, the victorious lieutenant-general reported the immediate result of his march over the Border. "All the enemy's forces in Scotland," he wrote, "are now disbanded. The Committee of Estates have declared against all of that party's sitting in parliament. Good elections are made in divers places of such as dissented from, and opposed the late wicked engagement, and they are now raising a force, of about four thousand horse and foot. Until they can complete it, they have desired me to leave them two regiments of light horse and two troops of dragoons, which accordingly I have resolved, conceiving I had warrant by your late votes so to do." The week after sending this report, Cromwell quitted Edinburgh, conducted some miles southward by the chiefs of the government. His task in Scotland was finished, and another no less important one awaited him in England.

His splendid victories in Lancashire, astonishing even to those who had not been in doubt before of his being the greatest military leader of the age, had made Cromwell all at once the first man in England; but while doing this, had not subdued the rancour of either his personal or his political enemies, both, for natural causes, very numerous. Being fully, aware that unless hurled down immediately from the height to which he had risen, the lieutenant-general would infallibly set his iron heel upon their necks, they resolved to make a violent effort to carry out their object, taking advantage for this purpose of his temporary absence in the northern kingdom. At the beginning of August, Major Huntingdon, a conspicuous member of the presbyterian party, publicly denounced Cromwell, in a memorial addressed to the House of Lords, as an intriguer aiming to clutch the supreme power in the state, using the cloak of religion to cover his ambitious designs, unprincipled in all his words and actions, and ready to stamp out, by the brute force of the soldiery, of which he had made himself the master, both royal and parliamentary rule. The lords, inimical in their majority to the great plebeian general, after some slight hesitation ordered the memorial to be read, and Huntingdon made oath on its truth on the 8th of August. It was next attempted to bring the paper before the commons; but here the major and his friends were less successful, although there was a large party in the house eager to assist them in their designs. But the latter were timorous. Already the name of Cromwell had become a power before which most men trembled; and the Speaker, the serjeant at-arms, and every other officer of the house refusing even to touch the Huntingdon memorial, it had to be laid aside.

Thus baffled in their objects, the opponents of the victorious general, and of the democratic principle which he represented, had recourse in the last instance to the means already so often and so ineffectually tried to the same end, that of entering into negotiations with the king. By making a great effort, the Presbyterians succeeded in passing a hurried vote through the House of Commons, ordering the appointment of fifteen envoys, who were to proceed at once to the Isle of Wight to treat with Charles, submitting conditions of peace more favourable than any that had yet been offered to him. The vote was looked upon as a direct challenge to the leaders of the Independent party, and the news of it brought the army once more into an aggressive attitude towards the parliamentary majority. "They are plodding," said General Ludlow to Sir Thomas Fairfax, "to betray the cause for which so much blood has been shed: they will have peace at any price. The king, being a prisoner, will not think himself bound by his promises; even those who most urge negotiations care little about making him fulfil them; and to employ his name and authority to destroy the army is their only aim. But the army has achieved power, and must make use of it to prevent its own ruin and that of the nation."

The report of what was going on at Westminster made Cromwell hasten back from Scotland faster than he originally intended; and on the 14th of October he arrived at Carlisle, where he stayed for several days, reflecting on the immediate course to be pursued. His friends urged him to proceed at once to the head-quarters of the army, at St. Albans, where a great plan of campaign for counteracting the designs of the Presbyterians was in open preparation; but Cromwell, wary as ever, and careful not to give any cause for attack to his enemies in parliament, hesitated to compromise himself too much, and to shape a middle course, went into Wales, nominally to undertake the siege of Pontefract Castle, the only stronghold in the Principality which had not yet surrendered to his troops. His caution had no effect in damping the ardour of Sir Thomas Fairfax and the other army leaders to commence the struggle upon which they were bent; and learning that the parliamentary envoys who had been sent to the king were making rapid progress in their negotiations, they resolved upon immediate action. As a commencement, the various regiments quartered in the neighbourhood of the capital sent in petitions to the House of Commons, demanding in stern language the punishment of "all delinquents," and settlement of a new order of government. No notice being taken of these petitions, a general address from the army followed, still more austere and explicit, condemning the treaty that was being negotiated as dangerous to the liberty of the people, and declaring that it was a duty imposed upon the soldiers by God, who had given them the victory, to call the king to strict account for all the blood which had been shed during the civil war. The address eliciting no reply from parliament, the army leaders consolidated their strength for action by establishing a council of war, the first result of whose deliberations was the drawing up of a great Remonstrance, which was delivered to the commons on the 21st of November.

The Remonstrance, after enumerating the evils from which the country was suffering, demanded that "the capital and grand author of them all" should be brought to trial for the blood that had been shed in his name, and the murders committed by his order; and that, the requirements of justice having been fulfilled, a new parliament, sprung from general suffrage, should elect the future ruler of England, circumscribing his power so as to make it impossible that he should become an arbitrary despot, and investing him instead with the higher function of acting as the chief representative of the national will. The reading of the Remonstrance caused intense agitation in the House of Commons, it being evident to the members of both the great parties that the hour for the now inevitable contest with the army was near at hand. At first the Presbyterians, driven into desperation, made men as if inclined to hasten on the struggle, and a proposition, that the generals and officers who had signed the Remonstrance should be proclaimed traitors, was well supported by the members of the party. However, the courage thus shown cooled down in discussions extending over a whole week, at the end of which a proposition for the indefinite adjournment of the debate was adopted by a large majority. But with it passed another vote, giving new instructions to the parliamentary commissioners in the Isle of Wight, and urging them to hasten with all possible speed the conclusion of the treaty with the king. The vote brought matters to a crisis. Westminster desired speed, and St. Albans could not be behind in the race. There was a short sitting of the council of war, and at it the resolution was passed to strike—and to strike high.

At dawn of day on the morning of Wednesday, the 29th of November, the king, who had been allowed to go, during the negotiations with the parliamentary commissioners, from Carisbrook Castle to the neighbouring town of Newport, where a small court was attending upon him, was startled from his slumbers by a great clamour of voices. It had been a night of storm and pouring rain, and Charles, resting lightly, had been more than once awoken by the noise outside, so that the new disturbance made him at once rise from his bed. A few moments more, and steps were heard in the passage, after which there came a loud knocking at the door of the royal apartment. "Who is there?" demanded the duke of Richmond, one of the courtiers in attendance upon Charles. "Officers from the army," was the reply, "who want to speak with the king." The answer did not appear quite satisfactory to the duke, and he hesitated to open the door. However, the strangers outside continuing their importunity, Charles finally ordered to let them in. Upon this, a dozen military men of rank, headed by a lieutenant-colonel, John Cobbett, strode into the room. Saluting the king, Cobbett exclaimed, "Sir, we have orders to remove you." "Orders!" cried Charles: "From whom?" "From the army," was the reply. "Whither am I to be removed?" inquired the king, looking about anxiously, in great trepidation. "To the castle," said Cobbett. "What castle?" continued Charles, more and more agitated. "To the castle," the lieutenant colonel contented himself to repeat, evidently unwilling to divulge secrets. But the king was persistent. "To what castle are you going to take me?" he asked, pitcously: "I am ready to follow you to any castle, but name it." There was a short whispering among the officers, ending in one of them pronouncing the name, "Hurst Castle." "They could not name a worse place," said Charles, addressing the duke of Richmond, and then lapsed into moody silence.

One of the servants approaching, the king roused himself, crying, "I know not where these people intend to carry me, and would willingly eat before I go; therefore give me something to eat." The attendant bowed and retired; but half an hour elapsing without the arrival of the breakfast ordered by Charles, the officers got impatient, and told him that the time for departure had come. Without further ceremony, the king, accompanied by two of his immediate attendants, was hurried to a coach standing at the outer gate, and driven off, guarded by Cobbett and a troop of horse. The coach went westward to a place called Worsley's Tower, in Freshwater Isle, a little beyond Yarmouth Haven, where, after an hour's stay, Charles was put into a vessel and ferried across to Hurst Castle on the opposite shore. The appearance of the small fortress, as well as of its commander, who stood at the gate to receive him, struck terror into the king's mind. As described by one of the companions of Charles, the governor's "look was stern; his hair and large beard were black and bushy; he held a partisan in his hand, and, Switz-like, had a great basket-hilt sword at his side." The king feared more than anything else to fall a victim to secret assassination, but his apprehensions in this respect were utterly groundless. The friends of Charles, at the very moment, were committing murder more unscrupulously than ever; and only a few weeks before the arrest of Charles, one of Cromwell's best officers, Colonel Rainsborough, had been treacherously killed by Royalists at Doncaster; but the thought of foully slaying their opponents, even in retaliation, never entered the minds of the leaders of the Independents and their representatives in the army. They had made war upon despotism for years, and were warring still, yet meant to fight only as they had always fought, in the open light of day.

The news of the seizure of the king, and transference to Hurst Castle, arrived at Westminster on the 1st of December, at a moment when the commons were hotly debating whether the last concessions he had made to their commissioners should be accepted or not. With his habitual hypocrisy, Charles had agreed to many things which, as revealed in his letters to the queen, he had not the least intention to keep; however, beginning to feel elated with the advance made by parliament, he had not conceded all that was demanded, and the question to be decided was, whether what he offered should be accepted or not, as preliminaries of the treaty to be concluded. The chiefs of the majority knew fully that the game they were playing was desperate, and that having set everything upon one stake, they must either gain all or lose all, so that every nerve was strained by them and their followers to obtain the victory. After a debate of all but unexampled vehemence, extending over three days and one whole night, they gained their point, passing a vote of one hundred and forty against one hundred and four that the king's terms should be accepted, and he be invited to come to London. But while the commons were engaged in heated discourse, the army had put itself silently in movement upon the capital. The vote for the restoration of Charles was recorded at five o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, the 5th of December; and, two hours after, seven regiments of horse and foot lay coiled around Westminster. At daybreak on Wednesday, General Skippon, old commander of the city train bands, hitherto the faithful guard of parliament, bid them go home to their families; and the last of the armed citizens having turned his back upon St. Stephen's, their place was taken by a division of the troops from St. Albans, a regiment of horse, under Colonel Rich, being stationed outside the houses of parliament, in Palace Yard, and a regiment of foot, commanded by Colonel Pride, inside, within the precincts of Westminster Hall. At nine o'clock, lieutenant-general Cromwell, who had arrived with the army, went to take his seat among the commons, following in the wake of Colonel Pride, who had posted himself at the door of the house half an hour before. The gallant colonel was preparing for a great political operation, famous ever after as "Pride's purge."

The operation was a very simple one, and though pre-eminently grave, not altogether devoid of humour. Colonel Pride held in his hand a long list containing the names of all those members of the lower house of parliament who wished to see King Charles back upon the throne; and for the purpose of identifying them, he had two persons at his side, Lord Grey of Groby, a staunch Independent, and the doorkeeper of the commons. As member after member approached, some light-hearted, others lost in thought, the name of each was given to the colonel, who thereupon looked at his list, to find out whether it was there or not. In the negative case, there followed a military salute, and the representative of the nation was allowed to proceed; but if otherwise, he was told to go back, and, if refusing, handed over to a guard of soldiers, who quickly conducted him to the outer gate. In this summary way, forty-one members were excluded from the House of Commons on the morning of Wednesday, the 6th of December, and one hundred and two more the next day, when "Pride's purge" got finished to his own satisfaction and that of his friends. Most of the ejected representatives, including the chief leaders of the Presbyterian party, left the capital very quietly; but a few of the more impetuous members, who attempted to stir up the city in their favour, were put into temporary confinement, in which they received the spiritual consolations of the Rev. Hugh Peters, chaplain to Sir Thomas Fairfax, who the day after preached at St. Paul's. His text was the end of the one hundred and forty-ninth Psalm: "Let the saints be joyful in glory; let them sing aloud upon their beds. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand, to execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; to execute upon them the judgment written, this honour have all his saints. Praise ye the Lord!"

Hugh Peters was not in vain preaching on the text of the psalmist to "bind kings with chains." Holding the strong and honest belief that nothing but the death of Charles could save the nation from a revival of despotism, inasmuch as there would always be a party, as long as he was alive, ready to seat him on the throne, and whatever agreements and conventions might be made to reduce his power, his boundless duplicity would not fail to destroy all safeguards, the leaders of the Independent party prepared his trial as soon as they had seized the supreme power by the expulsion of the Royalists and Presbyterians from the House of Commons. One of the first acts of the reduced parliament, which the people came to denominate "the Rump," was a resolution declaring the half-prepared treaty of the Isle of Wight "a monstrous error, a dishonour, and a great peril to the country ;" and this was followed by a vote ordering the removal of the king from Hurst Castle to Windsor. In conformity with it, a troop of horse, commanded by Major Harrison, made its appearance at the small fortress which Charles had entered tremblingly on the 18th of December, and to his delight, conducted him away to the ancient residence of the kings of England. On the road, at Bagshot, the seat of Lord Newburgh, with whom Charles had been long in secret correspondence, an attempt was made to procure his escape; but he himself prevented it, his anticipations running as high as ever that he would soon be seated on the throne, and able to take revenge upon all his enemies. He told his friends "that he had yet three games to play, the least of which left hope of regaining all;" in reply to which Lord Newburgh could do nothing but bow, and unsaddle the swift horses which he had held ready for the flight of his sovereign. Met along the road by crowds, which increased as they came nearer to the capital, Major Harrison's troopers slowly conducted the king to Windsor, treating him very deferentially, but keeping their pistols sharp loaded in the holster, as if dimly suspecting his "three games." On the 23rd of December Charles was safely lodged in the royal castle, and on the same day the House of Commons appointed a committee of thirty-eight of its members "to consider of drawing up a charge against the king, and all other delinquents that may be thought fit to bring to condign punishment."

On the first day of the year 1649, the thirty-eight delivered in their report, which was immediately adopted by the house, and issued in the form of an ordinance commanding the trial of "Charles Stuart." It was stated in the preamble, "that the said Charles Stuart, being admitted king of England, and therein trusted with a limited power to govern by and according to the laws of the land, and not otherwise, and by his trust, oath, and office, being obliged to use the power committed to him for the good and benefit of the people, and for the preservation of their rights and liberties; yet nevertheless, out of a wicked design to erect and uphold in himself an unlimited and tyrannical power to rule according to his will, and to overthrow the rights and liberties of his people, yea, to take away and make void the foundations thereof, and of all redress and remedy of misgovernment, which, by the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, were reserved on the people's behalf, in the right and power of frequent and successive parliaments, or national meetings in council: he, the said Charles Stuart, for the accomplishing of such of his designs and for the protecting of himself and his adherents in his and their wicked practices, to the same ends hath traitorously and maliciously levied war against the present parliament and the people therein represented." On the basis of this preamble, the ordinance provided for the establishment of a special High Court of Justice, to try the question of fact as to whether Charles Stuart, king of England, had or had not been guilty of the treason of levying war against the nation. The day after it had been passed, the 2nd of January, the bill was sent from the commons to the lords, but, as expected beforehand, was dismissed immediately by the peers. Thereupon the members of the lower house assembled within closed doors, and passed a portentous resolution. It was to the effect, "that the commons of England, in parliament assembled, do declare that the people are, under God, the origin of all just power; and do declare that the commons of England, in parliament assembled, being chosen to represent the people, have the supreme power in this nation; and do further declare that whatsoever is enacted as law by the commons of England, in parliament assembled, hath the force of law, and all the people of this nation are bound thereby, although the consent and concurrence of king or House of Peers be not had thereunto." Thus the lords were annihilated before the axe was laid on the throne.

The formal Act for the trial of the king and constitution of the already decreed High Court of Justice was passed by the commons on the 6th of January. By the terms of the Act, the High Court was made to consist of one hundred and thirty-five judges, or commissioners, any twenty of which were empowered to act in the name of the whole body. The list of commissioners, who were appointed at once, included three generals, Cromwell, Fairfax, and Ireton, and thirty-four colonels of the army; and for the rest was made up of country gentlemen, lawyers, merchants, and the principal members of the House of Commons. There were three serjeants-at-law among the number, Bradshaw, Nicholas, and Thorpe; three lords, Lisle, Mounson, and Grey of Groby; four aldermen of the city of London, Andrews, Fowkes, Pennington, and Wilson; and twenty-two baronets, knights, and younger sons of peers. The commissioners, assembling for the first time on the 8th of January, elected Serjeant John Bradshaw, member of an old Cheshire family, and a lawyer of high repute, to be their lord-president; while four other lawyers, Coke, Steele, Aske, and Donilaus, were appointed to conduct the prosecution. All preliminaries having been completed, a herald-at-arms followed by an officer of the House of Commons bearing the mace on his shoulder, and preceded by mounted guards, rode, high on horseback, into Westminster Hall, and amidst the sound of trumpets announced the forthcoming trial of Charles Stuart, king of England, inviting all men to bring in what evidence they might possess towards the charge or discharge of the accused. While the trumpets were quavering in the great hall, and the herald reading his proclamation, the commons in the adjoining building voted, on the proposition of Henry Marten, member for Berkshire, that the great seal of state hitherto in use should be destroyed, and another substituted in its stead. The new instrument was ordered to bear the inscription on one side, "The great seal of England," and on the other, "In the first year of freedom, by God's blessing restored."

The place appointed for the sittings of the High Court of Justice was at the upper end of Westminster Hall, on the site of the courts of King's Bench and Chancery, the partition between which was taken down, so as to throw the two into one vast chamber. The space thus obtained was divided, by strong bars placed across its breadth, about forty feet from the north end, into two compartments of unequal size, the first, or smallest one, under the great window, being reserved for the court itself; and the other, opening by a wide Gothic portal into Westminster Hall, for the public and soldiers, the latter again separated from each other by a low railing. A raised platform, with a crimson velvet seat on it, was placed in the centre of the compartment reserved for the High Court, as the seat of the lord-president; while a number of benches, rising in the form of an amphitheatre, around and behind him, were reserved for the judges, facing whom, and separated from them by an open space, containing nothing but a square table, was the arm-chair, railed in by a bar, assigned to the king. The drawing up of a heavy mass of documentary evidence delayed the opening of the trial till Saturday, the 20th of January, on which day, Charles, having been previously escorted from Windsor Castle to St. James's Palace, was led to his velvet-covered arm-chair, somewhat throne-like in appearance, the great Gothic portal, leading into Westminster Hall, having been previously thrown open, giving ingress to a vast crowd of people, who were kept in order and silence by a numerous body of halibordiers. The king was brought into court by a guard of thirty-two officers, under Colonel Hacker, and having been received by the serjeant-at-arms, bearing the mace, was conducted by the latter to his chair. After gazing with an expression of contempt upon the judges, Charles seated himself for a moment, but presently rose again, and turning round, began to examine the crowd at his back. There was a sea of hard, thoughtful, many-wrinkled Puritan faces, but apparently few among them able to comprehend the doctrine of kings being persons of semi-divine nature, irresponsible for their deeds; and having gazed at the multitude for a minute or two, Charles sat down once more, his countenance full of lofty disdain.

After a minute's silence, John Bradshaw arose on his seat, addressing the king, who was fronting him with angry look, his hat drawn over his eyes, and twirling in his hands a gold-headed cane in the form of a sceptre. "Charles Stuart, king of England," exclaimed the lord-president, "the commons of England, being deeply sensible of the calamities that have been brought upon this nation, which are fixed upon you as the principal author of them, have resolved to make inquisition for blood; and, according to that debt and duty they owe to justice, to God, the nation, and themselves, they have resolved to bring you to trial and judgment, and for that purpose have constituted this High Court of Justice, before which you are brought." Charles sat still while being addressed, looking at the judges with an ineffable air of disdain; but he sprang up a moment after, when John Coke, one of the public prosecutors, acting as attorney-general, who was standing near him, began to read the act of accusation. On Coke commencing, "My lord, I am come to charge Charles Stuart, king of England, in the name of all the commons of England, with treason and high misdemeanours," the king interrupted him, and, lifting his cane, struck him several times on the shoulder, while crying, "Hold! hold!" Coke turned round, surprised and irritated, and the movement twisting the gold-headed stick which Charles was swinging, its top fell off on the ground. At sight of the fancy sceptre rolling at his feet, the king's face got suddenly pale, deep consternation being marked in all his features; and an attendant approaching to pick up the little piece of gold, he hastily bent forward himself to do so, and then leaning back in his seat, appeared for some minutes to be lost in thought. Though with little faith in justice and truth, Charles profoundly believed in evil omens.

The attorney-general, as soon as the king had relapsed into some propriety of behaviour, began anew the act of accusation. It enumerated the various contests and battles of the civil war, specifying those of Nottingham, Edge Hill, and Keynton Field, of Newbury, of Leicester, of Marston Moor, and of Naseby, in all which, it was said, "he, Charles Stuart, king of England, caused thousands of the free people of the nation to be slain, and by divisions within the land, invasions from foreign parts, and other means, carried on the said wars by land and sea; and particularly for that purpose gave commissions to his son, his nephew, the Prince Rupert, and others. By which unnatural wars much innocent blood of the free people of this nation hath been spilt, families undone, the public treasury wasted and exhausted, trade decayed, and parts of the land spoiled even to desolation." "All which wicked designs and wars," the charge concluded, "were carried on for the advancement of a personal interest of will and power, and a pretended prerogative to himself and his family, against the liberty and peace of the nation, by and for whom he was intrusted with a limited power to govern according to the laws. And for the said treasons and crimes, the commons, in parliament assembled, have impeached and do impeach the said Charles Stuart as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the commonwealth of England, and ordered that he shall be put to answer the promises, and that proceedings shall be had in conformity with justice and the laws." During the reading of the charge, Charles seemed completely unmoved, "looking," as described by an eye-witness, "sometimes on the High Court, sometimes up to the galleries, and sometimes, rising, turned about to behold the guards and spectators." On the attorney-general pronouncing the words "tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public and implacable enemy to the commonwealth of England," the king appeared greatly amused. "He laughed," as stated by the same eye-witness, "in the face of the court."

The reading of the act of accusation having come to an end, lord president Bradshaw once more addressed Charles. "You have heard," he said briefly, "the charge against you delivered, and the court now expects your answer." The king hesitated for a moment, and then began, confused and stuttering, "I would know by what power I am called hither? I was not long ago in the Isle of Wight: how I came there is a longer story than is fit at this time for me to speak of; but there I entered into a treaty with both houses of parliament, with as much public faith as it is possible to be had of any people in the world. I treated there with a number of honourable lords and gentlemen, and treated honestly and uprightly. I cannot say but they did very nobly with me, and we were upon the conclusion of a treaty. Now I would know by what authority, I mean lawful—there are many unlawful authorities in the world, thieves and robbers by the highways—but I would know by what authority I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place, and when I know by what lawful authority, I shall answer." Here Charles made a short pause, and then continued, with rather untimely pathos, bringing up the divine-right doctrine, "Remember, I am your king, your lawful king, and what sins you bring upon your heads, and the judgment of God upon this land. Think well upon it, I say, think well upon it, before you go further from one sin to a greater. Let me know by what lawful authority I am seated here, and I shall not be unwilling to answer. In the mean time, I have a trust committed to me by God, by old and lawful descent, and I will not betray it to answer to a new unlawful authority. Therefore resolve me that, and you shall hear more of me." To which Bradshaw replied, "Sir, if you had been pleased to have observed what was said to you by the court at your first coming hither, you would have known by what authority—which authority requires you, in the name of the people of England, of which you are elected king, to answer." "I deny that," cried Charles; and, continuing in the same strain, went on to assert his irresponsibility as a king, till at last Bradshaw told him that he could be heard no longer. "The court expects you," said the lord-president, "to give them a final answer, and will adjourn for that purpose till Monday next. If you do not satisfy yourself, we are satisfied with our authority, which is that of God and the nation." Charles was about to begin again, but on a sign from the president, the guards approached and marched him off through the dense crowd of people in the rear, a few of whom exclaimed, as he passed along, "God save the king!" while others shouted "Justice! justice!"

On Sunday, the 21st of January, the judges of the High Court held a fast together at Whitehall, the chaplain of the commander-in-chief, Hugh Peters, preaching before them on the text of the ninth chapter of Genesis: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." On Monday morning the court held a private sitting in the Painted Chamber, and in the afternoon Charles was again brought before it, seventy commissioners of the whole number being present. The space allowed to spectators was more densely crowded than on the Saturday, but the king this time seemed to shrink from the public gaze, seemingly lost in thought. Silence having been proclaimed by the serjeant-at-arms in the usual form, the lord-president began to address Charles. "Sir," he exclaimed, "you may remember at the last court you heard a charge read against you containing an accusation of high treason and other crimes against this realm of England; you heard likewise that it was prayed, on behalf of the people, that you should give an answer to that charge. You were then pleased to make some scruples concerning the authority of this court, saying you knew not by what authority you were brought hither; and you were answered that it was by authority of the commons of England, assembled in parliament, that did think fit to call you to account for those high and capital misdemeanours wherewith you were then charged. Since that, the court has taken into consideration what you then said: they are fully satisfied with their own authority, and they hold it fit you should stand satisfied with it too. They do expect you should either confess or deny the charge: if you deny, it is offered, on behalf of the kingdom, to be made good against you. Their authority they do avow to the whole world, and the nation being satisfied with it, so you are to rest satisfied." The president having ceased speaking, Charles appeared to hesitate for a while, but after a short reflection repeated what he had said two days before, that the High Court had no "legality," and that "a king cannot be tried by any jurisdiction on earth." After discoursing for a while in this strain, Bradshaw cried, "I must interrupt you, Sir, which I would not do but that what you say is not agreeable to the proceedings of any court of justice. You are entering into arguments and disputes concerning the authority of this court, before whom you appear as a prisoner and are charged as a high-delinquent. If you take upon you to dispute the authority of the court, we cannot entertain it, nor would any court give way unto it. You are demanded to submit, and to give a punctual and direct answer whether you are guilty of the crimes with which you stand charged, or not." The king made no reply, but began twirling once more his gold-headed cane.

After a moment's silence, the lord-president bowed to the clerk of the court, Andrew Broughton, and the latter, standing upright at the table in front of the king, took up a paper. "Charles Stuart, king of England," he read slowly, "you have been accused, on behalf of the people of England, of high treason and other crimes, and the court have determined that you ought to answer the charge." "I will answer," cried the king, interrupting, and visibly excited, "so soon as I know by what authority you do this." Bradshaw immediately replied, "If this be all that you will say, you may leave;" and, addressing the guards, "You that brought the prisoner hither, take charge of him back again." Charles now appeared to feel abashed. "But," he cried, "I do require that I may give in my reasons why I do not answer, and that you give me time for that." "Sir," Bradshaw answered sternly, "it is not for prisoners to say that they require." "Prisoners!" exclaimed the king: "Sir, remember I am not an ordinary prisoner." Not choosing to notice the petulant remark, the lord-president went on to repeat once more his former demand. "The court," he said, "hath considered carefully, and has confirmed its jurisdiction: if you will not answer, we will give order to record your default." "But, Sir," again interrupted Charles, "you have never heard my reasons." "Your reasons," answered the president, "as they are but protests against the jurisdiction of the court, cannot be heard." "Show me that jurisdiction," cried the king, more and more irritated. "We have shown you already, and told you," said Bradshaw, "that it lies in the commons of England." "The next time you are brought here," he added, with some severity, "you will know more of the pleasure of the court, and it may be the final determination." Not wincing under the threat, Charles continued, "Sir, show me where-ever the House of Commons was a court of judicature of that kind." "Take away the prisoner," exclaimed the president, addressing the guards. The halberdiers came marching up, but Charles was still too excited to subdue into dignified silence. "Remember, sir," he cried, "that the king is not suffered to give in his reasons for the liberty and freedom of all his subjects." The words were so indiscreet as to tempt Bradshaw into a reply. "You have no right," he observed with bitterness, "to use this language. All England, nay, all the world are judge how great a friend you have been to the laws and liberties of the people." With this he made another sign to the guards to approach. "Well, Sir!" was all that Charles could say when escorted out of the court, met once more by the shouts of the spectators, of "God save the king!" and "Justice! justice!"

The third day of the trial, Tuesday, the 23rd of January, was taken up as before, with constantly-repeated protests of the king against the jurisdiction of the tribunal before which he was placed. "As for the charge," he exclaimed, after a lengthened altercation with the president, "I value it not a rush; it is the liberty of the people of England that I stand for. For me to acknowledge a new court that I never heard of before—I that am your king, that should be an example to all the people of England for to uphold justice, to maintain the old laws—indeed, I know not how to do it." After interrupting the king several times, Bradshaw at last told him that he could be heard no longer. "This is the third time," the president exclaimed, "that you have publicly disowned this court, and put an affront upon it. How far you have preserved the privileges of the people, your actions have spoken it; for truly, Sir, men's intentions ought to be known by their actions, and you have written your meaning in bloody characters throughout the whole kingdom." Then to the guards: "You that took charge of the prisoner, take him back again." "Sir," broke in Charles, "I will only say this one word more to you. If it were only my own particular case, I would not say any more, nor interrupt you, but—" "You have heard the pleasure of the court," exclaimed the lord-president, "and you will find, notwithstanding your not wishing to understand it, that you are truly before a court of justice."

The king having been led away, the members of the High Court proceeded to the examination of witnesses for the charge that he had taken part in a number of battles during the civil war, and given orders leading to the effusion of blood. The formality occupied the whole of Wednesday and Thursday, and on Friday, the 26th of January, the court met in a long private sitting, and agreed upon the sentence, which was ordered to be at once engrossed: Once more, in the afternoon of Saturday, the 27th of January, the great Gothic door leading into Westminster Hall was thrown open to the public, and every nook and corner having been filled in an instant, Charles was led into court with the ceremonies employed on former occasions. He now looked extraordinarily pale and careworn, but took his seat in his usual manner, with his hat on, not deigning even to give a look to the crowd of soldiers and citizens behind him, numbers of which were shouting, "Justice!" and others, "Execution!" Order having been enforced after some little lapse of time by the ushers and guards on duty, the king was the first to take the word. It was whispered about that his majesty, to save his life, meant to abdicate the throne in favour of his eldest son, and thereupon deep silence came over the vast assembly.

"I desire to be heard," exclaimed Charles, his lips twitching nervously, "and I hope I shall give no occasion of interruption." "You may answer in time, but hear the court first," said the lord-president. "If it please you, Sir," continued the king, in great agitation, "I desire to be heard; I shall not give any occasion of interruption, and it is only a word. A sudden judgment—" Bradshaw cut his speech short. "You shall be heard in due time," he repeated, "but you must hear the court first." "Sir, what I desire," stuttered the king, with increasing excitement, "what I desire, it will be in order to what I believe the court will say. Sir, an hasty judgment is not so soon recalled." "You shall be heard before the judgment be given," replied the president, "and in the mean time you may forbear." "Well, Sir, shall I be heard before the judgment be given?" Charles asked, earnestly. "You shall be heard," confirmed the president, consulting with some of the other judges, and then began his address to the court. "Gentlemen," he exclaimed, "it is well known to you that the prisoner at the bar hath been several times brought before this court to make answer to a charge of treason, and other high crimes exhibited against him in the name of the people of England; but that he hath been so far from obeying the commands of the court, as to begin to take upon him to offer reasoning and debate upon the authority of the court, and of that highest court that constituted them to try and judge him; and though being overruled in this, he hath still continued contumacious, and refused to submit or to answer. Whereupon the court, that they might not be wanting to themselves, and to the trust reposed in them, nor that any man's wilfulness prevent justice to be done, have considered of the charge. They have considered of the contumacy, and of that confession which in law doth arise upon that contumacy; they have likewise considered of the notoriety of the fact charged upon this prisoner; and upon the whole matter they are resolved, and are agreed upon a sentence to be pronounced against this prisoner. But in respect that he doth desire to be heard before the sentence be read and pronounced, the court hath resolved that they will hear him." "Yet, Sir," he continued, addressing Charles, "thus much I must tell you beforehand, that if that which you have to say be to offer any debate concerning the jurisdiction of the court, you are not to be heard in it. You have offered it formerly, and you struck at the root, that is the power and supreme authority of the commons of England, which this court will not admit a debate of. But, Sir, if you have anything to say in defence of yourself, concerning the matter charged, the court hath given me in command to tell you that they will hear you."

...should be granted to him it necessarily took the form of a denial. Though still nominally in existence, the upper house of parliament in reality had been abolished by the vote of the commons, passed at the beginning of the year, which declared the "supreme power" residing solely in them; so that it had become impossible for the members of the High Court to call the lords upon the stage once more, and by so doing invest them with at least an outward form of authority. After retiring for a short time to deliberate on the demand made by the king, the court returned to give its decision by the mouth of the lord-president. "Sir, you were pleased to make a motion," said Bradshaw, speaking in a rather laboured style, "to offer a desire of yours touching the propounding of somewhat to the lords and commons in the Painted Chamber, for the peace of the kingdom. Sir, you did in effect receive an answer before the court adjourned. Truly, Sir, their withdrawing and adjournment was 'pro forma tantum,' for it did not seem to them that there was any difficulty in the thing. They now have considered of what you have moved, and have considered of their own authority. Sir, the return I have to you from the court is this: That they have been too much delayed by you already, and this that you now offer hath occasioned some little further delay. They are judges appointed by the highest authority, and judges are no more to delay than they are to deny justice. These are good words in the great old charter of England: 'Nulli negabimus, nulli veredemus, nulli differemus justitiam.' There must be no delay; but the truth is, Sir, and so every man here observes it, that you have much delayed them already in your contempt and default, for which they might long since have proceeded to judgment against you. And notwithstanding what you have offered, they are resolved to proceed to punishment and to judgment, and that is their unanimous resolution."

Charles listened in silence, his features, of ashy paleness, being stirred now and then by a slight nervous twitch. A short pause intervening after the president's address, he began to speak again, but in a tone of deep humility, such as had never yet come from his lips. "Sir, I know it is vain for me to dispute," he cried. "I am no sceptic for to deny the power that you have: I know that you have power enough. But, Sir, I think it would have been for the kingdom's peace if you would have taken the pains to have shown the lawfulness of your power. For this delay that I have desired, it is a delay very important for the peace of the kingdom. For it is not my person that I look at alone; it is the kingdom's welfare and the kingdom's peace. It is an old sentence, that we should think long before we resolve on great matters. Therefore, Sir, I must put at your doors all the inconveniency of a hasty sentence. I have been here now, I think, this week. This day eight days was the day I came here first; but a little delay of a day or two further may give peace, whereas a hasty judgment may bring on that trouble and perpetual inconveniency to the kingdom that the child that is unborn may repent it. And therefore again, out of the duty I owe to God and to my country, I do desire that I may be heard by the

...the words of the king, though extremely vague in their meaning, appeared to make some impression upon various members of the court, giving rise to the demand that they should retire for further deliberation. For a moment it seemed probable that if Charles would but throw himself upon the mercy of his judges, and at once announce his abdication, the greater number of them might be inclined to stop the passing of the sentence upon him, and, if nothing else, insist that his life should be spared. However, as yet there was no allusion even to any wish on the king's part to abdicate, and the whole question before the court being as to whether the desired conference "in the Painted Chamber, before the lords and lords and commons in the Painted Chamber, or any other chamber that you will appoint me." Humble, and yet imbued with quiet dignity—not unworthy of a better king than Charles—as was the appeal, it proved necessarily vain. "Sir," said Bradshaw, after another moment's pause, "you have been already answered to what you even now moved, it being the same you moved before. The court now requires to know whether you have any more to say for yourself than you have said, before they proceed to sentence." "I say this," interrupted Charles, speaking eagerly, as if under the influence of great agitation, "that if you will give me but this delay, I doubt not but I shall give some satisfaction to you all here, and to my people after that; and therefore I do require you, as you will answer it at the dreadful day of judgment, that you consider it once again." "Sir, I have received direction from the court," replied Bradshaw, perceptibly startled by the solemn address of the king. "Well, Sir!" urged Charles. "To your repeated demand," continued Bradshaw, "the answer must be the same. The court will proceed to sentence, if you have nothing more to say." The king paused for a moment, and then cried, slowly, "I have nothing more to say, but I shall desire that it may be entered what I have said."

The lord-president now arose on his seat to deliver judgment, prefacing it by a long speech in vindication of the equity of the sentence. After laying it down as a fundamental rule of government that, "as the law is superior to the king, so there is something superior to the law, which is the people itself, the source of the law, by whom and for whom it is made," he went on to pass in review the whole of the reign of Charles, showing how its tendency had been from the commencement to overthrow all constitutional safeguards, established to protect the liberty of the nation, and to set up in their stead a despotism of the most baneful kind. He then exhibited the gradual development of the king's attempts to reign unchecked into the breaking out of intestine war, for which he made him responsible as the sole author. "All the bloody murders," exclaimed Bradshaw, addressing the king, "which have been committed since the time that the division was betwixt you and your people, which have been acted in these late wars, must be laid to your charge. And if any man will ask us what punishment is due to a murderer, let God's law, let man's law speak. I will presume that you are so well read in Scripture as to know what God himself hath said concerning the shedding of man's blood. Genesis, the ninth chapter, and Numbers, the thirty-fifth, will tell you what the punishment is. This court, in behalf of the whole kingdom, are sensible of what innocent blood hath been shed; whereby, indeed, the land stands still defiled with blood, and, as the text hath it, can no way be cleansed but by the shedding of the blood of him that caused its being shed. We know of no dispensation from the commandment 'Thou shalt do no murder;' we do not know but that it extends to the greatest kings as well as to the meanest peasants." After dwelling on the recklessness of Charles in bringing ruin and misery over the nation, for no other object than that of serving his vanity and ambition, the president continued: "Sir, all that I shall say more, before the reading of your sentence, is that the court doth heartily desire that you will seriously think of the sins you are guilty of. You said well to us the other day, you wished us to have God before our eyes. Truly, Sir, I trust all of us have so. That God who, we know, is a King of kings and Lord of lords; that God with whom there is no respecter of persons; that God who is the avenger of innocent blood: we have that God before us. Clerk, read the sentence."

"O-yes! O-yes! Silence! Silence!" cried the ushers, after which the clerk proceeded to read the judgment. It recited the act of the House of Commons establishing the High Court of Justice, the charges exhibited against the king, his refusal to reply to them, or to admit the jurisdiction of the court, and the consequent necessity to try him in contumacy. The judgment further stated that, for the greater satisfaction of the Court, a number of witnesses had been examined upon oath touching the charge; and that, on mature deliberation of all points, and consideration being had of the notoriety of the matters of fact exhibited against the prisoner the court was in conscience satisfied that the accused Charles Stuart, king of England, was guilty of all the charges laid against him, and that he had been and was "the occasioner, author, and continuer of the unnatural, cruel, and bloody wars, and therein guilty of high treason, and of the murders, rapines, burnings, spoils, desolations, damages, and mischiefs to the nation acted and committed in the said wars, and occasioned thereby." "For all which treasons and crimes," the clerk finished his reading, "this court doth adjudge that he, the said Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy to the good people of this nation, shall be put to death by severing his head from his body."

There was a minute's silence, then the lord-president rose again. "The sentence now read and published," he exclaimed, "is the act, sentence, judgment, and resolution of the whole court." On these words the whole of the members of the High Court rose in a body, to signify their assent to the judgment. Every one within the vast hall stood upright, except Charles, who once more seemed lost in meditation. All on a sudden he roused himself, exclaiming, "Will you hear me a word, Sir?" "You are not to be heard after the sentence," replied Bradshaw. "No, Sir?" echoed the king, in a tone of entreaty. "No, Sir; by your favour," repeated the president; adding, "Guards, withdraw your prisoner!" The agitation of Charles seemed to increase terribly. "I may speak after the sentence, by your favour, Sir," he stammered; "I may speak after the sentence, by your favour, Sir, by your favour—" "Hold!" exclaimed Bradshaw. "The sentence, Sir!" Charles cried piteously; "I say, Sir, I do"—"Guards, remove your prisoner!" once more ordered the president. "I am not suffered to speak!" ejaculated the king: "Expect what justice the people will have." Before he could say more, Charles was led away by the soldiers, whose iron halberds went clanging on the floor, while the people in the background rent the air with shouts of "Justice! Justice! Execution!"

After the king had left the judges of the High Court held another private sitting, at which it was decided that the sentence which they had passed should be carried out on the morning of Tuesday, the 30th of January, the open space in front of Whitehall being fixed upon as the place of execution. Charles received the notice of it with the greatest calm, only asking, as a last favour, that his youngest son and daughter might be brought to him to take farewell, and that Dr. Juxon, bishop of London, should be allowed to spend with him the few days he had to rest upon earth. These requests were immediately granted, and on the afternoon of Saturday Juxon had a long interview with the king, while in the evening he preached before him at St. James's Palace, taking for text the sixteenth verse of the second chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans: "In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, according to my Gospel." The sad farewell meeting of Charles with his two children took place on the following day, Sunday, the 28th of January. There had been at first, after the capture of the king by the troops, three of his children in England, but the eldest of them, James duke of York, now about fifteen years old, had escaped to the continent some months before, not being strictly guarded, and the two now remaining were the Princess Elizabeth, of the age of nearly thirteen, and the duke of Gloucester, in his ninth year. The interview with them was tender and affecting in the extreme, though Charles did not entirely forget the king over the father.

Holding firm to the idea of his life, that England must be an absolute monarchy, and that the kingdom could not exist without some member of his family being at the head of it, Charles took great pains to impress his little son with the fact that the crown did not belong to him, but to his eldest brother. "Mark, child, what I say," he exclaimed, drawing the poor boy towards him, and grasping his hands fixedly; "they will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee a king; but mark me, you must not be a king so long as your brothers Charles and James do live." To enforce his precept, Charles added, "They will cut off thy brothers' heads when they can catch them, and cut off thy head at last, too; and therefore I charge thee do not be made a king, by them." To which, according to the narrator of the scene, Sir Thomas Herbert, the child answered, "I will be torn in pieces first;" which "ready reply, from so young an infant," it is said, "filled the king's eyes with tears of admiration and pleasure." Having instructed his little son, Charles addressed himself to his daughter. He bade her to tell her mother that his affections had never strayed from her, and that his love would be the same to the last; and he further enjoined upon her to tell her brother James, whenever she should see him, "that it was his father's final desire that after his death he should no longer look on his brother Charles merely as his eldest brother, but should be obedient to him as his sovereign." At parting, the king commanded both his children to place themselves entirely under the orders of their mother, and to be submissive to her in all and every respect. It was evident that uppermost in all the thoughts of Charles was his wife—a wife who, as the whole world knew, was living, and had been living for years in voluntary exile with another man. In his domestic life, in his political career, nothing was so conspicuous as the character of the unhappy monarch about to suffer death as his utter inability to open his eyes to the patent facts of the world.

On the morning of Monday, the 29th of January, the members of the High Court of Justice assembled once more at Westminster, for the purpose of drawing up and engrossing the death-warrant of Charles. The warrant, addressed "to Colonel Francis Hacker, Colonel Huncks, and Lieutenant-colonel Phayre, officers of the guards in whose charge the king had been placed, was stern and concise. "Whereas," it ran, "Charles Stuart, king of England, is, and standeth convicted, attainted, and condemned of high treason and other high crimes; and sentence, upon Saturday last, was pronounced against him by this court, to be put to death, by the severing of his head from his body, of which sentence execution yet remaineth to be done: These are therefore to will and require you to see the said sentence executed, in the open street before Whitehall, upon the morrow, being the thirtieth day of this instant month of January, between the hours of ten in the morning and five in the afternoon, with full effect. And for so doing, this shall be your warrant. And these are to require all officers and soldiers, and others the good people of this nation of England, to be assisting unto you in this service." The document was signed by fifty-nine members of the High Court of Justice, first among them, in order of signature, the names of John Bradshaw, Lord Grey of Groby, and Oliver Cromwell. Together with the death-warrant, there was issued an order to the officers of the ordnance within the Tower of London, to deliver to Edward Denby, esquire, the serjeant-at-arms of the High Court, "the bright axe for the execution of malefactors." An injunction was likewise issued that "the king's scaffold be covered with black cloth;" and private notice was forwarded to Richard Brandon, the common hangman, that he and his assistant, Ralph Jones, should attend to their duties upon the morrow, in the open street before Whitehall. Richard Brandon, thus called upon to perform a deed new and strange in the annals of England, had already distinguished himself in his craft, having served his apprenticeship by cutting off the head of the earl of Stafford.

The night preceding his execution Charles slept soundly for four hours, awaking a little before six o'clock. It was a bitterly cold morning, and the first thing he did was to issue orders to his attendant, Sir Thomas Herbert, who was resting on a pallet by his bedside, to give him his warmest clothes. "Let me have a shirt on more than ordinary," he cried, "by reason the season is so sharp, as probably may make me shake, which some observers will imagine proceeds from fear. I would have no such imputation, for I fear not death. Death is not terrible to me." Soon after the king was dressed, Bishop Juxon came to him, in conformity with an appointment made the night before, and they had a private meeting of about an hour, at which no one else was present. The interview over, Sir Thomas Herbert was called in,

When the bishop began praying, and reading the last testament of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, denouncing the passion of Christ, which happened to be the lesson of the day by the calendar of the Church of England. The king next received the sacrament, after which he exclaimed, with a cheerful countenance, "Now let the rogues come; I have heartily forgiven them, and am prepared for all I am to undergo." Before long the clock struck ten, and with the stroke there was a soft knock at the door. "Come in," cried the king, and Colonel Hacker entered. "Sir," the visitor exclaimed in a low voice, broken by emotion, "it is time to go to Whitehall, but you will have some further time to rest there." "I will go directly," said Charles, and taking Bishop Juxon by the hand, he followed the colonel, who led the way out of the back door of St. James's Palace into the park, the guards under him closing in at the rear. Several companies of foot soldiers were drawn up in St. James's Park, forming a double line from the palace to Whitehall, through which the king marched, with Dr. Juxon to his right, and Colonel Tomlinson, the officer on duty, to the left, preceded by a detachment of halberdiers, with banners flying and drums beating. Arrived at Whitehall, there was some delay, the carpenters and other artisans not having quite finished their task of building up the scaffold and hanging it with black cloth; and the king, while awaiting his doom, had to enter a chamber which had formerly served him as his private cabinet, from which he had issued his first decrees in the struggle with the parliament, and where he had signed the death-warrant of the earl of Strafford. The room adjoined the scaffold, and the man in black who had despatched the earl, could look in at the window, leaning on his axe.

When led upon the scaffold, through an opening that had been broken in the wall, the king found it surrounded by a vast multitude, and by several companies of horse and foot, who kept the people at a little distance from the black stage. Charles was prepared to address the spectators, but perceiving that his voice would not be able to reach many of them, he contented himself with delivering an harangue to the few persons around him, the bishop of London, Colonel Hacker, Colonel Tomlinson, and several other officers. "I shall be very little heard of by anybody else," he exclaimed, "and shall therefore speak a word to you here. Indeed, I could hold my peace very well, if I did not think that holding my peace would make some men think that I did submit to the guilt, as well as to the punishment. But I think it is my duty to God and to my country to clear myself, both as an honest man, a good king, and a good Christian. I shall begin first with my innocence. Indeed, I think it not very needful to insist long upon this, for all the world knows that I did never begin a war with the two houses of parliament; and I call God to witness, to whom I must shortly make an account, that I did never intend to encroach upon their privileges. They began upon me; it is the militia they began upon. They confessed the militia was mine, but they thought fit to have it from me; and if anybody will look to the dates of the commissions, of their commissions and of mine, and likewise to the declarations, he will see clearly that they began these troubles, and not I. So that as for the guilt of these enormous crimes that are laid against me, I hope in God that God will clear me of it. God forbid that I should lay it upon the two houses of parliament; there is no necessity of it either. I hope they are free of this guilt, for I believe that all instruments between them and me have been the cause of all this bloodshed; so that, as I find myself clear of this, I hope and pray God that they may be too. Yet for all this, God forbid I should be so ill a Christian as not to say God's judgments are just upon me; many times he doth pay justice by an unjust sentence." Charles then went on to dwell upon the necessity of the nation possessing a chief ruling by divine right, telling his hearers, "You shall never go right, nor God will never prosper you, until you give God his due, and the king his due: that is my successor." While he was speaking, one of the bystanders approached the axe, on which the king interrupted himself, exclaiming, "Take care! take care! Hurt not the axe: that may hurt me." Then addressing the executioner near him, whose face, as well as that of his assistant, was hidden under a black mask, Charles cried, "I shall say but a very short prayer, and when I thrust out my hands, you strike." The veiled head nodded.

Intense silence now hung over the vast crowd gathered around the foot of the scaffold. While taking off his doublet, and exchanging his hat for a silk cap, under which he carefully tucked his long hair, grown perfectly white within the last few months, the king once more addressed Bishop Juxon. "I have a good cause and a gracious God on my side," he said, with a firm voice. "There is but one stage more," replied the bishop; "this stage is turbulent and troublesome. It is a short one, but you may consider it will soon carry you a very great way: it will carry you from earth to heaven, and there you will find a great deal of cordial joy and comfort." "I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible world," continued Charles, "to a world where no disturbance can be." "You are exchanged from a temporary to an eternal crown," exhorted the bishop; "truly, a good exchange." Having prayed for several minutes, the king took the cross of St. George from his neck and handed it to Dr. Juxon, exclaiming, "Remember!" None knew the meaning of the word.

Praying, the king sank upon his knees, stretching his neck across the block. A minute after he lifted up his hands. The hangman whirled his glittering axe in the air; a stream of red blood gushed forth, and a lifeless body fell upon the ground. Bending down, the man in the black mask seized the head that had borne a crown for near a quarter of a century, and swinging it by its long snowy locks, waved it over the edge of the scaffold, shouting, "Behold the head of a traitor!"

THE COMMONWEALTH.

THE execution of Charles I. produced an effect as deep as it was lasting. Kings had perished before under the sword and the battle-axe, but a king had never yet been put to trial for his actions, been judged by his subjects, and been led to the scaffold in the open light of day; so that the new spectacle which England and the world had witnessed came upon all with the startling issue of something inoffable, which ordinary men's minds could scarcely comprehend at once. Even those who were furthest away from approving the dire real tragedy performed in front of Whitehall, could scarcely help admiring, if only in the secret recesses of their own hearts, the boldness of the deed, and still more its publicity and solemnity. Apart from the legal question as to the king's having been guilty of what was called, for want of a better name, high treason, it was the grandest proclamation that had ever taken place of the responsibility of all human beings, however exalted by power, rank, and birth, for their actions, and of the equality of all before the throne of justice and of God. The act, there was no doubt, was that of a comparatively small number of men, but this scarcely detracted from its grandeur and impressiveness, since it is minority, which had grasped the helm of state and become the ruling power in the realm, represented and included all that England possessed of social, political, and religious worth. Whatever the faults and errors of Oliver Cromwell and his associates, they had high aims, they took straight roads in accomplishing their objects, and they were terribly in earnest. And all England acknowledged their supreme worth and earnestness by bowing before them as before true guides and rulers of men.

Thoughtful as were the leaders into whose hands the guidance of the nation had fallen, they proceeded very quietly and unobtrusively in changing the outward form of government. On the same day on which sentence was delivered upon the king, the House of Commons passed a short Act, ordering that in all courts of law, as well as in all writs, grants, and judgments, the style to be used henceforth should be in the name of "the keepers of the liberty of England by the authority of parliament," or, as in the original, "custodes libertatis Angliæ auctoritate parliamenti." All jurors, by the same Act, were ordered to be termed "Juratores pro republicâ," instead of "pro domino rege," and all indictments to conclude "contra pacem publicam," in lieu of "contra pacem, dignitatem, et coronam nostram." On the twenty-ninth of January, the day before the execution of Charles, an Act was brought in making it treasonable to recognize any king in England without the authority of parliament; and having been read for the third time and voted on the thirtieth, proclamation of it was made the same day by the sergeant-at-arms at Chancery, the Old Exchange, and Westminster. A week after, on the 6th of February, the House of Lords was formally abolished by a resolution proclaiming it to be "useless and dangerous;" and on the day following it was further voted "that the office of a king in this nation, and to have the power in a single person, is unnecessary, burthensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and public interest of the people." Immediately after, steps were taken to establish a new executive in place of the parliamentary committees which had hitherto carried on the functions of government, and whose action was necessarily slow and cumbersome. It was determined that the future administration of the realm should be under a Council of State, to consist of forty persons, who were to remain in office for one year, but able to be reappointed by the commons. The election of the Council occupied about a week, and it met for the first time on Saturday, the 17th of February, for the despatch of business, its first action consisting in electing Oliver Cromwell temporary president. There were in the Council five members of the dissolved House of Peers, the earls of Denbigh, Mulgrave, Pembroke, and Salisbury, and Lord Grey of Werke, while all the rest were members of the House of Commons, with the exception of one, John Bradshaw, president of the High Court which had tried King Charles. Among the first resolutions of the new executive was that of assuming an erect and dignified attitude towards the rulers of the great European states, for which purpose a special "Secretary for Foreign Tongues," was appointed, to carry on the requisite correspondence with them. To fill this important post the Council made choice of a kinsman of Bradshaw, by name of John Milton.

The people of England immediately, and without the least show of opposition, acknowledged the rule of the Council of State; but it was otherwise in Scotland and Ireland. No sooner had the report of the king's execution reached Edinburgh, than the government there proclaimed his eldest son, under the title of Charles II., and breaking off all communication with the House of Commons, declared its intention to install him on the throne of England, as well as of Scotland, if necessary by force of arms. One of the first duties of the Council of State now became to prepare to resist another invasion from over the Tweed, and steps were taken at once to assemble as many troops as possible in the northern counties. However, the danger was considerably less than feared at the moment. The party in power at Edinburgh, headed by the earl of Argyle, consisted mainly of rigid Presbyterians, who, though resisting the Independents who had seized the helm of state with such sudden energy in England, felt in reality but scant sympathy with the son and heir of the beheaded monarch. A handsome, gay youth of nineteen, the prince of Wales, styling himself Charles II., was rumoured to be greatly under the influence of his Roman Catholic mother; and though those of his Cavalier friends who knew him best stated frankly their belief of his being an atheist rather than a papist, his relationship alone was enough to inspire fear to Argyle and his friends, and they resolved not to lift a hand for him until he had given in his firm adherence to them by taking oath upon the Covenant.

The contingency was not likely to take place without extensive negotiations, and the Scottish invasion being thus postponed, it became necessary to deal first with the revolt in Ireland. It had long been the wish of Cromwell to employ the veterans of the civil war to subdue the fearful state of anarchy into which Ireland had sunk for generations; and the execution of Charles having been made the pretext for new risings there, accompanied as usual by the murder of English and Scotch settlers, and the destruction of the property which their industry had created, he at once prepared for the commencement of his great task. After obtaining from the Council of State the appointment of lord-lieutenant, or civil and military governor of Ireland, together with the assignment of the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, raised by loan from the City, the formation of the army intended to subdue the rebels in the west proceeded very quickly; but at the last moment Cromwell was stayed in his work by an unforeseen hindrance. While the majority of the people of England, after beholding the king's head struck off in front of Whitehall, were thinking that the revolution had gone too far, there was a small minority who deemed that it had not gone far enough. The minority was made up chiefly of the persons already known as "the Levellers."

Ill-judged, and tending to the spread of disorder, as were the designs of the Levellers, their principles were neither despicable nor illogical from the revolutionary point of view. They simply held that all the things hitherto done towards the overthrow of despotism in the realm, and the establishment of political and religious freedom, were chiefly affecting the middle and upper classes, and ought to be only steps to a higher end, that of raising the mass of the people from poverty, ignorance, and irreligion, by means of wise legislation, having for object the spread of knowledge and the more general and more equal distribution of property. It was but natural that in many cases these doctrines should be imperfectly understood, and still more imperfectly expressed, and the first public manifestations of the Levellers, after the institution of the new government, were of the quaintest kind. "The Council of State," wrote Bulstrode Whitelock, one of the forty members, in his diary, under date of April 17th, 1649, "has intelligence of certain Levellers appearing at St. Margaret's Hill, near Cobham, in Surrey, and at St. George's Hill, near it, where they were digging the ground and sowing it with roots and beans. One Everard, once of the army, who terms himself a prophet, is the chief of them. They were thirty men, and said that they should be shortly four thousand. They invite all to come in and help them, and promised them meat, drink, and clothes." There was apparently no great harm in a lot of poor people, probably agricultural labourers out of work, cultivating the waste lands on the Surrey hills; however, the Council of State, impressed with the conviction that after the crisis which the country had gone through all agitation had to be rigorously kept down, sent two troops of horse against the sowers of roots and beans, and they were all carried to London as prisoners. The "prophet" and another man, named Winstanley, had to appear before Cromwell, who examined them himself, aware that the tenets they advocated were largely diffused among the soldiers, and wishing, therefore, to get as clear an insight into them as possible. The information he received was little calculated to make the great clear-headed Leveller admire the horde of small, confused Levellers.

On being brought before Cromwell, "to justify their proceedings," Everard and Winstanley declared, in the first instance, their belief "that all the liberties of the people were lost by the coming in of William the Conqueror, and that ever since the people of God had lived under tyranny and oppression worse than that of the Jews under the Egyptians." They added, however, "that now the time of deliverance was at hand, and that God would bring his People out of slavery, and restore them to their freedom in enjoying the fruits and benefits of the earth." As to their immediate aim, they stated "that their intent was to restore the Creation to its former condition; that as God had promised to make the barren land fruitful, so now what they did was to restore the ancient community of enjoying the fruits of the earth, to distribute the benefit thereof to the poor and needy, to feed the hungry and clothe the naked; and that they intended not to meddle with any man's property, nor to break down any pales or inclosures, but only to meddle with what is common and untilled, and to make it fruitful for the use of man." Cromwell listened silently to the tenets vented by "the prophet" and his friend, both of them talking somewhat noisily, and not too civil in manner. "While they were before the general," noted Whitelock, "they stood with their hats on, and being demanded the reason thereof, they said, 'Because he was but their fellow-creature.'" The argument did not strike Oliver Cromwell as very sound, and after some consideration he ordered the two men back to prison, to think over their theories. In the meanwhile, the doings of other Levellers, not mere peaceful sowers of roots and beans, but people in steel coats, with long swords in their hands, mounted on high horses, forcibly engaged his attention.

On the same day on which the two men brought from St. Margaret's Hill appeared before Cromwell, Friday, the 20th of April, a strange scene was enacted at Whitehall, the ordinary place for the meetings of the State Council, and of the military administration, or General Council of the Army. Considerable dissatisfaction having been expressed among the troops about the intended expedition to Ireland, it had been settled by the government that the regiments which were to go there should be chosen by lottery, which arrangement was carried out in the most punctilious manner, as described in the "Perfect Diurnall," a news-sheet of the period, devoted to give short accounts of military proceedings. "This day," says the "Perfect Diurnall," of April 20, "the General Council of the Army met at Whitehall, about casting of lots, what regiments should go for the service of Ireland; where, after a solemn seeking of God, by prayer, they cast lots what regiments of the old army should be designed for that service. Fourteen regiments of horse, and fourteen of foot, of the established forces, came to the lot; and it being resolved that four regiments of horse and four of foot should go upon that service, ten blanks and four papers, with 'Ireland' written upon them, were put in a hat, and being so shuffled together, were drawn out by a child, who gave to an officer of each regiment in the lot, the lot of that regiment, so that it was done in so impartial a way as no regiment can take any just exception. The regiments whose lot it fell to go were, of horse, General Ireton's, Colonel Scroop's, Colonel Horton's, and Major-general Lambert's; and of foot, Colonel Iwer's, Colonel Cook's, Colonel Hewson's, and Colonel Dean's. The officers of each regiment allotted to the service expressed much cheerfulness at the decision." But though the officers were contented, a great many of the common soldiers were not, and in the evening of the day on which lots had been drawn at Whitehall, a mutiny broke out in one of the regiments of horse, quartered in the City, in Bishopsgate Street.

The mutineers had no personal grievance, but spoke out for general principles, demanding that the government should be reconstituted in a more democratic sense; that a new parliament should be at once summoned, to be re-elected annually; that there should be absolute freedom of conscience, and that all taxes and imposts bearing specially upon the poorer classes should be abolished. The claims thus made were among the chief requirements of a body of Levellers following the leadership of lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne, or "Free-born John," as he was generally called, who had just been thrown into the Tower for stirring up sedition among the soldiers, by distributing among them a pamphlet which he had written, entitled, "England's New Chains Discovered." Feeling considerable alarm as to the effect of the teachings of "Free-born John" upon the men he was going to lead to Ireland, Cromwell took horse as soon as he heard of the revolt of the troopers in Bishopsgate Street, and rode into the midst of them, accompanied by but a few officers. His personal influence succeeded in quelling the dangerous outbreak, and after ordering the arrest of fifteen of the mutineers, he had the rest of the regiment sent out of London the same night. The men did not leave without loud mutterings, showing the general that before subduing Irish rebels, he would have to conquer English Levellers.

The fifteen soldiers arrested in Bishopsgate Street were tried before a court-martial the day after, when six of them were condemned to death. On the recommendation of the court, Cromwell pardoned five, but ordered the sixth, a young man named Lockier, who had served seven years in the army, and was much beloved by his companions for his bravery, piety, and other high qualities, to be shot at once. The sentence was executed in St. Paul's churchyard—which had recently been turned into a sort of stable, while the cathedral itself had become a cavalry barrack—amidst an immense concourse of people, both soldiers and citizens, all exhibiting deep sympathy with the condemned man. Having fallen under the bullets of his comrades, Lockier's corpse was carried away by a procession of men and women to a house in the eastern part of the City, where it was watched and prayed over for three days and three nights, and then buried with great solemnity. "About one hundred men," as described by Whitlock, "went before the corpse, five or six in file; the corpse was then brought, with six trumpets sounding a soldier's knell; then the trooper's horse came, clothed all over in mourning, and led by a footman. The corpse was adorned with bundles of rosemary, one half stained in blood, and the sword of the deceased along with them. Some thousands followed in rank and file; all had sea-green and black ribbons tied on their hats and to their breasts, and the women brought up the rear. At the new churchyard in Westminster some thousands more of the better sort met them, who thought not fit to march through the City."

It was a formidable demonstration of the Levellers, who thus publicly exhibited their strength, throwing down a sort of challenge to the government; and its effect was immediately felt in numerous manifestations on the part of Lilburne's adherents, now commonly called the "sea-green men," on account of the colours they had adopted. To still the growing excitement among the soldiers, Cromwell held a great review of all the regiments quartered within and near the capital, in Hyde Park, on the 9th of May, addressing to them speeches of the most conciliating nature. He dwelt particularly upon the "great care and pains" which the government had taken and continued to take, in satisfying the army, and went so far as to offer that "those who thought martial law a burthen should have liberty to lay down their arms, receive their tickets, and be paid as those that stay." Even this, however, did not content all the men, and one of the troopers in a company wearing sea-green ribbons "made some objections, and was bold, for which he was committed, but at the solicitation of some of his fellows, the lieutenant-general ordered his freedom." Though trying hard to disarm the Levellers by friendly speeches, many days did not elapse after the review in Hyde Park before the lieutenant-general found that his policy would have to be reversed once more. On the 13th of May, the report arrived at Whitehall that two squadrons of horse, above a thousand strong, had mutinied at Salisbury, and that risings among smaller bodies of soldiers had taken place in Oxfordshire, at Portsmouth, and in the Isle of Wight. Not losing a moment, Cromwell at once put himself at the head of two of his faithful regiments, and hurried off to the West, fairly determined to stamp out the sea-green from the face of the land.

Riding at a tremendous pace, "near upon fifty miles a day," Cromwell came up with the chief body of the rebel troops, all of them moving about, attempting to unite, at Burford in Oxfordshire, and at once attacked them with great impetuosity. The fight was very short, and before a dozen of the mutineers had been killed, the rest, near upon a thousand men, laid down their arms, imploring the mercy of the lieutenant-general. But Cromwell looked stern, and declaring that the time for pardon had expired, ordered the immediate formation of a court-martial, which condemned every one of the rebels to be shot. The terrible sentence was altered by the commander-in-chief to decimation, and the lots having been drawn, the whole of the prisoners were led into Burford church and churchyard on Thursday, the 17th of May, every tenth man preparing to receive his doom with his back against a gravestone. The first brought forward to be shot was a Cornet Thompson, who, according to the relation of an eye-witness, "expressed himself to this purpose: 'That it was just what did befall him, that God did not own the ways he went, and that he had offended the general.' He desired the prayers of the people, and told the soldiers who were appointed to shoot him, that when he held out his hands they should do their duty." The next victim was a corporal, who, "looking upon his fellow mutineers, set his back to the wall, and bade them who were appointed to shoot, 'Shoot!' and died desperately." Then came another corporal, "and without the least acknowledgment of error, or show of fear, he pulled off his doublet, standing a pretty distance from the wall, and bade the soldiers do their duty, looking them in the face till they gave fire, not showing the least kind of terror, or fearfulness of spirit." The fourth man led forward to be shot was a cornet, but at the last moment, when the muskets were already levelled at his breast, Cromwell made a sign staying further slaughter. "All the while that this act of justice was doing," says the eye-witness, "the rest of the mutineers were upon the leads of the church, beholding the sad spectacle; and after all was over, Lieutenant-general Cromwell and other officers went to them in the church, and acquainted them how merciful they had been dealt with, the mutiny being of so high a nature, hazarding the ruin of the parliament and kingdom, and delivering up all honest men to the cruelty of the common enemy, against whom they had fought so long." The combined vigour and clemency of Cromwell was admirably calculated to win over men like those rebelling against parliamentary authority, "great professors of the gospel," as described by the narrator of the executions in Burford churchyard, and the soldiers he had thus pardoned were among the most faithful of all serving him afterwards. They particularly looked forward to the coming campaign as a means of regaining their character, and, rebels in England, felt no mercy for rebels in Ireland.

• Having subdued various risings of a smaller kind than the one first encountered, Cromwell prepared assuming his important trust in the sister kingdom. Before leaving London, the House of Commons, on the 28th of May, passed a unanimous vote of thanks to him "for his great care and courage in this business against the Levellers;" ordering, moreover, "that there should be a day of thanksgiving set apart for this great mercy," to be celebrated "Thursday come fortnight for the city and suburbs of London, and Thursday come three weeks for all the nation." Prudently combining their old love of good cheer with their religious duties, the lord mayor and aldermen of the city selected the day of thanksgiving for a grand entertainment in honour of the commander-in-chief of the Irish expedition, inviting thereto the Speaker of the House of Commons, the members of the Council of State, the chief officers of the army, and a vast number of other civil and military notabilities. The "sumptuous feast," looked upon as a great event in London, marking the reconciliation of the Presbyterian citizens with the existing government of the Independents, took place at Grocers Hall, to which Cromwell and the chief of the other invited guests went in procession, after "hearing two sermons preached by Mr. Thomas Goodwin and Mr. Owen." As reported in one of the news-sheets of the day, "the entertainment was very free and cheaful, 'Welcome,' in capital letters, written on a bannet upon most of the dishes, which were a great number. No drinking of healths or other uncivil concomitants, formerly of such great meetings, nor any other music but of the drum and trumpet. A feast indeed of Christians and Chieftains, whereas others were rather of Cretians and Cormorants." The departure of Cromwell soon after was marked by a still greater display of magnificence, as well as show of affection towards him on the part of the citizens. According to the elaborate narrative of the "Modern Intelligencer," of Tuesday, the 10th of July, it was on the evening of this day, "about five of the clock," that "the lord-lieutenant of Ireland began his journey by the way of Windsor, and so to Bristol. He went forth in that state and equipage as the like hath hardly been seen, himself in a coach, with six gallant Flanders mares, whitish grey, divers coaches accompanying him, and very many great officers of the army. His life guard consisted of eighty gallant men, the meanest whereof a commander or esquire. They were in stately habit, with trumpets sounding, almost to the shaking of Charing Cross had it now been standing. Of his life-guard, many are colonels, and it is such a guard as is hardly to be paralleled in the world." Deeply gratifying as was the show to the vulgar crowd that gazed upon it, there were not a few of the sterner citizens who loudly denounced it as an aping of the ceremonies of defunct royalty. The fear that the great and fortunate soldier, who had risen to be the first man in the state, would, in course of time, establish a new form of despotism, was growing upon many minds; and all those republicans who loved social and political freedom more than military glory, fervently hoped that he would fail, as others had failed before him, in the conquest of Ireland.

There was little ground for the anticipations of Cromwell's republican friends and enemies. Gigantic as was the task upon which he had engaged, he had made his plans and calculations carefully, and was able to reckon confidently upon success from the moment he set foot upon the shore of Ireland. The expedition fitted out by Cromwell left Milford Haven on the 21st of August, in three divisions; the first, consisting of twenty five ships, under his own immediate command; the second, of seventy transports, under the orders of his son-in-law, General Ireton; and the third, a rear-guard of eighteen vessels, under those of Colonel Horton and Admiral Dean. When half-way across St. George's Channel, the fleet divided, the commander-in-chief, followed by Horton, sailing for Dublin, and Ireton for Cork harbour. On the 23rd of August, Cromwell landed his troops without any difficulty near Kingstown, and Horton's squadron approached the same shore a day after; but Ireton was less fortunate in his maritime course, and after being tossed about by adverse winds for a week, and making a vain attempt to land at Cabell Island, near Youghal, had to steer in the wake of his leader, and with some difficulty got into Dublin Bay on the last day of the month. After giving his soldiers, numbering in all not more than ten thousand, about one-third of them cavalry, a few days' rest, Cromwell started northward for Drogheda, one of the strongholds of the Irish insurgents, who had recently hoisted the flag of King Charles II., and put themselves under the command of Sir Arthur Aston, who had fought most of the battles of the Cavaliers.

The plan of campaign of the lord-lieutenant was to attack the scattered forces of the enemy in turn, so as to give them no time to unite; and in pursuance of it he fell upon Drogheda in a sudden manner on the 9th of September, having previously withdrawn the attention of Sir Arthur Aston by making a pretence to march into Westmeath. On the evening of the 9th, a Saturday, the siege cannons were put up; the next day there was praying and psalm-singing all through the English camp; and on Monday, the 11th of September, began the battering of the fortifications. It was continued uninterruptedly all the day and the next, with such fury, that on the evening of Tuesday a great breach had been made, at sight of which Cromwell at once ordered a storm. The first regiment passing the breach, the forlorn hope of Colonel Custle, was beaten back with considerable loss, but the men had no sooner turned their faces, than Cromwell himself drew his sword, and rushing forward, bade his soldiers follow him. There was no resisting the terrible onslaught now made. Inflamed to fury by the example of their commander, the veterans of Marston Moor and Naseby overthrew everything before them, trampling down the enemy like grass, and killing thousands to the cry of "Our Lord God." On the Mill-hill Mount fifteen hundred men fell under the swords of the Ironsides, and nearly twice the number on the bridge over the Boyne, over which the unfortunate defenders of Drogheda pushed in mad despair, with the grip of Cromwell's troopers at their neck. The town was taken in a couple of hours, but the carnage lasted for three days longer, the holding out of several of the "towers" on the walls exciting the English soldiers to savagery. "When they submitted," the lord-lieutenant informed the Speaker of the House of Commons, "their officers were knocked on the head, every tenth man of the soldiers killed, and the rest shipped for the Barbadoes." "I am persuaded," added Cromwell, "that this is a righteous judgment of God upon these barbarous wretches."

Going to work in this manner, Oliver Cromwell was sure of the conquest of Ireland. His heavy ordnance was able to shatter into dust the miserable little guns of Irish fortresses; and his stout, tall fighting men, trained to battle, clad in armour, and nerved by holy fanaticism, were as lions against weasels, in contact with the poor, undisciplined, ill-armed, half-naked natives. To inspire the "barbarous wretches" with the terror of his arms was from the commencement one of the main objects of Cromwell's policy, and by which alone he could hope to obtain the rapid success which to him was indispensable, so that the scenes enacted at Drogheda had of necessity to be repeated in other places. From the town on the Boyne, the lord-lieutenant marched southward to Wexford, which he summoned on the 9th of October to surrender, and on the governor declining, except on condition of freedom of worship for the Roman Catholic inhabitants, he planted his siege cannon before the walls, and kept up a raking fire for forty-eight hours, till part of the town was in ruins, and everything ready for the assault. What followed, Cromwell himself described in a report to the Speaker of the House of Commons. "Our men," he wrote, "no sooner appeared on the top, but the enemy quitted the walls of the town, which our men perceiving, ran violently upon the town with their ladders, and stormed it. And when they were come into the market-place, the enemy making a stiff resistance, our forces brake them, and then put all to the sword that came in their way. Two boatfuls of the enemy attempting to escape, being overprest with numbers, sank, whereby were drowned near three hundred of them. I believe in all there was lost of the enemy not many less than two thousand, and I believe not twenty of ours from first to last of the siege." "This town," the lord-lieutenant concluded his report, "is now so in our power, that of the former inhabitants I believe scarce one in twenty can challenge any property in their houses. Most of them are run away, and many of them killed in this service. And it were to be wished that an honest people would come and plant here, where are very good houses, and other accommodation fitted to their hands, which may be made of encouragement to them; as also a seat of good trade, both inward and outward, and of marvellous great advantage in the point of the herring and other fishing. For which, as for all, we pray God may have all the glory."

After taking Wexford, and driving away the "former inhabitants," to make room for "honest people" from England, Cromwell pushed his troops and siege artillery onward to Ross. He marched quick, but the tale of his doings travelled yet quicker, and the governor of Ross threw open the gates of his town before the heavy English cannon had come to play upon the walls and houses. "The rendition of this garrison," Cromwell informed the House of Commons, under date of Ross, the 25th of October, "was a seasonable mercy, as giving us an opportunity towards Munster, and is for the present a very good refreshment for our men. We are able to say nothing as to all this, but that the Lord is still pleased to own a company of poor worthless creatures, for which we desire his name to be magnified." Cromwell's next letter stated: "Cork and Youghal are both submitted, and divers other lesser garrisons are come in also. The Lord is wonderful in these things." The example of Ross, Cork, and Youghal, was followed by all the other towns in the south of Ireland, only two of them, Clonmel and Kilkenny, offering a short resistance, for which they had to pay dearly. There could be now no longer any doubt of the complete success of the expedition; and Cromwell, therefore, in the spring of 1650, prepared to return to England, where his presence was urgently required by parliament, the aspect of affairs in the north assuming a more and more threatening attitude. A first resolution, "that the lord-lieutenant of Ireland be desired to come over," was passed by the commons on the 8th of January, and meeting with no immediate attention, more pressing requests followed; it being voted finally, towards the end of February, that a special fleet should be sent to fetch the lord-lieutenant back, and that, when arrived in London, he should be installed in St. James's Palace, and otherwise be treated in royal style. Thus urged and coaxed, Cromwell could resist no longer, and leaving the command of the army in Ireland to his son-in-law, whom he appointed his deputy, he set sail from Waterford in the largest frigate of the English navy, the "President," and after a stormy passage across St. George's Channel, landed safely at Bristol.

Cromwell, on setting foot on English soil on the last day of August, 1650, was received with extraordinary demonstrations of honour, the great guns firing thrice, and the authorities of Bristol being pressing that he should stay for a few days, to rest from the fatigues of the sea. But Cromwell refused, and, without an hour's loss, hurried up to the capital, which was ready to greet him like a born king. "Drawing near Hounslow Heath, he was met by the Lord-general Fairfax, accompanied by many members of parliament and officers of the army, with multitudes that came out of curiosity to see him of whom fame had made such a loud report. Hence, after mutual salutations, congratulations, and other testimonies of high respect, he proceeded on, and, passing near Hyde Park Corner, he was saluted with great guns and several volleys of small shot by Colonel Barkstead's regiment, which was drawn up on the highway for that purpose. Continuing thus to march, multitudes increasing to behold him, the Lord Cromwell was conducted to the house called the Cockpit, at St. James's, which had been appointed and prepared for him. Here he was visited by the lord mayor and aldermen of London, and by many other persons of quality, all of them expressing their own and the nation's great obligation to him for his eminent services in Ireland. After some time of respite and refreshment, he attended his charge in parliament, where the Speaker, in an elegant speech, gave him the thanks of the House."

On the 11th of June, Cromwell, from his seat in parliament, "made a full relation of the whole state of affairs in Ireland," amidst the wrapt attention of the commons, who, in the end, once more voted their gratitude for the deeds he had achieved. In the week following Sir Thomas Fairfax made an offer to resign his commission as commander-in-chief of the parliamentary armies, in order that the post might be given to the victorious lord-lieutenant, now towering high above him in fame. Feeling some conscientious scruples to deprive the old and faithful soldier of parliament of his hard-earned honours, the commons, in a first fit of generosity, refused the offer; but immediately after they appointed a committee "to attend and confer with the lord-general," in order "to preserve a right understanding." The result of the committee's efforts was that on Wednesday, the 26th of June, Fairfax formally gave in his resignation, and that on the same day the House of Commons passed a vote ordering "That Oliver Cromwell, esquire, be constituted captain-general and commander-in-chief of all the forces raised or to be raised by authority of parliament within the Commonwealth of England." Three days after the vote, on Saturday, the 29th of June, it was resolved that "the Lord-general Cromwell went out of London towards the north," and that "the news of him marching much startled the Scots."

The attitude of Scotland towards the English Commonwealth had undergone various changes of an extraordinary nature during the twelve months preceding the date of Cromwell's departure "out of London towards the north." After proclaiming Charles II., a deputation had been sent to the young prince, to the Hague, to invite him to come to Scotland, but with the explanation, that before being actually placed on the throne, he would have to sign the Covenant, and to subscribe to other conditions, which would place him for some time to come under the control of the earl of Argyle and the other chiefs of the Presbyterians. This was not deemed desirable by the heir of Charles I., and after some hesitation, and consultation with his mother and friends, he declined the Scottish propositions, hinting that he knew straighter roads than they had pointed out to find his way to the throne.

The means to which Charles alluded were the raising of an Highland army by the marquis of Montrose, the same to undertake the invasion of England, together with some twenty or thirty thousand Irish fighting men, who promised their help for the good work while yet Oliver Cromwell and his Ironsides were lingering on the eastern side of St. George's Channel. To carry out the scheme, young Charles left Holland at the commencement of the summer of 1649, for Jersey, on the road to Ireland, while at the same time Montrose started for the Highlands of Scotland, where his name was believed to be an all powerful charm, able to call up warriors by the thousand. Bringing with him some five hundred foreign mercenaries, the bold marquis landed at Kirkwall, in the Orkneys, and from thence crossed over to Caithness, where he raised the standard of Charles II. But not a man would flock to it, and a few weeks were sufficient to show Montrose that, instead of friends, he would meet with hard enemies in his native country, the first notice of his arrival having produced an order from the government of Edinburgh to seize him, dead or alive. The troops despatched to execute the command encountered and easily defeated the invaders at Invercarroon, near Strachan, on the confines of Ross-shire; and though the marquis himself escaped, and tried to save his life by disguise, he was captured at the end of a few weeks through the treachery of a supposed friend, and dragged at the heels of the soldiers to Edinburgh. The Scottish parliament had already condemned him to death, ordering that he should be hanged on a gibbet thirty feet high, and that his head should be fixed on the Tolbooth at Edinburgh, and his limbs hacked to pieces, and stuck up over the gates of Perth, Stirling, Glasgow, and Aberdeen.

Montrose underwent the barbarous punishment with the spirit of a hero, while the princely youth for whom he had staked his life had the incredible meanness to disavow him. In order to keep on good terms with the ruling party at Edinburgh, the heir of King Charles made a solemn declaration that he had expressly forbidden Montrose to invade Scotland, and that he felt no regret in the defeat of one who had drawn the sword in opposition to his own royal command. The worthy son of Henrietta Maria, on the first news of the encounter at Invercarroon, had fled back from Jersey, where he was amusing himself, to the Netherlands, and from there he opened fresh negotiations with the Scottish government. His princely heart now felt a sudden glow of Presbyterianism. He was ready, he declared, for the signing of the Covenant; and Argyle and his friends, feeling the want of a tool to play with, thought fit to enter upon the bargain. A formal agreement having been concluded at Breda, in Holland, the "godly Prince Charles II.," as his new allies chose to call him, went on board a Dutch ship, which, on the 16th of June, 1650, not quite a month after Montrose's head had been stuck up at the Edinburgh Tolbooth, threw anchor on the coast of Scotland, at the mouth of the river Spey. Knowing the royal youth with whom they had to deal already to perfection, the Presbyterian leaders forced him to sign the Covenant, together with various other documents, before even he had set his foot on shore, making this a condition of his landing, and intimating plainly that he must consider himself for a time under their exclusive guidance, attempting no intercourse whatever, either with the faction of the "Malignants," the Scottish Royalists, or the party of the "Engagers," the men friendly to a union with England. Among the papers young Charles had to subscribe was a large document, called "the Declaration," in which he proclaimed his abhorrence of the sins of his family, and his resolution to tolerate no other religious guide but the Covenant in any part of his dominions. When all the signing was done, the "godly prince" was taken off ship, and carried in triumph to Falkland, where his first actual duty was to listen to several sermons expatiating in violent terms on the sins of his father, the idolatries of his mother, the backslidings of the "Malignants," and the truth of which he could not but feel, his own unmitigated wickedness. After this, the heralds at Edinburgh and at Falkland Palace proclaimed the accession of Charles II. as king of Scotland, England, and Ireland.

The sound of the heralds' trumpets had scarcely died away, when Cromwell stood already at the Border. Coming up in rapid marches from the capital, the English army, counting seven thousand five hundred foot, and three thousand five hundred horse, arrived at Berwick on Monday, the 22nd of July, and on the same day crossed the Tweed, encamping at Mordington, a short distance from the river. In the night following "the Scotch beacons were all set on fire, and the men fled, and drove away their cattle." The cause of the flight of the inhabitants was the distribution of papers, emanating from Edinburgh, declaring that the invaders from the south intended "to put all the men to the sword, and to thrust hot irons through the women's breasts;" which, coupled with the stories current about Cromwell's doings in Ireland, caused such terror among the people that all scampered off, as if seized by a panic, even the lame and bedridden insisting on being carried beyond the reach of the English monsters. It was a serious misfortune to Cromwell to find the land between the Border and Edinburgh thus turned into a desert, denuded of everything in the shape of provisions for man and horse; and to escape famine, there remained nothing for him but to keep close to the coast, in uninterrupted communication with the English fleet, which had left Berwick together with the army, to assist its operations. Moving onward slowly in this manner, it was not till Friday, the 26th of July, that the invaders got to Dunbar, and on the following day turned westward to Haddington, where the outposts of the Scottish army became visible for the first time. Anxious to come to an encounter with the enemy, Cromwell pushed forward two regiments of horse, under General Lambert and Colonel Whalley, to Musselburgh; but the Scots evaded an encounter, withdrawing in good order to a strong entrenched position which they had formed a few miles from Edinburgh. To attack them here was found to be impossible, the more so as it kept raining almost incessantly, and Cromwell's soldiers were suffering greatly from want and illness; so that, after hovering about the neighbourhood for several days, he found himself compelled to march back to Dunbar, in order to reopen communication with the fleet. Seeing the invaders retreat in apparent confusion, the Scottish troops, commanded by the veteran David Leslie, came forward from their fastnesses, prepared to attack the foe in the rear. The army of the Covenant was nearly twice as strong in numbers as the host led by Cromwell, and there seemed good hopes to the former that it would be possible to fall upon the enemy and hurl him into the sea.

Cromwell's position was desperate when getting back to Dunbar, on the evening of Saturday, the 31st of August. It was with extreme dismay he learnt that the ships from which he hoped to get food for his starving soldiers were kept far out at sea by contrary winds; while at the same time the Scots, by a cleverly-executed flank march, had taken possession, at a place called Copperspath, of the road south-eastward along the shore; so that, hemmed in both at the front and from behind, he was completely within the folds of a huge and exasperated antagonist. David Leslie was watching the movements of the exhausted English troops from the edge of the grey Lammermoor hills shutting in the town of Dunbar, deeming already to have them within his grasp; and to Cromwell himself, undaunted as he was, the situation appeared so full of danger, that he gave vent to a shriek of despondency in a brief note addressed to Sir Arthur Heslridge, governor of Newcastle. "We are upon an engagement very difficult," wrote Oliver;

"the enemy hath blocked up our way at the pass of Copperspath, through which we cannot get without almost a miracle: he lieth so upon the hills, that we know not how to come that way without great difficulty, and our lying here daily consumeth our men, who fall sick beyond imagination." Cromwell apparently did not expect that the relief from Newcastle could reach him in time, and looked more to being avenged than to being assisted immediately. "Whatever becomes of us," he told Sir Arthur, "it will be well for you to get what forces you can together, and the south to help what they can. The business nearly concerneth all good people. But the only wise God knows what is best: all shall work for God. Our spirits are comfortable, praised be the Lord, though our present condition be what it is. And indeed we have much hope in the Lord, of whose mercy we have had large experience." There seemed nothing remaining for the English army but to capitulate, and the Scottish commander-in-chief proposing honourable terms, almost any other general would have accepted the offer, but not so Cromwell. "He was a strong man," says Charles Harvey, "in the dark perils of war, in the high places of the field. Hope shone in him like a pillar of fire, when it had gone out in all the others."

Deep as was his distress, the "pillar of fire" even now did not desert Oliver Cromwell. Having lain for forty-eight hours in and around Dunbar, the rain pouring down all the while upon his half-starved soldiers, ill-sheltered under wretched huts and more wretched tents, he resolved to bring on a battle at any hazard. It was utterly impossible to attack the Scots in the fastnesses where they lay encamped, and the whole hope of the English commander-in-chief resting to draw them down from the wild Lammermoor hills into the plain below, and engage them there, he tried to effect this great object by a stratagem. Towards noon on Monday, the 2nd of September, he pushed his vanguard of horse slightly to the south, across a little rivulet called the Brocksburn, occupied by the outposts of the Scottish troops, so as to make it appear to the latter that he was contemplating a forward movement, and, bursting through the Copperspath pass, to regain the road to Berwick. A few regiments would have been sufficient to check the supposed advance; but David Leslie, though otherwise a cautious general, felt alarmed at the bare idea that the foe he had seized might be breaking through his grip. Giving way to his own apprehensions, as well as to the urgent counsel of the Presbyterian ministers, who trembled for anxiety, to "go down against the Philistines at Gilgal," he determined to leave his impregnable position; and descend with his whole force into the plain to face the enemy. The manoeuvre was executed in great haste during the afternoon of Monday, and by sunset the two hostile armies of England and Scotland lay facing each other on even ground, divided by nothing but the swiftly-running stream of the Brocksburn, carrying the waters of the Lammermoor hills into the German Ocean. A battle now was imminent, and Cromwell being determined not to postpone the struggle for a moment longer than he could help, at once made his preparations for attacking the Scots by the dawn of the next morning. David Leslie knew it, and accepted the proffered contest, and at midnight the watchword for the day of strife and blood to come, was given out to both armies. The Scots were to fight under the cry of "The Covenant!" and the English to go into battle shouting: "The Lord of Hosts!"

The night from Monday the 2nd, to Tuesday the 3rd of September, was wild and wet, the harvest moon wading deep among clouds of sleet and hail, and stormy gusts sweeping from over the North Sea across Dunbar plain. The ten thousand warriors of Cromwell encamped on the plain had tents, but the twenty thousand soldiers of the Covenant had none, and they kept shivering through the cold night, seeking what rest and shelter they could get under corn-shocks, hedges, and ditches. At four o'clock in the morning, on the first faint dawn of light creeping up over St. Abb's Head, the English horsemen got into saddle, and having been mustered by General Lambert, made their way slowly towards the front of the enemy, seeking the upper part of the plain where the road to the south went crossing the Brocksburn rivulet. To gain the passage over the stream, swollen by incessant rain into a torrent, was the first object of the lord-general; and by his orders Lambert made an immediate attempt to seize the position with three regiments of horse. But their onset was energetically resisted by a brigade of Scottish lancers, aided by a dozen pieces of cannon, the fire of which latter was kept up with so much success as to compel Lambert's troopers to fall back in some disorder. However, the retreat had not gone far when Cromwell came up with the main body of his army, and his approach instantly changed the state of affairs. "We came seasonably in," the lord-general made his report to parliament, "and, at the push of the pike, did repel the stoutest regiments the enemy had there, merely with the courage the Lord was pleased to give." Brave as were the soldiers of Scotland, and under a good leader, their valour and his skill were insufficient to stem the assault of the old war-born veterans of England, guided by the greatest general of the age; and on the first cry of the legions calling upon the Lord of Hosts, the ranks of the fighters for the Covenant fell down like fields of wheat under a hail-storm. It was scarcely a battle on the part of Leslie's troops, but only a wild frantic flight before a foe whom all seemed to hold irresistible. According to Cromwell's own account, "The best of the enemy's horse was broken through and through in less than an hour's dispute," and the whole Scottish army in the same space of time "put to a total rout, our men having the chase and execution of them near eight miles." "We believe," the lord-general continued his report, written the day after the battle, "that upon the place and near about it were about three thousand slain; of prisoners taken, near ten thousand; the whole baggage and train taken, wherein was good store of match, powder, and bullet; all their artillery, great and small—thirty guns. We are confident they have left behind them not less than fifteen thousand arms; I have already brought in to me near two hundred colours; and that, which is no small addition, I do not believe we have lost twenty men." The eight-mile chase of the army of the Covenant went in the direction of Edinburgh, Cromwell himself joining in the pursuit as far as Haddington. "Arrived here," as related by one of the English soldiers, "the lord-general made a halt, and sang the hundred and seventeenth psalm," the dark mass of his Ironsides, bespattered with mud and blood, joining in the chorus: "O Praise the Lord, all ye nations; praise Him, all ye people. For His merciful kindness is great towards us, and the truth of the Lord endureth for ever. Praise ye the Lord."

The battle and rout of Dunbar had the immediate effect of placing Edinburgh, together with all the neighbouring fortresses, in the hands of Cromwell. He remained ten days at the Scottish capital, spending the "reasonable good leisure," as he called it, in a semi-theological, semi-military controversy with the leading Presbyterian ministers, who had taken refuge within the castle of Edinburgh, which was still holding out; and at the end of the time, on Saturday, the 14th of September, moved towards Stirling, which had been made the head-quarters of the troops escaped from the slaughter at the foot of the Lammermoor hills. Their position now was somewhat singular, most of the soldiers being uncertain whether they were still in arms for the Covenant, or for the faction of the "Malignants," or pure Royalists, the latter having thought fit to assume a high tone of speech after the fall of Edinburgh, declaring their intention to seat Charles II. on the throne of his fathers without the assistance of the Kirk and its ministers. To the youthful king of Scots, already deep in intrigue the Dunbar rout had been a source of satisfaction rather than of regret, as freeing him from the power of Argyle and the Presbyterian clergy, who made no secret of his being a mere tool in their hands, who beset him constantly with sermons and lectures, and whose very presence he had come to hate.

The report of the destruction of Leslie's army had no sooner reached Perth, where Charles had been residing of late, than a project was concocted by the Royalists that he should throw off the yoke of the Presbyterians, which was to be done by his retiring further into the north of Scotland, for the purpose of gathering a devoted army under his standard, while his friends were taking possession of as many of the garrisons of the country as they could seize, either by force or fraud. In execution of this design, the young king withdrew himself secretly from Perth on the evening of the 4th of October, and the same night reached the village of Clova, in the Grampian hills, where he was met by the earls of Huntley and Athol, and some other "Malignants," anxious equally to fight Argyle and the English invaders. It was expected by them that a vast number of the people of the Highlands would at once enrol under the banner of Charles II.; but the hopes proved vain, and finding Clova an excessively dull place, entirely without amusements, his majesty, at the end of a few days, expressed a wish to return to Perth, taking the opportunity of a small body of troops sent after him to enforce his desires against his own friends. But though thus breaking down in one direction, the royalist scheme did not prove an absolute failure, the chiefs of the "Malignants" succeeding in establishing themselves in many posts of importance deserted by the adherents of Argyle, as well as gaining over a number of the troops escaped from Dunbar. They also took possession of Stirling, while the English army was marching upon it from Edinburgh; and seeing their determination to hold the strongly-fortified city to the utmost, Cromwell was fain to withdraw from it after a short siege, deeming the place not sufficiently valuable to pay for the cost of an assault. It seemed wise, too, that as Presbyterians and Royalists had begun to quarrel, to let them fight their own battles, for the benefit of the "Good People."

Returned to Edinburgh, the lord-general was met by numerous protestations of affection from the citizens; and having been assured by many of them that the great majority of the people of Scotland were most desirous to live in friendship and union with England, he addressed a message, remarkable in many respects, to the national representatives in temporary session at Stirling, offering peace on the sole condition of casting off a "Person" sprung from an evil stock. "To the right honourable the Committee of Estates of Scotland, at Stirling, or elsewhere," the message ran. "The grounds and ends of the army's entering Scotland have been heretofore, often and clearly, made known unto you, and how much we have desired the same might be accomplished without blood. But, according to what returns we have received, it is evident your hearts had not that love to us as we can truly say we had towards you. And we are persuaded those difficulties in which you have involved yourselves, by espousing your king's interest, and taking into your bosom that person, in whom, notwithstanding what has or may be said to the contrary, that which is really malignant, and all Malignants, do centre, against whose family the Lord hath so eminently witnessed for bloodguiltiness, not to be done away by such hypocritical and formal shows of repentance as are expressed in his late Declaration. Your strange prejudices against us as men of heretical opinions, which, through the great goodness of God to us, have been unjustly charged upon us, have occasioned your rejecting those overtures which, with a Christian affection, were offered to you before any blood was spilt, or your people had suffered damage by us, the daily sense we have of the calamity of war lying upon the poor people of this nation, and the sad consequences of blood and famine likely to come upon them; the advantage given to the malignant, profane, and popish party by this war; and that reality of affection which we have so often professed to you, and concerning the truth of which we have so solemnly appealed, do again constrain us to send unto you, and to let you know, that if the contending for that person be not by you preferred to the peace and welfare of your country, the blood of your peoples, the love of men of the same faith with you, and, in this above all, the honour of the God we serve, then give the state of England that satisfaction and security for peaceable and quiet living beside you which may in justice be demanded from a nation giving so just ground to ask the same. It may be demanded from those who have, as you, taken their enemy into their bosom, whilst he was in hostility against them; and it will be made good to you that you may have a lasting and durable peace with them, and the wish of a blessing upon you in all religious and civil things. But if this be refused by you, we are persuaded that God, who hath once borne his testimony, will do it again on the behalf of us, his poor servants, who do appeal to him, whether their desires flow from sincerity of heart, or not. I rest, your lordships' humble servant, Oliver Cromwell."

To this touching appeal for peace, the more impressive as coming from a conqueror whose power could no longer be resisted, not even a reply was given. The "right honourable the Committee of Estates," from being Presbyterian at the outset of the war, had gradually verged towards Royalism; and now, sitting at Stirling, surrounded by Cavalier swords and backed by Cavalier purses, was devoted absolutely to what Cromwell called "the malignant, profane, and popish party," headed, at least nominally, by that distinguished young "Person" who had come over from Holland, claiming the rule over three nations as a birthright and inalienable heirloom. It was due more to the dislike of the Scots for the English people, result of centuries of sanguinary strife, than to any real affection for the son of the beheaded Stuart king, that his cause kept on prospering after the rout of Dunbar. However, Cromwell's efforts to conclude the war swiftly by an enduring treaty of alliance took so far effect as to bring about a decided separation between the pure Royalists and the sincere Presbyterians. While the former gained strength by unservedly proclaiming the real ends they had in view, the latter began to see the huge blunder they had made in seeking to find tools where they could only meet with masters; and this insight once obtained, they came to the conclusion that it would be infinitely wiser for them to seek alliance with the English Independents than with the high-handed and unscrupulous followers of the "Person."

The number of those willing to accept the olive-branch held out by Cromwell increased greatly after the sending out of his message to the Committee of Estates at Perth, copies of which were spread judiciously all over the country; and in the month following its publication it became manifest that a final separation between the "Malignants" and the strictly Presbyterian party could no longer be avoided. At the beginning of November, the Royalists, to signify their complete ascendancy in the remnant of the national government, made the Committee of Estates pass a vote ordering the solemn coronation of Charles II. at the ancient abbey of Seone, the Westminster of Scotland; but the resolution had no sooner been proclaimed when a great part of the population protested against it. The opposition was most energetic in the south-western counties, where it assumed the form of a grand Remonstrance, signed by thousands of persons of the upper and middle classes, who severely blamed the admittance of Charles II. into the kingdom, and earnestly declared themselves against the design of continuing the war on his account. To strengthen the arguments of the Remonstrance, its originators, in the counties of Renfrew, Ayr, Galloway, Wigton, and Dumfries, set to work raising an army of five thousand men, which was intrusted to the command of two veteran Presbyterian officers, Colonels Ker and Strachan. It was not intended at the commencement that these troops should unite with the invading army; but the current of events ran too strongly in that direction to prevent the joining of the two forces, and on the 1st of December, after a simulated engagement, Ker allowed the regiments under his command to give themselves up to General Lambert, while on the day following Strachan openly went over to Cromwell. Several smaller bodies of Presbyterian soldiers, either newly formed or remnants of the host defeated at Dunbar, followed the example set by Ker's and Strachan's troops, and before the year 1650 had come to an end, the army of the Covenant had ceased to exist. Its disappearance cleared the field for the two antagonists fighting, with open visors, for monarchy and republic.

The ceremony of the coronation of Charles II. at Scone, decreed by the Committee of Estates, took place with great pomp on the 1st of January, 1651, immediately after which the Royalists prepared to advance southward upon the capital of Scotland. For once in his life, Cromwell seemed unaccountably sluggish in the attack upon his enemies. He lingered first at Edinburgh, and then at Glasgow, preaching peace and entering upon long controversies with the religious and political leaders of the Presbyterian party, but making no other progress in the military subjugation of the country than taking possession of Edinburgh Castle, which for some months after Dunbar had been the refuge of the chief ministers of the Kirk, and of several smaller fortresses in the south and south-west. The hesitation was due partly to illness and suffering, and partly, and far more, to a sincere desire to spare the nation he had invaded further bloodshed, and to accomplish by peaceable negotiation alone one of the desires dearest to his heart, that of intimate union between the two kindred races of Scotland and England. However, as months passed on, developing only the further separation of the moderate Presbyterians and the Royalists, and strengthening rather than weakening the cause of the latter, Cromwell perceived the urgent necessity of grasping the sword anew, and dealing a good stroke against the adherents of the "Person." At the end of March, 1651, he had made all his preparations for besieging Stirling once more, but just as he was setting out towards it, he was seized by a severe fit of the ague, and thrown upon a bed of sickness for several weeks. Recovered from it, he went on a short visit to Glasgow, in very inclement weather, which brought on the ague a second time, and, immediately after, a third, the last relapse so dangerous as to alarm all his friends, who sent the report of it to London. There was a whole day's debate in parliament, on the 27th of May, about Cromwell's illness, and finally a vote was come to unanimously, requesting the lord-general to remove temporarily from the "sharpness of the air" in the north to some part of England, until, by the blessing of God, he might be able to resume the duties of his command; intrusting, in the meanwhile, the conduct of affairs to such hands as he might think most able for the task. The resolution of the commons, communicated through the lord-president of the Council of State, who likewise despatched the two most celebrated physicians of London to attend upon the illustrious patient, reached Cromwell on the 2nd of June, while gradually recovering from his third fit of ague; and feeling hopeful of having no further relapse, he thought it imperative upon him to decline the proposition for leaving Scotland. "I need not recite the extremity of my last sickness," he informed the lord-president; "it was so violent that indeed my nature was not able to bear the weight thereof. But the Lord was pleased to deliver me, beyond expectation, and to give me cause to say once more, 'He hath plucked me out of the grave.'" After declaring his firm intention to proceed in his undertaking as long as he had life and strength left, Cromwell proceeded,—"This cause is of God, and it must prosper. Oh, that all that have any hand therein, being so persuaded, would gird up the loins of their mind, and endeavour in all things to walk worthy of the Lord." There was terrible earnestness in the words of the ailing lord-general, of unhappy presage to the followers of the gay youth just crowned at Scone Abbey.

Having sufficiently recovered to be able once more to mount his steed, Cromwell mustered his forces near Edinburgh, at the foot of the Pentland Hills, on the 25th of June, and the day following set out for Stirling. The Royalists, some twelve thousand strong, under the nominal command of Charles II. and the actual orders of David Leslie, were lying in a strongly-entrenched position at Torwood, a little to the south of Stirling, and to force them from their vantage-ground to a battle in the open field was the first object of Cromwell in approaching the ancient city. To this end he drove in all their outlying posts, and effected various strategic operations intended to bring on a contest, but to no other purpose but that of inducing the enemy to coil himself up more and more in his retreat, thus plainly declaring the intention to avoid an engagement by all possible means. A siege of Stirling, with attack upon the Torwood entrenchments offering no chances of very speedy success, Cromwell, in the latter part of July, crossed the Forth into Fifeshire, and marching northward, went upon Perth. It took him a few days to capture all the fortified places between the Firth of Forth and the Tay, and on the 1st of August, Perth itself—or, as it was then called, St. Johnstown—surrendered, after a twelve hours' siege, making the English forces master of the great road to the Highlands, and thereby cutting off the Royalists from the chief source of their supplies. It was a most important gain, eminently calculated to bring about the issue so much desired by Cromwell of compelling the "Person"—to emerge from behind his earthen and stone bulwarks, and engage in a face-to-face struggle, the result of which, in all probability, would very soon, despatch him either into an English prison, or convey him back to his male and female friends at the Hague. But all the advantages of the capture of Perth were frustrated by an event, the news of which reached Cromwell only a few hours after he had taken possession of the city. The youth crowned at Scone had long looked with eager eyes towards the south; the crown of Scotland to him seemed a miserable burthen as long as it was not accompanied by the crown of England, and fancying that the time had come for making a grasp at the high object of all his desires, he had started in perish of it as soon as the flank march of Cromwell to Perth opened the way. On the 1st of August, the lord general heard with astonishment that the Scottish king, whom he had left shut up in the Torwood fortifications had crept out of them, and with his twelve thousand followers marched direct south, on the road to England.

Though sufficiently daring in conception, the start of the "godly prince" over the Border was far more reckless than bold. All England was profoundly tranquil under the wise rule of the Council of State, which administered the government of the realm with as much firmness as prudence. There was not a single man of social eminence among the crowd of persons known as Royalists, nor so much as an organized faction able to cope for a moment with the resources of the party guiding the helm of state; and it was therefore nothing more than unscrupulous audacity and utter unconcern for the miseries springing from his acts, which led the son of Charles I. to stir up a fresh civil war. But if he seriously counted upon any sympathy of even a portion of the people for his designs, a few days were enough to show young Charles that his presence in England was not at all desired. He left his camp near Perth on the last day of July, and hurrying southward in forced marches, crossed the western Border on the 5th of August, and early the following day entered Carlisle, driving out the small garrison of the place. Taking but a short rest at Carlisle, the invader hastened on to Penrith, from thence to Kendal, and further to Preston and Warrington, leaving Lancaster to the right. All along the road the population stared in silence and dismay at the twelve thousand fighting men, and the youth in their midst who called himself king of England, Scotland, and Ireland; all along the road they had to take by force the food and drink required, reading love in the eyes of none, and meeting bitter hatred only in many an uplifted arm; and with every mile further south they became more and more conscious that if not rushing onward wildly in their course, the sullen resistance of the mass of the population would soon stop their career. Arrived at Warrington, Charles himself, with all his recklessness and unconcern, appeared to get oppressed by the consciousness that those whom he considered his subjects were, if not actually full of hatred against him and his followers, at the least entirely indifferent to his cause, and that therefore its success was absolutely hopeless. But he pushed on nevertheless due south, from Warrington to Nantwich, from Nantwich to Shrewsbury, and from Shrewsbury to Worcester, arriving in the latter city, known as the one attached above all others to the cause of the Stuart kings, on the morning of the 22nd of August, and expressing his determination to make a stay here. Charles the First had planted his standard at Nottingham on the 22nd of August, 1642, and Charles the Second selected the ninth anniversary to raise his at Worcester.

Rapid as had been the march of young Charles and his twelve thousand from the heart of Scotland into the heart of England, there was at his heels a pursuing host storming along at no less furious a pace. The very moment Cromwell heard of the start of the "Malignants" for the south, he gathered up two-thirds of his forces, leaving the rest to garrison the principal towns in his possession, and hurried back from Perth to Edinburgh, and from thence to Newcastle-upon-Tweed, by the way he had entered Scotland. The road not being quite as straight as that taken by Charles, he crossed the Border four days later, but made up amply for lost time by a series of far-sighted strategic arrangements for laying hold of and defeating the Royalist army with the utmost speed and certainty. Of these arrangements he gave notice to the Speaker of the House of Commons, in a letter dated Leith, the 4th of August, written with the main object of allaying the alarm which, as he foresaw, would break out at the news of the advance of the "Malignants," and which in reality was far greater than he could possibly expect, a complete panic reigning in London and all the larger towns of the northern and western counties. "Major-General Harrison, with the horse and dragoons under him," Cromwell informed the Speaker, "and Colonel Rich, with the rest in those parts, shall attend the motions of the enemy, and endeavour the keeping of them together, as also to impede his march; they will be ready to act in conjunction with what forces shall gather together for this service. Major-General Lambert, this day, marched with a very considerable body of horse up to the enemy's rear. With the rest of the horse, and nine regiments of foot, most of them of our old foot and horse, I am hastening up, and shall, by the Lord's help, use every diligence." Lambert and his horse, making the utmost speed, got at the rear of the Royalists at Warrington, but did not attack them, having received stringent orders to the contrary from Cromwell, whose plan was to drive Charles farther into the heart of England, and there to crush him in his own iron embrace. The plan was ripe for execution by the time the invading army had reached Worcester. Hurrying on blindly thus far, the king from the north suddenly found himself hemmed in here on all sides; there glistened swords in front, and swords at his flank, and swords, dense like a forest, in his rear. Worn out with fatigue, and weary unto death, his own soldiers insisted on resting at Worcester; and giving way to them and to better necessity, Charles sat down awaiting his great foe, who was striding up from the Border, the fear of his name rolling before him like the thunder of battle.

Cromwell arrived in sight of Worcester on the 28th of August, having marched by way of York, Doncaster, Nottingham, Coventry, and Stratford, raising all along his road the soldiers of the militia, who flocked to his standard with the greatest alacrity. Thus, when arrived at the Severn, the total forces under his command, old and new, amounted to nearly thirty thousand, or much above twice the number fighting under the banner of Charles. However, if numerically inferior, the Royalists had the great advantage of position. The city itself was a place of considerable strength, surrounded by walls and towers, to which had been added, in the week preceding Cromwell's arrival, a series of extensive entrenchments, running along the course of the river, which made a sudden assault all but impossible. To risk the latter, or to commence a regular siege, seemed nevertheless the only two modes of aggression that could be chosen, and Charles flattered himself that either of the two might result to his advantage, and that if the worst should happen, he would have time to break through the long lines of his opponents with his cavalry, and, leaving his foot behind, be able to regain the Border. However, in calculating thus, the crowned youth of Scone left out of account that he was opposed by a general who was master of the art of war, and whose plans were as perfect as his genius was great. With consummate military skill, Cromwell threw a vast chain around Worcester, possessing himself of every path and road and bridge leading towards the city, and, the work accomplished, prepared to deal his final blow. The day fixed for it was the 3rd of September, the anniversary of the great victory at the foot of the Lammermoor Hills. The battle of Worcester was to complete the battle of Dunbar.

The contest began at three o'clock in the afternoon, with the advance of General Fleetwood, commanding the vanguard of Cromwell's army, from Upton towards Worcester. As at Dunbar, so now again, the watchword of Cromwell's soldiers was "The Lord of Hosts," and steadily advancing under this cry, they pushed up the river-side, till coming in contact, at Powick, near the junction of the Teme and the Severn, with the outposts of the Royalists. For nearly a quarter of an hour the latter stood their ground bravely, fighting under cover of the thick hedges of the district; but driven from one to the other, they at last got into confusion, and ended by scampering off in a panic into the city. While entering it at the south-western gate, another phase of the battle was being fought on the eastern side of Worcester, eagerly watched by Charles, who, with his staff and Scottish war council, had posted himself at the top of the cathedral, out of reach of the fatal bullets that were flying about thick and fast. Knowing that Cromwell himself was commanding the attack from the east, and fully aware that if it succeeded all would be lost, it was determined by the Royalist leaders, after the engagement on the river-bank had lasted for nearly an hour, to issue forth from the city on the side most threatened, and hazard a battle outside the walls, under the protection of the guns of a large tower, known as Fort Royal. The design was executed with much skill, but neither which, nor the most undaunted valour of the Scots, availed the least against the fierce onset of Cromwell's veterans. Before them the Royalists fell in masses, neither giving nor receiving quarter. "My lord-general did exceedingly hazard himself," wrote an eye-witness, "riding up and down in the midst of the fire, and riding, himself in person, to the enemy's foot, to offer them quarter, whereto they returned no answer but shot." After a desperate struggle of nearly two hours, Cromwell succeeded in driving the Scots back into Worcester, and then storming Fort Royal, and putting its garrison of fifteen hundred men to the sword, he turned their own guns upon the fugitives. Heaped upon each other, with death and destruction assailing them from all sides, the defeated Royalists now ran for their lives in the wildest disorder. More than three thousand were slain, and nearly all the rest, with the exception of the best-mounted horsemen, made prisoners. "Indeed, this hath been a very glorious mercy," the lord-general reported, at ten o'clock at night, to the Speaker of the House of Commons. Cromwell added that he was "weary and scarce able to write," but rejoiced in having gained another victory. "upon this day, being the 3rd of September, remarkable for a mercy vouchsafed to our forces on this day twelvemonth in Scotland." Dunbar and Worcester had become two links in one great chain, connected by the war-cry of "The Lord of Hosts."

Charles managed to escape from Worcester, foremost in putting his own royal person in safety, and after many ingenious hidings succeeded in getting out of the country, and back to his Dutch friends and mistresses. Very few of his deluded followers fared as well, those not slain on the battle-field, or made prisoners, falling a victim to the rage of the country people, who killed them like wild beasts wherever they were found. The news of the great victory over the Scotch Royalists created all through England the most intense enthusiasm, the more vehement as following close upon the terrible panic engendered by the first report of the invasion. The House of Commons was not behind in showing its gratitude to the great leader to whom the victory was due, and on the 8th of September a vote was passed, appointing four members of the Council of State to wait upon Cromwell, to present to him the acknowledgments of parliament for the eminent service he had rendered to the nation. Besides conveying their fervent thanks, the commons instructed their envoys to represent to the lord-general that, since, by the blessing of God, the enemy was totally defeated, and the state of affairs in the north was of a kind not to require his own immediate presence in the field, he would resolve to take such rest as might be most conducive to his health, and for that purpose select a residence within a few miles of Westminster, in order that they might have the benefit of his presence and advice in the further settlement of the affairs of the Commonwealth. The four members of the council of state, including Bulstrode Whitelock, and John Lislo, keepers of the great seal, and Oliver St. John, lord chief justice, left London the day after their appointment, and came up with Cromwell, wending his way to the capital, a little beyond Aylesbury. They were received by the victorious general, as recorded by Whitelock, "with all kindness and respect, and after ceremonies and salutations passed, he rode with them across the fields, where Mr. Winwood, the member for Windsor, met them with his hawks, and the lord-general, with the other gentlemen, went a little out of the way a-hawking." At Aylesbury, Cromwell and the parliamentary commissioners rested for a day and a night, "having much discourse as they supped together;" and on Friday, the 12th of September, the lord-general made his triumphal entry into London, amidst the boundless enthusiasm of the population. Among the crowds that lined the streets was the Rev. Hugh Peters, chaplain to Sir Thomas Fairfax, who whispered to his neighbour, as Cromwell was passing by, "That man will be king of England yet." The remark of the chaplain, a somewhat singular man, half-soldier half-divine, contained the outspoken thought of thousands of people. Indeed, it was impossible not to see that in the actual state of England it depended upon Cromwell alone to put the crown of the Stuarts on his head, and not only to be king, but to be king with more absolute power than the unfortunate ruler who had paid the price of despotism in front of Whitehall. Having conquered Ireland and overrun Scotland, the victorious lord-general had consummated the subjection of the three kingdoms by the great day of Worcester, which he himself called "the crowning mercy," and which, as many were inclined to believe, could have no other sequel than that of putting on his brow the royal diadem. The behaviour of Cromwell immediately after the great battle was not a little made to increase this belief. According to the narrative of the chief member of the Council of State, senior keeper of the Great Seal, the lord-general, soon after his triumphant entry into London, assembled a conference, or congress, of the leading political and military personages, for the discussion of the important question as to whether a monarchical or a republican government would be most preferable for the nation. In the words of Bulstrode Whitlock, "Upon the defeat at Worcester, Cromwell desired a meeting with divers members of parliament, and some chief officers of the army, at the Speaker's house. And a great many being there, he proposed to them, 'That now the old king being dead, and his son being defeated, he held it necessary to come to a settlement of the nation; and in order thereunto had requested this meeting, that they together might consider and advise what was fit to be done, and to be presented to the parliament.'" The conversation now ensuing, as reported by the keeper of the Great Seal, was very remarkable. "My lord," said the Speaker, addressing Cromwell, "this company were most ready to attend your excellence, and the business you are pleased to propound to us is very necessary to be considered. God hath given marvellous success to our forces under your command, and if we do not improve these mercies to some settlement, such as may be to God's honour and the good of this Commonwealth, we shall be much blameworthy." Then Bulstrode Whitlock himself, looked upon as one of the foremost leaders in parliament, took the word. "It is a great question, indeed," he said, seeming to feel his way, and looking for guidance to the lord-general, who, as yet, had not given the least hint as to his own opinions and wishes—"it is a great question, indeed, and not suddenly to be resolved. Yet it were pity that a meeting of so many able and worthy persons as I see here should be fruitless. I should humbly offer, in the first place, whether it be not requisite to be understood in what way this settlement is desired: whether of an absolute Republic or with any mixture of Monarchy?" The lord-keeper was plain-spoken enough, and, his little speech finished, all eyes turned upon Cromwell, to discover "what way this settlement is desired," and if there should be, for his own benefit, "any mixture of Monarchy."

Cromwell hesitated not to reply to the question indirectly put to him, but in a manner almost mocking to the audience, and which left his own intentions as dubious as ever. "My Lord Commissioner Whitlock," he exclaimed, "hath put us upon the right point; and, indeed, it is my meaning that we should consider whether a republic or a mixed monarchical government will be best to be settled. And if anything Monarchical, then in whom that power shall be placed?" Having thus answered a query by a query, the lord-general let his friends speak, evidently desirous that they, and not he, should take the initiative in the forthcoming "Settlement." The Speaker of the commons and the whole of the lawyers present at the conference were in favour of something "mixed monarchical," though seemingly not very clear in their ideas as to the ingredients of the mixture, while most of the military men, "Levellers" all of them, more or less, had the courage to tell Cromwell to the face that they preferred the republican system of government unadulterated. On the lord chief justice remarking, "It will be found that the rule of this nation without something of monarchical power will be very difficult to be settled," Colonel Desborough broke out, pertinently "I beseech you, my lord, why may not this, as well as other nations, be governed in the way of a republic?" The lord chief justice had no reply ready to this simple question, upon which Colonel Whalley, one of the judges who had sat upon the trial of Charles I., came forward with the sharp cut exclamation, "I do not well understand matters of law, but it seems to me the best way not to have anything of monarchical power in the settlement of our government." It was impossible for Cromwell, if he harboured really any intention of putting upon his head the crown of the Stuarts, not to see that his object would meet with the determined resistance of the chief army leaders; and they being infinitely more powerful and influential for the moment than the men of the parliamentary "Rump," who had long ceased to play any but a subordinate part in political affairs, he was all but forced to curb his ambition. In the meanwhile he could console himself that, if not in name, he was in reality monarch of England, Scotland, and Ireland, invested with more substantial power than any monarch that had ever borne the crown of the three kingdoms.

The complete subjection of Scotland and Ireland was effected, in less than six months after the battle of Worcester, by the troops which Cromwell had left behind, without himself returning to either country. On the 14th of August, 1651, the maiden fortress of Stirling, which had never yet been taken, fell under the fierce assault of the veterans of Marston Moor and Naseby, and the national records, as well as the regalia of Scotland, were packed up and sent to London as trophies of conquest. All the members of the Committee of Estates found at Stirling, including the old hero of the Covenant, the earl of Leven, had to go at the same time as prisoners to the Tower, and a new administration was instituted entirely dependent upon the English Council of State, or rather upon Cromwell. Dundee, the last stronghold in the hands of the Royalists, was taken by storm on the 1st of September, and all the inhabitants put to the sword; after which further resistance ceased, except on the part of some of the clans in the north, who clared to withstand in their mountain fastnesses the invincible swords of the soldiers of the Commonwealth. To curb these Highlanders, a long chain of military stations was drawn, by Cromwell's orders, across the country from Moray Firth to the Loch of Linnhe; strong citadels were erected at Ayr, Leith, Perth, and Inverness, and the English army was gradually reinforced to twenty thousand men. Scotland, thus conquered, lost all the attributes of an independent nation. Three weeks after the storm of Dundee, which spread infinite terror all through the northern kingdom, the House of Commons, on the demand of the Council of State, passed a vote declaring "that Scotland might and should be incorporated into and become a Commonwealth with England, whereby the same government enjoyed by the good people of this nation, without king or House of Lords, may be derived and communicated to the people of Scotland."

Somewhat more difficult than the conquest of Scotland was that of Ireland. Here it was not merely, as in the former country, a strife for the overthrow of a political party, but a deep struggle of race and religion, which gradually assumed all the features of a war of extermination on the part of the English invaders. Cromwell on every occasion frankly expressed his resolve of driving the "Papist" Irish out of Ireland, and filling the country with English or Scotch settlers, or, if they could not be had in sufficient numbers, French, German, or Dutch Protestants; and in pursuance of this extraordinary plan, conception of the fiercest religious fanaticism, the war against the unfortunate natives was not long in becoming a vast carnage. After having reduced, with all but marvellous rapidity, Drogheda, Wexford, Cork, Kilkenny, Clonmel, and a multitude of smaller places, which gave him possession of the whole of Leinster and Munster, Cromwell on departing left to his son-in-law the work of conquering the rest of Ireland, reserving to himself the superior direction of his civil and military policy. Ireton's chief task now consisted in making himself master of Connaught and Ulster, the former entirely, and the latter province partly, in the hands of the insurgents, rebels against English authority. He executed his commission with great energy, displaying considerable military genius, as well as diplomatic capacity, in fomenting dissensions among the natives. In a short campaign, while the Scots were fighting for the Covenant and Charles II., he overran the greater part of the west of Ireland, capturing all its strongholds, with the exception of Limerick. To the siege of this city, Ireton sat down early in the autumn of 1651, and after taking it by capitulation, on the eve of a storm, prepared to push on to Galway. But on the march thither he was seized by fever, the produce of fearful hardships he had undergone for several months, which carried him off on the 27th of November.

The death of Cromwell's son-in-law and representative encouraged the Irish to make another great effort for averting the deluge that was sweeping over them, but it proved as fruitless as all their former resistance. Ireton's place was taken by General Fleetwood, who, of equal military talents, though less political wisdom, continued his victorious career, till in the course of a few months he had trampled down with iron heel the last remnant of organised forces opposing him. Nearly all the armed Irish not perishing in the field were put to the sword, or sent to the West India settlements as slaves, while the few that escaped with their lives had to hide amidst bogs and mountains, where they gathered round them bands of brigands, known as "Raperees" and "Tories"—the latter appellation derived from the word "tournighim," following for the sake of plunder—to pursue for a short time longer a precarious kind of guerilla warfare. In the meanwhile the conquerors engaged upon the "settlement" of Ireland. Only English laws were allowed, and only English immigrants entrusted with the full rights of citizens; all Roman Catholics were deprived of the offices and dignities they held, and no "Papist" was permitted to reside within any garrison or market town, or to move more than a mile from his own dwelling without a passport. Every meeting of four persons, not members of one household, was declared a treasonable assembly, and the carriage of arms, or mere possession, made a capital offence; and, finally, all "suspected persons" were ordered to be put in prison, or to be banished, or, at the discretion of the judges, to be shipped off as slaves. To complete the conquest of Ireland, an "Act of Settlement" was passed by the House of Commons in August, 1652, which confiscated the property of all persons who had borne arms against the parliament, as well as of all persons who had not shown themselves active supporters of the English supremacy, the whole of whom were not only deprived of their possessions, but ordered to be transported from their homes to the wild districts west of the Shannon. Those passing the Shannon boundary, even if only crossing the river, might be put to death by the first settler meeting them, like wild beasts escaped from their cages. Oliver Cromwell professed to have the most exalted objects in view in thus trampling upon and trying to exterminate a whole race; yet even the warmest admirers of the august hero of the Commonwealth must have grave doubts whether his aims justified his means.

The conquest of Scotland and Ireland had a great effect upon raising the English nation in the eyes of foreign sovereigns, and instilling in them a sincere desire to keep in peace and amity towards the new government. Both the two great powers hitherto the warlike opponents of England, Spain and France, showed in many ways their inclination to establish friendly intercourse with the Council of State and the victorious general whose sword was fast becoming a sceptre; and nearly all the other princes of Europe, while ostentatiously professing abhorrence of the execution of Charles I., made secret efforts to gain the good will of the men who had sent him to the scaffold. But there was one exception in the case of a state from whom it was to be the least expected, that of the republic of the Netherlands. In throwing off the heavy yoke of Stuart despotism, the English had fought precisely the same battle as the Dutch in their successful combat against Spanish tyranny; but so far from showing sympathy on this account, the latter rather exhibited hatred on beholding a nation, striving to attain the same political and religious objects, accomplish their task. From the very beginning of the civil war, the rulers of the Dutch republic supported the royal cause more than any other government; they allowed Henrietta Maria to sell and pawn the English regalia in their country; they assisted her to buy ships, arms, and warlike stores; and they even furnished her with soldiers to invade a nation struggling for freedom as they had done. This hostile attitude reached its height after the death of Charles, when there occurred an event almost unheard of in the intercourse between civilized nations. Holding to the belief that all the antagonism hitherto shown by the Dutch government was due more to the fact of the prince of Orange, the Stadtholder, or first magistrate of the republic, being the son-in-law of Charles, than to any base commercial policy, envious of the rise of England's power, the Council of State, immediately after the death of the king, decided on despatching a special envoy to Holland, with authority to conclude an intimate alliance between the two countries. The person chosen for this important office was Dr. Dorislaus, an eminent lawyer, a native of the Netherlands, his selection being made on purpose as complimentary to his countrymen. It was an ill omen for the success of the negotiation that the States General, the representative assembly of the United Provinces, presented themselves in a body to the heir of Charles I., as soon as the report of the Whitehall execution reached Holland; however, the English envoy started notwithstanding on his errand, reaching the Hague at the end of April, 1649. Seeing the son of Henrietta Maria ride about in pompous style at the same place, calling himself King Charles II., Dr. Dorislaus modestly took up his quarters at an inn, bent upon doing his work without any show or ceremony. He had been there about a week, presenting his credentials, when, on the evening of the 2nd of May, he sat down to supper at a public table, accompanied by a few friends. During the repast the door opened, and six persons, heavily armed, and their faces hidden by masks, entered the room. One of them, politely addressing the bystanders, begged them not to disturb themselves, while the others laid hands upon the English ambassador, pulled him from his seat, and hacked him to pieces with their swords. Leaving the house, the murderers loudly boasted of their deed, declaring that it had been committed by command, in retaliation of the execution of Charles I. The hopeful son of Henrietta Maria had chosen to inaugurate his so-called reign by an assassination.

The news of the murder of Dr. Dorislaus excited the greatest indignation all over England. It was resolved instantly by the commons to make the royalists of the sham court at the Hague answerable for the foul deed, while a vote was passed at the same time settling a state pension upon the family of the assassinated envoy, and ordering him a public funeral. The latter took place in Westminster Abbey, attended by all the members of parliament, the Council of State, the judges, and an immense concourse of people, whose words and attitude proclaimed the deep resentment felt against the men who had committed the murder, as well as the government under whose protection they lived. Very little was done by the Dutch authorities towards discovering the assassins and bringing them to due punishment; and although the ambassador of the republic in London was instructed to declare the regret of his masters for what had happened, it was felt on all hands that this was a mere diplomatic pretence, and that to punish the outrage, and the more and more hostile action of the rulers of the United Provinces, a war would be necessary. Matters were fast drifting in this direction, when an unforeseen event postponed for a while the drawing of the sword. On the 6th of November, 1650, Prince William of Orange, son-in-law of Charles I., died of the small-pox, at the early age of twenty-five; and with him perished not only the leader of the faction most hostile to the English commonwealth, but the man in whom centered the monarchical aspirations of the trading aristocracy and the ultras in church and state. The prince of Orange died childless, and though a few days after his decease his widow gave birth to a son—famous in times to come as William III. of England—his family ceased to have any influence, thus enabling the leaders of the democratic party in Holland, who had always been waging war against the house of Orange, to recover once more their ascendancy, which they proclaimed by entirely abolishing the office of Stadtholder. The revolution thus effected encouraged the Council of State, acting under the impulse of Cromwell, to bring forward a grand proposal, one of the loftiest in conception ever thrown out by English statesmen. It was nothing less than a plan for the incorporation of the United Provinces of the Netherlands with the English Commonwealth, and the formation thereby of an all-powerful republic, the champion of Protestantism and liberty against the world.

To give becoming dignity to the embassy carrying so important a proposition, Cromwell fixed upon his friend Oliver St. John, lord chief justice, and one of the leading members of the Council of State, as the chief representative of the Commonwealth, and the latter, having accepted the appointment, left England at the beginning of March, 1651. Accompanied by a suite of forty gentlemen, besides numerous attendants and servants, Oliver St. John entered the Hague in state, well received by the upper classes, upon whom the brilliant victories of the English armies in Ireland and Scotland were making a deep impression. However, the first interview of the lord chief justice with the principal members of the States General, who for the moment carried on the government of the United Provinces, went far to show that his mission would prove, as far as its substance went, an entire failure. Already a reaction was taking place in the country against the democratic party who had seized the reins of power; and the adherents of the house of Orange being still very numerous, and jealousy and hatred of the rising prosperity and influence of England great among the mercantile population, nothing else was possible than that the offers made by Cromwell should be refused. This was done on the outset with politeness, hopes being held out by the negotiators acting on behalf of the States General that if not all, at least some of the propositions for an alliance with the Commonwealth might be granted; but as time went on, the English ambassador saw plainly that the men with whom he was dealing were not acting in good faith, and he therefore deemed it best to retire from his post, the more so as the time fixed by parliament for the duration of the negotiations had already elapsed. But he was not allowed to leave without fresh affronts being heaped upon him and the nation he represented. The populace at the Hague, excited by men of the Orange faction and others inimical to England, pursued the suite of the ambassador whenever they showed themselves in the streets, broke the windows of the hotel where Oliver St. John had taken up his residence, and even insulted him openly in the streets, while a follower of the Stuarts on one occasion made an attempt upon his life. It was in vain he demanded redress from the leaders of the government. They professed themselves powerless against the mob; and on his insisting to obtain the protection due to all acknowledged envoys of sovereigns and states, went so far as to confess that the people of the United Provinces, in its majority, was bitterly hostile to England. They might have added that it was an hostility springing from the meanest sources that could possibly sway the conduct of nations, and in saying this would have spoken no more than the truth. There now remained for the lord chief justice but one other act to accomplish, which was to take his farewell audience. He obtained it on the 20th of June, having resided three months in the Netherlands to accomplish a most noble and exalted object, and got in return for his efforts scorn and insult. The great dream of Cromwell to seek champions of religious and political liberty among a people of hucksters and money-lenders was nothing, and could be nothing, but a dream.

Neither Cromwell nor any of his friends knew much of the character of the Dutch people when planning their grand scheme for a union of the two countries; but Oliver St. John had learnt something during the three months he lived in Holland, and the experience was not lost upon him. Aware that nothing but material success could ever make an impression upon the men with whom he was negotiating, and that even the slight check which the English arms had received in the failure to take Stirling on the first assault had contributed to his offers being spurned, he gave vent to his feelings in a very plain speech, delivered before the States General at his farewell audience. "I perceive," he exclaimed, "that your High Mightinesses are awaiting the issue of affairs in Scotland, that you may regulate your carriage to our government accordingly, and for that reason you have slighted the generous overtures with which we were charged. It was foreseen by some members of our parliament, who dissuaded from this embassy, advising that we should first finish our war with Scotland, and then expect your representatives on our shores. But, as far as I was concerned, I thought more honourably of you. I was wrong; and I now confess that these cautious advisers understood you better. Take my word for it, however, our Scottish campaign will soon be terminated as our warmest friends could wish, and you will then repent your having so lightly treated the proposals we have made." Oliver St. John, after returning to England, did all in his power to reverse the friendly policy which he and his colleagues had been so much inclined to follow towards Holland; and by his advice a measure was adopted by parliament intended to wound the trading republicans of the Low Countries in their most vulnerable part, namely, their purses. The people of Holland had got rich through acting as the general carriers of Europe and of the civilized world, interchanging the produce of distant countries, sending ships from pole to pole, bartering the spices of the south against the furs of the north, keeping staples of merchandize for every nation, and claiming a toll and profit upon all. To reduce this profit to a considerable extent, it was only necessary that the English nation, first becoming one of the wealthiest of Europe, as well as the most powerful, should withdraw her customs and it was this Oliver St. John sought to accomplish by a statute, famous for all times as the "Navigation Act." It was laid before the commons on the 5th of August, a month after the return of the lord chief justice from Holland, and passing without delay, proved an immediate blow, greater even than expected by the originator, to the Dutch carrying trade. The simple provisions of the Navigation Act were, first, that "no goods, the produce of Asia, Africa, or America, shall be imported into this country in ships which are not the property of England, or its colonies," and, secondly, "that no produce or manufacture of any part of Europe shall be imported unless in ships the property of England, or of the country originating such produce or manufacture."

The passing of the Navigation Act, coming in the wake of the battle of Worcester, last testimony of the immense strength of the Commonwealth, aroused the rulers of the United Provinces to an extraordinary degree, and throwing aside all their former haughtiness, they now pressed eagerly forward to grasp the hand offered to them in vain a few months before. Early in September, 1651, a letter, full of humility, offering friendship, union, and everything else, was addressed by the States General to the House of Commons; and three months after, towards the close of the year, James Catz, the foremost political leader of the democratic party in the Netherlands, and who had filled the office of Grand Pensionary, or first magistrate of the republic, arrived in London with two other ambassadors to resume the treaty broken off in June by the departure of the English envoy from the Hague. In his introductory audience, Catz spoke in the most conciliating terms of the desire of his government to be on a friendly footing with the Council of State, regretted the delay that had taken place in accepting the propositions brought by the lord chief justice, and finally offered to conclude immediately, awaiting the formation of a union between the Commonwealth and the United Provinces, a league, offensive and defensive, between the two countries. But it was too late. At the moment when the Dutch ambassadors were presenting themselves before parliament, prepared to do the utmost to engage England into an alliance, war had already been proclaimed, if not directly at least in acts, against their country. Through the exertions mainly of Oliver St. John, whose former admiration of the staunch little republic of traders and fishermen that had grown up in the marches at the mouth of the Rhine seemed all at once changed into bitter hatred, letters of marque had been issued in favour of several merchants who complained of ill-treatment from the government of the United Provinces; and while Catz and his brother envoys were yet talking, English privateers were flying up and down the Channel to pounce upon Dutch merchantmen, freighted with the rich produce of southern climes. In the course of a few months eighty trading vessels belonging to the Netherlands were brought into the Thames, and before the last had come, the envoys of the republic had gone home, with sorrow in their hearts. England once more, after a long lapse of time, was entering upon a great naval war.

It was an undertaking of no little boldness on the part of Cromwell, and the men who with him and under him guided the destinies of the Commonwealth, thus suddenly to confront a power claiming the sovereignty of the seas. World-commanding as were the successes achieved by the host of armed men that had sprung into existence to defeat royal absolutism, England yet remained weak and almost insignificant upon the ground that had once been her favourite battle-field, and of which Nature seemed to have given her the command. The last remnant of the fleet created by Elizabeth lay rotting in the Thames and Medway, and the sea-kings that had defeated world upon the ocean, their flag waving triumphant upon the highroads of the sea, and the names of their commanders words of power in the most distant regions. One name, above all others, had grown up to the highest pinnacle of fame, that of Martin Harpertsoon Van Tromp. The son of a captain of a small vessel, Van Troship, born in 1597, was brought up on the sea; and his father having been killed in an engagement with an English cruiser off the coast of Guinea, he imbibed an intense hatred for the nation aiming to dispute the supremacy of his own country on the ocean. After distinguishing himself greatly in the contest with Spain, defeating successively three fleets equipped by Philip IV., Van Tromp was appointed, in 1650, to the chief command of the whole Dutch navy, under the title of vice-admiral. Although a prominent member of the Orange party, to which he attached himself mainly because of their hostility to England, the powers of Van Tromp were increased after the death of Prince William and the extinction of the office of Stadtholder, his influence and renown leading to his being appointed head of the Council of the Admiralty. In this council, or board of government, was vested the supreme direction of the maritime affairs of the Netherlands, to such an extent that they could act independent of the assembly of the States General, the concentration of authority thus obtained, though adverse to republican principles, being deemed indispensable to maintain intact the bulwark of the nation. His nomination to the high post having made Van Tromp virtual arbiter of peace or war, he lost not a moment in deciding for the latter, much against the wishes of the majority of the members of his government, who, having the material interests of the people at heart, ardently desired to remain in friendship with England. By a decision of the Council of Admiralty, come to in February, 1652, a fleet of one hundred and fifty armed ships was ordered to be fitted out for the ensuing summer, and although the States General disapproved the step, it was carried out nevertheless. To hurry matters still further to a crisis, Van Tromp put himself at the head of a squadron of forty ships at the commencement of May, and went sailing to the Downs. As yet the English and Dutch republics were nominally at peace with each other, but little failed to kindle the flame of war, and Van Tromp was determined to apply the torch.

There were not wanting grounds for coming to a collision. Since the time of Elizabeth, the English government had claimed the right, which had generally been submitted to, that the ships of other nations should strike the flag before its own, when passing through the Channel, or the so-called "narrow seas." Being a mere matter of courtesy, not at all infringing upon their pecuniary interests, dearest to them of all others, the Dutch had hitherto made no objection to concede the demand; but Admiral Van Tromp, on sailing for the Straits of Dover, determined to make it a point of dispute, and, if possible, a commencement for hostilities, in both of which he succeeded to the extent of his desires. The fleet of the Commonwealth, consisting of not more than twenty small vessels, under the command of Robert Blake, colonel of a regiment of horse during the civil war, the Great Armada were dead and gone, leaving no successors behind. Like all else, the navy, once the pride and glory of the nation, had fallen to wreck and ruin under the Stuarts, the most despicable race of kings that ever held the sceptre of a proud and noble people. On the other hand, the Dutch fleet of war had risen to the highest state of efficiency during the same time that the English had fallen to the lowest step of decay. The sailors of the United Provinces had taken the place of the Elizabethan sea-kings; they had come to call themselves, and in reality were, lords of the and recently appointed "Sea General," was lying at anchor in the Downs when Van Tromp approached with his forty ships, on the 19th of May, and sailed at once right into the midst of it, under the pretence of being driven onward by stress of weather. The excuse was accepted, but at the same time the Dutch admiral was summoned to lower his flag as usual before the English, which he refused, declaring he had no orders from the Council of the Admiralty of the United Provinces. A second summons followed quickly in the wake of the first, to which Van Tromp replied by ranging his squadron in battle order, and pouring a broadside into Blake's flag-ship. The necessary consequence was an action which, continued for four hours, ended in the flight of the Dutch, who had one ship taken from them and another sunk, and did not stop in their retreat till getting to the Texel. It was the first time Van Tromp had been made to fly on his native element; he had driven all the admirals of Spain and France before him, and was defeated now by an English colonel of dragoons.

The victory, due to nothing but the undaunted bravery of the men under Blake's command, young sailors but old soldiers, who inverted all the rules of naval warfare as hitherto understood by storming ships like fortresses, and falling upon the enemy as in a cavalry charge, created the greatest enthusiasm all through England, but an equal despondency in the United Provinces. However, there was a wide conflict of opinion in the latter country as to the steps next to be taken. The people, warlike and proud of their dearly-bought independence, were clamouring for a continuation of hostilities, to wipe out the disgrace of their flag, while the upper classes and leading political men, having a deeper stake in the commercial prosperity of the republic than the mass of their fellow-citizens, took an opposite view, arguing that a prolonged contest with England, kindred in race, in institutions, and in religion, would be unwise to the highest degree, resulting, even if directly successful, in nothing else but the fresh ascendancy of the great Roman Catholic powers of Europe and of that spirit of despotism and of repression which ever had been, and probably would long continue to be, the direst foe of the nation. The latter view, by far the highest and most statesmanlike, prevailed at once in the States General; and little more than a week after the news of the naval encounter between Van Tromp and Blake had reached the Hague, it was resolved by them to send a new ambassador to England, instructed to apologise for what had occurred, and to offer fresh terms of peace and amity.

In order to show in a striking manner the importance attached to the mission, the rulers of the republic selected as their representative in the negotiations with the Commonwealth the highest dignitary of the state, Adrian Pauw, Grand Pensionary of the United Provinces. Pauw arrived in London early in June, 1652, less than three weeks after the engagement in the Downs, and on the eleventh of the month had his first audience with the Council of State. In his address he represented the naval combat that had taken place as an "unlucky chance," and as an "unhappy accident," throwing the blame of it equally upon Van Tromp and Blake, but adding that there was nothing his government had more at heart than that what had thus occurred should be wholly laid aside and forgotten, or treated as a thing that had never happened. He moreover proposed that all further hostilities should be instantly stopped on both sides, and that the treaty of union and alliance should be proceeded with, consenting in the meanwhile, in the name of the States General, that the honour of the flag of England should be paid strictly in the manner desired by the Council of State. It was almost impossible for a government respecting itself to go further in self-humiliation; but it was not enough for the rulers of the Commonwealth. They had begun to taste of the sweets of victory in a new form, and they now yearned for more. If a colonel of dragoons had beaten the most renowned admiral living in a sea fight, what might not a general do?

But it was not mere vain consideration of glory that incited the action of Cromwell and his friends. Complex as were the motives of the men whose arms and whose brains had upst the throne of the Stuarts, and outrooted despotism, all had one high object in common, which was the greatness of England. And they saw that for England to be truly great it was an indispensable necessity that she should be sovereign upon the seas, and seeing this they prepared to wrestle for the sovereignty. Therefore, in replying to the address of the Grand Pensionary, the Council of State, speaking in the name of the commons, took a lofty tone. They said that, combining what had passed on the 19th of May with the great maritime preparations that had been going on for months in the United Provinces, with the notorious protection given to the bitter enemies of the Commonwealth, they could not consent to forgive and forget the combat in the Downs as a simple "unhappy accident." It would be necessary, the Council stated, to guard the nation of England from a similar outrage hereafter, and the negotiations of the treaty of peace could not be resumed till the wound inflicted had been healed. In the meanwhile, till this was done, they had to seek, as occasion offered, reparation for the wrongs already suffered, as well as security for the future. To this stern communication, amounting to little less than an open challenge for a renewal of hostilities, the Grand Pensionary made a humble rejoinder, proffering fresh apologies for the past, and inquiring to know what was the "reparation" demanded by the Council of State. The reply was that the matter might form the subject of a special treaty, but that preparatory to it the States General would have to pay a compensation for the expenses and losses sustained by the Commonwealth through the hostile proceedings of the United Provinces, the damages of which had been calculated to represent the sum of one million six hundred and eighty-one thousand eight hundred and sixteen pounds sterling. On reporting this message to his government the ambassador at once received letters of recall, the demand of the million and a half having touched the rulers of the Netherlands in their tenderest feelings; and on the 30th of June Adrian Pauw took his farewell audience of the Council of State. A week after, on the 9th of July, a proclamation was issued by parliament declaring war against the United Provinces. The document, enumerating the causes which brought the Commonwealth to grasp the sword, as last appeal to justice, dwelt chiefly on the facts that the pretender to the English crown had been long under the open protection of the Dutch government; that the expedition against Scotland had been fitted out at the Hague; that the States General had been culpably remiss in punishing the murderers of Dr. Dorilaus; that they had connived at the indignities put upon Oliver St. John, that they had fitted out one hundred and fifty ships of war while peace negotiations were yet pending; and that blood had been shed in a most unjustifiable manner by the attack of Admiral Van Tromp upon the English fleet in the Downs. In conclusion, the proclamation declared that for the issue of their cause parliament now depended, not on any policy or strength of men, but upon the goodness and assistance of God.

The war commenced, immediately after the issue of the proclamation, with extraordinary energy. Sir George Ayscough, a veteran of the civil war, who, like Blake, had turned readily and genially from a horse captain to a ship's captain, had just returned to the Thames from a cruise in the West Indies, during which he had conquered Barbadoes; and to strengthen his little fleet Cromwell ordered a certain number of foot soldiers to be drafted from every regiment in the army for naval service. Five hundred men were shipped immediately in this manner, and brought at once into action, Ayscough, in leaving the river, falling in with a fleet of forty Dutch merchantmen, escorted by four men-of-war. In a short battle, fought in the novel English fashion of the soldiers storming the enemy's ships, treating them like mere wooden fortresses somewhat insecure in their foundation, the Dutch were utterly defeated, one third of them being captured or destroyed, and the rest forced to run on the French coast, where most of them were wrecked. In the meantime, while Ayscough was executing cavalry charges in the Channel, Blake, looking for prizes further north, fell in, midway between the coasts of Scotland and the Netherlands, with a fleet of six hundred herring busses, richly laden, and protected by twelve men-of-war. Attacking the latter at once with fierce impetuosity, he captured nine of the ships and sank three, after which, taking possession of the cargoes of the fishermen, he sent them home, with the advice to take to grow cabbages and make cheese, instead of venturing upon the high seas, the property of the Commonwealth of England.

The extraordinary boldness of the proceedings of both Ayscough and Blake roused the Dutch to frantic wrath; and thinking of nothing but retaliation, the renowned admiral of the republic rushed forth from the Texel, taking with him eighty of the largest men-of-war, together with ten fire-ships. He first went in search of Sir George Ayscough, whom he met in the Downs, quietly at anchor, watching for goodly prizes in the shape of spice-laden Indiamen returning to Amsterdam. An engagement seemed imminent, but at the moment Van Tromp was making his preparations for it, a dead calm came on, followed by a south-westerly gale, which drove him back into the North Sea. Being here, he resolved to fall upon Blake before going back to the Channel, loudly expressing his determination to annihilate the rash intruder upon the seas, who had dared to treat citizens of the "ocean republic" with so much contumely. But Blake, after dispersing the fleet of fishing busses, had captured two Dutch merchantmen, and searching for more, had gone to the Orkney Islands, expecting some valuable cargoes to float into his way in that neighbourhood, while endeavouring to get home by rounding North Britain. After some search, Van Tromp came up with Blake between the Orkneys and Shetlands; but again, while proceeding to attack, the elements turned against him. A fearful storm arose, which, scattering his ships in all directions, compelled him to retreat; and instead of the ninety ships with which he had left, he only brought forty back to Amsterdam. Arrived here, the same populace who but a few months before had worshipped him as a demigod, publicly hooted him in the streets, while the government deprived him of his offices and dignities. In the eyes of every Dutch patriot Van Tromp's offences were unpardonable, no victory having been gained, and all the herrings lost.

Their anger did not incline the republicans of the Low Countries to prosecute hostilities with less energy than before; and a new fleet having been fitted out, it left the Texel at the beginning of September. To the chief command of this armament, consisting of sixty-four ships of war of the largest size, the States General appointed Cornelius De Witt, member of one of the most illustrious families of the United Provinces, while under him, as lieutenant, served Michiel Adrianzoon De Ruyter, considered inferior to no sea captain of the age, except Van Tromp. On the 28th of September, the Dutch fleet, sweeping grandly up the Channel, hove in sight of Blake's squadron near the South Foreland, and a few shots having been exchanged on both sides, preparations were made for a general battle. But at this moment dissensions broke out between De Witt and De Ruyter, the former desiring an immediate combat, and the latter counselling a short postponement, to bring up several ships that were lagging in the rear. While the Dutch admirals were disputing, Blake fell upon them, and after a few hours' fight drove them back with great loss as far as the mouth of the Scheldt. The defeat caused a fresh uprising of the mob of Amsterdam, and the weathercock of popular favour swinging round once more, De Witt and De Ruyter were condemned as Van Tromp had been before, and the latter reinstated in power, there being no other man of note to take his place. This time, to repair the disgrace of his former failures, the old sea hero went to work with the utmost skill as well as caution, and stealing up to the Downs, succeeded in pouncing upon the English fleet by surprise, of defeating Blake, and driving him up the Thames, as far as Gravesend. Proud of this victory, the States General followed it up by declaring the whole of England under blockade, while Van Tromp, as an insult to the Commonwealth, put up a broom at the masthead of his ship, and kept sailing up and down the Straits of Dover, declaring he would sweep the English for ever from the seas. But the "for ever" has lasted two months.

Having been retained for the winter months in the harbours of the Thames and the Medway, Blake came out again early in February, 1653, with seventy-nine sail, and on the 18th of the month formed a line right across the Channel, between Portland Bill and Cape La Hogue, to offer battle to Van Tromp, who was coming up southward, in charge of a homeward-bound fleet of three hundred merchantmen. The fight lasted all day, without any decided success on either side, and was renewed on the 19th, the 20th, and the 21st of February, the navies of the Commonwealth and of the Dutch republic hanging together, drifting with the tides, and struggling for supremacy, like monsters of the sea engaged in death combat. But at last, on the fourth day of the battle, British pluck and daring carried everything before it. Though determined to hold out to the utmost, Van Tromp, having seen eleven men-of-war and thirty merchantmen captured before his eyes, found himself compelled to retreat, to save the rest, and taking advantage of a dark night and favourable winds, he fled precipitately towards the mouth of the Maas. No Dutch admiral ever after put up the broom at the masthead.

Victorious at home and abroad, the Commonwealth at this moment seemed firmly established, and yet there was approaching a crisis in its fortunes. Successful in every enterprise as had been the government founded on the ruins of the throne of Charles I., there was in reality a great source of weakness at the very base of it, in the defectiveness of its legal title. It was not only that the House of Commons, in which was vested the supreme power of the realm, was no strictly representative assembly, but merely the part of one, a "Rump parliament," as it was expressively called; but even considered as the fraction of a body created by the nation, it did not reflect the popular will, nearly half a generation having elapsed since its members had been elected. The fabric was manifestly held together only, and kept in all the outward appearances of life and strength by the matchless power and genius of a single man, yet this man again was invested with no visible mark of high authority, and in an altogether uncertain position. Though without Cromwell neither the "Rump parliament," nor its executive organ, the Council of State, could hope to live a single month, yet nominally the conqueror of three kingdoms was their servant, liable to be dismissed at any moment, and to be stripped of what titles and dignities he enjoyed by a mere vote. The situation, entirely unnatural, and full of peril for the stability of the Commonwealth, became still more so through the constant jealousy, evinced by the members of the House of Commons against the man who, as they could not help confessing to themselves, was virtually their master. The jealousy, at first hidden under more or less of adulation, the voting of large sums of money, and of the use of the royal palaces, to the victorious lord-general, gradually developed itself into a definite form by ever-renewed attempts to reduce, and, if possible, dissolve the army; and those not being entirely successful, through the resistance of the troops themselves, efforts were made to diminish the influence of the commander-in-chief by vesting some of his functions in the Council of State. Cromwell, on his part, retaliated by seeking to get rid of the House of Commons altogether. It appeared no very difficult task, as the "Rump parliament" suffered under decided unpopularity, and its members were being looked upon by the population at large as mere impostors, so that on a due amount of pressure being applied by Cromwell, parliament found itself compelled to resolve upon its own dissolution, and the meeting of a new representative assembly. The vote to this effect, although come to with great reluctance, rather increased than allayed the outcry against the "Rump," inasmuch as the date for the dissolution had been fixed at three years' distance, while the people were all but unanimous in demanding that it should take place at once. Here was a great opportunity for Cromwell, and he neglected not to take advantage of it. If an obnoxious House of Commons was deaf to the call of the nation, he would be its interpreter, speaking loud enough to make the sound of the people's voice reverberate through the ancient hall of St. Stephen's. In consequence, the lord-general resolved upon overthrowing parliament by the same engine which already had served him to upset a throne.

It was in February, 1653, while Blake was beating Van Tromp in the Channel, taking for ever the broom from Dutch mastheads, that the conflict between Cromwell and the House of Commons reached its height. In consequence of the constantly-reiterated demands of the people and the army that a new parliament should be forthwith elected, the "Rump" had passed a vote, at the end of February, that it should dissolve on the 3rd of November following, and that the future number of representatives in the House of Commons should be four hundred, to be elected by freeholders in counties, and owners, or tenants in boroughs. But coupled with these provisions, introduced in a bill which had gone through the first reading, was the important clause that the whole of the members of the "Rump" should remain in their seats, and be looked upon, without any fresh elections, as representatives of the counties, or boroughs, which had originally returned them. This clause, evidently unjust and arbitrary, was strenuously opposed by Cromwell; and on the majority of the commons insisting upon making it law, he summoned to his assistance an assembly of officers and members of the minority, to bring their united efforts to bear in defeating the bill. The question what to do should the "Rump" persevere in prolonging its own existence was warmly debated at a conference held at Cromwell's residence at Whitehall, on the evening of the 19th of April, the meeting lasting till midnight, and finishing without any definite decision being arrived at, with the understanding that the discussion should be resumed the next morning. At the appointed hour this day, Wednesday, the 20th of April, Cromwell's adherents assembled for fresh deliberation; but they had not been long so engaged when a member of parliament, Colonel Ingoldsby, came hurrying up, telling them that the majority of the commons were hurrying the obnoxious bill through all its stages, determined to make it law in spite of every opposition. It was evident that further talking now was utterly useless, and that other measures must be taken to extinguish the pretensions of the "Rump." Cromwell, with that general's eye which never failed him, in an instant grasped the position of affairs, and declared his intention at once to proceed to St. Stephen's Chapel. "It is not honest: yea, it is contrary to common honesty!" he exclaimed, in violent indignation; and ordering a company of musketeers to follow in his steps, strode forward to Westminster.

The commons were in anxious and excited discussion upon the bill for a new parliament when Cromwell entered the house. He "came clad in plain black clothes, and grey worsted stockings, and sat down, as he used to do, in an ordinary place," listening quietly to the debate going on. When it had proceeded for a short time the deliberation flagged, all eyes being turned upon the lord-general, so that, no other member expressing a wish to say anything more, the Speaker prepared to put the question "that the Bill do pass." Before he could do so Cromwell arose from his seat, whispering to General Harrison, who was sitting near him, "This is the time!" So saying, he "rose up, put off his hat, and spake." The speech was of considerable length, and although begun in a calm tone, before long assumed a character of extraordinary vehemence and personality, such as had scarcely ever been heard within the walls of St. Stephen's. He charged the members with self-seeking and profaneness; with frequent denials of justice, and numerous acts of oppression; with idolizing the lawyers, the constant instruments of tyranny; with neglecting the men who had shed their blood for the nation, and encouraging their enemies; and with doing everything to the end that they might perpetuate their own power, and fill their own purses. Having gone thus far, Cromwell on a sudden stopped in his speech, and leaving his seat, walked into the middle of the hall, where he paced up and down, as if agitated by conflicting emotions. Presently he stamped on the floor, and at the signal the doors were thrown open, and a file of musketeers entered in military order. "You are no parliament!" Cromwell began again; "I say, you are no parliament: begone, and give place to honest men!" On one of the members remonstrating against the violence offered to them, the lord-general exclaimed, angrily, "Come, come, sir, I will put an end to your prating," and then beckoned to the officer of the musketeers to clear the room. The work was accomplished in a few minutes, and without any exercise of force; the members, fifty-three in number, went hurrying to the door in a stream, followed by the passionate ejaculations of Cromwell, who had something to say to each, by way of parting benediction. Some he called drunkards, others libertines, others robbers of the poor, and others "corrupt and unjust persons," and "following the devil's commandments." To Sir Harry Vane, leader of the house, who went out one of the last, he told that he "had no common honesty," and on the accused retorting in a few words, exclaimed, "Oh, Sir Harry Vane, thou art a juggler. The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" All the members being gone, Cromwell went up to the Speaker's table, and fixing his eye on the mace, cried, "What shall we do with this bauble?" and then, addressing a musketeer, "Take it away." He then seized on the records, snatched the bill that had been under debate from the table, ordered the doors to be locked, and went back to Whitehall. "Among all the parliament-men," Whitlock recorded, "of whom many wore swords, not one offered to draw his sword against Cromwell, or to make the least resistance, but all tamely departed." The lord-general remarked, in his own forcible language, "We did not hear a dog bark at their going."

There was, indeed, no dog barking in all England to lament the breaking up of an assembly which had long fallen into utter disrepute and contempt; and the shouts and acclamations of the people in the streets plainly informing Cromwell that the task he had executed was, if not legal, yet ratified by the popular will, he proceeded to finish his work. After staying for a couple of hours at Whitehall, narrating to the assembly, which was still sitting there, the particulars of what he had done, the lord-general went on to Derby House, the meeting-place of the Council of State. Entering the room where the members were engaged in deliberation, he told them, in a short speech, that they represented no longer the executive government of England, inasmuch as the power from which they derived their authority had ceased to exist. "If you are met here as private persons," he concluded his harangue, "you shall not be disturbed, but if as a Council of State, this is no place for you. And since you cannot but know what was done in the morning, so take notice that the parliament is dissolved." There was a short pause, after which John Bradshaw, president of the Council of State, opened his lips. "Sir," he exclaimed, "we have heard what you did in the house in the morning, and before many hours all England will hear it. But, sir, you are mistaken to think that the parliament is dissolved, for no power under heaven can dissolve them but themselves. Therefore take you notice of that." Three other members of the council added some words to the same purpose, but having given in their protest, made no other show of resistance, and quietly departed. It was as if the burden of unpopularity under which the "Rump" was suffering was weighing too heavily upon them even to attempt upholding the dignity of their position, and thus they slipped away, withdrawing quietly into private life. Their withdrawal was followed by addresses from all parts of the country, thanking the lord-general for what he had done, and congratulating the nation upon having been delivered from the tyranny of the small knot of men holding themselves forth as representatives of the people, but incapable of being its governors. Only a single address in favour of the dispersed House of Commons was presented by a dozen citizens of London, proving the smallness of the minority attached to it. There were many who disapproved the illegal act of Cromwell, but few, if any, who doubted that he alone was the only possible guide and ruler of the Commonwealth.

The first step of Cromwell, after having made himself absolute master of the government, was to issue a proclamation to the people, defending his conduct in forcibly dissolving the House of Commons. The document, dated the 3rd of April, and headed,

"A Declaration of the Lord General and his Council of Officers," went fully and at great length into the causes which had brought about the step for the dissolution, justifying it, in very dignified language, as absolutely indispensable for the peace and welfare of the realm. "After it had pleased God," it began, "not only to reduce Ireland, and give in Scotland, but so marvellously to appear for his people at Worcester, that these nations were brought to a great degree of peace, and England to perfect quiet, and thereby the Parliament had opportunity to give the people the harvest of all their labours, blood, and treasure, and to settle a due liberty, both in reference to civil and spiritual things, whereunto they were obliged by this duty, their engagements, as also the great and wonderful things which God wrought for them, it was matter of much grief to the good and well-affected of the land to observe the little progress which was made therein." After enumerating the main points of neglect of the members of parliament in accomplishing "those ends which God, his people, and the whole nation expected from them," the "Declaration" stated that if this had been allowed to proceed, "the Cause which the Lord hath so greatly blessed, and borne witness to, must have languished under their hands, and by degrees be wholly lost, and the lives, liberties, and comforts of the people be delivered into their enemies' hands." It then went on: "All which being sadly and seriously considered by the honest people of this nation, as well as by the army, and wisdom and direction being sought from the Lord, it seemed to be a duty incumbent upon us, who had seen so much of the power and presence of God going along with us, to consider of some more effectual means to secure the Cause which the good people of this Commonwealth had been so long engaged in, and to establish righteousness and peace in those nations. And after much debate it was judged necessary and agreed upon that the supreme authority should be by the Parliament devolved upon known persons, fearing God, and of approved integrity, and the government of the Commonwealth committed unto them for a time, as the most hopeful way to encourage and countenance all God's people, reform the law, and administer justice impartially, hoping thereby the people might forget monarchy, and understanding their true interests in the election of successive Parliaments, may have the government settled upon a true basis, without hazard to this glorious Cause, or necessitating to keep up armies for the defence of the same. And being still resolved to use all means possible to avoid extraordinary courses, we prevailed with about twenty members of parliament to give us a conference, with whom we freely and plainly debated the necessity and justness of our proposals on that behalf, and did evidence that those, and not the Act under their consideration, would most probably bring forth something answerable to that work, the foundation whereof God himself hath laid and is now carrying on in the world, the which, notwithstanding, found no acceptance, but instead thereof it was offered that the way was still to continue this present Parliament." Such were the main reasons assigned by Cromwell "to make an end to this Parliament."

There was nothing said in the "Declaration" as to the form of government that was to be established in place of the dissolved parliament and Council of State. Though more than king in power, Cromwell was not in a position to assume the outward attributes of kingship, the basis of his authority resting in the army, attached in overwhelming majority to republican principles, and more and more verging in the same direction. On the other hand, the calling upon the scene of a new parliament could not but interfere with the plans of the lord-general, he holding sincerely to the conviction that until the Commonwealth had been firmly established, and secured against all enemies, foreign and domestic, the supreme authority ought to be concentrated in one hand, and emanate from a single source. It seemed a difficult and almost impossible task thus to prop absolutism upon democracy, and Cromwell in attempting to solve it had recourse to somewhat singular means. Assembling at Whitehall a number of military leaders and state officials, a day or two after the dissolution of the "Rump," he told them that he had resolved to summon, from all parts of the realm, a novel kind of representative body, consisting of "known persons, men fearing God, and of approved integrity," all of them carefully selected by himself, with the assistance of a council of ministers. This council, made up of thirteen persons, nine officers of the army and four members of the dissolved parliament, Cromwell nominated forthwith, and then set to work, without loss of a single day, to constitute the new power in the state, meant to be both legislative and administrative, which he was bent upon erecting. Circulars were sent around to the principal ministers and preachers, known for their piety or the influence they possessed, to consult with their congregations as to the fittest individuals to be entrusted with the high position of representatives of all religious and God-fearing men in the realm, and long lists of names having come in reply, the lord-general and his assistants set themselves to make the selection. The work was carried out with the greatest care and minuteness, the character of every person submitted for choice being weighed and scrutinized in all important particulars, first by the thirteen councillors, and then by Cromwell himself, who undertook the final revise of the list prepared by his assistants. There issued from the scrutiny thus elaborately gone through one hundred and thirty-nine names, of which six from Ireland, five from Scotland, six from Wales, and the rest, one hundred and twenty-two, from England, and the whole of these were inserted accordingly in writs for the new parliament of the Commonwealth.

The writ of summons to each of the hundred and thirty-nine persons was signed by the lord-general alone, and of singular brevity and directness of purpose. "Forasmuch," it ran, "as upon the dissolution of the late Parliament it became necessary that the peace, safety, and good government of this Commonwealth should be provided for, and in order thereunto divers persons fearing God, and of approved fidelity and honesty, are by myself, with the advice of my council of officers nominated, to whom the great charge and trust of so weighty affairs is to be committed, and having good assurance of your love to, and courage for God, and the interest of His Cause, and of the good people of this Commonwealth:—I, Oliver Cromwell, Captain-General and Commander-in-Chief of all the armies and forces raised and to be raised within this Commonwealth, do hereby summon and require you, being one of the persons nominated, personally to be and appear at the Council Chamber commonly known or called by the name of the Council Chamber at Whitehall, within the city of Westminster, upon the fourth day of July next ensuing the date hereof, then and there to take upon you the said trust, unto which you are hereby called, and appointed as a member for the county of . . . And hereof you are not to fail. Given under my hand and seal, the sixth day of June, 1653, Oliver Cromwell." All the persons summoned, with the exception of two, made their appearance at the appointed day at Whitehall, where a large apartment had been prepared for their reception, with a table on one side, and chairs in a circle around. The assembly, as regarded rank, birth, and education, was a more mixed one than any parliament or representative parliament England had ever seen, comprising both the highest and lowest degrees of the social ladder. There were several members of the extinct House of Lords, and a few "gentlemen who had estates;" but there were also a great many shopkeepers, as well as "artificers of the meanest trades," together with a number of persons so utterly obscure, or of occupations supposed to be so unsuited for law-making, that the mere mentioning of their names was provocative of ridicule. There came to place themselves on the chairs in the Council Chamber at Whitehall, scions of the houses of Montague, of Lislo, and of Howard, Admiral Blake, the sea hero, and other men of fame and renown; but at their side sat Praisegod Barebone, a leather seller of Fleet Street, a worthy man, it was said, and of unimpeachable character, but little suited by habit and training to take part in the government of a great nation. Popular wit, laying hold of the name of the leather dealer, soon raised him to higher distinction than any of his colleagues, giving the assembly summoned by Cromwell the title of the "Barebone Parliament."

The reception of the new lawgivers at Whitehall

was of more than republican simplicity. "After each person," says a contemporary account, "had given in a ticket of his name, they all entered the room, and sat down in the chairs appointed for them, round about the table. Then his excellency the lord-general, standing by the window opposite to the middle of the table, and as many of the officers of the army as the room could well contain, some on his right hand, and others on his left and about him." All the members being seated and uncovered, Cromwell took off his hat, and with his hands resting on a chair, pronounced a brief introductory speech. "Gentlemen," he exclaimed, "I suppose the summons that hath been instrumental to bring you hither gives you well to understand the occasion of your being here. Howbeit, I have something farther to impart to you, which is an instrument drawn up by the consent and advice of the principal officers of the army, which is a little more significant than the letter of the summons. We have that here to tender you, and somewhat likewise to say for our own exoneration, which we hope may be somewhat farther for your satisfaction. And without seeing you sit here somewhat uneasily, by reason of the scantness of the room and heat of the weather, I shall contract myself with respect there unto." With these words Cromwell took off his cloak, giving it to an officer near him, and then prepared to explain all that he had to say. The promise to "contract" his words was not strictly fulfilled, for the speech he delivered lasted above two hours, full, like all his orations, of historical narrative, reflections, arguments, quotations, commentaries, interpolations, allusions to the past, and speculations on the future, but nevertheless, in all its length, listened to with breathless attention. He had not written his speech, nor any notes before him to guide his memory, and the thick mass of his thoughts, as he went on, appeared to crowd in upon him with irresistible force, while he abandoned himself to their current. All the while the extraordinary assembly of men which he had called together sat before him, their eyes riveted on his, and listening to every sound from his lips as to a voice from heaven.

Cromwell began by reminding his hearers of the great events they had witnessed from the opening of the Long Parliament to the battle of Worcester, the civil war, the trial of the king, the defeat of his son, the subjugation of Scotland and Ireland, "those strange windings and turnings of Providence, those very great appearances of God in crossing and thwarting the purposes of men, that He might raise up a poor and contemptible company of men, neither versed in military affairs, nor having much natural propensity to them, simply by their owning a principle of godliness and religion." He then passed in review his conflict with the House of Commons, declaring that the members whom he had been compelled to disperse and send back to their homes, had shown themselves entirely unwilling either to effect the reforms which the nation demanded, or to dissolve voluntarily, and restore to the people their right of suffrage. The lawyers, he said, had spent three months in disputing about the veritable meaning of the word "incumbances," without coming to an agreement, and several conferences which had been obtained, with great difficulty, between distinguished officers of the army and political leaders in the House of Commons, had uniformly ended in the assertion of the latter that "the perpetuation of the parliament can alone save the nation." Had they been allowed to go on any longer, he said, "the liberties of the nation would have been thrown away into the hands of those who had never fought for it, and upon this we thought it our duty not to suffer it: and upon this the house was dissolved, even when the Speaker was going to put the last question." Cromwell then went on to dwell upon the principles of good government, advising his hearers to be, above all, impartial, "to be as just towards an unbeliever as towards a believer," to be "faithful with the Saints," and to be "very much moved with the infirmities of the Saints." "Therefore, I beseech you," he continued, rising into eloquence, on touching the great subject of religious toleration, "have a care of the whole flock! Love the sheep, love the lambs; love all, tender all, cherish and countenance all: in all things that are good. And if the poorest Christian, the most mistaken Christian, shall desire to live peaceably and quietly under you: I say, if any shall desire but to lead a life of godliness and honesty, let him be protected." After giving his reasons for summoning a legislative assembly different from any that had yet existed, in the all-abounding necessity "to choose men that fear the Lord, and will praise the Lord, such as the Lord hath formed for himself," Cromwell concluded by quoting the song of David which his army had intoned on the field of Dunbar, "that famous Psalm, sixty-eighth Psalm, which indeed is a glorious prophecy of the Gospel Churches." Dwelling on the words of the inspired singer, Cromwell's speech rose into the loftiest fervour of enthusiasm. "Indeed," he exclaimed, "the triumph of the Psalm is exceeding high and great, and God is accomplishing it. And the close of it, that closeth with my heart, and I doubt not with yours, 'The Lord shakes the hills and mountains, and they reel.' Yea, God hath a hill too, 'an high hill as the hill of Bashan, and the chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels, and God will dwell upon this hill for ever.'" "Amen!" exclaimed the assembly.

The hundred and thirty-eight persons called together by Cromwell began their work the day after he had addressed them at Whitehall. Meeting within the chapel of St. Stephen's, appropriated to the sittings of the House of Commons, they began by receiving and putting upon record a message from the lord-general, which devolved upon them the supreme legislative authority, but at the same time imposed an obligation not to retain the same for longer than sixteen months, or till the 3rd of November, 1654. Three months before this term, they were to make choice of other persons to succeed them, who in their turn were not to sit longer than a year, repeating the process of electing their successors. The stipulations of the message having been approved of, a long debate took place as to whether they should assume the name and title of parliament, which was settled in the affirmative by sixty-five against forty-six votes. Next they elected a Speaker, the choice falling upon Francis Rouse, provost of Eton, and member for Truro in the dissolved House of Commons, who having taken the chair, it was ordered that the mace, which had been removed, should be again laid on the table, and that, in all other respects the usages and customs of parliament should be adhered to. The first day of the regular sittings under a Speaker was devoted entirely to pious exercises, different from those in use by the former House of Commons by there being no sermon from any recognised clergyman or minister, the whole consisting in a series of spontaneous prayers and exhortations from the members themselves. On the day after it was resolved to issue a proclamation to the people, explaining the aims and objects they had in view. "We declare ourselves to be the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England," the document began, and then set forth the aspirations of the new lawgivers in a strain of deep humility. "When we look upon ourselves," they said, "we are much afraid and tremble at the mighty work and heavy weight before us, which we justly acknowledge far above and quite beyond our strength to wield or poise, so that we oft cry out, and say with Jehoshaphat, 'O Lord, we know not what to do, but our eye is towards thee!' We hope that God, in His great and free goodness, will not forsake His people; that we may be fitted and used as instruments in His hand; that all oppressing yokes may be broken, and all burdens removed, and the loins also of the poor and needy may be filled with blessing; that all nations may turn their swords and spears into ploughshares and pruninghooks; that the wolf may feed with the lamb, and the earth be full of the knowledge of God, as waters cover the sea. And this is all we say as regards ourselves; If this undertaking be from God, let Him prosper and bless it, and let every one take heed of fighting against God; but if not, let it fall, though we fall before it."

Noble and lofty as were the aims of the members of the legislative assembly called into life by Cromwell, they failed as a parliament, and could not but fail. The vast majority of the one hundred and thirty-eight persons who took their seats in the old hall of English lawgivers were undoubtedly, as recorded, "men of orderly life, neither spendthrifts nor in debt, nor seekers after employment or adventures, but devotedly attached to their country and their religion," and deficient neither in courage nor in independence. However, these high moral qualities were clearly insufficient to fit them for the task for which they had been chosen, that of remodelling the political life of England, of carrying out vast religious reforms, and, of marking, in the forms of laws and statutes, the boundaries of a new society that had arisen on the scattered ruins of a throne and of ancient feudal institutions. The sarcasm of its enemies, which gave to the new parliament the name of the leather-seller of Fleet Street, was so far justified as the assembly showed in its first actions that it possessed all the virtues, but likewise all the shortcomings of that highly respectable but naturally narrow-visioned citizen known as Praise-god Barebone. The greater number of his colleagues, like him, had more private honesty than political intelligence; and, notwithstanding the uprightness of their intentions, the integrity of their character, and the depth of their piety, they were incapable of carrying through, or even of comprehending, the high mission to which the summons of Cromwell had called them. They began by making various important legal reforms, decreeing, among others, the abolition of the court of Chancery, and the installment of commissioners to preside in courts of justice; they also enacted that marriages should be solemnized by the civil magistrate alone, and voted the annulling of tithes and advowsons, vesting the choice of ministers in the parishioners. So far, the work done was more or less useful, even if somewhat rash; but not content with making law improvements, the assembly soon launched into the wildest schemes of social and religious reform, regardless as to whether the ideas that received its approbation were of practical execution, and seemingly content that they should be true in theory. It was with pain Cromwell perceived the direction into which his chosen legislature was drifting, and the ill results thereof for the peace of the nation, all classes of the people, particularly those possessed of property, getting possessed of a vague alarm that the "Barebone Parliament" would end by overthrowing the whole structure of society, erecting instead of it some fair-looking ideal form, intended for "the wolf to feed with the lamb," but greatly tending, in sober reality, to the lambs being eaten by the wolves. The alarm, well or ill-founded, increased with every successive sitting of the legislative assembly; and after having existed three months, the lord-general saw that his own creation could endure no longer. It was easy to break up the meeting at Westminster, for the fiat which had called them into life could clearly make an end of them, but on consideration Cromwell resolved not to have recourse to an open dissolution. It seemed to him that the most becoming way for Barebone's friends and colleagues to vanish from the scene would be to commit suicide.

The design of the lord-general was, executed, in a rather strange manner, on Monday the 12th of December. On this day the members of the assembly who had been let into the secret of the work that was to be done, the Speaker among them, assembled at an earlier hour than usual, and after very short prayers, Colonel Sydenham, one of the intimate friends of Cromwell, rose to deliver a speech. He said that he must take leave to unburden himself of some things that had long lain upon his heart, and that he would have to speak of matters not only relating to the welfare of the Commonwealth, but inseparable from its very existence. He then went on in making a violent attack upon the proceedings of the majority of the assembly, accusing them of dragging the nation into utter ruin. "They have aimed," he cried, addressing the Speaker, "at nothing less than destroying the clergy, the law, and the property of the subject. Their purpose was to take away the law of the land, and the birthrights of Englishmen, for which all have so long been contending with their blood, and to substitute in their room a code modelled on the laws of Moses, and adapted only for the nation of the Jews. In the heat of a preposterous fervour, they have even laid the axe to the root of the Christian ministry, alleging that it is Babylonish, and that it comes from Antichrist. They were the enemies of all intellectual cultivation, and all learning, and they had likewise adopted resolutions indicating a deep-laid design for the total dissolution of the army." The colonel finished his extraordinary speech by declaring that as he himself was no longer satisfied to be a member of an assembly which had so far degraded itself, he trusted there were many others who shared his feelings, in consequence of which he would move "that the continuance of this parliament is not for the good of the Commonwealth, and that it is requisite that the house shall repair, in a body, to the lord-general, to deliver back into his hands the power they have received from him." The motion having been seconded by Sir Charles Wolseley, an Oxfordshire gentleman, high in the confidence of Cromwell, the Speaker was about to put it hurriedly to the vote, when he was stopped by some of the members not initiated in the scheme. They remarked, with much truth, that it was not only undignified but disgraceful for the assembly to destroy its own life almost at the onset, after having held out grand promises of deeds to be achieved, and that before having recourse to this humiliating step efforts should be made to enter upon a new career, more in harmony than the past with what was desired by the lord-general and the nation. These words being greeted by cheers from the majority of members present, it became evident that Colonel Sydenham's proposal would not be adopted, upon which there was a short conversation between some of the friends of Cromwell, one of whom then communicated with the Speaker. All on a sudden, the latter left the chair, followed by the serjeant-at-arms, carrying the mace, and by about forty members, the whole of whom marched straightway in procession to Whitehall, to "resign their powers to his excellency the lord-general." The remaining members of the house, after the Speaker had left, engaged in prayer, and when they had prayed for nearly an hour, there came one of Cromwell's officers, Major White, desiring them to leave the place, as they had no further business there. On receiving the answer that they would not leave, the major, with a slight motion of the hand, beckoned in a file of musketeers, who cleared the chapel of St. Stephen's in a few minutes, locked the doors, and went away with the keys. No parliament had ever come to a less dignified end.

Cromwell's behaviour in slaying the body fashioned by his own hands was not free from the appearance of dissimulation. On arriving at Whitehall the Speaker, with his train of members, first went into a private room, where they resolved upon and wrote down a form of resignation, and then demanded an audience of the lord-general. The paper, making all the powers of parliament over to him, having been presented to Cromwell, he affected the utmost surprise, declaring that he was not prepared for such an offer, nor able to load himself with so heavy and serious a burthen. However at last, after listening to a number of speeches from Colonel Sydenham, General Lambert, Sir Charles Wolseley, and others present, he declared himself persuaded that it was for the good of the nation that he should yield, at least temporarily, the whole legislative as well as executive authority of the Commonwealth, stating at the same time that, in entering upon his new functions, it might be requisite that he should assume a more distinctive title than the one he had hitherto borne. The notice of it came not quite unexpected, it having been rumoured for some months past that the lord-general intended to put the crown upon his head, and to become in name what he had long been in reality. Probably, Cromwell harboured such a scheme at times in his own mind, and occasionally gave hints of it to his intimate friends, or to those whose assistance he was likely to require in the matter; but, being aware that the army was strongly opposed to the restoration of the kingly office, he never did more than sound opinions on the subject, and even now, on the abdication of his parliamentary assembly, took care not to compromise himself further than to express a wish to increase his outward dignity by the adoption of some new title, leaving the choice of the same to others. On receiving the abdication, he appeared to expect some offer or suggestion bearing on the matter; but this not forthcoming, he summoned to his assistance the day after, the 13th of December, another conference of military men and political leaders, described by the lord-keeper of the Great Seal as "a council of officers and other persons of interest in the nation." The conference sat for two days, and after "much seeking of God by prayer," drew up, for the acceptance of the lord-general, which was at once signified, an "Instrument of Government," vesting in him the supreme executive and administrative, and limited legislative power, with the title of "Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland."

The installation of Cromwell as Lord Protector took place, rather hastily, on Friday, the 16th of December, the day after the "Instrument of Government" had been accepted by him, and four days after the fall of his legislative assembly, or, as frequently called, the "Little Parliament." Though usually simple to abnegation in all his habits and public as well as private doings, Cromwell thought fit to display considerable pomp on this occasion, as if desirous to impress the multitude with the sense of the new dignity with which he was being invested. He left his residence at Whitehall at one o'clock in the afternoon, to go to Westminster, in the midst of a magnificent procession, passing between a double row of soldiers. The lords commissioners of the Great Seal, the members of the Council of State, the judges, and the lord mayor and aldermen of the city, in their scarlet robes and state carriages, headed the procession, and after them came Cromwell, in a splendid coach, surrounded by the principal officers of the army, in full uniform, with drawn swords, and immediately preceded by his guards and a large number of gentlemen, all walking and bareheaded. "His Highness," as related by a spectator, "was in a rich but plain suit; black velvet, with cloak of the same, and about his hat a broad band of gold." Thus attired, the lord-general walked into Westminster Hall, at one end of which a chair of state, similar in appearance to a throne, had been placed for him, to both sides of which the procession ranged itself. All having taken their places, standing and bareheaded, General Lambert, temporary president of the Council of State, approached Cromwell, who stood in front of the chair of state, and bending a knee, announced the voluntary dissolution of the late parliament, and in the name of the army of England, and of the three nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, prayed that he might accept the office of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth. After a moment's pause, Cromwell declared his readiness to undertake the charge, whereupon one of the clerks of the Council of State came forward to read the "Instrument of Government," embodying the new constitution of the realm. The reading of it lasted half an hour, and on its being concluded Cromwell made oath "to take upon him the protection and government of the nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland," and then seated himself in the chair of state, "with his head covered, the court continuing all bare." "The Lords Commissioners next," reported the news sheets of the day, "delivered up to his Highness the purse and seals, and the lord mayor of London his sword, which were presently delivered back to them again by his Highness, and then, after a salute, the court rose," the procession leaving Westminster Hall "in the same equipage they came." In returning to Whitehall, "the lord mayor rode bare with the sword in the boot of the coach, with his Highness, and there were great acclamations and shoutings all along the streets as they passed."

The people of the streets had some cause for joyous shoutings, the installation of the Protector and inauguration of a new form of government offering a fair guarantee for the return of settled peace, after the long miseries of war and revolution. Though brought into existence in an abnormal and, to all outward appearance, despotic manner, the "Instrument of Government" sworn to by Cromwell was a most wise, temperate, and well-planned form of constitution, designed to give to the nation the fullest amount of liberty, compatible with order and the due exercise of authority. According to the terms of the new charter of the Commonwealth, the national sovereignty was to reside in a parliament, consisting of a single House of Commons, whose acts and decrees should become law as soon as made, if approved of by the first magistrate, the Lord Protector, but if not, at the end of twenty days, with or without his consent. In the Lord Protector, whose office was to be held for life, but not to be hereditary, was vested the executive power, to be exercised with the assistance of a Council of State, or ministry, consisting of not less than thirteen, and not more than twenty-one persons, who were not to be removable from their places except for corruption or other gross misconduct, to be judged by a parliamentary committee. The charter further prescribed that all writs, processes, commissions, and grants should run in the name of the Lord Protector, and that he, acting in concert with the Council of State, should command the militia and other armed forces of the Commonwealth, both by land and sea, exercising the powers of war and peace; but that, on the other hand, no law should be made, altered, suspended, or repealed, but by the authority of parliament, the executive only possessing the right to issue temporary ordinances until the meeting of the same. Parliament itself, or the House of Commons, was to be triennial, and to consist of four hundred and sixty members, of whom four hundred for England, thirty for Scotland, and as many for Ireland, elected by the free votes of all persons possessing real or personal property worth two hundred pounds sterling, and not guilty of having fought on the Cavalier side in the civil war, or of having taken part in the Irish rebellion. Every parliament was to sit at least five months during each of the three years of its duration, and to be summoned by writ under the Great Seal, with the proviso that if the Lord Protector should neglect to issue the writs, the keepers of the Seal must do so on their own authority, under pain of high treason. Finally, the meeting of the first parliament was ordered to take place on the coming 3rd of September, date of the two greatest of the victories gained by the Lord Protector. Like almost all men who achieved greatness through the sword, Cromwell ever and anon exhibited a tendency towards fatalism, showing it on this occasion by fixing the to him eventful day when the representatives of the nation were to assemble, either to approve of or condemn his assumption of supreme power, on the anniversary of the "great mercy" of Dunbar, and the "crowning mercy" of Worcester.

Before the meeting of parliament came to take place, the renown of English arms was increased by some fresh naval victories over the Dutch, which, although not due directly to Cromwell, tended to shed lustre over his government. Thinking that they might profit by the domestic troubles of the Commonwealth that appeared probable after the dispersion of the Rump of the Long Parliament, the rulers of the United Provinces had fitted out a new fleet in the spring of 1653, and the command being once more entrusted to Van Tromp, still smarting under his great defeat by Blake, he at once started to take his revenge. The Dutch fleet met the English, the latter under the orders of vice-admirals Monk and Dean, old military officers like Blake, in the Downs, off the North Foreland, early on the 2nd of June, when the action commenced at once with great fury on both parts. At the first broadside, Admiral Dean, who at dawn of day had spent a longer time than usual in prayers, seemingly full of gloomy presentiments, was struck dead by a cannon-shot, as he was standing at the side of Monk, whereupon the latter instantly threw his cloak over the body of his colleague, so as to hide his loss from the sailors and soldiers, who were greatly attached to him. The fight lasted all day long, interrupted only by nightfall, which for a time separated the two fleets, the tide and winds carrying them into opposite directions. On the 3rd of June it was taken up again, but somewhat late in the day, Van Tromp having spent the greater part of the morning in unsuccessful attempts to recover the weather gage which he had lost. He was unaware that, while manœuvring about, his great foe and rival, Blake, was coming up to the scene of action from the coast of Scotland, where he had been stationed, and attacking him from behind, prepared to overthrow all his calculations. The combat had just been renewed when suddenly the boom of heavy artillery was heard in the rear of the Dutch, and a few moments after Blake fell in upon them with fierce impetuosity. His arrival sent a panic among the sailors of Van Tromp, so that even his orders were disobeyed, and several vessels having run away before his eyes, against his express commands, he became enraged, and going to the powder-magazine of his flagship, the "Broderode," threw a lighted match into it. The report immediately spread through the Dutch fleet that their famous commander was dead, upon which the greater number of the captains turned their vessels, seeking safety in retreat. The explosion, however, though destroying the deck of the "Broderode," had not sunk it, and Van Tromp, who had escaped almost by miracle, left the flagship for a fast-sailing frigate, in which he flew through the lines of his navy, calling upon all under his command to renew the battle, and opening his guns upon those who insisted on retreat. But both persuasions and threats had now become vain, and, carried along in the irresistible current of flight, Van Tromp himself was drawn away from the scene of action, and with the rest of his scattered armament driven to the coast of Holland. On the 10th of June, the three great admirals of the United Provinces, Van Tromp, De Ruyter, and De Witt, presented themselves before the States General, declaring that they would go to sea no more unless with better armed vessels, manned by braver men. "Why should I keep silence any longer?" exclaimed Cornelius de Witt; "I am here to speak the truth, and I must say that the English at present are masters both of us and of the seas."

Thrown into despair by the repeated defeats they had suffered, the government of the United Provinces now sent again ambassadors to England to negotiate a peace; but their diplomatic movement was slow, and hostilities not being suspended in the meanwhile, a new naval victory came to be added to those already gained by the Commonwealth. The English fleet had followed the Dutch in their retreat home, and towards the end of June set to blockade the mouth of the Texel, which inflicted so much injury upon the commerce of Amsterdam as to drive the inhabitants into frenzy, so that they loudly called upon their rulers to renew the war at any cost. Pressed by popular clamour, the States General gave way, and on the 29th of July, Van Tromp, commanding nearly one hundred ships of war, all that the utmost efforts of his countrymen could bring together, put himself once more face to face with the sea captains of the Commonwealth. The first day's encounter was indecisive, and a heavy gale of wind prevented the battle from being renewed the next morning; but it was taken up again with intense ardour the day after, Sunday, the 31st of July. Never in all the naval actions between English and Dutch, had there been a more fierce and desperate struggle between them; ship against ship, and man against man, there was an uninterrupted discharge of broadsides and a ceaseless series of hand-to-hand fights, till it seemed as if each fleet was bent upon destroying itself together with the enemy, leaving nothing behind but universal wreck. Above fifteen hundred English had already fallen, and the battle was still as fierce and wavering as ever;

when one swift cannon-ball decided it all at once. Van Tromp, leaning against the mast of his flagship, giving orders to his officers, was shot in the heart; and he had no sooner sunk speechless to the ground, a stream of blood gushing from his breast, than his countrymen lost all courage, and fled away in wild disorder. The pursuit on the part of the victors lasted till midnight, resulting in the capture of thirty ships, and of twelve hundred prisoners, as well as the utter discouragement of the Dutch to contest the supremacy of the seas any longer. After this last signal defeat, the States General could not possibly protract negotiations; and having instructed their ambassadors in London to conclude peace at any price, the conditions were soon arranged and subscribed to. They were extraordinarily moderate, Cromwell continuing as Lord Protector the policy he had followed in all his former undertakings, which made a broad distinction in the treatment of Protestants and of Roman Catholics. As he had ravaged conquered Ireland with fire and sword, but treated conquered Scotland with the greatest leniency and kindness, so now again he imposed the very easiest terms upon the Protestants of the United Provinces. He did not even insist upon the demands made some years before, when the naval victories of England had been far less decisive, of having the right of search, the privilege of the northern fisheries, and indemnification for all war expenses, but contented himself with stipulating that neither country should harbour the enemies of the other, and that the flag of the Commonwealth should be saluted in the same manner as the old royal flag. The treaty on these conditions was signed on the 5th of April, 1654, and on the 5th of June following a secret article was appended thereto, by which the States General promised never to elect a member of the house of Orange for their stadtholder, or governor. Cromwell held that the Orange family had become unfitted to govern a Protestant race since having become tainted by Stuart blood.

The conclusion of peace with the United Provinces caused great satisfaction all over England, as bringing hopes of increase of commercial prosperity, and under the influence of it the elections for the new parliament took place. It was for the first time after the commencement of the civil war that the nation was called upon to nominate its representatives, and the long term of fourteen years having elapsed since the last general election, a corresponding excitement made itself felt throughout the country. The choice of the thirty members for Scotland, and equal number for Ireland, being of comparatively small importance, the interest was concentrated in the English returns, chiefly those of the counties, the latter having had allotted to them two hundred and fifty-one representatives, against one hundred and forty-nine for cities and boroughs. There were, in counties as well as boroughs, three great parties contesting with each other at the elections, in the adherents of the Protector, personal and political, the strict Republicans, averse to the concentration of executive authority in a single hand, and the Presbyterians, aiming at the establishment of a constitutional monarchy, and the supremacy of their own creed. The latter, most numerous in the middle classes admitted to the two hundred pound franchise, were expected to carry their candidates at least in the majority of the cities and boroughs; however, this did not prove to be the case, both republicans and friends of the government being preferred to them in a great many instances. Nearly all the members of the Council of State, and most of the leading officers of the army were returned to the new House of Commons, some of them in double and triple elections, while everybody of whom it was known that the Lord Protector personally desired his nomination, such as his near and distant relatives and intimate friends, got the desired seat without scarcely any contest. Under these favourable auspices, Cromwell met his parliament on the appointed day, the 3rd of September. It was a Sunday; "the Lord's day, yet the day of the meeting," noted Bulstrode Whitlock, one of the commissioners of the Great Seal. "The members," he continues, "met in the afternoon at sermon in the Abbey Church, at Westminster, thence they attended the Lord Protector in the Painted Chamber, where he made a speech to them of the cause of their summons, after which they went to the house, and adjourned till the next morning."

The formal opening of parliament took place on Monday, the 4th of September, with considerable display of pomp and splendour on the part of Cromwell. "His Highness, the Lord Protector," as recorded by one of the actors in the ceremony, "rode in state from Whitehall to Westminster Abbey. Some hundreds of gentlemen and others went before him bare, with the life guard, and, next before the coach, his pages and lacqueys richly clothed. On the one side of his coach went Strickland, one of his council, and captain of his guard, with the master of the ceremonies, both on foot; on the other side went Howard, captain of the life guard. In the coach with him were his son Henry [second son] and General Lambert, both bare, and after him came Claypole [son-in-law of Cromwell], Master of the Horse, with a gallant horse, richly trapped. Next came the commissioners of the Great Seal, commissioners of the Treasury, and divers of the council in coaches, and last the ordinary guards. He alighting at the principal door of the abbey, and entering, the officers of the army went first, and next them four maces; then the commissioners of the Great Seal, Whitlock carrying the purse; after them General Lambert, carrying the sword bare, and the rest followed. His Highness was seated over against the pulpit, and the members of the parliament on both sides. After the sermon, which was preached by Mr. Thomas Goodwin [one of 'the two Atlases and Patriarchs of Independency,' according to Anthony à Wood], his Highness went, in the same equipage, to the Painted Chamber, where he took seat with covered head in a chair of state, set upon steps [by another account a throne with two steps], and the members upon benches round about, all bare. All being silent, his Highness, rising, put off his hat, and made a large and subtle speech."

It was a most remarkable address, this "subtle speech," delivered by the Lord Protector to his first parliament. "Gentlemen," began Cromwell, "you are met here on the greatest occasion that, I believe,

England ever saw, having upon your shoulders the interests of three great nations, with the territories belonging to them; and truly, I believe I may say it without any hyperbole, you have upon your shoulders the interest of all the Christian people in the world. And the expectation is that I should let you know, as far as I have cognisance of it, the occasion of your assembling at this time." After dwelling at length upon the sufferings, the state of decay, and general misery of the people before and immediately after the civil war, the Protector continued, "Things being so, and I am persuaded it is not hard to convince every person here they were so, what a heap of confusions were upon these poor nations! And either things must have been left to sink in the miseries these premises would suppose, or else a remedy must be applied. Now a remedy hath been applied; that hath been this government: a thing I shall say little unto. The thing is open, and visible to be seen and read by all men, and therefore let it speak for itself. Only let me say this, because I can speak it with comfort and confidence before a Greater than you all, that in the intention of it, as to the approving of our hearts to God, let men judge what they please, it was for the interest of the people—for the interest of the people alone, and for their good, without respect had to any other interest. And if that be not true, I shall be bold to say again, let it speak for itself. Truly I may—I hope humbly before God, and modestly before you—say something on the behalf of the government." Having detailed the chief efforts made to bring peace and prosperity to the Commonwealth, by making England both great and free, Cromwell finished his address, eloquent in meaning though rugged in style, by a reference to the sermon to which he and the whole parliament had just been listening at Westminster Abbey. "You were told to-day," the Lord Protector cried, "of a people brought out of Egypt to the land of Canaan, but who through unbelief, murmuring, repining, and other temptations and sins wherewith God was provoked, were fain to go back again, and linger many years in the wilderness before they came to the place of rest. We are thus far, through the great mercy of God; and we have cause to take notice of it, that we are not brought into misery, but have a door of hope open. And I may say this unto you: If the Lord's blessing and His presence go along with the management of affairs at this meeting, you will be enabled to put the topstone to the work, and make the nation happy." With this final prayer on his lips, Cromwell sat down again in his chair of state. "And after the speech was ended," recorded the parliamentary report, "all generally seemed abundantly to rejoice, by extraordinary expressions and hums at the conclusion."

The "hums" were of bad augury for the Lord Protector. All his high expectations of what the new parliament would achieve "to make the nation happy" were overturned before a day had passed; for instead of settling down to pass wise laws, the members began criticising the past, and quarrelling among themselves. On the first day of meeting, after the choice of a Speaker, which fell upon William Lenthall, holder of the same dignity in the "Long

Parliament" and "the Rump," a coalition took place between the Presbyterians and the strict Republicans, and the consequence was the immediate assumption of a hostile attitude against Cromwell. It was admitted by his political as well as personal enemies that his rule had been altogether beneficent to the nation, directed to the furtherance of the general welfare, and though checking licence, quite free from despotism; but it was objected to, nevertheless, on purely theoretical grounds, as not having been the produce of the established electoral apparatus. Starting from the fixed idea that the popular will could not possibly find any other expression than by the machinery of a certain number of persons, bent in the possession of two hundred pounds sterling, putting names on slips of paper, the orators in the new House of Commons at once set up the principle that the government in existence, though parent of parliament itself, was illegitimate, and would continue so till sanctioned by the majority in the house. It was clear that this doctrine, if carried out to the full in the existing state of things, was a wild absurdity, leading to nothing but to open the door once more to the greatest possible anarchy, robbing the nation of its dearly-acquired peace, and making all order dependent upon the fluctuating votes of rival parties, and the more or less brilliant phrases of gifted speech-makers. Nevertheless, the leaders of the Presbyterian and Republican factions fanatically held to their great theory that they, the offspring of the majority of votes of a number of two hundred pound electors, were sole arbiters of the nation's fate, and declining to "put the topstone to the work" of government, as entreated to do by Cromwell, insisted to examine the foundation. Two days after the opening address of the Lord Protector, they brought forward a motion for forming a committee to deliberate upon the question "whether the house shall approve, or not, of the system of government by a single person and a parliament;" and although being repeatedly told that the subject was altogether unconstitutional, forbidden both in the fundamental "Instrument of Government," and the writs of election, they pressed it to a vote, and on the 11th of September, carried it by a majority of five votes, one hundred and forty-one names being given for, and one hundred and thirty-six against the motion. It was an undisguised declaration of antipathy to the Lord Protector.

Cromwell hesitated not a moment to reply to the challenge. On the morning of Tuesday, the 12th of September, when the members of the House of Commons went to take their places, at the usual hour of nine, they found the entrance of St. Stephen's closed against them, a file of soldiers being posted against the door. Several attempted to force their way in, but were kept back, politely yet firmly, by the captain of the guard. "There is no passage here," was the peremptory declaration of the officer; "the command has been issued to refuse admittance to all comers, and for further explanation you may go to the Painted Chamber, where the Lord Protector will be this morning at ten of the clock." The members, pacing up and down the galleries of Westminster Hall in fierce agitation, had not to wait long, for punctually at ten Oliver Cromwell made his appearance in the Painted Chamber, attended by his officers and life guards, and went up to the chair of state, or throne, in front of which he had stood exactly eight days before to open parliament. The Lord Protector now came to address the representatives of the nation a second time, in somewhat different tone than before, though with no less eloquence of meaning. "Gentlemen," he exclaimed, without any pause, as soon as he had taken his stand, "it is not long since I met you in this place, upon an occasion which gave me much more content and comfort than doth. That which I have now to say to you will need no preamble to let me into my discourse, for the occasion of this meeting is plain enough. I could have wished with all my heart there had been no cause for it. At our former meeting I did acquaint you what was the first rise of this government, which hath called you hither, and by the authority of which you have come hither. Among other things which I then told you of, I said you were a Free Parliament. And so you are whilst you own the Government and authority which called you hither. But certainly that word 'Free Parliament' implied a reciprocity, or it implied nothing at all. Indeed there was a reciprocity implied and expressed, and I think your actions and carriages ought to be suitable. But I see it will be necessary for me now a little to magnify my Office, which I have not been apt to do before. I have been of this mind—I have always been of this mind—since I first entered upon my Office, that if God will not bear it up, it must sink; But if a duty be incumbent upon me to bear my testimony unto it, which in modesty I have hitherto forbore, I am in some measure necessitated thereunto. And therefore that will be the prologue to my disclosure." It was a remarkable prologue to one of the most remarkable discourses ever held by an English ruler before an English parliament.

"I called not myself to this place," Cromwell went on; "I say again, I called not myself to this place! Of that God is witness; and I have men-witnesses who, I do believe, would lay down their lives bearing witness to the truth of that, namely, that I called not myself to this place. And being in it, I bear not witness to myself or my Office, but God and the people of these nations have also borne testimony to it. If my calling be from God, and my testimony from the people, God and the people only shall take it from me: else I will not part with it. I should be false to the trust that God hath placed in me, and to the interest of the people of these nations, if I did. I was by birth a gentleman, living neither in any considerable height nor yet in obscurity. Having had some occasions to see, together with my brethren and countrymen, a happy period put to our sharp wars and contests with the common enemy, I hoped, in a private capacity, to have reaped the fruit and benefit, together with my brethren, of our hard labours and hazards, the enjoyment, to wit, of peace and liberty, and the privileges of a Christian and a man, in some equality with others, according as it should please the Lord to dispense unto me. But I could not obtain what my soul longed for: I pressed the parliament, as a member, to period themselves, once and again, and again, and ten, nay twenty times over. I told them, for I knew it better than any one man in the parliament could know it, because of my manner of life, which has led me everywhere up and down the nation, thereby giving me to see and know the temper and spirits of all men, and of the best of men, that the nation loathed their sitting." After showing that parliamentary government as carried on by "the Rump" had failed to give to the people the desired peace and liberty, Cromwell went on to recapitulate the successive steps taken to insure the carrying out of the national will, and asserted that in this way the supreme authority had been forced upon him by the political and military leaders. "They told me," he exclaimed, "that except I would undertake the government, they thought things would hardly come to composure, or settlement, but blood and confusion would break in upon us. I refused it again and again, not complimentingly, as they know, and as God knows; but I consented, after many arguments, they urging on me that I did not thereby receive anything which put me into a higher capacity than before, but that it limited me, that it bound my hands to do nothing without the consent of a council, I did accept it. I was then arbitrary in power, having the armies in the three nations under my command, and truly not very ill beloved by them, nor very ill beloved by the people. And I believe I should have been more beloved if they had known the truth as things were, before God. So I did accept of the place and title of Protector. . . . Now, if this be thus, and I am deriving a title from God and men upon such accounts as these are, it is not for you to disown it—for you not to own the authority by which you sit. It is that which I believe astonisheth more men than myself, and doth as dangerously disappoint and discompose the nation, as anything that could have been invented by the greatest enemy to our peace and welfare, or that could well have happened."

The Lord Protector wound up his oration, which lasted nearly two hours, by expressing his conviction that "In every government there must be somewhat fundamental, somewhat like a Magna Charta, which should be standing and unalterable," and laid it down that there ought to be four fundamental matters settled in the English government. These were, first, that the supreme power should be vested in a single person and parliament; secondly, that parliaments should be successive, and not perpetual; thirdly, that the militia and armed forces of the nation should be under the combined control of parliament and the head of the state; and, fourthly, that there should be liberty of conscience. Before these principles had been agreed upon, he argued, there could be no regular government, and consequently the members of parliament must give their consent thereto before proceeding further. "And therefore I must deal plainly with you," cried Cromwell; "what I forebore upon a just confidence at first, you necessitate me unto now. Seeing the authority which called you is so little valued, and so much slighted, till some such assurance be given and made known that the fundamental interest shall be settled and approved, and such a consent testified as will make it appear that the same is accepted, I have caused a stop to be put to your entrance into the parliament house." The door of the house, he added, would be thrown open again to all willing to put their names to a paper acknowledging the existing form of government: "The place where you may come thus and sign, as many as God shall make free thereunto, is in the lobby without the parliament door." Thus saying, the Lord Protector swept out of the Painted Chamber, followed by his guards, while the representatives of the nation whom he had been addressing looked after him in utter consternation. Whether to stand out in opposition against Cromwell, or give way, was the great question, and a short consideration made the majority decide to follow the latter course. "About a hundred signed directly within an hour," Whitlock noted, while another hundred "had dinner together," to talk the matter over. The final result was that more than two-thirds of the members of the House of Commons subscribed the paper lying in the lobby, which ran as follows: "I do hereby freely promise and engage myself to be true and faithful to the Lord Protector and the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and shall not propose, or give my consent, to alter the government as it is settled in a single person and parliament."

The weeding-out process which Cromwell had undertaken to make his legislature a little more practically useful, though it succeeded to give him a large majority, obedient to all his behests, accomplished none of the higher objects he had in view. Instead of securing the liberty and welfare of the nation by the enactment of wise laws, the members of the reduced House of Commons continued, as much as they and their expelled colleagues had ever done, to discuss abstract political and theological questions, wasting their time in hot disputes about the most subtle and the most useless theories. Having gone on in this way for above four months, disregarding all hints on the part of the government that there had been enough of debate upon theories, and that some practical work ought to be done, Cromwell at last lost all patience, and on the 22nd of January, 1655, once more made his way to the Painted Chamber, and summoned the representatives thither. He told them bluntly that he had expected, during all the months they had been sitting, they would "have made those good and wholesome laws which the people expected," and was infinitely grieved to find that they had not produced anything but empty speeches. "I do not know what you have been doing," the Protector continued; "I do not know whether you have been alive or dead: I have not once heard from you all this time. . . . There be some trees that will not grow under the shadow of other trees, and there be some that choose to thrive under the shadow of other trees. I will tell you what hath thriven under your shadow. Instead of peace and settlement, instead of mercy and truth being brought together, and righteousness and peace kissing each other by your reconciling the honest people of these nations, and settling the distempers that are amongst us, which would have been glorious things, and worthy of Christians, to be done—weeds and nettles, briars and thorns have thriven under your shadow. Dissettlement and division, discontent and dissatisfaction, together with real dangers to the whole, have been more multiplied within these five months of your sitting than in some years before. Foundations have also been laid for the future renewing of the troubles of these nations by all the enemies of them abroad and at home. . . . And so I must conclude: I think myself bound, as in my duty to God, and to the people of these nations, for their safety and good in every respect—I think it my duty to tell you that it is not for the profit of these nations, nor for common and public good, for you to continue here any longer. Therefore I do declare unto you that I dissolve this present parliament." The members silently retired, none of them offering the least remark or show of opposition to a measure which once more made Cromwell absolute dictator of the realm.

To all outward appearance, the dictatorship was submitted to quietly by the nation. There were not wanting isolated cases of resistance to the existing government, which, whatever its other high merits, was clearly not resting on a strictly legal foundation; but the opposition thus made seldom went far, and but in one instance led to public excitement. The assault in this case, strangely enough, came from a personal friend of Cromwell, a wealthy merchant of the city of London, named Cony, who endeavoured to repeat the part played at the commencement of the reign of Charles the First by John Hampden. Excited by one of the debates upon the principles of government that were taking place in the House of Commons, Cony, on the 4th of November, sent notice to the Commissioners of Customs that he would no longer pay certain duties imposed by an ordinance of the Lord Protector, but which had not received parliamentary sanction; and to carry out his resistance, he tried to remove the merchandize imposed upon forcibly to his house. The London citizen was summoned to account on the 6th of November for his denial of the authority of government, and assuming a high tone, was put to trial, and, judgment being given on the 16th of the month, was condemned to pay a fine of five hundred pounds. However, Cony again refused to pay either the fine or the duties, upon which Cromwell sent for him, "reminded him of the old kindness and friendship that had been between them, and said that, of all men, he did not expect this opposition from him, in a matter that was so necessary for the good of the Commonwealth." In his defence, Cony, with bold frankness, reminded his exalted friend of their common principles, recalling to his memory his own expression in the Long Parliament, "That the subject who submits to an illegal impost is more the enemy of his country than the tyrant who imposes it." These were striking words, and Cromwell fully felt their weight, and, conscious of reason and justice being against him, could do nothing but get angry. "I have a will as stubborn as yours," was all he could say, "and we will try which of the two will be master;" with which he sent the merchant away, and then made out an order for his imprisonment. The last argument of kings was fast becoming also the last argument of a Lord Protector.

The city merchant, not dismayed by the stern attitude of his former friend, kept up the unequal battle against him with great courage. Sent to prison on the 12th of December, he immediately claimed a writ of habeas corpus from the Court of Upper Bench, and at the same time retained three of the most eminent lawyers of the day, Maynard, Twisden, and Windham, to plead his cause. They undertook the task, and at the trial spoke with so much earnest eloquence that Cromwell took the alarm, their arguments tending to nothing less than the absolute denial of the legality of his power. Conscious that if the merchant was acquitted every citizen might, in virtue of the same principles, sanctified by a decision at law, refuse to pay taxes, the Lord Protector now resorted to flagrant despotism; and on the day after their pleading, the 17th of May, 1655, Maynard and his two colleagues were dragged to the Tower, on the charge of having held language destructive to the existing government. Tyrannical as was the measure, it proved of no effect, for Cony, even when deprived of legal assistance, did not give up his defence, but personally pleaded his case before the Upper Bench. He did it so ably, that the lord chief justice, Henry Rolls, feeling embarrassed at his position, and not knowing how to disguise the arbitrariness of the sentence he was expected to pronounce, adjourned the case and deferred judgment to the following term, to the great indignation of the Lord Protector. Seeing the evident lack of zeal of Rolls to support his despotic government, Cromwell removed him from his high office on the 7th of June, 1655, appointing in his stead a more courtier-like lawyer, James Glynn. However, it seeming doubtful whether even he would consent to be as absolute a tool as was desired, Cromwell, after some further hesitation, in which there appeared to be a struggle between his innate sense of justice and the growing difficulties of his position, resolved upon stopping the case pending in the Upper Bench, and having discharged Maynard, Twisden, and Windham from prison, he induced Cony, by bringing the whole weight of his personal influence to bear upon him, to remain quiet and take no further proceedings. At the same time, to vent his ire against some of the persons in an affair which had given him the greatest anxiety, the Lord Protector sent for the judges of the Upper Bench, and bitterly upbraided them for not interfering with the freedom of speech of such daring members of the bar as the three counsel of the city merchant. On the judges submitting, in all humility, that such freedom was sanctioned by the law and Magna Charta, Cromwell got into a passion. "Your Magna Charta," he exclaimed, with an oath, "shall not control my actions, which, I know, are for the good of the Commonwealth. Who made you judges? Have you any authority to sit there but what I gave you? If my authority were at an end you know well enough what would become of yourselves, and therefore I advise you to be more tender of that which alone can preserve you, and not suffer the lawyers to prate what it does not become you to hear."

Cromwell's words indicated a great change in his convictions, which change, however, was evidently more forced upon him by the overwhelming power of circumstances than the result of inward deliberation. The Lord Protector had now arrived at that fatal point in his career when he could not any longer hope to satisfy the nation by good government alone, and scrupulous regard to its most cherished material interests, but had either to give way to, or suppress by brute force, desires of a higher nature and equally just. None but his most inveterate personal and political enemies had any doubt that he was acting, and had been acting all along, as he himself constantly reiterated, "for the good of the Commonwealth," and that his conduct throughout was inspired by lofty motives, and remarkably free from vanity, parade of power, and vulgar ambition. Yet if all this was admitted, there still remained an intense want of satisfaction with his government, and the bases upon which it was established, in the ever-recurring consideration that in reality it was nothing but an enlightened despotism. Though there seemed little fear that as long as his bright intellect and high moral rectitude was presiding over the destinies of the Commonwealth the liberty and welfare of the people would be endangered, nevertheless it was, beyond doubt, of extreme peril to trust the happiness of three nations to the feeble life of a single man, and leave him to collect an immense power, vaster and more formidable than had ever been possessed by any crowned sovereign of the realm. However wise and high-aimed Cromwell's despotism, all thoughtful men felt that the country, just emerged from a gigantic struggle against arbitrary government, could not submit to it without degrading itself, as well as risking future happiness; and the gradual spread of this conviction soon came to raise a mighty and constantly growing opposition against the established government. The opposition, dull and dumb at first, gradually found vent among the Republicans of the army in plots and conspiracies, and encouraged by the example thus set, the Royalists in their turn, after long silent submission, made an attempt to stir up a revolution. Towards the end of 1654, while the House of Commons was discussing constitutional theories, the plans of both parties began ripening into action, and at the commencement of the new year all was ready to burst into open flame.

But the smouldering fire had been seen and watched by the keen eye of Cromwell long before it exhibited outward signs. The first scheme of the army Republicans, chiefly belonging to the faction of the "Levellers," was to seize the Lord Protector, and by a simultaneous movement get possession of the Tower of London, Hull, Portsmouth, and Edinburgh Castle; after which the troops were to choose a representative body, and to inaugurate a new government. However, the design had scarcely been elaborated when Cromwell knew all its details; and following the movements of the authors, chief among them Colonel Wildman, an officer of high talent and good family, with cautious vigilance, he swooped down upon them the moment they were thinking of action. By a series of ordinances, issued swiftly, and carried into execution with the utmost promptitude, all officers known as antagonistic to the government were at once dismissed; others, of doubtful fidelity, suspended from service; and all soldiers of questionable character, or suspected as being "Levellers," discharged from their regiments. Colonel Wildman was surprised in the very act of dictating to his secretary a proclamation directed against the Lord Protector; and a number of his friends, among them Lord Grey of Groby, and Colonels Alured and Overton, were placed in strict confinement, in which they gave up the whole of the threads of the conspiracy. While thus the Republican rising was nipped in the bud, the Royalist insurrection, prepared to break out simultaneously, flared up for a moment with some fierceness. The leaders of this plot were the earl of Rochester, dissolute companion of the son of Charles I., and Sir Joseph Wagstaff, an old Cavalier officer, and their plan was to raise the western counties in arms for the house of Stuart, by the representative of the family appearing there and planting the royal standard. Young Charles, who had taken up his residence at Cologne, his whole time devoted to wine and women, consented to play his part in the enterprise; but feeling reluctant at the last moment to leave the pleasant shores of the Rhine in an inclement season, kept back hesitatingly, and before he had well decided in his own mind whether he should make another bold grasp at a crown, or remain in the midst of boon companions and mistresses, the whole scheme had burst. Sir Joseph Wagstaff managed to seize the city of Salisbury for a few hours, during which he arrested the sheriff and judges who were holding the assizes; but seeing that nobody joined him, he decamped at once with the band of desperate adventurers he had gathered around him, making for the west, where he expected to get reinforcements. But as he marched through Devonshire, his hopes grow fainter every day, and at South Molton, a single troop of Cromwell's horse, which happened to be in the neighbourhood, dispersed the warriors of the so-called Charles II. almost without a blow. Sir Joseph, careful in saving his valuable life, succeeded in escaping to France, as well as his friend the earl of Rochester, who had been hanging in his rear; but almost the whole of their deluded followers were taken, a few of them executed, and the rest sent to prison or to the West Indies. The short-lived insurrection seemed to prove as much as anything that the nation was content and happy under the wise despotism of the Lord Protector.

However, Cromwell himself was not content with his own work, and, thoughtful and sagacious ruler as he was, could not be content. In all his strength and power, with three nations at his feet, mute, if not admiring his deeds, he could not but be conscious that he was drifting along a fatal precipice, at the end of which there was utter darkness. He was erecting, he knew but too well, an edifice of government the keystone of which was his own frail life, which, breaking under the toil of years, would leave nought but ruins behind. Nevertheless, there was no going back on the path he had once entered. Being filled heart and soul with the conviction he had expressed to the representatives of the nation, that he had a grand mission to accomplish, he could admit of no petty theories of government to stand in his way, and thus strode along undauntedly in his arbitrary career. "If my calling be from God, and my testimony from the people," he kept repeating to himself and to others, "God and the people shall take it from me; else I will not part from it. I should be false to the trust that God hath placed in me, and to the interest of the people of these nations, if I did." That a Stuart king might have said the same, and, if backed by a sufficiency of fighting men, set up the most tyrannical government in the name of God, was clear to the Republican antagonists of the Lord Protector, but not admitted by himself; and unable to see his own false position as others saw it, he necessarily went farther and farther on his fatal path. The quickly-suppressed insurrection of the Royalists, and designs of the "Levellers," so far from pointing out to him the dangers of his arbitrary policy, had no other effect but to fortify him more and more in it, and deeming that his authority was not yet vast enough to suppress similar risings in the future, he worked out a grand plan for drawing still tighter the reins of despotism he held in his hand. The plan was to rule the Commonwealth in military fashion, like a regiment of soldiers, by dividing the country into a certain number of districts, with an officer over each. Terrible in every respect as was the scheme, Cromwell carried it through in all its integrity, and six months had not elapsed after the miserable knot of rebels under Sir Joseph Wagstaff had been overthrown, before the nation had come under the "government of the major-generals."

There was something extremely bold in the very conception of this new form of government. Under the pretext of maintaining the public peace and suppressing royalist plots, Cromwell resolved to establish in every county a local militia, composed mainly of cavalry, drawn from the ranks of the small freeholders most attached to his cause, and well paid for their services. In order to pay them, he proposed to levy a tax of one-tenth on the income of all Royalists possessing above a hundred pounds per annum, which tax, it was anticipated, would maintain a body of armed men more than sufficient to secure perpetual "order and peace." For the effectual organization of this militia, and collection of the new tax, Cromwell proposed to divide England and Wales into twelve districts, the rule of which was to be intrusted to twelve of his most devoted adherents in the army, who, under the name of major-generals, were to exercise all political and administrative power, and, to a certain point, all judicial authority, and from whose decisions there was to be no appeal but to himself. The plan thus laid down was carried into execution with extraordinary promptness and energy, astounding alike to the friends and the enemies of Cromwell. On the 28th of May, 1655, he exhibited to them the first part of his great design, by nominating his brother-in-law, John Desborough, "major-general of the militia levied, and to be levied, in the six counties in the south-west of England;" and on the 2nd of August following, Desborough took the direct command of twelve squadrons of newly-enrolled cavalry militia that had been raised in the two months since his appointment. On the 3rd of August, the day after the new major-general had entered upon his charge, Cromwell brought the question of the establishment of a general militia for the first time before the members of the State Council, and they assenting, as in duty bound, to all his proposals, the ordinance was issued to lay out the country in twelve military divisions. It was the most sudden, if not the most important change of government that had occurred in England since the commencement of the civil war, and yet the decree ordering it passed as quietly as if it had been the merest trifle. There was an appearance as if the nation had arrived at the point to cede all its will and power to the great Lord Protector; either with implicit love or with implicit fear. Cromwell had come to be the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth Cromwell.

The ordinance providing for the establishment of the new militia all over England was accompanied, when issued, by a sort of manifesto of the Lord Protector and his council. It was entitled, "A Declaration showing the reasons of the proceedings of the government for securing the peace of the Commonwealth on occasion of the late insurrection and rebellion;" and went into copious details of the revolutionary attempts of the Royalists at the beginning of the year, which were stated to have been planned by "Charles Stuart," and other enemies of England abroad. "Upon these grounds," the Declaration went on, "we have been necessitated to erect a new and standing militia of horse in all the counties of England, under such pay as might be without burthen to the peaceable and well affected, and be a fitting encouragement to the officers and soldiers that they might not go to war at their own charge. Wherefore we have thought fit to lay the burthen of maintaining these forces, and of certain other expenses which are occasioned by them, upon those who have been engaged in the late wars against the state." The manifesto then went on to asseverate that the Royalists had in reality paid less to the state as yet in the compositions and fines to which they had been subjected than the good people who had maintained the parliamentary armies by heavy taxes and assessments, so that it was but fair they should now make up the difference. It was further remarked that the generous treatment which the adherents of the Stuarts had hitherto received at the hands of the government was entirely unparalleled in history, other nations and rulers, in all ages, having made it a principle, in cases of civil war, to deprive the losing party completely of power and wealth, so as to prevent the same to engage in new disturbances. In the present case, for the first time, it had been resolved to try the effects of forbearance, but to little effect, so that now it became necessary to fall back upon a strict assertion of authority, and let the punishing arm of justice take the place of generosity. In consequence, as the Royalists had neither accepted with sincerity their own defeat, nor the amnesty which had been granted to them, and as they had incessantly threatened the state with new dangers, it was but fit and just that they should pay the cost of establishing and maintaining new means for its defence. All the adherents of the fallen cause were to be deprived henceforth of the protection of the common law, and subjected to an annual decimation of their revenue, with the exception, however, of such persons' income as was less than a hundred pounds a year, or whose personal estate was worth less than fifteen hundred pounds. The Declaration concluded with the assurance, meant to soften the terribly fierce character of Cromwell's measure, "that if there was yet any person that had been of the malignant party, who could say with truth that he was wholly free from evil designs, and show, by actions previous to the insurrection, a disclaiming of the tenour of his former life and conversation; or if any person, being now sensible of his error, should change and forsake his former interest, and give demonstration to that effect, the government would much more esteem of their reformation than desire their prejudice or harm."

A few days after the publication of his manifesto the Lord Protector proceeded to the appointment of the twelve major-generals, who were henceforth to rule the Commonwealth under his supreme direction, and distributed the country among them. To his brother-in-law, Desborough, already nominated, he gave the six great west of England shires of Gloucester, Wilts, Dorset, Devon, Somerset, and Cornwall, while the equally important six central and eastern counties of Bucks, Herts, Cambridge, Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk were made over to Fleetwood, his son-in-law, just returned from his government in Ireland. Major-General Skippon, old captain of the train bands, obtained the city of London to rule; Colonel Barkstead, governor of the Tower, the rest of Middlesex; Colonel Kelsey, the counties of Kent and Surrey; Colonel Goffe, Sussex, Hants, and Berks; Colonel Worsley, Cheshire, Lancashire, and Shropshire; Major Buler, Northampton, Bedford, Rutland, and Huntingdon; General Whalley, Lincoln, Notts, Derby, Warwick, and Leicester; Colonel Berry—friend of Richard Baxter, once a clerk in an iron foundry—Hereford, Shropshire, and North Wales; General Dawkins, Monmouthshire and South Wales; and, finally, General Lambert, ablest of officers of the Lord Protector, but least trusted, Yorkshire, Durham, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Northumberland. The instructions given to all and each of these twelve major-generals enjoined them to make Cromwell's manifesto known throughout the country, to obtain the co-operation of trusty commissioners in their respective districts, and to proceed immediately, with their assistance, to a valuation of the incomes of the Royalists, and collection of the tax imposed upon them. They were moreover invested with the most extensive authority, not only over "malignants," but over every person whom they might mistrust as inimical to the established government, all of whom they were empowered either to arrest and throw into prison, or to put upon bail, with injunction to appear from time to time before appointed agents and examiners. A common register of the persons thus held under supervision in the twelve military districts was ordered to be kept in London, and none of them were allowed to visit the capital, or to travel any distance from their homes, without leave of the major-general of their division. The latter functionaries carried out their mission to the full, in a few instances with moderation, but in others with extreme harshness, oppressing and robbing the wealthy, and ill-treating both Royalists and Republicans. However, as designed in principle, the tyranny of the major-generals did not extend over the lower and the middle classes, the workmen and tradesmen of towns, and small yeomen of the country, among whom were to be found the bulk of the Protector's adherents. Like all despotisms, that of Cromwell was driven to uphold its existence by arraying class against class, and calling into play the lowest of human passions.

The arbitrary rule to which the country was condemned to submit by the establishment of the major-generals caused very little open resistance, but it had the visible effect of alienating the best, the wisest, and noblest men of the nation from the august general and statesman who guided the destinies of the Commonwealth. Henceforth, the great name of Cromwell ceased to be beloved, and only inspired terror, not-unmixed, however, with a reverence approaching awe. Even those who most abhorred the course of tyranny into which the Lord Protector was launching, could not forbear admiration of his high genius, as well as his intense striving to promote the glory and physical welfare of the people of England. At the same time, while he was setting his will above law, pleading a mission from God to lead the Commonwealth through servitude to liberty, he upheld with mighty arm the honour of the nation against foreign potentates, concluded treaties of commerce and navigation with countries far and wide, and made the British flag respected, in peace and war, in all the corners of the globe.

The maritime superiority of the Netherlands having succumbed already under the valour of his sailors and soldiers, Cromwell determined to beard the only two remaining powers whose forces could dispute with England the rule of the seas; and in the autumn of 1654, while the parliament he had called together was investigating the philosophy of government, made vast preparations for attacking France and Spain, either singly or both together. Two great fleets were fitted out for this purpose in Portsmouth harbour; the first under the orders of Robert Blake, consisting of twenty-five men-of-war of the largest kind, heavily armed, and strongly manned; and the second, commanded by Sir William Penn, comprising thirty-eight ships and transports, prepared to take on board, besides its crews, three thousand soldiers. The greatest secrecy was kept as to the destination of the two armaments, and the commanders having received sealed orders, only to be opened at sea, they both left port, almost simultaneously, in October, for their unknown destinations. Admiral Blake, called "the sea-king" by his devoted men, whose love for him was as great as their trust and admiration, sailed straight for the Mediterranean, and anchoring before Leghorn, demanded and obtained redress from the grand duke of Tuscany for wrongs committed against the owners of English merchant vessels. From thence Blake went to the Barberrine states, forcing, at the point of the cannon, the rulers of Algiers and Tripoli to release their Christian prisoners; and on the bay of Tunis refusing to do the same, he burst into the harbour, battered the strong fortresses to pieces, and then set fire to the galleys of the pirates, burning their whole fleet at its moorings. In the meanwhile, the second fleet from Portsmouth, under Admiral Penn, had gone to the West Indies, to make an attack upon the Spanish settlements there, and in the first instance capture St. Domingo. This scheme failed, through the incompetency of General Venables, the commander of the three thousand soldiers in Penn's armament. However, though repulsed from St. Domingo, the English troops conquered Jamaica, thus making an important addition to the as yet small colonial possessions of the Commonwealth.

Penn's cruise to the West Indies had for consequence a declaration of war on the part of the king of Spain. Cromwell was fully prepared for it; but in order not to hazard too much in a contest with the greatest naval and military power of Europe, he concluded, just before the breaking-out of hostilities, a long-offered treaty of alliance with France. By the terms of the treaty, signed on the 24th of October, 1655, the combined forces of England and France were to invade the Spanish Netherlands, with Dunkirk to remain the price of the former. It was likewise settled that help should be given by the new ally of the Commonwealth to the persecuted Protestants of the Western Alps, the so-called Waldenses; and also that Charles Stuart and his whole family should be for ever excluded from French territory. The latter stipulation appeared, somewhat unnecessary for the moment, the unhappy heir of the Stuarts living in a very abject state at Cologne, begging alms from all the princes of the continent, and devoting the sums thus obtained to low orgies with his dissolute male and female companions. However, the report of the forthcoming war served to rouse him into some show of languid exertion; and offering the value of his name to the sovereign of Spain, he proposed to aid him in the conquest of England. At first the government of Madrid refused, but being hard pressed by the agents of the Cologne Cavaliers, made importunate by dire want of victuals, an agreement was concluded in April, 1656, stipulating that "Charles II., King of England, Scotland, and Ireland," should invade England, Scotland, and Ireland, his royal brother, the king of Spain, to furnish the necessary cash, as well as the soldiers, with a pension for life superadded. There was no great danger to the Commonwealth in this proposed assault; however, to reduce the peril of invasion as much as possible, Admiral Blake, who had returned from his first Mediterranean cruise, set out again for the Straits of Gibraltar. His design was to burn the Spanish fleet in the harbour of Cadiz, and though this miscarried, he succeeded in inflicting great damage upon the enemy all along the coast, as well as seizing a portion of the famous "Plate fleet," returning from America laden with treasure. The rich prize was sent at once home, and in the middle of November, 1656, the whole capital got into joyous uproar at the news that near two score chariots full of bullion had arrived, "some eight-and-thirty waggon-loads of real silver, triumphantly jingling up from Portsmouth, across London pavements to the Tower, to be coined into current money there." The glory of England was becoming perceptible to the meanest understanding.

The war with Spain, which continued, with short interruptions of ill fortune, to be highly prosperous

for the Commonwealth, was not without effect in strengthening the power of Cromwell at home. Nevertheless, there were not wanting strong manifestations to show that the country was getting tired of his arbitrary government, and to reconcile himself as much as possible with the more moderate of his antagonists, he resolved to convene another parliament. The writs for it were issued in August, 1656, and on the 17th of September following, the house met at Westminster, not, however, before one hundred and two members, supposed enemies of the government, had been violently excluded from it, under the pretext of immorality and "delinquency." To those who presented themselves before him in the Painted Chamber, Cromwell made a very long and rather violent speech, in which he passed the history of the country since the dissolution of the last parliament in review, defended the establishment of military rule, by the twelve major-generals, as necessary for the maintenance of order, and, finally, called for liberal supplies to carry on the war against the Spaniards, "the natural enemies of England." The address was received with marked coldness, if not irritation, which was increased when, on proceeding from the Painted Chamber to the hall of parliament, the members were stopped at the door by a file of soldiers, who would let none pass unless producing a certificate of having been "approved by his highness's council." The next day, after the Speaker had been elected, a protest was handed in by the excluded members of the house, denouncing the arbitrary proceeding by which they were prevented from fulfilling their duties as representatives of the people, and demanding to be admitted at once. A short and excited discussion followed, but on a simple communication being made that it was the desire of the Lord Protector that the obnoxious persons should remain expelled, all subsided into quietness, and a solemn vote went to confirm what had been done. It was in vain the excluded members appealed finally to the nation at large, in a document impeaching in strong language the tyranny of Cromwell, and declaring all who should continue to sit in the mutilated parliament to be "betrayers of the liberties of England, and adherents to the capital enemies of the Commonwealth." Many thousands of copies of this protest, which was signed by ninety-three representatives, were dispersed over the country and eagerly read by the people; but the excitement, whatever there was of it, did not go further than the reading. It was as if the nation had become fully aware that the rule of the Lord Protector was an unmitigated despotism, yet had resolved at the same time to bear it for the sake of its material advantages and of the illustrious hero who had imposed the burthen. The edifice was safe as long as he was alive; but there were few men who loved their country, its welfare, and its liberty, who liked to answer to themselves the question as to what would happen after the death of Oliver Cromwell.

The parliament which the Lord Protector had called together, and shaped afterwards to his own liking, faithfully represented the state of public feeling. Everything demanded by the government, subsidies to carry on the Spanish war, legalisation of the edicts issued by Cromwell, and, finally, new measures of repression against both Republicans and Royalists, came to be voted instantly by large majorities, till it seemed as if the representatives of the nation had been brought to look upon themselves as mere registrars of the ordinances of the Lord Protector. On the 26th of September an Act was passed "for renouncing and disannulling the pretended title of Charles Stuart and his descendants to the crown of England;" and another bill was adopted on the 9th of October "for the security of his highness the Lord Protector's person, and continuance of the nation in peace and safety." On the 1st of October, it was unanimously voted that "the war against the Spaniards was undertaken upon just and necessary grounds, and for the good of the people of this Commonwealth; and the parliament will, by God's blessing, assist his highness therein," or, in other words, "provide the necessary funds. Considerable discussion took place as to the amount to be placed at the disposal of the government for war purposes, but it was finally settled at four hundred thousand pounds, which sum was ordered to be raised by an increase of several taxes. While thus approving the whole policy of Cromwell, the representatives of the nation showed him personally the greatest deference, letting no occasion pass to prove that they looked upon him as the legitimate sovereign of the country. By a special Act, passed on the 1st of October, the forms of all official communication between parliament and the Lord Protector were settled with great precision, leading to the establishment of almost regal ceremony; while another resolution invested him with large powers to appoint to judicial and other offices in the Commonwealth. There was a visible tendency in the whole course of proceedings towards re-erecting the fallen throne, and seat Cromwell upon it; though as yet all those who harboured the thought wanted courage to express it openly, and thus to face the resistance of the strong republican party, with the greater part of the army at its command. An opportunity was waited for to start the scheme, and it came in a rather unexpected manner.

After concluding an alliance with the king of Spain for the invasion of England, the son of Charles I., who had taken up his residence at Bruges, momentarily roused himself from his life of dissipation, to consider how best to accomplish his object. He had no intention whatever to risk his valuable life in personally engaging in a fresh campaign; yet as it was absolutely necessary that he should do something to earn the liberal Spanish pension settled upon him, he had to think of making war through others, and the best course offering itself for the moment was a league with some English adventurers, pretended Republicans, who were offering their services. The chief of these men was a Colonel Sexby, formerly in the parliamentary army, who engaged, if sufficient funds were handed to him, to raise a body of fifteen hundred mercenaries in the Spanish Netherlands, to land with them on the coast of Kent, and to get up an insurrection against the Lord Protector by raising the republican standard, the latter to be exchanged in proper time for the royalist flag. Aware that there was not the slightest chance for the success of such a rebellion as long as Cromwell was alive, the colonel proposed at the same time to have the latter assassinated, against payment of a further amount in ready cash, by one of his accomplices, a former quartermaster in his regiment, Miles Sindercomb by name. The plan was at once sanctioned by Charles Stuart and his Spanish allies, and the sum of sixteen hundred pounds having been handed to Miles Sindercomb, with promise of subsequent remuneration "on the faith of a Christian king," preparations for the intended assassination were at once actively taken in hand. The ex-quartermaster commenced his work by taking a house at Hammersmith, "which had a banqueting-room looking into the road," from which room he intended to destroy the Lord Protector and his suite by an explosion, when passing by on the way to Hampton Court. However, Cromwell's active secretary of state, John Thurloe, obtained timely information of the design, and taking possession of the house, the friend of Charles Stuart had to fly, and to think of other means for obtaining his end. After much cogitation and conferences with Spanish agents, Miles Sindercomb conceived the grand scheme of firing Whitehall, and in the ensuing confusion to have the Lord Protector and his whole family killed by a band of armed assassins. Having plenty of money at his command, he actually purchased "a hundred swift horses, two in a stable," with as many ruffians to ride them; and in the evening of Thursday, the 18th of January, set about the execution of his plan. In company with an old trooper named Cecil, he attended public worship in Whitehall chapel, and before it was over the two managed to sneak into an empty apartment on the ground floor, and set fire to some combustible materials there. The flame soon spread, but before it had gone far, a sentinel on duty perceived it, and giving the alarm, Sindercomb and his companion were captured, the former not without stout resistance, "wherein his nose was nearly cut off." There was intense excitement at Whitehall on the news of the plot becoming known, and in the first moment of terror the council of the Lord Protector gave orders to ring the alarm bells, and summon the train bands of the city. But Cromwell forbade it, declaring that, trusting in God, he did not fear his enemies.

On the following morning, the 19th of January, 1657, Secretary Thurloe got up in his place in parliament, and, amidst the deepest silence, reported the arrest of the two conspirators, together with an outline of their design as far as already discovered, showing that the intended assassination of the Lord Protector was connected with the designs of the king of Spain and Charles Stuart for an invasion of England. The emotion caused by this statement was profound, and manifested at once in a couple of resolutions voted unanimously. By the first it was ordered that a solemn day of thanksgiving should be celebrated, "Friday come four weeks," in all the churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland, for the discovery of the plot; while the second motion was for the appointment of a committee to enter into communication with the Protector, so as to learn from his highness what day it would be most convenient for him to set aside for an audience of the whole of the representatives in parliament, to accept their congratulations for his happy delivery. The latter vote had just been passed, when a rather obscure member, John Ashie, arose to proffer an amendment to it. "I would propose to add," he exclaimed, in much trepidation, "something that would tend very much to the preservation of his highness, and to the quieting of all the designs of our enemies, namely, that his highness would be pleased to take upon him the government according to the ancient constitution. Both our liberties and peace, and the preservation and privilege of his highness, would then be founded upon an old and sure foundation." The words had no sooner been pronounced than there arose an immense commotion in the house. "I understand not," cried one of the republican members, "what means the motion of the gentleman who talks of an ancient constitution. The ancient constitution is Charles Stuart's interest; I hope we are not calling him in again." Other speakers followed, attacking the indiscreet admirer of the ancient constitution. "The gentleman that moved this," exclaimed one of them, "was once helping to pull down what he would now set up again. We had a constitution of king, lords, and commons, and that we have pulled down with our blood and treasure. Will you make the Lord Protector the greatest hypocrite in the world, to ask him to sit in that place which God has borne testimony sufficiently against? Are you now going to set up again that kingly government which for a thousand years has persecuted the people of God? Do you expect a better consequence? I beseech you consider of it. What a crime it is to offer such a motion as this! Do you expect a thanksgiving-day after it? I desire that this motion may die as abominable, and I beseech you that such a thing as this may never receive footing here." Frightened at the storm which his proposition had caused, John Ashie wrapped himself in silence, and nobody also supporting the amendment he had brought forward, it was allowed to drop. "I have never seen," a member wrote in his diary, "so hot a debate vanish so strangely, like an ignis fatuus."

There had been both too great haste and indiscretion in the sudden motion to restore "the ancient constitution," which made it fail at the outset; but a large majority of the members of parliament, though allowing the subject to be stifled for a moment, were nevertheless anxious to support it, and did not fail to do so on the first opportunity. This was given by another address of attachment to the Lord Protector, voted shortly after the conviction of the conspirators who had attempted his life. The latter, put upon their trial before a jury sitting in the Upper Bench on the 19th of February, 1656, were condemned to death; but the chief delinquent, Miles Sindercomb, escaped his doom by taking poison, smuggled to him by his sister, and justice could be executed only upon the minor criminal. The fresh expression of loyalty to which the incident gave rise, encouraged one of the members for the city of London, Alderman Sir Christopher Pack, whom Cromwell had knighted and given a commissionership of excise, to start again the "ancient constitution" question, which he did with much more tact than the unfortunate John

Ashe. On the morning of the 23rd of February, as soon as the house had met, Sir Christopher arose in his seat, and drawing forth a bulky paper, requested permission to read it, stating that "it was something come to his hands tending to the settlement of the nation, and of liberty and property." There had not been any secret kept as to what was in the document produced by the worthy alderman, and his motion had no sooner been made than the Republicans stormed in upon him as they had done upon John Ashe, declaring his proceeding scandalous, and overwhelming him with taunts and reproaches. However, Sir Christopher Pack insisted on pressing his demand for permission to read the paper which had "come to his hands," and even after he had been dragged away by some republican officers from his seat near the Speaker, and placed like a penitent in front of the bar, he continued to hold his ground, till at length, after a debate of the fiercest kind, his perseverance found recompense in a decisive victory. The house resolved, by a majority of one hundred and sixty-two votes against fifty-four, that the member for the city of London should have his demand granted, whereupon he immediately proceeded to read his document. It was entitled, "The humble address and remonstrance of the knights, citizens, and burgesses now assembled in the parliament of this Commonwealth," and contained nothing less than the form of a new constitution, restoring the House of Lords and all the old forms of government, and building up a new throne, whereon the Lord Protector was invited to take his seat.

The debate on the important paper submitted by Alderman Pack extended from the 23rd of February to the 30th of March, 1657, and occupied twenty-four sittings, seven of which, contrary to parliamentary usage, continued during the whole of the day, both morning and evening. Though the republican minority resisted step by step the progress of the measure, they were outvoted on every occasion; and the most important clause, running, "That your highness will be pleased to assume the name, style, title, dignity, and office of king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the respective dominions and territories therein to belonging, and to exercise the same according to the law of these nations," was adopted by the large majority of one hundred and twenty-three votes against sixty-two. The wisdom of the re-establishment of kingship having thus been affirmed, the title of Sir Christopher Pack's bill was changed from "Address and Remonstrance," to "Humble Petition and Advice," so as to make it more monarchical in form; and on Tuesday, the 31st of March, a parliamentary deputation, consisting of the most eminent members of the majority, presented the document, "engrossed on vellum," to the Lord Protector. Cromwell received them with some pomp in the banqueting hall of his residence—the same room through which, eight years before, Charles I. had passed, between a double line of soldiers, on his way to the scaffold—and listened with much complacency to a very affected address of Sir Thomas Widdrington, the Speaker of the Commons:—"May it please your highness," he exclaimed, "I am commanded by the parliament of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and in their name, to present this humble petition and advice to your highness. I am sensible that I speak before a great person, the exactness of whose judgment ought to scatter and chase away all unnecessary speeches, as the sun doth the vapours. I am a servant, however, and a man not to vent my own conceits, but to declare the things I have in command from parliament. I am not unlike a gardener, who gathers flowers in his master's garden, and out of them composeth a nosegay: I shall offer nothing but what I have collected in the garden of the parliament." Sir Thomas then gave a detailed analysis of the eighteen clauses of the "Humble Petition and Advice," recommending, besides the restoration of monarchy, the re-establishment of the House of Lords, under the singular title of the "Other House," the settlement of a permanent revenue, and the regular summoning of parliaments. "I have now done," the Speaker concluded his address, "with the several pieces of the government, but not with the articles of which there remaineth yet one. The parliament hath so good an apprehension of this frame of government, in all the articles of it, that it is their humble desire that you may be pleased to accept of them all. They are bound up in one link or chain, or like a building well knit and cemented: if one stone be taken out it loosens the whole. The rejection of one may make all the rest unsuitable and impracticable. They are all offered to you with the same heart and affection, and we hope they will be received by you in the same manner. They are all the children of one mother, the parliament, and we expect from your highness an adoption of them all. Aut nihil aut totum dabit."

Cromwell's reply was exceedingly courteous, but somewhat evasive. He told the honorable gentlemen who offered him a crown that their proposition occasioned him "the greatest reverence and fear to God that ever possessed a man in the world," yet added that both parliament and he must be careful not to make mistakes. "It would be like a match," he cried, "where a good, and worthy, and virtuous man mistakes in the person he makes love; and, as often turns out, it proves a curse to the man and to the family through mistake." He ended by declaring that "the thing will deserve deliberation and consideration," and promised to give "as speedy an answer to these things as I can." Three days after, on Friday, the 3rd of April, Cromwell sent for the Speaker and other members of the parliamentary deputation, and they attending in great haste to the summons, he made another speech. Its substance was a refusal of the crown, but in terms not too peremptory. "I have been able to attain no further than this," he exclaimed; "that seeing the way is hedged up so as it is to me, and I cannot accept the things offered unless I accept all, I have not been able to find it my duty to God and you to undertake this charge under the new title." The house politely refused to accept this reply as final, and having confirmed the "Humble Petition and Advice" by a fresh vote, the members went in a body to Whitehall, entreating the Lord Protector to reconsider his decision. He suggested thereupon that a conference should be held between him and a committee of parliament, to discover, if possible, some means of reconciling their opinions on the great subject. The offer was eagerly accepted; nevertheless, the work of the committee proceeded very slowly, Cromwell protracting it as much as possible, in order to come to an understanding with the leading officers of the army. Nearly the whole of these were violently opposed to the restoration of a monarchy, or even the mere change of title from Lord Protector to king; and great as were the efforts that had already been made to change their opinions, they could not be induced to consent in any way to the acceptance of the parliamentary "Petition and Advice." To break the force of their resistance, the institution of major-generals, which, while fortifying the government, had given a great power to the military class, was abolished by Cromwell; but this had no effect whatever, and the opposition to the kingly scheme kept increasing to such an extent, as to make it evident that, if accepting it, the Lord Protector would find a great portion of the troops ranged in more or less open hostility against him. Cromwell was too wise to let his ambition betray him into so fatal a step, and after spending more than two months in ineffectual attempts to gain over the officers, he finally resolved to banish all further thoughts of becoming a crowned king.

He made his resolution known to parliament, which met him in full body, in the Painted Chamber, on the 8th of May, in a short and outspoken declaration. "I cannot undertake," the Protector exclaimed, "the government with the title of king; and that is my answer to this great and weighty business." The representatives of the people withdrew in silence, postponing further deliberation on the subject for a week, with the intention of remodelling after that period the "Petition and Advice," so as to meet the desires of the Lord Protector. The work went on very slowly, and it was not till towards the end of June that it was completed to the satisfaction of the parliamentary majority, as well as of Cromwell. It was settled in the amended bill, which came to assume the form of a charter of the realm, that the chief magistrate of the Commonwealth should continue to be called Lord Protector, but should be invested with increased political powers, among others that of appointing his successor, and that he should likewise have the nomination of the members of the "Other House," or reconstituted House of Lords. The other chief provisions of the new constitution were that the annual revenue of the government should amount to one million three hundred thousand pounds sterling, of which sum one million was to be devoted to the army and navy, and the rest to the civil list; while as to spiritual matters there should be complete liberty of conscience, denied only to those who refused to acknowledge the doctrine of the Trinity and the inspiration of the Scriptures, or who professed the "Popish" religion. It was deemed necessary for the inauguration of the revised charter of the nation that Cromwell should take a second time the oath as Lord Protector and supreme magistrate of the Commonwealth, which ceremony took place, under a considerable display of splendour, on Friday, the 26th of June, 1657. An immense platform was erected for the purpose at the upper end of Westminster Hall, in front of which was placed "a prince-like canopy of state," and under it the royal chair of Scotland, brought from Westminster Abbey. Facing the chair, but a little below it, stood a table, "covered with pink-coloured velvet of Genoa, fringed with fringe of gold," on which were laid the sword and sceptre of the Commonwealth, together with a Bible—grand substitute for a crown.

The Lord Protector made his appearance on the Westminster platform at two o'clock in the afternoon, surrounded by his ministers, the chief state dignitaries, and a great crowd of officers, and amidst the loud acclamations of the assembly sat down in the chair of state. After being seated for a few moments, he arose again, and, as reported by Bulstrode Whitelocke, chief commissioner of the Great Seal, "while standing under the cloth of state, the Speaker, in the name of the parliament, presented to his highness and placed upon his shoulders a robe of purple velvet, lined with ermine, and then delivered to him the Bible, richly gilt and bossed. After that the Speaker girt the sword about his highness, and delivered into his hands the sceptre of massive gold; and this done, he made a speech to him on the several things presented, and then gave him the oath;" "I do, in the presence and by the name of God Almighty," exclaimed the Lord Protector, with uplifted hand, "promise and swear that, to the utmost of my power, I will uphold and maintain the true reformed Protestant Christian religion in the purity thereof as it is contained in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, and encourage the profession and professors of the same; and that, to the utmost of my power, I will endeavour, as chief magistrate of these three nations, the maintenance and preservation of the just rights and privileges of the people thereof, and that I will in all things, according to my best knowledge and power, govern the people of these nations according to law." The oath having been taken, the chaplain of the Commons, Dr. Manton, "by prayer recommended his highness, the parliament, the counsel, the forces by land and sea, and the whole government and people of the three nations, to the blessing and protection of God." Next the heralds, by sound of trumpet, proclaimed his highness, the Lord Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions therunto belonging, to which the vast multitude in Westminster Hall replied with shouts of "Long live his highness! Huzza!" All the while "the Lord Protector sat in his chair of state, holding the sceptre in his hand," and on the trumpets and the shouts of the people ceasing, he rose, bowed in silence to the assembly, and, with his vast retinue, passed through the midst of immense crowds, back to Whitehall.

Under all this pomp and splendour which greeted the inauguration of the new form of government, there was hidden deep mourning and dissatisfaction. In lifting his own person higher and higher, Cromwell made the future of the Commonwealth ever more dark and uncertain, giving little space to the growth of free institutions, and leaving the welfare of three nations dependent upon the hazards of a single life. In his hands the Commonwealth appeared safe, but what would happen when he was gone none could tell; for no eyes could see a successor worthy of him, his ascendancy having blighted the rise of all other influences as the wide-spreading branches of a mighty oak destroy the growth of all life underneath. And the very height to which his power had risen made him stand more and more lonely, unable to listen to the wishes of the people, and therefore liable to constant errors in policy. It was more than an error which had brought him to consent to the reawakening of the dormant House of Lords, and thus create an institution which could not be of the slightest possible use in carrying on the government on a liberal basis, but was capable nevertheless of producing infinite mischief. Cromwell himself discovered this before many months had elapsed after his solemn proclamation in Westminster Hall. The House of Commons was prorogued immediately after the ceremony till the 20th of January, 1658, and the interval of seven months was to be employed to create the resuscitated chamber of peers, the "Other House," the members of which the Lord Protector had to nominate. The task, apparently easy, proved one of extreme embarrassment, all men of superior birth and talent refusing to sit in an assembly which threatened to be a mere clog in the working of the parliamentary machine, while those aspiring to the empty honour were chiefly persons of low degree and undefined position. More than five months were spent in vain searches after Commonwealth lords. "The difficulty proves great," wrote Secretary Thurloe on the 1st of December, 1657, "between those who are fit and not willing to serve, and those who are willing, and expect it, and are not fit." Of all the members of the old chamber of lords, not more than seven consented to receive Cromwell's writ of summons for the "Other House," of whom only one appeared in the end to take his seat. After trying in all directions to discover eminent persons of some sort to make up his parliamentary appendage, the Lord Protector finally was reduced to a very unsatisfactory list of sixty-three members, of whom nine were civil functionaries, fifteen military officers, some of those soldiers of fortune of the very humblest birth, and the rest country gentlemen and citizens possessed of a little money, or a little local importance. Cromwell's main design in creating the "Other House" had been to attract to him many of the old nobles and great landed proprietors; but the list he was compelled to form upset this plan entirely, for even Lord Warwick, one of his most intimate friends, refused, after he had seen it, to take part in the new gathering of peers, declaring that "he could not sit in the same assembly with Hewson the gobbler and Pride the drayman." The nation was getting rife for political liberty, but it was as far as ever from social equality.

The adjourned parliament met on the day fixed, Wednesday, the 20th of January, and the very first hour showed that the new session would be a stormy one. Nearly the whole of the members of the House of Commons whom Cromwell had violently excluded in September, 1656, at the beginning of parliament, now presented themselves at the door, offering to take the oath to the new constitution, and although everything was done to resist their demands, they had to be admitted, constituting so many enemies of the government. The opening of the session itself gave rise to strong manifestations of antipathy on the part of many of the members of the House of Commons. Not having got the fact well fixed in their memories that they had to share their authority henceforth with another assembly, strange to look upon at first sight, the commons felt startled when the usher of the black rod appeared at the bar, summoning them to attend his highness the Protector "in the House of Lords." The latter name was at once protested against; after which a small stream of representatives of the people flowed sullenly in the wake of their Speaker, and the mace carried before him, till they found themselves in the presence of the chief magistrate and the three score new-made peers. Cromwell's speech was unusually brief, beginning with "My lords and gentlemen of the House of Commons," the same as in the times of royalty, which again brought on a murmur of dissatisfaction, that was quenched, however, at once by a remark about illness. "I have some infirmities upon me," said the Lord Protector, "and I have not liberty to speak much unto you, but I have desired an honourable person here by me to discourse a little more particularly what may be proper for this occasion and this meeting." The honourable person referred to was Nathaniel Fiennes, filling the position of chancellor of the exchequer in the Council of State, who, when Cromwell had sat down, delivered a long address, of more than an hour's duration, full of figurative and flowery language. He compared the state of England to the rising of Cosmos out of Chaos, quoted Moses, Aristotle, the Evangelists, Lord Bacon, Magna Charta, and Abraham, and finished by inviting the representatives of the people to range themselves round the Protector, crying, "Come, good and faithful servants, and enter into your master's joy." There was no applause when the "honourable person" had finished. The Republicans gazed upon him with stern looks, and the secret Royalists, daily more bold in words and acts, smiled with contempt, while all felt excited and ill at ease.

The conflict of parliament with the executive, apparent from the first hour, was not long to commence. On the 22nd of January, two days after the opening of the session, a messenger from the "Other House" presented himself at the bar of the commons, to invite the latter to unite with "the lords" in presenting a humble address to his highness, to appoint a day of public prayer and thanksgiving throughout the country. The bare mentioning of the word "lords" caused an immediate storm. "We know of no House of Lords," several members cried at the same time, "and will have none;" and, the agitation subsiding, a long debate ensued, spreading over several days, in which the Republicans openly impeached the government with trying to subvert the foundations of the Commonwealth. They exclaimed, with evident truth, that the gradual return to monarchical institutions which was going on could have but one ultimate result, that of the restoration of the Stuarts; and that this was the policy followed, either blindly or designedly, by those who had created the "Other House," and whatever else there was approaching to kingship in the new constitution.

The discussion gave rise to so much excitement, that Cromwell deemed it necessary to interfere, and on the morning of the 26th of January a message was handed to the Speaker, desiring the commons to attend his highness, together with the "Other House," at Whitehall. Having obeyed the summons, the Protector launched forth into a long speech, taking an hour and a half in delivery, and commencing with "My lords and gentlemen of the two houses of parliament, for so I must own you, in whom, together with myself, is vested the legislative power of these nations." The essence of Cromwell's address was that the Commonwealth was in the greatest danger of destruction, both from external and internal enemies; and that the only means of saving its existence was complete unity of the powers in the state, and firm attachment of the parliament to his office and his person. "I look upon this to be the great duty of my place," he cried, "as being set on a watch-tower, to see what may be for the good of these nations, and what may be for the preventing of evil;" adding, "and you are come now, as I may say, into the end of as great difficulties and straits as, I think, ever nation was engaged in." The words were listened to attentively, but had no effect whatever upon the attitude of the commons. They renewed the debate upon which they had been engaged as soon as returning from Whitehall, and continued it from day to day with ever-increasing heat, fresh speakers coming forward continually to denounce the attempts of certain men to deprive the people of all its liberties, dearly purchased on the field of battle. On learning what was taking place in the House of Commons, the Protector no longer hid his anger, and a vote having passed on the 3d of February, declaring that no assembly of lords should be acknowledged, he resolved upon a decided step. Without consulting the members of his council, or communicating his design to any one, he went to Westminster on the morning of the 4th of February, to dissolve parliament.

The commons were startled infinitely, when, "about eleven of the clock in the morning," the usher of the Black Rod made his appearance at the bar. Sir Arthur Haselrige, leader of the republican party, was in the midst of a violent speech against the government, when some members told him to stop, that they might listen what the messenger from the "Other House" had to say. "What care I for the Black Rod?" cried Sir Arthur, and was going to proceed, but was stopped by the Speaker, who ordered him to sit down. "His highness is in the lord's house," shouted Black Rod, "and desires to speak with you," upon which the sergeant-at-arms at once took up the mace and went away, followed by the Speaker and most of the members of the house. The Lord Protector bore a look of great severity at the approach of the commons, and, rising before his chair of state, at once addressed them in a stern tone. "I had very comfortable expectations," he began, "that God would make the meeting of this parliament a blessing; and, the Lord be my witness, I desired the carrying of the affairs of the nation to these ends." He then bitterly complained that they, representatives of the people, would not assist him in relieving "the sad condition of these nations," which made him sorry that he had ever allowed himself to be made the chief magistrate. "I can say, in the presence of God, in comparison with whom we are but like poor creeping ants upon the earth," he exclaimed, with deep solemnity, "I would have been glad to have lived under my wood-side, to have kept a flock of sheep, rather than have undertaken such a government as this." "It hath been not only your endeavour," he continued, "to pervert the army while you have been sitting, and to draw them to state the question about a Commonwealth, but some of you have been listing of persons, by commission of Charles Stuart, to join with any insurrection that may be made. And what is like to come upon this, the enemy being ready to invade us, but even present bloodshed and confusion? This being so, I do assign it to the cause of your not assenting to what you did invite me to by your Petition and Advice, as that might prove the settlement of the nation. And if this be the aim of your sittings, and this be your carriage, I think it high time that an end be put to your sittings. So I do dissolve this parliament. And let God be judge between you and me!" "Amen!" murmured the leader of the Republicans.

Oliver Cromwell now, once more, stood all alone on the giddy heights of absolute power. He was master of the Commonwealth, with his heel on the neck of three nations, trusting him and trembling before him; yet, in his far-seeing mind, he could not but quail before the thought of his own position, so great and so glorious, and still so rotten and without foundation. He knew that he was the Atlas of a world of his own creation, the living pillar on whom alone all order rested; and he knew also that his shoulders were bending under the heavy burthen of cares resting upon them, and that his feet were tottering to the grave. Proud as he was, full of high thoughts, and with unspeakable love of his country, he yet had begun to acknowledge the barrenness and abortiveness of the great political structure he had been raising, in declaring, with touching pathos, his regret of not having spent his life "under a wood-side, to have kept a flock of sheep, rather than to have undertaken such a government as this." But laments like these were vain. He had gone too far to return upon his steps, and, driven on by the indomitable force of events, could do nothing but stride forward and brave the unknown future. It looked dark enough at home, wherever his gaze was turned: the nation torn by factions, authority sinking to nought, and the crew of the vessel of state turning against the steersman at the helm, leaving him to cry in despair, "And let God judge between you and me!" But the internal gloom of the Commonwealth was strangely relieved by its lustre and glory abroad. Never in all its history had the nation been so great and powerful as at this moment. The nations of the west, without exception, were bowing before England, as mistress of the seas and arbiter of Europe; ambassadors from the farthest countries were eager for a glance and a kind word from the great soldier, born a yeoman, and who wished himself a shepherd; and the report of his deeds, together with the renown of his country, were borne by thousand-tongued fame, into the most remote corners of the globe. Besides the foreign ministers permanently accredited to the chief magistrate of the Commonwealth, more numerous than even in the reign of Elizabeth, he was greeted by special embassies from Sweden, Poland, Germany, Italy, and other countries, all bringing the homage of the princes and nations they represented, with the expression of fervent wishes for an alliance with England. The honours thus rendered were not mere vain compliments, and frequent events showed that the newly-acquired power and greatness of England among the nations of the world was of the most substantial kind. On the duke of Savoy attempting to convert his Protestant subjects in the Alps, known as the Vaudois, or Waldenses, by fire and sword to Roman Catholicism, Cromwell forwarded an earnest remonstrance against his doings, which, backed by a fleet in the Mediterranean, was so effective as to bring about the restoration of the persecuted people to their ancient civil and religious liberties. The influence thus strikingly exhibited re-echoed all over Europe, and everywhere the down-trodden disciples of the Reformation began to look up to England as the foremost champion of Protestantism in the world.

The almost uninterrupted good fortune which had accompanied the efforts of Cromwell to make the flag of the Commonwealth mistress of the seas, and respected from pole to pole, continued at his side through all the struggles with internal factions, hostile legislative assemblies, and plots and conspiracies against his rule. At the very moment when the emissaries of the Stuart prince and the King of Spain were plotting his assassination, and violent speeches were directed against him in parliament, the news arrived of a great victory achieved by the fleet under Admiral Blake, one of the most brilliant successes ever gained by England on the ocean. The war against King Philip IV. had hitherto been mainly carried on by sea, in attacks upon his Indian treasure convoys, and a blockade of the principal harbours of the Peninsula, the result of which was to deprive him of his principal means for paying his armies, while at the same time it all but ruined the commerce of Spain. In the autumn of 1656, Blake sat down to the blockade of the port of Cadiz, shutting it in so closely, as to prevent all possibility of vessels passing in and out, with the main object in view of laying hold of a great "Plate fleet," supposed to be of immense value, which was expected to arrive from South America. But he waited fruitlessly the whole winter through for the floating mass of wealth eagerly expected by Philip IV.; and it was not till the spring of 1657 that he learnt from the cruisers he had sent forward that the commander of the rich convoy had become aware of the danger of being intercepted, and to save his treasure for his master, had taken refuge in the harbour of Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe. The report had no sooner been made to Blake, when he instantly set sail with the greater part of his fleet, and favoured by a fair wind, reached Santa Cruz on the morning of the 19th of April, six days after leaving Cadiz. The sight that met him here was such as to startle any commander less resolute and daring than Blake, and precluded apparently any possibility of his taking the offensive. Santa Cruz harbour, shaped like a horse-shoe, and completely surrounded by batteries and fortifications, was to all appearance impregnable and unassailable. The narrow entrance was defended by castles on either side, bristling with cannon; while the guns of eight other tall forts, along the inner circuit dominated the whole port, with war ships moored at the water gate, and war ships, crowded with gunners and soldiers, lying around the whole of the beach. All chances of success in an attack of the small English fleet upon such a gaunt stronghold seemed hopeless; nevertheless, Blake resolved upon an attack. Now, more than ever, he was determined to earn the title given him by his sailors, and be a real "sea king."

After having spent a day in prayer and fasting, Blake rushed in upon the enemy early on the morning of the 20th of April. Besides the forts, he had sixteen men-of-war against him, six great galleons, and ten smaller ships, while his own force consisted of not more than fifteen vessels, mostly of inferior size. Breaking his way through the harbour entrance under a tremendous discharge of cannon, "whirlwinds of fire and iron hail, as the old Peak of Teneriffe never heard the like," Blake first assailed the galleons, and having stormed several and silenced the rest, next attacked the smaller ships, while at the same time he poured broadside after broadside upon the harbour castles and batteries. From eight o'clock in the morning till seven at night the battle raged, till every Spanish vessel had either been sunk or set on fire, the lurid flames leaping from ship to ship, and creeping up the stone walls of the forts on shore. At last, when the sun was sinking in the west, and earth, sky, and sea were wrapped in flame and smoke, the sea king sailed out again from the harbour of Santa Cruz as grandly as he had come in eleven hours before, leaving the proud fleet of Philip IV. an immense wreck. The report of the deed produced wonder and amazement all over Europe, for never yet, in the history of naval wars, had a fleet been known to brave massive fortifications on shore, and dared, under the shelter of their guns, to attack and destroy a stronger navy. When Cromwell heard the news of the extraordinary feat, he was enraptured, and taking a star in diamonds from his neck, ordered it to be sent to the "sea king," with the message to return home at once and receive his own thanks and those of parliament. Blake obeyed, and set sail for England; nevertheless, the triumph awaiting him did not come to rejoice his heart. He had long been suffering under a complication of diseases, the result of many wounds and the hardships to which he had exposed himself; and on Friday, the 17th of August, when arrived in the Channel, in the very sight of Plymouth harbour, he closed his eyes for ever, having just completed his fifty-ninth year. Not being able to exalt the living hero, the Lord Protector, gave honour to the dead sea king. By Cromwell's orders his body was deposited in Henry the Seventh's chapel in Westminster Abbey, to the vault of which it was carried, on the 4th of September, attended by all the dignitaries of government, after having lain embalmed in state at Greenwich, at the palace of Queen Elizabeth—hospital to some of the sailors of the British fleet.

The great naval victory and death of Blake, while fanning the warlike spirit of the English people, were followed by augmented hostilities against Spain. As yet little had been done to fulfil the stipulations of the treaty of alliance with France for a combined attack upon the Spanish Netherlands; but on being pressed by Cardinal Mazarin, ruler of the country in the name of Louis XIV., to carry out the compact, Cromwell, although in want of funds through his disputes with parliament, hesitated no longer, and early in the year 1657 he sent Sir William Lockhart, a Scottish judge who had married one of his nieces, as special envoy to Paris, to enter upon the necessary arrangements. The negotiations were quickly finished, and on the 23rd of March, 1657, there was signed a new treaty, by which the Protector engaged to send without delay six thousand troops to join the French army, twenty thousand strong, under the command of the great Turenne, in the siege of Gravelines, Mardyke, and Dunkirk. The last-named important place, as already stipulated in the former treaty of alliance, was to fall to the Commonwealth, besides which, Louis XIV. engaged to pay one-half of the total expenses of keeping the English auxiliary troops in the field. It was an agreement eminently favourable to England, and Cromwell hastened to execute it, despatching his six thousand soldiers, selected from among the veterans of the civil war, forthwith to the Spanish Netherlands, under the orders of General Sir John Reynolds. The latter effected his junction with Turenne in the summer of 1657, and was then directed to assist the French troops in securing their own frontier against the attack of the Spaniards, instead of, as stipulated, besieging the three fortresses. However, Cromwell was not the man to be duped in this fashion, and as soon as he learnt of the employment of his soldiers, he ordered Sir William Lockhart, who had remained as ambassador at Paris, to tell Cardinal Mazarin, that unless the treaty was carried out in all its strictness, the English troops would be withdrawn at once. The cardinal, considered the greatest diplomatist of the age, and before whose wiles many a power had succumbed, was not proof against so much decision and energy, and at once declared that the will of the Lord Protector should be done. Louis XIV. at the same time told Sir William Lockhart that he considered his master "the greatest and happiest prince of Europe;" to which a courtier added the no less flattering remark, "Our cardinal is more afraid of Oliver than of the devil."

In consequence of the new instructions from Paris, result of the Lord Protector's interference, the combined French and English armies commenced the siege of the three Spanish fortresses early in the autumn of 1657. Mardyke was the first place attacked, and having been invested both by sea and land, the great guns opened against it in the last days of September. Taken after a very short resistance, the keys of the fortress were delivered over, as a token of affectionate good-will, to Sir John Reynolds, after which he and Turenne marched together upon Gravelines. The work here was not quite so easy as it had been at Mardyke, and the Spaniards having opened the sluices, and inundated the neighbourhood of the otherwise strongly-fortified place, the allied troops spent the whole winter fruitlessly before it, and in the spring of 1658 had to retire eastward. This again was not to the taste of Cromwell, and by his instructions Sir William Lockhart concluded a new agreement with the French government, stipulating that Dunkirk should be assailed first, for which purpose fresh reinforcements were to be sent from England. The latter arrived towards the end of April, commanded by General Morgan, a valiant officer and personal friend of the Lord Protector, and under his and Turenne's command, the investment of Dunkirk commenced on the 25th of May. Louis XIV. himself, together with Cardinal Mazarin, went to Calais in order to watch the progress of the siege; but notwithstanding the importance thus given to the undertaking, the Spaniards made no great preparations for the defence, blown up with conceit of their own valour, and persuaded moreover that the place was impregnable. The Marquis of Leyden, an aged general of Philip IV., commanded the garrison of Dunkirk, and at the beginning of the siege declared his capability of holding the place against all comers. However, he changed his opinion at the end of a week, under the constant fire of the heavy English cannon; and sending expresses after expresses to the Spanish commander-in-chief, Don Juan of Austria, urgently demanded reinforcements. After a little delay, Don Juan set out with an army of twenty thousand men from Ghent, to relieve the important city, but instead of marching right upon it, took his road along the coast, where he had to pass through the thick of the besieging forces. In vain his chief lieutenant, the Prince de Condé, warned him not to encounter the danger, advising him to turn the English camp. "Turn back!" cried Don Juan: "If the enemy dare to fight, that day will be the most glorious that ever shone on the armies of his Catholic majesty." The opposing forces met early on the morning of the 14th of June, and after a battle lasting nearly four hours, the brunt of which was borne by the English troops, who fought with the greatest bravery but under immense loss, the Spaniards were utterly defeated, leaving four thousand prisoners and the greater part of their cannon in the hands of the allies. Nine days after the victory, on the 23rd of June, Dunkirk surrendered to the besiegers, and forty-eight hours later, his majesty Louis XIV., with Cardinal Mazarin at his side, entered the gates of the city, received the keys from the commander, and handed them to Sir William Lockhart, representative of the Lord Protector. Once more, England had got a footing on the continent of Europe.

The conquest of Dunkirk, succeeded by the fall of Gravelines, Ypres, and other strongholds in the Spanish Netherlands, gave rise to a great interchange of congratulations between Cromwell and Louis XIV. The Lord Protector began by sending Lord Falconbridge, his son-in-law, to the French king, and the latter returned the compliment in the despatch of an extraordinary embassy to London, headed by the Duke de Créquy, a member of the royal family, and by Count Mancini, nephew of Mazarin. The envoys carried two autograph letters to Cromwell, the one from Louis XIV., and the other from his great minister, both couched in the most adulatory terms. "Monsieur le Protecteur," wrote the king, "as I have deeply appreciated the testimonies of your good-will conveyed to me by Viscount Falconbridge, your son-in-law, I have been unable to remain satisfied to forward my reply through him; and to give you a more particular proof of my affection, I send you my cousin, the Duke de Créquy, who will express to you the profound esteem with which I regard your person, and the high value I set upon your friendship." Cardinal Mazarin wrote in the same tone, though somewhat more business-like, with hints as to the profits to be got by "Monsieur le Protecteur" from a constant and intimate French alliance—magnificent slices of Spanish property only waiting to be cut up and divided between them. The offer was received by Cromwell with becoming caution, but he, at the same time, neglected nothing to honour the French envoys, and receive them with the same splendour with which Lord Falconbridge had been treated by Louis XIV. A train of twenty carriages, each drawn by six horses, was sent to Dover to receive the Duke de Créquy and his associates, while an escort of two hundred of the Lord Protector's life-guards was put at their disposition, with orders to accompany them wherever they went. On their arrival in London the ambassadors were received with the greatest magnificence, and at their public reception Cromwell rose from his chair of state and advanced two steps to meet the Duke de Créquy, who had to sit on his right-hand side, while Richard, his eldest son, took the left. The extreme warmth with which the Lord Protector received the representatives of Louis XIV. and Mazarin made many surmise that he had serious thoughts of continental conquests. Everything, indeed, seemed to invite to such a policy, as well the disturbed aspect of home affairs, strife of parties, and parliamentary opposition, all which seemed easiest to be extinguished by the glory of victory of the arms of the Commonwealth on foreign fields, as the unsettled state of the Continent itself, the vast Spanish monarchy having fallen into a state of dissolution, with new political organisations springing up everywhere from the wreck of a decayed past. Holding to the fervent belief that it was England's mission to be the champion of Protestantism against the power of Rome, it would have been not unnatural for Cromwell to have sought for territorial acquisitions on the Continent; and the eagerness with which he insisted upon the delivery of Dunkirk into his hands, made it highly probable that he would seek to push the sentinels of the Commonwealth gradually forward into Spanish Flanders, ancient region of superstition and priestcraft. But if the Lord Protector cherished such designs, they had to stay far from their development, nipped in the bud by a power before whom all earthly schemes, even the greatest, were vain like the dreams of a dreaming infant.

While receiving the ambassadors of Louis XIV., Cromwell had felt slightly unwell, and before they had withdrawn to France, his indisposition had increased so much that he was compelled to retire to Hampton Court Palace, his favourite residence, the stillness of which was congenial to the constant occupation of his overwrought brain. On this occasion he went thither not only to attend to his own health, but that of the most beloved of his children, his daughter Elizabeth, married to Jean Claypole, a gentleman of wealth and refinement. The lady, by unanimous consent, was endowed with peculiar sweetness of temper, besides being highly accomplished, gifted with exquisite taste, of rare sensitiveness, faithful to her friends, generous to her enemies, and tenderly attached to her father, of whose greatness and goodness she had the most exalted opinion, looking upon him at once as the best of parents and the noblest and most perfect of rulers of men. Cromwell, on his part, felt the utmost delight and pride in the affection of his daughter, and whenever fatigued by the labour of government, the strife of factions, and the strain of his own burning thoughts, he took refuge in her society as in the calm of a purer world. Her company at last had become so indispensable to him, that, on his wish, she had established her residence at Hampton Court, her husband consenting to the arrangement on being made one of the members of the new House of Lords. But not long after her removal to Cardinal Wolsey's palace, the Lady Elizabeth was attacked by a painful disease, a cancer in the breast, the sufferings from which were much aggravated by grief, occasioned by the loss of an infant son. About the middle of July, the disorder assumed an alarming character, and on Cromwell being informed that her life was despaired of, he sank down at her bedside in the utmost grief and agony. "His highness's constant residence hath been at Hampton Court," Secretary Thurloe informed one of his friends, under date of the 27th of July; "and his attendance on the Lady Elizabeth hath been perpetual, so that very little or nothing hath been done by him in public business for these last fourteen days." Little more than a week after Thurloe's letter was written, the fond child had whispered her last words to the father, and lay before him a corpse. "The Lady Elizabeth died on Friday, the 3th of August," reported Harvey, one of the grooms of the bedchamber of the Protector; "she having lain long under great extremity of bodily pain, which, with frequent and violent convulsive fits, brought her to an end. But as to his highness, it was observed that his sense of her outward misery, in the pains she endured, took deep impression upon him, who, indeed, was ever a most indulgent and tender father." After the death of his beloved daughter, Cromwell was never more seen to smile. His life had become a burthen to him: "a burthen," as he himself declared, "too heavy for man."

The burthen was soon to be taken off. Having buried his daughter in Westminster Abbey, taking a melancholy joy in surrounding her coffin with all the earthly pomp that was at his command, Cromwell went back to Hampton Court Palace to pray and to weep, and to prepare for a better world. A few days after the funeral, George Fox, founder and head of one of the new religious bodies which the time had brought forth, known as the society of the Friends, went from London to Hampton Court for an interview with the Lord Protector, and there beheld a sight that greatly startled him. "On this day, Friday, the 20th of August," George Fox entered in his journal,

"taking boat, I went up to Kingston, and from thence to Hampton Court, to speak with the Protector about the sufferings of the Friends. I met him riding into Hampton Court park, and before I came to him, as he rode at the head of his life-guards, I saw and felt a waft of death go forth against him, and when I came to him he looked like a dead man." The day after the ride in Hampton Court park, Cromwell felt worse than he had been before, an attack of the tertian ague, or "bastard tertian," as it was called by the doctors, having come to add to his other sufferings, bodily and mental. From Saturday the 21st, till Tuesday the 24th of August, he kept his bed; but in the afternoon of the latter day, by the urgent advice of the physicians in attendance upon him, who held that change of air was absolutely necessary for his recovery, he allowed himself to be removed from Hampton Court Palace to Whitehall. The report that the Lord Protector's life was in imminent danger now began to spread in all directions, giving rise to the most universal expressions of sympathy and sorrow, even among those who had been his political enemies. "Prayers abundantly and incessantly poured out on his behalf," recorded Harvey, "both publicly and privately, in more than an ordinary way; besides many a secret sigh—secret and unheard by men, yet, like the cry of Moses, more loud, and strongly laying held on God, than many spoken supplications." "But his time was come," adds the narrator, "and neither prayers nor tears could prevail with God to lengthen out his life, and continue him longer to us."

Besides the pure grief of human sympathy of those who prayed and wept for the Lord Protector, there was another sorrow upon all thoughtful minds at the contemplation of the gloom that would arise if he should be no more. By the terms of the last constitution, he himself was to appoint his successor in the Protectorate; but none knew upon whom the appointment would fall, and all his political advisers, as well as his most intimate personal friends, were in darkness on a subject so nearly concerning the welfare and prosperity, if not the very existence, of the Commonwealth. Always impenetrable in the current of his designs, Cromwell had become more so of late years; and though he was believed to confide most of his political secrets to John Thurloe, the one of all his ministers in whom he put any amount of trust, even Thurloe at present had to acknowledge that he was in complete ignorance of his master's intentions. He, no more than any of the other members of the government, at first dared to ask the direct question, as to who should succeed him, of the stern Lord Protector; but as day after day elapsed, his life gradually and visibly ebbing away, the favourite secretary, impelled on all sides to the unavoidable step, was brought to approach the subject. He did so on Monday, the 30th of August, after Cromwell had been for six days on his bed of sickness at Whitehall, in alternate spasms of violent pain, followed at times by profound despondency, and again by intervals of bright and peaceful serenity. On this Monday his mind seemed calm, in strong contrast to the elements without, a mighty storm of wind howling over the land, shaking in its fury the walls of the royal palace, and filling the air as if with groans of rage and despair. In the midst of the hurricane Thurloe approached the couch of the Lord Protector, humbly beseeching him to declare who should guide the destinies of the Commonwealth, in case it should please God to take his soul to everlasting peace. There was a faint answer from the dying man, announcing that he had expressed his will in a sealed letter, deposited in a certain place, among other state papers. Immediate search was made for the important document, but it could nowhere be found, though a strict investigation was entered upon for the purpose. Momentous as was the subject, no more could be said about it, for when approaching his master again, Thurloe found that he had sunk into a deep lethargy, from which he could be roused only at intervals of partly recurring consciousness. In one of these, the secretary, now eager to accomplish the all-important object before him, pronounced the name of Richard, and was replied to by an indistinct moan, which he concluded to be an affirmative of his question. If rightly interpreted, that death groan of the Lord Protector was fatal to the Commonwealth.

But while the fate of three nations was hanging upon the breath of his lips, Oliver Cromwell himself had come to be heedless of all but his own doom. After lying insensible, with short intervals, for several days, he seemed to recover consciousness towards midnight of Thursday, the 2nd of September, when he began to pray, raising his voice slightly above a whisper. "Truly God is good," he cried, in broken utterances; "indeed He is—He will not—He will not leave me—I would be willing to serve Him further—to serve God and His people—but my work is done—yet God will be with His people." So he prayed on till towards morning, when he sank again into quiet sleep. At noon on Friday, the 3rd of September, he prayed again, as appeared from his moving lips, but from which came no audible words. A little after three o'clock in the afternoon he heaved a deep sigh, and fell back on his pillow, with a radiant expression of countenance. Oliver Cromwell had finished his earthly career—finished it on the anniversary of the victories of Dunbar and Worcester, always spoken of by him as his "fortunate day." Thrice fortunate day it was to the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth.

As when the sun has sunk his rays continue to hover a short while longer in the sky, diffusing brightness over the earth, so the great name of Oliver Cromwell kept hanging for a brief space of time after he was gone above the clouds of impending darkness, to throw a borrowed light upon the edifice he had erected. All its support was gone the moment his spirit fled, yet the skyey glow of his fame made it look strong still in outward appearance, not showing but to those gifted with superior vision that it was a lifeless wreck. Immediately after the decease of the Lord Protector, the members of the Council of State held a meeting, and secretary Thurloe with several other witnesses having declared upon oath that his highness, by verbal declaration, had appointed his eldest son, Richard Cromwell as his successor, the latter was at once installed, in office, without the slightest show of opposition. Late in the evening of the 3rd of September, the council went in a body to Richard, to offer their congratulations on his accession, and condole with him on the loss he had suffered, while at the same time an official gazette was widely circulated, announcing the death of the Protector, with the remark, "We would willingly express, upon this sad occasion, the deep sorrow which hath possessed the mind of his most noble son and successor had we language sufficient, but all that we can use will fall short of the merits of that most excellent prince." On the following morning, Saturday, the 4th of September, the new Lord Protector was solemnly proclaimed at Whitehall, Westminster, and the principal public places in the city, in the presence of the members of the Council of State, the Lord Mayor and aldermen, and a large concourse of officers and people. The ceremony over, the Lord Mayor and city dignitaries went in state to Whitehall to offer their congratulations, after which Richard took the oath as Protector, and then signed a proclamation which continued in their offices all the civil and military functionaries employed by his father. For some days after, addresses of loyalty came pouring in from all sides, making it appear as if the whole country was hailing with the utmost enthusiasm the accession of the new first magistrate of the Commonwealth. "It hath pleased God," secretary Thurloe informed Henry Cromwell, commander of the forces in Ireland, under date of the 7th of September, "to give his highness, your brother, a very easy and peaceable entrance upon his government; there is not a dog that wags his tongue, so great a calm are we in." Not gifted with great discernment, John Thurloe, together with most of his colleagues, was unable to see that behind the unnatural dead-like calm there was looming a fierce storm.

The storm was soon in coming, and the edifice of the Commonwealth was shaking in its very foundations before even the last earthly honours had been paid to its great founder. Few who knew him expected much from Richard Cromwell, who all his life had been nothing but an indolent country squire, fond of pleasures, but absolutely without energy, and in every respect the very opposite of his illustrious father; and all that his warmest friends could hope was that the consciousness of the high position to which he had so suddenly risen would break the worst of his faults, making him, if not a more thoughtful, at least a somewhat more active man. However, these expectations, if seriously entertained, were doomed to bitter disappointment, and a couple of weeks sufficed to show that whatever the change in his outward state, Richard remained the same in character, his high office serving to nothing but to raise his vanity. His first serious occupation after passing over the ceremonies of his installation as Protector was to make arrangements for a magnificent funeral of his father, which he intended to be of extraordinary costliness, although aware that the public exchequer was perfectly empty, funds being wanting even to pay the army, abroad and at home. His own private fortune, as he was in the habit of telling laughingly to his boon companions, consisted chiefly in debts, and Oliver Cromwell having left no estate, too honest and high-minded to enrich himself at the public expense, his pecuniary embarrassments increased vastly with the accession to his new dignity. Nevertheless, contrary to the advice of all the members of the Council of State, he insisted that his father should have a pompous funeral, which accordingly took place on the 23rd of November, in the shape of a grand procession from Somerset House to Westminster Abbey, a waxen effigy of the Lord Protector having been exposed some weeks previously at the former place. The magnificence of the display on this occasion caused general murmuring; the republicans were loud in their censure of the show, which was said to cost above sixty thousand pounds; pamphlets were distributed in the streets, along the line of the funeral procession, denouncing the untimely prodigality of the new ruler in violent terms; and there were even reports current that several regiments of soldiers had resolved to seize the coffin and effigy of the great Protector on its way to the Abbey, to hold it in pledge for the liquidation of their arrears of pay. No disorder took place, but the public fermentation kept on increasing from day to day, and the visible want of firmness in the government, denounced by many before the funeral upon which the new Lord Protector had wasted so much time and treasure, was spoken of on all sides now with mingled hatred and contempt. Eyes not the clearest began to see that the vessel of state had lost its pilot, and was fast drifting into the devouring gulf of anarchy.

The first pressing duty of the advisers of Richard Cromwell—chief among whom were John Thurloe, and his brother-in-law, lord Faulconbridge—was to procure a small amount of money, to pay at least a few of the servants of the government, and in doing so they had recourse to the most extraordinary means. They first applied to some London merchants, and were refused, next, they tried their credit at the exchange of Amsterdam, but with the like ill-success; and after that they went as beggars before Louis XIV. and cardinal Mazarin, asking, in almost piteous language, that he would accommodate the rulers of wealthy England with fifty thousand pounds. To get this small sum, lord Faulconbridge himself went to Paris towards the end of October, with the result of having his demand, as far as the public part of it went, politely rejected, but obtaining a pension for himself and his wife, with promise of another for the new Lord Protector, if the latter should be able to maintain himself in power and consent to becoming the willing tool of French policy. It was a degradation so terrible that even Richard shrunk from going forward in the same path, so that he was driven to consult with his friends and advisers more earnestly than hitherto upon the position of the government, and the way by which they might get over their difficulties. There was clearly only one mode of action open, which was to summon a parliament, and this accordingly was adopted, and carried out forthwith. The writs of summons for the representatives of the nation were sent out at the beginning of December, and on the 27th of January, 1659, Richard opened the new legislature, having gone in great state, and surrounded by a pompous train of courtiers, from Whitehall to Westminster. His magnificence of carriage did not impose upon the members of the House of Commons, who had already come to look upon the existing government as a nonentity, and when summoned to the bar of the "Other House" to hear the opening speech of the Protector, not more than ten or eleven obeyed the call, the rest staying away in silent contempt. The opposition thus manifested springing less from enmity to than disdain of the men who were possessed of the supreme power but did not know how to wield it, soon showed itself more distinctly, in the passing of a variety of resolutions, all tending to disparage the new Lord Protector and his ministers. The question as to whether he himself should be acknowledged only passed after a long debate, by a narrow majority, while the commons absolutely refused to vote the supplies urgently demanded by the Council of State. There could but be one object in the proceeding, which was to break up the protectorate rule, and this, indeed, was what the majority of the commons aimed at, though at the same time none of the parliamentary leaders seemed to have any clear conception what other form of government should take its place. It was as if with the death of Oliver Cromwell, and fall of the social structure which he had erected, a general confusion had laid hold of men's minds, banishing all ideas of order, and leading to universal chaos.

The attitude of the House of Commons became somewhat more distinct at the end of a couple of months. At the commencement of the session, there appeared to be, besides a small knot of members honestly adhering to the established government, two great factions, the Republicans and the Presbyterians, which held each other the balance very evenly; but as week after week advanced in discussions and debates, mostly of a very violent nature, it was noticed that the latter party got the upper hand, and having come to this point, developed itself under a new phase. Having all along been opposed to a democratic form of government, and in favour of a limited monarchy, though not daring to express their aims openly under the great Protector's iron rule, the Presbyterians now held that the time had come to throw off further disguise, and to state openly that they desired the restoration of the Stuarts to the throne. Propositions to this effect, timid at first, but gradually, as it became certain that they were hailed with approval by the majority, more and more firm, made themselves heard in parliament, and by the end of March, when the session had lasted rather more than nine weeks, there seemed every probability that before another month was gone a vote would pass for opening negotiations with the son of Charles I. The Lord Protector himself, it was more than whispered, was ready to give up his exalted office in favour of the legitimate descendant of the old royal race, greatly preferring obscurity and the payment of his debts to his high but uncomfortable position; and backed by a parliamentary vote, there seemed absolutely nothing in the way of the pensioner of King Philip IV. returning to Whitehall, and quietly taking the seat vacated by Richard Cromwell. But at this juncture of affairs, another power, not counted upon for the moment by the leaders of the majority in the commons, suddenly arose before them. The army, intensely republican, had hitherto remained in quietness, approaching to apathy, mainly for want of a head around which to rally; but on seeing that parliament was fast drifting into proclaiming another Stuart king, the soldiers all on a sudden roused themselves, demanding to make their voice heard in the national councils. On the 2nd of April, a number of officers appeared unannounced before Richard Cromwell, and partly by persuasion, and partly by threats, made him give his consent to the convocation of a grand meeting of delegates from the troops to deliberate upon the dangers threatening to the Commonwealth. Some of the members of the Council of State bitterly upbraided the helpless Lord Protector for what he had done, immediately after the officers left; but they themselves, utterly powerless to accomplish anything, either for good or evil, could do nothing but look on upon what was to come. A few days after the interview, the representatives of the troops began to arrive in London, and on the 10th of April, the delegates, to the number of five hundred, assembled at Wallingford House, and formed themselves, after solemn prayer, into a General Council of the Army.

There were now two rival parliaments assembled in the capital, with nothing to check their antagonism but an utterly impotent executive, a government more in name than in reality. It was not difficult to see that a collision was nigh at hand, and not many days elapsed before it took place. The deputies of the army commenced their work by drawing up and publishing a document which they called the "humble Representation and Petition," in which they complained bitterly of the contempt into which "the good old cause" had sunk, and of the calumnies and threats uttered in parliament against the patriots who had staked their lives for the national freedom. The paper was denounced in the House of Commons with great violence as an instigation to treason; but the military delegates, nothing daunted, kept on in their course, passing votes that the "common cause" was in danger, and that the army should be paid their arrears without further delay, and demanding that every officer should testify by a solemn declaration his approval of the execution of Charles Stuart, and the establishment and continuance of the Commonwealth, or else resign his commission. The latter was too direct a challenge to the monarchical faction in parliament to be taken quietly, and they at once adopted a resolution declaring the General Council of the army illegal, and ordering its immediate dissolution. No sooner had the vote been taken when the leaders of the army published an order of the day, summoning all the troops in and near London to a meeting in St. James's park, which command met with so much obedience that even the Protector's own life-guards deserted Whitehall, declaring they were bound to follow their military superiors before him. In the midst of this disruption of all authority, a number of officers, among them Colonel Desborough, his near relative, called upon Richard Cromwell, and roughly told him that the crisis had come, and that he must decide whether he would go with them or with the royalist faction in the House of Commons. If he would choose the former, they said, he must dissolve parliament forthwith, in which case they promised to take care of him and his interests, but if not giving his consent at once, they would do without him, and leave him to his fate, whatever that might be. After a short painful hesitation, Richard yielded to the demands of the officers, promising to issue the required message of dissolution, and stipulating only that he should not be required to appear in person before parliament. It was late in the evening of the 21st of April that the engagement was made, and half an hour after the officers had left Richard Cromwell, Whitehall was occupied by the troops under the orders of the General Council of the army. The shadow reign of the second Lord Protector had virtually come to an end.

Having subjected the feeble executive to their will, the army leaders quietly took possession of Westminster, and on the morning of Friday the 22nd of April, when the members of the House of Commons came to assemble in their accustomed place, they found all the entrances occupied by soldiers, who looked at them with undisguised disdain. The agitation throughout the House was intense, and increased when, soon after the Speaker had taken the chair, the usher of the Black Rod appeared at the bar, summoning the members to the "Other House" to hear a message from the Lord Protector. Few had any doubts as to what were the contents of the message, and the summons of Black Rod, therefore, was received with groans and expostulations, while scarce a dozen members left their places to obey the order of the chief of the state. The rest, with the Speaker still in the chair, impelled by ever-increasing excitement, and scarcely knowing how to vent their overwrought feelings, set to pass fresh votes condemnatory of the proceedings of the General Council of the army, and declaring everything done against the legal representatives of the realm to be treason. After passing half an hour in this way, a reaction seemed to set in, and as if struck all at once by the utter uselessness of their speeches and votes, among the rattle of arms resounding in the lobby, the motion was passed in a hurry that the House should adjourn till eight of the clock on Monday morning, the 25th of April. This done, the Speaker arose and left the house, followed in one long file by the members, who accompanied him to his coach, through two long rows of troopers, heavily armed, spurred and booted, muttering curses upon the retreating "lawyers." Before the last representative of the people had turned his back, the message, dictated to Richard Cromwell by the officers had been read in the "Other House" by Nathaniel Fiennes, one of the commissioners of the Great Seal, and the ceremony finished, the usher of the Black Rod once more went into the hall of the commons, announcing to the empty benches that parliament stood dissolved by command of his highness the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth. In the course of the day, padlocks were placed at the door of the House of Commons, and sentinels placed in the lobby, to keep back all individuals pretending to be members of parliament.

The dispersion of the House of Commons made the leaders of the army masters of the situation, and the government resting entirely in their hands, there seemed one more chance for the return of settled order. It was only necessary that any of the chief officers should stand forward with a definite, clearly-defined programme, tending to establish a powerful executive, liberal in its aims, and strong enough to stop the wave of anarchy, to secure the hearty co-operation of all classes, and accomplish the triumph of national freedom, under the established democratic forms. As yet the cry for the restoration of the Stuarts was a mere cry of despair; the overwhelming mass of the people either know nothing whatever of the individual calling himself Charles the Second, and claiming England by birthright, or know him only as a wretched, profligate creature, entirely unprincipled, with no faith in God or man, or any quality whatever to promise even a moderately good ruler. The only class earnestly desiring the return of the unhopeful scion of an unhopeful race of kings were the nobility and landed gentry, whose political creed was growing out, either of the natural desire to revel again in the honours and emoluments flowing from a throne for their especial benefit, or due to the no less weighty fear that the continuance of a democratic form of government was certain to imperil, if not their property, at least the continuance of such of their privileges and immunities as chiefly made up their high and exclusive social position. Against these, the only true Cavaliers, a faction numerically small, and important only through rank and wealth, stood the vast phalanx of the middle classes, distinguished by sincere attachment to Protestantism, and no less sincere love of order, willing to support any government capable of protecting their faith and banishing anarchy, but opposed rather than otherwise to the personal claims of the representative of the Stuarts, generally believed to be a Roman Catholic at heart. To destroy the pretensions of the second Charles, all that was required was to institute a firm and liberal administration, after the model of that founded in the early days of the first protectorate. However, comparatively easy as seemed the task, there was not a man wise enough, or strong enough, to accomplish it. The army leaders had no sooner driven out their parliamentary rivals when they began quarrelling among themselves, and a week had not elapsed before it became clear that they could not agree upon a single point in their future operations. In this perplexity, not knowing which way to turn next, they bethought themselves of an extraordinary measure, that of calling to their aid the members of the House of Commons dispersed ignominiously six years before by Oliver Cromwell, and known to the people as the "Rump Parliament." It was the sword that had killed the "Rump," and the sword now was to revive it again.

The resolution to set up another representative assembly was come to by the General Council of the army on the 6th of May, and carried out with great promptness. In the afternoon of the day, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, with a number of other officers, went, as deputies of the Council, to the residence of Speaker Lenthall, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, requesting him to summon his old colleagues once more to the chapel of St. Stephen's, to act as representatives of the nation, and presenting him for the purpose with a formal declaration, exhibiting the motives for the step. "The public concerns of this Commonwealth," the document ran, "being, through a vicissitude of dangers, deliverances, and backslidings of many, brought into that state and posture wherein they now stand, and ourselves also contributing thereto by wandering divers ways from righteous and equal paths, and although there have been many essays to obviate the dangers, and to settle those nations in peace and prosperity, yet all have proved ineffectual—so we have been led to look back and examine the cause of the Lord's withdrawing his wonted presence from us, and, amongst other things, calling to mind that the Long Parliament, consisting of the members who continued there sitting until the 20th of April, 1653, were eminent asserters of the good old cause, and had a special presence of God with them, and were signally blessed in that work—the desires of many good people concurring with ours therein, we judge it our duty to invite the aforesaid members to return to the exercise and discharge of their trust, and we shall be ready, in our places, to yield them, as becomes us, our utmost assistance to sit in safety." William Lenthall, an eminently cautious member of the bar, at first declined to take part in re-establishing the "Rump," on the plea that he was preparing to take the Lord's Supper the next Sunday, and in the meanwhile had to abstain from all mundane affairs. Thereupon the officers left him, and visiting all the members of the old assembly known to be in London, by dint of great exertions got together forty-one, or sufficient to form a quorum, the whole of whom met in Westminster Hall on the morning of the 7th of May. They had not long been together when Speaker Lenthall, who had kept himself informed of what was going on, came rushing up in great haste, declaring the love of his country would not allow him from keeping away from his colleagues, and inviting them to accept again his presidency. His arrival was hailed with acclamation, and, immediately after it, the forty-one formed in procession, with the Speaker at their head, and solemnly marched back to St. Stephen's chapel, passing between long rows of officers, who cried that they would live and die in their service.

There was not much meaning in this new-born acclamation of the men of the sword for parliamentary government. The delegates and chiefs of the army had one object in common with the resuscitated members of the "Rump," in the safe establishment of the "good old cause" of the republic; but their ideas differed widely as to the means by which this was to be effected, and the two factions were imbued from the beginning with more suspicion than love for each other. Nevertheless, at the commencement there was great apparent harmony between the General Council of the army and the members of the restored "Rump," the latter exerting themselves with much energy to establish a real executive, in place of the sham government still existing at Whitehall. Without formally abolishing the office of Lord Protector, fallen into ridicule through the imbecility of its bearer, they sent private notice to Richard Cromwell to absent himself from the capital, and be again, what heaven had meant him to be, a country squire, promising that, if behaving well, his debts should be paid some day. Richard having gone his way as ordered, they formed a Committee of Safety, composed in the first instance of seven, and afterwards of eleven members, invested with very extensive powers in regard to the routine of internal administration of the country, but subject in matters of policy to act under the direction of parliament. Here was a first source of weakness, and the principle once set up that nothing important should be done without debating and voting, and all action be made dependent upon talk, the slow machinery of government was not long in coming to a standstill. A still more dangerous matter, involving the very existence of the newly-founded authority, soon came to add to all the other difficulties of the situation. In resuscitating the "Rump," the main design of the military leaders had been to get a convenient instrument of government, which they naturally desired to be under their own control; but this was not so understood by the old Parliamentarians under the leadership of Speaker Lenthall, who aimed at possessing the reality, instead of the mere semblance of power, and to rule the army as well as the people, in the name and as representatives of the sovereignty of the nation. The claim to national representation thus set up was not very reasonable, seeing the origin and actual composition of the assembly now gathered within St. Stephen's chapel; nevertheless the members of the "Rump" insisted upon it with the utmost pertinacity, going so far as openly to defy the General Council of the army in the assertion of their imaginary power. The struggle thus commenced, though it was not likely to last long, could clearly have but one result, that of increasing to an immense degree the existing anarchy.

To the first manifestations of desire for dominion on the part of the assembly which they had brought into existence, the army leaders submitted with good grace, deeming it better to make concessions, however large, than to risk the work in hand, together with the welfare of the country. Little more than a fortnight after its installation, the members of the "Rump" decreed that seven parliamentary commissioners should be invested with the supreme direction of the army, to nominate the whole of the officers, subject to the approbation of the house, and that all officers should come to the bar to receive their commissions from the hands of the Speaker. It was clearly a measure of extreme arrogance, and the first effect of it upon the heads of the army was to resist it with all their power. However, on consulting with each other, in a spirit of extreme moderation, opposite counsels prevailed, leading to the resolve to yield to the power of their own creation. Having gone thus far to meet their open allies and secret rivals, the officers in their turn petitioned that the arrears of the army should be paid, so as to put a stop to the growing insubordination of the soldiers, which had already led to serious riots; but their demand met with very little attention, not so much from want of goodwill, but in the utter inability of the members of the new parliament to raise the funds they urgently required. A hundred propositions were made in the "Rump," to fill the exchequer by laying on new taxes, raising forced loans, and selling the palaces of Whitehall, Somerset House, and Hampton Court; however, as in all else, there was more debate than action; and while the legislators at St. Stephen's were talking, the soldiers whose control they had insisted upon taking in hand were starving, or leaving their regiments in masses, to return to their homes.

Towards the latter part of July, it became apparent that complete disorganisation had seized the army; while at the very moment the danger of this situation impressed itself upon the new government, the news reached London that Royalist risings had taken place in several parts of the country. Impatient to accelerate the current of events that was strongly running in his favour, Charles Stuart, with the help of his Spanish allies, had for some time past sent agents all over England to stir up either a general, or a number of local insurrections, and their efforts had proved partly successful in the northern counties, the territory of the large landowning class, and stronghold of the Cavaliers. The movement commenced at Wroxham, in Denbighshire, where Sir Thomas Middleton, an old man of eighty and fanatic Royalist, appeared on a market day, at the head of a troop of his tenants, and brandishing his sword above his head, caused Charles to be proclaimed king. He was joined at once by a number of noblemen, among them the earl of Derby and Sir George Booth, and the latter, who had fought in the civil wars under Charles I., having been selected for commander-in-chief, the insurrectionary forces kept rolling onwards. The city of Chester fell into their hands without a battle, and Liverpool, with several smaller places, having been likewise occupied by the Royalists, they mustered their army at Warrington in the last days of July, and found it to contain about four thousand men. Not doubting but that all England would join them, the northern Cavaliers at once despatched messengers to Holland, inviting Charles Stuart to ascend the throne of his ancestors, and while he was tearing himself from the arms of his mistresses, Sir George Booth and his four thousand set out for the capital.

The intelligence of the rising in the northern counties had the effect of spurring the members of the Westminster assembly into sudden activity, and postponing discussion for a while, they set to raising money and equipping troops. By dint of extraordinary exertions, between four and five thousand men were got together, and General Lambert having been appointed commander of the parliamentary forces, they left London on the 6th of August. Demoralized as were the troops by neglect, distress, and the all-pervading anarchy, there was still something of the old spirit of the Commonwealth soldiers among them; and though in want of almost the necessaries of life, they rallied around their general with great enthusiasm, while rushing in hurried marches through the midland counties towards Cheshire. Sir George Booth and his Cavaliers were still standing here, waiting, before marching southward, for news from king Charles, who had promised to be in England at the beginning of August, being uncertain, in the meanwhile, as to whether they should advance towards, or retreat before the parliamentary army that was coming up from the capital. In order to gain time, Sir George, on the near approach of General Lambert, attempted to enter upon negotiations, but the latter was not to be deluded in this manner, and without giving more than a short negative reply to the Royalists, he at once marched upon them, preparing for battle. Surprised, first at Winnington, and afterwards at Nantwich, and cut off from a portion of his forces which he had left at Chester, Sir George Booth was defeated almost without a struggle, only a handful of his men, under lieutenant-colonel Morgan, offering resistance, and sacrificing their lives to protect a retreat that had become a rout. In the course of a single week, Chester, Liverpool, and the other towns in the district where the standard of king Charles had been hoisted, were taken possession of by the parliamentary forces; Sir Thomas Middleton had to capitulate in Chirk castle, to which he had retired with his followers, and he, together with Sir George Booth, the earl of Derby, and other leaders of the revolt, were taken prisoners and sent to the Tower, not without having, previous to their capture, made their cause ridiculous by attempting flight in disguise, the noble head of the house of Stanley dressing himself up as a groom, and the commander-in-chief of the Cavaliers as an old woman, to escape from their pursuers. On the 21st of August, scarcely a fortnight after his departure from London, General Lambert was able to inform his masters at Westminster that the phantom of Stuart kingship, which had suddenly arisen in the northern counties, had as suddenly been dispersed to all the winds. "If there be anything in these parts," added the parliamentary captain, "which may require my further service and attendance, I shall desire your speedy commands therein, which shall be most readily observed."

The rapid and decisive victory of General Lambert created the greatest dismay among the partizans of the Stuart restoration, and to all appearance established the cause of the Commonwealth on a firmer footing than it had stood since the death of Oliver Cromwell. This was the general belief in London, and shown by a sudden change in the attitude of the prosperous city merchants, who, setting their sails with the current of the tides, had before refused even the smallest loan to the rulers at St. Stephen's, but now came forward with great alacrity to offer their patriotic assistance to the new government. However, the calculations of the city patriots were reposing on a very insecure basis, and a few weeks proved that the very successes in the field, which were deemed to have poured fresh life into the tottering edifice of the Commonwealth, served but to hasten on its fall. Bitter necessity and the dread of a dark future, which they could not behold without the greatest anxiety, had compelled the leaders of the army to submit to the rule of a set of men they inwardly despised, and to bend their necks under the yoke of the "Rump" parliament; but, the fear dispelled, and seeing that they after all wielded the real power of state, they once more raised their heads, resolved not to suffer any longer the dominion of the arrogant "lawyers." The first open manifestation of the new spirit that had taken possession of the troops showed itself in a petition handed in to the "Rump" on the 22nd of September, by a deputation from the General Council of the Army, demanding that the commissions of the principal officers should be no longer revocable at the will of parliament, but that lasting appointments should be made, three of them being indicated at the same time as absolutely necessary, namely; that Fleetwood should be nominated permanent general-in-chief, that Lambert should be next in command as major-general, and that Desborough should be lieutenant-general of the cavalry. The delivery of this petition caused the greatest excitement in the hall of St. Stephen's, and after some violent speeches, Speaker Lenthall adjourned the debate to the following morning, the 23rd of September. On this day the doors were shut, and the lobby was cleared of strangers, while the strictest secrecy was enjoined on all members, and a vote passed that none should leave the house without express permission of the Speaker. After a lengthy and fierce discussion, it was resolved to refuse the demand of the General Council of the Army as "dangerous to the Commonwealth," and also "to communicate the vote of the house to the officers of the army, to admonish them of their irregular proceeding, and to take care to prevent any further proceedings therein by the soldiers." It was a bold step on the part of the St. Stephen's assembly, and for a moment checked the encroachments of the military leaders; but the resolution did not last long. After deliberating for a few weeks in great secrecy, the members of the General Council of the Army came to the determination to throw down again the governing body which they had raised, which resolve was executed without any trouble on the 30th of October. In the morning of this day, Speaker Lenthall, on alighting from his carriage at Westminster, was arrested by a detachment of soldiers, under lieutenant-colonel Duckenfield, one of Lambert's officers, forced into another vehicle, and despatched to his private residence. In vain the chief of the "Rump" protested against the violence; the officers laughed in his face, telling him that they were only doing their duty in taking him back to the place from which they had fetched him not long before. Together with the Speaker, the leading members of the "Rump" parliament were refused admission at the door, and the rest, without attempting to play their parts any longer, quietly vanished from the scene.

The supreme power having now fallen once more entirely into their hands, the delegates of the General Council of the Army established a strictly military government, nominating Fleetwood commander-in-chief, and Lambert major-general, and vesting the executive in a "Committee of Safety" of fifteen officers. But the new administration had no sooner been formed, when dissensions broke out within it, leading in the course of a few weeks to an absolute destruction of its authority. There did not seem to be two members in the Committee of Safety possessed of the same political principles, and pursuing the same objects, and while some advocated democratic ideas of the widest scope, others appeared inclined to favour the re-establishment of a despotism more violent than that of the latter days of Oliver's Protectorate. While anarchy and confusion were thus rapidly spreading among the persons who had placed themselves at the helm of the state, the army upon which they were leaning, and which formed their sole engine of power, was rapidly dissolving, the soldiers leaving their ranks in crowds, partly on account of having remained for a long time either entirely without pay or suffering from great arrears, and partly, and more still, out of sheer disgust for the cause they were serving. Bands of armed men thus let loose from discipline, but having no home or friends to which to return, congregated in various parts of England, and while many of them were enlisted by wealthy Cavaliers to serve the cause of king Charles, others enrolled themselves under the banner of the parliament, raised by some of the more energetic or ambitious members of the dispersed "Rump." One of the latter, Sir Arthur Haslerig, a violent personal enemy of General Lambert, had the daring to take possession, with a company of soldiers he had gathered around him, of the fortress and naval harbour of Portsmouth, and seated there, to proclaim the new military government an usurpation, and the persons constituting it traitors to the Commonwealth.

The chance of his overthrowing the established executive, low as it had fallen, with his Portsmouth volunteers, seemed small indeed; but the representative of the "Rump," in making his bold assault, reckoned upon another power, as yet little noticed, but destined before long to dazzle the eyes of the world by its influence. Everything had fallen into anarchy in England, there were no visible rulers anywhere, and the army, last resource and base of authority, had virtually ceased to exist, severed into mere disorganised factions of soldiers, following certain officers of their own choice. But while thus the chief division of the realm was lying prostrate and helpless, and Ireland had fallen back into its old chronic state of confusion, the third of the nations of the Commonwealth was unaffected as yet by the disease that had laid hold of the other two. Scotland, under its own separate administration, established by Oliver Cromwell, had grown wonderfully in prosperity within the last few years, and within its limits, among inhabitants needing no military rule, was stationed a strong and well disciplined army. The commander of this army was General George Monk. It was said that Sir Arthur Haslerig, when raising the banner of the "Rump" parliament at Portsmouth, had cried, "We have some hopes of Monk to be our champion."

George Monk, thus looming forward into fame, was the scion of an ancient but decayed Devonshire family, born in 1608, and therefore now a little past fifty. Very imperfectly educated, he became a soldier at the age of seventeen, serving in the naval expeditions of 1626-7 against Spain and France, and subsequently for ten years in the Netherlands. Returned from thence, at the commencement of the conflict between Charles I. and the Scots, he ranged himself ardently at the king's side, fighting for the royal cause in England and Ireland, and thereby gaining the command of a regiment. However, the military fortune of the king had no sooner begun to wane, when George Monk made haste to leave the sinking vessel, and taking the Covenant in 1647, offered himself and his good sword to Parliament. Not being entirely trusted, he was sent to Ireland, where he distinguished himself by great bravery, but also by great rapacity, his conduct in the latter respect leading to his being accused of participation with an Irish chieftain in surrendering the town of Dundalk to the Royalists. The charge gave rise to a parliamentary inquiry, resulting in the censure of Monk, but with the superadded decision "that he should not be questioned for his actions in time to come." After this verdict, Monk remained for some time unemployed, until the breaking out of hostilities between parliament and the Scots, when he accompanied Cromwell to the north as lieutenant-general of the artillery, and signalized himself by his valour at the battle of Dunbar. He was subsequently employed in putting down the "moss troopers," which he effected with much strategical skill, and on Cromwell marching into England, in pursuit of young Charles Stuart, he left his lieutenant-general of the artillery behind as commander-in-chief of the forces in the north. As such Monk besieged and took Stirling castle, and carried Dundee by storm, revenging himself against the citizens of the latter place for their resistance by the committal of the most diabolical cruelties, and indiscriminate slaughter, in which neither sex nor age was spared. The terror spread by the report of the massacres of Dundee made the subjugation of the rest of the country an easy task for him, and Montrose, Aberdeen, and the remainder of the towns still held by the Royalists quickly fell into his hands. Monk's rule in Scotland came to an end, temporarily, in 1652, on the breaking out of the war between the Commonwealth and the United Provinces, on which he exchanged his military for a naval career, and was made "sea general," the same as Blake, Dean, and other officers, in conjunction with whom he achieved a well-earned fame. At the termination of the great naval contest, Monk once more went back to Scotland as general-in-chief and head of the administration, and by dint of great firmness and very remarkable prudence succeeded in gaining a deep hold of the affections of the army under his command, as well as the civil population. Cromwell, fully valuing the services rendered to himself and the state by Monk, overwhelmed him with honours and dignities, but never really trusted him. With his profound judgment of character, the Lord Protector knew that the man who had done such great things in the cause of the Commonwealth was in reality nothing but a greedy, unscrupulous, and unprincipled adventurer, and more than once, when referring to the Scottish commander-in-chief, described him as "the sly fellow."

But "the sly fellow," by dint of a fortunate position, upheld by vast cunning, and great art in using the gift of silence, was now fast becoming the most powerful man in the realm. Like a wary gamester, he was watching from a distance the movements of rival players, prepared to step into the arena the very moment they had thrown their last dice. The time evidently had come when the broken "Rump" was rising against the jaded, self-defeated Army Council, and Monk, seeing his opportunity, hesitated not for a moment to seize it. Applied to by Sir Arthur

Haslerig and the fiercest of his colleagues to become the champion of their cause, he at once consented to do so, promising to march, if necessary, his army into England, and to uphold with the sword their truly ancient rights to be sole representatives of the national sovereignty. "As to a Commonwealth," he told Haslerig in one of his letters, "believe me, Sir, for I speak it in the presence of God, it is the desire of my soul." To doubt such fervency of patriotism and republicanism was impossible to Sir Arthur and his friends, the more so as those high qualities were so well calculated to serve their own ambition, and they accordingly set to extolling the fame of the Scottish commander-in-chief to the skies, while at the same time entreating him to be their patron, and not to delay his march to Westminster for a single hour. Monk made haste to accept the invitation, setting out from Edinburgh in the beginning of December, 1659, at the head of seven thousand veteran troops, with the openly declared object of freeing the parliament of the Commonwealth from the oppression of the soldiers. While the members of the "Rump" believed, or professed to believe, that the motive given out by their champion from the north was real, and springing from the loftiest impulses, the army leaders knew otherwise, and allowed themselves not for a moment to be duped. As soon as the report of the southern march of the Scottish army arrived in London, the chief officers of the General Council of the Army, among them Lambert and Desborough, called a meeting at the Guildhall, entreating the citizens to rise for the defence of the capital, and telling them plainly, "that the bottom of Monk's design was to bring in the king upon a new civil war." The good citizens listened, but kept very silent, deeming discretion the best part of valour. They seemed to feel that, in the universal chaos which had set in, the seven thousand veterans of the north, stern in action, thoroughly disciplined, and obeying the voice of a single man like a mute engine of war, were a power absolutely irresistible, and that, therefore, all that remained for them was to submit to fate and General Monk.

In starting on his southern expedition, big with the doom of three nations, Monk, in all probability, had not settled in his own mind the exact course of policy he was to pursue. A mere soldier of fortune, without anything approaching to settled principles, political or religious, his whole conduct through life had been guided hitherto by nothing but the aim to provide for his own personal interest, in the vulgar form in which such self-interest could exhibit itself, that of making money. To this ideal of success he clung now as much as ever, greatly fortified and assisted in his endeavours by his wife, a woman of masculine character and furious temper, even exceeding him in avariciousness, and who exerted a powerful sway over all his actions. Careful not to destroy the position at which he was aiming by a single hasty movement, Monk proceeded onward on his march from Edinburgh to London with extreme slowness and caution, making lengthened halts on the road, and taking the greatest pains to keep on good terms with all parties. While openly unfolding the banner of parliament, and repeating, with many solemn asseverations, the assurance given to Sir Arthur

Haslerige that it was the one "desire of his soul" to see the Commonwealth thrive and flourish, he had numerous secret interviews with Royalist agents, and neglected not at the same time to remain as friendly as possible with the English officers, and principal members of the General Council of the Army. The latter, notwithstanding his flatteries, and assertions that their cause was his own, continued to feel the deepest mistrust of him; however, aware that all substantial power had glided from their hands, and deeply unwilling, besides, to plunge the country into the horrors of a fresh civil war, they resolved not to oppose the march of the Scottish army by force, but to await quietly what the future would bring. In the meantime, the mere report of the advance of Monk led to the reinstatement in power of the members of the "Rump," and on the 26th of December, Speaker Lenthall and some two score of his friends who had come to London at his summons, met at Whitehall, and walked together in file to the hall of St. Stephen's, amidst the deep silence of the people of the streets, who stared upon the knot of old men, elected representatives of the nation nigh thirty years ago, and clinging to their posts with furious energy, as upon petrified relics of a bygone age, walking the world in ghostly procession. Three days after the reopening of Speaker Lenthall's assembly, on the 29th of December, Sir Arthur Haslerig, most vigorous of all the old men of the "Rump," came up from Portsmouth, and took his seat in the house, dressed in warlike costume, booted and spurred, and looking, as noted by one of his colleagues, "very jocund and high." The high airs of poor Sir Arthur were due to the news that his friend, the Scottish commander-in-chief, had crossed the border and was hastening towards London, in noble enthusiasm to restore the Commonwealth and its defenders.

Monk's march to London was entirely unopposed. General Lambert had gone northward as far as Newcastle to see whether anything could be done to resist the advance of the treacherous friend of the Commonwealth; but the few troops he had taken with him from the capital were completely demoralized, and they becoming mutinous on the road, nothing was left for him but to disband them. On the 3rd of January, 1660, Monk entered York, where he was joined by a large body of Cavaliers under Sir Thomas Fairfax, old commander-in-chief of the parliamentary armies against Charles I., now swimming with the tide towards Charles II. But though the accession thus made to his forces seemed to commit the "sly fellow" to a definite policy, he still kept up his implacable reserve, maintaining what was undoubtedly true in one sense, that he was not attached to any party, and taking to himself the ambiguous but alluring title of "Assertor of the ancient laws and liberties of the Country." Continuing his excessively slow and cautious progress, Monk entered Nottingham on the 21st, Leicester on the 23rd, and Northampton on the 26th of January, publishing everywhere proclamations declaring that he was but a servant of parliament in a military capacity, ready to execute all its behests. What these were, no doubt existed, for having once more taken possession of the legislative hall at Westminster, the members of the "Rump" set to voting a series of ordinances establishing the Commonwealth on a wider democratic basis than before, and denouncing the attempts of Charles Stuart to usurp the sovereignty of the free nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Engaged in the performance of these republican labours, Speaker Lenthall and his friends were somewhat startled on learning that their patron from the north was joined everywhere by the most notorious Cavaliers and friends of Charles Stuart; however, they took little notice of such trifling facts, and kept on voting new laws for the Commonwealth. On the 28th of January, Monk was approaching the capital, but before making his entry, he sent a message to the "Rump" demanding that all the soldiers of the English army in and about London should be driven out, to give way for the godly and right-minded men he had brought from Scotland. The rulers at St. Stephen's hastened to execute the desire of their patron, and the whole of the English troops having been removed, by dint of force, promises, and bribes, the Scottish general held his solemn entry into the capital on the 3d of February, and at once took up his residence at Whitehall. Two days after, Monk was introduced in parliament, received with the most unbounded enthusiasm, and thanked by the Speaker, in words of burning eloquence, for the eminent services he had rendered to the Commonwealth.

The time had now nearly come for George Monk to throw off his mask, and to rid himself of the men who had hitherto assisted him in the prosecution of his schemes. After a week's stay at Whitehall, and uninterrupted conferences with Royalist agents, the general suddenly, on the morning of the 11th of February, sent a letter to his devoted friends of the "Rump," informing them that it was requisite to readmit into their body the whole of the members expelled by Cromwell, or, in other words, to re-establish the Long Parliament as it existed previous to the trial and execution of the king. Of the meaning of this demand, which was couched in harsh and almost menacing terms, there could not be a moment's doubt, and the consternation which it created was the greater when it became known that at the moment when sending off his message, Monk had put his troops in motion and marched into the city, agitated, ever since his arrival, by royalist emissaries, and which had shown within the last few days strong predilections in favour of a return of the Stuarts. Now for the first time the eyes of the deluded politicians of St. Stephen's began to open, and the crushing certainty fell upon them, that the man upon whom they had set all their hopes had played them false, and was about to turn their bitterest foe, pulling down, root and branch, the edifice which they had been building up. In their profound consternation, broken by rage and despair, the unhappy Parliamentarians at once gave up every thought of resistance; and instead of attempting a bold move, not without chances of success, by voting the deposition of Monk, and appointing Lambert, or some other republican general, to the command-in-chief of the united army of England and Scotland, they threw themselves at the feet of their enemy. A resolution was passed "that the thanks of the House be given to General Monk," with added declaration that his desires should be carried out "in due time;" and two commissioners were forthwith despatched to carry the reply to his message to the general. The parliamentary envoys found Monk at the house of the lord mayor, Sir Thomas Allen, a noted Cavalier, and after meeting with a haughty reception, were invited to accompany him to the Guildhall, where the Royalists and their Presbyterian followers had mustered in great strength. On the way thither, the crowds in the streets, made up chiefly of city apprentices, better informed of what was going on behind the scenes than the elderly legislators at Westminster, broke out in loud hurrahs for Charles II., mingled with cries of "The general is with us!" and "Down with the Rump!" Towards evening the bells of all the churches were set ringing, and bonfires were lighted in the main thoroughfares. "I counted seven or eight in King Street," Samuel Pepys noted in his diary, "fourteen between St. Dunstan's church and Temple Bar, and at Strand Bridge I could at one time tell thirty-one fires." The bonfires were not only intended as triumphal exhibitions, but made use of for humorous play by the street mobs. They got from the butchers a fraternity noted for its steady friendship to the Stuart cause—all the hind quarters of meat which their shops contained, and throwing them into the flames, drank bumpers to the health of King Charles, while roasting to cinders "the Rump."

The royalist movement, once begun, proceeded with extraordinary celerity. Deeming it useless to continue his play with the men of the "Rump," who had helped him thus far, any longer, Monk treated them henceforth with undisguised contempt, paying no attention whatever to their votes and proceedings. By his invitation, the excluded members of the Long Parliament came to London a week after the despatch of his letter demanding their attendance; and having met at his private residence on the 20th of February, and pledged themselves to obey his orders, they were escorted on the following day to Westminster by a company of his guards. As if ashamed of the part they were playing, they went to take their seats in the hall of legislature, one by one, in deepest silence; but they had no sooner arrived, with the escort of soldiers still at the door, when Sir Arthur Haslerig and the other chief republican leaders arose tumultuously and left the house. Nothing could be more acceptable to the Royalists than this sudden flight of their adversaries; and unhampered now by any show of opposition, they lost not a minute in turning the legislative machine to their own use. Before the day had come to an end on which they had taken their seats, they had passed a score of votes of the most important character, upsetting everything that had been done by the "Rump" during all the years the party constituting it had been in power, and preparing openly the transformation of the Commonwealth into a monarchy. Having annulled, and ordered to be erased from the journals of the House, the whole of the votes which in 1648, 1649, as well as in more recent years, had ordained or ratified their expulsion, the returned members proceeded to the dissolution of the republican Council of State, and ordered the formation of a new government, with General Monk, appointed commander-in-chief of the armies of England,

Scotland, and Ireland, at the head of it. The next step of the new parliament was to promulgate anew the Covenant, which was ordered to be read in all the churches; while in conjunction with this measure, the old penal laws against the Roman Catholics, set aside by Cromwell, were again put in full force, with an expressed tendency to religious persecution by the offer of a reward of twenty pounds to all persons discovering and denouncing popish priests. Having accomplished everything he desired to be done, Monk signified his wish to the members of the Westminster assembly to vote their own dissolution, which they did without murmur, ordering at the same time elections for a new parliament, the task of which, as tacitly understood, was to reinstate formally the Stuart dynasty. It was settled that the dissolution should take place on the 16th of March, and on the evening of that day a significant scene took place in the City, in front of the Exchange. Here a statue of Charles I. had formerly stood, which after his execution was replaced by a column, bearing the inscription, "Exit tyrannus, regnum ultimus, anno libertatis Angliæ restitutæ primo, annoque Domini 1648." An immense crowd had assembled on this spot, when, at the setting-in of night, a man came up with a brush and a vessel of paint, and leaning a ladder which he carried with him against the column, he boldly ascended and effaced the inscription. When the work was done, the painter threw his cap in the air, shouting, "God bless King Charles the Second!" upon which the vast multitude repeated in chorus, "God bless King Charles the Second!"

The cry for the Second Charles, coming from the lips of the London mob, was somewhat premature, for the man who alone was able to decide whether the heir of the Stuarts should reoccupy the throne of his ancestors, or remain a wretched exile, and despised pensioner of the arch-enemy of England, had as yet not declared openly. It was well known that Monk was negotiating with the chiefs of the Royalists; but with his habitual cautiousness, which seemed to increase rather than relax as he went forward step by step on the slippery path he had marked out for himself, he had scrupulously abstained from saying a word in favour of the restoration of the monarchy, repeating, as he had done from the commencement, that he was nothing but the humble servant of parliament. The hypocritical farce was carried out so completely as to deceive even the Republicans whom he had driven from power; and more than a fortnight after the reinstatement of the excluded members of the Long Parliament, Sir Arthur Haslerig, in company with seventeen of his friends, leaders of the destroyed "Rump," deemed it necessary to ask for an interview with Monk, to discover what were his real intentions. They could not make up their minds to believe that their cause was lost, as the deep distrust which the acts of the all-powerful general inspired was counteracted completely by his words, and, seeking his presence, the poor deluded Republicans told him, with curious frankness, that they wished to hear his confession of political faith from his own lips. But George Monk, now as ever, was more than a match for plain-spoken Sir Arthur. On being asked what had been his objects in reinstalling the Presbyterians of the Long Parliament in authority, Monk replied, with childlike artlessness, "To free myself from their importunities," adding, "but I will take effectual care that their measures shall not do any harm." The republican chieftains looked at each other, scarce knowing what to say, till Haslerig, presuming upon old acquaintance, and the services he had rendered to Monk, boldly asked, "But will you join with us against Charles Stuart and his party?" The dictator raised himself to his full height, assuming a look of offended dignity. "Sir Arthur," he exclaimed with solemnity, laying his hand into that of Haslerig, "I have often declared to you my resolution so to do, and I now once more protest to you, in the presence of these gentlemen, that I will oppose to the utmost the setting-up of Charles Stuart." This was plain and straightforward, and Sir Arthur and friends withdrew in great joy. But a week had scarcely elapsed after the declaration to the leaders of the "Rump," when General Monk granted an open audience to Sir John Grenville, accredited ambassador of Charles Stuart.

The interview of Monk with the Stuart envoy took place on the 19th of March, three days after the dissolution of parliament. Sir John Grenville had been soliciting the favour of a reception for nearly a month, declaring himself the bearer of an autograph letter from Charles; but the dictator had hitherto declined compromising himself, so that, in doing so now, he for the first time emerged from the dubious light in which he had shrouded his intentions. At the meeting that took place, the ambassador of the exiled prince, having delivered his letter, which abounded in expressions of goodwill and affection, declared that his master had authorized him to offer to the general, if according to him at once his powerful aid, an annual pension of one hundred thousand pounds for life, together with the post of lord high constable of England for himself, and the right of appointing any one of his friends to some other great office under the crown. The tempting bait was neither accepted nor declined by Monk, who contented himself to state that he was "wholly resolved to trust to the good pleasure of his majesty," but at the same time promised definitely to seat Charles on the throne if he would be guided by his counsels. Grenville eagerly asked the nature of these counsels, and thereupon had a paper dictated to him containing four propositions, which he was to lay before "his majesty." General Monk recommended Charles, first, to grant a general amnesty, from which four persons at most should be excepted; secondly, to ratify and confirm in their acquisitions the possessors of confiscated property, whether obtained by gift or purchase, thirdly, to make a declaration of being willing to establish complete liberty of conscience; and fourthly, to remove out of Flanders and altogether from Spanish territory, and to take up his residence temporarily, until his return to England, in the United Provinces, if possible at the small town of Breda, renowned for its old-dated adherence to Protestantism. Possessed of these instructions, Grenville hastened back to his master, who was living at Brussels, and persuaded him at once to close with General Monk. Charles had some scruples, the promise of liberty of conscience and ratification of property changes made by the Republicans being not at all to his taste. However, remembering that royal promises had been broken many a time before, and that he need not set the first example of inviolably keeping them, he allowed himself to be brought round to the views of Sir John Grenville, by resolving to put himself under the guidance of the sole man who could offer him the crown of three kingdoms. To give a first proof of his obedience, Charles secretly quitted Brussels at night from the 4th to the 5th of April, fearing, not without ground, that the Spanish government might impose some hard bargain upon him before leaving; and having crossed the Dutch frontier safely, at once despatched Grenville back to England. Sir John, this time, was the bearer of a number of important despatches, signed "Charles Rex," one of them destined to be famous as the Declaration of Breda.

While the ambassador of Charles Stuart was hurrying to and fro between England and the continent, the elections took place for the new parliament, and being well controlled by the dominant party, resulted in the return of an overwhelming number either of declared Royalists, or, to a larger degree, of Presbyterians favourable to the restoration of kingship. By the fiat of Monk, the old lords were summoned, together with the commons, to attend parliament; and on the 25th of April, 1660, both houses met at Westminster, each in its own chamber. The first business of the commons, after having elected a Speaker, in the person of Sir Harbottle Grimstone, old leader of the moderate Presbyterians, was to pass a fervent vote of thanks to Monk for all that he had done. "Your lordship hath been our physician," exclaimed Sir Harbottle, on delivering the vote to the commander-in-chief, "and hath cured us with lenitives. Statues have heretofore been set up to persons meriting much of their country, but your lordship hath a statue set up higher, and in another place, in the hearts of all the well-wishers to the good of this nation." The lords followed the commons in worship of the new master, while making no secret of their wishes and desires. "The peers return to your lordship," said the earl of Manchester, their mouthpiece, "their humble acknowledgments for the care which you have taken in restoring them to their ancient and undoubted rights; and they hope that God will still bless you in the use of all means for procuring a safe and well-grounded peace, according to the ancient fundamental government of this nation."

To assist the chief manager in putting-up "the ancient fundamental government" was now the only task before lords and commons; and after various conferences between Monk and Sir John Grenville, the mode in which the great scene in the drama should be played was settled and decided upon. The due preparations having been made, and the chief actors well instructed, Sir John presented himself in the lobby of the House of Commons on Tuesday, the 1st of May, and demanded to be introduced to the representatives of the nation, as the bearer of a message from "his majesty Charles II., by the grace of God king of England, Scotland, and Ireland." He was at once admitted to the floor of the House, and marching up to the Speaker, handed him a letter, with a large seal bearing the royal arms, while exclaiming, "I am commanded by the king, my master, to deliver this letter to you, and to desire that you will communicate it to parliament." On receiving the document the Speaker arose, and the whole House followed his example. Standing erect and uncogered, Sir Harbottle then read the royal messages, dated from "Our court at Breda, this 4th of April, in the twelfth year of Our reign," and addressed to "Our trusty and well-beloved the Speaker of the House of Commons." From the commons, Sir John Grenville proceeded to the lords, who received him with the traditional ceremonies of the old monarchy, while accepting the royal message, likewise dated from "Our court at Breda, in the twelfth year of Our reign." It was no little satisfaction to the ancient upholders of legitimacy to learn that their king had borne crown and sceptre already for a dozen years—dwelling out of his realm for various reasons.

The letters delivered by Sir John Grenville to both Houses of Parliament contained in substance the stipulations which had been carried by him to Brussels at the dictation of Monk, and which were embodied now in a royal statement as the "Declaration of Breda." Charles gave his solemn assurance not only to grant a general amnesty and complete liberty of conscience, but that he would leave the settlement of all property questions that had arisen during the twelve years of "Our reign," while residing away from his beloved subjects, to parliament, and would conform in all other matters, as far as possible, to the expressed desires of the national representatives. "We do assure you upon Our royal word," the declaration concluded, "that none of Our predecessors have had a greater esteem of parliaments than We have in Our judgment, as well as from Our obligation; and We do believe them to be so vital a part of the constitution of the kingdom, and so necessary for the government of it, that We well know neither prince nor people can be in any tolerable degree happy without them." Vague as were these assurances, and containing no guarantee whatever against the infringement of the dearly-bought political and religious liberty of the people, they more than satisfied both lords and commons, and in their new loyalty they could with difficulty find words to express the depth of their admiration for the gracious message from "Our court at Breda." To give an immediate vent to it, in a shape presumed to be most acceptable to the persons of "Our court," the commons voted that the sum of fifty thousand pounds should at once be offered to his most gracious majesty as a gift, with ten thousand pounds more for the duke of York, and another five thousand more for his younger brother the duke of Gloucester. That nothing might be wanting to the full expression of the satisfaction of the last representatives of the Commonwealth in getting back a king, Sir John Grenville, after having finished his business with the lords, was recalled to the bar of the lower house, thanked by the Speaker, and presented with an order for five hundred pounds, with which to purchase a jewel, as a memorial of the great occasion in which he had taken so important a part. Enthusiasm and loyalty having now risen to their highest pitch, a slight incident occurred to mar the beauty of the scene. A man of business, and with a deep sense of the value of ready money, acquired in many years of foreign pilgrimage, Sir John felt very anxious to convert the Speaker's order at once into sterling coin; but on expressing his wishes to this effect, it was found that there was no cash in the parliamentary treasury. The excited legislators, having just voted away many thousands of pounds, looked at each other with great consternation on becoming aware that they could not raise five hundred; and the royal ambassador was on the point of walking away with saddened countenance, when a private member came to the rescue. It was a merchant named Forth, who risked his five hundred pounds for the honour of the parliament in which he had a seat, leaving Sir John to return in haste to his master, the bearer of a crown and of piles of letters of exchange upon Amsterdam bankers. There was delirium of joy on his arrival at "Our court at Breda."

In the midst of the hurricane of monarchical reaction that had set in on a sudden, there were still a few men left in the House of Commons anxious to do their duty as representatives of the people; and the day after the Declaration of Breda had been read, on its being proposed that twelve commissioners should be despatched to bring the king back to England, a short debate ensued as to whether it would not be requisite to ask his majesty to subscribe to some form of constitution, or charter of popular rights, in order to set up a barrier to unlimited despotism. The necessity of doing so was warmly urged by Sir Matthew Hale, one of the most upright members of the bench of judges, and after a long but exceedingly temperate speech, in which he dwelt upon the dangers that were likely to happen through parliament neglecting all safety-guards to maintain national freedom, he ended by moving, that before the twelve envoys of the House of Commons started for Breda, a committee should be appointed to examine the propositions which had been presented to the late king in the Isle of Wight, with a view to ascertain whether it would not be expedient to submit any or all of these to the king his son. The motion was supported by James Prynne and several leading Presbyterians, and there seemed a probability that the bulk of the latter party, desirous for the return of monarchy, but by no means of absolutism, would vote for it, when all at once Monk made his voice heard. It was listened to in deepest silence, every one knowing that his words were commands. "There is yet," cried the dictator, "beyond all men's hope, an universal quiet all over the nation; but there are many incendiaries still on the watch, trying where they may first raise the flame. I have such copious information sent me of these things that is not fit should be generally known, but I cannot answer for the peace, either of the nation or of the army, if any delay is put to the sending for the king. What need is there of sending propositions to him? Might we not as well prepare them, and offer them to him when he shall come over? He will bring neither army nor treasure with him, either to fright or to corrupt us. So I move that we immediately send commissioners to bring over the king, and I must lay the blame of all the blood and mischief that may follow on the heads of those who shall still insist on any motion that may delay the present settlement of the nation." The speech, received with boisterous acclamations by the Royalists, at once made an end of the debate. Sir Matthew Hale having been compelled to withdraw his motion, the parliamentary commissioners were nominated at once, and ordered to proceed in haste to Breda, to lay the fate of the nation unreservedly at the feet of King Charles II.

The twelve delegates of the House of Commons, to which were added six from the Lords, set out on their journey as commanded immediately after their appointment, and on the day of their departure, Saturday, the 5th of May, it was voted that all the acts of government should go forth from that moment in the name of King Charles II. On the Monday following, the 7th, the two Houses decided that they would proclaim his majesty in a body the next day; and accordingly on Tuesday, at the hour of noon, a procession composed of the whole of the lords and commons was formed at the outer gate of Westminster Hall. An immense crowd had assembled to witness the proceedings, and silence having been proclaimed, a herald came forward to read the parliamentary proclamation. "Although," it ran, "it can in no way be doubted but that his majesty's right and title to his crown and kingdoms is and was every way completed by the death of his most royal father of glorious memory, without the ceremony or solemnity of a proclamation; yet, since proclamations in such cases have been always used, to the end that all good subjects might, upon this occasion, testify their duty and respect; and since the armed violence, and other calamities of many years last past, have hitherto deprived us of any such opportunity, whereby we might express our loyalty and allegiance to his majesty. We therefore, the lords and commons now assembled in parliament, together with the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, and other freemen of this kingdom now present, do, according to our duty and allegiance, heartily, joyfully, and unanimously proclaim that, immediately upon the decease of our late sovereign lord King Charles, the imperial crown of the realm of England, and of all the kingdoms, dominions, and rights belonging to the same, did, by inherent birthright, and lawful, undoubted succession, descend and come to his most excellent majesty King Charles II., as being lineally, justly, and lawfully next heir of the blood royal of this realm; and that, by the goodness and providence of Almighty God, he is of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, the most potent, mighty, and undoubted king: and thereunto we most humbly and faithfully do submit and oblige ourselves, our heirs, and posterity, for ever." The proclamation having been read by the herald, the lords and commons standing around in a circle, bareheaded, like penitents, they went forward in procession to Whitehall, where the same ceremony was repeated, and from thence eastward to the City. Arrived at Temple Bar, the gates were found shut in the face of parliament, but were thrown open on the heralds demanding admission by sound of trumpet. "Who are you, and what is your message?" demanded the lord mayor, riding forward on a richly caparisoned horse, glittering in scarlet and gold. "We are heralds at arms," was the reply, "commanded by the lords and commons in parliament assembled to demand entrance into the famous city of London, to proclaim Charles II. king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland." The lord mayor bowed, and the procession entered the city, where, repairing to the four principal points, the two houses of parliament proclaimed the restoration of the monarchy, amidst the booming of cannon from the Tower, and the frenzied applause of the populace, shouting "God save King Charles II."

King Charles II. landed at Dover on the 25th of May, received by General Monk and an immense throng of nobles and courtiers, kneeling in the dust. On the 30th of January following, the body of Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector of the Commonwealth, greatest war captain of the age, and noblest ruler ever born to England, was taken from the tomb of the illustrious dead in Westminster Abbey, and hung on the gallows at Tyburn.

CHAPTER II.

History of Laws and Government, from the Accession of James I., A.D. 1603, to the Dissolution of the Commonwealth, A.D. 1660.

THE accession of the House of Stuart to the throne of England was the commencement of one of the most important eras in the constitutional history of the realm. Two great elements opposed each other at the eventful hour when the crown of great Elizabeth was transferred to the son of Mary Stuart. England had become Protestant, that is, had thrown aside the fetters of blind obedience, and substituted the light of reason for the night of superstition; and England at the same time had fallen under a strongly-marked autocratic government, thwarting in every essential the free development of her new aims and energies. A struggle between these two contending influence, was inevitable, and its beginning a mere question of time, dependent upon extraneous circumstances and events. It was hastened on and brought to a conclusion with unusual rapidity, owing mainly to the fact of the new race of hereditary rulers showing themselves men of such boundless incapacity for their office as the world had seldom seen. A more wretched and despicable breed of kings than the Stuarts no country ever produced; and the rising of buoyant Protestantism against rigid absolutism, capable either of being postponed for some generations, or of being driven from the current of wild revolution into that of smooth-flowing reform, became peremp-tory at the moment they climbed into the seat left vacant by the large-brained sorrow-born daughter of Henry VIII. Little Scotland had never been able to bear her Stuart burthen, and greater England could bear it still less. Though possessed instinctively of a spirit of loyalty amounting to worship, the Scots had been compelled to rid themselves violently of James I.; they had taken arms repeatedly against James II.; they had slain James III. on the field of battle; they had risen more than once in rebellion against James IV.; they had abandoned James V.; and they had deposed, and were now sending to the scaffold, his daughter, Mary Stuart. It was soon found that her offspring, a captive in the hands of his northern subjects from his birth, had not learnt wisdom from misfortune, remaining of the true Stuart blood when changing his title from James VI. of Scotland into James I. of Great Britain.

No monarch of any age or land ever expressed more exalted notions about the boundless power and god-like dignity of kingship, than the first Stuart ruler of England, and no monarch was ever more absurdly incompetent than he to give effect to them. His character, admirably drawn by Macaulay, united all that could be possibly brought together to make royalty despicable. "James was always boasting of his skill in what he called kingcraft, and yet it is hardly possible even to imagine a course more directly opposed to all the rules of kingcraft than that which he followed. The policy of wise rulers has always been to disguise strong acts under popular forms. It was thus that Augustus and Napoleon established absolute monarchies, while the public regarded them merely as eminent citizens invested with temporary magistracies. The policy of James was the direct reverse of theirs. He enraged and alarmed his parliaments by constantly telling them that they held their privileges merely during his pleasure, and that they had no more business to inquire what he might lawfully do than what the Deity might lawfully do. Yet he quailed before them, abandoned minister after minister to their vengeance, and suffered them to tease him into acts directly opposed to his strongest inclinations. Thus the indignation excited by his claims, and the scorn excited by his concessions, went on growing together. By his fondness for worthless minions, and by the sanction which he gave to their tyranny and rapacity, he kept discontent constantly alive. His cowardice, his childishness, his pedantry, his ungainly person and manners, and his provincial accent, made him an object of derision. Even in his virtues and accomplishments there was something eminently unkingly. Thus, during the whole course of his reign, all the venerable associations by which the throne had long been fenced were gradually losing their strength. During two hundred years, all the sovereigns who had ruled England, with the single exception of the unfortunate Henry VI., had been strong-minded, high-spirited, courageous, and of princely bearing. Almost all had possessed abilities above the ordinary level. It was no light thing that, on the very eve of the decisive struggle between our kings and their parliaments, royalty should be exhibited to the world stamporing, slobbering, shedding unmanly tears, trembling at a drawn sword, and talking in the style alternately of a buffoon and a pedagogue."

The combat against absolutism began very slowly, its opposing forces being devoid as yet of all organization. In the first parliament of James, which met on the 19th of March, 1603, the worship of royalty in which the Commons of the realm had been trained prevailed so much as to give rise to an address slavishly obsequious to the poor blubbing monarch. The national representatives acknowledged his title to the throne "with one full voice of tongue and heart," giving "unfeigned and hearty thanks to Almighty God for blessing them with a sovereign adorned with the rarest gifts of mind and body;" and "upon the knees of their hearts they assigned their most constant faith, obedience, and loyalty, to his majesty and his royal progeny, of most rare and excellent gifts and forwardness." But the next seven years wrought a great change in the attitude of the Commons, and in the parliament which opened in February, 1610, they were no more humbly suppliant, but of haughty and even defiant demeanour. It was in vain James told them, in a speech composed by himself, that "the state of monarchy is the supremest thing upon earth;" that "kings are not only God's lieutenants upon earth, and sit upon God's throne, but even by God himself they are called gods;" and that "kings have like power with God—can make and unmake their subjects, have power of raising and casting down, of life and death." Without entering into a controversy about his own divinity with the learned son of Mary Stuart, the Commons politely yet firmly denied his right to impose taxes without their sanction, passing a resolution to declare "that all impositions set, or to be set upon the people, their goods and merchandizes, save only by common consent in parliament, shall be void." They likewise disputed the king's power to make or alter laws by proclamations, affirming that "there is nothing more precious than to be governed by a certain rule of law and not by any uncertain or arbitrary form of government;" and at the same time upholding "the indubitable right of the people of this kingdom not to be made subject to any punishment that should extend to their lives, lands, bodies, or goods, other than such ordained by the common laws of this land." After some further protests to this effect, met by renewed assertions of unlimited royal power, James cut short the controversy by a sudden dissolution, and for the next three years did without a parliament. He would have gladly made the interval longer, but for his pressing financial exigencies. Many circumstances, independent of his own unthriftiness, and the shameless waste of his reigning favourites, combined to render parliamentary supplies objects of much greater magnitude than they had formerly been. The difficulties in which Queen Elizabeth, from her peculiar situation, was involved, had obliged her to alienate a great portion of the ancient royal domains, thus stopping a very important source of income of the crown. On the other hand, the increase in the quantity of precious metals that had taken place since the discovery of America had lowered to a very considerable extent that part of the regal revenues payable in money; while the influx of national wealth, through the progress of trade and manufactures, by increasing the expense of living to each individual, had also augmented the charges attending the administration of government. Thus wanting much more and possessing much less than his predecessors, the first Stuart king was in a worse position than any of them to dispense with the assistance of a body which alone could unloose the purse-strings of the nation.

Compelled by his bitter necessities, James opened another parliament in the spring of 1614. But the experiment resorted to this time by his counsellors of cajoling the national representatives, without entering upon any of the substantial reforms in government which they loudly demanded, was entirely unsuccessful; and after sitting a few weeks, the Commons were again suddenly dissolved, with strong marks of his majesty's anger and resentment. James appeared now resolved to summon no more parliaments, and to this determination he adhered for seven years. His ever-increasing wants made him call in the aid of the Commons once more at the end of this period, and in the spring of 1621 a fresh legislative assembly met at Westminster. It brought the great political struggle that had been going on for half a generation to a climax. To the message of James, reproaching them "for that you usurp upon our prerogative royal, and meddle with things far above your reach," the representatives replied in the perspicuous and bold protest of the 18th of December, 1621. "The Commons now assembled in parliament, being justly occasioned thereunto concerning sundry liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament, do make this protestation following. That the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England, and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the king, state, and defence of the realm, and the maintenance and making of laws, and redress of mischiefs and grievances which daily happen within this realm, are proper subjects and matter of counsel and debate in parliament." The king's behaviour towards the antagonistic element thus raised up against him clearly indicated the position at which the contest between freedom and absolutism had arrived. Learning that the declaration of the Commons had been entered upon the journals of the house, he sent for the volume containing it, and "rent out the protestation with his own hand." It was impossible for James to give a more striking proof of his feebleness and impotency than this absurd attempt to upset a great principle by tearing a leaf or two from a book.

The last parliament of James, which met on the 19th of February, 1623, completed the results already gained in the great constitutional struggle that had been going on during the reign, by the impeachment of the lord-treasurer, the earl of Middlesex. Notwithstanding the strong opposition of the king, he was arraigned before the House of Lords, upon articles drawn up by the Commons, accusing him of bribery and peculation in his high office; and being found guilty, was condemned to degradation from all his dignities, to perpetual exclusion from parliament, to the payment of a fine of fifty thousand pounds, and to imprisonment "during his majesty's pleasure." More important even than this condemnation, was the passing of a statute aimed directly against one of the most valued prerogatives of the crown, the power to grant monopolies, and to dispense with penal laws and forfeitures. The new statute, entitled "An Act concerning Monopolies and Dispensations with Penal Laws, and the Forfeitures thereof," declared that, "all monopolies, commissions, grants, licenses, charters, and letters-patent, for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using anything within the realm, or of any other monopolies; or of power, liberty, or faculty to dispense with any others, or to give license, or toleration, to do, use, or exercise anything against the tenor or purport of any law or statute, or to give or make warrant for any such dispensation, license, or toleration, to be had and made, or to agree or compound with any others for any penalty or forfeitures limited by any statute, or of any grant or promise of the benefit, profit, or commodity of any forfeiture, penalty, or sum of money, that was or should be due by any statute, before judgment thereupon had," and so forth, should henceforth be "altogether contrary to the laws of the realm, and be utterly void, and in no wise be put in use, or executed." An important provision was attached to this Act, declaring that it "shall not extend to letters-patent and grants of privilege for the term of fourteen years and under, thereafter to be made, of the sole working, or making of any manner of new manufactures within this realm, to the true inventor or first inventors of such manufactures, which others, at the time of making such letters-patent and grants, shall not use." It is under this clause that the crown has exercised, and continues exercising to the present day, the right of issuing patents for new inventions—a very doubtful boon both for the protection of genius and the progress of national art and industry.

With the accession of Charles I. commenced a new phase of the great constitutional struggle. During the whole of the preceding reign the contest had been prosecuted on the part of parliament with more or less of timidity and in a very irregular manner, the pretensions of royal absolutism being opposed neither by bold statesmen like leaders nor even by any fixed plan of action; but all this changed with the appearance of a new generation of fighters for liberty, who turned the confused guerilla warfare into an organized battle. On the ultimate result of the battle, the personal character of Charles exercised a most important influence. "He had received from nature," says Macaulay, "a far better understanding, a far stronger will, and a far keener and firmer temper than his father's. He had inherited his father's political theories, and was much more disposed than his father to carry them into practice. He was, like his father, a zealous Episcopalian; he was, moreover, what his father had never been, a zealous Arminian; and, though no Papist, liked a Papist much better than a Puritan. It would be unjust to deny that Charles had some of the qualities of a good, and even of a great prince. He wrote and spoke, not, like his father, with the exactness of a professor, but after the fashion of intelligent and well-educated gentlemen. His taste in literature and art was excellent, his manner dignified, though not gracious, and his domestic life without blemish. Faithlessness was the chief cause of his disasters, and is the chief stain on his memory. He was, in truth, impelled by an incurable propensity to dark and crooked ways. It may seem strange that his conscience, which, on occasions of little moment, was sufficiently sensitive, should never have reproached him with this great vice. But there is reason to believe that he was perfidious, not only from constitution and from habit, but also on principle. He seems to have learned from the theologians whom he most esteemed, that between him and his subjects there could be nothing of the nature of mutual contract, that he could not, even if he would, divest himself of his despotic authority; and that in every promise which he made, there was an implied reservation that such promise might be broken in case of necessity, and that of the necessity he was the sole judge. And now began that hazardous game on which were staked the destinies of the English people. It was played on the side of the House of Commons with keenness, with admirable dexterity, coolness, and perseverance. Great statesmen, who looked far behind them and far before them, were at the head of that assembly. They were resolved to place the king in such a situation that he must either conduct the administration in conformity with the wishes of parliament, or make outrageous attacks on the most sacred principles of the constitution. They accordingly doled out supplies to him very sparingly. He found that he must govern either in harmony with the House of Commons, or in defiance of all law. His choice was soon made." Charles told his third parliament, in direct terms, that "unless they did their duty in contributing what the state required, he would be obliged to use the other means which God had put into his hands." The reply to this threat was the famous Petition of Right.

The course of action followed by the king after the passing of this important Act virtually ruined his cause, by turning the whole intelligent mass of the nation against him. He might have declined to sanction the Petition of Right, as opposed to the royal prerogative; but to give his assent to it only in order to break its most important provisions immediately after, was clearly a fatal line of conduct. If there had been still any doubt as to the ultimate aims of Charles, it disappeared before the flagrant breach of trust of which Charles now made himself guilty, and which developed itself from year to year, every one of his acts proving that he was attempting systematically to destroy all the liberties of the nation, and to make his rule a despotism as unlimited as that of the sovereigns of Spain and France. For full eleven years, from March, 1629, to April, 1640, the two houses of parliament were not convoked, while taxes and imposts were raised in defiance of constitutional limitations, brute force everywhere usurping the reign of law, and the voice of all patriots that dared to speak of legality being stifled in the dark cells of the Tower and other dungeons. For eleven years the king of England was like the king of Spain, though with this important difference, that the power of the former had not, as that of the latter, the substantial basis of a standing army. There was the weakness of English despotism, and it was on this defect, more directly than on any other, that it was brought to make shipwreck. Charles was perfectly conscious of the due flaw in the substance of his arrogated power, and, more so than he, the ablest of his advisers, the earl of Strafford, whose one mighty aim, towards which all his other efforts were tending, was to create a regular army. He succeeded so far as to establish a strict military despotism in Ireland, keeping down not only the natives but the English colonists, to such an extent that he was able to boast, in a letter to Archbishop Laud, that, in the country under his control, the king was as absolute as any monarch in the world could be. All that was wanting, in Strafford's far-reaching design, was to transfer the Irish army to England, but before this could be accomplished a new power, the existence of which had not been calculated upon in the schemes of the bold earl, had darted upwards on a sudden, with almost volcanic energy. Both reckless and obstinate, like all the members of the fated Stuart race, Charles insisted, against the advice of Strafford, as well as all his other advisers gifted with the least spark of political wisdom, to force episcopacy upon Scotland, and thereupon Scotland rose in arms. The marching of the hosts of the Covenant across the Border was the signal of England's freedom.

The tramp of the Scottish army on English soil produced, more or less directly, that surprising assembly of reformers known as the Long Parliament. Without hesitation and without fear, the new men, who had come to Westminster as representatives of the nation, attacked the huge fabric of despotism that had grown up in England, and threw it to the ground after a herculean struggle. With Strafford's impeachment commenced the great assault upon absolute monarchy, which ended logically nine years later in the trial and execution of the king. In signing the bill called "an Act for the Attainder of the earl of Strafford," Charles condemned himself, and from that moment could only hope for peace by the most unqualified submission to the national will, as embodied in the House of Commons. But his deeply ingrained disposition to falsehood and intrigue made such submission, frankly offered and honestly performed, an utter impossibility, so that his course from the commencement was towards his own destruction. The conduct of the king, when once the supreme power had been wrested from his hands, seemed directed throughout by no higher motive than desire for vengeance, leading him to acts of frenzy such as his attempt to arrest the five members of the House of Commons, for which even his warmest and most sincere friends could not find one word of justification. That the king should not, in any shape, interfere in the deliberations of parliament, was a maxim understood to have been fully settled in the preceding reign, and any breach of the same was sufficient in itself to give rise to severe censure. But when Charles came in person, at the head of an armed force, into the House of Commons; to lay hands violently upon such of the leaders of the assembly as had incurred his displeasure, it was naturally deemed an act of arbitrary power beyond forgiveness, indicating that the king, in spite of all that had happened, remained an incurable despot, and would remain so to the end of his life. Henceforth the proceedings of parliament assumed a different character from what they had been before. At the commencement of the Long Parliament, the majority of the members of the House of Commons had placed more or less faith in the promises of the king, deeming that bitter necessity would be a teacher to him as to other men. But the trust in the royal word ceased all on a sudden after Charles had tramped, with a band of hired ruffians at his heels, into the sacred precincts of the chamber of legislature, which no monarch of England yet had violated; and from that moment the conviction became general that it was indispensable to place some restraint upon his actions. Nothing less than the command of the military forces of the kingdom was now capable of yielding satisfaction to the popular party; and as, notwithstanding the disuse of the feudal services in the field, there still remained a shadow of the ancient militia, under the orders of the lieutenants of counties, a bill was carried rapidly through both houses, ordering that the nomination of these officers should be vested in, and that they should be responsible for their conduct to parliament. It was the starting movement of the leaders in the Commons to grasp the hilt of the sword.

The organization of the military forces of the kingdom was in a somewhat singular state at the time parliament made its first attempt to wrench it from the executive. Theoretically, there existed two classes of troops in the realm, the one designed to maintain the king's and the nation's rights abroad, and the other to protect the people against civil disturbances at home. The former comprehended the tenures by knight's service, which, according to the fundamental principles of feudal monarchy, bound the owners of crown lands to attend the king in war, within or without the realm, for the space of forty days. Beyond this term they could only be retained by their own consent and at the king's expense, and the limitation thus imposed necessarily made the forces so raised of very little use in case of protracted hostilities. They were therefore in very early times supplemented by the second class of troops, men procured either by voluntary enlistment or by a kind of conscription, the right of which some of the more warlike sovereigns of England arrogated to themselves. "What was the extent of the king's lawful prerogative," says Hallam, "for two centuries or more after the Conquest, as to compelling any of his subjects to serve him in foreign war, independently of the obligations of tenure, is a question scarcely to be answered; since, knowing so imperfectly the boundaries of constitutional law in that period, we have little to guide us but precedents, and precedents in such times are apt to be much more records of power than of right. We find certainly several instances under Edward I. and Edward II., sometimes of proclamations to the sheriffs, directing them to notify to all persons of sufficient estate that they must hold themselves ready to attend the king whenever he should call on them; sometimes of commission to particular persons in different counties, who are enjoined to choose and array a competent number of horse and foot for the king's service." These forced levies meeting naturally with great opposition from the people, they were frequently denounced in the House of Commons as illegal; and in the first parliament of Edward III. a short and remarkably concise Act forbade them for the future. The Act proscribed that "no man from henceforth shall be charged to arm himself otherwise than he was wont in the time of his progenitors; and that no man be compelled to go out of his shire but where necessity requireth, and sudden coming of strange enemies into the realm, and then it shall be done as hath been used in times past for the defence of the realm."

The Act of Edward I., renewed and enforced by several subsequent statutes, had the effect of putting a stop to the forced enlistment of soldiers, and thus prevented the growth of that formidable institution, the fundamental of despotism in all the great continental states, a standing army. Henry VIII. made a feeble attempt towards the creation of one by establishing, in 1485, the body of yeomen of the guard; but the strength of this troop, beginning at fifty, never exceeded two hundred, and the men composing it were looked upon throughout more as the king's domestic servants than as soldiers. Henceforth, with the gradual decline of feudality, the only armed force of the kingdom, known to law and in actual existence, was the old Teutonic militia. "By the Anglo-Saxon laws," Hallam explains, "or rather by one of the primary and indispensable conditions of political society, every freeholder, if not every freeman, was bound to defend his country against hostile invasion. It appears that the alderman, or earl, while those titles continued to imply the government of a county, was the proper commander of the militia. Henry II., in order to render it more effective in cases of emergency, and perhaps with a view to extend its service, enacted, by consent of parliament, that every freeman, according to the value of his estate or movables, should hold himself constantly furnished with suitable arms and equipments. By the statute of Winchester, in the thirteenth year of Edward I., these provisions were enforced and extended. Every man between the ages of fifteen and sixty was to be assessed, and sworn to keep armour according to the value of his lands or goods—for fifteen pounds and upwards in rent, or forty marks in gold, a hauberk, an iron breastplate, a sword, a knife, and a horse; and for smaller property less expensive arms. A view of this armour was to be taken twice in the year by constables chosen in every hundred. These regulations appear, by the context of the whole statute, to have more immediate regard to the preservation of internal peace, by suppressing tumult and arresting robbers, than to the actual defence of the realm against hostile invasion, a danger not at that time very imminent. The sheriff, as chief conservator of public peace and minister of the law, had always possessed the right of summoning the posse comitatus, that is, of calling on all the king's liege subjects within his jurisdiction for assistance, in case of any rebellion or tumultuous rising, or when bands of robbers infested the public ways, or when, as occurred very frequently, the execution of legal process was forcibly obstructed. The provisions, however, of the statute of Winchester, so far as they obliged every proprietor to possess suitable arms, were of course applicable to national defence. In seasons of public danger, threatening invasion from the side of Scotland or France, it became customary to issue commissions of array, empowering those to whom they were addressed to muster and train all men capable of bearing arms in the counties to which their commission extended, and hold them in readiness to defend the kingdom."

To the thoughtful men of all parties it seemed clear from the very commencement of the struggle between Charles and the Long Parliament that its ultimate decision could be sought only on the field of battle. Accordingly, both the king and the leaders of the Commons directed all their efforts to get the control of the only existing armed force, not doubting but that the victory would remain at the side commanding the militia. While conceding everything else demanded of him, Charles stoutly refused his assent to a bill by which commissioners nominated by parliament should be intrusted with authority over the militia, declaring, with great energy, "that he could not consent to divest himself of the just power which God and the laws of the kingdom had placed in him for the defence of his people, and to put it into the hands of others for any indefinite time." Thereupon followed a conference between lords and commons, in which the resolution was passed, "that the king's answer was a direct denial of their desires; that those who advised it were enemies to the state; that if the king should persist in it, it would hazard the peace and safety of his kingdoms, unless a speedy remedy were applied by the wisdom and authority of both Houses of Parliament; that such parts of the kingdom as had put themselves into a posture of defence against the common danger had done nothing but what was justifiable; and that it would be a great hazard to the kingdom if the king removed to any remote parts from his parliament." Charles had quitted London when these resolutions were sent to him, embodied in a message from both houses, which declared "that they were enforced in all humility, to protest that if the king should persist in his denial, the dangers and distempers of the kingdom are such as will endure no longer delay; and unless he graciously assured them, by their messengers, that he would speedily apply his royal assent to the satisfaction of their former desires, they should be enforced, for the safety of his majesty and the kingdom, to dispose of the militia in such a manner as they had propounded, and they resolved to do it accordingly." The king returned a reply on the 2nd of March, 1641, from his palace of Theobald's, "I am so much amazed at this message," he declared, to the parliamentary envoys, "that I know not what to answer. You speak of jealousies and fears. Lay your hands on your hearts, and ask yourselves whether I may not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies, and if so, I assure you this message hath nothing lessened them. For the militia, I thought so much of it before

I sent the former answer, and I am so much assured that the answer is agreeable to what, in justice or reason, you can ask, or I in honour grant, that I shall not alter it in any point." It was a right royal response, not devoid of dignity, but in spite of its decisive character was entirely unable to change the current of events. Resolute as was the king not to part with the command of the militia, parliament yet wrenched it from his hands, partly by dint of bold energy and perseverance, and partly by means of a weapon as mighty as the sword. The Commons wielded a power which the king had not, the power of the purse.

The state of the national revenue, and the sources from which it was raised, exercised a paramount influence upon the ultimate result of the great contest between constitutional government and absolutism. During the Tudor period, the principal and most secure portion of the income of the sovereigns of the realm was derived from the royal domains, valued, at the accession of Henry VIII., at above two millions sterling, and increased during his reign by the addition of the confiscated property of the monasteries and other church establishments. However, the whole of the immense wealth thus obtained was not only squandered recklessly by the profligate monarch, but his wastefulness brought him to alienate many of the estates of the crown; and he died so much indebted that his son and successor, youthful Edward VI., was compelled to sell Boulogne, stated to have been acquired at a cost of 1,340,000*l.* sterling, for the insignificant sum of four hundred thousand crowns, or about 133,000*l.* Edward, or rather his ministers, kept on selling crown domains, besides raising loans from the Hebrew money-lenders of Antwerp and Amsterdam, at fifteen and twenty per cent., and the process continuing under Mary, it resulted that the executive got into ever-increasing financial embarrassment. It got somewhat lessened during the reign of Elizabeth, but even her thoroughly economical government could not restore the interrupted balance between income and expenditure, and she left behind her debts amounting to nearly half a million sterling. However, the frugal queen did not end her long and on the whole glorious reign as a bankrupt, for her outstanding claims far outnumbered her debts, the king of France owing her 450,000*l.*, and the States-General of Holland 800,000*l.*, besides which 350,000*l.* were due to her from subsidies voted by parliament, and not paid into the royal exchequer at the time of her death. James I. eagerly grasped the subsidies and all the other sums due to his great predecessor, but he nevertheless, had the meanness to discharge the debts incurred by Elizabeth only under compulsion, and not without throwing aspersions upon her character. Though extremely unthrifty, and careless of his own, the poor Stuart king yet seemed to feel instinctively the value of money, as if dimly conscious that the want of it might one day be fatal to his successor.

At the accession of James I. the crown domains formed no more the chief, or even a considerable part of the royal income, the annual revenue derived from them amounting to little above 32,000*l.* The important consequence was that the king was made almost entirely dependent upon parliamentary grants for his subsistence, so that all his high-flying notions about the godlike power possessed by him were on this account alone the vainest and most baseless of dreams. It appeared from a statement laid before the House of Commons, that during the whole of the first fourteen years of the reign of James his total ordinary income amounted to only 450,863*l.* sterling; and while the extraordinary sums, chiefly grants and supplies, which he received during the same period were 2,200,000*l.*, his expenditure throughout exceeded his income by 36,617*l.* per annum, or more than the revenue from the crown domains. In 1610, the earl of Salisbury declared in parliament that the king was burdened with a great and urgent debt of 300,000*l.*, and that the liabilities of his majesty were increasing every year at the rate of nearly 100,000*l.*, his total income from all sources not being more than 500,000*l.*, while his disbursements amounted to 600,000*l.* The announcement was listened to by the Commons with loudly-expressed dissatisfaction, which increased on their learning that the king was proceeding with the sale of the state domains, and raising sums in every other way to cover his extravagance. An attempt was made to procure a strict entail of the crown lands on the king and his successors for ever; but a bill for that purpose, after passing in the upper house, was rejected by the Commons on some technicality, and James, meeting with no hindrance, continued devouring the capital of the fund which had made his predecessors independent. In the course of a few years he realized the sum of 775,000*l.* by the sale of domains, alienating estates worth probably three times the sum, and likely, in their constantly-increasing value, to serve still as a modest maintenance for a frugal sovereign. Thus parliament subsidies became more and more absolutely necessary, as well to James as to his successor; and the latter, not choosing to rely upon and give way to the demands of the representatives of the nation, made as a condition of their grants, was driven by the direct course of events into exacting arbitrary and violent imposts. The claim of such taxes as "ship money," disputed by Hampden, and made the subject of a legal trial that rang all over the nation, had not a little to do with drifting him towards that abyss in which he was ultimately engulfed.

It was a striking and notable phase of the great constitutional struggle between the House of Commons and Charles, that the former doled out their supplies to him in the most niggardly manner, while the people so much approved this policy as to reduce the assessment imposed upon them to the lowest possible value. At the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth a subsidy was worth 120,000*l.*, but in 1640, in the first year of the Long Parliament, it had fallen to 50,000*l.*, instead of increasing as it should have done. Subsidies were a tax upon incomes, and as the wealth of the country was constantly and rapidly augmenting, no other reason can be assigned for the decrease of the impost but that, the government being extremely unpopular, both tax-assessors and tax-payers acted in collusion to diminish the parliamentary gift to the king to the lowest possible figure. During the whole of the fifteen years from his accession till the meeting of the Long Parliament, Charles had but fifteen subsidies granted to him, six from his first, four from his second, and five from his third parliament, none of them producing above 50,000*l.* each, and some less than 40,000*l.* These sums being far below his wants, the king, by necessity as much as the drift of his own inclination, had recourse to "ship money," which yielded about 200,000*l.* per annum, producing altogether 800,000*l.* during the four years that it was levied. The Long Parliament showed itself outwardly liberal, granting six subsidies, besides a new poll-tax; but the whole produce went to maintain the English and Scotch armies, and the money was paid into the hands of commissioners appointed by the House of Commons instead of into the royal treasury. So it happened that when the great contest had at last been brought to the decision of the sword, Charles was sunk in the direst poverty; and though able to raise, by the power of his office and the feeling of veneration still clinging to royalty, a large body of adherents, he had the utmost difficulty to provide for their support. The capital, most of the large towns and seaports, and altogether the wealthiest part of the kingdom, adhered to parliament; and in order to satisfy his most immediate wants, Charles was compelled to sell or pawn the crown jewels, and to melt down a quantity of plate which had been sent him by the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge. A little later, the king tried to imitate the example of his opponents by levying assessments and customs duties in the districts where his authority was acknowledged, but the sums derived by these means were extremely small, and he had to fall back upon the voluntary contributions of the more wealthy of his adherents as his principal resource for carrying on the war. But though the leading Royalists displayed extraordinary munificence, the marquis of Worcester alone contributing 100,000*l.* to Charles's exchequer, the marquis of Newcastle nearly the same amount, and many other enthusiastic Cavaliers mortgaging their lands, and selling their plate and jewels for the benefit of their royal master, all these exertions were necessarily feeble and unavailing as opposed to the systematic taxation at the command of parliament. The latter was an ever-flowing natural river, while the king's means were more like the rush of an artificial fountain, spiring up one moment high in the air, and the next dying in self-exhaustion, with not a trace of their existence left.

If there could be any doubt as to whether, in the mighty contest between the defenders of old absolutism and the champions of new-born liberty, ending in the destruction of the former and the building up of a new social edifice more in harmony with the enlightened spirit of Protestantism and the progressive spirit of the English race, the House of Commons really represented, from the commencement, the majority of the nation, it would be found in the financial history of the period. When the Long Parliament assembled, it was impossible for any of its members to foresee the terrible calamities of war into which the country was about to be plunged, and it was thought quite sufficient therefore, for the purpose of checking the encroachments of arbitrary power, to place the subsidies voted to the government in the hands of special commissioners. The king having all on a sudden raised the standard of civil war, the conduct of parliament was so popular, and so much approved of by the people, that the voluntary contributions for a time supplemented further taxation. The plate of almost every inhabitant of London was delivered up cheerfully in support of the cause of liberty; the very thimbles and bodkins of the women were thrown into the common fund, and no article however small, no ornament however valuable, was spared. But it was impossible that an expensive war could be long supported upon so slender a foundation as the temporary fervour of the people; and the two houses of parliament therefore came to resolve, in order to provide for a better subsistence, to levy assessments on the personal and landed property of the people. These assessments varied, according to the exigencies of the times, from 35,000*l.* to 120,000*l.* per month; and they were found so productive, and in every respect so much superior to the ancient form of raising subsidies, that they were retained to modern times, under the name of "land tax." Seeing the extreme willingness of the people to bear the new burthens that had to be imposed, parliament next devised a somewhat singular impost, known as the "weekly-meal tax." The theory of it was that every adult person should retrench a meal per week, and give the cost of it to the country; and, whether leading to fasts or not, the scheme answered so far as to put above 600,000*l.* into the parliamentary exchequer. The "weekly-meal tax," maintained only for a few years, evident offspring of exalted patriotism more than of calm statesmanship, was followed by an impost of a far more important nature, called, and ever after famous as the "excise." It was not by any means a tax the people liked, and had it been imposed by or through the influence of the old government, might have caused a rebellion, but being decreed by the new champions of freedom, it was paid willingly, if not cheerfully. Far-sighted politicians like Hampden had staked their all to resist ship money; yet not the poorest of poor patriots ever forgot that ship money, and all other moneys whatsoever, were more like symbols than realities in the battle for liberty in which the nation was engaged.

an entirely new system of financial legislation, was due to the great leader of the House of Commons, John Pym. It was at first laid upon liquors only, with the superadded declaration that at the end of two years all excise duties should be abolished. However, the armed contest continuing much longer than expected, the tax was not only maintained, but extended to bread, meat, salt, and other articles of first necessity. The excise on bread and meat was subsequently repealed, and the revenue derived from them replaced by new customs duties, laid on in such a manner as to interfere least with the natural development of trade and industry. By these and other means, sometimes strongly imperious, yet on the whole statesmanlike and full of wisdom, the new rulers of England permanently raised the public revenue, to the great advantage of the nation no less than of the government. While the two Stuart kings, with all their extortions, arbitrary imposts, forced loans, and sales of crown domains, of honours, and of titles, could never wrest much more than half a million sterling a year from the national purse, a sum more than three times the amount was obtained without difficulty in the period of the Commonwealth, although the country at this time was suffering under the effects of the civil war. The average public revenue of England during the administration of Oliver Cromwell was 1,517,274*l.*, to which Scotland added 143,652*l.*, and Ireland 207,790*l.*, giving a total income of 1,868,716*l.* Vastly larger sums were raised by parliament in the course of the civil war. It is stated in a treatise printed in 1647, and written apparently by a well-informed person, that in the four years preceding the immense amount of 17,512,400*l.* was raised, or not less than 4,378,100*l.* per annum. Another contemporary writer, Clement Walker, author of "The History of Independency," asserts that in the course of five years the sum of forty millions was collected from the people of England for the overthrow of royal despotism. Accepting this statement as reliable, and taking into account the value of money, and the resources of the people at the time, it stands forth as a striking fact that at no period of its history, ancient or modern, was England taxed as it then taxed itself. The nation, truly and literally, to its utmost power, gave its best blood and whatever it possessed of earthly goods to gain the priceless boon of liberty.

CHAPTER III.

History of Religion, from the Accession of James I., A.D. 1603, to the Dissolution of the Commonwealth, A.D. 1660.

RELIGIOUS and political life were intimately, and all but indissolubly, bound together during the great revolt of England against monarchical absolutism. As the whole political movement was in its essence but a development of Protestantism, so again the religious progress was offspring of the secular contest—both mother and child of the vast upheaving in which ancient prerogative, clinging to the past, got interlaced in mortal struggle with new-born thought, asserting its right to the future. In its more direct aspect, the main course of religious faith consisted in the further growth and spread of those ideas comprised under the description of Puritanism. It was the rebellion of the early reformers against the episcopal Church of England, made prominent in the first instance by John Hooper, appointed bishop of

Gloucester in the reign of Edward VI. Having lived for many years among the followers of Calvin and Zwingli on the continent, and imbibed their doctrines, Hooper, on returning to England and receiving his nomination to the see of Gloucester, demurred both to the oath of supremacy and to the robes in which the episcopal investiture was to take place, and sent a letter to the young king, earnestly requesting to be allowed either to decline the office, or to be admitted to it without the usual oath and ceremonial. After a controversy extending over nearly a year, Hooper finally accepted the bishopric on a compromise, his conduct in the meanwhile having made a deep impression upon both the clergy and laity of the Church of England, fostering to a large extent the spread of Puritanism. But its more visible development did not take place till the reign of Elizabeth, the foundation of it having been laid in the terrors of the Marian persecution, which drove crowds of the most thoughtful and most energetic ministers of the church to the continent, chiefly to Geneva, Zürich, Basol, and Frankfort-on-the-Main, strongholds of the Calvinist creed. On the death of Mary the whole of the banished divines returned home, poor in worldly goods, yet rich in faith, "bringing nothing with them," according to Fuller, "but much learning and some experience." The contrast between the show and splendour of the ceremonial of the Church of England, akin to that of Rome, and the stern simplicity of religious worship abroad, forcibly struck the returned exiles, and they at once set inveighing against the former as a remnant of old idolatry. Their opponents in turn attacked them as unpatriotic admirers of foreign institutions, and the dispute, in a very short time, grew loud and fierce, so that the new preachers attracted the attention of the whole nation. "They were for the most part Zwinglian gospellers," says Peter Heylin, chaplain of Archbishop Laud, "and became the great promoters of the Puritan faction at their coming home."

In Scotland, Puritanism at once got a firm and legally acknowledged footing in the shape of Presbyterianism, but the arbitrary civil and ecclesiastical rule of Elizabeth, bent to create rigid uniformity, left little room for its open establishment in England. Nevertheless it spread secretly, and James I. had no sooner ascended the throne than he was assailed with the cry for religious reform. On his very road from Edinburgh to London, the English Puritans presented him with a petition, signed by above eight hundred clergymen, from twenty-five different counties, asking for changes in the government and ritual of the established church, notably the prohibition of non-residence of ministers, of commendams held by bishops, of the cap and surplice, of the cross in baptism, and of other rites borrowed, and retained from the worship of Rome. James, treading as yet very uncertain ground in his new kingdom, answered the petitioners hopefully but evasively; and finally, wishing to exhibit the light of his theological acumen, assembled the Hampton Court Conference. The real tendencies of the king at once showed themselves at this meeting. Though having solemnly promised, on the eve of his departure from Scotland, to be faithful to the tenets of the Presbyterian creed, in which he had been educated, he liked the constitution of the Church of England—fitted far more to uphold his egregious vanity as a monarch, and the whole of his notion of the divine right of kings—too well not to adhere to it in preference; and he did not scruple to say so to the learned representatives of English Puritanism who appeared before him at the Hampton Court Conference. Their claims were extremely moderate; they did not ask for the subversion of episcopacy and the introduction of the Geneva dogmas, but merely for reforms in ecclesiastical ceremonies, and there was only one point in their demands in any way tending towards Presbyterianism. This was the proposal that the clergy of each diocese should meet from time to time in common assembly, to be called an episcopal synod, and, under the presidency of the bishop, determine matters of church government and internal discipline. The mild claim was enough to stir James into a great passion, he seeing in it the little wedge that was to bring the whole system of the kirk southward from over the Tweed. "If," his majesty cried out, in droll excitement, "you aim at a Scottish presbytery, it agreeth with monarchy as God with the devil." Then Jack, and Tom, and Will, and Dick shall meet, and at their pleasure censure me and my council, and all our proceedings. Then Will shall stand up and say, 'It must be thus!' Then Dick shall reply and say, 'Nay, marry but we will have it thus!' and, therefore, here I must once more reiterate my former speech, and say, le roi s'avisera." There was wit in the remark, though the poor pedant king had little cause to look down upon the wisdom of Jack and Dick.

The Hampton Court Conference was followed by an organised persecution of Puritanism in all its forms, which lasted as long as regal absolutism, and until the oppressed faith at last became victorious in the Long Parliament. The movement was set on foot by a proclamation of James, ordering all ecclesiastical and civil officers to do their duty in enforcing the laws for conformity, and admonishing all persons not to expect any further alteration in the public service. James, mightily elated in having escaped from his Presbyterian teachers at home, and in playing the new part of English pontifex, informed his subjects that "he would neither let any presume that his own judgment, having determined in a matter of this weight, should be swayed to alteration by the frivolous suggestions of any light spirit, nor was he ignorant of the inconvenience of admitting innovation in things once settled by mature deliberation." It was a main characteristic of the prosecution thus initiated that it was less made to inspire terror than hatred and contempt, the system pursued by the successive archbishops and bishops who carried out the Stuart policy of repression being specially directed to aggravate every difference already existing, and to irritate every tender and sensitive feeling of their antagonists. As strong antagonism to the Romish faith was one of the essential features of Puritanism, the men of the ruling episcopal faction made pertinent efforts to offend this sentiment by studied coquetry with the abhorred religion, introducing insignificant priestly ceremonies of various kinds into the Anglican service, and letting no opportunity pass to show that their sympathy was far more with Rome than with Geneva. Another tenet on which the Puritans laid great stress was the due observance of the Sabbath, a principle not much attended to at first, but the importance of which was more and more dwelt upon with the increase of persecution against the new faith. The leaders of the dominant Church of England might well have sympathized with their antagonists on this one point, yet so far from doing so they took great pains, here as elsewhere, to inflict wounds and stir up rancour. Bishops high in favour at court opposed and derided the teachings of the "Sabbatarians," arguing that the commandment to rest on the seventh day was confined to the Hebrews, and that the observance of the first day of the week was but a modern institution, in no degree more venerable than that of the other festivals of the Church, or the season of Lent, stubbornly despised as "popish" by the Puritans. The discussion of the subject soon grew into a hot controversy, in which James as usual interfered with his pontifical authority, apparently for no other reason than to vex and exasperate his adversaries. A royal declaration was published, and ordered to be read in all the churches of the kingdom, permitting "all lawful sports and recreations" on Sunday, after divine service, the list of legal amusements, carefully enumerated, including archery, May games, and morrice-dances, but excluding bull and bear-baiting. However, there was a clause attached to the behest of James as to the manner in which his subjects should amuse themselves, by the direction that only those should participate in the shouting, drinking, and hopping about to the sound of fife and fiddle, who had been at church, so that "lawful sports" were made a premium on orthodox piety. It was impossible for any pontifex, whether of Rome or England, to go further in ecclesiastical legislation.

Under Charles the persecution against the Puritans increased in earnestness and intensity, partly on account of the strong and almost violent attachment of the king to episcopacy, and partly and to a still greater extent through its becoming more and more visible that political aims were intimately interwoven with the religious aspirations of the reformers. Thus, cruel punishments, for the most trifling causes, were inflicted frequently upon conspicuous men among them. Alexander Leighton, a distinguished divine, and native of Scotland, having published a pamphlet against the English hierarchy, was sentenced to be publicly whipped and set in the pillory, to have one side of his nose slit, one ear cut off, and one side of his cheek branded with a hot iron: the whole of this frightful torture was to be twice repeated, first at Westminster and next at Cheapside, after which the victim was to suffer perpetual imprisonment in the Fleet. Another sufferer, John Lilburne, a mere lad, condemned for dispersing papers against the bishops, was whipped from the Fleet prison to Westminster, there set in the pillory, and tortured afterwards. The cruelties culminated in the treatment of William Prynne, author of the "Histriomastix," a book containing nothing worse than invectives against stage plays, actors, and courtesans, the existence of all of which was denounced with an amount of erudition so immense as to become incomprehensible in its very height and depth. The real crime of Prynne was his being a rising man among the Puritans; and the Star Chamber, before which he was brought, had no difficulty in finding a pretence for his condemnation, the bulky volume of several thousand pages which he had sent into the world offering sentences enough that could be pieced together for the purpose. Accordingly, the unhappy author of "Histriomastix" was adjudged to stand twice in the pillory, to be branded in the forehead, to lose a portion of both his ears, to pay a fine of five thousand pounds, and to suffer perpetual imprisonment. The Puritan writer suffered the hideous punishment without wincing, and had no sooner got into the jail where he was to spend the rest of his life, than, with dogged pertinacity, he began composing another book, less learned than the "Histriomastix," but far more severe against his opponents. The occupation brought him a second time before the judges of the Star Chamber, with two other Puritan delinquents, Burton, a divine, and Bastwick, a physician; and all of them refusing to retract what they had said or written, the vengeance of the despotic court fell upon them with terrible force. Prynne lost the remainder of his ears, they being sawed off to the stump, with a portion of the cheek adhering; but he bent no more than before under the torture, and his heroic behaviour while he was undergoing mutilation by the hangman was so great as to excite the deepest expressions of sympathy from the crowds that witnessed the punishment. Having been sentenced to perpetual confinement in different prisons, the three victims of episcopacy were dragged off to Launceston, Chester, and Carnarvon castles; but their reception by the people showing that they were looked upon as martyrs in a good and great cause, they had to be carried further away to the Channel Islands. It was dimly felt, even by the Star Chamber judges, that all England was fast becoming Puritan.

The volcanic upheaving of the masses gained over to the new religious faith was not long in coming. In less than seven years after the absolutist party in state and church had wreaked their vengeance upon Prynne and his companions, there assembled the Long Parliament, visible and potent result of victorious Puritanism. Conscious of their origin, and the cause that had called them into being and would have to uphold them, the leaders of the great assembly set to attack ecclesiastical tyranny even before they began wrestling with political despotism. "He is a great stranger in Israel," exclaimed Lord Falkland at the opening of the session, "who knoweth not that this kingdom hath long laboured under many and great oppressions both in religion and liberty; and his acquaintance here is not great, or his ingenuity less, who doth not know and acknowledge that a great, if not a principal of this, have been some bishops and their adherents. Under pretence of uniformity, they have brought in superstition and scandal; under the titles of reverence and decency, they have defiled our Church while adorning our churches. They have tithed, mint, and anise, and have left undone the work of the Gospel. They have made the conforming to ceremonies more important than the conforming to Christianity." A crowd of orators followed in the wake of Lord Falkland, the vehemence of their speeches indicating the energy of long pent-up convictions, while the applause that followed them proved convincingly that the Long Parliament was beyond doubt, in its immense majority, the offspring of Puritanism. The heart of the assembly was touched by a few words from Sir Benjamin Rudyard, member for Wilton. "We well know," he cried, "what disturbance hath been brought upon the church for vain petty trifles: how the whole church, the whole kingdom hath been troubled where to place a metaphor, an altar. We have seen ministers, their wives, children, and families, undone against law, against conscience, against all bowels of compassion, about not dancing upon Sundays. What do these sort of priests think will become of themselves when the Master of the house shall come and find them thus beating their fellow-servants? They have so brought it to pass that, under the name of Puritans, all our religion is branded, and, under a few hard words against Jesuits, all popery is countenanced. Whosoever squares his actions by any rule, either divine or human, he is a Puritan; whosoever would be governed by good laws, he is a Puritan; he that will not do whatsoever the priests would have him do, he is a Puritan. Their great work, their master-piece, now is to make all those 'of the religion' to be the suspected party of the kingdom." Having listened to a number of speeches like these, the Puritans of the House of Commons proceeded to action; and at their fourth sitting passed a resolution that the three outraged victims of episcopacy and the Star Chamber, Prynne, Burton, and Bastwick, should be forthwith liberated by warrant of the Speaker, with the endorsed statement that they had been unjustly and tyrannically mutilated, branded, and imprisoned. It was a bold step on the part of the Commons, but the people fully ratified its urgency in the enthusiastic reception given to the three martyrs of religion on their return to the capital. It was the first loud cry of joy and exultation of victorious Puritanism.

The joy was legitimate, and yet there was something strange and anomalous in this sudden victory of the new faith. As yet Puritanism, as existing in England, was based upon no actual embodiment of any outward form of religion, but a mere theory, bent chiefly upon negation. Even the title given to the followers of the new faith was a mere nickname, fastened upon them by their antagonists; while they themselves did not pretend to belong to any of the numerous creeds into which thinking Europe had split in its superb revolt against Romish priestcraft and superstition. Puritanism, like all the other manifestations of the revolt at their commencement, from the time of Wickliffe down to Huss and Luther, was more a protest against falsehood and error than the setting-up of positive dogmas of truth; and though its champions looked lovingly towards Geneva, and lovingly, no less, towards Edinburgh, they were very far from claiming to be either Calvinists or Presbyterians. As long as they were labouring under persecution the situation was not entirely unnatural; but it was necessary to be brought to an immediate end with the achievement of victory, and one of the first efforts of the Long Parliament consequently came to be to arrive at some sort of "settlement of religion," either by remodelling the national church, or, what seemed to be more in the inclinations of the majority, by overthrowing it altogether and establishing Presbyterianism in its stead. However, Charles, clinging to episcopacy with even greater stubbornness than to his absolute power, resolutely refused all demands of the Commons for ecclesiastical reform in a wider sense; and it was not until parliament had taken the sword in hand that any progress could be made towards the great aim the Puritans had in view. In the meanwhile, for more than two years, no established form of worship existed in the country; and though the service in cathedrals was abolished for the most part, by authority of parliament, the clergy in all the ordinary churches were left to do very much as they liked, at liberty to read the liturgy or abstain from it, to preach in canonical habits or in a Geneva cloak. But at last, the army of the Covenant having crossed the border, and given a mighty impulse to the religious movement, the Commons resolved, "that such a government should be settled in the Church as might be most agreeable to God's Holy Word, and most apt to procure and preserve the peace of the Church at home, and bring it into nearer agreement with the Church of Scotland and the reformed Churches abroad." An ordinance followed, bearing date the 12th of June, 1643, directing "the calling of an assembly of learned and godly divines, and others, to be consulted with by the parliament for settling the government and liturgy of the Church of England, and for vindicating and clearing the doctrine of the said church from false aspersions and interpretations." The decree brought into existence a body famous under the name of the Westminster Assembly.

The Westminster Assembly held its first meeting in the chapel of Henry VII., on the 1st of July 1643. It was composed of one hundred and twenty-one divines, selected by the two houses of parliament, besides six deputies from Scotland, ten English peers, and twenty representatives of the Commons. Among the members were a few Episcopalian, such as the tenants of the sees of Bristol and Exeter, and the primate of England, Archbishop Usher, but the vast majority of them were declared Puritans, with a strong prepossession for the forms of Presbyterianism. The deliberation began by Archbishop Usher bringing forward a proposal for "reduced episcopacy," the groundwork of the scheme being that there should still be bishops in name, but stripped of rank and secular distinctions, and assisted in the administration of their dioceses by another council of clergymen. The plan was dismissed at once, with a show of indignation, as were also the ideas of another party, the extreme opponents of the episcopal faction. These were the Erastians, followers and disciples of Thomas Erastus, a German physician, contemporary of Martin Luther, who maintained that the true ministers of Protestant Christianity ought to be nothing more than lecturers on morals and divinity, and that all religious communities should be voluntary associations, under the power and direction of a secular magistrate. It was a heresy quite intolerable to the admirers of the strict Calvinistic church discipline, and the Erastians therefore were immediately silenced; after which, to suppress further debate from either this or the Episcopalian side, the Westminster Assembly hastened to accept the Presbyterian model, proposed by the deputies from Scotland. On a vote of the House of Commons, Sir Harry Vane and two other commissioners were sent to Edinburgh, where they subscribed, on behalf of parliament and the nation of England, to a document drawn up after the ancient Scottish Covenant, with a few slight alterations, and entitled the Solemn League and Covenant. It consisted of six articles. The first set forth the lamentable condition of the English church, and the determination of the people and its representatives to reform religion, in doctrine, discipline, worship, and government, "according to the word of God and the example of the best reformed churches." In the second clause, the signers of the Covenant agreed to "endeavour to bring the church of God in the three kingdoms to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in religion, confession of faith, form of church government, directory for worship, and catechising, so that we, and our brethren after us, may, as brethren, live in faith and love, and the Lord may delight to dwell in the midst of us." The remaining articles contained denunciations of Episcopacy and Romanism, together with repeated formulas binding the Covenanters to maintain the rights of "king and parliament," to expose "malignants and incendiaries," and to persist through life in upholding and spreading the principles of the Solemn League.

There was nothing in the great document, which thus came to form the basis of a new church in England, directly establishing Presbyterianism; but all things were tending in that direction, as well in the political as the ecclesiastical movement of the next few years. More energetic, if not more earnest in their religious propagandism than their brethren in the south, the Scots strained every nerve to make the kirk victorious, and backed as its cause was by a powerful army, indispensable in the overthrow of the old edifice of state and church, they failed not to gain their ends. After a long campaign of discussion and debate, extending over more than three years, rising and sinking in vehemence, and closely connected with the strife of the great armies in the field, the Westminster Assembly finally, towards the end of the year 1646, concluded the most important part of its labours. On the 11th of December, the produce of its activity, embodied in a large document called the Confession of Faith, was placed on the table of the House of Commons. It contained in substance the principles forming the basis of the Church of Scotland, as laid down in the book of discipline, adopted by the followers of John Knox in the preceding century. There was to be a kirk session, consisting of the pastor and his elders, assembling every week; next the presbytery, or classes, a weekly meeting for devotion of all the ministers and principal laymen of a great town or district; then the provincial synod, to take cognizance of ecclesiastical matters within a wider range; and last of all the general assembly, forming the superior ecclesiastical court, and representative and legislative of the combined clergy and laity of the church. In proposing this new system of ecclesiastical polity for England, the Westminster Assembly took very high ground. The divines composing it decided formally, by the vote of a large majority, not merely that the Presbyterian form of government was best fitted for, and desired by, the people of the country, but that it was the injunction and precept of the Gospel of Christ, and, in fact, the only scriptural and lawful religious system, and that it had to be submitted to because it was ordained by God. The House of Commons was little disposed to give its consent to such doctrines, feeling naturally jealous to assist in the foundation of a new power of spiritual jurisdiction, coiled up in the jure divino doctrines of Presbyterian churchmen, as greedy of authority to all appearance as the ministers of Rome. However, the sagacious leaders of the Long Parliament, always measuring with careful eye the necessities of the moment, thought it injudicious to enter upon a quarrel with the divines which they had called together to reform the church; and before even the latter had handed in their confession of faith, they prepared a bill establishing Presbyterianism in England by way of experiment, the preamble declaring "that if upon trial it was not found acceptable, it should be reversed or amended." Both houses of parliament passed the bill on the 6th of June, 1646, with the great fact steadily before their eyes, that on the 5th of May previous, King Charles had given himself up to the army of the Covenant.

Though only "upon trial," the act of the 6th of June tended to give a firm root to the Presbyterian church in England. It decreed that all parishes, and other places whatsoever, should be brought under the exercise of congregational, classical, provincial, and national assemblies, the private chapels of the king and the nobility only being excepted from their jurisdiction, but compelled not the less to adopt the Presbyterian mode of worship. The province of London, superseding the ancient diocese, was to be divided into twelve classical elderships, each to contain from ten to twelve parishes; while the different counties of England and Wales were to be divided into provinces and subdivided into classical elderships. It was ordered that the presbytery of every parish should meet once a week, the classical assemblies of each province once a month, and provincial assemblies twice a year. As to general assemblies, whose power was most feared by the astute politicians of the House of Commons, it was deemed necessary to circumscribe, if not their functions, at least their time limits; and it was decreed accordingly, that they should "meet as often as they shall be summoned by parliament, and, to continue sitting as long as the parliament shall direct and appoint, and not otherwise." The constitution of the various governing bodies in the church was provided for in the manner that every congregational or parochial eldership should send not less than two, and not more than four elders, besides one minister, to the classical assembly; that every classical assembly within the province should send two ministers, and not less than four, and not more than nine ruling elders to the provincial assembly; and lastly, that two ministers and four ruling elders should be deputed by every provincial assembly to form the general applause.

The scheme, carefully elaborated as it was, met with shipwreck almost as soon as it was launched, being opposed to the religious sentiments of the great mass of the people, and welcome only to a portion of the clergy. In London alone the act was partially executed, but neglected all over the rest of the kingdom, the commissioners appointed by parliament to mark out the new ecclesiastical districts carrying the work no farther than drawing up a few plans. In the House of Commons itself, the high tone adopted by the Westminster theologians—who, having delivered themselves of the confession of faith, began to assume priestly airs, claiming, among others, authority for excommunication—met with violent opposition. "Master Speaker," cried Bulstrode Whitelock in the course of one of these debates, "the assembly of divines have petitioned that in every presbytery, or presbyterian congregation, pastors or ruling members may have the power of excommunication, and of suspending such as they shall judge ignorant or scandalous persons from the sacrament. The duty of a pastor is to feed, and not to disperse and drive away the flock. Excommunication is a total driving or thundering away of the party from all spiritual food whatever. The best excommunication is for pastors, elders, and other people to excommunicate sin out of their own hearts and conversations, and to suspend themselves from all works of iniquity." The words met with boisterous applause.

That the presbyterian form of church government was not suited to the genius of the English people, became apparent in less than six months after it had been ordered "upon trial." Disliked by the people, and not supported by any stronger motive than clerical ambition, it was adopted by the House of Commons solely as a matter of political expediency, and had to fall, therefore, as soon as the cause which gave it momentary power ceased to exist. On the 30th of January, 1647, seven weeks after the promulgation of the confession of faith, King Charles was delivered up to the parliamentary commissioners, and from that moment there was an end of all hopes which the Scotch might cherish to establish their ecclesiastical polity in England. However, while defeated as a religious party, the Presbyterians still remained a powerful political faction, though even on this ground they were hard pressed by their successful rivals, the Independents. As in all times of vast social upheavings, so in the great struggle of the English people against political and religious despotism, theories ruled strong, and in theory, if in nothing else, Independency could not but be acknowledged the truest child of the Reformation. Its fundamental principle, as simple as grand, was that every assembly, congregation, or society of believers, united for religious fellowship and Christian worship, is a perfect church within itself, possessing full power to regulate its own affairs, and free of all external control. The first reformers who stood forward to advocate the principle were the Baptists, who grew rather numerous under Edward VI., and they were followed, in the reign of Elizabeth, by the so-called Brownists, differing from them on no very important points, except in retaining infant baptism. It was to the Brownists that the afterwards famous name of Independents was first given, though, like the appellation Puritan, not at all with their consent. In a memorial which they addressed to the Long Parliament, in 1644, they rejected the title with energy, saying, "That proud and insolent title of Independency was affixed unto us as our claim, the very sound of which conveys to all men's apprehensions the challenge of an exemption of our churches from all subjection and dependence, or rather a trumpet of defiance against whatever power, spiritual or civil, which we do abhor and detest." In the Westminster Assembly, the Independents, known as "dissenting brethren," were represented by not more than eight or ten members, whose influence was still more weakened by internal dissensions, one half of them holding to the tenets of the Brownists, and the other to the still more democratic dogmas of the German Erastians. But the latter, after a short while, were either crushed, or went over into the ranks of the disciples of Robert Brown; while from among the small but vigorous knot of "dissenting brethren," there came forth an enthusiastic chief, Thomas Goodwin. He was joined soon after by another champion of the same faith, John Owen, and thus arose, in the words of Anthony à Wood, "the two Atlases and patriarchs of Independency."

Owing in part to superior leadership, and in part to the fact of the new religious and political party being joined by nearly all the eminent soldiers of the civil war, Oliver Cromwell at the head of them, Independency soon developed itself in the most extraordinary manner. In the Long Parliament at first not a single voice pleaded its cause, but it rose into favour in a very short time through the well-timed opposition which the "dissenting brethren" of the Westminster Assembly made to the Presbyterian majority. "It is inconvenient," one of them, Philip Nye, frankly told his ambitious colleagues, "to nourish high ecclesiastical authority in a Commonwealth; it is a thing not to be endured. Men are already troubled to think whether a presbytery shall be set up jure divino; and no wonder, for if it be, it will grow so as to become as big as the civil power. When two vast bodies are of equal amplitude, if they disagree it will be naught, but if they agree it will be worse." Opinions such as these were too much in harmony with those of the great parliamentary leaders not to attract immediate attention; and on the Presbyterian divines making some efforts to rid themselves of their Independent adversaries in the Assembly, the latter found immediate protectors in the House of Commons, and even among the lords. Glad to find a pretext for interfering in the doings of their ecclesiastic rivals, the two houses, in September 1644, passed a bill for the formation of a "Grand Committee of Accommodation," to consist of a few divines, but more laymen, directed "to take into consideration the differences of the opinions of the members of the Assembly in point of Church government, and to attempt an union, if possible." The chiefs of the Independents were the first to be called before the "Grand Committee," and advocated their cause warmly, demanding above everything toleration and liberty of conscience. They agreed, they said, in many points with the Presbyterians; and all they prayed for was, that they might not be forced into subjection to them, and be placed under the jurisdiction of ministers and elders whose authority to rule men's faith they could no more admit than that claimed by Romish cardinals and Anglican bishops. On this account they claimed to be exempted from the Presbyterian courts, or "classes," which it was proposed to erect in every parish, and to have liberty granted to them to withdraw from the established churches, and to form congregational churches possessing ecclesiastical authority within themselves, and subject only to parliament. The majority of the Westminster Assembly energetically opposed these demands, insisting upon conformity to the creed they advocated, and claiming the assistance of the government to suppress all schism. "After lengthened discussion, often violent, before the 'Grand Committee,' the latter dissolved itself, whereupon the House of Commons quietly dropped the matter, abstaining from further religious legislation. Thus Presbyterians and Independents were left to continue their own battle, unhindered by the arm of secular power.

The battle, fought on the field of politics as much as on that of religion, lasted but a comparatively short time, won, almost by storm, by the Independents. Though numerically small, they had the inestimable advantages of a great cause and of leaders equal to it, against which no opposing elements could hope to prevail. Before even monarchy had finally succumbed, and while yet Presbyterianism was engaged in a great attempt to raise itself with a throne on its luck, Oliver Cromwell joined the Independents, bringing with him not only the power of a great name, but the proof that the concentrated intelligence of the nation, represented in men such as his Ironsides, under the tramp of whose feet an old world had fallen into dust and a new one arisen, were partisans and champions of the latest phase of Protestantism. And if Cromwell's accession showed that thinking England was with Independency, not less so did that of a man equal to him, if not superior in mental stature, John Milton. Cromwell did scarcely more with his victorious sword, than Milton with his inspired pen, for the new cause. In 1644, while the tide of both popular sympathy and political power seemed to run strongly in favour of Presbyterianism, Milton, from his little house in Barbican, where he taught tradesmen's children Latin and arithmetic, launched forth a treatise, called "Areopagitica, a speech to the parliament of England for the liberty of unlicensed printing." The main object of the work was to advocate freedom of the press, but this itself Milton represented as but one small offshoot of freedom of conscience. "If," said he, "it came to inquisitioning again, and licensing, and that we are so timorous of ourselves, and suspicious of all men, as to fear each book, and the shaking of every leaf, before we know what the contents are—if some, who but of late were little better than silenced from preaching, shall now come to silence us from readings, except what they please—it cannot be guessed what is intended by some but a second tyranny over learning, which will soon put it out of controversy that bishops and presbyters are the same to us, both in name and thing." The words made deep impression, for already all the reflecting men of the nation had come to be afraid of the rise of a new form of spiritual despotism, and Milton's note of alarm, therefore, stirred up the host of defenders of advanced Protestantism. The city of London, though devoted more than any other place in England to the Presbyterian cause, made a show of opposition against it; and on parliament passing, in 1646, a bill for the establishment of a presbytery among them, the inhabitants brought a numerous signed petition against it. In other parts of the kingdom the resistance was greater still, leading to the Presbyterian establishment never getting into actual existence. Its soul, the simple faith of Calvin and Knox, continued to expand and flourish, but its body, the rigid kirk system, was rejected by the people of England.

With the casting out of the Presbyterians from the House of Commons, and the establishment of "the Rump," came the final victory of Independency over all its enemies. But like every great victory it contained within itself the germ of defeat and decay. As remarked by a great writer, "The general fate of sects is to obtain a high reputation for sanctity while they are oppressed, and to lose it as soon as they become powerful: and the reason is obvious. It is seldom that a man enrolls himself in a proscribed body from any but conscientious motives. Such a body, therefore, is composed, with scarcely an exception, of sincere persons. The most rigid discipline that can be enforced within a religious society is a very feeble instrument of purification when compared with a little sharp prosecution from without. We may be certain that very few persons not seriously impressed by religious convictions applied for baptism while Diocletian was vexing the church, or joined themselves to Protestant congregations at the risk of being burned by Bonner. But when a sect becomes powerful, when its favour is the road to riches and dignities, worldly and ambitious men crowd into it, talk its language, conform strictly to its ritual, mimic its peculiarities, and frequently go beyond its honest members in all the outward indications of zeal. No discernment, no watchfulness on the part of ecclesiastical rulers, can prevent the intrusion of such false brethren. The tares and the wheat must grow together. Soon the world begins to find out that the godly are not better than other men, and argues, with some justice, that, if not better, they must be much worse. In no long time all those signs which were formerly regarded as characteristic of a saint are regarded as characteristic of a knave." Thus it was, as with all religious sects, so with the Independents. From the moment they had raised themselves to be a powerful party, yielding sceptre and sword, corruption crept in among the body, and no longer satisfied with that free exercise of religion towards which all their former endeavours had been directed, they claimed to be masters in all things. Cromwell, far above, here as in everything else, of the men of his faction, long withstood the pressure put upon him to make the Independent creed as dominant as Episcopacy had been, and as Presbyterianism aimed to be.

But it was in vain he kept repeating to them that he considered his authority in the nation but as that of a constable, whose duty it was to maintain peace and quietness among all classes and individuals, and to set not one above the other. However, his supporters and friends, or, in some instances, enemies in the guise of friends, continued storming in upon Cromwell, till at last, in their weariness of heart, a few months before his death, he gave his reluctant assent to one of their demands, that of holding a synod, in order to prepare a new Confession of Faith in the Independent sense. The permission was given in the summer of 1658, and on the 29th of September following, three weeks after the great Lord Protector had gone to his eternal rest, while his waxen effigy was lying exposed to the public gaze at Somerset House, the Independent synod met at the neighbouring palace of the Savoy.

There were represented in the synod above one hundred congregations, some of them by ministers, but the majority by lay delegates. These did not represent, however, the total strength of the Independent Church, for a great many congregations throughout England had refused to take part in the synod, arguing, with great justice and incontrovertible logic, that such an assembly had no right to exist, being opposed to the fundamental principle of their belief, that of absolutely free and unfettered Christian worship. The first step of the synod was to appoint a committee, headed by the two great leaders of the Independents, John Owen and Thomas Goodwin, to draw up a statement of their principles, which was accomplished in little more than a week, and resulted in the publication of a document entitled, "A Declaration of the Faith and Order owned and practised in the Congregational Churches in England, agreed upon and consented to by their elders and messengers, in their meeting at the Savoy, October 12, 1658." Though not entirely in accord with the first principles of Independency, the manifesto was imbued throughout with a fine spirit of forbearance, containing at least an approach towards the great doctrine of absolute freedom of conscience and religious toleration. It was declared in the preface, supposed to be written by John Owen, "that among all Christian states and churches there ought to be a mutual forbearance and indulgence to saints of all persuasions that hold fast the necessary foundations of faith and holiness," and also, "that, all professing Christians, with their errors, which are purely spiritual, and entrench and overthrow not civil society, are to be borne with, and permitted to enjoy ordinances and privileges according to their light, as fully as any of their brethren who pretend to the greatest orthodoxy." As to the organisation of Independent, or Congregational churches, it was affirmed that the only office-bearers should be pastors, leaders, elders, and deacons: synodical authority was disclaimed in the abstract, but the association of the various churches for general purposes and mutual counsel was strongly recommended. The "Declaration of the Faith" was delivered to Richard Cromwell, on behalf of the synod, by Goodwin. "We present to your Highness what we have done," said the leader of the Independents, "and commit to your trust the common faith once delivered to the saints. The Gospel and the saving truths of it are a great endowment, bequeathed by Christ himself at his ascension, and committed to the trust of some in the nation's behalf—committed to my trust, saith Paul, in the name of the ministers—and we look at the magistrate as custos utriusque tabulae, and so commit it to your trust, as our chief magistrate, to countenance and to propagate."

The "patriarch of Independency," when uttering these words, greatly misunderstood his time. Independency, as a power in the state, ruling and swaying men's minds by secular authority, was dead, and it was beyond the influence of any chief magistrate to countenance and to propagate it. But Episcopacy and Presbyterianism were likewise dead, and already the waves of a new tide of humanity were closing in upon the ground which they had filled. From out the tumult and conflict of opinions, dogmas, and principles, all striving towards the sun of truth, yet all obscuring it by the mists of intolerance, there was springing, gradually but surely, the substance of a higher faith, farther from churches but nearer to God.

SEAL OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

CHAPTER IV.

History of Literature, Science, and Art, from the Accession of James I., A.D. 1603, to the Dissolution of the Commonwealth, A.D. 1660.

TIMES of civil war and deep social convulsions are seldom periods in which writers, men of science, and artists, can hope to flourish; nevertheless, England has no brighter period in the annals of her literature, and all that constitutes the higher development of the spiritual faculties, than the first half of the seventeenth century. No nation of whom record is had in history ever produced and gave to the world at the same epoch three names loftier in the realms of the mind than the noble triumvirate of Shakespeare, Bacon, and Milton. The greatest poet of all ages, and the greatest philosopher of English race, expired within a decade of each other, and eight years before Shakespeare, eighteen before Bacon died, Milton was born. Shakespeare wrote nearly the whole of his most sublime dramas—as far as has been discovered through the obscurity that surrounds everything connected with his meteor-like existence—after the accession of the Stuarts to the English throne; Bacon's chief career as author and philosopher fell entirely within the same period; and Milton commenced his "Paradise Lost" before the edifice of the Commonwealth had crumbled into dust. If England could lay claim to nothing else than to have been the mother of these three men within a generation, she would, on this ground alone, have a right to stand foremost among the nations of the earth.

However weak and contemptible in other respects, the two successors of Elizabeth both imitated her in fostering literature in its various forms, though more for the gratification of their own vanity than for any higher purpose. Long before his coming to England, King James exhibited great partiality for dramatic performances, and as early as the year 1589 there was a company of actors, known as "his majesty's players," at the Scottish court. Ten years later the king licensed a company of comedians at Edinburgh, amidst the outcries of the stern Presbyterian ministers, who compelled the poor actors, when James made his way southward to his higher destination, to follow him on the road. To judge from the various accounts of the revels, the dramas of "Master William Shakespeare" were in high estimation at the new English court. From November, 1604, to March, 1605, not less than six of them were played before the king at Whitehall; and it is reported that James, in token of his admiration of the author, had the boundless condescension to write to him a letter "with his own hand." The poet requited the courtesy, as is surmised, in a manner as only he could requite it, by the gorgeous picture of the line of Stuart kings in the vision of "Macbeth:"—

"Why do you show me this?—A fourth?—Start, eyes!
 What! Will the line stretch out to the crack of doom?
 Another yet?—A seventh?—I'll see no more!
 And yet the eighth appears, who bears a glass
 Which shows me many more. And some I see That twofold balls and treble sceptres carry."

But the grandeur of poetry such as this was rather thrown away upon the British Solomon; and there is reason to believe that not long after heaping the unmeasurable honour upon the poet's head, of sending him an autograph letter, he was very near casting him into prison for daringly presuming to play the part of a king on the stage. Certain it is that Shakespeare did not remain in London for more than three years after the accession of James, preferring the silence of the banks of the Avon to the neighbourhood of a court and the worship of a monarch who could not be pleased without degradation, and not be offended without danger.

SHAKESPEARE'S CHAIR.

While the dramatic works of Shakespeare have become the household property, not only of all the English-speaking races, but of the nations of the civilised globe, another class of his productions, the sonnets and small lyrical poems, remained comparatively unknown until modern times. The sonnets of Shakespeare, one hundred and fifty-four in number, were first printed in 1609, by Thomas Thorpe, a bookseller, who prefixed to the volume he issued a dedication of the most enigmatical character. It ran: "To the only begetter of these ensuing sonnets, Mr. W. H., all happiness, and that eternity promised by our ever-living poet, wisheth the well-wishing adventurer in setting forth. T. T." Endless conjectures have been made as to the person thus immortalised under the initials of "Mr. W. H.," but nothing approaching to certainty; or even high probability, has ever been discovered, though there is little doubt that the poet's own life was reflected in most, if not all of them. Like everything else that flowed from the pen of the "bard of Avon," the sonnets are full of sublime beauty, as may be seen from the following specimens:—

"When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
 I summon up remembrance of things past,
 I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
 And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste;

"Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow,
For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
And weep afresh love's long-since-cancell'd woe,
And moan the expense of many a vanish'd sight.

"Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er
The sad account of fore-bemoaned moan,

"Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restored, and sorrows end."

"Oh how much more doth beauty beauteous seem,
By that sweet ornament which truth doth give!
The rose looks fair, but fairer we it deem
For that sweet odour which doth in it live."

"The canker-blooms have full as deep a dye,
As the perfumed tincture of the rose,
Hang on such thorns, and play as wantonly
When summer's breath their masked buds discloses;

"But, for their virtue only is their show,
They live unwood'd and unrespected fade;
Die to themselves. Sweet roses do not so;

"Of their sweet deaths are sweetest odours made;
And so of you, beauteous and lovely youth,
When that shall fade, my verse distils your truth."

"No longer mourn for me when I am dead,
Than you shall hear the surly sullen bell
Give warning to the world, that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell!

"Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it: for I love you so,
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.

"O if (I say) you look upon this verse,
When I perhaps compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse;

"But let your love even with my life decay;
Lest the wise world should look into your moan,
And mock you with me after I am gone."

"Then hate me when thou wilt; if ever, now;
Now while the world is bent my deeds to cross,
Join with the spite of fortune, make me bow,
And do not drop in for an after-loss;

"Ah! do not, when my heart bath' scaped this sorrow,
Come in the rearward of a conquer'd woe;

"Give not a windy night a rainy morrow,
To linger out a purposed overthrow.

"If thou wilt leave me, do not leave me last,
When other petty griefs have done their spite,
But in the onset come; so shall I taste
At first the very worst of Fortune's might;

"And other strains of woe, which now seem woe, Compared with loss of thee, will not seem so."

In the smaller lyrics of Shakespeare, one of the most remarkable features is the smoothness of verse, as in the song in "Much Ado About Nothing:"—

"Sigh no more, ladies, sigh no more;
Men were deceivers ever;

One foot in sea, and one on shore,
To one thing constant never:

Then sigh not so,
But let them go,

And be you blithe and bonny:
Converting all your sounds of woe
Into, Hey nonny, nonny.

"Sing no more ditties, sing no more Of dumps so dull and heavy;

"The fraud of men was ever so,
Since summer first was leafty.
Then sigh not so," &c.

Charmingly easy and soft-flowing likewise are the verses in "As You Like It:"—

"Under the green-wood tree
Who loves to lie with me,
And tune his merry note
Unto the sweet bird's throat.
Come hither, come hither, come hither;
Here shall he see
No enemy
But winter and rough weather.

"Who doth ambition shun,
And loves to live i' the sun;
Seeking the food he eats,
And pleas'd with what he gets,
Come hither, come hither," &c.

The second in the august triumvirate of English writers and thinkers, Francis Bacon, brought forth the greatest of his works a few years after Shakespeare had been laid in the grave. In 1620 he gave to the world his stupendous system of philosophy called the "Novum Organum," continuation of a previous publication entitled, "Instauratio Scientiarum," or the "Instauratio of the Sciences. In the preface to the "Novum Organum," which was dedicated to King James, Bacon stated that he had been engaged for thirty years upon the work, "so as I made no haste," adding, "and the reason that I have published it now, specially being imperfect, is, to speak plainly, because I number my days, and would have it saved." The leading idea of Bacon's philosophy is expressed in the first chapter of the book, in which he says, "Man, who is the servant and interpreter of nature, can act and understand no farther than he has, either in operation or in contemplation, observed of the method and order of nature." Then, alluding to the scant aid which the useful arts had yet derived from science, and the small improvement which science had received from its practical students, he continues: "But whence can arise such vagueness and sterility in all the physical systems which have hitherto existed in the world? It is not certainly from anything in nature itself, for the steadiness and regularity of the laws by which it is governed clearly mark them out as objects of certain and precise knowledge. Neither can it arise from any want of ability in those who have pursued such inquiries, many of whom have been men of the highest talent and genius in the ages in which they lived; and it can therefore arise from nothing else but the perverseness and insufficiency of the methods that have been pursued. Men have sought to make a world from their own conceptions, and to draw from their own minds all the materials which they employed; but if, instead of doing so, they had consulted experience and observation, they would have had facts, and not opinions, to reason about, and might have ultimately arrived at the knowledge of the laws which govern the material world." In describing the causes which are apt to lead reason astray in the search after knowledge, Bacon dwells, with a rare insight into the workings of the mind, upon the vast structures of prejudice heaped up by successive ages, which, without figurativeness, he denominates "idols;" and then goes on to expound and exemplify his own method of philosophical inquiry, bound up in the precept, "to generalize slowly, going from particular things to those which are but one step more general, from those to others of still greater extent, and so on 'to such as are universal." The achievements of Bacon are lucidly summarized by Henry Hallam. "This wonderful man," he says, "in sweeping round the champaign of universal science with his powerful genius, found as little to praise in the recent as in the ancient methods of investigating truth. He liked as little the empirical presumption of drawing conclusions from a partial experience, as the sophistical dogmatism which relied on unwarranted axioms and verbal chicanery. All, he thought, was to be constructed anew; the investigation of facts, their arrangement for the purposes of inquiry, and the process of eliciting from them the required truth. And for this he saw that, above all, a thorough purgation of the mind itself would be necessary, by pointing out its familiar errors, their sources, and their remedies."

Among the smaller works of Bacon, his "Essays" met, during his lifetime, as well as subsequently, with the greatest popularity. They are the small coin of the great philosopher's mind, or in his own words, they "come home to men's business and bosoms, for, like the late new halfpence, the pieces are small and the silver is good." One of the noblest of these essays is that bearing the number sixteen, and entitled "Of Atheism." "I had rather believe," it begins, "all the fables in the legend, and the Talmud, and the Alcoran, than that this universal frame is without a mind; and, therefore, God never wrought miracle to convince atheism, because his ordinary works convince it. It is true, that a little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion; for while the mind of man looketh upon second causes scattered, it may sometimes rest in them, and go no further; but when it beholdeth the chain of them confederate, and linked together, it must needs fly to Providence and Deity: nay, even that school which is most accused of atheism doth most demonstrate religion, that is, the school of Leucippus, and Democritus, and Epicurus; for it is a thousand times more credible that four mutable elements, and one immutable fifth essence, duly and eternally placed, need no God, than that an army of infinite small portions, or seeds unplaced, should have produced this order and beauty without a divine marshal. The Scripture saith, 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God;' it is not said, 'The fool hath thought in his heart;' so as he rather saith it by rote to himself, as that he would have, than that he can thoroughly believe it, or be persuaded of it; for none deny there is a God, but those for whom it maketh that there were no God. It appeareth in nothing more, that atheism is rather in the lip than in the heart of man, than by this, that atheists will ever be talking of that their opinion, as if they fainted in it within themselves, and would be glad to be strengthened by the consent of others; nay more, you shall have atheists strive to get disciples, as it fareth with other sects; and, which is most of all, you shall have of them that will suffer for atheism, and not recant; whereas, if they did truly think that there were no such thing as God, why should they trouble themselves? Epicurus is charged, that he did but dissemble for his credit's sake, when he affirmed there were blessed natures, but such as enjoyed themselves without having respect to the government of the world; wherein they say he did temporize, though in secret he thought there was no God; but certainly he is traduced, for his words are noble and divine: "Non Deos vulgi negare profanum; sed vulgi opiniones Diis applicare profanum." Plato could have said no more; and although he had the confidence to deny the administration, he had not the power to deny the nature. The Indians of the west have names for their particular gods, though they have no name for God; as if the heathens should have had the names Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, &c., but not the word Deus, which shows that even those barbarous people have the notion, though they have not the latitude and extent of it; so that against atheists the very savages take part with the very subtlest philosophers."

Inferior in wealth of imagination and command of expression to Shakespeare, and below Bacon in range of thought and power of analysis, yet still an author and a thinker of the first magnitude, towering high on his own pedestal of glory, stands the author of "Paradise Lost." John Milton, greatest of English poets, by universal admission, next to Shakespeare, was born in the city of London, on the 9th of December, 1608, the son of a scrivener, or notary. Of his earliest education, Milton himself says, in one of his treatises, called "the Reason of Church Government," published in 1641, "I had from my first years, by the ceaseless diligence and care of my father, whom God recompense, been exercised to the tongues and some sciences, as my age would suffer, by sundry masters and teachers, both at home and in the schools." In 1625, when little more than sixteen, the poet went to Cambridge, where, as he records, "for seven years I studied the learning and arts wont to be taught, far from all vice, and approved by all good men, even till having taken what they call the master's degree, and that with praise, I went home." His original intention had been to enter the church, but he now changed his mind, and devoting himself to literature,

MILTON'S HOUSE AT HORTON

he went to live for the next five years with his father, who had given up his city business, and taken a house in the quiet little village of Horton, in Buckinghamshire. "At my father's country residence,"

Milton goes on to relate, "whither he had retired in his old age, I, with every advantage of leisure, spent a complete holiday in turning over the Greek and Latin writers; not but that sometimes I exchanged the country for the town, either for the purpose of buying books, or for that of learning something new in mathematics and in music, in which sciences I then delighted." It was during this time he produced, among other compositions, his descriptive poems of "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso," his "Arcades" and his "Comus." In the spring of 1637 Milton lost his mother, and in the summer of the same year one of his most intimate friends, who was drowned off the coast of Wales, both which events affected him so much, that to get change for his grief he set off on a tour over the continent of Europe, chiefly through Italy, where he remained for more than a year. Returning home, the poet, whose means by this time had probably been very much reduced, he having never yet earned the least income for himself, took lodgings "in St. Bride's churchyard, near Fleet Street," and there set up a small school, which he removed soon after to a house in Barbican. He now began to take the most active interest in politics, writing pamphlets and larger works, all of the most decided republican character. In 1647, with diminished resources, having lost his aged father and taken unto himself a wife, Milton removed to a smaller dwelling, situate in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Still keeping up his little school, he henceforth threw himself more and more into the national struggle, going so far in his zeal as to advocate the execution of the king. While Charles stood before his judges at Westminster, Milton issued a pamphlet, which rang far and wide through the land, entitled "Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, proving that it is lawful, and hath been held so through all ages, for any who have the power, to call to account a tyrant, or wicked king, and, after due conviction, to depose and put him to death."

One of the first acts of Cromwell, after the execution of Charles, and complete remodelling of the government, was to draw Milton, with whom he had long been in friendly intercourse, nearer to his person, by appointing him foreign secretary to the Commonwealth. However, the duties of the office, involving correspondence with all the great powers of Europe, were not long carried on by the poet; and after having had a colleague put at his side, who did the chief work, he retired on a pension. For ten years Milton's sight had been gradually declining, owing, as he touchingly expressed it, to many "wearisome studies and midnight watchings," and by the close of the year 1652 it totally failed, the world before his eyes becoming "dark, dark, irrevocably dark." The blindness was brought on more immediately by the composition of a noble work upholding England's right for freedom, written in reply to a publication in the contrary sense by a Frenchman, named Claude de Saumaise, or, as he called himself, Claudius Salmasius. Though fully informed of the danger he was incurring in continuing his "midnight watchings," he resolved to make the sacrifice, and did not regret living in everlasting night when once he had given to the world his "Defensio pro populo Anglicano contra Claudii Salmasii defensionem regiam." Almost simultaneously with getting blind, he lost his wife, and enshrined her memory in one of his exalted sonnets.

"Methought I saw my late espoused saint
Brought to me, like Alceste, from the grave;
Whom Jove's great son to her glad husband gave,
Rescued from death by force, though pale and faint.
"Mine, as whom wash'd from spot of child-bed taint, Purification in the bld law did save;
And such as yet once more I trust to have Full sight of her in heaven without restraint—
"Came vested all in white, pure as her mind,
Her face was veiled, yet to my fancied sight
Love, goodness, sweetness, in her person shin'd
"So clear as in no face with more delight.
But, ah! as to embrace me she couldn't,
I wak'd, she fled, and day brought back my night."

The sublime work, which placed Milton's name foremost in the list of the greatest poets of all ages, his "Paradise Lost," was not commenced by him till the year of the death of Oliver Cromwell, and not published till 1665. Like many another noble production of the mind that was given to the world before and after his time, the book-dealing people could not appreciate it, and all that he received for a work that cost him seven years of actual labour, and a whole lifetime of thought, was the miserable pittance of five pounds. The shopkeeper who paid this sum, and whose name went down to posterity as the "publisher" of the greatest epic poem in the English language, was one Samuel Simmons. With a greed and unscrupulousness not characteristic of the trade he represented, the man stipulated that Milton should have five pounds more at the sale of the first edition of fifteen hundred copies, and the like sum for the second, third, and every successive issue of the same number. Two editions altogether went off during the poet's lifetime, and his widow sold all further claims to keen Mr. Samuel Simmons for the sum of eight pounds.

Of the earlier poems of Milton, produced before he was afflicted with blindness, his "Allegro" and "Penseroso" met with the greatest popularity. "The choice of images," it is well said of them by Hallam, "is so judicious, their succession so rapid, the allusions are so various and pleasing, the leading distinction of the poems is so felicitously maintained, and the versification is so animated, that we may place them at the head of that long series of descriptive poems which our language has to boast." A still higher praise is awarded by the most eminent judges to some of Milton's odes, in particular to the "Hymn on the Nativity," written when he was in his twenty-first year, a student at Cambridge. It begins:—

"It was the winter wild,
While the heaven-born child
All meanly wrapt in the rude manger lies;
Nature, in awe to him,
Had doff'd her gaudy trim,
With her great Master so to sympathise:
It was no season then for her
To wanton with the sun, her lusty paramour.

"Only with speeches fair
She wooes the gentle air,
To hide her guilty front with innocent snow;
And on her naked shame,

Pollute with sinful blame,
The saintly veil of maiden white to throw;
Confounded, that her Maker's eyes
Should look so near upon her foul deformities.

"But he, her fears to cease, Sent down the meek-eyed Peace;
She, crown'd with olive green, came softly sliding Down through the turning sphere,
His ready harbinger,
With turtle wing the amorous clouds dividing;
And, waving wide her myrtle wand,
She strikes a universal peace through sea and land.

"No war or battle's sound,
Was heard the world around:
The idle spear and shield were high up hung;
The hooked chariot stood Unstain'd with hostile blood;
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng;
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sov'reign lord was by.

"But peaceful was the night,
When in the Prince of Light
His reign of peace upon the earth began:
The winds, with wonder whist,
Smoothly the waters kiss'd,
Whispering new joys to the mild Ocean,
Who now hath quite forgot to rave,
While birds of calm sit brooding on the charmed wave.

"The stars, with deep amaze, Stand fix'd in steadfast gaze,
Bending one way their precious influence;
And will not take their flight,
For all the morning light,
Or Lucifer that often warn'd them thence;
But in their glimmering orbs did glow,
Until their Lord himself bespake, and bid them go.

"And, though the shady gloom
Had given day her room,
The sun himself withheld his wonted speed,
And hid his head for shame,
As his inferior flame
The new-enlighten'd world no more should need;
He saw a greater sun appear
Than his bright throne, or burning axletree, could bear.

"The shepherds on the lawn,
Or ere the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they then
That the mighty Pan
Was kindly come to live with them below;
Perhaps their loves, or else their sheep,
Was all that did their silly thoughts so busy keep.

"When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet,
As never was by mortal finger strook,
Divinely-warbled voice
Answering the stringed noise,
As all their souls in blissful rapture took:
The air, such pleasure loath to lose,
With thousand echoes still prolongs each heavenly close.

"Such music, as 'tis said,
Before was never made,
But when of old the sons of morning sung,
While the Creator great
His constellations set,
And the well-balanc'd world on hinges hung,
And cast the dark foundations deep,
And bid the weltering waves their oozy channel keep.

"Ring out, ye crystal spheres,
Once bless our human ears,
If ye have power to touch our senses so:
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
And let the base of Heaven's deep organ blow:
And, with your ninefold harmony,
Make up full concert to the angelic symphony.

"For, if such holy song
Enwrap our fancy long,
Time will run back, and fetch the age of gold;
And speckled Vanity
Will sicken soon and die,
And leprous Sin will melt from earthly mould;
And Hell itself will pass away,
And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.

"Yea, Truth and Justice then,
Will down return to men,
Orb'd in a rainbow; and, like glories wearing,
Mercy will sit between,
Thron'd in celestial sheen,
With radiant feet the tissued clouds down steering,
And Heaven, as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace hall."

According to the mature judgment of Hallam, the "Hymn on the Nativity" is the "finest ode in the English language." "A grandeur," he adds, "a simplicity, a breadth of manner, an imagination at once elevated and restrained by the subject, reign throughout it." Of Milton's poems, in general, the same critic remarks, that "they are sustained at an uniform pitch, with few blemishes of expression and scarce any feebleness, forming a striking contrast, in this respect, to all the contemporaneous poetry, except perhaps that of Waller."

Among the minor writers of the age, the last-named poet holds a high position. Edmund Waller, born at Colebrook, in Hertfordshire, in 1605, the son of a gentleman of fortune, was first cousin to John Hampden, and a near relative therefore of Cromwell, which family connection resulted in drawing him into political life at an early age. He was elected a representative to parliament for the borough of Agincotesham before he was seventeen years old, and at first, very naturally, was somewhat undecided in his views, claiming to be a great friend of national freedom, yet at the same time feeling himself powerfully drawn towards the attractions of court life, and the gifts and honours at the disposal of a smiling king, always ready to honour merit when allied to good blood." Waller continued a member of the House of Commons throughout the reign of Charles I., and when the Long Parliament came to be summoned, had so far identified himself with the popular party, that he was appointed by the majority to conduct the prosecution against one of the judges who had espoused the cause of despotism in the great ship-money trial. At the breaking out of the civil war he played a very dubious part between Roundheads and Cavaliers, assisting the former with his speeches and the latter with his purse; and having been sent as a parliamentary commissioner to treat with Charles at Oxford, he suffered himself to be won over by the king to engage in a scheme for his restoration, which had all the appearances of a conspiracy. It was discovered before long, and Waller, placed before a military tribunal, was condemned to death; but through the influence of his friends the sentence was commuted to banishment for life, and payment of a fine of ten thousand pounds. After wandering about some time in the south of France and Switzerland, he settled at Paris, where he soon became noted for the splendour of his establishment, which became the resort of the wits and courtiers of the gay capital. He, in the meanwhile, was full of activity as a poet; but his verses brought him no money, the Samuel Simmonses of the day esteeming them even less valuable than the productions of Milton. Having spent nearly the whole of his fortune, he sought and obtained permission to return to England; and in the spring of 1652 found an asylum in the secluded house of his mother, at Harnstall, near Beaconsfield, Buckinghamshire. To make amends for the past, the poet, while here, addressed a panegyric to the Lord Protector, considered by some the best of all his compositions. The first three verses of the address ran:—

"While with a strong and yet a gentle hand
You bridle faction, and our hearts command,
Protect us from ourselves, and from the foe,
Make us unite, and make us conquer too.

"Let partial spirits still aloud complain,
Think themselves injur'd that they cannot reign,
And own no liberty, but where they may Without control upon their fellows prey.

"Above the waves, as Neptune show'd his face,
To chide the winds, and save the Trojan race;
So has your Highness, raised above the rest,
Storms of ambition tossing us repress'd."

Flattering as were the verses, there was no sincerity in them. When the Commonwealth had perished, Waller was quite as ready to pay court to Charles II. as he had been to fawn upon Oliver Cromwell; and little more than a year after bewailing, in smooth rhymes, "The death of the Lord Protector," he went forth to congratulate "the king upon his majesty's happy return." This want of principle little affected the fame of Waller among his contemporaries, who looked upon him less as a politician than as the "maker and model of melodious verse." His lyrics in particular were considered as "model," and a little poem "On Love" achieved immense popularity. It may serve as a fair specimen of the higher class of what has often been designated as the "Cavalier poetry" of the age, counterpart in all respects of the lofty Puritan muse which found its chief representative in Milton.

"Anger, in hasty words or blows,
Itself discharges on our foes;
And sorrow, too, finds some relief
In tears, which wait upon our grief:
So ev'ry passion, but fond love,
Unto its own redress does move;
But that alone the wretch inclines
To what prevents his own designs;
Makes him lament, and sigh, and weep,
Disorder'd, tremble, fawn, and creep;
Postures which render him despid,
Where he endeavours to be priz'd.
For women, born to be controll'd,
Stoop to the forward and the bold;
Affect the haughty and the proud,
The gay, the frolic, and the loud.
Who first the generous steed oppress,
Not kneeling did salute the beast;
But with high courage, life, and force, Approaching, tam'd th' unruly horse."

The "Cavalier poetry" was, not, however, always soft and amorous, but could get ferocious at times, as in the famous "March of David Lesley," given in Hogg's "Jacobite Relics of Scotland," a striking piece of Royalist literature. It is a powerful expression of the combined hatred and contempt of Charles's noble adherents for the humble defenders of the Covenant.

"March, march, pinks of election!
Why the devil don't you march onward in order?
March, march, dogs of redemption,
Ere the blue bonnets come over the border.
You shall preach, you shall pray,
You shall teach night and day,
You shall prevail o'er the kirk gone a whoring.
Dance in blood to the knees,
Blood of God's enemies!
The daughters of Scotland shall sing you to suoring."

Theology and moral philosophy naturally formed a prominent feature in the literary activity of the period. Nevertheless, no greatly distinguished writers, specially devoted to these subjects, appeared in either branch, and the field was left, more or less, to third and fourth-rate authors. Among the most noted of these was Jeremy Taylor, who, while making himself the champion of fallen royalty and episcopacy during the Commonwealth, was nevertheless a warm advocate for tolerance, the cause of which he argued eloquently in his "Liberty of Prophesying," published in 1647. The work was composed, as he himself relates, "in adversity and want, without books or leisure," but it had the effect of bringing him a wife of some means, in a lady passing for the illegitimate daughter of King Charles. Soon after Taylor published a "Life of Christ," which became very popular, and was followed by several works on devotion, including two tracts called "Holy Living" and "Holy Dying," containing much asceticism, but fervent in spirit and noble in aspiration, and overflowing with human sympathy. Another writer, distinguished for his works on practical piety, was

EXETER CATHEDRAL.

Joseph Hall, bishop, successively, of Exeter and Norwich, whose "Art of Divine Meditation" and "Contemplations" very much resemble the publications of Jeremy Taylor, in florid style and fertility of illustration, as well as in profuse exhibition of learning. Both authors achieved great renown among their contemporaries, but the fame of their writings was utterly dimmed and obscured by that of a single book published in the year 1649, a few days after the execution of Charles I., under the title of "Eikon Basilike; or the Portraiture of his most sacred Majesty in his Solitude and Suffering." It consisted of a series of prayers and meditations, in somewhat theatrical style, purporting to have been drawn up by the late king, upon the leading troubles of his reign. The royal authorship being universally believed in, the work was eagerly perused by the multitude, to the extent of passing through no less than fifty editions in one year. The impression made by it was so great that many ascribed to it the subsequent restoration of the Stuarts, the halo thrown in the "Eikon Basilike" around the memory of "saintly Charles" reflecting upon the very unsaintly brow of his son and successor. A vague rumour was circulated at the time, that the wonderful book had sprung from the brain of one of the leading episcopal divines; but nothing was known of its real origin till towards the year 1680, when the "merry monarch" revealed to some of his boon companions the fact that it was the clever performance of one John Gauden, who had been for some years his chaplain, and whom he had elevated afterwards to the bishopric of Exeter. Subsequent literary discoveries placed the question of Gauden's authorship beyond any manner of doubt, showing, as expressed in his own words, in a letter to Lord Clarendon, that the famous publication was "wholly and solely" his own "invention, making, and design." Nevertheless, there still remained for many generations a vast number of devout persons, adherents of the Stuart dynasty, who strenuously maintained that the pen of him whom they were pleased to call "Charles the Martyr" produced the "Eikon Basilike."

In connexion with all its other wealth of thought and of action, the great revolutionary period gave birth to a new species of literature, very insignificant at first, but destined to assume in progress of time the most gigantic proportions. The reigns of James I. and his successor brought into life the great class of periodical publications, narrators of contemporary history, and social and political guides, known by the general name of newspapers. They sprang out of pamphlets and short printed reports, giving descriptions of events that had happened either in England or abroad, demanded by public curiosity, the result of the growing intelligence of the masses. London printers brought out sheets, such as "Lamentable newes out of Monmouthshire, in Wales, containing the wonderfull and fearfull Account of the great Overflowing of the Waters of the said Countie," bearing date 1607; "Wofull newes from the West partes of England, of the burning of Tiverton," a quarto, with engraving; and "Strange newes from Lancaster, containing an account of a prodigious Monster born in the township of Addlington, in Lancashire, with two Bodies joyned to one back," headed, simply, April 13. In the course of a few years the pamphlets assumed a more definite outward shape, as well as form of contents, while the taste for "Newes" spread from home to foreign affairs. There came out "Newes from

Spaine," 1611; "Newes out of Germany," 1612; "Good Newes from Florence," 1614; "Newes from Gulick and Cleve," 1615; and "Newes from Italy," 1617; besides "Newes from Hull," "Truths from York," "Warranted Tidings from Ireland," and "Special Passages from several Places." The printed sheets were eagerly perused by the multitude, and demand producing supply, they kept on increasing in number, until almost every person of some education got into the habit of looking to them for mental food. It is illustrated in one of the comedies of Ben Jonson, produced in 1625, in which a gentleman is made to say:—

"And here I have my several rolls and files
Of newes by the alphabet; and all put up Under their heads."

By a natural development, on the demand getting more and more settled, the supply became settled too, and before long the irregular news-pamphlet shaped itself into the regular newspaper.

The first publication of a regular series, of which copies have come down to modern times, was one, headed "The Weekly Newes," the oldest known number of which bears the date of May 23, 1622. It changed its title several times, becoming in turn "The Last Newes," "Times Newes," "More Newes," and "The Newes of this present Week," but remaining the same in substance, distinguished throughout as "printed for Nathaniel Butter and William Shefford." Nathaniel Butter, most enterprising of all the "Newes" furnishers of the period, as appears from many accounts, had to overcome no few obstacles in establishing the new form of literature with which his name was connected. Besides the immense difficulty of procuring his reports, at a time when the sources of intelligence were extraordinarily scarce, he had to stand out against the prejudices of public men, and the animosity of most of the authors of the day. Ben Jonson described his customers as "hungering and thirsting after published pamphlets of newes, set out every Saturday, but made all at home, and no syllable of truth in them, than which there cannot be a greater disease in nature, nor scold put up on the time." The great writer was particularly savage against the "Times Newes," which he characterized as "a weekly cheat to draw money" for the benefit of Nathaniel Butter. He next breaks forth:—

"See divers men's opinions! Unto some
The very printing of them makes them newes,
That have not the heart to believe anything
But what they see in print."

An enemy far more dangerous than the poets to poor Nathaniel Butter and his co-operators was the government. No sooner had the little news sheets risen to some degree of importance, when they fell under the special supervision of the executive, and censors, or "licensors," were appointed to prune, and, if necessary, annihilate any flow of literary activity that might hurt the existing order of things. During the first part of the reign of Charles I., up to 1640, these functionaries suppressed everything breathing liberal opinion, even when coming in the shape of foreign news; but on the eve of the assembling of the Long Parliament there took place a welcome change, which Nathaniel Butter notified to his patrons with much cheerfulness. "Courteous reader," he addressed his public, in the number dated January 11, 1640, "we had thought to have given over printing our foreign avisees, for that the licenser would not oftentimes let pass apparent truth, and in other things oftentimes so crosse, and alter, which made us weary of printing; but he being vanished, and that office falling upon another, more understanding in these foraine affairs, and, as you will find, more candid, we are again, by the favour of his majesty and the state, resolved to go on printing, if we shall find the world to give a better acceptation of them than of late, by their weekly buying them." At the breaking out of the civil war the news-sheets increased to an extraordinary degree, the contending factions on either side belabouring each other with hard words at the same time that they were crossing swords. Most of the papers that now arose got the title of "Mercury," a word imported from France, which had its "Mercure d'Etat," "Mercure Suisse," and "Mercure Francois." The great mass of these new periodical publications, especially those issued on the Cavalier side, were of the most scurrilous kind, as expressed in the title of many of them, such as the "Mercurius Rhadamanthus, or chief judge of hell;" the "Mercurius Volpone, or the Fox;" the "Mercurius Diabolicus;" and the "Mercurius Insanus Insanissimus." With the return of more settled times, it became the necessary duty of government to stop this flood of low literature, and accordingly, in the autumn of 1647, the lords passed an ordinance prohibiting any person from "making, writing, printing, selling, publishing, &c., any book, sheet, or sheets of news, whatever, except the same be licensed by both or either house of parliament, with the name of author, printer, and licenser affixed." The penalty imposed upon non-compliance with this law was forty shillings for each contravention on the writer, and twenty on the printer, and these being sum far above the capital owned by the distributors of intelligence, the crowd of the "Mercuries" died a natural death.

The scientific progress of the age which saw Milton born and Shakespeare die was marked by two great events, the discovery of the circulation of the blood, by Dr. Harvey, and the invention of logarithms, by Lord Napier. William Harvey, a native of Folkestone, Kent, where he was born in 1578, was one of those notable men, few in each century, who strike out new paths for the human mind, overthrowing ancient prejudices, and shedding light where all was darkness before. It is remarked by one of his biographers, with as much truth as depth and insight, that "in relation to the physics of animal bodies Harvey stands precisely in the same position as does Copernicus to the physics of the solar system: each of these great men in his own sphere gave the first rude shock to prescription and authority, and kindled the torch that has since lighted science on her way in developing the system of the universe, and in eliciting the laws of life and organization." At the time Harvey educated himself for his profession, England was far behind Italy and France in the practice of medicine, not possessing even a school for students, so that the young native of Folkestone, eager in his search after knowledge, had to turn his steps to ancient Padua, where professors of world-wide fame taught all the mysteries of the art. Returning from thence, after a stay of five years, Harvey settled in London, and in 1609 was appointed physician to St. Bartholomew's hospital. Six years after, in 1615, he was chosen lecturer on anatomy and surgery to the college of physicians, and he then, for the first time, began to give oral expositions of his new views of the action of the heart and the circular motion of the blood through all parts of the animal body. Till this time, the liver was regarded as the origin of the veins, which alone were believed to be the real blood-vessels; while the heart was looked upon as a sort of cistern, ejecting and taking blood by expiration and inspiration, and the arteries were regarded as channels for air, or "vital spirits," which, if containing blood, held it improperly, in accidental mixture. After lecturing on his great discovery for more than ten years, meeting with far more sceptics than believers, he published it to the world in a treatise called "Exercitationes de motu Cordis et Sanguinis," printed at Frankfurt in 1628. The book was dedicated to King Charles, whose chief physician Harvey had been for some years, and he is stated to have taken such an interest in the subject, as to engage personally in anatomical studies. Charles also furnished Harvey from the royal parks with the does he required in the observations he was pursuing upon another great subject, that of generation, and otherwise liberally assisted him in his investigations. Full of gratitude, the medical philosopher attached himself warmly to the king at the breaking out of the civil war, and was present at the battle of Edgehill. "During the fight," says the old chronicler and antiquarian, John Aubrey, "the prince [of Wales] and the Duke of York were committed to his care. He withdrew with them under a hedge and read; but he had not read very long, before a bullet of a great gun fell on the ground near him, which made him remove his station." The grand struggle in which all England was engaged did not withdraw Harvey from his studies, and in the very midst of the surging hosts of Cavaliers and Roundheads he kept on making scientific experiments. He followed the king to Oxford, taking care as before of the royal offspring, but at the same time, as witnessed by Aubrey, "he had a hen set upon eggs for the study of generation." The result of these researches appeared in a great work, summed up in its contents in the epigraph, "Omne animal ex ovo." A few years after it had been published, in the summer of 1657, Harvey ended his active life, his memory remaining as "one of the imperishable beacons in the path of human progress."

Labouring in a sphere far removed from that of the discoverer of the circulation of the blood, yet equally eminent in opening up new fields of science, was John Napier, eighth baron of Merchiston, inventor of logarithms, and greatest pure mathematician of the age. Born at Merchiston castle, near Edinburgh, in 1550, he early applied his mind to mathematics, combining with it, singularly enough, the study of prophecy. He first came forward as an author in 1603, with a book called "A plaine discovery of the whole Revelation of St. John," which acquired high fame, as the best and most systematic commentary on the Apocalypse in existence; and this was followed by several mathematical publications, and, in 1614, by his great book, "Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis descriptio." The work caused unbounded surprise and delight in the scientific world, as furnishing the means of easily and rapidly making computations which previously had been matters of enormous labour and difficulty, forming almost a barrier to the progress of such branches of knowledge as astronomy. One of the leading mathematicians of England, Henry Briggs, was so struck with admiration at the ideas revealed by Lord Napier, that, though near upon sixty years of age, he resolved to undertake the arduous journey from London to Edinburgh, for the express purpose of seeing the author; and he did so to the great benefit of science, his visit to Merchiston castle resulting in a valuable simplification of the new invention. The logarithms in Napier's original table were those now called "hyperbolic," which are of such a nature, that the rate at which the logarithm of a given number increases, as compared with the rate of growth of the number itself, is the reciprocal of that number. In the course of their conversations Briggs remarked to Napier that it would be far more convenient for arithmetical purposes to have a determined scale of logarithms, and that the logarithms of the powers of 10 should be whole numbers. Napier replied that he had been thinking of an improvement of a similar kind; and this led to the invention, by consultation between the two learned philosophers, of the so-called "common logarithms," in which the logarithm 10 is unity. To the English mathematician was left the honour of publishing, in 1617, the first volume of logarithmic tables constructed on this principle; and by a singular coincidence, in the same month, and almost the same day on which the book appeared, Lord Napier died.

While overflowing with mental activity, exalted in the noblest forms of literature, and not neglectful of science, England, during its stormy revolutionary period, produced very little in the fine arts. The age was too serious and solemn for the mere creation and display of things of beauty: there was no time to make pictures and statues when battles had to be fought, and no wish to build fine mansions, and furnish them with all the luxuries of industrial refinement, before the higher treasures, after which the mind was yearning, and for which men joyfully went into death, had been obtained. At the court of pedantic James I. there was no home for true art, and although his son and successor encouraged it with success at the beginning of his reign, assembling around him some of its most distinguished representatives, the greater part of the era was too agitated to allow these attempts to take root. Victorious Puritanism, in overthrowing ancient privilege, falsehood, and superstition, overthrew likewise all that clung to it, unwilling or unable to distinguish between art and artifice, and to separate the gold from the dross. Heaven-soaring and earth-despising, the sons of Protestantism, fiercely earnest in all their aims and endeavours, protested against everything connected with the past, and while casting off the faith that had come from Italy, cast also off its arts. All the works of embellishment of royal palaces and public buildings which Charles had begun were put a stop to as soon as the Long Parliament had seized the reins of power; and from that moment England ceased to be an attractive home for the crowd of foreign artists that were basking in the sunshine of royalty. It was a matter of regret in some respects, with bad results, among others, for industrial and technical education in England, but at the same time an almost necessary consequence of the intimate connection that had arisen between the fine arts and absolutism. Rubens, greatest of all the artists of the period, hesitated not to lower his genius by engaging upon such an absurd subject as the apotheosis of James I., which he painted against the ceiling of the banquetting house of Whitehall, being paid 800*l.* for the work; and the whole tribe of minor craftsmen imitating his example, it was but natural that they should come to be considered mere soulless servants of wealth and power. There was no Shakespeare, disdaining even to honour the memory of great Elizabeth with his pen, among the class; no Milton, bidding defiance to tyrants, and lifting up the mind from the contemplation of earthly to heavenly majesty: but from Peter Paul Rubens, down to the most obscure hanger-on of art, nothing was seen but slavish obedience to authority and infinite greed after wealth. It was this, as much as the inherent dislike of the religious reformers to vain pomp and luxury, which made art and artists despised in England for the period; and exaggerated as was the antipathy for a time, the nation as a whole was no loser by it. For a time the people of England could well spare art, running a stupendous race after things far above it. "Methinks," cried Milton, amidst the roar of the surging tide, "I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks: methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beams, purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance, while the whole noise of timorous birds, with those that love the twilight, flutter about amazed."

CHAPTER V.

History of Industry and Commerce, from the Accession of James I., A.D. 1603, to the Dissolution of the Commonwealth, A.D. 1660.

THE epoch which saw the rise of the Commonwealth also witnessed the commencement of England's greatness in commerce and industry. If the fatal burthen of despotism obstructed the progress of the mind, it impeded equally, if not more, the development of material resources; and it was only when taken off that the country could hope to make use of those immense advantages due to a bounteous distribution of natural riches and an unrivalled geographical position. The truth, that no nation ever rose to commercial and industrial greatness under the restraints of arbitrary rule, was strikingly illustrated before the eyes of the world at the very moment when England began its mighty struggle for freedom. In power and riches Spain was then the foremost kingdom in the civilized world, gifted by Providence with a magnificent climate and every other bounty of nature, inhabited by a noble and energetic race, and possessing, as proud appendage, colonies of such illimitable wealth as never country owned before. Yet all this availed nothing to Spain as long as the nightmare of kingly and priestly tyranny was hanging around her neck. Amidst the huge stream of treasure flowing in upon her from the realms west of the Atlantic, she sank in poverty; under a glorious sun, and on a soil fertile beyond imagination, her people were starving; and while other nations, north and east, went on advancing, more or less rapidly, to higher forms of civilization, she visibly tottered back into the night of the Middle Ages. In marvellous contrast to the picture thus offered by great Spain, governed by an autocrat, was that of little Holland, under the guide of republican institutions. More neglected by nature than any country of record in history, a mere strip of marsh land, wrung from the sea with infinite pains, and which had to be protected against the encroachments of the mighty ocean with infinite patience and perseverance, she seemed to be destitute of all the elements of wealth and greatness, possessing nothing to indicate that she would ever be regarded as an important member in the family of European states. Yet half a century of liberty was enough to lift poor little Holland to the very first rank among the nations of the civilized world, full of industry, of opulence, and of refinement, with merchants to whom kings came as suitors, and with fleets that covered the seas from pole to pole. To imitate the example of the citizens of the United Provinces was the material task that stood before the English people when engaging in the grand revolt against absolutism.

The task was very clearly appreciated by the thinking men of the nation. Sir Walter Raleigh, foremost leader of the pioneers of England's future material greatness, laid it down with wonderful precision early in the reign of James I., in a treatise entitled, "Observations concerning the trade and commerce of England with the Dutch and other foreign nations." The paper was addressed to the insane tyrant, who, as if in reward, sent the illustrious author to the scaffold. Raleigh's treatise, which warmly advocated freedom of trade, has left to modern times by far the best account of the state of industry and commerce existing at that period. "We send into the east countries [Russia and the Baltic states] yearly but one hundred ships," he informed James, "and our trade chiefly depends on three towns there, Elbing, Königsberg, and Dantzic, but the Low Countries send thither about three thousand ships, trading into every city and port town, vending their commodities to exceeding profit, and lading their ships with plenty of their commodities, which they have twenty per cent. cheaper than we. They send likewise into France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, about two thousand ships yearly with those east country commodities, and we none in that course. They trade into all cities and port towns of France, and we chiefly to five or six. The Low Countries have as many ships and vessels as eleven kingdoms of Christendom have, let England be one. They build every year near one thousand ships, although all their native commodities do not require one hundred ships to carry them away at once. Yet although we have all things of our own in abundance for the increase of traffic, timber to build ships, and commodities of our own to lade about one thousand ships and vessels at once, besides the great fishing, and as fast as they make their voyages might reload again, yet our ships and mariners decline, and traffic and merchants daily decay. For seventy years we had a great trade to Russia, and even about fourteen years ago we sent a store of goodly ships thither; but three years past we sent out four only, and last year but two or three ships. Whereas the Hollanders are now increased to thirty or forty ships, each as large as two of ours, chiefly laden with English cloth, herrings taken in our seas, English lead, and pewter made of our tin, besides other commodities, all which we may do better than they."

Raleigh naturally was compelled to refer with great caution to the reasons which had brought English enterprise so low as he painted it. To speak of want of liberty to the pedant despot he was addressing, would have been immediately fatal to him; and he had to content himself to point to what "those foreigners," the Dutch, were doing, as matters not entirely unworthy of consideration. He informed James, in all humility, that monopolies such as those which crushed the life out of English trade and industry, and were nevertheless being multiplied by his majesty from year to year, did not exist in the United Provinces, and that this was one of the reasons enabling the Dutch "to draw multitudes of merchants to live amongst them, and thereby enrich themselves." As another important cause of the growth of foreign, and the decay of English commerce, he ventured to hint that his majesty had committed an error in burthensing merchandise that was flowing in and out of the country with heavy duties and impositions, inasmuch as trade, not only in Holland but likewise in France, appeared to flourish "by the lowness of the customs of those foreign nations." "The people of the Netherlands," said Raleigh, "imposed scarcely any tolls whatever, and even in France all nations may freely buy and sell, there being parts free of custom twice or thrice in the year, besides that at Rochelle, in Brittany, which is free of custom all the year round. Also in Denmark they freely buy and sell, excepting between Bartholomewtide and Michaelmas. The Hanse Towns imitate the Dutch in their wise regulations, and they also abound in riches and all manner of merchandize, have plenty of money, and are strong in shipping and mariners, some of their towns having near one thousand sail of ships. The Dutch and other petty states altogether engross the transportation of the merchandize of France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Turkey, and the East and West Indies, all which they carry to Denmark, Sweden, Poland, and other northern parts, and bring back the bulky commodities of the northern regions into the said southern countries. Yet is England better situated than Holland for a general storehouse as aforesaid. No sooner doth a dearth happen, of wine, fish, corn, and other merchandize, in England, than forthwith the Embdeners, Hamburgers, out of their storehouses, lade fifty or a hundred ships, or more, dispersing themselves round about this kingdom, and carrying away great store of coin and wealth, thus cutting down our merchants, and decaying our navigation, not with their natural commodities, but with those of other countries. Amsterdam is never without seven hundred thousand quarters of corn, besides what is daily used, though none of it be of the growth of the country; and a dearth of only one year, in England, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, is justly observed to enrich Holland for seven years after." Raleigh concludes, feeling his way more and more to the point he wished to impress upon the British Solomon, "That unless there be a scarcity, or high prices, all merchants avoid the parts where great impositions are on merchandize, which places are usually slenderly shipped, ill-served, and at dear rates, often in scarcity, and in want of employment for their people. Whereas the low duties of the wise states beforenamed draw all traffic unto them, and the great liberty allowed to strangers makes a continual mart."

The wise counsels of Raleigh were utterly thrown away upon the worthless king to whom they were tendered. James not only did nothing to lessen the heavy weight of oppression under which both the commerce and industry of the country were decaying, but did all he could to increase it to the utmost extent. During the whole of his reign, monopolies, trade restrictions, import and export duties, and other burthens upon national activity and free intercourse, kept on augmenting with fatal rapidity, till at last it seemed as if England was fast approaching the material condition of Spain. Whatever persons were able and willing to bribe the temperary favourites of the imbecile monarch, were sure to obtain any monopolies which they deemed would lead to the making of their own fortunes, although they might be totally destructive of the public interest. To a small company of merchant adventurers of Exeter, James granted the exclusive privilege, in reference to their fellow-citizens, of trading with France; while upon another corporation he conferred the sweeping monopoly of acting as sole merchants within the important town of Southampton, all individuals not belonging to the guild being strictly forbidden either to buy or sell anything there. There was scarcely an article of general use, either produced at home or coming from abroad, the sale and distribution of which had not been made over to some hanger-on at court, who taxed it for his personal benefit, in addition to any impost his majesty might choose to levy thereon. The few parliaments which were called together while the miserable reign of James lasted made great but vain efforts to stop the evil, their labours in this respect being invariably counteracted by the shrewd courtiers interested in the monopoly system, who induced their master, whenever the clamour about any particular subject became very loud, to lighten the weight thereon, but, to compensate himself and them for the loss, to put it threefold upon other articles. When, in 1621, an earnest petition had been sent in by the House of Commons for the abolition, on the ground of illegality, of "the patents of gold and silver thread, of inns and alehouses, of horse-meat, starch, cards, tobacco-pipes, salt, train-oil," and a number of other articles, the king solemnly declared that he would "strike them all dead;" but in the end the "striking dead" was confined to three monopolies, and these, too, soon came to life again. Under such a government, it was less a wonder that trade and industry did not flourish, but that they did live at all.

Though small as compared with the commerce of the Netherlands, and very far below what it might have been if not broken by despotism, the trade of England with foreign nations was yet of considerable value towards the middle of the reign of James I. According to the statement of Edward Misselden, an eminent merchant, who published a book entitled "the Circle of Commerce," the total exports of the kingdom in the year 1613, or, as given by the author, "between Christmas 1612 and Christmas 1613," were of the estimated worth of 2,090,640*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, while the total imports amounted to 2,141,151*l.* 10*s.* As chief articles of export, woollen goods, tin, lead, and pewter, are mentioned, while among imported merchandize are distinguished, woven silks, "Venice gold and silver stuffs," Spanish wines, and linen fabrics. The amount of customs duties levied by the king on these exports and imports is set down at 148,075*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*, the former producing nearly two-thirds of this sum, thus pressing in a most unwise manner upon the development of the natural resources of the country. As a singular fact, Misselden states that London paid nearly thrice the amount to the customs as all the rest of England together. It is reported that there were paid by the traders of London, in the year 1613, in export duties 61,322*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.*, and in import duties 48,250*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, making a total of 109,572*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* At the whole of the other shipping places, the sums collected amounted to 25,471*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.* for exports, and 13,030*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* for imports, or altogether to only 38,502*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* The cause of this extraordinary superiority of London over the rest of the kingdom, was that nearly the whole trade of England, or at least the most valuable part of it, was carried on by a few great mercantile associations, at the head of which stood the East India Company, dating its charter from Queen Elizabeth, and the Levant, or Turkey Company, started in the first years of the reign of James; and that these, having established their seat in the capital, attracted to it the mass of merchandize sent to or brought from foreign nations. These great corporations, though they did much towards fostering commerce when in its infancy, nevertheless often impeded it not a little by the upholding of their exclusive privileges, as well as by their never-ending quarrels and jealousies. The East India and the Levant Company, in particular, allowed their rivalry to drive them constantly into acts against their own, no less than against the national interest, owing to the ill-defined character of their respective monopolies. It was one of the many bad results, and not the least immaterial, springing out of the unwise interference with the natural development of trade.

In the course of the disputes between the two leading mercantile associations of the reign of James, an active paper warfare was carried on, which led to the publication of many interesting details regarding the trade of England during that period. Among others, a small pamphlet, called "The Trade's Increase," by an anonymous writer, was published in 1615, in the interest of the Levant Company, accusing their rivals of the attempt to engross the whole foreign commerce of the country, which led to a long rejoinder by one of the most eminent political writers of the day, Sir Dudley Digges, a partner in the East India corporation, and kinsman of the chief governor, Sir Thomas Smith. To contradict the assertion that the merchants of the East India Company were expanding their transactions at a rate dangerous to the interests of other "adventurers," Sir Dudley furnished in his book, which he called "The Defence of Trade," the exact statistics of the association. He began by giving a list of all the ships possessed by the company from the beginning till the year 1615, numbering twenty-four, of which he stated four had been lost, while twenty were still in use; the largest of them of one thousand one hundred tons burthen, the next of one thousand and sixty, another of nine hundred, another of eight hundred, and the rest from six hundred down to one hundred and fifty tons. Sir Dudley then went on: "Our East India Company's greatest stock [value of goods and treasure exported] in any one year was but 36,000*l.*, and yet the nation saves annually 70,000*l.* in the prices of pepper, cloves, mace, and nutmegs, merely for home consumption. Of the said spices we imported last year [1614] to the value of 218,000*l.*, besides indigo, calico, benjamin, aloes, and other articles—a considerable addition this to the national stock; to which should be added the king's customs, and also the employment given to ships and mariners." The author of the "Defence of Trade" next summed up the value of the exports of the East India Company transactions for the year 1614. "In bays, kersies, and broad cloths," he says, "to the kingdom's best advantage, 14,000*l.*; lead, iron, and foreign merchandize, 10,000*l.*; ready money in all the ships, and which was less than is allowed by the charters, 12,000*l.*, which makes a total of 36,000*l.* Besides this, their shipping and furniture cost the company, in fitting out, 34,000*l.*, and for victuals and other extraordinary charges, 30,000*l.*, being altogether 100,000*l.*" Referring again to his statement that the nation, through the instrumentality of his corporation, was saving annually 70,000*l.* in the cost of spices, Sir Dudley went closer into the matter of the sale of this description of merchandize. "Besides cinnamon," he writes, "the company compute that we annually consume, at home, the following quantities of spices, viz., of pepper, formerly 8*s.*, now but 2*s.* per pound, 450,000 pounds weight; of cloves, 50,000, of mace, 15,000, and of nutmegs, 100,000 pounds weight, being a total of 615,000 pounds weight." No mention is made of tea, which article, therefore, was probably not yet an item of any note in the company's imports.

The anonymous author of "The Trade's Increase" replied to Sir Dudley Digges' work, in a new pamphlet, which furnished some very notable particulars about the general commerce of England. "We trade," he says, "to Naples, Genoa, Leghorn, Marseilles, and Malaga, with only twenty ships, chiefly with herrings; and thirty sail more, laden with pipe staves, from Ireland. To Portugal and Andalusia we send twenty ships for wines, sugar, fruit, and West India drugs. To Bourdeaux, we send sixty ships and barks for wines. To Hamburg and Middelburgh, thirty-five ships are sent by our Merchant Adventurers' Company. To Dantzic and Königsberg we send yearly about thirty ships, viz. six from London, six from Ipswich, and the rest from Hull, Lynn, and Newcastle; but the Dutch send many more. To Norway we send not above five ships, and the Dutch above forty, and great ships too." All this the author thinks discouraging, and he dwells with satisfaction only upon a special branch of national and international traffic, newly risen, that in coals. "Our Newcastle coal trade," he writes, "employs four hundred sails of ships, viz., two hundred for supplying of London, and two hundred more for the rest of England. And besides our own ships, hither, even to the main's mouth, come all our neighbouring nations with their ships continually, employing their own shipping and mariners. I doubt not whether, if they had such a treasure themselves, they would not employ their own shipping solely therein. The French sail thither in whole fleets of fifty sail together, serving all their ports of Picardy, Normandy, and Brittany, even as far as Rochelle and Bourdeaux. And the ships of Bremen, Embden, Holland, and Zealand, supply those of Flanders, whose shipping is not great, with our coals." Then he goes on to fisheries. "Our Iceland fishery," we learn, "employs one hundred and twenty ships and barks of our own. The Newfoundland fishery has one hundred and sixty small ships; and our Greenland whale fishery, fourteen ships. Yet all our fisheries are nothing to those of other countries, and it would be well to help them on, by reason of the immense profit of the Dutch from their fishery, in which have been numbered, in sight, two thousand sail of busses, employing thirty-seven thousand fishermen, going out to sea at once." The figures here given seem very large, but their truth is amply confirmed by the minute investigation of Sir Walter Raleigh, and in turn, by the statements of John De Witt, Grand Pensionary of the United Provinces, who, in a book called "The Interest of Holland," quoted Sir Walter as the best authority on Dutch industry and trade, especially the fisheries.

"The greatest fishing that ever was known in the world," says Raleigh, "is upon the coasts of England, Scotland, and Ireland, but the great fishery there is carried on by the Low Countries, and other petty states, wherewith they serve themselves and all Christendom. Into four towns on the Baltic, viz., Königsberg, Elbing, Stettin, and Dantzic, there are carried and vended in a year between thirty and forty thousand lasts of herrings, which, being sold but at fifteen, or sixteen pounds the last, is about six hundred and twenty thousand pounds; and we send none thither. To Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and the ports of Riga, Revel, Narva, and other ports of Livonia, there are carried by the Dutch and vended above ten thousand lasts of herrings, worth one hundred and seventy thousand pounds; and we send none at all to those countries. The Hollanders send into Russia near one thousand five hundred lasts of herrings, sold at about thirty shillings per barrel, or at twenty-seven thousand pounds; and we send thither only about twenty or thirty lasts. To Staden, Hamburg, Bremen, and Embden, are carried and vended of fish and herrings about six thousand lasts, sold at about one hundred thousand pounds; and we none at all. To Cleves and Juliers, up the Rhine to Cologne, and Frankfort on the Main, and so over all Germany, are carried and vended, of fish and herrings, near twenty-two thousand lasts, sold at twenty pounds per last, or at four hundred and forty thousand pounds; and we send none. Up the river Meuse to Maestrecht, and Liege, and to Venloo, Zutphen, Deventer, Campen, Swoll, and other towns, are sent about seven thousand lasts of herrings, at twenty pounds per last, or at one hundred and forty thousand pounds; and we send none at all. To Guelderland, Artois, Hainault, Brabant, Flanders, Antwerp, and up the Scheldt, all over the Archduke's countries, are carried and vended between eight and nine thousand lasts, at eighteen pounds per last, or at one hundred and sixty-two thousand pounds; and we send none. The Hollanders, and others, carry off of all sorts of herrings, to Rouen alone, in one year, besides other parts of France, about five thousand lasts, at one hundred thousand pounds; and we not one hundred lasts." Summing up the different items here enumerated, Sir Walter Raleigh arrives at the fact that the fishermen of the United Provinces carry away from the coast of the British Isles, "greatest fishing ground that ever was known in the world," not less than one million and three quarter pounds sterling worth of produce every year. "Surely," he finishes by exclaiming, "the stream is necessary to be turned to the good of this kingdom; to whose sea coasts alone God hath sent these great blessings, and immense riches for us to take. And that any nation should carry away out of this kingdom yearly great masses of money, for fish taken in our seas, and sold again by them to us, must needs be a great dishonour to our nation, and hindrance to this realm."

All the suggestions made, by Raleigh and other writers, to expand English commerce by taking off its fetters, were systematically disregarded by James I., and his rule, from the first to the last day of his reign, was marked by a policy of restriction constantly growing in intensity. Every year brought forth new edicts conferring monopolies and special privileges upon favoured individuals, and hampering, if not destroying, branches of national industry; while, when not so engaged, the king managed to accomplish the same end under the endeavour, real or pretended, of fostering the nation's welfare. In 1622, three years before his death, he prohibited the exportation of all gold and silver, whether in coin, plate, jewelry, bullion, or any other shape, and at the same time restricted the manufacture of the precious metals, on the ground that their use encouraged luxury. The same year a proclamation was made, forbidding the wear of too costly garments; no persons were allowed to dress in "cloth of gold or silver, nor have gold and silver lace on their cloaths, nor velvets, sattins, or other silk stuffs," except noblemen, privy councillors, and other high officials, and persons possessing an annual income of six thousand marks, or about three hundred and fifty pounds sterling. The harvest of 1622 having been bad, and being followed by great dearth of victuals in London, the British Solomon, towards the end of the year, sent his commands to the whole of the lords spiritual and temporal, and all gentlemen owning estates, to leave the capital forthwith, and spend the Christmas in their several country houses, there to keep open table, "which is now the more needful as this is a time of scarcity and dearth." In a second proclamation, equally imprinted with royal wisdom, James ordered all those he had driven from London not only to remain at their country seats

"in the said Christmas time," but afterwards, until his further pleasure be known. Widows and ladies "of distinction" were also included in this decree, and lords and gentlemen, compelled by business to go to the capital, were ordered to leave their families behind, so that food might be cheapened. However, victuals refused to go down in price, and therefore the king, at the commencement of 1623, issued a fresh decree, in the manner and style of the former ones, strictly prohibiting all his subjects from eating flesh in Lent, or on "fish days," because there was not meat enough "for the maintenance of the navy and shipping, a principal strength of this island," and also "for the sparing and increasing of flesh victuals." Next, James fixed the price of the chief articles of food; then interdicted once more the export of gold and silver, in whatever form; and after that fixed the rate of interest, which had been generally twelve or fifteen per cent., at eight per cent. The last edict relating to commerce passed by James, issued but a few weeks before his death, was against the importation of tobacco from any part of the world except from the newly-settled colonies of Virginia and the Bermudas, or Somers' Islands. "Whereas," decreed his majesty, "We have, upon all occasions, made known Our dislike of the use of tobacco in general, as tending to the corruption both of the health and manners of our people; nevertheless, because We have been often and earnestly importuned by many of Our loving subjects, plantors and adventurers in Virginia and the Somer Isles, that, as these colonies are yet but in their infancy, and cannot be brought to maturity unless We will be pleased, for a time, to tolerate unto them the planting and vending the tobacco of their own growth: We have condescended to their desires, and do therefore hereby strictly prohibit the importation of any tobacco from beyond sea, or from Scotland, into England and Ireland, other than from our colonies before named, and, moreover, We strictly prohibit the planting of any tobacco, either in England or Ireland." The sense that dictated this last of his decrees characterized the whole arbitrary legislation of James. He put a barrier to a great branch of trade, first, to please himself, and, secondly, to please some "importunate" individuals. The traffic in tobacco was made a monopoly in order that Virginian planters might make fortunes, and, still more, because of "Our dislike of the use of tobacco."

The commercial policy of Charles differed not in the least from that of his predecessor, but in part almost outdid it in irrationality. Many of the decrees of Charles, interfering with trade and setting up monopolies, were, even in form, mere copies of similar ones issued by James; a fact quaintly explained by Adam Anderson, in his "Origin of Commerce," in the remark that, "the son was so much a transcript of the father that we must not wonder at their proclamations having so great a resemblance." However, "transcript" as the second Stuart king of England was of the first, there was, nevertheless, a great dissimilitude between them in some respects, and in none more so than in that the father desired peace above all things, and the son showed constant readiness to rush into war, whether with foreign nations or with his own subjects. It was curiously characteristic of the two reigns, that while the last mercantile edict of James concerned itself with the use of tobacco, the first of Charles had reference to the making of gunpowder. In the spring of 1625, almost immediately after his accession, the king sent forth a strange proclamation, "for the maintenance and increase of the saltpetre mines of England, and for the necessary and important manufacture of gunpowder," prescribing under high penalties all details to be observed in the manufacture and sale of the two articles. "Our realm," his majesty noticed and commanded, "naturally yields sufficient mines of saltpetre, without depending on foreign parts: wherefore, for the future, no dove-house shall be paved with stone, bricks, nor boards, lime, sand, nor gravel, nor any other thing whereby the growth or increase of the mine of saltpetre may be hindered, or impaired; but the proprietors shall suffer the floor or ground thereof, as also all stables where horses stand, to lye open with good and mellow earth, apt to breed increase of the said mine of saltpetre; and let none hinder and deny any saltpetre-man, lawfully deputed, thereto, from digging, taking, or working any ground which by commission may be taken and wrought for saltpetre. Neither shall any constable, or other officer, neglect to furnish any such saltpetre-men with convenient carriages, that the king's service suffer not. None shall bribe any saltpetre-man for the sparing and forbearing any ground fit to be wrought for saltpetre. All dove-houses and other places digged for saltpetre, must, when the earth thereof is wrought over, be laid smooth again, as before. And no saltpetre shall be exported, neither be sold at home to any but the king's powder-maker, who shall not receive for any powder sold by him, to any of the king's subjects, above ten pence per pound weight." Thus, to get the chief material of war, the king seemed to rely mainly upon doves, the emblems of peace.

However, the doves, after all, did not answer his majesty's expectations. Eighteen months after the issue of his first decree about gunpowder, Charles published a second, revoking all, or nearly all, that he had ordered before. It was said in the new proclamation "that the practice of making saltpetre in England, by digging up the floors of dwelling-houses, dove-houses, stables, and other inhabited places, tends too much to the grievance of the king's subjects, and that, notwithstanding all the trouble and charge attending this method, the undertakers cannot furnish this realm with one third part of the saltpetre requisite, especially in time of war, when most wanted, as the earth of itself is not able to engender the matter whereof saltpetre is made in many years, without the aid of artificial means for enriching the earth; and yet the necessity of the present times requires so much to be made as would so impoverish the earth that in a short time we should be utterly destitute of that inestimable treasure. Whereupon Sir John Brooke and Thomas Russell have proposed to us to make such quantities of saltpetre as our realms shall want, and also to supply foreign nations therewith, by a new invention of their own, of which they have given demonstrative proof, and for which we have already granted them an exclusive patent. And as these patentees now want nothing but leave to collect a sufficient quantity of urine for their said manufacture of saltpetre, at their own charge, the king therefore commands all his subjects in London and Westminster, near to the place where the said patentees have already erected a work for the making of saltpetre, that, after notice given to them respectively, they carefully keep in proper vessels all human urine, throughout the whole year, and also as much of that of beasts as can be saved, for the patentees to carry away from time to time." It was remarkable in this proclamation, as contrasted with the preceding one on the same subject, that while, on his accession to the throne, Charles spoke of "the necessary and important manufacture of gunpowder," a year and a half after, the same had already become in his mind an "inestimable treasure."

The patents referred to in the royal decree as given to Sir John Brooke and Thomas Russell, for the manufacture of saltpetre, were specimens of many similar ones, granted in this and the preceding reign, all more or less oppressive monopolies. Upon one of his courtiers, Sir Sackville Crowe, Charles conferred the exclusive right of manufacturing "iron cannon, cast within our forest of Dean, in Gloucestershire, or elsewhere;" while to a city merchant who had lent him money, Philip Burlamach, he gave the equally exclusive privilege to sell the cannon thus made. In the third year of his reign, he confirmed "the starch-makers' company monopoly, established by King James," and soon after he interdicted "the importation of French wines, for a limited period, on complaint of the merchants and vintners that the quantity thereof remaining unsold was so large that they could not carry on their business without such a temporary prohibition." The grants of patents of invention, for the term of fourteen years, also became rather numerous. Patents were given, among others, for "the sole making of an engine for the more easy cutting of timber;" for "engines for draining of marsh lands;" for "a medicine for preserving the sheep from rot;" for "an engine for the safe transportation of horses and cattle from Ireland into England, and from England to Ireland;" for "the sole making of stone pots, jugs, and bottles, according to the new invention of Thomas Rouse and Abraham Cullyn;" for "draining of water out of mines, and for making of guns, great and small;" for "the making of steele, according to the invention of Thomas Letsome;" and for "rendering of sea-coal and pit-coal as useful as charcoal for burning in houses, without offence by the smell or smoke, according to the invention of Sir John Hacket and Octavius de Strada." More notable than either of these were four patents of protection, or "special licences," accorded, in the year 1618, to David Ramsey and Thomas Wildgosse, "for the sole use and benefit of certain discoveries and inventions." The patents were, first, "for ploughing of land without horses or oxen;" secondly, "for improving of barren grounds;" thirdly, "for raising of water from any low place to the houses of noblemen and gentlemen, and to cities and towns;" and, fourthly, "to make boats for the carriage of burdens and passengers, to run upon the water as swift in calms, and more fast in storms, than boats full sailed in great winds." If these purported inventions had any existence at all, it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that David Ramsey and Thomas Wildgosse were thinking, two centuries before Watt and Stephenson, of making steam the handmaiden of civilization.

An interesting glance at the relative wealth, arising from industrial prosperity, of the various counties of England, shortly before the great revolt, is given by the memorable act of Charles, of the year 1635, decreeing the imposition of "ship-money." The document, based apparently on a recent survey of the kingdom, specified with great minuteness the size and burthen of the ships, with number of men, which each district should furnish, or, what the king really aimed at, the money equivalent. The counties first in the list in the value of assessment were Yorkshire, ordered to contribute to the king's wants 1,200 tons worth of shipping, with 480 men, and Devonshire, assessed at 900 tons, and 360 men; next came Lincolnshire, Somerset, Kent, Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, each of which was commanded to furnish 800 tons, and 320 men; Wilts, with 700 tons, and 290 men, followed; then Cornwall, with 650 tons, and 260 men; after that Hants and Northamptonshire, each with 600 tons, and 240 men; and then Gloucestershire, and Middlesex, exclusive of London, but inclusive of Westminster, with 550 tons, and 220 men. Assessed at 500 tons, and 200 men, were Dorsetshire, Northumberland, and Sussex; at 450 tons, and 180 men, Leicestershire, Bucks, and Salop; at 400 tons, and 160 men, Herts, Hereford, Berks, Worcester, and Warwickshire; at 350 tons, and 140 men, Cambridge, Oxfordshire,otts, Derbyshire, and Lancashire; at 300 tons, and 120 men, Bedfordshire; at 200 tons, and 80 men, Hunts, Staffordshire, Durham county, and the city of Bristol; at 150 tons, and 60 men, Monmouthshire; and, finally, at the lowest rate, 100 tons, and 40 men, Rutlandshire, Cumberland, and Westmoreland. The city of London was to furnish 1,000 tons, and 640 men, under a separate assessment, very moderate in comparison with former taxes levied by the king, which was due, probably, to the fact of Charles being afraid of the resistance of the capital to his illegal impost. In computing the money equivalent of the ships of which he professed to be in want, the king laid it down that each ton of shipping should be compensated for by ten pounds sterling, which simple regulation went far to facilitate the use of the multiplication table. For four years, the full amount of the tax, about 200,000*l.* per annum, was paid into the royal exchequer, to the delight of the infatuated monarch, who little dreamt that the phantom ships he was raising would float him on to the scaffold.

The same year which saw the imposition of "ship-money" was made remarkable by another occurrence of note, the establishment of regular postal intercourse within the realm. By a proclamation issued in the summer of 1635, and given at length in the nineteenth volume of Rymer's "Fœdera Conventiones Literæ," the king notified that "whereas, to this time there hath been no certain intercourse between the kingdoms of England and Scotland, he now commanded his Postmaster of England for Foreign Parts to settle a running post or two, to run night and day, between Edinburgh and London, and to go thither and come back again in six days, and to take with them all such letters as shall be directed to any post town in or near that road." Charles likewise commanded "that by-posts be placed at several places out of the road, to bring and carry out the letters from and to Lincoln, Hull, and other places, and to pay post for the carrying the said letters, in manner to pay two pence the single letter if under eighty miles, and four pence between eighty and one hundred and forty miles, and six pence if above one hundred and forty miles; and upon the borders of Scotland, and in Scotland, eight pence; and in this proportion for double letters and packets. The like rule shall also be observed to West-Chester, Holyhead, and thence to Ireland; also, to Plymouth, Exeter, and other towns on the West road." And, so soon as possible, the like conveyance shall be settled to Oxford, Bristol, and other places on the road." Finally, the king ordered "that the three first-named conveyances, viz., from London to Edinburgh, to Chester, and to Holyhead, and to Plymouth and Exeter, shall begin the first week after Michaelmas next: two pence half-penny per mile to be paid on the roads to the several postmasters for every single horse carrying the said letters. No other messengers, nor foot posts, shall carry any letters, but those alone which shall be employed by the King's Postmaster-general, unless to such places whither the King's posts do not go, excepting common known carriers, or messengers particularly sent on purpose, or else a letter by a friend." Commenting upon this decree, Adam Anderson, in the "Origin of Commerce," remarks, "It was the increase of England's foreign commerce, augmenting her domestic commerce and correspondence, which rendered the further extending the post carriage of letters absolutely requisite. It is indeed somewhat strange that, trade being, even before this time, got to a considerable height, these posts were not sooner established. On the other hand, it is possible that King Charles's necessities might put him upon this extension of post carriage sooner than otherwise might have happened."

Interrupted for a time, though not to any great extent, by the civil war, the commerce and industry of the country made immense strides during the period of the Commonwealth and the Protectorate. The destruction of the bulk of those tyrannical limits placed by the Stuart kings and their predecessors in the way of a free extension of trade was in itself sufficient to mark a new era for it, the prosperity of which was naturally accelerated by the whole moral, social, and political progress of the nation. Both the wants and the activity of the people increased on their being raised to a state of higher social development, free from the trammels of religious and political despotism, which, while it had benumbed the mental faculties, had likewise thrown its cold shade over the more physical aims and strivings of men. There was little incitement to use hands and brains for the production of useful things, and the augmentation of wealth and the comforts of existence, as long as life itself, and all that made life endurable, was at the mercy of autocrats obeying no law, and acknowledging no responsibility, but pretending to hold their power from heaven, and to stand forth as emanations of the Almighty. Commerce and industry, quite as much if not more, than political and religious aspirations, felt the benumbing weight of absolutism, the same "royal prerogative" which insisted upon directing the faith of the people, and fixing constitutional landmarks, claiming, in still louder tone of authority, the right to impose customs duties, to open and shut harbours, to establish monopolies of all kinds, and to divert from its ordinary channels, or even, if so willed, to destroy, any form of national activity. To leave no doubt about their pretensions in this respect, James I. as well as his successor asserted them constantly in their proclamations; the former, moreover, inciting his attorney-general, Sir John Davis, to write and dedicate to him a legal treatise, proving the unlimited power of the sovereign to regulate and adjust, at his own will and pleasure, all matters whatsoever concerning trade and industry. In his book, entitled "The question concerning Impositions, Tonnage, Poundage, &c., &c., fully stated and argued from Reason, Law, and Policy," Sir John, leaning upon the strength of a mountain of precedents, boldly asserted "That, by virtue of ancient prerogative inherent to his crown, the king of England may justly and lawfully set impositions upon merchandize, and may limit and rate the quantity and proportion thereof, by his own wisdom and discretion, without any acts of parliament." It was the precise doctrine maintained with success, under the assistance of a good standing army, by the king of Spain; and acted upon perseveringly for any length of time would have not failed to make England another Spain.

The immense development of trade and industry that took place immediately after the fall of the arbitrary government under which the nation had been suffering, was marked in a very peculiar manner by the rise of a new class of institutions, essential in the functions of well-regulated commerce, the establishments known as banks. During the whole of the reign of James, and the greater part of that of his predecessor, up to the year of the assembling of the Long Parliament, the wealthy merchants of London had been in the habit of putting their money and bullion in the royal mint, in the Tower, which seemed to them the place of greatest safety that could be found for treasure, and from which they withdrew it as required. But Charles, in the summer of 1640, rudely disturbed the sense of security in his mint by laying hands upon a sum of two hundred thousand pounds lodged there by the denizens of the capital, under no better excuse than that he wanted the sum as a loan, and would repay it in course of time. From that moment, very naturally, not another ounce of gold or silver found its way from the city into the Tower, and to guard their cherished riches, the moneyed people of London had recourse to all sorts of shifts and contrivance. "The traders and merchants generally," says a contemporary writer, "for a few years trusted their cash with their servants, until the breaking out of the civil war, when it was very customary for their apprentices and clerks to leave their masters, and go into the army. •Whereupon, in such unsettled times, merchants, not longer daring to confide in their apprentices, began, first, about this year 1645, to lodge their necessary cash in goldsmiths' hands, both to receive and pay for them; until which time, the whole and proper business of London goldsmiths was to buy and sell plate, and foreign coins of gold and silver, to melt and cull them, to coin some at the mint, and, with the rest, to supply the refiners, plate-makers, and merchants, as they found the price to vary." Thus, by an easy and natural movement, which had precedents in other countries, such as the republic of Venice and the Netherlands, where jewellers, dealers in bullion, and money lenders, had become bankers, or deposit holders of cash for the public, the ancient guild of the goldsmiths threw out a new branch, destined to grow in course of time into a mighty stem, for overshadowing the parent tree.

Of the progress of banking in the next twenty or thirty years after it had been established, a curious account is given in a small pamphlet of eight quarto pages by an anonymous writer, published in 1676, and entitled "The Mystery of the new-fashioned Goldsmiths, or Bankers, discovered." After giving a sketch of the manner in which the London goldsmiths became the depositaries of the funds of their fellow citizens, the author proceeds: "And this new banking business soon grew very considerable. It happened, in those times of civil commotion, that the Parliament, out of the plate, and from the old coin brought into the mint, coined seven millions into half-crowns, and there being no mills then in use at the mint, this new money was of a very unequal weight, sometimes twopence and threepence difference in an ounce; and most of it was, as it seems, heavier than it ought to have been in proportion to the value in foreign parts. Of this the goldsmiths made naturally the advantages usual in such cases, by picking out or culling the heaviest, and melting them down and exporting them. It happened also that our gold coins were too weighty, and of these also they took the like advantage. Moreover, such merchants' servants as still kept their masters' running cash had fallen into a way of clandestinely lending the same to the goldsmiths, at fourpence per cent. per diem, who, by these and such-like means, were enabled to lend out great quantities of cash to necessitous merchants and others, weekly or monthly at high interest, and also began to discount the merchants' bills at the like or an higher rate of interest. And, much about the same time, the goldsmiths, or new-fashioned bankers, began to receive the rents of gentlemen's estates, remitted to town, and to allow them, and others who put cash into their hands, some interest for it, if it remained but for a single month in their hands, or even a lesser time. This was a great allurements for people to put their money into their hands, which would bear interest till the day they wanted it. And they could also draw it out by one hundred pounds, or fifty pounds, or less at a time, as they wanted it, with infinitely less trouble than if they had lent it out on either real or personal security. The consequence was that it quickly brought a great quantity of cash into their hands, so that the chief or greatest of them were now enabled to supply Cromwell with money in advance on the revenues, as his occasions required, upon great advantages to themselves."

The "great advantages" were so visible, indeed, as to engender a general wish to participate in them, and a vast number of schemes relating to the establishment of banks and of banking associations sprang up during the Commonwealth. Among those that attracted the greatest attention was a project brought forth by one William Potter, and advocated by him in a treatise with the alluring title of "The Key of Wealth," for the foundation of a "Land Bank." William Potter, a man evidently in advance of his time, proposed to free land from the fetters of old feudal legislation, and to turn it into convertible wealth, changing hands like gold, diamonds, or other personal property. The "Land Bank" was to be a state establishment, and, by the details of the scheme, "all payments above twenty pounds should by law be directed to be made in bank credit," while, as to its organisation, besides the principal bank in London, there should be at least one hundred subordinate banks in different parts of England, all centering in the said capital bank, of London, which has, for the support of its credit, the general mortgage of lands, for which the mortgagee should have credit in bank to the full value of his land." It was believed that the Lord Protector was favourable to this scheme, which, however, was not proceeded with. If carried out, it might have produced a revolution of astounding magnitude, upsetting the whole framework of English society.

The vast development of commerce during the middle of the seventeenth century, exhibited, as much as in anything else, in the foundation of banks and credit institutions, acting both as receivers and as distributors of newly-risen streams of wealth, was accompanied by an equal progress of industry. Many improvements were made, as well in the reigns of James and Charles as for the next dozen years of republican government, in the production of textile fabrics. The art of dyeing wool was introduced by Dutch and Flemish artisans in London and at various places in the eastern counties, while the weaving trade likewise made great advances, so that English cloth, which previously had been of a coarse kind, manufactured chiefly for home consumption, came to be largely exported, being acknowledged equal to the best broadcloths of the Continent. An equally important branch of industry, the cotton manufacture, was planted in the kingdom in the early part of the period, cotton wool being imported from Turkey by the Levant Company, and used at Manchester in the production of so-called "mixed goods," that is, of fabrics in which the warp was composed of linen, and the weft of cotton. The manufacture of silk, brought over from France and Italy, likewise attracted much attention, and great exertions were made, by foreigners as well as natives, to establish it firmly in England. In 1603, King James, impelled by a momentary fancy, took it under his protection, and to encourage the growth of the mulberry, sent thousands of young plants all over the country. The culture of mulberry-trees thereupon became the fashion, followed, among others, by the great poet of that and of all ages, whose hands, if tradition can be believed, set one of James's plants in a garden of his native Stratford-on-the-Avon, to serve as point of pilgrimage for future generations of admirers.

However, though the mulberries grew well, the breeding of the worms did not succeed, and raw silk had to be imported from abroad, being found much better and cheaper than the home produce. In 1630, the silk manufacture, chiefly established in London, had so far increased that King Charles deemed it requisite to bring it within the reach of his proclamations. "The trade of silk within this realm," his majesty notified, "hath much increased, within a few years past, by the importation thereof raw from foreign parts, and throwing, dyeing, and working the same into manufactures here at home. But a fraud in the dyeing thereof being lately discovered, by adding to the weight of silk in the dye beyond a just proportion, by a false and deceitful mixture of the ingredients used in dyeing, whereby also the silk is weakened and corrupted, and the colour made worse. Wherefore we strictly command that no silk dyer do hereafter use any slip, alder-bark, filings of iron, or other deceitful matter, in dyeing of silk, either black or coloured; that no silk shall be dyed of any other black but Spanish black, and not of the dye called London black; neither shall they dye any silk before the gum be fair boiled-off from the silk, being raw." By dint of many other regulations of the same kind, Charles succeeded in compressing the new manufacture within narrow limits; but it underwent an extraordinary development as soon as his rule had come to an end, and by the year 1660 the company of silk throwsters in the metropolis had come to employ about forty thousand workpeople. The greater number of these were Huguenot refugees, the flower of the population of France, driven by religious persecution from their homes, and repaying the hospitality offered to them in the land of their settlement by founding new arts and industries, and thus offering an important aid to the rise of national prosperity.

Equal in importance, at least, to the textile industries was that in metals, chiefly iron, the manufacture of which made vast progress in the first half of the seventeenth century. As the art of smelting iron by ordinary or pit-coal was not yet discovered, charcoal had to be used, and on this account the best-wooded districts of England, such as Kent, Sussex, Surrey, and Gloucestershire, in the last-named county the district of Dean forest in particular, became the principal seat of the manufacture. In a book called "Treatise on Metallica," by James Sturtevant, published in 1612, the total number of iron factories, or mills, in England, and Wales was estimated at eight hundred, of which, as the author certified, "there are four hundred milnes in Surry, Kent, and Sussex." But these ironworks were not an unmixed benefit to the country, for although leading to the progress of all arts, in the increasing perfection of the noblest and most indispensable of metals, they went far, as then carried on, to deprive England of one of its natural riches, its splendid woods and forests. The steadily augmenting destruction of these was a standing complaint of the writers of the period. "Ho that well observeth it," says John Norden, in the "Surveyor's Dialogue," published in the reign of James, "and hath known the wealds of Sussex, Surry, and Kent, the grand nursery especially of oak and beech, shall find such an alteration, within lesse than thirty years, as may well strike a fear lest few years more, as pestilent as the former, will leave few good trees standing in the wealds. Such a heat issueth out of the many forges and furnaces for the making of iron, and out of the glass kilns as hath devoured many famous woods within the wealds."

Fortunately, there was a remedy at hand for the great evil complained of. Early in the reign of James, several patents had been granted to Germans and Dutchmen for the use of pit-coal in the manufacture of iron, but none of these attempts came to anything, till, in the year 1621, Lord Dudley, of Dudley Castle, owner of extensive beds of coal and iron, obtained the king's special privilege to carry out "the mystery and art of melting iron ore, and of making the same into cast workes, or bars, with sea-coals, or pit-coals in furnaces, with bellows." The enterprise was not at once successful; however, through the undaunted perseverance of a son of Lord Dudley, known as Dud Dudley, all obstacles were overcome in the end, and while the manufacture of iron was revolutionized, the greatest and most legitimate of all English industries got seated in the districts appointed by nature for its home. "God hath decreed the time," piously remarked Dud Dudley, "when and how these smiths should be supplied, and this island also, with iron, and most especially that this coal and ironstone should give the first and just occasion for the invention of smelting iron with pit-coal." Oliver Cromwell himself, ambitious not only to handle iron but to forge it, subsequently became partner, with several of his officers, in an undertaking for smelting ores after the new invention, and from thence commenced that period of marvellous development of the grand industry which ended in making England the workshop of the world.

CHAPTER VI.

History of the Social Life of the People, Manners, and Customs, from the Accession of James I., A.D. 1603, to the Dissolution of the Commonwealth, A.D. 1660.

EXTRAORDINARY changes took place in the social condition, manners, and customs of the English people during the life of the first two generations of the seventeenth century. When the first Stuart king rode from Edinburgh to London, "in colours as green as the grass he trod on, with a feather in his cap, and a horn instead of a sword by his side," he found himself greeted by a radiant throng of knights, nobles, and courtiers, glittering in scarlet and gold, in the light of whose splendours all else was eclipsed, they standing forth as sole actors on the romantic stage of "merry England." When the third Stuart king landed at Dover, he had before his eyes an armed host, iron-breasted, sober of mien, the shadow of whose swords fell over a multitude darker yet in outward aspect, and sadder still in countenance. The famous "merry England" of historical romance was at its height when the erudite son of Mary Stuart came over from Scotland to take possession of Elizabeth's throne; and though professing to despise all that she had done, he freely accepted the luxury and sumptuousness that had been inaugurated under her. During his reign, and not a little by his example and that of his successive favourites, extravagance of living increased to the highest point, and while the country was suffering, and the people preparing for revolt, the court and upper classes were revelling in feasts, and disporting themselves in lavish prodigality of attire, such as had never before been seen. As sketched by John Taylor, a verse-making boatman, known from his occupation as the "water-poet," every nobleman and courtier of King James wore—

"A firm in shoestrings edged with gold,
And spangled garters worth a copyhold;
A hose and doublet which a lordship cost;
A gaudy cloak, three manors' price almost;
A beaver band, and feather for the head,
Prized at the church's tithe—the poor man's bread."

As always, so in this instance, the extravagance of the court acted upon the middle classes, the more so now as increasing wealth and expanding trade allowed the indulgence in luxuries not known to former ages. In a play, called "The City Madam," produced about the year 1606, the wife of a prosperous city merchant, who has just received, or purchased, the honour of knighthood, is thus addressed by a brother, who describes her former and present mode of attire—

"You wore
Sat on solemn days, a chain of gold,
A velvet hood, rich borders, and sometimes
A dainty miniver cap, a silver pin
Headed with pearl, worth three pence; and thus far,
You were privileged. No man envied it,
It being for the city's honour that There should be a distinction made between The wife of a patrician and a plebeian."

Such she was, the good brother reminds his sister, before her husband had been dubbed a knight, which, he holds, has made her vain and frivolous, so as to adopt courtly fashions. He complains—

"You have
The reverend hood cast off. Your borrowed hair, Powdered and curl'd, is by your dresser's art
Form'd like a coronet, hang'd with diamonds
And richest oriental pearls. Your casanets
That do adorn your neck are of equal value.
Your Hungerland bands, and Spanish Quellio ruffs, Great lords and ladies feast but to survey.
You have embroidered petticoats; and you feign sickness
That your night-trails, of forty pounds a-piece,
May be seen with envy of the visitants,
As rich portables, in ostentation shown,
And roses worth a family. You are serv'd in plate,
And stir not a foot without a coach."

COSTUMES—CHARLES I.

That there was no exaggeration in the picture thus sketched is proved by many contemporary records, among others by a curious letter preserved in the Harleian manuscripts, full of information as to the domestic life and family arrangements of the great ladies of the period. The writer was the daughter and sole heiress of Sir John Spencer, nicknamed from his wealth "Rich Spencer," and who addressed the letter to her husband, to whom she had just been married, William, Lord Compton, subsequently earl of Northampton. "My sweet life," the young lady began, "now I have declared to you my mind for the settling of your state, I suppose that it were best for me to bethink and consider within myself what allowance were meetest for me. I pray and beseech you to grant to me, your most kind and loving wife, the sum of 2,600 pounds, quarterly to be paid. Also I would, besides that allowance, have 600 pounds, quarterly to be paid, for the performance of charitable works; and those things I would not, neither will be, accountable for. Also, I will have three horses for my own saddle, that none shall dare to lend or borrow: none lend but I, none borrow but you. Also, I would have two gentlewomen, lest one should be sick, or have some other let: also, believe it, it is an undecent thing for a gentlewoman to stand mumping alone, when God hath blessed their lord and lady with a great estate. Also, when I ride a hunting or a hawking, or travel from one house to another, I will have them attending; so for either of these said women, I must and will have for either of them a horse. Also, I will have six or eight gentlemen; and I will have my two coaches, one lined with velvet to myself, with four very fair horses; and a coach for my women, lined with cloth, and laced with gold, otherwise with scarlet, and laced with silver, with four good horses. Also, I will have two coachmen, one for my own coach, the other for my women. Also, at any time when I travel, I will be allowed not only caroches and spare horses for me and my women, but I will have such carriages as shall be fitting for all; orderly, not pestering my things with my women's, nor theirs with either chambermaid's, nor theirs with washmaid's. Also, for laundresses, when I travel, I will have them sent away before with the carriages, to see all safe. And the chambermaids I will have go before, that the chamber may be ready, sweet, and clean. Also, for that it is undecent to crowd up myself with my gentleman-usher in my coach, I will have him to have a convenient horse, to attend me either in city or country. And I must have two footmen. And my desire is that you defray all the charges for me. And for myself, besides my yearly allowance, I would have twenty gowns of apparel, six of them excellent good ones, eight of them for the country, and six other of them very excellent good ones. Also, I would have to put in my purse 2000 pounds and 200 pounds, and so you to pay my debts. Also, I would have 6000 pounds to buy me jewels, and 4000 pounds to buy me a pearl chain. Now, seeing I have beef, and am, so reasonable unto you, I pray you do find my children apparel and their schooling, and all my servants, men and women, their wages. Also, I will have all my houses furnished, and my lodging-chambers to be suited with all such furniture as is fit; as beds, stools, chairs, suitable cushions, carpets, silver warming-pans, cupboard of plate, fair hangings, and such like. So, for my drawing-chamber, in all houses, I will have them delicately furnished both with hangings, couch, canopy, glass, carpet, chairs, cushions, and all things thereunto belonging. Also, my desire is, that you would pay your debts, build up Ashley House, and purchase lands; and lend no money, as you love God, to my Lord Chamberlain, who would have all, perhaps your life from you.—So, now that I have declared to you what I would have, and what it is that I would not have, I pray you, when you be an earl, to allow me 2000 pounds more than I now desire, and double attendance." The compound spirit of affection, meekness, and voracity breathing in this note is wonderfully characteristic of the times of the first Stuart. No other age could have produced the intimation of a youthful wife to "lend no money, as you love God, to my Lord Chamberlain." At required a monarch like James I. to find out the connection between God and the Lord Chamberlain.

Both the dress of men and women was extremely ostentatious and foppish during the whole of the reigns of James and his successor. The male courtiers overloaded their garments with gold, jewelry, and ornaments of all kinds, while the bulk of the upper and middle classes more or less imitated their example. In one of the comedies of the earlier part of the period, a young gentleman thus describes the dress which he wore when fighting a duel with a friend. "I had on," he says, "a gold cable hat-band, new come-up, of massive goldsmith's work, which I wore about a French murrey hat, the brims of which were thick embroidered with gold twist and spangles; I had also an Italian cut-work band round my neck, ornamented with pearls, which cost me three pounds at the Exchange." Then he describes the results of the fight, and how the sword of his antagonist made a hash of his fine clothes. "He, making a reverse blow," the young duellist exclaims, "falls upon my embossed girdle, and, as I had thrown off the hangers a little before, strikes off a skirt of a thick doublet I had, lined with four taffetas, cuts off two panes of embroidered pearls, rends through the drawings-out of tissue, enters the linings, and skips the flesh; and not having leisure to put off my silver spurs, one of the rowels catch'd hold of the ruffle of my boot, which being Spanish leather, and subject to tear, overthrows me, and rends me two pairs of silk stockings of peach colour that I had put on, it being a raw morning." Before the reign of James had come to an end, the love of luxury in dress had spread so far among all classes that even farmers and agricultural labourers arrayed themselves in garments made in ludicrous imitation of those of city gentlemen. In a play called "The Tale of a Tub," a rustic is described as getting ready for his wedding day "a leather doublet with long points, a pair of breeches pinn'd up like pudding bags, with yellow stockings, and his hat turn'd up with a silver clasp on the leer side." In another comedy, entitled "Willy Beguiled," a country girl is made to say, "Upon the morrow, after the blessed new year, I came trip, trip, trip, over the Market-hill, holding up my petticoat to the calves of my legs, to show my fine coloured stockings, and how finely I could foot it in a pair of new cork'd shoes I had bought." Quite in keeping with the general style of dress, both men and women painted their cheeks, noses, and eyebrows. A lady's toilet chamber is described in one of the contemporary plays as holding "a table, a cushion, a looking-glass, and a chafing-dish, with a small phial of white mixture, and two little pots, one of white, and the other of red paint." The five gentlemen were as forward in painting and perfuming themselves as the ladies, according to a comedy of the period, called "The Widow," in which Valeria, the heroine, says to her friend Ricardo, "Are you painted? One painted bean has just been here." To which he replies, "Here! ha! I think I smell am. 'Tis vermilion, sure." Growing puritanism, stalking about in dark garments, with knitted eyebrows, found much room for reflection here, and for execration.

While wantonness and extravagance, encouraged by the rulers of the nation, were spreading in all directions among the upper and middle classes, the condition of the bulk of the people was of the most deplorable kind. In spite of the operation of the poor laws passed in the reign of Elizabeth, the land was swarming with beggars, vagabonds, and destitute individuals of all kinds, and the most severe enactments made against them failed to take any effect in diminishing the number. The increase of pauperism, in itself the result of a stagnation of social life, engendered by the blight of despotism, was furthered by the general corruption of the official class, which beginning at the summit of government, gradually extended to the lowest spheres. The laws providing for the maintenance of helpless persons were no more attended to by local functionaries than the higher laws of the constitution were by the head of the state; the same spirit of unlicensed tyranny, and the same absence of high moral feelings and sense of duty prevailing in either case. "Though the number of the poor do daily increase," says the author of a pamphlet entitled "Groans for the Poor," published in 1622, "there hath been no collection for them; no, not these seven years, in many parishes of this land, especially in county towns. But many of those parishes turneth forth their poor, yea, and their lusty labourers that will not work, or for any misdemeanor want work, to beg, filch, and steal for their maintenance, so that the country is pitifully pestered with them; yea, and the maimed soldiers, that have ventured their lives and lost their limbs in our behalf, are also thus requited. For when they return home, to live by some labour in their native country, though they can work well in some kind of labour, every man saith, 'We will not be troubled with their service, but make other shift for our business.' So are they turned forth to travel in idleness, the highway to hell, and to seek their meat upon nines," as the proverb goeth, with begging, filching and stealing for their maintenance, until the law bring them unto the fearful end of hanging." But the hanging system, congenial though it was to the spirit of Stuart government, could not be persevered in for any length of time, and recourse had to be had to fresh legislative measures. By several decrees issued during the reign of James, the provisions of the statute passed in the 39th year of Elizabeth, for the erecting of houses where the poor might be set to labour, were re-enacted, with additions, it being ordered that every parish, or poor law union, should establish "houses of correction, provided with mills, turns, cards, and such like necessary implements, to set rogues and other idle people to work." Under Charles, the principle here laid down was further carried out by a series of ordinances, the most important of which, passed in 1630, commanded that "corrector houses in all counties shall be made adjoining to the common prisons, and the gaoler be made governor of them." Thus gradually arose, step by step, the workhouse system, adopted by England as a lame substitute for the compulsory education of the masses, the only certain cure for the cancer of its social existence, huge pauperism, dark shadow of huge wealth.

decay under the arbitrary rule of the two Stuart monarchs, the capital of the kingdom, enjoying vast liberties and municipal privileges, amounting almost to self-government, went on increasing in prosperity. One of the signs of it was a vast undertaking, commenced in the year 1605, for supplying the city and its growing suburbs with drinking water, better than that obtained from the river Thames. By an act of parliament of the third of James, an association, headed by "Mr. Hugh Myddleton, citizen and goldsmith," was authorized to "bring a fresh stream of running water to the north parts of London, from the springs of Chadwell, Amwell, and others, in the county of Hertford," and power was given to the lord mayor "to lay out such convenient ground for the making of the trench for the said new river, not to exceed ten feet in breadth, leaving the inheritance in the owners thereof, who are to allow a free passage through their grounds to and from the said open cut at all times, with carts, horses, and men, for making and repairing the same, for which satisfaction or composition shall be made to the owners of lands." Another act of parliament, passed in the following year, prescribed "that since the making of the preceding statute, upon view of the grounds through which the waters are to pass, by men of skill, it is thought more convenient and less damage to the ground, that the waters be conveyed through a trunk, or vault, of brick or stone, inclosed, and in some places, where need is, raised by arches, than in an open trench or sewer." The latter was decidedly an improved plan, but it turned out beyond the material resources of the time and the means at the command of the enterprising citizen and goldsmith, and his associates. They had to fight, besides, not only against obstacles imposed by nature, but against a whole host of ancient prejudices. "If those enemies of all good endeavours," writes John Stow, friend and admirer of Hugh Myddleton, "danger, difficulty, impossibility, detraction, contempt, scorn, derision, yea, and desperate despite, could have prevailed, by their accursed and malevolent interposition, either before, at the beginning, or in the birth of the proceeding, or in the least stolen advantage of the whole prosecution, this work, of so great worth, had never been accomplished."

The undertaking was accomplished at last, after ten years' hard labour, though the plan to construct an enclosed vault, after the fashion of the grand Roman aqueducts, had to be abandoned in favour of the originally designed "open cut." Success, as always, so in this instance, brought forth its worshippers, and whereas Hugh Myddleton had been formerly depicted as a visionary and madman, if nothing worse, great and little men now vied with each other to render him honour. King James condescended to include him in the list of the army of knights which the touch of his royal sword was raising from among farmers, shopkeepers, and others able to put money in his pocket, while the corporation of London showed their approval by electing Thomas Myddleton, brother of Hugh, lord mayor for the year in which the waters of the "New River" were to be formally admitted into a vast reservoir, built "at Clerkenwell, near Islington," from which point they were to be distributed all over the city and suburbs. The affair was made the occasion of a great pageant, in which all London took part, on Michaelmas-day, 1613. The lord mayor, on a white palfrey, the aldermen in their scarlet robes, the members of the common council, the city companies, and a crowd of other eminent denizens of the capital, having assembled near the Clerkenwell reservoir, they passed round it in procession, greeted, amidst the sound of martial music, by the company of workers who had constructed the first of English aqueducts. These was poetic talent, as well as sinews and muscle, among the earnest toilers, for on marching up to the lord mayor and aldermen, one of them came forward and recited an address in rhyme which he had composed for the occasion, describing the character and duties of his fellow-workmen. A part of it, interesting as a sketch of the hierarchy of labour of the time, ran:

"First, here's the Overseer: this try'd man,
An antient souldier and an artizan.
The Clerke next: then the Mathematician
The Maister of the Timber-work takes place
Next after these. The Mesurer in like case, Bricklayer, and Engineer; and after those
The Borer and the Pavier. Then it shewes
The Labourers: next the Keeper of Anwell Head;
The Walkers last. So all their names are read.
Yet these but parcels of six hundred more,
That, at one time, have been employed before;
But these in sight, and all the rest, will say
That all the week they had their royal pay."

The recitation over, the flood-gates that kept the New River were thrown open, and the clear stream rushed in, amidst the shouts of the multitude, the pealing of bells, the braying of trumpets, and the firing of "charibers," or small mortars. London now, for the first time in its history, had good drinking water; but for near a generation longer the people were prejudiced against the conduits that brought it, and from morn to night there might be heard resounding through the streets the cry of the carriers, shouting, "Any water here? Fresh and fair water! None of your pipe sludge!"

Of the mode of living, and the cost of the chief articles of food and drink during the reign of James and Charles, the many ordinances issued by two kings give a minute account. In 1622, James entered into a contract with two "undertakers," Sir Allen Aspley, and Sir Sampson Darrell, for victualling the royal navy, and it was settled that the latter should be allowed for every individual in the fleet sevenpence a day when in harbour, and eightpence when at sea. In return for this sum, the contractors agreed to furnish every man, per diem, with one pound of biscuit, one gallon of beer, two pounds of beef for four days in the week, or else, instead of beef, for two of those four days, one pound of pork, or bacon, and one pint of pease, and for the rest of the week, one quarter of stockfish, or herrings, half a quarter of a pound of butter, and a quarter of a pound of cheese. According to modern notions, the allowance of beer was on a rather high scale, and the admeasurement of the rest of the victuals by no means illiberal; nevertheless, the sailors of his majesty's fleet rebelled against it, and clamouring loud, both under James and Charles, the latter had to make new arrangements, the first point of which was the throwing overboard of the "undertakers." By a proclamation, issued in 1626, it was ordered "that the medium allowance for every sailor shall be twenty shillings a month, which till now was but fourteen shillings, by which means there will accrue to every ordinary sailor fourteen shillings, net money, per month, besides an allowance, out of it, of four pence to a preacher, two pence to a barber, and six pence per month to the chest, at Chatham: whereas the ordinary men have now but nine shillings and four pence, net money, per month, and no allowance at all given to the preacher." The pay of soldiers, throughout the period, was rather better than that of the sailors, and as far back as the year 1612, when James raised four thousand fighting men for some German princes to settle a dispute about the duchies of Juliers and Cleves, the remuneration of each private was fixed at one shilling per diem. A serjeant-major was to have five shillings, a lieutenant six shillings, a colonel one pound, and the general, commander in chief of the force, five pounds a day. Large as these sums were, considering the value of money of the time, they greatly increased at the commencement of the civil war, when there was a hard competition between king and parliament for men versed in the art of murder.

While regulating the social condition and mode of living of the common people, no less than that of sailors and soldiers, James I., and still more his son, Charles I., issued repeatedly decrees fixing the amount to be paid to various descriptions of artificers and craftsmen, as well as the price to be given in provisions for the articles they furnished. In 1633, a royal proclamation went forth, in which inquiries had been made "by the clerk of the king's household," into the state of the sorts of victuals, and that on his report he had drawn up a list of "reasonable prices" for henceforth and until further comm

the standard of value. There was to be paid for "a turkey, in the poulterer's shop," four shillings and sixpence; for "a turkey hen," three shillings and fourpence; for "a wild duck," eightpence; for "a tame duck," twopence, and for a partridge, one shilling; for "the best fat goose in the market," two shillings, and for "the best fat goose in the poulterer's shop," two and fourpence; for "a capon fat and crammed, the best in the market," two shillings and twopence, and for the same "in the poulterer's shop," two and sixpence; for "the best fat and crammed pullet, in the poulterer's shop," one shilling and eightpence; for "a hen of the best sort in the market," one shilling, and for "a chicken of the best and largest sort," fivepence; for "the best rabbit, till Allhallowtide," sevenpence, and "from Allhallowtide till Lent," eightpence; for "a dozen of wild pigeons," one shilling and eightpence; for "a pound of the best salt butter, fourpence-halfpenny, and for a pound of fresh butter, sixpence; and, finally, three eggs for one penny. Nothing was said in the royal ordinance about the price of bread, which, as appears from all accounts, varied enormously, owing mainly to want of roads and effective means of intercommunication, which made each district depend upon its own resources, so that a good local crop caused extraordinary cheapness, while a defective harvest produced dearth and consequent dearthness. The average price of wheat, from 1606 to 1625, was thirty-four shillings a quarter, but in some years it was as high as fifty-eight, and in others as low as twenty-nine shillings. During the reign of Charles I. the cost of it rose considerably, though with constant and immense fluctuations, varying from forty to eighty-five shillings. In 1631, the quarter of wheat was sixty-eight shillings; in 1636 it was fifty-six; in 1646 it had fallen to forty-eight; in the next year, 1647, it rose suddenly to seventy-four, and in 1648 to the exorbitant sum of eighty-five shillings. After the execution of Charles, and the establishment of settled government, the price fell again, and in 1654 had come to be as low as twenty-six shillings. In all probability, the vast prices indicated in these figures, and which so fully affected the physical condition of the people, exercised not a little influence upon the course of political affairs. It was something more than chance that wheat was at famine price in the severe winter of 1648-9, when the king was led to the scaffold.

To lower the price of provisions, Charles I., besides fixing the value of nearly all articles, issued, at various times, a number of ordinances, of the most arbitrary kind. In 1633 there appeared a curious proclamation, adjusting the management of taverns, inns, and bakeries. It was stated in the preamble that "laidials of all sorts have become dear of late years, ordinances, & annual charge of the king's household is 1630, commended; and the court of Star Chamber having counties shewing into the causes thereof," his majesty prours, and, to send forth "several regulations for Thus gradually the prices of provisions and horse-meat, system, adopted accordingly, first, that "for the future for the compulsory their lately taken-up practice of certain cure for the and that henceforth they shall pauperism, dar to me, and bread to eat therewith."

While may commanded that "bakers shall not make their bread above twelve, or at most thirteen to the dozen; whereas now they make sixteen, which pinches the poor." The third injunction was, that "ordinaries shall not take above two shillings per head for dining, wife included, and not above eightpence per head for a servant attending his master. Lastly, his majesty directed that, "considering the present prices of hay and oats, sixpence per day and night for hay and stabling for a horse, and sixpence per peck for oats, shall be sufficient, without taking anything for litter; also the innkeeper may take one penny only per horse for stabling room, not being unbridled, and going away the same day, and twopence if he be unbridled, and have hay, and goes away before night." The next year Charles was at the innkeepers again, commanding that they should only sell liquor, and have nothing to do with the making. The royal decree animadverted in severe terms upon "the great number of innkeepers and victuallers who take upon them to brew ale and beer, which they sell by retail, and make too strong and heady, serving for drunkenness and excess. An order was made at the same time "for restraining the excessive number of common maltsters, by means of whom not only a greater consumption and waste of barley is occasioned, but also sundry abuses in the bad making of malt," it being decreed that from thenceforth "the king will appoint, in fit places throughout the realm, a competent number of maltsters to be incorporated, and also of common brewers, under such fines and yearly payments as shall be thought meet." A further ordinance, published in 1637, commanded that "for the sake of the poorer sort of people, whose usual bread is barley, as well as for the reasons assigned in the proclamation of the preceding year, the common maltsters in every county shall be incorporated, and none of them shall follow any other calling; also, that no maltster shall be a brewer or cooper at the same time. Common maltsters and common brewers shall only practise their trades in such places as shall be assigned by the king and privy council, and none but such to practise anywhere. No innkeeper, alehouse-keeper, or victualler shall brew the drink by retails, unless there be no common brewer near the place where he lives."

Carriages for public hire, or hackney coaches—from the French word 'haquenée,' a jade—were first introduced into London about the year 1630, and their appearance gave no little trouble to the bewildered king, who could not make up his mind for a while whether he should make them useful for taxing purposes, or crush them by a proclamation. In 1635 he decided upon the latter step, issuing a decree which stated that "the great number of hackney coaches of late time seen and kept in London, Westminster, and their suburbs, and the general and promiscuous use of coaches there, are not only a great disturbance to his majesty, his dearest consort the queen, the nobility, and others of place and degree, in their passage through the streets, but the streets themselves are so posteried, and the pavements so broken up, that the common passage is thereby hindered, and also the prices of hay and provender thereby made exceedingly dear: Wherefore we expressly command and forbid that no hackney, or hired coaches, be used or suffered
